HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 18, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Second report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Croll.

CRIMINAL LAW—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West) presented the first report of the joint committee on capital and corporal punishment and lotteries, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

CANNED SALMON—RELAXATION OF IMPORT RESTRICTIONS BY AUSTRALIAN GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wish to inform the house that the Australian government is undertaking a measure of relaxation in its import restrictions upon canned salmon. This news is important because it signifies the partial reopening of the Australian market to a Canadian export product which has been excluded from there in recent years. Further details on this matter will come from the Australian government.

While the total quantities involved may not be large, this renewed opportunity for trade will undoubtedly be welcomed in British Columbia and elsewhere in Canada as evidence of progress in returning to more normal conditions of world trade. Canned salmon is one of our major export products. Immediately before the war Canada had a market for canned salmon in Australia which amounted to $1½ million or $2 million per year. Since then these exports have been much reduced, until in recent years the quantities have become negligible. The Australian decision will, therefore, permit the Canadian industry to return once more to this traditional market.

The house is aware of the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), accompanied by a delegation of senior officials, attended the commonwealth finance ministers' conference in Sydney, Australia, last month. Following that conference the Canadian representatives took advantage of the opportunity of discussing trade questions with the Australian government in Canberra.

I desire to extend my vote of thanks to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister whether he can tell the house how much salmon is involved in the deal?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We were asked by the Australian government not to disclose that information at the moment. It will be released in Australia.

WHEAT

NEW SELLING PRICES AT VANCOUVER, FORT WILLIAM AND CHURCHILL

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Is it the intention of the Acting Prime Minister to make any announcement today with regard to the reduction in the price of wheat and the particular circumstances in which that reduction has been made?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be glad to do so, if it is the wish of the house. I thought there might be a question asked with respect to the matter, and that I would then make a statement.

The new prices that have been issued do not really represent a lowering of the prices. We have three marketing points. One is Vancouver, another is Fort William-Port Arthur and the third is Churchill. It has been our policy to price our wheat for export the same at all three points. In other words, the price at Vancouver is also the price at which grain is sold at Fort William and at Churchill. Owing to higher rail rates within Canada and lower ocean freight rates outside of Canada, the effect of that policy has been that the comparative Vancouver rate has been very much lower than the Fort William rate. While the port of Vancouver has been working to full capacity—in fact we have even exceeded the record of this time last year in shipments from Vancouver—we have lost business in the east owing to the fact that our selling prices on the east coast were out of line with world markets.

There has been no change in the selling price at Vancouver; there has been a slight increase in the selling price at Churchill, and there has been a reduction in the selling price at Fort William.

I can give the relative figures. These sales are based on United States funds. The Vancouver price today, in United States funds, is $1.92⅝; at Churchill the new price is $1.94⅝; and the new price at Fort William is $1.85⅜. I have here the prices of the various grades. If the hon. members wish me to do so I can put the table on Hansard. I am satisfied that the new pricing is realistic and will allow grain to move in the normal way.

The effect in the country was that while producers in Alberta are being enabled to fill their five-bushel quota, the same privilege has not been afforded to producers in Manitoba and in eastern Saskatchewan. If the old pricing had been continued, that would have been the effect for a considerable period.

The board has perhaps been a little slow in moving in a situation that was becoming more and more difficult all the time.

Britain has been buying nearly all her wheat basis Vancouver, bringing it through the canal and enjoying a price reduction in London by doing so. This will permit Britain to buy basis Vancouver, Montreal or Halifax and get the same delivered price in the United Kingdom no matter from which port they wish to buy.

I might point out that these prices are the prices of this day. The prices I have given were issued by the board as being good until noon today. Tomorrow's price lists may be different, and if the demand strengthens there is a distinct possibility that prices may be increased. But to have a price at Fort William that is not effective because no wheat is being sold at Fort William is hardly a situation that any member of the house, I think, would wish to have continued. The list of prices is as follows:

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD PRICES

NOTE: These are the second day's prices under the new pricing arrangement. The changes from the previous day are as follows:—

(a) All prices up 1/8 cent, except

Conversions made at .96 19/32.

Mr. Drew: Then the new policy, and it is a new policy, is mainly directed toward encouraging the shipping of wheat east from Fort William instead of letting the preponderance of shipments go by Vancouver, as has been the case in recent months. As I understand it, up to January 27, 65 million bushels were shipped from Vancouver and 49 million bushels from the eastern seaboard. This is not so much a question of commercial pricing as a question of seeking to redirect the movement of wheat by the price. Is that not the case?

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I would hardly say the purpose is to redirect wheat. It is to equalize the various outlets, to set the prices at these ports in a way that will give the buyer the option of buying from the port which he usually uses, without a price penalty. That is the real situation. I think it will have no effect on the Vancouver movement. In fact the port of Vancouver is booked well through March at the present time. But we are losing business to other countries that the port of Vancouver is incapable of handling, and I think this correction of the price differential will correct that situation and result in the sale of more Canadian wheat.

Mr. Drew: Will this have the effect of bringing about a different price to the producer in the eastern part of the western provinces compared with the producer in the western part of the western provinces?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

Mr. Drew: The price will remain the same?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask the minister a question. Will the effect of the announced change not be to reduce by 7 cents a bushel, in respect of the quantity of wheat that would otherwise have gone through Port Arthur and Fort William, the funds going to the wheat board, and consequently bring a reduction in the return to the producer not of 7 cents a bushel but of part of the 7 cents?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There is no grain through Fort William and Port Arthur. You cannot decrease nothing.

Mr. Argue: There were 45 million bushels this crop year.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That was last summer, when the freight rate situation was somewhat different.

Mr. Argue: You cannot get through on account of the ice?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, the wheat goes down by rail. When water movement is free a new look will be taken at the situation. These differentials are not fixed. Today grain has to be moved either from Fort William and Port Arthur or from the Georgian bay by rail to Halifax and Saint John, and the change in pricing is realistic in view of that situation.

[Later:]

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with his statement. Is there in contemplation any increase in facilities for the handling of grain at the port of Vancouver?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have had no information of any contemplated increase in facilities.

DRUGS

VITAMIN PREPARATIONS—INQUIRY AS TO STRENGTH

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to table a written reply to the question which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway asked me yesterday.

Mr. MacInnis: I think this question is of considerable importance, and if the answer is not too long I would ask the minister to put it on Hansard.

Mr. Claxton: Let us stick to the rules.

An hon. Member: Let him read the answer.

Mr. MacInnis: We did that a moment ago with the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Martin: I think it could be put on Hansard if I table it. If I table it, it would go on Hansard with unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles: Tabling does not put it on Hansard.

Mr. Martin: It will go on if we agree.

Mr. Speaker: Is the answer tabled or is it to be printed in Hansard?

Mr. Martin: Tabled, and it will be printed in Hansard. I think that was the request of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Fulton: They are two different things.

Mr. Speaker: Tabling is one thing and having a document printed in Hansard is another. If it is to be printed in Hansard I will have to ask hon. members if they will give their consent. Is it agreed that it be printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin: The answer is as follows:

A comprehensive survey by the food and drug divisions of the Department of National Health and Welfare of over 250 manufacturers representing practically the entire trade has shown that those companies supplying the bulk of pharmaceutical vitamins now have products which meet their label claims. Products of manufacturers with inadequate controls were not as satisfactory but these have been checked and considerable improvement has been shown.

The food and drug divisions analyse samples taken from the market and those not meeting the strength declared on the labels are withdrawn from sale. Checks are also made by the department of the labels and advertising of these products to make certain that they are honestly presented to the public.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN MARITIME COMMISSION ESCROW FUND

Mr. Green:

1. What is the nature of the escrow fund under the replacement plan administered by the Canadian maritime commission?
2. How many ships have been sold under this replacement plan?
3. What is the amount of the total deposits now in this escrow fund and to whom does this money belong?

Questions

4. In what manner have funds drawn from this escrow fund been used?
5. How much is now available in the fund for acquisition of new tonnage?
6. Were funds permitted to be used for building other than ocean-going replacements for the vessels sold?
7. Have any ocean-going dry cargo ships been acquired under the plan to date?
8. If not, what is the reason?
9. Have any proposals for acquisition of more modern dry cargo tonnage been made to the Canadian maritime commission since the inception of the replacement plan?
10. If so, what were the proposals and when were they made?
11. Have any such proposals been accepted?
12. If not, why were they not accepted?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. Owners of ships subject to the covenant restricting such ships to Canadian registry may obtain relief from such covenant in order to sell to foreign registry if the proceeds of sale are deposited in escrow, in the name of the ship owner, for replacement purposes. These deposits constitute the escrow fund.

2. 85.

3. (a) $7,723,686.50; (b) to the depositor.

4. (a) For the cost of the construction and acquisition of ocean-going ships; (b) for the cost of the modernization and improvement of existing units of our ocean-going fleet; (c) for a part of the cost of the construction of modernization of tonnage for use in our domestic trades such as the canals and great lakes.

5. See answer (a) to No. 3.

6. Yes; see answers (b) and (c) to No. 4.

7. Yes.

8. Answered by No. 7.

9. Yes.

10. Many and varied proposals were made from 1948 onwards for: (a) the building of tonnage in Canadian shipyards; (b) the building of tonnage abroad; (c) the acquisition of existing tonnage; (d) the acquisition of tonnage for Canadian registry; (e) the acquisition of tonnage for registry other than Canadian.

11. Yes.

12. Answered by No. 11.

SOCIAL SECURITY PAYMENTS, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Kickham:

How much money did the province of Prince Edward Island receive each year since 1946, in connection with the social security program, including old age pensions, family allowances, blind pensions, etc.?

Mr. Robertson:

HEIGHT-WEIGHT SURVEY

Mr. Follwell:

What is the nature and purpose of the height-weight survey which has recently been carried on in Canada?

Mr. Robertson: Because overweight is deemed to be a factor in disability or early death from diseases such as diabetes, high blood pressure or heart disease the problem of overweight is receiving much attention. To determine whether a person is overweight requires comparison with some standard table. However, the standard tables at present in use were derived from limited studies on small groups of people scattered throughout various countries.

Therefore the world health organization and other interested bodies have recommended that each country consider carefully the standards in use, with a view to preparing one representative of its own population. Canada is one of the first countries—if not the first—to meet this recommendation and to conduct a height-weight survey on a representative sample of the population of the whole country.

Under the direction of the chief of the nutrition division of the Department of National Health and Welfare and the guidance of the dominion bureau of statistics, the staff of the nutrition division has weighed and measured 22,000 persons throughout Canada. These measurements are now being averaged according to sex, height and age. A new standard table will soon become available giving the average weight of Canadians in each category. While this average weight may not be the ideal weight for an individual (this only his doctor can decide) it is the considered opinion of medical experts that the average weight can serve as a guide to everyone in eating with a view to adjusting his or her weight to that which will help to ensure good health.

CANCER CONTROL GRANTS

Mr. Follwell:

By provinces and by years, how much money has been expended by the federal government under the cancer control grant since the national health grants program was inaugurated?

Mr. Robertson:

CANADIAN VESSELS ON U.K. REGISTRY

Mr. Green:

1. How many applications have been received from Canadian owners of ocean-going vessels for transfer to United Kingdom registry, since the government announcement of November 12, 1953?
2. How many have been approved?
3. How many are pending?
4. At completion of the present transactions, how many Canadian-owned vessels subject to government control will be on United Kingdom registry?
5. Under what conditions can the transfer agreement between the Canadian and United Kingdom governments be terminated or the vessels returned to Canadian registry?
6. What plans, if any, has the government in hand to man and operate these vessels if they should be returned to Canadian registry?
7. What plans, if any, are in hand for modernizing and replacing the Canadian-owned vessels now on United Kingdom registry?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. 21.

2. 11.

3. 10.

4. This will depend on the outcome of such transactions; at present there are 91 such ships, plus 5 stores-issuing ships remaining on loan to the United Kingdom government.

5. At the request of either government.

6. In the event of the return of any or all of these vessels to Canadian registry their Canadian owners, operators or managers would man and operate them as they did in the past.

7. As has already been done, Canadian owners of such vessels seeking to modernize or replace may sell under the replacement plan.

FOOD AND DRUGS—FOOD STANDARDS

Mr. White (Waterloo South):

In the case of a food processing manufacturer wishing to add a certain chemical to food as a preservative, emulsifier, colouring agent, etc., what criteria are used by the Department of National Health and Welfare in deciding whether the food standards under the Food and Drugs Act ought to be amended to permit the use of another chemical or a new chemical in the food?

Mr. Robertson: The Food and Drugs Act forbids the sale of a food that has in or upon it any harmful or poisonous substance. The act also forbids the sale of foods that are processed in such a way as to be deceptive or likely to create an erroneous impression as to their value, composition, or merit. The department must therefore consider these sections of the act when dealing with addition of chemicals to foods.

The following criteria have been adopted:

1. Evidence must be produced by the manufacturer to prove that the substance he proposes to add will not be harmful in the quantities used and under the conditions of use that may arise in consumption of the food.

2. The use of a chemical in a food must not result in any fraud being perpetrated through the sale of the food.

3. A method must be available for determining the amount of the chemical in the food.

4. A real need should be demonstrated for the proposed use of the chemical.

5. It is preferable that the request for the use of the chemical be made by the food industry concerned rather than by the chemical manufacturer.

In addition, the department consults other departments which have an interest in the food in question because of legislation administered by them.

COUNTY HEALTH UNITS, ONTARIO—HEALTH GRANTS

Mr. Cavers:

1. Have county health units in the province of Ontario been assisted under the national health grants program?

2. If so, what units were assisted and what was the amount of such assistance each year during the first five years the program was in operation?

"BELMONT SPREAD"

Mr. Boisvert:

1. Is the product labelled "Belmont Spread", manufactured at Ste. Anne de la Perade, Quebec, a food under the provisions of the Food and Drugs Act?

2. If so, what are the components of such product and the proportion of each?

[Mr. White (Waterloo South).]

Mr. Robertson:

1. Yes.

2. Moisture 20·4 per cent; curd, salt, etc. 5·7 per cent; and fat 73·9 per cent. An examination of the fat indicates that it is probably lard. It also contains a trace of the preservatives known as propyl gallate and butylated hydroxyanisole.

MARGARINE—GOVERNMENT PUBLICITY

Mr. Poulin:

1. Is there a publication issued by any department or agency of the government in which prospective consumers are advised to serve margarine during meals?
2. If so, what is the name of the said publication and under what authority is it published?

Mr. Robertson:

1. There is no publication issued by the nutrition division of the Department of National Health and Welfare which is concerned with margarine alone or which advises consumers to serve margarine in distinction to other spreads.

2. See answer to No. 1 above.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES NOT CANADIAN CITIZENS

Mr. Fulton:

1. How many persons have been engaged for the service of the dominion government since the commencement of the fiscal year 1950-51 to date, either as government employees or in a representative capacity (but not including temporary clerical employees, manual workers, artisans, etc., employed as such by Canadian diplomatic, trade and military establishments abroad) who (a) are not Canadian citizens, or (b) hold the nationality or citizenship of some other country in addition to Canadian citizenship?
2. Of such persons, what are the names of (a) all who are employed in a representative capacity abroad; (b) those who are employed in Canada who have not yet filed a declaration of intention to become a Canadian citizen, indicating in each case (i) the name of the country other than Canada of which he or she is a citizen or national, and (ii) the nature of such employment or service?

BEEF AND PORK PURCHASES AND SALES

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. How much beef was purchased by the government, during the year 1951 and the year 1952?
2. What was the purchase price per pound in each case?
3. How much of this has been sold to date, to whom and at what price?
4. How much pork was purchased by the government, during the year 1951 and the year 1952?
5. What was the purchase price per pound in each case?
6. How much of this has been sold to date, to whom and at what price?
7. How much was the storage and/or processing costs on the beef and pork so purchased, and to whom were these payments made?

CATTLE SLAUGHTER—PAYMENTS

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. How many cattle were slaughtered under the authority of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, during the year 1951 and the year 1952?
2. What were the payments per animal to owners for purebred and/or for graded animals so slaughtered?

ATOMIC ENERGY

PEACETIME USE FOR INDUSTRIAL PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister, of which I have sent him notice. In view of President Eisenhower's statement yesterday as reported by the Associated Press, to the effect that the United States government proposes to end the government's present monopoly over peacetime use of atomic energy for industrial purposes, does the Canadian government propose taking similar action in the near future?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): The practice of the government has been to carry out the security regulations agreed upon among the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. Those restrictions have been relaxed from time to time, and Canada has always followed the practice prescribed by agreement among the three countries. I do not think it is fair to say that private enterprise has not been permitted to deal in atomic energy, because representatives of private enterprise are now engaged in studying the use of atomic energy for power purposes. In any case, the rules that apply to the three countries will apply in Canada.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO CLOSING OF VETERANS HOSPITAL AT ST. HYACINTHE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Joseph Fontaine (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe).

Does the government intend to close the veterans hospital at St. Hyacinthe? If so, when will the hospital be closed and for what reasons?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Fontaine) for having advised me of his intention to ask this question. This affords me the opportunity of making a brief statement with regard to the St. Hyacinthe hospital for the treatment of tuberculous veterans.

For some time the number of tuberculous veterans entitled to treatment has greatly decreased so that the number of patients at St. Hyacinthe hospital is constantly decreasing and we expect a further decrease when the new hospital at Quebec opens in the spring for the treatment of tuberculous veterans in that district.

For the efficient treatment of tuberculous patients, we must have the necessary installations, such as clinical laboratories, X-ray apparatus, a department of physiotherapy and occupational therapy, as well as operating rooms. Owing to the reduction in the number of patients at St. Hyacinthe, it is becoming more and more difficult to find sufficient personnel to provide all those sections with the kind of services we wish to give them. But we already have the necessary installation at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, where we can adequately house this limited number of patients. We therefore propose to transfer the veterans still hospitalized at St. Hyacinthe to Ste. Anne de Bellevue hospital before October, 1954. Several persons now employed at St. Hyacinthe will be transferred to Ste. Anne, if they so desire, where they may continue to fulfil their present duties.

I wish to assure the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, who has shown special interest in this matter, that several other members on the hospital staff, whose services will not be required at Ste. Anne, will be able to keep on working at St. Hyacinthe for the Department of National Health and Welfare, which will take over the hospital when it is vacated by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since he last spoke in this house about the matter, has he anything further to report on a possible solution to the pollution problem in the North Saskatchewan river?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am glad to have had notice of my hon. friend's question. I believe it will be agreed that the hon. member is perhaps one of the few in this house who have had an opportunity of seeing the situation, as I understand he recently visited the scene of pollution. I thought it might be useful if I just said by way of answer that yesterday, after the return of Dr. Charron from the scene of operation in Edmonton, I sent the following telegram to the minister of health in Alberta, Dr. Cross. The telegram reads as follows:

Hon. Dr. Cross
Minister of Health, Edmonton, Alta.

I understand that some progress is being made toward the identification of the offending substances. I am further informed that an intensive investigation has been launched using all available federal, provincial and industrial resources. Nevertheless there is no assurance of an early solution to this problem. Meanwhile, the distress of all of the affected communities is one of growing aggravation and I am accordingly wiring to obtain direct information from you as to what measures are being contemplated by your province towards and pending solution of this problem.

As you may be aware, from the reports of the discussions that have taken place in parliament, the federal government considers that in so far as jurisdiction is involved, the situation is one that would appear to be a matter for provincial authorities.

In order however that I may answer the various questions that are directed to me as well as knowing wherein the federal government could be of further assistance, it would be most helpful if I could know something of the measures that are being taken by your government in this connection. I have of course in mind the procedure which is provided in the public health act, whereby your provincial board of health has supervision over the source of public water supplies with reference to purity and wide authority for the investigation and determination of complaints arising from industrial wastes and other pollutants affecting such water.

I would assume that your provincial board of health has already taken active steps in this connection and that in due course it will be prepared to make such recommendations and initiate such action as may be required. Some word from you, however, on this would of course be most helpful.

Apart altogether from the correction of the present problem, there would seem to arise the overall and long-term question of the extent to which the waters of the North Saskatchewan river can reasonably be utilized to receive industrial wastes from your expanding chemical industries. I appreciate that there are a number of industries situated along this river that have for some time past used the waters for the disposal of industrial wastes. It may be that until the recent use of the river for this purpose by the Canadian Chemical Company the flow of water was of itself sufficient to neutralize the other wastes which were being deposited and that the recent addition has brought the matter far beyond the toleration point. If this should be so, then with the possibility of other industries seeking to use the river for disposal of industrial wastes, it would seem quite clear and apart from the immediate problem, that wholly different measures would need to be employed by the industries in order to permit of the reasonable use of the river for disposal purposes.

There are accordingly two problems that arise, the first relating to the measures which your government propose to initiate to correct the present situation, and secondly, the general problem of the overloading of this river by the dumping of industrial wastes.

I trust that you will understand my purpose in wiring you as I have done and it is not with any view of seeking to intervene in a matter which is within the responsibility of the provincial authorities but in order that I may be in a position to discuss the matter with the many parties that are concerned with the problem and to be able to offer such technical help and assistance as may be best under the circumstances.

Paul Martin
Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Tucker: Has the minister received any reply?

Mr. Martin: No.

[Later:]

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the officials he sent to Edmonton have as yet received certificates of analysis covering the various samples of water they took along the Saskatchewan river from Edmonton through Prince Albert. I ask this because it is a long time, and one would think that an analysis would be available after 90 days.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I answered this question the other day. The analysis is under way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But, Mr. Speaker, this is today, not the other day. The department certainly should know whether the certificates of analysis are available now.

Mr. Martin: I can make no better reply than the one I have already given, that the analysis is under way. And if the analysis is under way, the certificates have naturally not been completed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Ninety-six days!

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

ALLEGEDLY OFFENSIVE PICTURE ENTITLED "FAREWELL TO OAK STREET"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles Henry (Rosedale): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, notice of which I have given him. Is the minister aware that the national film board has plans to distribute a picture deeply offensive to the human dignity of many Canadians, the title being "Farewell to Oak Street"? Has the minister considered the advisability of a restricted distribution?

Mr. Speaker: Unless the minister is prepared to answer the question, I do not see the urgency of it. I think the member should put it on the order paper.

OBSCENE LITERATURE

ALLEGED REQUIRED ACCEPTANCE BY NEWSSTANDS AND DRUGSTORES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice? Has the minister's attention been drawn to a report of the Canadian pharmaceutical association to the effect that magazine distributors are forcing drugstores and newsstands to accept undesirable literature in packages distributed to them? Will the minister state whether any action is contemplated?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given notice of his question, and also for having included with it a news report in the Globe and Mail of a couple of days ago, upon which his question is based.

My attention has not been drawn to any report of the Canadian pharmaceutical association, and if the thought that it has been is based upon this news report I would point out that the report states this, in relation to my hon. friend's question:

The association executive yesterday approved a letter to the federal justice department commending the government for several recent prosecutions in the salacious literature field.

Then it goes on to say:

At the same time, the association revealed that many retail pharmacists, enlisted in the fight against crime comics, have met strong opposition from magazine distributors.

"Individual pharmacists," executive director John C. Turnbull said, "have been told they either must take the full package of magazines for sale, or not receive any."

I gather that the revealing of this information was probably made in the letter which is still to come to me. I have not received it yet. This being so, the only notice I have of it so far is in the newspaper item in question. Therefore I think that answers both the first and the second parts of my hon. friend's question.

TRADE

JAPAN—INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): In the negotiations now current between representatives of the Canadian government and the government of Japan, looking to a trade treaty, what instructions are the Canadian delegation working under, specifically, with regard to the importation of Japanese textiles?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The delegation negotiating for a treaty are instructed to work out the best possible deal for Canada.

Mr. Fleming: My supplementary question is, are there any specific instructions in relation to textiles?

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question—

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming: I asked a supplementary question, and I think the minister was about to answer it.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, in the negotiating of a treaty it is not customary to discuss the terms thereof on the floor of the House of Commons. When the treaty is ready for ratification, it will be presented here.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO PROHIBITION OF THE SALE OF INFANTS OR CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. I am sorry I could not give him notice; I just thought of it now. Would the Minister of Justice tell the house whether the Criminal Code, as revised, will include an article which would make it punishable to sell infants or children?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Replying to the hon. member's question I would say that the present Bill No. 7, which is now before the house, does not specifically make it a crime to sell infants or children.

[Later:]

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Justice? Would it be possible to have something more on the record? I can conceive of delegates from Canada at the United Nations being embarrassed about that question and answer, and that the answer might be quoted before one of the United Nations committees. Similar questions and answers, not quite as bad as that, have been asked and have embarrassed members. I, myself, suffered on one occasion from an answer somewhat similar to that.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Garson: I think the point raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is well taken. The answer I gave is quite correct, but I think perhaps it would be better if I were to make a fuller statement tomorrow indicating that while Bill No. 7 does not specifically make it a crime to sell infants or children, such an act might be prosecuted under other sections of Bill No. 7. Perhaps I should also make reference to the law now existing before Bill No. 7 is passed.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if it is not correct that the sale of a baby is an offence at common law which, under the Criminal Code as it now stands, is in force in Canada when the matter is not covered by the code?

Mr. Garson: No, that would be a wrong assumption. The common law is in effect at the present time, if that is what my hon. friend means, and will be in effect until Bill No. 7 is passed. But Bill No. 7 itself will be comprehensive of the whole field of criminal law, in the sense that it will abolish all common law offences.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF INCREASES IN RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Can the minister say if the department is now considering a proposal to raise the rates of unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am not able to answer that question at the present time.

FLOODS

SUGGESTED CONSTRUCTION OF DAMS ON THAMES RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) asked a question of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) which was taken as notice. The question had to do with flood conditions in Woodstock, and the building of dams on the upper Thames river and Cedar creek. In reply I might say that the building of the projected dams is normally considered to be the responsibility of the Ontario government.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

AMENDMENT TO PREVENT INCREASE IN MAXIMUM RETIRING ALLOWANCE

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (for the Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 176, to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the amendments which are proposed in this bill are designed to continue the present scheme of pensions under this act at the same level as before by eliminating the automatic increase which would be possible as a result of an increase in the sessional indemnity.

Hon. members will recall that they have been contributing on the basis of 6 per cent of the sessional indemnity of $4,000 and would have continued to contribute until their contributions equalled the amount of the sessional indemnity, which has been $4,000. Without this amendment, the recent increase in indemnities would have increased the limit of contributions to $8,000.

A member who was eligible for pension would receive one equal to 75 per cent of the contributions he had made.

The proposed amendment no longer ties the limit of contribution to the sessional indemnity but specifies that $4,000 will be the limit and correspondingly the maximum pension will be $3 000, for the 75 per cent factor remains unchanged.

The contributions will continue at the same level, and will be taken at the rate of 6 per cent from the first $4,000 payable to a member by way of sessional indemnity in each period of twelve months commencing the day he became a member. It can be seen therefore that there will be very little difference and, if anything, it will take a member longer to become entitled to the maximum pension than would have been the case under the act as it stands at the moment.

I should like to take this opportunity to emphasize how restricted a pension scheme this is. The pension is paid to the member only and there are no dependents benefits. Moreover, the minimum requirements are such that, as a result of the last election, appointments to the Senate and resignations, only 16 members of the House of Commons at the end of the last parliament have become eligible for pensions. As a matter of interest, none of those who became senators were eligible for an annual allowance, and all received withdrawal allowances equal to their own contributions, which did not include any interest which they had paid. One of those who were eligible for an annual allowance has had it suspended because he is holding a position in the government service. Of the remaining 15, five are of the age of 70 or over and their allowances are therefore subject to the reduction of $480 a year to tie in with the amount payable under the Old Age Security Act.

In addition to these annual allowances, 55 withdrawal allowances have become payable in respect of members who have died or of former members who failed to qualify under the minimum requirement of having contributed or elected to contribute in respect of sessions in more than two parliaments. As I mentioned a few moments ago, the withdrawal allowances which these former members received did not include any interest which they had paid in respect of prior service. Those amounts of interest as well as the interest which was earned by the contributions of those members will remain for the benefit of the fund. Thus the relatively small number of allowances that are paid can be seen to have been paid at the expense of the much larger number of other members who will not become eligible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister permit one question?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister made the statement a moment ago that under the new regulations now before the house it would take a somewhat longer time in order to be entitled to full pension. Has he the figures on that?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have not the figures, but it arises from the fact that there have been indemnities for each of two sessions of parliament in one year and that will no longer be the case.

Mr. Coldwell: One other question. Is it not a fact that not all of the 15 members who retired are entitled to the maximum pension?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, that is true. To receive the maximum pension would require 17 sessions of parliament. A man must have attended 17 sessions of parliament to qualify for the maximum pension and a number of those who have qualified have qualified for less than the maximum pension.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Members' contributions.

Mr. Low: I have one question I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance. I think I am right when I say that under the act as it now stands members of the House of Commons are not allowed to receive the old age pension if they qualify for retirement allowance under the act. Is it not true that members of parliament will be the only group of people in Canada who will be debarred from receiving old age pensions when they reach the age of 70?

Mr. Knowles: They get the old age pension, but that amount is deducted from their retirement allowance.

Mr. Abbott: I think the answer would be this. The plan was worked out by the actuaries on the basis that when a man reached 70 his parliamentary allowance would be reduced by the amount which he received as old age pension. One might say that he is not receiving the old age pension. In point of fact and of law of course he does receive the old age pension, but his parliamentary allowance is reduced by a corresponding amount.

Mr. Low: Yes. I get the point; but when it is all reduced to ordinary common sense is it not true that members of parliament will be the only group in Canada who will not receive—

Mr. Knowles: Don't forget the burnt-out pensioners.

Mr. Low: —the universal old age pension without having a reduction in something else?

Mr. Abbott: Members of parliament who are receiving the retiring allowance would fall within that group; that is true.

Mr. Low: There is one other thing. Does this action affect the wives or dependents of members of parliament in any way? Does this act in any of its provisions affect the wives or dependents of members?

Mr. Abbott: No; as the Acting Prime Minister indicated, there is no provision for dependents. I must say I have sometimes thought that the effect of this pension is somewhat—unintentionally, of course—misrepresented in the public mind. It is a pension plan which I believe is actuarially sound. I had been assured it was before it was brought in; but comparing it with industrial pension plans or our own civil service superannuation plan, where there are provisions for widows and dependents, this is a very much more restricted plan.

Mr. Ferguson: I am in favour of a pension plan for every man, woman and child in the Dominion of Canada, if they are Canadian citizens and they can earn and save through some method so they will not have the fear of destitution in their old age. Before being elected to parliament I had the same opinion of members of parliament that I have now, namely that they were one of the most highly respected groups of men we have in Canada, and that being a member of parliament was something that nobody had to apologize for.

Mr. McIvor: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ferguson: As a young man I was associated with men who chose to offer themselves as candidates for parliament. After great difficulty with the people of their own constituencies some of them finally convinced the voters that they were qualified to fill the position known as a member of the House of Commons. When the ballots were counted these people found themselves, whether or not they were capable, the representatives of constituencies in one of the greatest countries in this world, the Dominion of Canada.

During the discussion of increased indemnities some of the hon. members were a little apologetic with respect to the remuneration they were going to receive. I have never been apologetic. Now we come to pensions. In these pensions for the individuals who chose the vocation in which we now find ourselves we are in no different position from that of any other man or woman in Canada who chose a different vocation in life. And we have to go through an election to arrive here. But the wives and the husbands of members of parliament go with the members every step of their difficult journey in being elected to the House of Commons. Speaking for my own wife, I know the telephone in our home rings so frequently that she abhors it. She hates to hear it ring because it gets on her nerves. I think this will apply to the wife of every hon. member in this house. My wife has become a pretty fair liar, too, because I say, "You go; I am not in." I cannot take all the gaff; I put half of it on her shoulders.

Those who merit high standing in this House of Commons have given much of their lives and their time and their money to their constituencies, to the people who put them here. A man may die at a fairly ripe age after having served the people. He may have been on pension for six months, and his widow is left destitute. She is a woman who walked every step of the way with him along the path of government as laid down by the Canadian people.

People should not be able to point at the widow of a man who served in this House of Commons to the very best of his ability as she is on her way to the poorhouse after she has served her country well, after she has given unstintingly of her time to the people in her husband's constituency. As long as the husband lives there is a mark of appreciation for the services which his wife renders, but the minute he dies his widow is aided to the door of the poorhouse.

This is the woman who kept the other home going. This is the woman who has been denied the pleasure of the company of her husband who must reside in Ottawa. This is the woman who looked after the family, who brought up children who were without a father for most of the time. This is the woman who is not being recognized under this pension scheme.

I would like to see an amendment to this pension plan so that the wives of members of parliament would be included. I apologize to no man or woman for the remuneration I receive as long as I retain my position in the House of Commons. It is the position the people vote for. If they do not see fit to send the right man here as the representative of their constituency that is their fault, not the fault of the member.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, may I say first of all on behalf of my colleagues, and I think of hon. members of the house generally, that we welcome this bill. I think the government has done the right thing under the circumstances in introducing it and placing a limit on the superannuation as provided for in the original act. I repeat that we welcome it.

There has been a tremendous amount of misinformation spread across the country relating to this particular superannuation plan. As the Minister of Finance said, it has proved to be actuarially sound from the beginning and is likely to remain so. Members contribute 6 per cent of their past and current indemnities in order to build up the fund, and of course there is a similar contribution by the government. Hon. members do not receive any pension if they retire from parliament before a certain time.

When this bill is before the house I think it should be noted, as the Acting Prime Minister has said, that it will require members of parliament to serve much longer in order to qualify for the maximum pension. For example, if I were to retire or were defeated I would be entitled to the full superannuation of $3,000 provided I could raise the amount I have to pay in order to make up the total of $4,000 and interest which I owe the government. I shall do that in time.

I have earned that right in about 14 years, during which I have been elected three times. It has been possible for me to earn the full pension in that time under the act as it is before this amendment because we had extra sessions and fractions of sessions. Altogether they enabled me—I am using my own case—to earn the maximum pension in about 14 years.

As the Acting Prime Minister has said, under this amendment a member of parliament will have to serve 17 years for the maximum pension of $3,000. Moreover, if this parliament continues and subsequent parliaments continue for the average that has prevailed since 1926, in order to get the maximum pension a member will have to be elected four and possibly five times in 17 years. The average has been four years for each parliament.

Mr. Ferguson: Which is crazy.

Mr. Coldwell: Consequently, in effect we are making it much more difficult for hon. members who came to this house at the beginning of this parliament to earn the maximum pension. I do not think that is understood in the country. I have had it thrown at me that members of parliament may be elected three times, retire and receive a pension of $3,000 no matter what their age may be. When this amendment passes that statement will be absolutely wrong. I think this should be brought out this afternoon in order that the public may know.

I have supported the idea of superannuation for members of parliament for the reasons I gave when the bill was before the house in the first instance, and which I am not going to repeat. I think this is the best thing we have done, far better than increasing the indemnity.

I am going to support the hon. member for Simcoe North in his request that something be done for the widows of members. I am in the position where I speak as one who has no dependents. I would like to see, not today but perhaps later on this session, an amendment introduced, or even a separate measure, to provide something for the widows of members who were entitled to some pension. I think this should be paid for by the members themselves; I do not think there should be any imposition on the public funds of Canada. If we all agreed in this house—and again I speak as one who is entitled to the maximum pension but who is without dependents—to contribute to a fund for the benefit of widows who might be left behind, that could be built up by means of a small deduction from the annual indemnities of all members of parliament. Widows could be at least partly taken care of from that fund. I think that is something we should consider.

I am not asking the government to consider it today because when the superannuation bill was introduced into this house it was not introduced as a government measure.

it was introduced because there was general agreement among all parties in the house. Some member of the government might take the initiative, or some private member, as has been done before, and get in touch with the members of the house to see if something could not be worked out. But there should be no contribution from the public funds of Canada. All of us, whether we have completed our service and paid up our full assessment or not, should contribute to the fund out of which widows of hon. members who have served the country well could be provided for. As the hon. member for Simcoe North said, no wife of a member of parliament does other than serve this country well.

I know that perhaps I have gone a little beyond the scope of this bill and I hope, Mr. Chairman, you will forgive me for having discussed this matter. I believe some consideration should be given it. May I again say that we support this measure as it stands, and that we should like to see something done subsequently for the women who will become widows when members of this house die.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): First of all I wish to say I support what has been said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Simcoe North. I will, however, say—and I hope it would be included in anything that might be arranged—that if the widow married again I think provision should be made that the pension be cut off immediately.

What I am on my feet for is this. When the hon. member for Peace River spoke he said he thought this pension was the only one that would be affected by the old age pension, and would be reduced. I believe the hon. member for Peace River forgets that war veterans' widows' pensions are reduced, or the old age pension is reduced according to what the pensioner gets, or according to what the earnings are. I do not object to the members of parliament having their pensions cut, but I certainly object to the veterans having theirs reduced in the way that is done at the present time.

Mr. Fulton: I just want to make a comment or two on this bill. As one who was not always on the side of the majority in connection with the original legislation in this case, I want to make it clear that I am not going to raise any unwelcome or controversial points at this time. However, I want to say this. I think the government is doing the right thing in introducing this amendment which will prevent the amount of the pension otherwise payable on full qualification being automatically doubled. It will also prevent what would otherwise be the result, the automatically doubling of the maximum contributions to be made by the treasury. My only regret on this score is that the government did not announce it as their intention at the time they introduced the bill to increase the sessional indemnity. However, it is being done now and I am sure there can be no objection.

However, in connection with what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said, I think it should be pointed out that the length of time necessary to qualify will be only four or more parliaments or 17 or more years after this amendment goes through. Unless that is made clear I think it might have been taken from what he said that that was the length of time necessary to qualify at the present time. I may say that I would not have had as many objections as I had to the original legislation had there been written into the act a longer minimum time which it was necessary to put in before a member qualified, which will be the effect of this amendment. I am therefore very much in agreement with this amendment in that regard.

I want to make this further suggestion. While there are other modifications which I think might be made to the retirement allowance legislation, such as the provision of an age floor below which a member would not receive the pension if he retired from the house at less than that age, which according to the actuaries who appeared before the committee two years ago would have the effect of substantially lessening the treasury contribution, I am not going to press that point now, except to say that I hope it will be considered in conjunction with the other suggestions which are being made, if they are to receive consideration.

One other matter I wish to mention is in connection with the provision of retirement allowances to widows of members who have retired. I think there would be a quite simple way of covering that matter, and one which would not increase the burden on the treasury. That would be to do as is done now with a number of other forms of retirement allowances, namely to put it on a last-survivor basis, under which the person entitled to receive the allowance may, at the time he begins to receive it, elect whether he will take the full pension payable to himself and stopping with his death or take a little smaller pension, the amount of which would be worked out on an actuarial basis, payable to himself or his widow, whichever may survive the longest.

If the matter is to receive consideration, that suggestion might be one that could be considered, inasmuch as it would not have the effect of imposing any greater burden on the pension fund if it is worked out on an actuarial basis.

Mr. Low: I think the government is acting wisely in bringing in this bill making provision for some ceiling on the amount of the pension. I believe that is a matter every hon. member was anxious about at the time of the passing of the other bill.

I am afraid I put my first questions rather badly, or at least one of them. The purpose for which I framed the question was to get the information accurately on the record, because I knew there had been a good many misapprehensions about the members' retirement allowances and that some of the press had scattered across the country stories that were just not true.

In reply to the hon. member for Peterborough, let me say that what I meant to get on the record was this, putting it not in the form of a question but of an assertion. I think it can be shown that this is the only contributory retirement allowance scheme in Canada that has the means test applied to it as far as the old age pension is concerned. Mention might be made of some of these other schemes, as has already been done, but they are not contributory schemes. This one is. I think I am quite correct in saying that this is the only contributory retirement allowance scheme in Canada where the means test is applied so far as the universal old age pension is concerned.

With regard to the extension of the program, may I say that I think we should study a possible extension, with a view to securing some benefits for the widows of members who pass on. I believe any scheme that is worthy of enactment in the House of Commons is worthy of an extension of that kind, and I certainly would support some such arrangement. When I say that I am not suggesting by any means that the government should put up any more money; but surely we ought to give careful study to an extension to cover the widows of members of the House of Commons.

I want to say that we support wholeheartedly the amendments to the act as they are now before us.

Mr. McIvor: I have supported this measure from the beginning. There is one thing the general public does not understand. When a man has qualified, as far as the number of sessions he must attend is concerned, the general public think he will get the pension. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, he cannot get the pension until he has paid in the $4,000 or $5,000, according to the length of time it takes him. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister this question. If a member has served his time and is out in the open, will the government lend him the money to make the back payments?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The provision now exists that if a member qualifies for the pension, the government will deduct from the pension due him an amount that will cover the payments and the interest on the payments for those past services. It means that the member will have to wait a while before getting his pension but, if he lives long enough, he will get it in the end.

Mr. McIvor: I thank the minister.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I might just say a few words in reply to what has been said thus far. As hon. members have said, the pension plan really originated with the private members of the House of Commons. It was brought to the government by a group of private members and was then referred to the banking and commerce committee. The government asked the committee to decide one thing in particular. Was the plan actuarially sound? We were told that it was sound. We have not had much experience with the working of the plan. Results to date show that it is rather better than actuarially sound, but that is only based on one year's operations.

I might say that to give the option to divide the pension with the wife would put quite a strain on the fund. Judges are permitted to do so, but we know something of the cost of that concession in their case. We know that it is an expensive business. That would hardly work, although I might point out that in effect the retiring allowance makes it possible for a member to provide for his wife, since he can set aside a thousand dollars each year of his pension and with it buy insurance protection for his wife.

This plan is different from most, in that a man can qualify for the pension at the age of 45 if he starts his parliamentary career at the age of 28, and we have had several members in the house who were 28 or less. An hon. member might find it desirable to marry a woman ten or fifteen years younger than himself.

Mr. Macdonnell: Not at 28.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, but he might marry later.

Mr. Lennard: They just do that in the other place.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Nevertheless I think hon. members will agree that with our present knowledge of the pension plan it would not be wise to attempt to revise its terms at this moment. We adopted the best judgment of the group of members who originated the plan. We had it examined as presented to the committee, and we believe that the plan today is sound. If the matter is restudied by any group of members and another plan can be presented which is also sound I am sure the government will be glad to consider it, but I do not think the government would consider it unless it can be shown that it is an actuarially sound pension plan.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, probably my only reason for saying a word now is to demonstrate that now and again a subject does come before the house on which I do not find myself opposed to the government. As a matter of fact during the session when the retiring allowances bill was introduced I think the only speech I made was in support of that bill. I am still convinced that it is good legislation. However, as my leader says, I do not think that we have done a good public relations job in regard to it. I think the general feeling in the country is that members receive the retiring allowance without making any contributions themselves.

During the recent election campaign I received a letter from a constituent who was very irate on the subject. She said that for the first time in many years she was not going to vote for me. I did not feel greatly concerned, because I had an idea that there would be plenty of votes besides hers. But after the election was over I took the time to write and give her certain figures with respect to my own account in the fund. She is a fair-minded woman, and she apologized by the next mail. I believe that feeling is fairly general throughout the country. People do not follow what we do here as closely as we sometimes think, and if they do they forget.

The hon. member for Kamloops raised the point that there should be an age limit for receiving the retiring allowance. I do not believe that we should do that. Probably it does seem rather generous to provide pensions for members who retire at the age of, say, 45, but it must be remembered that if a member is eligible for the pension at that age he has spent his life from the age of 22 or 23 as a member of parliament, and that is the period when other people are working and making provision for their own future. In my opinion such a man is more entitled to the pension than a person who enters politics at a later age.

The matter of pensions for widows is not part of the bill before us, but other members have said a word about it and I should like to say something also. If it can be done through contributions by the members themselves I am all in favour of it. It would be a good move for the members. But I wish we could approach subjects of this kind without either feeling sorry for ourselves or for our future widows who are no more deserving of a pension than any other widows in Canada. Who is going to provide pensions for the widows of farmers in the constituency of the hon. member for Simcoe North? Who is going to provide pensions for the widows of the longshoremen in my constituency? These women have all done something for Canada. They have raised Canada's children to manhood and womanhood, and if there is any group more worthy of attention I should like to know who they are.

I say again that I wish we could approach these matters without feeling sorry for ourselves. In my opinion there is no reason why a member of parliament should feel sorry for himself or for his wife and possibly future widow. I believe the wives of members of parliament are enjoying themselves. I know my wife is, and I daresay the others are. They get opportunities that many other wives throughout the country do not get.

Mrs. Shipley: I should like to say a few words on this subject. I think I am particularly well fitted to speak on it. This is my first year in parliament, and it is highly improbable that I will ever be re-elected four or five times and serve some 17 years. I am a widow, so one might say that I have nothing to gain from anything that may be done here. I feel very keenly, and agree with the statements made by some hon. members, that this measure has been very poorly explained to the people of Canada. I was under the impression, as most other people are, that a member got a wonderful pension and that he did not have to do very much to earn it. But there will be a very small percentage of the members of the house who will ever earn the full pension, and if a member is not elected at least three times he gets no pension at all.

When I learned further that the widows receive nothing I was somewhat shocked. I think any pension or insurance plan to which we contribute in large measure ourselves should make some provision for the widows. After all, I think it would be fair to say that with very few exceptions the members of this house are the only wage earners in their families. As long as we are alive most of us will still be able to earn something and support the other members of our families, but when death occurs the pension stops and there is nothing left.

I must say that I do not agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. He said that the widow of a member of parliament was no more entitled to a pension than the widow of a farmer or a fisherman. Now, the only type of pension for a widow that I have heard described here is one for which members of parliament would pay themselves.

There was a proposal made by the hon. member for Kamloops. He suggested that we should have the option of electing to take a smaller pension ourselves, thereby increasing the pension for the widow. No one is suggesting, certainly I am not suggesting, that the widows of farmers and fishermen are not entitled to pensions. This is something which it is within our power to plan to do for the widows of members of parliament. The farmers and fishermen have the same privilege of looking after their wives or dependents. I would support them in every move they wanted to make in that regard. However, I do not think the suggestion made by the hon. member was particularly sound.

I do not like this idea of the old age pension being deducted from the pensions of members of parliament. I think there is a rather unfortunate inference there.

Mr. Martin: It is not correct. Old age security is a non-means-test pension.

Mrs. Shipley: Is it to be deducted?

An hon. Member: No.

Mrs. Shipley: I do not understand it. I am sorry I opened up that subject. I believe that is all I have to say. I do hope that, as suggested by the Acting Prime Minister, a committee of this house will be formed to consider something for the widows of members of parliament. I can only say that I hope I might be asked to serve on that committee, because I would have nothing to gain from it and I should like to see some consideration given to the widows of members.

Mr. Ferguson: When I speak in the House of Commons I am here to speak for the people of Canada. When I spoke on this subject today I was not whining on my own behalf. I was not whining on behalf of my wife. I was here discussing a matter which concerns the people of Canada. I do not like the implication by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I have never needed any contribution from the House of Commons in order to weigh 210 pounds. I have eaten three meals a day and so has my wife, even before we saw the House of Commons. We shall continue to do so. We do not need the House of Commons.

When I spoke, I spoke for future generations in Canada. We are being asked to enact a change in a law which has been on the statute books for only a short time. I think it is most unfair for another member to cast aspersions on me by saying he did not like people whining about their own case in the House of Commons. No person has ever heard me whining on behalf of myself or my family.

Mr. MacInnis: I did not say the hon. member was whining. I did not say any hon. member in this house was whining.

The Chairman: Perhaps I have been a little too indulgent in allowing the debate to proceed on the question of extending the provisions of this bill to the widows of members; that is perhaps beyond the scope of these amendments. I believe we might limit our discussion more particularly to the clause before us.

Mr. Cardiff: I do not intend to take up very much of the time of the committee. After considering the answer given to the hon. member for Fort William, perhaps there is one place a change should be made in the bill, because it does not make sense. The provision in the original bill stated a member had to win three elections and sit through 17 sessions of parliament to qualify for a pension. Those of us who have been here for 14 years qualified, but now one may not qualify for a full pension by winning three elections. You would have to win four, and sometimes perhaps five.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is to qualify for the maximum pension. You are able to qualify for a pension after two parliaments plus, but you only qualify in relation to the amount you have contributed to the fund over that period. It will take 17 sessions of parliament to qualify for the full amount. By that time you will have paid in $4,000 and will be entitled to receive $3,000 a year.

Mr. Cardiff: I understand that, but we had two sessions of parliament within one year on two different occasions, which meant that many of the older men in the house became eligible for a full pension.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is right.

Mr. Cardiff: Those who will be coming into the house now cannot qualify for this full pension even in three parliaments. They would have to go on perhaps to four parliaments.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I said the effect of this bill was to lengthen the time required for those participating in the scheme to qualify for the maximum pension.

Mr. Byrne: With deference to your ruling concerning ranging just a little farther afield than the actual clause under discussion, may I say that we have heard a great deal from the opposition side but very little from members on the government side. I would beg your indulgence for just a moment to comment on some of the statements that have been made, and give my impression of this particular bill as it relates to the increase in members' indemnities.

On the basis of being a person with family responsibility, I wholeheartedly supported the increased indemnity. I shall go further and say I was somewhat cool a year or two ago to the question of the members' retiring fund. In view of the fact that it was pointed out by members of the opposition that the retiring fund would be a boon to the opposition, as was mentioned by the member for Rosetown-Biggar, I went along with it. I did not seek to create the impression mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, that there have been poor public relations on this question. Let me tell the hon. member that there has been an equally poor public relations job done on members' indemnities. I know that if the members of his party spoke here as they did privately, the public relations job would not have been so poor. I feel that the $10,000 indemnity—

The Chairman: I do not think I can allow a discussion of members' indemnities on a bill which concerns retiring allowances.

Mr. Byrne: I agree. The maximum pension of $3,000 is approximately, in my estimation, a little more than half what a member receives in take-home pay from his total indemnity, plus expense allowance, so undoubtedly it is a fair and reasonable pension plan. I have no quarrel with that; but I am just pointing out that the indemnity should not have received such bad publicity, after all.

It has been suggested that some provision should be made for the widows of members of parliament. One member has said that the wives of members are enjoying themselves. Well, I hope they are. I would hope that every wife in Canada, in so far as is possible, is enjoying herself. But I want to say that any member's wife who was left at home, perhaps two or three thousand miles away, and had to look after a family without any assistance because the amount paid the member was not sufficient to keep them together, was not having too good a time of it. Those wives are doing a great service, and are working hard.

When it comes to the matter of pensions, I think they deserve the same treatment as the pensionable widows of other groups in the community. I am not suggesting only that we should increase payments made by the government. I think it should be done in the usual manner in which any pension is handled in industry, or under civil service pension plans. Under those plans the pensioner would receive smaller annual or monthly payments, and at his death the pension would be continued for his widow at a somewhat reduced rate. I do not think there should be any further contribution other than the $3,000; but some arrangement could be made to attend to that matter, and in my opinion it should be done soon.

It has been pointed out that few members have been affected by the pension plan. However, as time goes on there will be more, and consideration should be given to this matter so the widows would be cared for.

The Chairman: Order. I can see now that I have been entirely too indulgent in allowing this discussion to proceed. I must say now that I shall have to rule out of order any further discussion about the extension of this provision to the widows of members.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, there are just two things I wanted to say. I confess you have put me in a bit of difficulty by the firmness of the ruling you have just made. However, perhaps you would permit me to say one or two sentences; and if Your Honour thinks I am going too far, please stop me. I suppose you will do that, without my asking for it.

I think it should be noted, particularly by the press, which is undoubtedly going to report this afternoon's discussion, that all those who have referred to the possibility of any change in the plan to include a provision for widows have emphasized that if such a provision is made it should be without any additional cost to the treasury. Otherwise, no hon. member would agree to it. Some have made the statement—

The Chairman: The hon. member invited me to interrupt him if I thought he was transgressing the ruling I made a moment ago. I hope he will not continue to discuss that subject. We should confine ourselves to the subject in hand.

Mr. Knowles: I agree; and I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for not stopping me until I had got my point across. The other point

I wanted to say a word about is that which was raised by the hon. member for Peace River. I think it is well that we try to keep clear in our minds exactly what the situation is. I noticed that the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the hon. member for Timiskaming were not too sure, between them, just what the situation was. I think it is this—

Mr. Martin: There is no doubt about what I think.

Mr. Knowles: Then the minister will agree with what I am about to say.

Mr. Martin: Not likely.

Mr. Knowles: Well, I think you will. The fact is that under the act as it now stands, a retired member of parliament, even though receiving the member's pension, is entitled to draw the old age security pension when he reaches the age of 70.

Mr. Martin: Everybody is.

Mr. Knowles: No question about it; the minister and I agree.

Mr. Martin: That is what I said, and all I said.

Mr. Knowles: But his parliamentary pension is reduced by the amount of the old age security pension, whether or not he applies for the old age security pension.

Mr. Harris: Has there ever been any doubt about that?

Mr. Knowles: No, not in my mind.

Mr. Harris: Then why waste time about it?

Mr. Knowles: But there certainly does seem to be a doubt in the minds of some members, and there is a misinterpretation being placed upon it, I think, down in the left corner. Let us have it clear, then, that there are two groups of people in the country to whom that provision applies. One group consists of members of parliament and the other group consists of recipients of the war veterans allowance. The parliamentary pension is on a contributory basis, as the hon. member said, but the war veteran has contributed something else. It should not be said that our burnt-out pensioners are in a different position, so far as that aspect of the matter is concerned.

So far as the old age security deduction from the parliamentary pension is concerned, I register no objection. But I do hope that we will soon cease making that deduction in the case of our burnt-out pensioners.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a deal with you, that for 20 seconds you should not apply to me the ruling you have just laid down. I say I hope the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and so admirably supported by the hon. member for Timiskaming, might be followed; that is that, failing any other arrangements regarding widows, we in this house, who are no exception to the public, might look into the matter further.

Mr. Shaw: I wish to make this perfectly clear, and what I shall say arises out of the observations made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The hon. member for Peace River did not intend to leave any impression whatsoever to the effect that war widows had not made a contribution. He was simply referring to plans which we look upon and categorize as contributory pension or retirement schemes.

Mr. Nickle: With reference to the subject which you have ruled out of order, Mr. Chairman, and about which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre succeeded in getting in a few words, I would like to say that his final comment to the effect that any extension of pensions to widows should not be charged against the public treasury is one with which I fully agree.

However, my purpose in rising at the moment is to refer to comments already made by other hon. members as to public misunderstanding of the terms of the present Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. I received this morning, by way of Trans-Canada Air Lines, yesterday morning's issue of the Calgary Albertan. This newspaper carries a lengthy article under an Ottawa dateline by James R. Nelson, and is made up to a great extent of quotations such as this:

—Bona Arsenault, youthful Liberal member for Bonaventure, Quebec, who—

According to this writer.

—was the father of the members' pension scheme adopted at the last session of parliament before the election.

This article aroused some concern in my mind because I believe through some unfortunate set of circumstances the writer, from the sources of his information, arrives at some erroneous conclusions. The lead sentence of this article reads:

Fledgling members of parliament elected for the first time last June will have to serve 17 years and contribute $480 per year to a pension fund before they can retire on an annual life income of $6,000.

Later in the article the author goes on to quote from the member who is said to be the father of this proposed pension plan, and he states as follows, quoting the hon. member for Bonaventure:

"The chances are that after being in parliament 17 years he would rather continue to sit here in the hope of obtaining an appointment to the Senate or to the bench, or some federal appointment, than retire on his pension", Arsenault said. "Even if he is defeated after 17 years, he has the security of knowing that he will at least have an income of $6,000 a year for life."

I raise the point, Mr. Chairman, because I feel that the hon. member who has been quoted should have the opportunity of correcting this rather inaccurate report in order that the newspaper in my home city may have the opportunity of correcting the information it has given to the public in that city.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Hansell: May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Acting Prime Minister one question? Is there any other class of people, apart from members of parliament under this act, who do not receive the old age security pension by reason of the fact that they receive some other pension?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is quite usual in industrial pensions to take into account the old age pension at age 70 in working out the benefits. The reason this fund is actuarially sound, I am told, is that the calculations were made on the basis that when a member qualified for the old age pension his parliamentary payment would be reduced. That was the proposal of the committee; that was the basis of the fund, and that was the basis on which it was declared actuarially sound. We can attempt to devise another fund where the reduction is not made, but this one was set up on the basis that it would be made.

Mr. Hansell: In that case, Mr. Chairman, I cannot very well see that Canada has a universal old age pension.

Mr. Martin: The Acting Prime Minister covered one aspect of my hon. friend's question. The fact is that at the age of 70 the pension is paid, as a matter of right, to everyone in Canada without the means test. Therefore it is correct to say that Canada's old age security scheme is universal in character.

Mr. Hahn: In connection with the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I would gather that if we are going to say, to use his own words, that Canada has a universal old age pension, then we must declare that this pension—and I hope the press will take note of it—is a pension of $3,000 a year to the age of 70 and thereafter $2,520 a year.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is right.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2.

Mr. Harkness: Can the Acting Prime Minister tell us just what changes this clause makes in regard to what the situation was previously under the old section 2, which is on the right hand side and which is repealed by this new clause? To me the language is a little confusing. I do not know exactly what changes were made.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The twenty-first parliament was the parliament that preceded this one. The clause provides for the deductions made in previous parliaments, and also for the deductions to be made in this parliament and subsequently.

Mr. Harkness: It is still not very clear. As far as I can see, this provides that all sessions previous to the seventh session, that is up to the last session of the last parliament, will be counted as a session, and any payments made on behalf of this will count toward the pension. That is as far as the last session was concerned. The withdrawal allowances, which mean the same thing, were subtracted from the indemnity and they will count, I would take it, as one session toward the pension. What is the situation as from the date of the last parliament? Does the next period of entitlement or the next session start from the day of the election and therefore end six months after that, or what is the situation?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There are so many eminent lawyers in the house that I do not know why a layman like myself should attempt to say what the bill means; but as I understand it, I qualified under the original bill; therefore my pension is governed by the original bill. There are those here who will qualify partly under the original bill and partly under this bill. The extent to which they did qualify under the original bill stands, and in future they will be governed by the present bill. In layman's terms I think that is what this particular clause means.

Mr. Hodgson: I should like it made a little clearer. What the Acting Prime Minister is saying is this. Take the class who came here in the election of 1945. They had served 11 sessions up to the last election, as I calculate it. That means that if they have paid in they will be entitled to count 11 years toward the pension. From now on they have to serve six more years to be qualified under the new legislation.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is exactly the meaning of the clause as I understand it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was wondering whether the minister might clear up this situation. Did a person who was a member of the twenty-first parliament have to elect during that parliament? Suppose he were here during that parliament and did not elect at that time; is he in the position of being able to elect today?

Mr. Lesage: No, he cannot.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, he cannot elect for that parliament today. He can elect for the current parliament, but not for the preceding parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having elected just for the current parliament, his time does not count until the date on which he elects?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is my understanding.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE AUTHORIZED CAPITAL STOCK, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act to increase the authorized capital stock of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation from five million dollars to fifteen million dollars; also to require the corporation to continue the underwriting reserve to cover future losses under contracts of insurance; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, the Export Credits Insurance Act which was passed by this parliament some years ago has been of great assistance to exporters. It has fully justified its existence in that it has allowed a good deal of business to be carried out that could not possibly have been carried out otherwise. The volume of business insured under the act has been constantly expanding, and the purpose of this amendment is to provide additional capital to the corporation and to make such revisions as will permit the act to meet the needs of present-day circumstances.

This amendment affects only part I of the Export Credits Insurance Act and has nothing to do with part II under which the authority to make loans to foreign governments expired on December 31, 1947. The main purpose of the amendment is to increase the effectiveness of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation by authorizing an increase in its capital. I think it would be helpful if I were to review briefly the operations of the corporation since the Export Credits Insurance Act was passed in 1944.

—the corporation may for the purpose of facilitating and developing trade between Canada and any other country enter into a contract of insurance with an exporter to insure him against any risk of loss in connection with the export or an agreement for the export of goods by reason of the failure of the exporter for any cause not avoidable by the exporter to recover the selling price of the goods.

There are no private commercial concerns who provide the insurance offered by the corporation. In all other countries in the world where similar insurance protection is available, the service is provided by the government or with government backing.

The Export Credits Insurance Corporation protects against these unexpected and unpreventable losses that occur in spite of every precaution taken by the exporter. Some of the risks covered include the insolvency of the foreign buyer, cancellation of an import licence in the country of destination, and the risk of adverse changes in foreign exchange regulations. While the corporation will insure against delays in collection that are not the fault of the exporter, it does not cover trade disputes as to the quality or quantity of goods received. The corporation does not cover straight repudiation on the part of the buyer if the buyer is able to pay for the goods. However, if the exporter were to secure a court judgment against the buyer and the judgment could not be satisfied, then the corporation would be on risk. The exporter is insured against blockage of funds or transfer difficulties which prevent him from receiving payment for his goods in the currency agreed upon at the time of the sale. Such calamities as war or revolution in the country of the buyer are also covered. In other words, the policies protect against credit risks and political risks, but the protection extends just to the accounts receivable and has nothing to do with the goods themselves.

This provision of export credits insurance in no way subsidizes the exporter for he still has to compete in the markets of the world on the basis of quality, price, credit terms, services rendered, etc., and in addition pays premium for the insurance protection. By insuring one of his most important liquid assets the exporter finds it easier to obtain financial assistance from his bankers. The policy he holds gives him the benefit of advice and assistance of the corporation in recovering as much as possible of his losses in the event of default, and by being given coverage against the principal forms of loss arising out of overseas trade he is able to expand his exporting business and so help in maintaining Canada's foreign trade.

The corporation does not compete with commercial enterprises in the insurance field. It is nevertheless administered on a sound and businesslike basis. In all its policies it adheres to the principle of co-insurance and will pay to a maximum of 85 per cent of the contract price, leaving 15 per cent to be borne by the policyholder.

Also in keeping with another basic principle of insurance—that there should be a broad spread of risk—the corporation requires its policyholders who export consumer goods to insure all their export sales for a twelve-month period, excluding sales made to the United States of America or sales made against irrevocable letters of credit, but all other sales to all other countries must be insured. In the case of capital goods an individual policy is issued to cover the specific contract of sale.

It is the aim of the corporation to operate on a self-supporting basis. In the setting of premium rates, the tariff charged is expected to be sufficient to cover operating expenses and probable losses. Hon. members will understand that in a business of this kind the extent of the risk is far more difficult to appraise than in the case of credit insurance in the domestic market. That is the principal reason why it is practically impossible for a private concern to give this form of world-wide coverage. The experience of the corporation to date is encouraging, in that the rates charged appear to have been fair both to the insurer and the insured. But no doubt we still have something to learn from experience over the years under varying conditions of world trade.

The corporation has covered $235 million of goods exported to more than 100 different countries. While it is not possible to ascertain precisely the volume of business that would have been done had export credits insurance protection not been available, nevertheless we know for a fact that in many cases the exporter would not have considered taking on the risk involved in the export sale without the insurance protection. With the very evident change from a seller's to a buyer's market, competition in the export field is ever-increasing and the provision of export credits insurance helps exporters and encourages them to sell aggressively. In covering $235 million of business, gross claims paid totalled $3·9 million, the bulk of which have arisen due to exchange transfer difficulties. Recoveries of $1·7 million have been obtained and only $138,000 has been written off as irrecoverable.

The net outstanding claims paid at December 31, 1953 totalled $2 million, of which it is confidently expected the major portion will be recovered. The average premium rate is $0.82 per $100 on all exports covered to date. This is less than 1 per cent of the selling price. The total premiums received plus the interest on the corporation's capital have covered the operating expenses and net claims paid and left the corporation with a balance at the credit of the underwriting reserve of about $1 million.

At present the corporation is working with $10 million made up of $5 million capital stock and $5 million capital surplus. It is authorized to take on risks to the extent of ten times the capital and surplus or $100 million, indicating that the capital was supposed to bear relationship to the insurance underwritten. There is no provision by which the government guarantees the policies. It is the corporation's capital and the capital alone which provides the guarantee. Therefore the board of directors must make sure that the capital is sufficient to meet any normal losses.

I should add that the premiums received have fallen short of covering operating expenses and net claims paid by some $955,000, but if our expectations in regard to recoveries are fulfilled, the corporation will have operated on a self-supporting basis, that is, will have had no need to make use of their earnings on capital contributed by the government.

In considering applications for insurance the board must exercise reasonable prudence, and it feels it cannot take on liabilities in any one foreign country which may be excessive in relation to its capital. Accordingly the present capital limits the corporation's effective scope particularly because today's pattern of sales of agricultural equipment and capital goods such as locomotives tends to concentrate large sums at risk in individual countries. While it is not practicable to determine the precise extent to which the corporation should commit itself in any one market, as an example the corporation was recently asked to consider a program involving several million dollars in one country on normal payment terms. But it was already committed in that country to the extent of about $5 million. This additional business would obviously involve too great a concentration of risk in relation to its $10 million capital. And yet it is this type of business which the corporation was originally set up to encourage.

Section 21 of the act permits the governor in council to authorize the corporation to insure where the board of directors is of the opinion that the insurance would impose on the corporation a liability for a term or an amount in excess of that which the corporation would normally undertake in relation to any one contract, exporter, commodity or country. It is felt that this section should not generally be used to insure normal business which the corporation would be prepared to handle were the capital sufficient. It is therefore proposed that the authorized capital be increased by $10 million to $15 million which, together with the $5 million capital surplus, would give the corporation an effective government backing of $20 million. It is also proposed that the additional capital be subscribed but not paid over to the corporation unless required.

One section of the amendment requires that the corporation credit the entire excess of its revenue over expenses and losses to an underwriting reserve. The nature of the corporation's activities is such that it is impossible to measure the results achieved by an examination of its accounts on a year-to-year basis or even over an extended period. Of necessity the volume of claims it has to pay will fluctuate more or less directly with economic conditions prevailing from time to time throughout the world. Since its inception the corporation has followed the practice of crediting the excess of its revenue over its disbursements to an underwriting reserve account. The proposed amendment makes it mandatory to continue this procedure until the reserve reaches $5 million, so that as far as possible funds would be available to cover all future losses.

The other amendments in the bill clarify the position of the corporation as an agent of Her Majesty, provide for the appointment of alternates to certain of the directors, and change the title of the operating head to conform with the practice in other crown corporations.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have listened with much interest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think he has given us a clear picture of the inception and of the course of business of this company. It is interesting to look back to the debate on August 1, 1944. I want to read just a sentence or two from it because at that time this corporation was evidently regarded as a most important cog in the machine of post-war rehabilitation. I want to read these few words from Hansard of August 1, 1944, page 5758. This is the preamble:

> Whereas it is desirable to promote the revival of trade by establishing a corporation to insure against loss caused by insolvency, delays in collection and transfer difficulties in connection with the export of Canadian-produced goods, and during the period of transition from war to peace by providing for loans or guarantees to governments of other countries or their agencies;

That is the preamble. At that time the debate, which was widely participated in, made it clear that in those days of uncertainty it was regarded as an extremely useful precautionary measure. I think it has carried out its usefulness to date just as the minister has explained. I think also he indicated to us why it needs more capital.

There are one or two questions I want to ask the minister. In particular it should be noted that the increase which we have—and which I shall refer to in a moment—refers to part I of the act. Part II of the act was a different affair and the transactions carried out there were not carried out under the auspices of the Export Credits Insurance Act in the same way as were those in part I. I want to ask the minister if he will tell us the present standing of one of the transactions which took place under part II—and it is one which has often been referred to in this house—namely the Ming Sung transaction which, as I say, does not appear in the accounts of the corporation because the corporation in that respect really acted only as an agent of the Minister of Finance; and, as I understand it, these accounts were dealt with in the consolidated revenue fund and do not come into the operations proper of the corporation.

There are one or two questions I should like to ask. The minister has already indicated the vagaries of this business. I want to draw attention to them by just referring very briefly to the operating statement of 1951, 1952 and the first nine months of 1953. It is the great variety in policyholders' payments that I want to direct attention to. In 1951 the payments under policyholders' claims are only $1,703. In 1952 they were $996,000. In the nine months of 1953 they were $2,062,000. With regard to the 1952 figure, my understanding is that it was occasioned largely by exchange difficulties in Brazil. That is one of the hazards that the exports credits insurance corporation took care of. If the minister would refer to it, I should like him to tell us whether there was anything special in 1952 and in the first nine months of 1953. Perhaps I might take my seat at this point, and the minister might say a word on that last question I have asked.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): As far as the Ming Sung transaction is concerned, I know my hon. friend is familiar with the situation. For a time the payments were made when due. Then when the iron curtain descended over China, the payments were stopped. There are some Chinese funds held in Washington. Perhaps we have a very good claim on them. I would not say that the possibility of ultimately collecting the balance of the payments due is hopeless. However, at the moment the responsibility of this government under the credit arrangements is being carried out and the banks are being paid the amounts due under that loan. The Ming Sung transaction involved insurance carried by the government itself, as my hon. friend knows, under part II of the act.

As to fluctuations in claims paid, that depends on the credit position of the various countries in the world. I would not blame Brazil particularly. Argentina has been slow. One or two other countries have been slow in paying their accounts. But while exchange difficulties have been accentuated in the last year or so in certain South American countries, we find that the accounts are being paid although perhaps not on the due date. For example, Brazil is catching up on its outstanding indebtedness to this country. Aside from the claim to which I referred of $138,000 which has been written off as irrecoverable, we have reason to hope that sooner or later we shall recover all the outstanding payments that have been made on account of insurance written by the corporation.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister gave a figure of $235 million which somewhat surprised me by its smallness. Is that the accumulated business done over the ten years?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is correct, yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Can the minister say the approximate amount of business outstanding at any one moment? For instance, can the minister give a rough figure as to how much business is outstanding at the present time?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I could get the information by calling my officer down from the gallery, but would my hon. friend not agree that we could discuss this matter on the bill to better advantage? I will have them with me then on the floor of the house, and in the meantime I will take note of the question and make sure that I have the information here.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Macdonnell: And at the same time I should like the minister to give us up to the minute detailed figures with regard to Ming Sung.

Mr. Thatcher: I have a comment or two to make on the resolution and I should also like to ask the minister several questions. I think the resolution will receive almost unanimous support in the house since the corporation undoubtedly is promoting trade at a time when more trade is needed. I was rather interested to learn that the corporation is paying its way. If I understood the minister correctly, I think he said that since formed it has shown a profit of roughly $1 million. I wonder if that profit would not be somewhat greater if it were not for the fact that the corporation is only taking risky insurance policies, and leaving the others to private companies. However, I suppose that is problematical.

There is one aspect of the operations of the corporation that I should like to have clarified this afternoon. It arises from a question which the hon. member for Kamloops asked in the house yesterday. He asked the minister whether or not exporters in Canada wishing to ship to iron curtain countries would be able to come under the provisions of this act. I think most of us in this group feel that this should be encouraged. Several days ago the Russian ambassador made certain overtures to this country indicating that he would like to see trade relations between Russia and Canada expanded. He said that Russia was going to send a trade attaché here and suggested that Russia might be willing to take some products we want to sell.

He mentioned wheat, meat, textiles and ships, I believe. It seems to me that there has been too much of an inclination throughout the country to write off these offers as valueless without examining them closely. I thought the minister gave a kind of negative answer yesterday. At page 2170 of Hansard he said:

> . . . if any Canadian merchant can arrange trade with Soviet Russia, his application will be considered by the department.

It seems to me that the government should be a little more positive. I do not think anyone would accuse me of being a communist. I know that the Russians sometimes are not such good pay. Yet if there is an opportunity for us to expand our trade with Russia at this time I think we should go ahead and do it, and I think one of the first steps to do that would be to utilize this act. The applications of exporters or traders wishing to trade with iron curtain countries should be very carefully examined and the provisions of the Export Credits Insurance Act should be made available. I think the government should give leadership. I think we should consider sending a trade attaché to Russia as they have promised to do here.

I should like to see our trade relations with certain other countries, China, Czechoslovakia and Poland, examined. I do not see why we should not enlarge trade with those nations also and allow this act to apply to them. Perhaps the minister would feel like making a somewhat more comprehensive statement on the subject than he did yesterday.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This is a business organization and my friend is a businessman. He realizes that we do not extend credit because of a certain flag. We extend credit when we think we are offered good credit risk. Our transactions are measured on that basis. I did not say we would not extend credit to the Soviet union. I did not say we would not extend credit to any other iron curtain country. It all depends on whether we think the debt will be paid on the due date. I suggest that the hon. member add that information to his broad experience of business and remember that dollars operate in that way.

Mr. Thatcher: Can the minister say whether the corporation has turned down any applications in the past several years from Canadians who wanted to export to Russia or China?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I would not know but I daresay they have. I do not know whether or not they have. As I say, it is entirely a matter of whether the insurance company believes that the paper will be paid on the due date. That is the criterion as far as the insurance company is concerned. It may have had the opinion that under the circumstances the paper of the Soviet union would not be paid on the due date. I think that might have been a reasonable conclusion as to the situation in the last two or three years, although it may not have been. I might mention the names of those who operate the corporation. The directors are W. F. Bull, deputy minister of trade and commerce, who is the chairman, K. W. Taylor, deputy minister of finance, L. C. Audette, chairman of the Canadian maritime commission, G. F. Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada, J. J. Deutsch, assistant deputy minister of finance, M. W. Sharp, associate deputy minister of trade and commerce, and H. T. Aitken, who is the general manager of the corporation.

They have the following as an advisory council: Mr. Hector Authier of Amos, Quebec, R. B. Buckerfield, Vancouver, R. H. Davis, Welland, James S. Duncan, Toronto, Raymond Garneau, Quebec, H. G. Hesler, Montreal, C. D. Jacox, Edmonton, L. J. Koerner, Vancouver, George W. Robertson, Regina, Fletcher S. Smith, Halifax, James Stewart, Toronto, who is president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, K. F. Wadsworth, Toronto, and F. Homer Zwicker, Lunenburg.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister is trying to dazzle us.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, I would call it a strong board. In any event, it is the combined judgment of the men I have named that governs whether or not a loan will be made. If my hon. friend wants to talk international politics, he is talking outside the scope of the corporation.

Mr. Thatcher: I am not talking politics. I am trying to get some information. Would the minister answer one more question? In the public accounts I notice that Greece is listed as a country which has owed us about $6 million for a period of twenty-five years, and yet last year the corporation accepted an insurance risk of $288,000 with respect to Greece. How could Greece be considered a good risk if they will not pay their old debt?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We believe that the Greek merchant who bought the goods in Canada will pay on the due date, and we believe that the Greek government will see that he is permitted to do so.

Mr. Macdonnell: I want, if I am not trespassing on the ground of the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, to ask a supplementary question. I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce to indicate, in answer to the hon. member for Kamloops, that trade beyond the iron curtain was strictly rationed, that it had to be done altogether by permit.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell: To that extent it seems to me that the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre was justified in raising the question as to whether it could be further extended. Did I understand the minister to say that certain export credit risks had been refused on any other ground than their intrinsic merits, that there was a policy of taking only certain types?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You were quite mistaken. The only ground for turning down insurance of that kind is doubt as to whether the transaction will be settled on the due date.

Mr. Macdonnell: I found it difficult, looking at the balance sheet of the corporation, to understand why more capital was needed.

The minister made a statement on that point which seemed to me to cover it. He said that they wanted to be able to do more business and to assume more risks. From the inquiries that the corporation has, are there clear signs that more business is being offered in various parts of the world at the present time?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, there is definite—

Mr. Macdonnell: Can the minister give any figures?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I cannot give figures, but I will say that the corporation has asked the government, under section 21 of the act, to underwrite some risks that the corporation would have gladly accepted themselves had their capital been sufficient to enable it to do so. I might say that the government has done rather well out of those risks. The insurance fee was paid to the government, of course, and we have never had a loss by taking a risk under section 21 of the act that was recommended by the corporation.

Mr. Macdonnell: Did they recommend Ming Sung?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That transaction was quite different; that was a transaction under part II of the act that was not operated by the corporation but rather was operated by the government.

Mr. Macdonnell: Then, if a profitable business is offered to the corporation, do you say that is still being done under part II?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If the business is beyond the capacity of the corporation to handle under part I, and is still desirable business, the corporation invites the government to assume responsibility for that particular risk.

Mr. Macdonnell: Do you think you could possibly have as good a board of directors to assume responsibility under part II as you have just listed under part I?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They are the same directors.

Mr. Macdonnell: I thought it was the governor in council who acted under part II.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The risk is recommended to the governor in council by the corporation. The governor in council need not assume it. The government has its choice as to whether or not it is willing to assume it. The governor in council does not consider it unless recommended by the corporation.

Mr. Macdonnell: Why should the corporation not be put in funds sufficient to enable the corporation to take this risk?

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is what we are trying to do by this measure.

Mr. Macdonnell: Do you think this will enable them to carry the whole business?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. Thatcher: Do I understand the minister to say that before this corporation will take one of these policies it must have been turned down by a private company? In other words, if there is any chance of a private corporation taking it this corporation will not?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There is no private company in the world handling this kind of insurance.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 295, to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES

MEASURE TO IMPLEMENT INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (for the Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 251, to implement the international convention for the northwest Atlantic fisheries.

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): When this bill was in the resolution stage, the Minister of Fisheries made a very concise statement concerning the international convention for the northwest Atlantic fisheries, and how it operates. There is very little that I can add at this time to what the minister said on that occasion. Briefly, however, the purpose of this bill is to permit the governor in council to make regulations to carry out the obligations assumed by Canada under the convention.

As hon. members know, under the annex to the convention the convention area, as delineated in article I, was divided into five sub-areas. Under the provisions of article IV of the convention, the contracting governments established panels for each sub-area. The entitlement to representation on the several panels is based on contiguity and historic right. In other words, the countries bordering a sub-area are entitled to representation on the panel for the sub-area, as also are the countries who have historic rights to fish in those areas.

Sub-area 5 covers an area contiguous to the states of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Rhode Island. In this sub-area is located the Georges bank, which is a very important fishing area. The only two contracting governments represented on this panel are Canada and the United States. As the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) pointed out in his statement at the resolution stage, Canada and the United States have had much experience in this type of convention. It is not surprising, therefore, that the first recommendation should come from this panel. After much research and scientific study a recommendation was made by this panel that the size of the mesh in trawl nets used for haddock be reduced. It was, therefore, necessary to pass legislation to permit the governor in council to make regulations which would apply to Canadian nationals in the convention area.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I should like to comment on the remarks made by the minister the other night, Mr. Speaker. He made the announcement for the first time that Dr. Bates was to be the first chairman of the commission. During my short interest in fisheries I have found that he is highly regarded, and we all consider it a great honour that he is representing us in this matter.

It was pleasing also to hear that Halifax had been chosen as the permanent site of the commission. Over my way we are partial to St. Andrews, so we are a little disappointed that St. Andrews is not included in the new plan. We are pleased, however, that the commission has a site in Halifax.

I have been going back over the story of this convention during the late forties. It was ratified by the house in 1950, but I cannot seem to find reference to the fact that the convention generally has been considered by the standing committee on marine and fisheries. I appreciate that it is perhaps not controversial, but I do think there has not been too much interest shown, either at the resolution stage or upon ratification. I felt also that members from Newfoundland, who should be concerned about one area, did not seem to be too worried over it. I feel that I should ask that this convention be referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries. The request is subject to the reservation that it has not been considered before.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I noticed when the parliamentary assistant was making his statement he mentioned the fact that, by agreement, the mesh in drags had been made smaller. Did he mean smaller or larger?

Mr. MacNaught: Smaller.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): If he has the information I would appreciate his pointing out what advantage there would be in a smaller drag mesh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Perhaps the hon. member would not mind my reminding him that we are not yet in committee on the bill.

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate the concern of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) when he said that he thought St. Andrews might have been considered as a location for the offices of the northwest Atlantic fisheries organization.

The members from Halifax feel that this time we should express our gratification in the fact that, after considering the excellent locations in many other cities throughout North America, Halifax has been the chosen city. Perhaps I should reverse the order of those words and say the "city chosen"—because I think we already are the former.

We are very grateful to those other cities and universities, including Harvard, and Memorial College at St. John's, Newfoundland, that have so gracefully acceded to the final decision in favour of Halifax and Dalhousie University. In locating in Halifax, we would like to give credit first of all to Dalhousie University and its president, Dr. Kerr, where quarters and other facilities have been supplied. We would also refer in the same connection to the Halifax board of trade which, through its endeavours, showed the advantages of Halifax over many other places considered. In this connection, too, I would include the government of Nova Scotia for supplying the necessary furniture for the offices.

While the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), his deputy minister and his parliamentary assistant could not at any time show preference for one part of Canada as against another, we would like to thank them for their earnest efforts in convincing the commission that Canada is the ideal country in which to locate this set-up. The work of the commission, I understand, is under the able leadership of the noted Danish scientist, Dr. Poulsen, and the work is proceeding well. Extensive and satisfactory scientific progress is being made.

It is hoped, and I feel sure the hope will be realized, that through conservation methods introduced and carried out by the commission, stocks of fish will be conserved to such an extent and at such a level that the maximum catch will be available for many future generations of fishermen. Through this a more stable economy will be assured for those provinces that are largely dependent upon fish for their livelihood.

On June 1 it is planned to have a general meeting of the commission in Halifax, upon which occasion representatives of all countries in the convention will be present. Those countries are the United States, Iceland, Denmark, Norway, France, the United Kingdom, Spain, Portugal, Italy and Canada.

As I said, the choice of Dalhousie University is a happy one, in that we have many scientific libraries at hand and readily available. I have in mind the one at Dalhousie University, as well as those at St. Mary's University and at King's University. And by the way, this last named is the oldest university in Canada. It will also have available the libraries of the Nova Scotia Technical College, the well-stocked library of the fisheries research experimental station which has, I believe, the best equipped fisheries biological laboratory in the world, the Halifax Memorial library, as well as the extensive and selective libraries of the Nova Scotia research council, under Dr. H. D. Smith, and the libraries of Acadia University, St. Francis Xavier University and that of the Memorial College at St. John's, Newfoundland.

Perhaps all these universities and libraries so readily available will indicate to members of the house one reason why Nova Scotia has the largest ratio of university students in Canada. And it might also at the same time raise a question in our minds as to why it is that Nova Scotia universities receive from the Massey grants the smallest per-student grant of any province in Canada.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, before the debate on second reading is concluded, I should like to join with others in what has been said. Obviously this is not a controversial measure, but one to which we can give general support. All hon. members realize the necessity for conservation, and the importance of the type of work contemplated in the legislation before us.

I most certainly join in what was said by the previous speaker about the satisfaction we all feel in the fact that Canada has been chosen as the country from which the commission will operate. Those of us from the east recognize the wisdom of it. Those in control of the board have been wise in choosing Nova Scotia as the province out of which they will operate. This reflects great credit upon their judgment and intelligence, and suggests that in future, if their operations are conducted as wisely, they will be very successful.

I am not sure as to what the course of procedure is to be in this instance—whether the matter is to be referred to a committee, or whether we shall deal with it in committee of the whole. And, if so, I do not know whether we will proceed with the discussion immediately after second reading has been given, or at some future date. There are however some questions one would wish to ask.

Along with the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) I did not grasp the significance of the reduction in the size of the mesh, to which reference was made by the parliamentary assistant, and which was described as a conservation measure. We do realize that conservation is necessary, but we also know that sometimes measures suggested by some organizations can impose a great deal of expense—sometimes unnecessary expense—upon fishermen engaged in the industry. I hope that the board will consider this point.

Canada will be represented on various panels, and certainly we need to safeguard the fisheries and, particularly, the interests of the fishermen engaged in the industry. At the moment the industry is undergoing economic difficulties, as was pointed out the other day by the hon. member for Charlotte; and I believe this point has been stressed at other times by other hon. members.

Reference to the size of mesh reminds me about a change in the size of rings in scallop draggers, which was brought about a year ago. I do not think this change has resulted in any safeguarding of the scallop industry, and most certainly it has put the fishermen engaged in that industry to a substantial expense—an expense which many feel was unwarranted.

In general, however, there cannot be any criticism of the principle of the bill, or of the action taken thus far. We are all in agreement on that. The only questions would be those of detail in administration, having special reference to the fish and the waters concerned, and all those other matters. I have no doubt these could be better discussed in committee of the whole.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, when I referred to the—

Mr. Pearkes: The hon. member has already spoken, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) wishes to speak now, he may be heard.

Mr. Pearkes: The hon. member who is standing has already spoken in this debate.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I did not speak; I asked a question.

Mr. Speaker: In asking a question the hon. member exhausted his right to speak on second reading. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich may now speak.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Far be it from me, representing a constituency on the Pacific coast, to enter into a debate as to the relative merits of the various provinces on the Atlantic seaboard; but I do rise to support the suggestion which was made by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) that this bill be referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries. A similar bill which dealt with the fisheries of the north Pacific ocean was referred to that committee a year ago, and the principle of the bill and details thereof were clarified in that committee in a way that it would not have been possible to have them clarified in the committee of the whole.

A good deal of advantage would accrue by referring this bill, although it is just a simple one, to that committee, where we could have the officials of the department give the background of the reasons why it has been introduced. We would be able, if necessary, to hear evidence from the interested parties, the fishing industry, or the fishermen of the Atlantic coast, and I believe that considerable value would be gained from having this bill referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries which is not very heavily employed at the present time.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): As a member of this house who is especially interested in conservation in all its forms I should like to take the opportunity of making a few comments on this occasion. Perhaps it is not generally realized how important the resources of the sea are. As a matter of fact, at the present time, without the products which we reap from the sea, the present population of the world could not satisfy its protein nourishment needs. As far as carbohydrates and that sort of thing are concerned, perhaps we might be able to get along without the fishing industry, but when one considers how necessary proteins are in people's diet, one realizes that already we have exhausted the available facilities for the production of protein from the land, and must turn to the sea for it.

The other day, in commenting on this bill in the resolution stage, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) said, as reported at page 1934 of Hansard:

> The Grand Banks are still, after 400 years of fishing, the greatest single fishery in the world, but in recent years there have been signs of depletion in one or two of the banks, which give concern to the nations which are fishing that great fishing ground.

I agree with the opinion expressed by the minister when he said that the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, and the northwestern Atlantic generally, are one of the greatest fishing grounds in the world. I think it is very much of an understatement to say that in recent years there have been signs of depletion. Actually the northwest Atlantic fishery has been tremendously depleted in the last 450 years, and many forms of marine life in that area have been exterminated. It is an historic and important source of food for the peoples of Europe, and following John Cabot's voyage to Newfoundland there grew up a great and important fishing industry on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, even in the sixteenth century.

That was understandable because when that area became known to Europe it was realized that it was an area of great abundance. There was an incredible supply of fish and other forms of marine life there, and that supply has been gradually depleted. It is very encouraging that even at this late date the nations concerned should get together and do something to preserve the resources which they have in common in that area.

I quote from a book published by Mr. Biggar dealing with the early trading companies of France, at page 18:

> On the return of Cabot from his first voyage in the year 1497 an Italian envoy in England wrote home to Milan that the sea in those parts had been found so full of fish that the sailors caught them by merely lowering a basket with a stone in it and hauling it up again.

In other words, the Grand Banks of Newfoundland were teeming with fish, and the same was true of the gulf of St. Lawrence and adjacent waters. When that news spread there was much interest and great excitement in Europe and an immediate effort was made to exploit the resources that had been discovered. As a result, from about 1506 on, a large number of ships went annually across the Atlantic from France, Portugal, England and Spain to fish on the Grand Banks; and the number of ships that sailed across the Atlantic in those early days to exploit the fishery there was really remarkable. As early as 1578 as many as 150 ships went annually from Europe to fish on the Grand Banks. Of course, that number was much lower in some years. For instance, in the year that the Spanish Armada sailed against England the number was greatly reduced, because crews in the Spanish Armada were pressed from the crews of those Basque fishing ships which would normally have come across the Atlantic.

There was an abundance of fish not only on the banks but in other areas where they now have become relatively scarce, for instance, in the gulf of St. Lawrence areas. There were industries other than fishing which were based on marine life and which were of great importance in those days. There was a large fleet from the bay of Biscay that came across the Atlantic annually to whale in the gulf of St. Lawrence. The number of whales in the gulf of St. Lawrence has been greatly diminished. There are other forms of life that have been exterminated. In those early days the islands of the gulf of St. Lawrence were practically covered with what were known at that time as sea oxen or sea cows. There is still a place in the riding of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacNaught) that is called Sea Cow Pond, and it gets its name from the fact that two or three hundred years ago it was customary to hunt those sea cows in that area. That animal has been exterminated.

There was another type of sea cow that existed in Davis strait, and I believe they became extinct in 1768. Their existence was discovered only 30 years before, but they were the type of animal that was easy to hunt, and Russian fishing vessels came annually to hunt these sea cows in the Bering strait. They were exterminated in the course of 30 years. I point this out merely to illustrate how the original natural resources in this part of the Atlantic ocean have been reduced in the last 450 years. When Jacques Cartier arrived in the gulf of St. Lawrence in 1534 he had this to say when recording the details of his voyage:

> About two leagues from Cape royall wee sounded and found 20 fadome water, and there is the greatest fishing of Cods that possible may be: for staying for our company, in lesse then an houre we tooke above an hundredth of them.

If one refers to historical references one will find many instances of an extreme abundance of fish and other forms of marine life 400 years ago in this area before they were exploited to any great extent. I make these remarks merely to point up the fact that this area has been exploited to a considerable extent and its possibilities have been reduced over the years by indiscriminate fishing and hunting of marine life.

As I have said already, there are various types of life that have been exterminated, and I refer particularly to two types of sea cow. Various types of birds, including penguins, which were very common on the islands of the gulf of St. Lawrence 400 years ago, have been wiped out. The number of fish has been reduced tremendously and the whole balance of nature has been upset.

Therefore, I suggest that it is most important that consideration be given to widening the scope of this convention to include forms of marine life other than fish. I have in mind especially whales and seals in the northern St. Lawrence and around Newfoundland. I think the protection of this form of life is very important.

I must say that I am tremendously encouraged by the indication that real progress will be made almost immediately in a co-operative, scientific study of the situation with a view to making regulations to be enforced by the various partners which will increase the potential of the resources in the northwest Atlantic.

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, in closing this debate I want to make just one or two references. More particularly I want to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) to the effect that this bill be referred to the standing committee on fisheries. I do not think that any useful purpose would be served by sending this bill to the standing committee.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich referred to the fact that the north Pacific fisheries convention was referred to the standing committee, but there is no analogy between the two cases. In the instance referred to by the hon. member the convention had not been ratified by the house and it was considered thoroughly by the committee before ratification took place. In the present instance the convention was approved by the house in July, 1950, and has been ratified by the ten other countries. I cannot see what purpose would be served by having it referred to the committee at this time.

I regret that something I said appears to have left confusion in the minds of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) and the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan). What I intended to say was that the recommendation of the panel was that the mesh be standardized. Perhaps it would be more clear to hon. members if I read the recommendation, which was as follows:

> That the contracting governments take appropriate action to prohibit the taking of haddock in sub-area 5 by persons under their jurisdiction with a trawl net having a mesh size less than four and one-half inches.

In other words, it is essential that no net with a smaller mesh be used.

I agree with what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Balcom) said concerning my alma mater, Dalhousie University. I want to thank all hon. members for taking part in the debate and for their laudatory remarks concerning the work of our deputy minister and other officials in the department.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, this gives me an opportunity to clarify my position with regard to the statement made by the parliamentary assistant. Over the years I have found that to a great extent the criticism with regard to trawlers has been in connection with the size of the mesh used, and for that reason I asked the parliamentary assistant if he had said that the mesh would be smaller instead of larger.

The criticism in this regard has been due to the fact that a great number of the fish taken in drags are killed in the drag and when liberated are a complete loss. That has been the criticism for many years with regard to this type of fishing. Skippers of trawlers have told me that in some cases the number of fish destroyed would be greater than the number saved. There would be no comparison in poundage, of course. For that reason it has always been felt that any conservation work should be directed toward the use of a larger rather than smaller mesh. That is why I made the comment I did.

I should like to refer for a moment to the statement made by the hon. member for Digby - Annapolis - Kings, that the changes made in the scallop drag did not meet with the approval of fishermen in that area. I might say at this point that I have dragged for scallops myself and I am heartily in agreement with the change made in the size of the scallop drag. The department was convinced that the size should be increased in all areas where scallops are dragged. On the west side of the bay of Fundy beds of small scallops were found. When the fishermen went out to drag these beds, and when their catch was looked over by the fisheries inspector, it was decided that the scallops were too small and they were forbidden to drag on that particular ground. That has caused a great deal of ill feeling. In many cases the scallop beds have been practically depleted in a matter of a year or two by starfish and other marine growths. The fishermen have always thought that when scallops are found they should be given a permit to drag for them. I had an example on Grand Manan island almost one year ago where a nice bed of scallops was found and the price at that time, if I remember correctly, was 60 cents a pound. That is a very good price. The fishermen were doing very well. Then the department decided that it should be closed.

In discussing this matter with the officials of the department it was suggested that if the mesh in that drag—and as we all know they are metal rings—was enlarged, it would allow the small scallops to escape. The reason that occurred was one which I will explain briefly. As to scallops, the same as with lobsters, there is a two-inch limit. There never was a barrel of clams dug which an inspector could not condemn if he wanted to because there never was a barrel of clams dug in which you could not find some clams below two inches. The same thing applies to scallops. There never was a boatload of scallops that came into dock that an inspector could not condemn as far as size is concerned. It was a headache for the inspector. It was a headache for the fishermen. That is the reason, to a great extent, that if they had small scallops they would not go in at all. They would go into some isolated place and shuck them there. That is the position in which you are placed. With the scallops that we have, if they had been taken off the beds at that time during last winter—the price has fallen this year—the fishermen would have derived greater benefits then than they will in 1954. But again that was because of a price drop. That was all. But any move by this department that increases the size limit has my support. The same thing would apply to the lobster industry. I may be getting away from the bill for a moment. The same thing would apply to all these branches of this industry that I have had anything to do with. I have found that when you increase the size limit, it is of benefit to the producer. That is why I was most anxious about the statement made by the parliamentary assistant. I felt that if the size of mesh of these drags was to be smaller than it was previously, it was a step in the wrong direction and not a step in a way that would indicate that conservation was being considered.

Mr. Nowlan: Following the hon. member for Charlotte I should like to say a word. I think we are in substantial agreement. His fishermen are on the opposite side of the bay of Fundy and their problems and the problems of the fishermen in my constituency are common ones. I know the views he has expressed on behalf of the fishermen of his area would be expressed by the fishermen on the opposite side of the bay of Fundy. I know that the matter of scallops is a most serious one. The market price is less than it has been, in I do not know how many years; I guess since the industry was first commenced. There is a real problem.

What he said about the size of the mesh in the trawls and the operation of the draggers generally or the trawlers is a most serious matter. I do not know whether it will come within the purview of this commission or not, but the hon. member for Charlotte pointed out the damage done by the trawlers generally and the conflict between the trawls, the fishermen operating trawls and the hand-liners, the inshore fishermen on the small operations, with his line and what-have-you, who sees that he is being ruined and his existence is being threatened by that form of fishing. Apparently the size of the trawl, so we are told, has now been standardized. But I hope that this commission—it may not come within its jurisdiction—will look into the matter. I suggest that more careful study must be given to the operation of these trawlers in the inshore waters. In so far as the high seas are concerned, I realize that the industry must be standardized, that there must be assurance of a steady flow of fish, and that trawlers operating on the high seas are necessary to maintain the industry. But in the inshore waters, in the waters adjacent to Charlotte and in the waters adjacent to Digby—these coves, bays and inlets up at the head of the bay of Fundy, where the haddock go to spawn in the fall, and where they come back along the inshore waters—the trawlers come there and catch them. Forty or fifty thousand of the big haddock are taken in those boats and the hand-liners along the shore have a poor winter. We have heard about unemployment in this chamber during the last three or four days. The situation confronting some of these fishing villages after one operation by a trawler like that is comparable to what we have heard with regard to industrial centres throughout Canada. I simply want to emphasize the importance of this commission. I agree with what the hon. member for Queens has said. We all know that conservation is necessary. We know that the waters have been exploited in the past and they are depleted in many parts today. This is an important question. It is a matter on which one must make progress slowly. Certainly the interests of the fishermen of today must be protected as well as the industry in the future.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. MacLean: There is one question on which I should like to have some general information, and I know the parliamentary assistant will be kind enough to explain it. As I understand it, when this convention was signed it was before Newfoundland came into confederation and Newfoundland signed as a contracting government on its own. There are certain obligations which the convention allots to each of the contracting governments. As an example article XI, section 3, subsection (a) states:

> From the administrative budget there shall be deducted a sum of 500 United States dollars for each contracting government;

And that sort of thing. It is based on the assumption that Newfoundland and Canada were two separate contracting parties. Now that they have become one country, how has this been resolved? In other words, do we take over two shares of the responsibility, one for the original nine provinces and another for Newfoundland? Or do we merely absorb the obligations which were originally contracted for by Newfoundland into our own as one contracting party?

Mr. MacNaught: When I moved the adoption of the ratification of the convention on May 29, 1950, I referred to the problem raised by the hon. member for Queens. At that time, owing to the position of Newfoundland then, it was necessary to refer to it separately but later on it was taken in and was included in the Canadian panels and so on. In other words, Canada pays only its proportion, which proportion is based on the number of panels on which it has representation in the commission. There are five panels, and Canada has representation on four of the panels. The sub-area on which Canada has no panel representation is the area contiguous to Greenland. Does that satisfy my hon. friend?

Mr. MacLean: Yes; thank you.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant one question. It probably was mentioned when he moved ratification of the convention but I have forgotten it and so I raise it again now. The international convention refers to the protection and conservation of fisheries of the northwest Atlantic ocean. One would assume that would include all fish of all kinds. I notice article IV (2) states:

> After this convention has been in force for two years, but not before that time, panel representation shall be reviewed annually by the commission, which shall have the power, subject to consultation with the panel concerned, to determine representation on each panel on the basis of current substantial exploitation in the sub-area concerned of fishes of the cod group (Gadiformes), of flat fishes (Pleuronectiformes), and of rosefish (genus Sebastes), . . .

Those are the only three which are mentioned. Am I right in assuming that all fish of all kinds—including shall we say scallops and shellfish—are included within this convention? Then if I am right in assuming that, what representation on the panels have fish other than those mentioned in paragraph 2, namely cod, flat fishes and rosefish?

Mr. MacNaught: I say this subject to correction, Mr. Chairman, but I do not think any other fish are included except those in subsection 2 of article IV.

Mr. Nowlan: Those are all that are included in this convention.

Mr. MacNaught: That is right.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Bell: With respect to clause 2, paragraph (c), "convention area", I am wondering about the rights that the French fishermen have and have had for years inside the territorial waters of Newfoundland. I realize that the question of territorial waters is a controversial one, but would the rights of the French fishermen still be protected?

Mr. MacNaught: Any rights the French fishermen had under international law would not be interfered with by this convention unless they agree later on to give them up.

Mr. Power (St. John's West): I may be wrong in my history, but it is my notion that the rights that the French fishermen had in Newfoundland waters were treaty rights and that these were abolished about the beginning of this century. French fishermen have no more rights in Newfoundland waters now than the fishermen of any other foreign nation.

Mr. MacNaught: I prefaced my remarks by saying "any rights that they had". I am not saying they had any rights.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Regulations.

Mr. Bell: I should like to make a comment with regard to the licences that may be issued. I do not know how far the regulations will go but this is quite a broad clause and as a novice in the fisheries game I should like to pass on one suggestion. I suggest that every care be exercised in the issuing of licences to see that the people who actually do the fishing get the licences. We are having trouble now in Saint John county, and I think it extends into Charlotte county. I should like to say that the fisheries department is aware of it and is giving us good co-operation, but so far as any new areas or any new licences that may be issued under the regulations are concerned we should start right from the beginning to see that those who actively work the weirs and do the fishing are the only ones who are considered for licences. I think that would be commendable.

TELEGRAPHS ACT

APPLICATION OF PART III CONCERNING MARINE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH COMPANIES

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 30, to amend the Telegraphs Act.

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is a very simple bill and I wish to make the following statement in order to further clarify the situation. The Telegraphs Act, chapter 262 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, applies to the province of Newfoundland since confederation. Part III of the Telegraphs Act which relates to marine electric telegraph companies was first enacted in 1875. Prior to that date there was no legislation of the parliament of Canada dealing with the control of cable companies.

Part III of the Telegraphs Act applies to every company authorized by act of parliament to construct or maintain telegraph wires or cables placed under or across any territorial waters of Canada so as to connect a province with another province or to extend beyond the limits of a province. It also applies to companies authorized to construct or maintain such wires or cables before the 8th day of April, 1875, by act of the parliament of Canada or by act or charter of any of the provinces constituting Canada in force at that time. Only companies to which this part applies are authorized to construct, maintain or use such wires or cables connecting two or more provinces or extending beyond the limits of a province.

The act requires the company, before exercising any of its powers, to obtain the approval of the governor in council of the plan, site and location of its telegraph, the shore approaches, its stations on land and related works.

When Newfoundland united with Canada in 1949, certain companies such as Cable and Wireless Limited and Anglo-American Cable Company Limited were authorized by Newfoundland to operate cables landed in Newfoundland. Western Union and Commercial Cable Company also land their cables in that province. In particular, Cable and Wireless Limited, a company incorporated in the United Kingdom, operates a cable between the United Kingdom, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, but this company is not authorized under the Telegraphs Act to land its cables in Canada and is not a company coming within part III of that act. It is proposed to bring Cable and Wireless Limited under this part of the Telegraphs Act so that Cable and Wireless Limited in conjunction with Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation may be authorized to construct and operate certain cables in connection with the commonwealth telegraphs agreement, 1948, to which, as you know, Canada is a party.

It is considered to be within the intent of the terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada to have part III of the Telegraphs Act apply to companies authorized under the laws of Newfoundland prior to union to construct and maintain submarine cables extending beyond the limits of that province. The bill, as I said, is a simple one and there is no doubt that parliament has the necessary jurisdiction to enact the proposed amendment.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the parliamentary assistant that this is a routine bill but there are one or two clauses in it—I will not refer to them particularly now—which to my mind are in conflict with the Newfoundland aspect of the matter. I feel that there may be some overlapping. I do not mean that there is not authority under the constitution to pass this legislation, but there are one or two points involving the existence of Newfoundland previously and I think they should be taken into consideration.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Bell: I quite realize the implications of clause 1 (c) on section 18 in the act, but there is mention there of a New York, Newfoundland and London Telegraph Company with rights existing at this time. I do not know what their position would be under the new section.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): When you read section 18 of the Telegraphs Act, Mr. Chairman, you will note that this section only says:

> "This act does not affect any franchise, right or privilege that the New York, Newfoundland and London Telegraph Company or any other company, or person lawfully entitled thereto, actually acquired and exercised or operated in Prince Edward Island before and up to the said 1st day of July, 1873, under and subject to the provisions of any act of the legislature of Prince Edward Island made and passed before the said 1st day of July, 1873" . . . etc.

This has nothing to do with the proposed amendment, since the proposed amendment does not deal with that particular company but with companies which were in operation in Newfoundland prior to the union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Mr. Bell: The point I am making is that you are seeking to put in an extra section in the middle of the act, and there are other sections which make definite mention of Newfoundland when it was not a part of Canada. While section 18 has no direct bearing on clause 1 (c) and might not be in conflict with it, I am certain that section 39 is.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I hope the hon. member will indicate in a clearer manner just how section 39 comes into conflict with the proposed amendment.

Mr. Bell: I appreciate that it is confusing, but you are taking a section and adding it to the middle of part III of the Telegraphs Act. I maintain that some of the other sections of the Telegraphs Act are in conflict with that section you are reading because at the time the Telegraphs Act was drawn up Newfoundland was not a part of Canada. There are instances in some sections where Newfoundland is referred to as a separate country. I feel some consideration at least should be given to these sections that are farther on in the act.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I must admit that I do not see the point which the hon. member is trying to make. The existing sections in the Telegraphs Act are not being amended, and will have the same effect as they have had since this act was put into force. Whatever is said in section 17 of the act, either in the two existing paragraphs (a) and (b) or in the new paragraph (c) which we are adding today, will be governed by whatever is said in the following sections. I should like the hon. member to explain further how these sections could come into conflict with the proposed amendment.

Mr. Bell: Well, section 17 of part III of the Telegraphs Act begins by saying that this part applies to every company, and then goes on to list them. They are in the act now. You are adding paragraph (c), and that is fine, but the other sections of part III of the act which come along from section 18 onwards were drawn up at a time when Newfoundland was not a part of Canada. I maintain that there is some law in those sections concerning Newfoundland as a separate country which is in conflict with the addition you are making to the act. At least, I ask for consideration of that point. I do not want to be dogmatic about it. That is the only point I want to make on it.

The Deputy Chairman: If the parliamentary assistant wishes, we could call it six o'clock, and he could answer the question later.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I do not think the hon member has clarified the point he wishes to make. However I can assure him that the law officers of our department have thoroughly considered the amendment before submitting it, and I am certain he can take it there is no conflict between the proposed amendment and the existing sections of the Telegraphs Act.

NATIONAL BATTLEFIELDS

QUEBEC—AMOUNT PAID TO COMMISSION INCREASED TO $125,000

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 167, to amend an act respecting the national battlefields at Quebec.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Payment of $125,000 a year for four years authorized.

Mr. Power (Quebec South): Mr. Chairman, over a very long period of years I have taken a great interest in the subject matter of the bill now before the house. For that reason I am beholden to thank the minister for the interest he is taking in this question—and that, notwithstanding his great preoccupation with the enormous task he has before him in the development of those great last frontiers of Canada, the new regions of our north country. I am sure that he, in the interest which he takes in the preservation and conservation of the memorials to those who have gone before us, will find inspiration for himself and his associates in the great task they have undertaken.

My interest, as I have said, creates in my imagination an almost proprietary or vested interest in the objects which are covered by this bill. Back in March of 1920 I moved in the house—

> That, in the opinion of this house, the ancient walls and fortifications of the city of Quebec, having for all military purposes become obsolete, it is expedient in order to better preserve these valuable heirlooms as a historical monument for future generations, that their upkeep and control be now vested in the national battlefields commission.

This resolution was repeated on one or more occasions. But in connection with this matter let me say that, as a member of parliament, I went through almost the entire gamut of human emotions. There was fervour, crusading zeal, a certain amount of encouragement, setbacks, small successes, long years of patient waiting, and finally almost partial achievement—and, I regret to say, at the end a good deal of disillusionment.

Encouraged by the somewhat favourable comments of the then existing government, in 1920, I fondly imagined that when a friendly government should come into power what had been encouragement would become decisive action. But, like a great many of that generation following the first war, I was carried away by the slogan that the 1914-18 war had been a war to end all wars. And in my firm belief in that theory I was bold enough, and imprudent enough, to move in 1922 that the estimates of the militia department, including the salaries of the military heads, be considerably curtailed. After that, may I tell the house, the walls still remained in the control of the Department of National Defence, and my most impassioned pleas to preserve their historic interest met with brazen hearts and cold words from the heads of the department.

After a term of years, proceeding along these lines, it occurred to me that the interest which I had intended to suscitate might better be covered by an appeal to another element of the thinking of the ministry, the political element. And I raised the question in this house of the possibility—yes, and the probability—that these walls, if their upkeep and fortifications were not kept in proper repair by the Department of National Defence, might some day crumble, and fall upon the inhabitants of the quarters situated below the hill, thus wiping out a substantial Liberal majority.

In those days the Liberal party had not achieved the state of respectability which it now enjoys, and those of us who wished to be returned sought and obtained considerable support from below the hill—or "below the track", as they would put it in other constituencies. The result of these representations was that, within a short space of time, moneys were voted by the Department of National Defence for the repair of these walls. And by strange coincidence, once every four years more moneys were voted, with the result that the Quebec walls, taken by themselves, are today in a reasonable state of preservation.

But it did take over 30 years for the government, as a whole, to be moved to the point where the control of the upkeep and maintenance of these historic monuments was taken out of the hands of the Department of National Defence and transferred to a civilian department. This took place some time in 1950. It was announced that, from now on, these properties would be looked after, maintained and kept by the then department of resources. But unfortunately, I believe through some slip, or perhaps because the military mind was not existent in the civilian department, in the transfer there was an oversight in that whereas the walls themselves, that is to say, the mortar, the rock and the brick, were turned over to the department; the approaches, the fortifications, which I believe to the military mind are part of an entire fortified city, such as the glacis, the clearance made for the path of fire, and so forth were transferred to the national battlefields commission. The result is that today we appear to have two authorities dealing with what, in the opinion of many, should be exactly the same property. I am going to suggest to the minister, not for immediate action, because I realize that there will be many obstacles to overcome, that he take under the immediate control of his department both the actual concrete buildings, walls, bricks and so on and the approaches thereto consisting of the glacis, the cleared terrain which lies in front of it, and that having the two together he might proceed to the development of this great historic site of Canada in a manner which befits the government of Canada.

May I suggest to him that he has very valid reasons for undertaking this in his department. The national battlefields commission of itself has neither the facilities, the personnel nor the equipment to undertake anything like reasonably large capital expenditure such as the building of approaches and the giving of access to the more important parts of the fortification. I would suggest to him that he do not at once abolish the commission, but that he retain it in a consultative capacity within his department, and that the one or two permanent employees—and I do not think there are more than that—be also taken over and become employees of his department.

Should he—and I think perhaps he may—meet with some local prejudice, may I suggest to him that if he looks over the debates which took place in this house at the time of the creation of the national battlefields commission in 1908 he will find that at that time there was some objection, and serious objection also, from a great leader of public opinion in our province, the late Armand LaVergne, who objected to the creation of such a commission with a constitution as laid down in the act, which I believe is still in existence, whereby persons from other countries and from other provinces could on the subscription or contribution by that country or province select a commissioner on the national battlefields commission. Mr. LaVergne raised the question in this house, and as a matter of fact divided the house on the subject. It may be that at that time there was considerable justification for the constitution of the commission as it was then formed, since the figures given to me by the department indicate that outside of the contribution of the government of the day, which was I think $300,000, there were gifts from provincial governments amounting in all to $260,000; gifts from Canadian municipalities; a gift from New Zealand; gifts from teaching institutions in Canada, in Great Britain and in other parts of the empire; gifts from historical societies, from commercial institutions and so forth, amounting to $556,787.24, which was certainly to some extent a justification of the peculiar constitution of this particular commission. But I submit, sir, and suggest to the minister that at the present time the function of this commission is restricted almost wholly to that of maintenance. There are eight or ten commissioners, I do not know which, all of whom are men of standing and prestige in the community, and it is hardly likely that men of that particular executive capacity and standing would do very much in the way of attending to the work of laying out paths or deciding which particular type of shrubbery, be it mistletoe or holly, should line the different paths, byways and roadways in this particular park.

Again my suggestion to him is that he retain the services of these very eminent and estimable persons as consulting authorities in matters relating to this great national battlefields park, and that his department undertake to do whatever there is to be done so as to bring the national battlefields park of Quebec, which after all was the first one constituted in this country and which from the standpoint of history does represent a great deal in the early and even in the later life of this great country of ours, on a par with all the national parks throughout the country. If he were to undertake the work which should be done by his department, I am sure it would not be long before the national battlefields park in Quebec would have the facilities and the appearance which would make it at least on a par with other national parks throughout the country.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I want to say only a few words to comment on what has been said by the hon. member for Quebec South. In doing so I might be a little embarrassed because one has to remember that he is my own member; I live in the constituency which he represents; he is also my ex-senior law partner. Therefore it might not be too easy for me to comment on what he has just said.

Of course he knows the situation and the history of this park better than I do, even if he has been living for a great number of years at one end of the park and I also have been living for a great number of years at the other end of the park.

He has mentioned the reasons why the constitution of the national battlefields commission is what it is. Since it was thought at the time that the provinces, private societies and private individuals, or even other countries, might contribute to the creation and maintenance of the park, it was felt that there should be an independent commission to administer the park. But since 1912 all the money necessary to maintain and improve the park has come from the federal government with no contribution coming from any other source. The question of whether the time has come to change the constitution of the park to bring it directly under part II of the National Parks Act is difficult to answer. I am certainly delighted to have had the views of the experienced hon. member for Quebec South on this matter.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

CHANGE IN BASIS OF COMPENSATION IN RESPECT OF SWINE AND SHEEP

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 250, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in order to abide by the general rules of the house it is necessary that a minister move the second reading of this particular bill, but as my parliamentary assistant handled the matter at the resolution stage I am going to ask the house to permit him to make a speech in connection with this bill at this time.

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in this amendment of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act it is intended to change the basis of compensation. Under the act as it now stands we paid, in the case of swine, $50 for purebred and $30 for grade hogs; in the case of sheep the compensation was $50 for purebred and $20 for grade types. Under this new amendment we are going to pay the market value of sheep that have to be destroyed because of any disease that may occur. We have been most fortunate over the years in not having many diseases in sheep, but other countries have not been so fortunate and we may be faced with this problem in this country.

In the case of hogs, for many years these animals have been afflicted with cholera, particularly in the province of Ontario where we had a serious outbreak last year. The government feels that it would be in the interests of hog producers to increase the compensation to be paid. For that reason, instead of the $30 paid formerly for grade animals and $50 for purebred animals, we are now going to pay the market value of hogs when they are slaughtered.

I may be asked, What is meant by market value, slaughter value or any other term that I might use? Anyone who is a farmer will understand that in the case of small pigs they might be worth $10 or $12 when they are six to eight weeks old. If such pigs were slaughtered, $10 or $12 would be paid.

A pig ready for market might be worth in the neighbourhood of $50, and $50 would be paid for such a pig when slaughtered. A brood sow might be worth in the neighbourhood of $75, $80 or more, and if she were slaughtered, $75, $80 or more would be paid.

By this means we hope to help to eradicate any disease that may occur. We feel confident that this legislation will be favourably received by the producers and they will appreciate what we are trying to do to help them.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, a week ago Tuesday night the debate on this legislation to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act was commenced and at that time I was careful to have the parliamentary assistant describe what was meant by market value. The definition he gives tonight is different from the definition given a week ago last Tuesday. I should like to quote from page 1933 of Hansard of February 9, where the parliamentary assistant is reported as having said:

> The market value of a cattle beast may be the value that the farmer, in sending that cattle beast to an inspected slaughterhouse, is able to obtain.

As appears on the opposite page, I was careful to have the parliamentary assistant say that he did not mean the replacement value; he said that it was the slaughter value. In that case, I think it was most unfair for purebred sheep and swine breeders. However, the definition has been changed tonight and the parliamentary assistant is now defining market value as the actual market value of the swine or sheep.

That being the case, I submit that the principle of this bill is not good either way you look at it. If the definition was right a week ago Tuesday night it was not good for the purebred sheep and swine breeders. If it is right tonight, it is not good for the purebred cattle and horse breeder.

This is government legislation and it is the duty of the opposition to point out any discrepancies. So far as I know, the only case where the actual market value was paid for animals was during the outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan two years ago. That was covered by special legislation. It was only right that the market value was paid in order that breeders might be more apt to report the disease.

If that principle was fair in connection with foot-and-mouth disease, is it not just as fair that it should apply in the case of t.b. reactors? The government takes the t.b. tests. The other evening the parliamentary assistant said that this was done at the request of the farmers. That is partly true. The first test in a county is taken at the farmers' behest if they want the county to be a restricted area.

However, these animals are now t.b. tested every so often and the farmer has nothing to say as to whether a reactor is kept in the herd. It must be tattooed, or tagged and taken to a slaughterhouse and slaughtered. What is fair for one is fair for the other. If a fair market value is to be placed on cattle in the case of foot-and-mouth disease, and is to be placed on sheep and hogs in the case of cholera or any disease for which they have to be killed, then I say it is just as fair that fair market value be placed on purebred cattle and purebred horses in case they have to be slaughtered by government officials. The action taken in both cases—whether it be as a result of hog cholera, foot-and-mouth disease or any other disease such as tuberculosis—is taken to protect the cattle breeders of this country—and, incidentally, the health of Canadians all across the country—and the economy of the country as a whole. Why should cattle breeders and horse breeders be put in a much less desirable position than that of hog breeders and sheep breeders?

I will go so far as to say this. I would suggest to all hog producers and sheep producers across this great Canada of ours—anyone who is breeding purebred animals—that they be sure to get their registration papers in order in case there is an outbreak of hog cholera or of any other disease as a result of which these animals have to be slaughtered. For instance, in the case of a registered bull, a herd sire, the owner probably has gone out and paid $500, $1,000 or maybe $5,000 for it. Then the veterinary inspector comes along, puts a tag in that animal's ear and that animal goes to the slaughterhouse; the breeder gets $100 plus the value of the carcass. With the price of hogs today, in my district not more than two weeks ago, two sows due to farrow shortly, two grade sows, brought $190 apiece. Does the government think it is fair to pay $190 for those grade animals, for instance, when a purebred herd sire that probably cost the owner $1,000 or more should bring only $100?

I want to point out this consideration, Mr. Speaker. We cannot ever place ourselves in a position so as to tolerate the subsidization of disease in this country; nor can we allow disease to become profitable, as was the case back in the 1930's. I would strongly urge the government to consider this argument. If it is fair for one, it is fair for the other. As the situation is at present, there is gross discrimination against the purebred-cattle breeders. If it is fair to pay the fair market value to one group—and I am not saying it is not; I think it is fair to pay the market value—then it is fair to pay it to the other.

You are placing the inspectors in an extremely embarrassing position. Someone who has a herd of purebred stock, developed over a period of 20 years or 25 years, probably representing the work of a lifetime, can have that lifetime's work wiped out in one day by an inspector. It can be wiped out just as fast for tuberculosis as for hog cholera, and just as effectively. I would seriously urge the government to give this matter consideration. I am saying that it is proper that sheep and swine should get all the consideration in the world and should be paid for on the basis of actual market value. But if that be so, I think it is just as fair that cattle breeders should receive the same consideration.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to make a strong recommendation to the minister with regard to this bill; but first I should like to ask some questions of the parliamentary assistant to the minister because I think before we vote on this bill we should have some clarification as to just exactly what is meant by certain terms in the bill.

First I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to define quite clearly to us what is meant by "market value". As the preceding speaker has indicated, there is definitely a misunderstanding on this conception as to what is meant by the word "market". I for one think that the market value should be the sale value. In connection with that matter, I am going to wait until I hear what the parliamentary assistant has to say.

Then again, in the act respecting infectious or contagious diseases affecting animals there is no definition that I could find which would actually indicate the complete classification of animals as pertaining to this bill. I know that in one place it refers to cattle. Then of course the act refers purely to animals. I should therefore like to have clarification of those two points before I speak further, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I should point out to the hon. member that we must not anticipate committee stage. On second reading we must discuss the principle of the bill. The hon. member should not expect the parliamentary assistant to answer his questions now, because when the parliamentary assistant speaks again on second reading, he will be closing the debate.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Then, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make quite clear my stand on this matter. First, I want to say that I agree that an amendment was quite essential in order to bring some justice to the producer of livestock in this country. As has been indicated by the parliamentary assistant, under the original bill, in the case of swine which were designated for destruction, there was payable a maximum of $50 for purebred animals and $30 for grade animals, and in the case of sheep, $50 for purebred animals and $20 for grade animals. The import of the amendment would be to strike out the clause of the bill which makes that limitation, and then there would be no ceiling payable under the original paragraphs (c) and (d) of the section of the act.

Of course it is rather difficult at this stage to make any definite recommendation because I am not sure as to what market value actually means, and there seems to be some confusion in the mind of the parliamentary assistant. I want to say to the house that I think that market value should mean the sale value. If we are taking into consideration the removal of the ceiling on payments to purebred sheep breeders and hog breeders, then of course the market value, if it is to be fair, must be the sale value which those animals so destroyed would bring on the market in a purebred sale.

In that connection I want to make a case for all our purebred livestock breeders because, from the standpoint of the producer of livestock and that of the people who consume our livestock products, it is quite essential that they get the best possible type of product. By so doing, the breeder, of course, gets a greater return on his produce and the consumer gets a better quality of meat. I think it is in the interests of the economy and in the interests of the country that this government should promote an increase in the production of purebred cattle because in that way we produce a better quality of livestock all along the line.

I should like to bring to the attention of the house the fact that there has been a tremendous increase in registrations in certain lines of livestock while in other cases we have had a marked decrease in the registration of various types of livestock produced in Canada. I find that according to the Canadian national livestock records registration of swine pedigrees totalled 17,686 in 1945 while in 1953 the figure was 15,019, or a decrease of 2,667 registrations in swine alone. If we turn to the registration of pedigrees of sheep we find that in 1945 there were 16,141 and in 1953 there were 13,550, or a decrease of 2,591. In view of the figures I have just given I think there should be encouragement all along the line. If the words "market value" in the bill as drafted mean the sale value of registered sheep and swine, then I think it will be a very fine thing.

I should like to bring to the attention of the house the rather outstanding increase of pedigree registrations in some of the cattle breeds, and I want to refer to Hereford cattle. There has been an increase of about 126 per cent from 1945 to 1953. In 1945 there were only 14,818 pedigree registrations and in 1953 there was a total of 33,537, or an increase of 18,719. In my opinion the producers of purebred livestock, whether they be sheep, swine or cattle producers, should be protected. It is only on unusual occasions that it is necessary for the government to step in and compensate producers under this legislation, and our Canadian people and the livestock industry should be protected.

I want to urge very strongly that the government should accept the principle I am trying to put forward here, namely, that when the government decides under this legislation that livestock must be destroyed in the public interest and in the interest of the livestock industry compensation should be paid on the sale value prior to the animals being condemned. While I am not able to move an amendment under the rules of the house, I want to suggest to the parliamentary assistant and the minister that in order to make the legislation fair for all livestock producers there should be an amendment to the bill. A period should be placed in the twelfth line of clause 1 after the word "act", and all the words thereafter from line 13 to line 22 should be deleted. There would also be quotation marks after the word "act". The implications of such an amendment would be that all producers of livestock who had animals condemned under the legislation would be eligible for compensation on the market or sale value at the time the animals were ordered to be destroyed.

I think that is pretty well all I want to say, but may I emphasize my point that breeders of purebred livestock have every reason to expect justice and equality from the government in the administration of the act. I suggest first that the inclusion of the words "or sale", so that it would read "market or sale value", would clarify the meaning, and then I have also suggested the deletion of all the words I have indicated. I think I should read the new subsection to the house as it would then be.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have allowed the hon. member to indicate the amendment that he contemplates moving in committee, but since he must not refer to the sections when discussing the principle of the bill I would ask him to wait until the house resolves itself into committee at which time he can move his amendment and read the section if he wishes, but not now.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall have a number of questions to ask when we are in committee, but I think that is all I have to say at this time.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, to some extent I am at a loss to add anything to what I had to say at the resolution stage. At that time we did not have the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) here. We did have his parliamentary assistant but we were not able to get from him the definition of "market value" that we wanted. On that occasion the discussion seemed to run along exactly the same lines that it is running tonight. At that time I made a plea, as did the other hon. members who have preceded me, to have compensation for purebred animals paid on the basis of their actual market value, and when I say "actual market value" I do not mean the value that would be paid for them at the slaughterhouse.

Purebred animals have cost the farmers of this country a lot of money. The federal and provincial departments of agriculture have been advocating the improvement of livestock, but you cannot have that without breeding and importing purebred livestock. For that reason I believe that those who have gone to a lot of trouble and expense in building up their herds should not have to pay the penalty of selling their good purebred livestock at the same price at which scrub livestock are sold at the slaughterhouse. Until we can get some further explanation from the parliamentary assistant or the minister—they are both quite qualified to give it—I do not think I have very much more to say. In the interests of maintaining and further improving the quality of our livestock I think this legislation should go further than it does. I believe that a proper definition of "market value" would do away with some of the handicaps under which we are working at the present time. I hope the minister will give us a satisfactory explanation before the bill receives second reading.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I think this bill should be sent to the standing committee on agriculture for discussion. In my opinion there is discrimination in it against cattle breeders. If you are going to give compensation to one you should give it to all. I would suggest and move that the bill be sent to the standing committee on agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: I presume that the hon. member is merely making a suggestion and not moving that the bill be now referred to the committee because a bill cannot be committed until it has received second reading.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Amount of compensation.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I wonder if the minister would now define for the committee what is meant by "market value"?

Mr. McCubbin: Market value is the sale value at the time the animal is destroyed. If a hog were worth so much at that time, that is the value that will be paid for it.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant if he would be prepared to take the suggestion that the words "market value or sale value" be included in the bill?

Mr. McCubbin: I do not see that there is any need to put in market or sale value. It is the market value at the time of slaughter. It is well understood by the committee, I believe, and I think it will certainly be understood when the payments are made for the hogs or sheep.

Mr. Charlton: Would market or replacement value be acceptable? The replacement value of an animal might be more than the sale value. It is going to be difficult enough for an inspector to arrive at a price just on the market value, but perhaps if it were defined in a slightly more practical way by saying market or replacement value it might be a little more definite. The other night the parliamentary assistant thought it was the slaughter market value only. In the bill it is definitely the market value, and I think the definition is correct when the parliamentary assistant says it is the sale value or value of the animal before slaughter. At any rate, it is not the slaughter value.

Mr. McCubbin: There is no difference of opinion between the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand and me. A hog that goes to market has a slaughter value. If it were a little pig, then a little pig has no slaughter value of any kind. However, it has a value to the farmer, and it is that value that is placed upon it. The same is true of a sow. There might be a sale in the district and sows would be selling in the neighbourhood of $100 or, as the hon. member says, $190. That is the value that would be placed on a sow of the same calibre.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I think the minister could save a lot of arguing as to what market value means if he could just accept my suggestion. One hon. member has just spoken in favour of replacement value, but replacement value could mean a lot of things and start a lot of argument. I think that if you had market or sale value in the bill a man would know what he had paid for a purebred bull or any other animal, and on that basis there could be a fair and just settlement.

As the bill stands, it is up to the minister or someone appointed by him to make a decision as to what the market value is. I, for one, would feel more at ease and think we had a better basis for giving satisfactory compensation to the producer if we had market or sale value rather than just market value in the bill.

Mr. Fair: Are we to understand that there will be no extra compensation paid on purebred sheep or swine, but that they will be paid for on the basis of slaughter or sale value? Would that be correct?

Mr. McCubbin: No; it would depend on what the market value would be for comparable purebred sows or boars at that time.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): The Animal Contagious Diseases Act relates also to infectious diseases. There is a definition in the act which includes certain infectious diseases. In the west today we have deer, and because they are cloven-footed animals they may be carriers of diseases which could be transmitted to our domesticated animals. I was wondering if this amendment covered other infectious diseases than those outlined in the act.

Mr. McCubbin: Just those diseases that are outlined in the act. Perhaps new diseases will occur, but there are diseases to which our animals are subject. I think the hon. member realizes full well what they are.

Mr. Harkness: I am by no means clear as to just what this market value is going to be, as a result of the statement made by the parliamentary assistant. We will take the case of a man who has just bought a purebred Hereford bull for $5,000. We will say that a month afterwards it takes infectious haematitis and is condemned to be killed. As I read this, the farmer would receive the market value of the carcass plus $100. Is that correct? If it is not correct, would he receive the $5,000?

Mr. McCubbin: We may be talking at cross purposes in respect to this provision. So far as t.b. is concerned, the farmer would receive $100 plus the slaughter value of the animal at that time.

Mr. Harkness: That was not the question I asked you. I said that if this particular bull were to take infectious haematitis, as I read this act the farmer would only receive $100 plus the slaughter value, or the value of the carcass, or what the value of the carcass would be if it could be sold. Is that correct or is it not? If it is not correct, what would the farmer receive?

Mr. McCubbin: It is rather difficult to say what he would receive. The matter is left to the discretion of the minister or anyone he may appoint to value the animal at the time.

Mr. Harkness: Under what act is it left to the discretion of the minister? This bill says the compensation which shall be paid for an animal slaughtered shall be the market value of the animal in the opinion of the minister or some person appointed by him. That is the value it would have immediately before slaughtering. Then it goes on to say, except that the compensation shall not exceed, in the case of cattle, $100 for purebred animals. If the sale of the carcass is unlawful there will be an additional amount for purebred and grade animals equal to the value the carcass would have if the sale were lawful. It seems to me that is definite. In the case of the $5,000 bull which I mentioned that has been condemned for any of these diseases, and I took infectious haematitis as an example, under this act the amount that could be paid is the value of the carcass plus $100. If the farmer could get any more, under what authority is he paid it?

Mr. McCubbin: Under the act as it reads, the amount that he could be paid is left to the discretion of the minister or anyone appointed by him. If there were some outbreak that was going to be dangerous or harmful to the industry, special legislation might be put through to take care of it.

Mr. Harkness: I think the question is being evaded. I have asked a very definite question. Under what authority would the owner of this particular bull we are taking as an example be paid more than the value of the carcass plus $100? The parliamentary assistant says that that would depend upon a lot of circumstances. It also must depend upon some parliamentary authority. So far as I have understood our parliamentary system, money cannot be paid out unless authority is given by parliament for doing so. Certainly, as I read the act, there is no authority for paying out more than the value of the carcass, plus $100. If there is authority to pay out more than that, where is it? That is my question.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary assistant has been giving the proper answers to the questions that have been asked. The discussions which took place in connection with the act itself were not heard by him, and, in view of the fact that I did hear those discussions, perhaps I should say something about it.

I have voiced opinions that have been expressed here with regard to some of these matters, when the question of drafting the act was up. And what I am told is—and this is on the authority of our best legal advisers—that "market", as used in this particular legislation, is not confined to the markets in a stockyard or a packing house. The word is not used in that sense at all, nor would it be interpreted in that sense. It is the market on which these animals are usually sold.

The hon. member for Moose Mountain as well as the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose defined it as clearly as it could be defined, when they said what they thought ought to be in the bill. They defined it very clearly. And that is what the word "market" in this bill actually does mean.

Let me state a case as an illustration. Where registered stock is slaughtered payment should be made on the basis of the last sale of registered hogs and sheep that have been sold in that district. Those are the market prices of that particular kind of animal. That type of animal is not put on the market to be slaughtered; it is put on the market for breeding purposes. And those amounts would be paid under this bill, so far as hogs and sheep are concerned. Payments would be made under this bill on that basis.

Then my hon. friends say: what about cattle? Well, we have a record, in connection with cattle, of the diseases they are likely to take. Hog cholera is pretty prevalent on this continent, and has been coming into Canada periodically over a long number of years. We have set up a method of dealing with hog cholera which has been very much less helpful to the producer of livestock than what is provided in this bill, so far as hogs and sheep are concerned.

But when it came to the matter of having to deal with foot-and-mouth disease, which came to Saskatchewan in 1952, and which we had never before had in Canada, we immediately established a policy, so far as the government was concerned, of taking hold of that situation through special legislation, and making it possible to make payments in connection with cattle, and hogs as well, that could not be made under this bill. We made much more liberal payments than could be made under this bill; and the policy of the government in connection with that kind of thing is to deal with such situations under special legislation that would be brought down to meet the circumstances—we not knowing at the present time what those circumstances might be.

Coming back to cattle, as dealt with in this bill, the disease that is in the mind of those who have been drafting the bill is the one upon which by far the greater number of payments have been made, in connection with the slaughtering of animals—and not only the greater number of payments, but greater amounts in payments to farmers which might be claimed by them.

In view of the experience we have had, we think that we should go on dealing with t.b. and similar diseases on the same basis as we always have, with this exception, that two years ago, I believe it was, we amended the legislation in order to make it possible to have higher payments than those for which provision had been made, in cases where the animal's carcass is entirely destroyed.

Up to that time we just paid on a carcass the amounts mentioned in the bill, whether the carcass was entirely destroyed, or taken to market and a fairly high price received for it. For example, dealing with a case such as has just been referred to, at a time when prices of animals were very much lower, one could buy a registered bull for possibly $125 or $150. I bought one for that myself. I had to have him slaughtered because he reacted for t.b. I took him to market and got $105 for him. In addition to that I could have collected the allowance. Because I was a minister in the government I did not think I should, and so I did not collect that amount. But anyone could have collected it; I could have collected it—the additional amount provided for here. That is another $100 on top of the $105, which would have been a reasonable return for that animal. Perhaps under the circumstances that then prevailed, it was a little more than reasonable.

So I suggest that we are proposing here to go ahead on the same basis in connection with diseases of that kind. But in this case, where cholera comes along quite regularly into this country, and does take livestock from our farms, we should be in a position to make higher payments on those hogs and sheep than we have been able to do in the past.

Mr. Harkness: I must say I am glad to hear the minister in such good voice. I agree with a considerable amount of what he said. But he still has not answered the question I asked at the beginning. Perhaps I might now put it a little differently.

As I understand this legislation—if I may take an example which I believe is comparable to the one he mentioned—a man goes out and buys an extremely good Yorkshire boar and pays $1,000 for it. This boar develops hog cholera a month later. As I understand the bill it will be possible to pay that man $1,000 for that boar? Is that correct? And if the market value as mentioned in the first part of clause 1 is taken, he would be paid that $1,000.

But, to take the example I took previously, of the man who has paid $5,000 for a Hereford bull, and it dies a month later from any of these diseases: the most he can collect, as I read the bill, is still the market value of the carcass—which, we will say, is $150—plus $100, making $250 altogether. That is all he can collect, although he has had a more valuable animal than the boar.

It does not seem to me that that is reasonable. The minister says, "We will meet any of these special circumstances by legislation." As a matter of fact something along these lines can develop when parliament is not in session, when special legislation cannot be passed. What reason is there for not placing those animals on all fours, so far as payments are concerned, cattle, swine, sheep and horses.

I would say at this point that I think the owners most discriminated against are the owners of purebred horses; because, so far as purebred horses are concerned, the maximum that can be paid is $200 for a purebred animal. A purebred horse of any sort of breed at the present time is worth considerably more than that. They are probably discriminated against to a greater extent than the owners of any other sort of animal.

To keep on the subject of cattle, the minister has not yet answered the question with respect to the suggestion put forward by the parliamentary assistant that the owner of this $5,000 bull could be compensated more than the value of the carcass, plus $100 except by special legislation. Is that not the situation? Perhaps I can get an answer to the two or three questions I have asked.

Mr. Gardiner: In view of the fact that the hon. member addressed his questions to me in the beginning, and as a result of what I have just said, I would point out that when a breeder buys an animal at a very high price he is not always paying for the animal. There are times when he is paying for good advertising. I have been at sales where animals were being sold and when the price that was paid for the animal was very much higher than would have been paid by the man who bought it had he just been thinking about the animal himself. I would not like to say on the floor of the house that if a case of this kind came up before me as minister I would declare that no matter what the gentleman paid for the animal that he had we would be committed under this bill to pay him that much for it. We would pay him of course what he probably would have been prepared to sell the animal for himself after he had used him for a short time. Many things have to be taken into consideration besides just the fact that he paid that much for the animal, and all those things would be taken into consideration.

Mr. Harkness: That is entirely on the question of market value, which the parliamentary assistant said a little while ago was absolutely clear and understood by everybody. As I understand the minister's remarks, the market value is anything but clear. The market value essentially comes down to what the minister, or the person whom he appoints for the purpose, thinks is the value of that animal. In other words, it puts the thing on an entirely arbitrary basis. If it happened to be one of my boars which had been condemned and was killed I would think perhaps the minister might not think it was nearly as valuable as if it were a boar belonging to his parliamentary assistant, for example. I would think that is a highly probable thing and I doubt very much whether it is a reasonable basis on which to leave the matter. If we are going to say "market value", then the term should be defined; otherwise it should be on the basis in any event of the most recent sale of that animal or a similar animal. If that is not done, I would say it is entirely an arbitrary matter in the opinion of the minister.

Mr. Gardiner: May I say that it is the general practice of people who are in the class just referred to by the hon. member who buy $5,000 bulls to insure the bull for the full amount long before they take him home, and there is not so much risk in connection with that. All the facts in connection with it would have to be considered when we are determining how much money we are going to take out of the treasury of Canada, paid in by the taxpayers, and pay to the individual on account of what happened.

Mr. Hodgson: There should be some uniformity with respect to the price of these purebred animals. Although there are not many bulls bought at $5,000, or worth $5,000, I remember 18 years ago the minister of agriculture in Ontario, Duncan Marshall, went to Europe and bought a bull for $14,000. If that bull was worth $14,000 18 years ago, with the depreciated dollar it would be worth somewhere around $30,000 today. Some figure should be set or the sky would be the limit.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): We have come all the way from the high-priced $5,000 bull suggested by the hon. member down to the kind that the Minister of Agriculture purchases, apparently, for $150. We are debating a bill here which deals with four types of livestock, namely, horses, cattle, sheep and swine. I say that there is no equity in the suggestion put forward. All these producers should be compensated on a fair and equitable basis.

The explanatory note says:

> The purpose of the amendment is to remove the limits on the compensation payable in respect of swine and sheep, and to provide for payment of compensation on the basis of market value.

We have had two explanations of what constitutes market value. As far as I am concerned, neither the explanation of the parliamentary assistant nor that of the minister is satisfactory. They must be confused in their own minds because they have given conflicting answers to our questions as to what does constitute market value. The minister points out that when a person goes out to purchase an animal he may be paying for a lot of publicity rather than for line breeding or for the quality of the purebred animal. That statement is hardly justified, because when livestock producers go out to buy such an animal to head their herd they are going to purchase the type of animal that they want in their line breeding, and they will pay a big figure for it. Therefore on that basis, as I said earlier in the resolution stage of the bill, it is in the interests of the Canadian people, the consumer and the producer of livestock, that compensation be paid on the sale value, which would be just and equitable.

I would suggest an amendment to the bill, and I would ask the minister and the parliamentary assistant to consider it on the basis of justice. To make this more equitable to all livestock producers, I would suggest that after the word "act" there should be a period, and all the words from line 12 to line 21 should be deleted. The bill would then read:

> The compensation ordered to be paid under this section for an animal slaughtered under the provisions of this act shall be the market value that the animal, in the opinion of the minister or some person appointed by him, would have had immediately before slaughter if it had not been subject to slaughter under the provisions of this act.

I want to make reference to the statement which the minister just made. He said that in the case of hog cholera the department now has the right to compensate producers, who unfortunately have to slaughter their swine under this act. If the bill is left as proposed, the swine producer and the sheep producer might be compensated fairly and equitably for the slaughter of their animals. But if you leave out the cattle producers and put them under special legislation, as I see it, you are going to have this situation. If you do not have an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, as we had a while ago, you will have isolated cases where cattle will have to be slaughtered and special legislation will not be set up and each producer of livestock will have to stand his loss or take what is now provided, a small additional amount for the purebred animal.

I suggest that the minister give further consideration to the suggestion I have made. Can the minister or his parliamentary assistant state how much has been paid under this act since 1945?

Mr. McCubbin: I have not the figures going back that far, but from April 1, 1953, to February 5, 1954, a total of 3,075 hogs were slaughtered.

Mr. Cardiff: After listening to the arguments pro and con, I still think that this bill should have been sent to the agriculture committee. A year or so ago I asked why the agriculture committee of this house did not meet more often and I was told it was because nothing was sent to it. This is an important piece of legislation that should have been sent to that committee where it could have been threshed out better than in the committee of the whole, because many members are not here tonight. Even yet I think the minister should send it to the agriculture committee.

Mr. Charlton: The parliamentary assistant specifically mentioned t.b. In my previous remarks I stated that I did not see why special consideration should be given in the case of foot-and-mouth disease as compared with hog cholera, or foot-and-mouth disease as compared with t.b. The parliamentary assistant seems to have the idea that just because it is t.b. the farmers should get less. I would point out to the minister that when the increase was brought about it was actually a decrease. Previous to that time the compensation paid for purebred cattle was $150 instead of $100. You lowered the compensation from $150 to $100 and you paid the carcass value. Actually there was not much of a difference there; there was no appreciable difference in the amount paid when the carcass value was added even although it went to the tank.

This question of market value is not at all clear. As the hon. member for Calgary North has pointed out, the parliamentary assistant and the minister have each given a different interpretation of market value. If it is to be left entirely with the minister or his inspector, as I pointed out in my previous remarks, the inspector will be placed in an unenviable position when there is no restriction as to the amount to be paid.

I come back to the old story: if it is fair for one it is fair for the other. Whether it be hog cholera, whether it be t.b., whether it be foot-and-mouth disease, when cattle or sheep or swine have to be slaughtered there should be no difference. Hog cholera is just as serious to the swine breeder as foot-and-mouth disease was to the cattle or swine breeders of Saskatchewan. Just because we are one of the few countries in the world which slaughter for hog cholera is no reason to blame it on the farmers of this country.

A week ago Tuesday night, the parliamentary assistant stated that we were the only country. He told us that the United States did not pay anything. Of course the United States do not pay anything because they do not slaughter. They live with the disease. They have hog cholera there all the time. But this government demands the slaughter of any hog affected with cholera and it should be willing to pay. It is for the good of the country that the hogs are being slaughtered.

The same is true in the case of t.b. in cattle. The cattle are slaughtered for the good of the health of the country. If you are going to pay the market value for sheep and swine it would be just as fair to pay the cattle breeders and the horse breeders the market value for their animals. Could the parliamentary assistant or the minister give any other definition of market value in order to make it more clear?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, our discussion so far has been very unsatisfactory. The explanation given by the minister and his parliamentary assistant is no answer to my suggestion that the bill should be amended. Can the minister state whether any farm organization made representations to the government suggesting that cattle should be put on the same basis as sheep and swine?

Mr. McCubbin: I do not want to go into a long discussion of the slaughter of cattle for t.b., as I do not think it is necessary. It is a long story, but it is worth telling. The eradication of t.b. has certainly helped the livestock industry of this country because we are now able to ship cattle all over the world. After the amendment was brought in in respect to t.b. in cattle we paid $40 for grade animals and $100 for purebred animals, plus the carcass value. I discussed the matter with farm organizations and we came to an agreement on this.

Before this bill was brought in, discussions took place with respect to it and they were satisfied with the amount that is provided. As the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand has said, we are one of the few countries—if not the only country—that pay for hogs that go down for hog cholera. Where hog cholera is discovered in a herd all the swine are destroyed. However, in the case of t.b., there may be only one or two cattle in a herd of 50 that have to go down.

The amount we pay is the amount that was asked by the farm organizations. We are one of the countries that are to the fore in this connection. I would like to go further and tell the committee that the United States has now stopped paying for t.b. reactors. They also do not pay for hogs affected with hog cholera. They live with the disease. But we in Canada are paying the amounts mentioned and I feel that all in all this government and the department are being fair to the livestock industry of Canada.

Mr. Charlton: What farm organizations were approached with regard to this matter?

Mr. McCubbin: An organization that my hon. friend knows quite well, the federation of agriculture.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Will the provisions of this bill be made retroactive?

Mr. McCubbin: Until May 1, 1953.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Operation.

Mr. Charlton: This is the clause containing the retroactive provision. I think the parliamentary assistant made some mention of the fact that as the statutes are being revised as of September, 1953, that date is mentioned here. Is that true? Would he explain that again?

Mr. McCubbin: The act was to have come into force on September 15, 1953, but owing to an outbreak of hog cholera in the province of Ontario prior to that date we moved it back to May 1 so that it would take in those people who had their hogs destroyed by hog cholera in that period from May 1 to September 15 of 1953.

Mr. Charlton: A week ago Tuesday night when the resolution was up for consideration I asked the parliamentary assistant another question. It was with regard to animals, in the case that the animals died prior to the official diagnosis of the disease. Are those animals going to be paid for?

Mr. McCubbin: That question was asked of me the other night and my answer was no. But if the hon. member has a case that he feels we should investigate, we shall be glad to investigate it.

Mr. Lennard: There is nothing definite about that.

Mr. Charlton: That is very indefinite. In the case of foot-and-mouth disease, for instance, the animal does not die and in the case of tuberculosis, the animal does not die, but in the case of hog cholera the pig is dead before the veterinary gets there to tell the farmer what it is. Just because the pig dies is no reason for the farmer not to get compensation if it is proven that the pig had hog cholera. I think it is only fair that he should get it.

Mr. McCubbin: I can only repeat what I said before. If there is some definite case to which the hon. member can refer, we will certainly investigate that case.

Mr. Lennard: What will you do about it after you investigate it?

Mr. Charlton: Has the minister or the parliamentary assistant any idea how many animals there were which came under this act, as far as hog cholera is concerned, in Ontario last year and how many sheep have been slaughtered in the past year or so under this act?

Mr. McCubbin: According to the record I have, Mr. Chairman, no sheep have been slaughtered under this act but—to repeat the figure I gave a little while ago—there have been 3,075 hogs slaughtered up to February 5 of this year.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, if it met with the unanimous wish of the house, I might move the adjournment until tomorrow. Tomorrow we shall take third reading of those bills that are now ready, followed by the Salaries Act and then by the Criminal Code.

On motion of Mr. Harris the house adjourned at 9.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 19, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACINNIS—REFERENCE TO REPORTED REMARKS BY MEMBER FOR BROADVIEW

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege based on a news item in yesterday's Ottawa Journal. The article is headed, "Hees Charges Deal to Kill Private Bill". Then follows the report of an address that the hon. member for Broadview made at London, Ontario. I should like to read the report and make my point of privilege. It reads in part as follows:

Last Wednesday in the House of Commons a private member's bill for setting up such a research committee was due to come up for debate. A day or so before a senior member of the government made a deal with the C.C.F. to debate the bill preceding the research bill to such length that the research bill could not be brought forward. Because that was the last day for private bills, the research bill was killed for this session and cannot be brought forward again until next year.

I rise on a question of privilege now because, although my name was not mentioned by the hon. member for Broadview, the private member's motion which was debated at that time stood in my name. Eleven members spoke on the motion of whom only three were members of the C.C.F. party. Their speeches occupy about six and a half pages of Hansard, not more than the space taken by one 40-minute speech, a rather poor effort for a party that had made a deal to talk out a motion.

May I say further that after the opening of the house on that day but before the debate began I spoke to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and told him that as far as I could ascertain there was no opposition to my motion and that if the house were agreeable I would be glad to withdraw it after there had been an expression of opinion by the several parties. I wish to say most emphatically that I did not enter into any deal to talk out the motion either with a senior or junior member of the government.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I learned from sources usually unassailable that such an agreement had been made. If I am wrong, I withdraw the remarks and apologize for having made an incorrect statement.

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE PUBLISHED IN "LE DEVOIR"

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. A friend of mine has brought to my attention an article published yesterday in a Montreal newspaper Le Devoir. The article is entitled:

Mr. Pouliot echoes the voice of his master Mr. Duplessis in attacking trade unionism.

In reply to that article written in bad faith, I wish to say that I have only one master, who is neither in Ottawa nor in Quebec, that it is the electorate of the constituency of Temiscouata; my chief is the leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent), who is at present replaced by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe), but I am perfectly entitled to have friends to whom I am faithful. I have never struck them in the back.

As far as Mr. Duplessis is concerned, he is one of my friends, we are of the same age, we were admitted together to the bar, and I am not ashamed of this friendship, no more than I am ashamed of having friends among all political parties.

As to my so-called attack, I did not attack trade unionism, I condemned the labour leaders; but there certainly was bad faith on the part of the parliamentary correspondent, because, the previous day, I had made in this house a double correction, and he had no excuse for not knowing it.

The article ends thus:

In Quebec parliamentary circles, they know very well what to think about it. They know that Mr. Jean-François Pouliot is Premier Duplessis' spokesman in the House of Commons . . .

Which is absolutely false, because I am here only as spokesman for my electors, who have honoured me with their faithful support during 30 years.

. . . when he wants things said that neither Conservative nor independent members from the province would want to say.

That is another ignominious lie.

It is a well known fact that he was instrumental in bringing about the victory of the Union Nationale candidates in Riviere du Loup and Temiscouata at the last provincial election . . .

That is absolutely false since I took no part in that election.

. . . and that, should the need have arisen, he could have counted on the support of the Union Nationale to ensure his own re-election.

Intelligent people, Liberals as well as supporters of the Union Nationale, did me the honour of voting for me.

In all fairness to Mr. Pouliot, it must be added that in the circumstances he did not have to go against his feelings in echoing Mr. Duplessis' opinions, which he shares altogether.

The answer to that is that I am surprised that the press gallery still retains a correspondent who is a dishonest mercenary, a man who, to his own misfortune, has learned to read and write. Otherwise he would have known the joy of living . . .

Mr. Speaker: I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member. He is of course entitled to correct the way in which his remarks may have been interpreted and such comments as may have been made on the subject. He must not, however, go beyond the necessary correction. Right now I feel that he is launching upon a personal attack on someone who happens to be a full member of the press gallery who is not here to defend himself. I believe that the hon. member must limit his remarks to making the necessary correction.

Mr. Pouliot: I will paint his picture Monday, Mr. Speaker.

MR. NICKLE—EXPLANATION OF REMARKS MADE IN DEBATE ON FEBRUARY 18

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): I rise on a question of privilege, to make an explanation in order that a capable and respected member of the press gallery, Mr. James R. Nelson, may not be unfairly criticized because of my references in this house yesterday to an article written by him and appearing in the Calgary Albertan of Wednesday, February 17. I have now learned that this article, built around an interview with the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault), was written by Mr. Nelson last January 27, and was transmitted to various newspapers, including the Calgary Albertan, by teletype on that date. I have no firsthand information, of course, as to why the Calgary paper deferred publication until February 17, by which date the opinions and perhaps the personal hopes expressed to Mr. Nelson by the hon. member for Bonaventure, and accurately set out in Mr. Nelson's article, had been completely outdated by new developments in this house. I submit, sir, that no blame can be attached to the author of the article because of this.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

INQUIRY AS TO PROHIBITION OF THE SALE OF INFANTS OR CHILDREN

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) asked me a question to which I replied as follows:

Replying to the hon. member's question I would say that the present Bill No. 7, which is now before the house, does not specifically make it a crime to sell infants or children.

Later the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) made what I thought was a very good suggestion, that perhaps this rather bald reply should be amplified for the purpose of being read outside of Canada. I would, therefore, like to amplify it.

Under Bill No. 7, an act respecting the criminal law, which is now under consideration by this house, all common law offences will be abolished. Under Canada's present Criminal Code, however, Canadian crown prosecutors may lay charges for offences which are defined by the code and may also prosecute offences under the common law and statute law of Great Britain, which laws were in effect in the British North American colonies at the time of confederation and were continued in effect in the new Dominion of Canada by the British North America Act.

Since the sale of babies is not defined as a crime in the present Canadian Criminal Code, naturally the answer to the question as to whether that sale is an offence under the present Canadian law may be sought in an examination of the British common and statute law still in effect in Canada. There might be, although I am not suggesting there is, an old anti-slavery statute which prohibited the sale of human beings into slavery and which prohibited the sale and traffic in human slaves. The hon. member for Ottawa East, with whom I have spoken since, tells me that this is not the crime he had in mind yesterday when he asked me this question. He is concerned not with the sale of human beings into slavery but the traffic in unlawful adoption of babies born in Canada and the taking unlawfully of such babies to other countries for adoption there.

This being so, there is not any purpose in our legal staff making any minute examination, and it would have to be minute, of the common law of England for the purpose of seeking an answer to my hon. friend's question. As is well known, there has never been the slightest trace of human slavery practised in Canada at any time since long before confederation. Hon. members need not be reminded of that, but it may be, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested, that people from other countries do need to be reminded of it. In any case, the law relating to the lawful or unlawful adoption of babies which contains, or should contain, the answer to my hon. friend's question, is available in modern Canadian statutes. The laws relating to the means whereby the natural parents of children may lawfully relinquish their parental rights and responsibilities in favour of new parents by adoption are set out in the adoption statutes passed by, and clearly within the powers of, the various provincial legislatures of Canada. Indeed, no subject matter of legislation enactment is more peculiarly within provincial jurisdiction than the relationship between parents and children.

Where steps taken by the natural parents or others for the relinquishment by the natural parents of their parental rights and responsibilities in favour of new parents by adoption are contrary to the relevant provincial adoption statutes, these steps may constitute an offence under these provincial statutes and may make the purported adoption itself invalid. It would seem that the law relating to adoption should remain within provincial jurisdiction and should not be overridden in any way by federal legislation defining, as a crime, actions now unlawful under, or offences created by, provincial adoption statutes, unless it can be shown that abuses under the provincial laws have arisen which cannot be cured by amendments to the relevant provincial statutes, and these abuses are so great as to warrant the passage by the federal parliament of a criminal law dealing with this subject.

The most careful consideration, therefore, would have to be given to any proposal that the federal parliament should interfere with the operations of the provincial adoption statutes by defining as a crime those things which they prohibit or should prohibit. The criminal law, I suggest, is rather a blunt and harsh instrument with which to deal with the relationship between parents and children, which is now regulated by provincial statutes drafted in each province to meet what are considered by the legislatures of each province to be the needs of each province.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that some time before this matter was raised in the house yesterday by the hon. member for Ottawa East we in the Department of Justice had been keeping the proceedings in Montreal under observation. Of course, while they are under consideration by the courts, it is improper for us to discuss them here except in the most general terms in which I am referring to them today. We can continue our discussion of the matter, I think, to much greater advantage after these court proceedings are completed, when it will not only be proper to discuss them but when we shall have all the facts and be able to clearly see the legislative problems for the provincial legislatures or for this parliament which those facts present.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): The Minister of Justice has gone to some length, Mr. Speaker, to explain why the impression that was conveyed yesterday is not consistent with the one he seeks to leave with us today. I am, however, under the impression that many members will still wonder what his opinion is today. The situation that was obviously behind the question that was asked is a simple one. Is it or is it not to be made a criminal offence to traffic in children or other human beings? That is the question, and the answer, in effect, still is that it is not the intention of the government to introduce into the Criminal Code any provision that would make this an offence.

Mr. Garson: Quite apart from the question of whether or not the hon. member is in order in making his present contribution to the debate, might I ask him to recall a statement which I made less than two minutes ago to the effect, not that we would refuse to consider the legislation which he says we are refusing to consider, but that we should delay consideration of it until we have before us those facts upon which we could base an intelligent consideration of it.

Mr. Speaker: I am rising at this moment to say that the question which was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Ottawa East, had it not been so short and had the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) not replied so quickly and had I thought more rapidly, would have been ruled out of order. It is not in order in this house to ask the Minister of Justice for legal opinions. Before the orders of the day are called we may ask questions for information on facts or policy. It looks as if the question now put by the hon. member for Ottawa East has caused the Minister of Justice, at the request of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, to make a statement on the order for motions.

The statement has been made, and I do not think we ought to introduce a debate upon the matter or go beyond the statement. Hon. members must keep in mind that this afternoon we will be studying in committee sections of the Criminal Code. I would imagine that if any amendments are to be introduced, and suggestions as to what should be included, that would be the proper time—but not now.

Mr. Drew: With deference, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the Minister of Justice was as well aware as anyone in the house that the Criminal Code will be before the house. He has chosen this occasion to make a speech, and—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps if I might interrupt, the statement made by the Minister of Justice under the order for motions does not preclude discussion of the matter in committee of the whole, when the appropriate section is reached.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I trust that you will—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: And may I also express the hope that you will indicate that there is only one Speaker in the house, because, with all deference, I propose to permit neither the Minister of Finance nor the Minister of Justice to assume the responsibilities of the role of Speaker.

Mr. Abbott: Or the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Drew: And, Mr. Speaker, I would submit for your consideration the fact that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly comfortable standing here,—

Mr. Abbott: You look wonderful, too.

Mr. Drew:—until you can hear what I have to say.

Mr. Claxton: Why shouldn't you?

An hon. Member: You are losing ground.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the Minister of Justice, following a practice that has been long established, has made a statement. There has been an understanding that where a statement has been made, it is appropriate to make comments upon that statement, not for the purpose of entering into any debate, but for the purpose of presenting at least a balanced position in regard to the statement which has been made.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: And it was not in any way with the intention of entering into a debate, but rather of making certain brief observations which I believe should be made, and which I believe would be helpful in proceeding to consider the matter when it comes up. On those grounds I would ask your consent simply to make the observations that I had proposed to make.

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Speaker: I took it that once the minister had spoken, the Leader of the Opposition had stood up and made his comment—

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. Speaker:—when he said, "I take it that it is not the intention of the government to bring about the necessary legislation to prevent what has happened, in the matter of children." Perhaps he was not asking a question; perhaps it was just a form of speech, but when he resumed his seat at that time I thought he was through with his comments.

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. Speaker: Then, if that is not so, I will listen to him.

Mr. Drew: Just so that the record may be clear, I was extending a courtesy to the Minister of Justice who had risen and asked to make a statement. It was for that reason; I had not even terminated the sentence I was speaking at the time. I had indicated that since this was the view I would point out that we are not dealing in this instance with a particular case in Montreal, so that there is no problem which arises as to the subject being sub judice. There is the simple problem before us as to whether there shall or shall not be provisions in the Criminal Code dealing with trafficking in children or in human beings.

Mr. Abbott: On a point of order, may I be informed, Mr. Speaker, under what article in Beauchesne we are proceeding with the present debate.

Mr. Fleming: The practice was set.

Mr. Claxton: No practice at all.

Mr. Drew: It is obvious that the interruptions did not permit me to conclude the sentence I had begun to make.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister of Finance has raised a point of order. There is no section in Beauchesne to the effect that a debate at this moment is permitted. But it has been the practice—

Mr. Claxton: Of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: —not for many years, but it is one that was initiated two or three years ago, by a ruling whereby, when a minister makes a statement, the leaders of the three opposition parties might be permitted to comment upon that statement.

As I explained the other day, when objection was taken to that procedure, I said that perhaps we might have to revise that ruling which was then made.

If hon. members do not go beyond what was contemplated at that time, and what was in the mind of Mr. Speaker Macdonald, that is to give an opportunity to make a few observations upon a statement being made by a minister, I think we might perhaps keep the present system. But if abuses take place, then it would not be proper for hon. members to follow this practice any longer.

I think that answers the point raised by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to keep the record clear as to what is under consideration. There is no provision in Beauchesne in regard to the system being introduced by the ministers. We have indicated our desire that a measure of flexibility be retained. We have indicated our hope that ministers will have the opportunity to make statements, and we have pointed out that we are ready to accord that consent just so long as there is an opportunity to make observations in reply to them.

Our only alternative, if that were to be denied to us, would be to refuse consent to any of the ministers to make statements; and that would not be desirable. This is simply a question of bringing about greater flexibility in our proceedings in the house. And I had only expressed the hope that the Minister of Justice would reconsider the position he has taken, and remember that if extradition proceedings are to be taken there should be a provision in the Criminal Code dealing with trafficking in children or in human beings.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister received a report from Dr. Charron regarding his investigation of pollution of the water in the North Saskatchewan river? If so, would the minister indicate the nature of such report? Also, has the minister received a reply to the telegram he sent to Dr. Cross on Wednesday, and would he also indicate the nature of any reply which may have been received?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) asked me whether or not I had received a reply to the question my hon. friend now asks. I have had a reply from the minister of health which says that he is sending us a report with regard to past, future and present activities in connection with this matter, on the part of his government. And the minister of health in Saskatchewan telephoned this morning to say that he has just returned from Edmonton, where he conferred with the minister of health and our officials, and departmental officials of the government of Alberta, and is satisfied that everything is being done to meet the situation.

WHEAT

PRICE OF SUPPLIES MADE AVAILABLE TO MILLING COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is wheat to be made available to any Canadian milling companies at the reduced lakehead price announced yesterday by the minister?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The price announced for wheat at the lakehead is available to any purchaser who buys wheat in store at the lakehead.

BUTTER

REDUCTION IN UNITED STATES PARITY PRICE—EFFECT ON CANADIAN PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. Anderson (Norfolk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Recent press reports state that the support price of butter will be reduced eight cents a pound in the United States, effective April 1, 1954. Can the minister inform the house what effect, if any, this action will have on our own market?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me a copy of his question and to state that within the last few days we have been notified from Washington that the government has taken the position that in future on a number of articles, one of which is butter, they will reduce the support price from 95 per cent of parity to 75 per cent of parity. That will result in butter going down about eight cents a pound as compared with the support that has been on it up to date. That reduction of eight cents will put it at 58 cents, which is the same support price we have in Canada. Then we must keep in mind the fact that there is a 12-cent duty on butter coming into Canada. We do not expect that the action of the United States will affect the position in Canada.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF NEW DESTROYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I regret I have been unable to give him notice because I was unable to reach him. Perhaps he will take this question as notice. Is it a fact that construction has ceased on Canada's new destroyers? If so, when will work be resumed?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The answer to the first part of the question is no.

(Translation):

ACADIAN HISTORY

INQUIRY AS TO HISTORICAL RESEARCH ON ACADIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, would the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) be kind enough to tell us if the government has done anything to carry out the suggestion I made here in the past, that more importance be attributed by the national archives to the history of Acadia and to research in that field?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) that Mr. Roger Comeau, a doctor of history who has been, for many years, an employee of our national archives, has just been given a promotion following which his main duty will be to collect, classify and preserve the records and other documents pertaining to the history of Acadia.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO VISIT OF QUEEN MOTHER TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Acting Prime Minister a question? In the light of the very welcome announcement he made the other day that an invitation had been extended to Elizabeth, the Queen Mother, to include Canada in her visit to North America, has the government had any reply to the invitation extended, and is there any likelihood that the Queen Mother will be accompanied by Princess Margaret?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): I have heard indirectly—I have not been in communication with His Excellency the Governor General—that the Queen Mother has stated that she hopes to come to Canada. I have no information regarding the latter question.

LIVESTOCK

MARKETING—SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO PRICE SPREAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister considered the request of the interprovincial farm union council that an immediate inquiry be made into livestock marketing and the spread between prices to the consumer and the prices received by the producer? Will the minister recommend that the standing committee on agriculture—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Can this question not be put on the order paper? It is a long one. I do not see what urgency there is about it. I think it should be on the order paper.

Mr. Coldwell: May I suggest that it is a matter of concern because of the spread between what the purchaser gets and the consumer pays. Then there is the request that the matter be referred to the committee on agriculture.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You will get the answer on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: The question is in two parts. I submit that the second part could go on the order paper. If any comments could be made on the first part, all right; perhaps I should leave it to the minister. It seems to me that the second part definitely should go on the order paper.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The presentation of the farmers' union is one which results from their convention which was held some time ago. It deals with matters that are referred to both the federal government and the provincial governments. I think it will be agreed by all hon. members that in so far as the price charged for beef, let us say, in the province of Ontario or in the province of British Columbia or in any other province is concerned, it is a provincial matter; it is not a matter that is dealt with here.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether the subject will be referred to the agriculture committee?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is a matter for the order paper.

Mr. Argue: There has been a tremendous drop in beef prices in recent days.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

ALLEGED PRIVATE AGREEMENT BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Will he comment on the press report today that there was an undisclosed agreement not to press for the all-Canadian development of the seaway in consideration of the speedy advancement of the joint development of the hydroelectric power plants on the St. Lawrence?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): I have not heard of the report referred to, but I can assure my hon. friend that there is no private agreement between Canada and the United States relating to the St. Lawrence project.

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF INCREASES IN BENEFITS

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? Can the minister now give me a reply to the question I asked him yesterday with reference to alleged consideration by the department of proposals for an increase in unemployment insurance benefits? I might say that this was announced in the Hamilton Spectator as a distinct possibility, and that an announcement would be made any day.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I think my hon. friend's question to some extent revolves around the definition in this chamber of the expression "give consideration to". She asked me yesterday whether the government was giving consideration to a plan for increasing unemployment insurance benefits, and I said that I was not able to reply to that. In reply to her question today I would say to her that my department is constantly studying the benefits given under unemployment insurance, and of course now with particular reference to the present situation; but I have not made any representations to the cabinet so far regarding changing these benefits.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I ask a supplementary question? Will the minister say whether he expects to make a statement within a few days, since that was the inference in the news report.

Mr. Gregg: If any decision is reached on this matter I will most certainly convey it to the house.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (for the Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 176, to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

He said: During the debate on second reading the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) asked for an explanation of clause 2. I gave an explanation which perhaps is appropriate to the bill, but it was not appropriate to the question asked. I have now been given a statement which will perhaps give him the information he was then seeking.

Section 2 of this amending act relates to section 8 of the present act and is concerned with elections to contribute for prior service. Under the present act the basis of contributions for prior service was 6 per cent of the sessional indemnity in respect of that session. This will still apply in the case of sessions prior to the commencement of the pension plan, and it could have been applied to the last session of the last parliament where the same basis of payment prevailed, but with the introduction of the new method of paying indemnities to members, we could not, of course, use the same wording.

If you take the case of a member who is now contributing and assume that he is defeated at the next election, he would, if he were not eligible for an annual allowance, receive a withdrawal allowance in respect of the contributions which he made during this parliament. If he is elected to a subsequent parliament after receiving his withdrawal allowance, all that he needs to do is to elect to repay his withdrawal allowance to get credit for all his service during the present session. The same would be the case if this member had been a member at the last session of the last parliament, had he on being re-elected, after receiving a withdrawal allowance, desired to count that service.

The only way in which a member would not be contributing at the present session would be if he had already contributed $4,000. In that case he would, on being defeated at the next election, be entitled to an annual allowance, and if he should ever be re-elected again, the allowance would be suspended until he ceased to be a member again and therefore, he would have no problem of electing to pay for prior service.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES

MEASURE TO IMPLEMENT INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries) moved the third reading of Bill No. 251, to implement the international convention for the northwest Atlantic fisheries.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

TELEGRAPHS ACT

APPLICATION OF PART III CONCERNING MARINE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH COMPANIES

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (for the Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. 30, to amend the Telegraphs Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL BATTLEFIELDS

QUEBEC—AMOUNT PAID TO COMMISSION INCREASED TO $125,000

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the third reading of Bill No. 167, to amend an act respecting the national battlefields at Quebec.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

CHANGE IN BASIS OF COMPENSATION IN RESPECT OF SWINE AND SHEEP

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. 250, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SALARIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE SALARIES OF MINISTERS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the second reading of Bill No. 172, to amend the Salaries Act.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the effect of this bill will be to increase the salary of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) by $10,000 to $25,000, and to increase the salaries of ministers of the crown by $5,000, that is from the present $10,000 per annum to $15,000 per annum.

I think that little needs to be said in justification of this bill. Perhaps the strongest argument is that the present salaries were fixed in 1920. Very few salaries fixed in 1920 are appropriate in this year of 1954. The salary of $10,000 paid to ministers in 1920 came to them almost tax free. Assuming that a minister is a married man with two dependent children, which may be flattering to some of my colleagues, his tax deduction today would be $3,700. So that actually his take-home pay, as it is called in labour circles, has been reduced considerably since 1920.

Perhaps I could give a short history of the salaries of cabinet ministers. The salary fixed at the time of confederation in 1868 was $5,000 for the prime minister and $5,000 for the other ministers. In 1873 the salary range was revised to $8,000 for the prime minister and $7,000 for the other ministers. The scale was revised again in 1905 when the salary of the prime minister was made $12,000 and the salaries of the other ministers, $7,000. In 1920 the present scale was fixed, as I have stated, at $15,000 for the Prime Minister and $10,000 for the other ministers.

A comparison of the salaries paid in other countries may be interesting. The President of the United States receives $100,000, plus a $50,000 taxable expense allowance, plus a non-taxable travelling allowance not exceeding $40,000. In the United Kingdom the Prime Minister receives ten thousand pounds—

Mr. Drew: That is £10,000.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): £10,000 I should say. The other ministers of the crown receive £5,000. The method of remuneration in Australia is somewhat different. There the Prime Minister receives £41,000 as a cabinet fund to cover the remuneration of himself and his colleagues. This is in addition to their parliamentary remuneration.

I might point out that the salaries and parliamentary indemnities of the Prime Minister and the cabinet ministers are taxable. Of the $25,000 which a cabinet minister would receive the taxes would amount to $7,625, so that the actual return is no more than the salary of a very junior executive in an ordinary business corporation.

I had occasion to look up the history of the $2,000 car allowance which cabinet ministers also receive. The details of this will be found in Hansard of August 1, 1931, at pages 4506 and 4507. Up to that time one of the perquisites of a cabinet minister was to have a car and chauffeur at his disposal. This was abolished in that year and when Mr. Bennett was introducing the legislation he stated that this represented a saving to the crown of $5,000 per month. He also expressed some views about the salaries of cabinet ministers which I shall not read, but they might make interesting reading for hon. members who may think that cabinet ministers are overpaid. That was certainly not his opinion when speaking in 1931. I do not know that I have anything further to say.

I believe we all agree that the chief executive of this country is not paid an amount comparable to what is paid to his opposite number either in the United States or in the United Kingdom. It is probably the position of the greatest responsibility among all positions of responsibility in this dominion of Canada.

Cabinet ministers also have a heavy responsibility and I suggest they work hard. I do not know of any class of executives who work longer hours or have greater responsibilities than the members of the government here in Canada. I believe the proposals contained in the bill are reasonable and I hope they will commend themselves to hon. members of this house.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this bill is in fact closely related to the measure which has already been before the house, and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) so indicated when he discussed both bills in his statement on the other measure with which we have already dealt.

Some time having elapsed, I should like briefly to place on record some of the statements made by the Prime Minister in relation to this subject so that it may be in context with the statement I wish to make.

On January 26, when the measure dealing with allowances to hon. members was before the house, the Prime Minister at the same time dealt with this measure in these words, as reported at page 1453 of Hansard:

> I turn now to the second proposal in the resolution which is that the salaries of ministers of the crown and of the Speakers and leaders in the houses of parliament should be increased. These salaries have not been altered since 1920. This fact, in itself, is perhaps all the argument needed to explain why an increase in salaries might be justified at this time. I do not think anyone would question the statement that ministers of the crown have full-time jobs of an exacting character, with heavy responsibilities. Under our constitutional system, the same is true of the position of the leader of the official opposition. I doubt if anyone who occupies one of these positions expects the remuneration to be comparable with the rewards open to persons of equal ability in private life, either in business or in the professions. I am sure no one expects, either, that the contrast will be too great.

I then pass on to a statement made later by the Prime Minister:

> This seems to be still a most modest amount compared with the salaries and earnings of most Canadians with senior executive positions in business or in the higher reaches of the professions. There is another reason, perhaps not an important one, but still one that is worthy of some consideration, for increasing the remuneration of ministers. In the nature of things a reasonable relationship must be maintained between the remuneration of ministers and the salaries of the senior public servants.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, there will be disagreement with what the Prime Minister said in the words I have quoted, or substantial disagreement with what the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) has said this afternoon.

The question, however, is one which raises another point. How are we to deal with matters of this kind? On other occasions changes of this nature have called for inquiry by a committee or by some other body which might examine the subject and make recommendations, after having considered the alternatives which present themselves.

The suggestion made by some hon. members, that this was handing over the responsibilities of parliament, is simply an evasion in terms of the normal practice, and would in fact apply with equal force to any other case where a matter is referred to a committee. We are constantly referring subjects of this kind to committees, to find out what alternative methods present themselves as an answer to the problem that undoubtedly is raised.

I believe there will be general agreement with what the Acting Prime Minister has said about the necessity for recognizing the responsibilities of the office of prime minister of Canada, and assuring that this office may be carried out efficiently, from the administrative and the parliamentary point of view, and also from the point of view of accepting those various social and other obligations that are an essential incidental requirement of the office itself. I might add that they have their important place in the fulfilment of the responsibilities of that office.

But, Mr. Speaker, the question which is before us here is one that does present alternatives. That is the thought I would like to leave most firmly in the minds of hon. members. There are alternative methods, and we should have had an opportunity through a committee of inquiry to find out whether there may not be some alternative method which would be much better than the flat method now proposed.

It is true that ministers must devote their whole time to this task. It is true that ministers have heavy responsibilities, and that those responsibilities increase constantly. But how do we arrive at the figure which is before us now? We have no method of arriving at it beyond the fact that it has been placed before us in this statute.

The Acting Prime Minister has said that the salaries paid in other jurisdictions differ greatly. He pointed out that the President of the United States receives a salary and an expense allowance far beyond anything contemplated in this measure before us.

He also pointed out that in Britain there is a salary of £10,000 paid to the Prime Minister. That amount, in terms of the present value of the dollar, would be less than is now proposed by this measure.

Having said that, may I point out that there is, however, another consideration in Britain which should not be overlooked. The Prime Minister of Britain, when he ceases to be Prime Minister, retains his right to the same salary for the rest of his life. That amount, capitalized in terms of the immediate amount that would be paid at the time of the retirement of any Prime Minister, would be a very substantial sum. We therefore cannot say and could not suggest that, even though the amount paid to the Prime Minister of Great Britain in present dollar values of the pound is less than that proposed here, this measure, in fact, suggests a larger payment. It does not. The provision in regard to the continuing payments after the retirement of the Prime Minister of Great Britain is one of very considerable importance. It does, however, suggest that there are alternatives that should have been considered.

The Acting Prime Minister has also pointed out that in Australia there is a payment of £41,000 to what is known as a cabinet fund, which is then administered by the Prime Minister. That gives to the Prime Minister of Australia the right to make variable arrangements in regard to the remuneration to his ministers. There again you have another alternative.

I believe it would have been a very good thing if a committee or a commission had had an opportunity to examine these different methods, and several other methods that present themselves, and simply place before us an analysis of the comparative advantages of these systems and then let us decide, on the basis of the evidence produced, which method this house would prefer, and also what figures should be adopted having regard to the over-all plan employed.

If, for the sake of argument, it were decided that we should adopt a system similar to that which has been long in use in Great Britain, then it would seem that there should be a different amount. If the salary were going to continue, that would have to be taken into consideration, and there might be strong arguments for that. I believe that the same practice is followed in France. We have not examined this matter for some time. As the Acting Prime Minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) have both pointed out, it has not been considered since 1920. Therefore it is highly desirable that the alternative methods employed in Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and France, where there are a number of similarities which do not exist in the government of the United States, should have been examined, given consideration and placed before us for final decision.

One of the points made by the Prime Minister was that some regard should be had to the amount that men of similar capacity would receive in executive offices in private employment. I think there will be general agreement with that. I think it should be recognized that the government of the country is big business on a very large scale and that executive capacity should be attracted by what is paid. Nevertheless one thing that hardly needs to be emphasized is that executive salaries in private business or in the professions are not the same. You do not reward executive efficiency by one single fixed salary. On the contrary, you gear the salary of the executive to the responsibility of the office as well as to the capacity of the individual.

There is already in operation a system of different salary levels for cabinet ministers in the United Kingdom. In Australia ministers receive different amounts for offices that are regarded as having a different weight of responsibility. This is made possible by the single amount paid to the cabinet fund which is administered by the Prime Minister of Australia. I think this is something that could well be considered. We are not dealing now with the individuals who may be in office today. No one should suggest for a moment that any comment that is made is related to the individual occupying any particular office of government. We are dealing with the government as part of our parliamentary system and we are considering the remuneration to be paid to those who assume these administrative offices.

I think there would be general agreement that there are members of the present government who would earn substantially more in executive offices in private business or in an outside professional capacity. Undoubtedly there are members of the government who are making a personal sacrifice and will still make a personal sacrifice in dollars no matter what change is now proposed. But, Mr. Speaker, without in any way reflecting on any individual member of the government, I do not think there will be any suggestion by hon. members of the house that that applies to every member of the government. I am sure that the members of the government would not suggest that. There are members of the government whose executive capacity and experience are not comparable with that of some of the senior ministers, and that will always be the case.

We are not dealing with individuals but with a situation which must invariably arise in the formation and continuance of any government. Without the slightest reflection on any cabinet minister, I say that to set a flat rate of this kind would be establishing a system under which some highly experienced men would be receiving less than they would receive in an executive capacity in private business or in professional office, while others would be receiving far more than what they could reasonably expect to receive in any private occupation at this time. I think that suggests that there may be very good reason for considering the wisdom of adopting here the system that is already in force in Great Britain, the system that, under a different method, is made possible in Australia as well as in some other jurisdictions.

I believe that we should certainly seek to make sure that we can have in government office highly trained men to carry on the business of the country. I think that the remuneration should be such that the sacrifice will not be so great as to preclude the possibility of acceptance by those of considerable experience and executive capacity. However, in trying to arrive at an amount that would hold such men in the government at this time I do not think we should fix an amount which there certainly might be some reason to believe would be beyond what was necessary to retain some of the other members of the government.

That being so, I return to the proposition that I put forward on an earlier occasion, and I think it applies with even greater force to this measure than to the other one that was before us. In so far as the other measure was concerned, we did not have evidence available of a variety of alternatives such as we know exist in other jurisdictions with respect to the appointment of cabinet ministers. I believe this matter should have been referred to a select committee or a royal commission. Such a body could do nothing more than digest the facts and make a report to parliament. Then parliament would have to accept full responsibility. Because that is not done and because we are adopting this method without any opportunity to consider the alternatives, I propose to vote against the measure. Having regard to the desire to maintain the dignity and responsibility of the government, I feel very strongly that it would have been advisable to refer this matter to a committee or commission as I have suggested.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this matter is of some importance both to the house and the government and, indeed, to the country at large. I can see no force in the argument that we should refer a question of this description to a royal commission or committee. After all, we are in the position of being the representatives of the people of Canada, we are dealing with the compensation to be paid to our executive, and it strikes me that is our responsibility and that we must accept it fully.

Having said that, I want to say that we have considered the bill very carefully and think that the increase suggested is more than is warranted at this time. We are not overlooking the fact of course that the ministers will share in the increased indemnity and that the total increase to be granted at the present time raises the emoluments of office from $18,000 to $27,000, including the automobile allowance. I say that we have carefully considered the matter and, while most of us feel that some increase may be warranted, particularly with respect to the office of prime minister—and I have so stated on a number of occasions—nevertheless we feel that we cannot support the bill as it now stands. If the amounts were reduced, we would give consideration to the matter. As it now stands, speaking on behalf of my colleagues, we shall oppose the bill.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): The leader of our party has been called to the banking and commerce committee, Mr. Speaker, otherwise he would have been here to make perhaps a more official observation than I am personally able to make. Perhaps he will be here before the bill passes second reading; I do not know. I wish to say that, personally, I do not think I have any particular objection to the bill. I base my observations on several grounds.

Before dealing with that, may I say that I know I cannot debate the bill which has already become law in respect to our own indemnities. At that time there was some criticism of us which came about in this fashion. It was said that we, as parliamentarians, raised our own salaries. The answer to that criticism, of course, is that we are the only ones who could do that. Nobody else could do it. Either we did it or we did not do it.

The bill before us is a little different because the members of the government cannot raise their own salaries unless they come to parliament with a bill. It then becomes the responsibility of the entire house to say whether or not Her Majesty's ministers can have an increase in their salaries. I am not seriously disturbed by the bill, because I do not think the salaries called for are out of line with salaries paid for men with similar responsibilities in private industry. I do not know that I should make a broad statement, but there are some members of the cabinet who are stronger than others; that is so wherever we go. No matter what line of work, profession or industry we consider, some men rise to the top and command perhaps a greater salary than others. In the case of the cabinet, each cabinet post pays the same amount, whether or not one minister is more capable than another. So far as I can see, I do not want to draw any distinction; most of those holding cabinet posts could undoubtedly command salaries much greater than they are now receiving if they were to move out and seek the dollar somewhere else.

I do not think there is any need to mention who they are. I cannot help thinking of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who is sitting there evidently signing his mail. There is no question in my mind that if he went into private practice he could command an exceedingly healthy income. I look at all these gentlemen on the front benches, and they look like wise individuals. I am quite certain they could all do the same thing. I do know that in some governments in this country they have difficulty holding men, because they become familiar with their posts over the years and are strong executives who could command a lot more in private industry than they are getting.

For these reasons, I do not think the government is unjustified in requesting that the salaries for these positions be brought in line with those paid for similar positions. I know the criticism might be made that in a service of this kind you must consider the sacrifice. That is all very well, but I think perhaps they have considered some sacrifice if they could make more on the outside than they are making here. I believe the people must recognize that a responsible position demands some equivalent income concessions. I think that is common sense.

I cannot ask the minister a question now such as I might ask if we were in committee, but I will ask this question in committee and the minister can answer it if he wishes. I do not believe there should be any reluctance on the part of the government to reveal other salaries that are paid to government officials outside the cabinet. When I say "government officials" I mean the officials of crown corporations and officials of various branches of government service who receive a fairly healthy income. I should like the minister to give to the house the salaries received by those who are employed in government service or crown corporations who receive remuneration in excess or the equivalent of the present cabinet salary. I believe the people are entitled to know; then the people can judge whether or not these salaries might be out of line with those of other responsible positions.

There is another observation I should make. Perhaps when these figures are revealed it might be said that Mr. so-and-so, the head of a crown corporation, receives so much in salary, and that is in excess of the salary of the minister under whom this corporation comes. If we ask why he receives that salary, the answer might be that this is a specialized thing and we have to have a man there who can handle the job. Well, that is all right. I may agree with that. But supposing he does not handle the job. Supposing that some way or another his work, or the crown company or the department, whatever it might be, is not successful? Supposing they fail in their obligation. Who is it that takes the rap? In the final analysis the responsibility is not there; it is that of the government. In the final analysis the government, or some minister in the government, must take the blame. So therefore I say once again my personal opinion is that if the bill is asking for salaries somewhere in line with those paid in other government positions, or positions of similar responsibility in private industry, then I see no particular reason why the bill should not pass.

Had the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) proposed a motion for a committee or commission, I do not know whether we would have voted for it or not. We do not become enthusiastic about commissions and committees, as a rule. But at least it would have been something to substitute for his bald statement that he is going to vote against the measure. I do not think voting against the measure will be interpreted in the country as voting against it because a commission has not been set up; it will be interpreted as indicating that the official opposition is against these increases.

The leader of the C.C.F. group has said that he is voting against the measure because he thinks the amounts stated in it are too high. If that is the conviction held by the C.C.F. group, then of course it is a reasonable one.

Speaking some time ago, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), making special reference to himself, said that these increases were not being asked particularly for the benefit of this cabinet, but rather for the positions represented in the cabinet, so that the benefit would accrue to incoming governments as well as to this one. I think that is a reasonable position, and that he was speaking reasonably when he said that he was not going to be here too long. He is getting on in years, and when he asks for the passage of this bill I am quite certain he is not asking that it be passed for his own benefit. I do not know what his financial status is, but I suppose he would be able to get along for the rest of his life with what he has at the present time.

So what he is asking for is something that will be permanent for the future, something that will be available to those persons who will step into the shoes of those who are now carrying the responsibility of government. I think that is reasonable. We have not discussed the amounts particularly, as to whether they are too high or too low. However, in my own personal view, I am not opposed to the bill.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to indulge in anything in the nature of sentimental discussion. I do believe, however, that the introduction of this measure at this time—and I cannot refer to the other one because it has been passed by parliament—is inopportune and inappropriate, in view of conditions both national and international.

Legislation such as this, introduced so soon after a general election campaign in which, at no time, was there any suggestion of this type of legislation being introduced, endangers the institution of parliament, and places democracy in our country in a position where we, in parliament, may well be pricing regard for parliament out of the free market of public opinion.

Mention was made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) of the appropriateness of having matters such as this referred to a committee of the house. I think that view has been reinforced in recent days by similar action in the British parliament. There a committee on members' indemnities was set up, representative of all members who, having heard evidence and having considered the situation from every angle and facet, made certain recommendations. I feel that a similar course should have been followed in connection with this legislation. A committee would have reviewed the situation and would have given consideration to the appropriateness of increases being made applicable to all ministers in the cabinet. There are certain portfolios to which the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) are inappropriate. In Great Britain there is a realization that heavy responsibilities rest upon certain ministers, including the Prime Minister, and that equal responsibilities do not rest upon ministers in other portfolios. Furthermore, even though we favour one or more increases under this bill, we are placed in the position of having to vote for the entire bill. That anomaly would have been obviated by the simple expedient of a committee being set up to review the whole problem of indemnities.

I cannot rid myself of the thought that members of this House of Commons would not have given the same expeditious consideration to this legislation had it been introduced in March or April last, in advance of the general election. And I believe this, too, that when legislation such as this has not been considered in any way by the Canadian people, and adopted by them, and when they have not been given an opportunity to consider whether or not they would have supported it, it is a travesty of parliament to bring it in immediately after a general election.

This is the kind of thing that undermines public regard for democratic institutions. I intend to vote against the bill, as I voted against an earlier measure. Public opinion in Canada is strongly adverse to this legislation. People are asking for a higher standard in parliament. Additional monetary rewards will not necessarily furnish higher standards. When I look back to a time 50 or 75 years ago and see the giants of that day who served without remuneration, and see some of the giants in—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Not in this parliament?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, not in this parliament. When I look at the cabinet today I feel—I am sure hon. members will agree with me—that neither the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) nor the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is here because of the rewards measured in terms of money. They are here for a public service. That is what the people expect of democratic representatives, and I believe that by coming through the back door in this way after an election and introducing it with such haste the government cannot but earn the condemnation of a large number of the Canadian people.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the position taken by the hon. member for Rosetown Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), which he took on behalf of this group, with respect to this bill. Entirely apart from considerations as to the way in which this measure was brought in, entirely apart from what would happen if the question were referred to some other body for inquiry, we have considered the substance of the matter as it is presented to us. We feel it is our responsibility as members of parliament to meet a question such as this head on and to make our own decisions. As my leader has pointed out, bearing in mind the fact that the Prime Minister and the other members of the cabinet share in the other increase which was passed by parliament recently, we feel that the additional increase for them set out in this bill is of too great a magnitude. It is because of our views with respect to the substance of the measure now before us that we shall vote against second reading of the bill.

As hon. members are aware, the present gross annual income of cabinet ministers is $18,000 a year. The two increases provided for by Bill No. 171 and Bill No. 172 will bring their total to $27,000 a year. In the case of the Prime Minister the gross annual income, prior to the introduction of these two bills, was $23,000. With the passing of the two measures, that gross income will be $37,000. We feel that increases to those two sums are out of line, and it is because of our attitude towards the substance of this measure that we have taken the stand my leader has indicated, and which I rise to support.

Let us look at the position as it would be if the majority of the members of this house joined with us in voting against this measure. If it were defeated, the salaries paid to the Prime Minister and the cabinet ministers would remain as they now are, but in addition to these salaries they would of course have their annual indemnities as members of parliament. That means that the Prime Minister's emoluments would be raised from $23,000 a year as is now the case to $27,000 a year, and the other cabinet ministers would be raised from the present figure of $18,000 to $22,000 a year.

We believe—we say this without any feelings of disrespect for the persons holding these offices at the present time; that is not what is involved; what is involved here is a principle—that an increase at one time of $4,000 a year is sufficient. Everyone knows that that amount of increase is far more than most Canadians will ever make in any one year in their lives, let alone ever getting an increase of that amount. I submit that we are not being unreasonable, we are not being unfair, we are not failing to recognize the importance of the job when we say that the total emoluments I have just indicated, $22,000 for cabinet ministers and $27,000 for the Prime Minister, should be quite enough.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the discussions that have taken place on this measure thus far, there is one item to which reference has been made two or three times. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) referred to it when we had before us the resolution preceding the two bills. The Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) referred to it today. In fact, the reference today was in a little greater detail than was the case when we were at the resolution stage. I refer to the matter of the motor car allowance of $2,000 a year, tax free, which is provided for the cabinet ministers as well as for some others, though in the case of the Speakers, the amount is a little less. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, this $2,000 is part of the total payment; it is part of the total of $18,000 that the cabinet ministers are now receiving; it is part of the total of $27,000 they will receive if both of these bills go through parliament.

I appreciate the fact that today the Acting Prime Minister indicated that he had looked into the history of this $2,000 motor car allowance. As he knows, I have looked into it a good deal myself, and I have had something to say about it on a number of occasions on the floor of this house. I have had correspondence with the Auditor General, Mr. Watson Sellar, about the matter, and I must say that I am disappointed that at this time when the Salaries Act is being amended this matter of the manner in which this $2,000 tax-free motor car allowance is being paid has not been—if I may use the phrase—tidied up.

The whole question first came to light in modern times when a number of new positions were created in the cabinet in the early years of the last parliament. The Prime Minister himself on that occasion admitted that up until then he had not known just how this $2,000 car allowance came to be part of the statutory amount paid to cabinet ministers. He said, however, he was informed, when he made inquiries, that it arose from an item in the estimates of 1931. Well, I confess that that really was a source of amazement to me; so as soon as I could I went back to the statutes of that year and looked up the item and I found that in Appropriation Act No. 5, 1931, there was an item, item No. 352, which reads:

> To provide for payment annually from the consolidated revenue fund of the sum of $2,000 to each minister of the crown charged with the administration of a department, the Solicitor General, and the Leader of the Opposition and the sum of $1,000 each to the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons, in lieu of motor cars and their maintenance, including chauffeurs, the acceptance of such sums not to vacate their respective seats in parliament; and to authorize the governor in council to appoint any person now employed in the public service as a chauffeur of a passenger automobile at Ottawa, whose position is abolished, to a vacant position in the public service, provided such chauffeur has been continuously employed as such for at least two years and that the appointment will be made at no higher remuneration than he is now receiving, $42,000.

The reason the figure of $42,000 is at the end of that long item is that that was the amount that had to be paid in the year 1931 to cover the motor car allowances being provided by that item in the estimates of 1931. But, Mr. Speaker, because there was in the text of that item one little word, "annually", it has been ruled that that was just the same as if the matter had been decided by statute in the ordinary way. From that day down to this, $2,000 has been added to the salary of each cabinet minister and it appears in the blue book of estimates with a capital "S" at the left, indicating that it is to be regarded as statutory.

We have before us today a bill to amend the Salaries Act. We know that the Salaries Act as it now reads specifies that the salary of each cabinet minister is $10,000. If any hon. member will look at the blue book of estimates he will see that for each minister there is an item covering salary and motor car allowance, $12,000. The two are lumped together and both are referred to as being statutory.

We can only assume from what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said at the resolution stage, and from what the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) said today, that if this bill goes through raising the salaries of cabinet ministers to $15,000, when we get the blue book of estimates, opposite each cabinet post will be, not the figure of $15,000 but the figure of $17,000 and we will be told again by the capital letter "S" that the total amount is statutory.

I am not going to pose as a lawyer in any sense because I am not one, and neither am I going to launch into a long legalistic argument about this, but I do think that anyone who wants to look at this matter in a common-sense manner must realize that even if it is legally correct it is hardly playing fair to contend that in the year 1954-1955 an item that was put in the estimates in 1931 justifies that amount still being paid and still being called statutory.

Just as a little aside, I find nothing in the original estimate that provided that the motor car allowance was to be tax free. I suppose that that did not matter so much in 1931. I do not yet know where the authority is to be found for that item to be tax free as it is today. That is another point which it seems to me, if I may use the phrase again, should be tidied up.

As I say, I am not going into a legalistic argument, probably because I have done it before and it is all on the record. However, in addition to the other arguments I have advanced in the past, when I claimed that this item should not be continued to be paid in that manner, I would now cite the Revised Statutes of Canada for 1952. Up until a couple of years ago it could have been argued that we were still operating under the statutes that had been passed annually from 1927 on down, but now we have the Revised Statutes of 1952. The statutes have been consolidated and brought up to date.

In volume VI of the Revised Statutes of Canada for 1952 the commissioners who had the job of revising the statutes set out for us a table showing what has happened to all of the statutes of Canada previous to 1952. I looked up to find out what happened to Appropriation Act No. 5 of 1931. This was the appropriation act which contained the item about the motor car allowances. At page 25 of volume VI we find details of the history and disposal of acts. In dealing with the statutes of 1931, I find this: "Chap. 61, Appropriation, No. 5, spent".

I suppose one could put two meanings on the word and say that the money had been spent. That is true, as the $42,000 was spent in that year, but that is not the meaning which the commissioners had in mind. What they meant by using the word "spent" was that the force of the legislation has expired, it has gone, it is spent.

Despite the fact that that legislation is spent we still have in the blue book of estimates which is before us now this $2,000 motor car allowance listed as statutory.

On the other occasions when I raised this matter I tried to confine myself to the procedure and the manner in which this was being done. I had in mind the fact that it was many years since cabinet ministers' salaries had been raised and I saw no point in discussing, on previous occasions, the question as to whether this money should be paid. I did not suggest on those occasions that it should be cut out altogether; I merely suggested that it should be dealt with in some other way, in some more satisfactory manner. I quoted Watson Sellar as being on my side of the case, and I shall do that again in a moment.

My point is that when the Salaries Act is being amended, when the whole question of the emoluments being paid to cabinet ministers is before the house, surely is the time to tidy up this matter and to decide once and for all, first, whether the motor car allowance is to be paid and, second, if so, how it is to be provided.

I contend from the reference I have just made to the appropriation statute of 1931, which is spent, that it should not be continued unless it is included in the Salaries Act which is now before us. As I say, I have raised this matter a number of times and I have always been appreciative of the manner in which the Prime Minister listened to my point of view. Perhaps it was in the hope that he would cut off my speech, and as a matter of fact he succeeded once or twice, but on one or two occasions he indicated that at the appropriate time items such as this would be tidied up.

I know just as well as Your Honour does that I cannot go into the details of the clauses of this bill, and I shall not do so, but the bill now before us does tidy up another point similar to this one. When we get into committee and are dealing with certain clauses of this bill to amend the Salaries Act I shall be able to point out that it tidies up the question of the salary of the secretary to the Governor General. For a number of years that item has been paid in two parts; there has been a salary of $2,400 paid by statute and an item of $7,600 in the estimates.

That is an item similar to the motor car allowance which Watson Sellar described as legislating by estimates. I shall quote Mr. Sellar in a moment. In response to my raising these items from time to time across the years, the question of the salary of the secretary to the governor general and the motor car allowances, the Prime Minister on two or three occasions has said that when the proper time came we would clean up these loose ends and put them on a proper basis.

If there ever was a proper time, this is it. My claim that it is a proper time is strengthened by the fact that this bill does clean up the question of the salary of the secretary to the Governor General. This bill will repeal the portion of that salary which is paid by statute and the blue book of estimates anticipates the passing of this bill—I am a little surprised at that—and includes the whole of that salary as an item. My point is that if that untidy item is being cleared up, so should this question of the motor car allowances.

As I say, after we first ran into this matter in 1949 I did a little research on my own. I felt it was my right and indeed my duty to lay my views before the Auditor General and get his comments if he were prepared to give them to me. Mr. Watson Sellar wrote me on December 14, 1949, and I shall quote the first paragraph which reads:

Dear Mr. Knowles,

Replying to your letter of the 12th, may I say at the outset that perhaps I'm not the best person to interpret vote 352 of 1931, because I drafted it. I was then assistant deputy minister of finance, and as there was then no deputy minister in office, I was responsible for the routine in connection with the estimates book. The instructions were to prepare a "continuing" item and have the text approved by the then deputy minister of justice. Frankly, I was surprised when, some years later, it was ruled that the latter part of the text provided authority to appoint one of the chauffeurs who, in the interval, had served as the private chauffeur of the then prime minister, Mr. Bennett. I was in sympathy with the appointment, but had assumed continuity of employment was an implied condition of the text.

I want to interpolate, sir, and on this point I am not expressing anything that I seek to attribute to Mr. Watson Sellar, but my own opinion is that if Mr. Sellar was surprised that the wording of that text was interpreted to mean the provision of a position for someone who was not then an incumbent so far as the chauffeurs were concerned, the same argument might be applied to all the then incumbents of those various cabinet posts. All of them have since left the cabinet.

It may be that the purpose of this item was, as the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) said today, to pursue Mr. Bennett's idea of economy. He found a way of saving $5,000 a month for the public treasury, namely by doing away with the cars and chauffeurs for those various people, and giving them instead $2,000 a year. The only comment I would make on that in so far as Mr. Bennett is concerned is to commend it. That differs from what the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said the other night, but that is beside the point.

My point is that this was a temporary measure and the fact that it was a temporary measure is borne out by the manner in which it was dealt with, namely not by changing any statute or by making changes in the Salaries Act, but by an item in the estimates.

I said I was going to read only one paragraph from Mr. Sellar's letter, but I wish to read the next one:

On several occasions I have expressed the opinion to the public accounts committee that legislating by the Appropriation Act has undesirable characteristics, and in the report of this office to the House of Commons a year ago I drew attention to the situation. See paras. 39-42 of the attached marked copy.

Mr. Sellar sent me a copy of his report for the year 1947-48. I will not read it all but paragraph 41 makes reference to this matter of car allowances and then says this:

These payments become statutory charges by the text of vote 352 of Appropriation Act No. 5, c. 61, statutes 1931. The 1947-48 main estimates included 30 items marked "(S)" because of texts in previous appropriation acts—22 having an association with vote 352 of 1931.

As I have already said the Revised Statutes of Canada for 1952 show that the Appropriation Act No. 5 is now spent. The next paragraph in that same report by Mr. Sellar for 1947-48 reads as follows:

The practice of legislating by appropriation acts has attractions when dealing with special cases or making temporary exceptions from general legislation; but the thought presents itself that it might be a safeguard and a convenience to members were such items listed together in a special schedule and the reason therefor printed with each item—as is the practice with respect to bills.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the first part of that sentence justifies what was done by Mr. Bennett's government in 1931. Let me read it again:

The practice of legislating by appropriation acts has attractions when dealing with special cases or making temporary exceptions from general legislation;

But it is a different story when it is continued for 23 years.

Similarly Mr. Watson Sellar, Auditor General, prepared a very extensive memorandum on matters of this kind. Originally it was for a committee of the Senate but later it was presented to the public accounts committee of this house as well. In that memorandum he dealt with this matter again and said:

An example is vote 352 of the main Appropriation Act for 1931. That vote authorizes an annual motor car allowance to be paid to ministers, the Speakers and the leader of the official opposition in the House of Commons. Payments are made every year by relying on the text of the 1931 vote. Consequently, in the estimates the amounts are listed as "s"— —which means authorized by statute. Legislating by means of an appropriation act is a convenience when a need is transitory. Furthermore, it avoids cluttering the statute books with expired legislation.

That means "statutory".

I think that is a very clear statement and a very proper statement. If there is some item which has to be passed only for two or three years there is really no objection to parliament being asked to pass it, and it can be included in the items in the estimates. Mr. Sellar states that it is rather ridiculous to have special statutes for temporary items which will result in the statute books soon becoming cluttered with expired statutes.

But this is not something that expires. This is something that has been continuing for 23 years. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed there were items which required to be cleaned up and this one certainly comes within that category. The Prime Minister assured me these items would be dealt with but we now have the matter before us and nothing is being done about it. Let me go on with Mr. Sellar's comment. After saying these things would clutter the statutes books with expired legislation he continued:

But from the constitutional viewpoint, it is open to the objection that it is, in fact, incomplete legislation because the mode employed circumscribes deliberations by the Senate. This was pointed out 30 years ago in a report of a special committee of the Senate on the rights of the Senate in matters of financial legislation.

Mr. Sellar included in the memorandum a notation on that subject which I will not take up the time of the house in reading but it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the position with regard to this matter is very clear.

I am not alleging that the paying out of this money is illegal. If it were the Auditor General would have said so long ago. But I am asserting in the words of the Auditor General that although it may be proper to deal with a transitory matter by means of items in the estimates, it is not fair to parliament nor to the recipients to continue year after year making payments of this kind on the basis of an item in the Appropriation Act of 1931 which was spent long ago.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are two things that might be done in respect of this. On the one hand, the government might say it intends to continue this $2,000 motor car allowance, and it could present the matter to parliament in some way so parliament could pass it or reject it. That could be done by including it in the Salaries Act. If that were done the question of whether it was tax-free or otherwise could be determined by parliament. Despite my extensive research on the question I have never been able to find when parliament decided on this question and how that decision was arrived at. I suppose the income tax people made a ruling on it or it was dealt with by someone in the Department of Justice somewhere along the line, but certainly parliament never made the decision.

That is one course the government could follow. It could say that notwithstanding the views of the member for Winnipeg North Centre they wanted this $2,000 to be part of the emoluments of cabinet ministers, and that therefore they were going to bring it before parliament in a clear-cut form. Though I might disagree with that, I certainly would respect them for doing it in this way. But I am afraid I do not feel a great deal of respect for the manner in which it has been done across the years.

The other course the government might follow would be to say that they were going to put through this bill providing for an increase of $5,000 in salaries to cabinet ministers despite the opposition of some hon. members but since they were going to do that at this time they were also going to abolish the $2,000 and be satisfied with a net increase of $3,000 in the salaries, or a total net increase of $7,000 instead of a total of $9,000.

As I pointed out earlier, on previous occasions when I dealt with this matter, I have dealt with it only from a procedural aspect. I have not suggested in the past that the motor car allowance should be cancelled, but for my part, I do now make that suggestion. I suggest that if the government insists on going through with this increase of $5,000 in salaries over and above the $4,000 increase in indemnities, that this is a time when they could well afford to take up the slack so far as this $2,000 motor car allowance is concerned and deduct it from the emoluments of cabinet ministers.

It may be, Mr. Speaker, that I have broken my own pledge not to get too legalistic about this question, but I did feel that this was a time when something should be done about the matter. I honestly thought it would be dealt with on this occasion because of the statements the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has made in the past. He has implemented his assurance with respect to the salary of the secretary to the Governor General. I am sorry it has not been done with respect to the motor car allowance, and even yet I think something should be done about it.

For that reason, together with the reasons stated earlier by my leader for being opposed to this increase along with the other increase, I shall vote against the second reading of the bill.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, the scope of argument in this discussion is very limited, and without indulging in repetition one can hardly find anything to say. I want to register my opposition to the bill. My personal feeling, and it is a strange one, is that we are in a situation of unreality and fantasy. I do not think that the term "fantastic" is too strong a one to use respecting the amount of the increases sought in this bill. I do not want to make an emotional appeal, but when I say "fantastic", when I say "unrealistic", I think of the condition of the people of this country, 50 per cent of whom earn an income of less than $2,000 a year. Those are the people who send us to parliament, who sent me to parliament. I think too of what we might do for old age pensioners. I am well aware that the total amount involved in this legislation would not improve the condition of these people appreciably in the matter of cash, but I am dealing for the moment with ideas and principles.

I think of the increasing unemployment, for no matter what may be the correctness of the figures submitted on both sides of the house, there is no doubt that unemployment, seasonal it may be, is certainly increasing at the moment. One could mention the means test, veterans allowances, blind pensions and all the rest. That is why I say that I feel we are in a situation of fantasy and unreality. Therefore I am opposed to the principle of the bill. I opposed by voice and vote the bill which increased our own indemnity. The supporters and sponsors of that measure could at least advance the argument that its provisions were based upon some proof of need.

It is on the question of need that I am going to base my objection to these increases. I am not convinced that that argument can be applied to this bill. Up to the present time I have heard nothing in the debate which would prove to me that the beneficiaries of this legislation need such increases. Through the other bill cabinet ministers have already received an increase in their indemnities from $4,000 to $8,000, although I grant that the actual increase is only $2,000 in view of the fact that the increased indemnity will be paid on an annual rather than a sessional basis. Nevertheless there has been an increase and it applies to cabinet ministers as it does to members of parliament. I would be quite content to let it go at that.

To my mind $27,000 is a lot of money, however capable those who receive it may be. I should like to point out that after all cabinet ministers are made and not born. They enter the cabinet by virtue of the fact that they first of all have been elected by the people. When they come to the house they come, like the rest of us, with the idea that they will perform the functions and receive the indemnity of a member of parliament. In his wisdom and good time the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) calls upon them to be members of the government, and I would ask hon. members if it is reasonable to think that their need immediately increases at that moment from $17,000 to $27,000 which it is proposed to give them under the bill.

There is certainly nothing personal in my remarks. The ministers will know that there is absolutely nothing personal in these arguments. I do not know whether I dare suggest that perhaps we in the opposition, who look into the eyes of the cabinet ministers over there, know more about them than they do themselves. We do see signs of ability. Of course there are many able men in the cabinet, but I suggest that some of those who sit in the seats of the mighty have been endowed, like the rest of us, with feet of clay.

In view of the fact that no announcement was made about the introduction of this legislation before the election and that it was brought in afterwards, I suggest that the people of the country generally will not only resent that but will also think that the amounts provided in the bill as introduced are too large. I shall oppose the bill.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word or two. I do not find it easy to vote against this measure, and I should like to explain briefly why I shall do so. I agree with what has been said by my leader as to the onerous duties discharged by members of the cabinet. Nobody would doubt that for a moment. The nature of my complaint is the same as my complaint about the other measure, that we were not consulted and that we had no means of arriving at a conclusion. I think we are still in that position.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said we did not need to have any outside discussion or to have a committee, because we were the people who had to make the decision. Yes, we are; nevertheless I think we should make a decision only after adequate information is given to us. The shareholders of a company would not readily increase the salaries of their executive officers without having some idea as to comparable conditions elsewhere.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The shareholders of a company would not have any competent officers at these salaries.

Mr. Macdonnell: I defer to the right hon. gentleman's knowledge.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You know that as well as I do. What was your salary when you occupied such a position?

Mr. Macdonnell: The only argument that has been made so far as I know is a comparison of the remuneration of members of the cabinet with that of business executives. I do not accept that as a comparison at all. As my leader said, there are men in the cabinet who could earn far more money outside, and it will be a poor day for the House of Commons when that is not true.

Why are these men here? In this respect I should like to refer to what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said after the 1949 election. He referred to the cabinet and their responsibility and honour. That is quite right. What better reason could there be for a man being here than that he wishes to serve the public, and what is more just than that he should receive honour for doing so?

That is why I say I do not believe the best men who come here come with any idea of comparing what they are going to get with what they have been getting before. Therefore I repudiate that argument, and that being the only argument we have been given, so far as I know, we are being asked to vote blindly and mechanically without proper consideration and proper information. Therefore I shall vote against this measure.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I want to say a few words in order to put myself on record as being opposed to these increases in the salaries of cabinet ministers. What I am about to say does not apply to the increase in the salary of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). It has been said that the amount is necessary to maintain the dignity of his office. I have heard it put in that way. Personally, I do not think there is very much connection between money and dignity. I am quite sure the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would maintain the dignity of his office without any increase in salary. He was dignified before he came here, and he has maintained his dignity while here despite the very undignified actions of some of his followers on some occasions.

I would emphasize what some of the members of this party who have spoken before have said. I think that a $9,000 increase at one jump is too much. The average person is not going to separate the indemnity from the salary and say that a minister is only getting an increase of $4,000 as a member of parliament and that has no relationship to the $5,000 he gets as a cabinet minister. In so far as the average person is concerned, it is an increase of $9,000.

I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that there have been additions to the cabinet in recent years, possibly in recent months, before any increase in indemnity was proposed. I do not believe that there was any force used to bring those young men into the cabinet. I am quite satisfied that they thought they were doing pretty well for themselves in getting a cabinet position at the salary as it was at that time.

The Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) said that the remuneration is not out of line with that paid in private enterprise. I do not think the two can be compared at all. I am quite willing to admit right now that when the Acting Prime Minister came into this parliament and took a position in the cabinet, he could have made much more than he got here. I do not want him to think there is anything in the nature of flattery in what I am saying or that it is my purpose to flatter. However, I feel this country owes him a great deal because he has spent himself for this country since he became a member of the cabinet in 1935. I am sure he did not seek the position because of the salary that went with the office. I am quite willing to admit that. He will not work any harder because of this increase, because he cannot work any harder.

There are other members of the cabinet —a person gets on rather dangerous ground when he singles out an individual—who have spent themselves and given their lives to the welfare of this country. However, to say that, by and large, every member who comes into the cabinet could earn the salary now proposed is just sheer nonsense. I can imagine what sort of a figure some of them would make if they were separated from their efficient deputy ministers and staffs. When you mention an increase such as we are now considering to the average Joe, as the saying is, he just cannot understand it. He sees a $9,000 increase on top of all the fringe benefits that a member of parliament now receives. I was going over some of the fringe benefits in my mind the other day, but for the good of the country perhaps I should not mention them. It might create unrest. They are there, however, and members of the press gallery enlarge upon them every now and then.

I should like to tell the house and the government that they are making a terrible mistake at this time. As someone has said, for the first three days of this week we were discussing the unemployment situation in this country. There are men and women who do not know where to turn; hundreds of thousands of them. Any minister who does not know that only has to read the newspapers from his home town. The ministers from Vancouver could read the newspapers from that city and find out about the condition of the old age pensioners, persons on social assistance and those who are unemployed. I say we should come to our senses and maintain the faith of the people of this country in our representative institutions. I am quite sure we are doing much harm at the present time.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): In rising to oppose this measure, I feel that the present members of the cabinet deserve some sympathy. I feel that they are going to receive public criticism which is not entirely deserved. I do not share the opinions expressed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), who suggested that probably the Australian policy of a flat sum which the Prime Minister could distribute as he might see fit would be a good practice. I am afraid I cannot go along with the views expressed by a number of speakers who have suggested that there are some weak members in the cabinet. I want to say that I have had a very happy association with all the members of the cabinet. What I am about to say is not prompted by any grievance with any department.

I am afraid I cannot agree entirely with the member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) because I think that most cabinet ministers, if they had worked as hard in the business world as they have worked here, would probably have collected more money than they are ever likely to receive here. Again, I am speaking only for myself. I have expressed this view before. I feel that the highest salary in the country should go to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). Next to the Prime Minister, I think that the members of the cabinet and His Honour the Speaker deserve to be mentioned.

I have a great deal of sympathy for His Honour the Speaker who is not able to leave this chamber and take a walk when the proceedings become boring. The Speaker and his deputy really have to take a lot of punishment in the course of a parliament. I feel there should be adequate compensation for that. I want to make it clear that I am not suggesting we bring the salaries of the Prime Minister or the members of the cabinet to the top in Canada. I think some day we should accept the principle that the highest income a nation can give should go to the one who has the highest office the people can give. Before we can reach that stage, however, we have to make some radical changes in our way of doing things.

I believe we should ask ourselves, what is an income for? In answer, we might say it is to provide security and security involves an income that will enable us to look after sickness when it comes to the family and provide for our old age. Canada, with all her resources, should be able to provide those things for all her people. If we can provide for sickness for all our people and provide for old age, then it is not necessary for the individual to try to have the fantastic salary that many seem to think they should have.

I appreciate the problem that this government has, or that any government has, in trying to maintain staffs to efficiently run the business of government. Private enterprise is able to make extremely attractive offers to people who get their training in the government service. But I want to suggest that we have made some progress, even under a Liberal government. We have introduced old age security legislation which does give every Canadian security that we did not have a short time ago. I find that if at the age of 50 I had tried to get the sort of security through government annuities that we now provide through this legislation, I would have to advance $2,296.27 in cash to purchase an annuity of $40 a month at the age of 70. I think we can all agree that $40 a month is not adequate, but together I believe we could provide legislation which would give every Canadian security for the evening of his life.

Mr. Speaker: Order. While I appreciate the sympathy the hon. member expressed for me a moment ago, I wish he would go a little further and express sympathy with the difficulties I sometimes have in enforcing strict adherence to the rule of relevancy.

Mr. Nicholson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I shall try to connect what I am saying with the legislation at hand. This legislation is to provide security for members of the cabinet. My point is that if those cabinet members will bring in security for every Canadian, such action would relieve them of some of the disbursements people have found it necessary to make in the past.

I accept the point of view that if members of the cabinet had not come to parliament, no doubt they would find themselves in a better financial position. But that is true of a great many other members of parliament. For example, my closest neighbour in this chamber is a medical doctor, and I am sure if he worked as hard in his profession as he works in parliament he would be able to accumulate a good deal more money than he can hope to accumulate as a member of parliament.

Then I have no doubt the Acting Prime Minister would have accumulated a great deal more money if he had been following his career, particularly during the war years; but perhaps he would not have had written in his honour a book, "Canada at Work." I find this book is dedicated to Right Hon. Clarence Decatur Howe, engineer and statesman, and states, "His vision saw the industrial and technical possibilities of Canada; his skill and courage and drive helped to realize them." Then his picture is in the book. First there is the picture of the Governor General, followed by that of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and third is the picture of the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe). I suggest that having a book of this type dedicated to one does provide some measure of compensation for the money one might have had in other walks of life. I think there can be no difference of opinion on that.

Then, returning to the point that we must provide economic security for all the people before we pass legislation of this kind, I would remind the house of some comments made by Sir Richard Acland, now a Labour member in the British House of Commons. I believe he wrote a book during the war years entitled "What it will be like in the New Britain". In this book he suggested that "the incomes paid for the most responsible positions in the land will not be more than ten times that of the lowest paid worker". He suggested that his personal preference was a ratio of only five to one, but he thought that, for the new Britain, ten times the salary of the lowest worker should be the maximum paid. They have not reached that point in Great Britain, but they have made some progress.

Then, on his eightieth birthday Somerset Maugham had some significant comments to make regarding the change in his country. He mentioned over a radio network that——Britons are much better off now than at the turn of the century, when the poor lived in "squalid, verminous slums" and the rich ate so much "they grew enormously fat."

Mr. Speaker: Order. Sometimes I wonder if the hon. member really knows what the word "relevancy" means. I have been following his argument very closely, and I can assure him that his understanding of that word and mine must differ substantially. He is trying to make an argument to the effect that before this legislation is carried we should provide social security or payments of increased amounts to people who perhaps need increases in whatever benefits there are. In order to make that argument he quotes statements made by people in other countries showing the standard of living of people in Great Britain and elsewhere. If we were to accept this kind of argument against second reading of the bill as relevant, then it would be open to any hon. member to stand in his place and say,

"Before we pass this bill, let us give farm implements to all the farmers. We must have a general discussion on the advisability of doing that before we pass the bill."

The principle in the bill before us is the desirability of increasing the salaries of those mentioned in it, and I would ask the hon. member to take a much narrower view of the word "relevancy" and try to come somewhat closer to my own interpretation of it. I am sure he will co-operate.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier I shall try to keep within the limits and abide by your suggestion; but may I adjourn the debate now and call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: There is still a minute to go before we reach five o'clock. But if there is no objection, and hon. members wish to call it five o'clock, we might proceed on that basis.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I would consider it a favour, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member's motion to adjourn the debate were accepted. I have a long-standing engagement for this evening, and I had not expected the debate to take this length of time. If it could be adjourned, then the government would favour taking it up as the first item of business on Monday.

On motion of Mr. Nicholson the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: As it is now five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

ASSOCIATED CANADIAN TRAVELLERS

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. 170 (letter T-3 of the Senate), intituled: "An act respecting the Associated Canadian Travellers".—Mr. Hanna.

Mr. Speaker: In respect of the first order under the heading of private bills, I notice that it involves a motion that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on that bill. I notice the sponsor of the bill is not in his seat. Usually we do not proceed with second reading of a bill when the sponsor is not here, and if there is unanimous consent we will not proceed with this motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Speaker.]

GREAT LAKES REINSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 174, respecting the Great Lakes Reinsurance Company—Mr. Richard (Ottawa East)—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

COMMERCE MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. Joseph Fontaine (for Mr. Eudes) moved the second reading of Bill No. 198, respecting Commerce Mutual Fire Insurance Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: Shall all these divorce bills be considered in one motion?

Mr. Knowles: There are 32 of them this time.

Mr. W. G. Weir (for Mr. Hunter) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 263, for the relief of Henriette Duffy Cote.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 264, for the relief of Jaroslav Jandera.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 265, for the relief of Robert Alfred Denman Stencel.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 266, for the relief of Madeleine Forcier Midock.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 267, for the relief of Annie Bray Hodgson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 268, for the relief of Joseph Kovecses.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 269, for the relief of Winifred Margery Taken Dillen.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 270, for the relief of Hilda Foster Mills Henderson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 271, for the relief of Evelyn Beatrice Diggon Ferguson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 272, for the relief of Hellon May Dreany English.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 273, for the relief of Ione Larson Morris.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 274, for the relief of Marie Laurette Carmen Gamache Desmarais.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 275, for the relief of Dorothy Agnes Louise Grant Walker.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 276, for the relief of Evelyn Maud Nash Wyse.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 277, for the relief of Anita Felton Corbeil.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 278, for the relief of Sonia Lippman Cohen.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 279, for the relief of Margaret Stuart Peniston Rex.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 280, for the relief of Phyllis Adair Barker Smith.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 281, for the relief of Elizabeth Louise Emmett Lightbody.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 282, for the relief of Madeleine Victoria Coussement Rolland.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 283, for the relief of Julia Frances Finn Radcliffe.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 284, for the relief of Eileen Theresa Burgess Cowan.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 285, for the relief of Christina Emmanuel Papadakis Banks.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 286, for the relief of Grace Connolly Houde.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 287, for the relief of Marion Elizabeth Davis Esson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 288, for the relief of Morris Goldsmith.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 289, for the relief of Edith Marie Treleaven Younkie.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 290, for the relief of Irene Dorothy Haselden Munn.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 291, for the relief of Margaret Hosie Black Kirk.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 292, for the relief of Irene Bertha Kirkpatrick Faubert dit Masson.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 293, for the relief of Marie Charlotte Yvonne Gisele Giguere Larocque.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 294, for the relief of Albert Pigeon. —Mr. Hunter.

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: The business under public and private bills having been completed, the house will revert to the business under consideration at five o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Friday, February 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: I understand that we were considering clause 163 when the committee rose previously. Shall the clause carry?

On clause 163—Offensive volatile substance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the minister a question regarding a suggestion made a week ago today respecting some amendment to the section in question in order to cover the pollution of streams. I am not going to repeat the arguments advanced on the last occasion this matter was up, but generally speaking I feel that something should be done under the Criminal Code to meet a situation that will become increasingly difficult as the years go by.

We have a situation on the Ottawa river as a result of pollution that has brought representations to the governments of both the provinces of Ontario and Quebec as to the need of doing something to meet a condition which is detrimental in some cases to the health of individuals, and in other cases dangerous to fisheries.

The latest report I have from the city of Prince Albert, and other localities through which the North Saskatchewan river flows, is that the condition of the water is still such that few people dare drink any of it. The odour is beyond description. How dangerous the water will be to the individual has not been determined yet; but, Mr. Chairman, it is of interest to know that my information is that the Canadian National Railways have found that without any treatment the water of the North Saskatchewan river in its present polluted condition is a very active agent for the removal of scaling in locomotive boilers. That would seem to indicate that it would not be too congenial to the health of human beings. I think that is an understatement on my part.

However, I do rise once more to suggest to the Minister of Justice that the section in question, and the next one twice removed, be allowed to stand so that further consideration may be given by the Department of Justice to the utilization of these sections as a means whereby more control may be achieved under the law over the pollution of rivers that pass through two or more provinces. The other night the minister said the law of Manitoba was such as to meet the condition of affairs which existed on the North Saskatchewan river. We have health laws in Saskatchewan, too, but neither the province of Manitoba nor the province of Saskatchewan can do anything by the enforcement of the laws of their respective provinces to cover pollution taking place in another province.

In the United States consideration has been given to this problem under the powers contained in the statutes controlling interstate commerce or interstate transportation. The pollution of streams is relatively new. It did not exist when the Criminal Code was codified some 62 years ago. There is no power in the legislatures of the provinces, other than the legislature of the province where the pollution takes place, to punish wrongdoing consequent upon the pollution of streams.

The North Saskatchewan river is the only source of water for human consumption in the cities of Battleford and Prince Albert and the town of The Pas. The Minister of Justice stated the other night that an amendment of the nuisance sections to cover pollution would not help. Certainly it would help, provided there was evidence sufficient to pin the guilt upon those who were responsible for the pollution.

In making the appeal that the government consider amending the nuisance sections to cover the conditions which prevail today on the North Saskatchewan river at no time did I suggest, nor do I now, that the mere amending of the law would result in a conviction. But it would put teeth in the objections now being raised by the people of the city of Prince Albert and these other urban centres, and would place them in a position when responsibility could be established so they would be able to act under the law.

During the last week thousands of people in Prince Albert have become more and more dependent upon wells throughout the country. Many are having ice hauled from the South Saskatchewan river, 30 or 35 miles away. The mayor of Prince Albert, Mr. Cuelenaere, speaking in Prince Albert the other day, in reference to a statement I had made that this was indeed a national emergency which existed along the North Saskatchewan river, said it was a national disgrace that something could not be done.

Without in any way entering into a controversy as to the respective fields of federal and provincial jurisdiction in connection with rivers that flow through two or more provinces, I think we would be taking a long step forward to meet the problem of pollution, not only of the North Saskatchewan river but in other parts of this country. No one wants to interfere with legitimate industry finding a means of disposing of its waste, but no one can justify industry using the God-given streams of this country upon which the people depend for water for human consumption as a means of disposing of their waste, with the excuse that there is no place else to dispose of it.

The waste that is being poured into the river today by one industry east of Edmonton amounts to 300 gallons a minute. Until this industry started to pour this effluent into the river, the waste poured in by other industries had no effect on the water supply in Battleford and Prince Albert. The odour of the effluent from this industry corresponds to the odour of the water in Prince Albert.

That of itself is not sufficient evidence upon which to convict. I am not asking that parliament convict anyone, as that is not the power or responsibility of parliament. But I do make an appeal to the minister to permit amendments to these sections so that not only will it be an offence, as it is today, to pour certain types of fluids into streams in this country, but it will also be an offence to pour into the God-given sources of drinking water for the people anything which has the effect of denying to the people as a whole the right to use those waters.

It has been said that it would be costly for this industry east of Edmonton, Alberta, to chemically treat this effluent so it would not have a detrimental effect upon the water of the North Saskatchewan river. Surely it is no excuse for the public interest being detrimentally affected to say that an industry would find it costly. The city of Prince Albert tried to meet the situation—

Mr. Garson: Perhaps it would help my hon. friend if I were to suggest that we would have no objection at all to having clauses 163 and 165 stand. I think indeed it would be desirable to do so until the facts in this particular case of the North Saskatchewan river shall have been established. Even if there were force in my friend's argument that an amendment to the code was desirable, I think we could draft the amendments much more intelligently when we knew what the facts were.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A matter of a few days is not going to make the situation any better or any worse, since it has been going on now for 97 days. I would appreciate it if the minister in allowing these sections to stand would take up with the law officers of the crown the question of the type of amendment that might be applicable to the conditions that have existed, as the department of health has found them. I would also ask that he secure from the law officers of the crown an opinion as to the degree to which, in consequence of a river passing through two or three provinces, the jurisdiction of the dominion is thereby brought into being.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, we would deal with all these questions as a matter of course in considering this subject. In fact some have been given consideration already. But there is another aspect to this matter which I am sure the hon. member for Prince Albert would be the first to appreciate, namely that we try, in the exercise of our federal jurisdiction in these matters, to encroach as little as possible on provincial jurisdiction and provincial rights. The provinces concerned have their laws dealing with public health; and in a matter of this kind, seeing that we are seeking their co-operation in finding a solution to this problem, the least we could do would be to hear what they have to say as regards the measures to be followed.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, before this clause is allowed to stand, and I think it should be allowed to stand, I want to point out that this situation has been going on, as the hon. member for Prince Albert said, for over 90 days. It is only going to be a matter of another 35 or 45 days before the river breaks up. If something is not done before the river breaks up, then the spring floods will come down from the mountains and the chances are that the effluents which are causing the trouble are going to be diluted to such an extent that it is going to be a great deal more difficult to find out what the trouble is, particularly a month or six weeks from now. It would be easier to find out what the trouble is now.

For the life of me I cannot see why that plant could not be shut down for 24 hours. We have scientists stationed at the 14-mile spot, where they are now conducting their tests, and after 24 hours with the plant shut down, a test could be made of that water. I am satisfied it would have cleared up to that point. The plant could then be started up again and other tests taken after allowing sufficient time for the effluent to get down to that point. To me that is the only practical way of doing it. At the moment we have a number of scientists, and no doubt they are the best we have, trying to decide which of the different chemicals—and there are supposed to be some 18 or more—is causing the trouble and from which particular plant they come.

On the 15th and 16th of January a delegation from Prince Albert spent two days at Edmonton, and they discovered the source of the effluent which is causing the trouble. The health officers in Edmonton know where it is coming from because they can see it. The hon. member for Prince Albert said there was a flow of 200 gallons—

Mr. Diefenbaker: 300 gallons a minute.

Mr. Campbell: —and I have been informed that it is 2,000 gallons a minute. It has been cut down to some extent, but they can see that horrible yellow substance coming down the river. To me the manner in which they are tackling this problem is just stupid when, as I suggest, they can shut down this plant for 24 hours by which time the water will have cleared itself and then take the tests.

They had the same kind of trouble with a similar plant out in Texas. What did they do? They followed the river down, found the source of trouble, and forced that plant to build an artificial lake into which the effluent was directed. That is the solution to this problem. This plant will have to pipe the effluent to some other suitable spot. Where the plant is situated at the moment there is no room to make an artificial lake. They are in a congested area. It will certainly cost them money to deal with this problem, but what is money when the health of 35,000 people is being affected? I think it is shameful. If the Minister of Justice will do what the hon. member for Prince Albert has suggested and see if the law offices of the crown can suggest a method of dealing with the matter federally, we will be satisfied.

The action taken by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on Wednesday helped quite a bit. He sent a wire. I have read it carefully, and underneath it all it seems to me that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is beginning to feel that something has to be done. Hon. members here cannot realize the extent to which the situation is being aggravated. The people in that area are talking about sending a caravan 1,000 strong to Edmonton in order to shame and shock the people of the city into clearing up the pollution. I had a letter from another person recently which suggests that the churches of Saskatchewan should hold a day of prayer, in order to pray that the heart of the premier of Alberta might be softened, so he would do what the law of Alberta will allow him to do.

I shall be quite satisfied if the minister will do that. Let Alberta know that we are beginning to be concerned down here, and that if something is not done by their people then we are going to deal with the matter ourselves. I shall be satisfied to let this clause stand.

Clause stands.

On clause 164—No apparent means of support.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the minister would say a word by way of comment on the first three lines of this clause, which read:

(1) Every one commits a vagrancy who
(a) not having any apparent means of support
(i) lives without employment . . .

There may be some legal interpretation of that which makes it read all right, but it sounds to me as though, bearing in mind the fact that vagrancy is an offence punishable on summary conviction, it is rather strong. I take it that anyone who has plenty of money and lives without employment would not be affected, but it would apply to those who are broke and live without employment and today there are quite a few people in Canada without employment.

Mr. Garson: I believe perhaps the best way I could reply to my hon. friend would be to refer him to the manner in which the courts have interpreted this language which he finds so difficult, and I would refer him to the case of Rex v. Bassett, where Mr. Justice Osler referred to an earlier enactment which was similar in terms to the one we are discussing here and then said this:

> In my opinion before a person can be convicted of being a vagrant of this class he must have acquired in some degree a character which brings him within it, as an idle person who having no visible means of maintaining himself, i.e., not "paying his way," or being apparently able to do so, yet lives without employment.

That is, one who presumably lives by devious methods which are not apparent on the surface. That is the best manner, I think, in which to explain the language of the clause, but I might say, as my hon. friend himself may know from his reading of the newspapers from day to day, this clause is taken from a very old section which has been in the code for many, many years; and in practice the magistrates do not seem to have difficulty, such as my hon. friend has, in applying it to the cases which come before them.

Mr. Knowles: I take it that the meaning of the word "lives" is not just what is meant by "exists". Rather it implies living without having any means of living, in such a manner as to raise a question as to what is the source of one's livelihood.

Mr. Garson: I will not comment upon that. If that is what my hon. friend takes it to be I will not argue with him, but I do not say I necessarily agree with him either.

Mr. Ellis: Is there any general rule of thumb whereby a policeman can apprehend a person under this section? Is a certain amount of money required for a person to satisfy the law that he does possess visible means of support? In other words, getting down to a practical case, when would a person be without visible means of support?

Mr. Garson: Speaking as one who, I must confess, has had no experience at all in this type of criminal work, I think the essence of the matter is pretty much as I have just stated it. Perhaps I might give my hon. friend another judicial quotation which may help to elucidate the matter more than the first quotation I gave. In Rex v. Riley Judge Wurtele said:

> The mere fact of living without employment is not an offence against the law, if the person living without employment is able to do so, because he has sufficient means either belonging to himself or which are provided for him in a legitimate way. The policy of the law against idlers is to protect the public against men who, while avoiding labour and employment, live by trickery and cheating and by preying upon other men. But where a person is supported either by his own means or by his parents, it cannot be presumed that he will have to resort to unlawful means to live and that he is consequently a vagrant.

In other words, it is where a man is idle, living without visible means of support and yet living. It may not be possible in a particular case to prove any illegitimate activity against him, but the mere fact that he is able to live, presumably by illegal methods which cannot be proven, will constitute vagrancy under this section.

Mr. Ellis: It seems to me this is very vague. Ordinarily under the law if a man is accused of an offence we say that he is presumed innocent until he is proven guilty. He must be proven guilty of a specific offence. This seems very vague. If my memory serves me correctly, it seems to me there were cases prior to the last war of persons being arrested for vagrancy simply because they were without employment, were going about the country looking for work, and in some cases had no particular intent to commit any crime.

I should like to clear up this point. In the event a person without money finds himself in a strange community, perhaps in the course of looking for employment, could he be accused of vagrancy? He might be without visible means of support, without money, perhaps without a permanent place of residence. Would there be any possibility of such a person being charged with vagrancy?

Mr. Garson: It is quite impossible for me to appear here as a sort of fountain of legal opinions on hypothetical cases such as that which my hon. friend has just stated. I have indicated the circumstances under which, according to the rulings of the two judges whom I have quoted, an accused may be found guilty when charged under the section in the present code. I do not think I can illuminate the matter very much more than that. I am sure my hon. friend has read in the newspapers on numbers of occasions, if he is at all interested in items of this sort, of men or women being brought before a court under this section, and in actual point of fact the magistrates' courts do not seem to have any great difficulty in hearing such matters and in holding in proper cases that the accused is guilty and in other cases dismissing the charge.

While I do not hold myself out in any sense as an authority upon this branch of the law, I do not think a man would be brought up merely because he was looking for work. But if, for example, it is notorious in the police force that he is always being around and never working, and cannot give a satisfactory account of the means by which he carries on in that way, I suppose they would lay a charge against him. Then it would be for the magistrate to decide upon the evidence in the case that came before him whether he thought the charge had been proven.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I find it difficult to understand why so many changes were made in the vagrancy section. A reading of the marginal note would indicate that the new section 164 constitutes sections 238 and 239 of the code. I am afraid this has been widened altogether too much. First I am going to read the old section 238, which is and has been the law of vagrancy for a very long time. It reads as follows:

> Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant who,
> (a) not having any visible means of subsistence, is found wandering abroad or lodging in any barn or outhouse, or in any deserted or unoccupied building, or in any cart or wagon, or in any railway carriage or freight car, or in any railway building, and not giving a good account of himself, or who, not having any visible means of maintaining himself, lives without employment;
> (b) being able to work and thereby or by other means to maintain himself and family, wilfully refuses or neglects to do so.

Then paragraph (c) deals with indecent exhibitions. Paragraph (d) reads:

> (d) without a certificate signed . . . by a priest, clergyman or minister . . . wanders about and begs . . .
> (e) loiters on any street, road, highway or public place, and obstructs passengers . . . or by using insulting language . . .
> (g) by discharging firearms, or by riotous or disorderly conduct in any street or highway, wantonly disturbs the peace . . .
> (i) being a common prostitute or night walker, wanders in the fields, public streets or highways . . .
> (j) having no peaceable profession or calling to maintain himself by, for the most part supports himself by gaming or crime, or by the avails of prostitution.

In the sincere desire to unify, the section now reads:

> (1) Every one commits vagrancy who
> (a) not having any apparent means of support

I think that is widening the law of vagrancy to too great an extent. In an endeavour to unify, the law of vagrancy will now cover anyone who, not having any apparent means of support, lives without employment. I believe that goes too far. I think it could be used in its new form in a manner that would be unjust and unfair.

Mr. Garson: Would my hon. friend care to say in what way that paragraph differs from 238(a) which he quoted before?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Because the words "is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant" are omitted. The authorities to which the minister referred were based on the words "loose, idle or disorderly". The omission of those words—

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look he will see that the existing law reads:

> Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant . . .

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Garson: The vagrant is the loose, idle or disorderly person.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With due respect and, as the minister would say, after reflection, the word "vagrant" will be interpreted as it always has been in the courts, according to the ejusdem generis rule, and as incorporated in vagrancy, the loose, idle or disorderly qualities.

I am very much concerned about this section in its present form. I see no reason why the experience of years which required that the crown should prove that a person was indeed, by his conduct, a loose, idle or disorderly person, should not be used today. I feel that the courts will conclude that any person who does not appear to be working at the moment, and who has no apparent means of support, will thereby be guilty of vagrancy. I would suggest the addition of the words "loose, idle or disorderly person" because as you know, sir, vagrancy is one of those sections that is too often used to convict. I do not want to see, and I am sure parliament does not want to see, the offence of vagrancy extended beyond what it is today.

This brings to mind one further reference that I am going to make at this time. In the general amendments to the Criminal Code something should be done to remedy the situation which results in a jail sentence in default of the payment of a fine. Under our law many persons go to jail when a conviction is registered because the alternative is jail, and the person is unable to pay the fine. This reform was brought in some years ago in Britain, and it has resulted in tens of thousands of those who were unable to pay fines, and who would otherwise have gone to jail, being freed from the stigma that falls upon a person who is sent to jail. I feel that in this section the door will be opened too widely to the conviction of those who have no apparent means of support, and live without employment.

One does not want to bring up personal examples, but I know I can say with authority of personal knowledge that there have been occasions when members of this house would have been in that position. They were not loose, idle and disorderly; they just could not get jobs. They were living, for the moment, without employment. They did not have money in their pockets. I believe that if we do not maintain the present provisions of the law of vagrancy we will make it, as I said once before, a passport to jail because of poverty. I would suggest that consideration should be given to adding to this section the provision that everyone who is a loose, idle or disorderly person commits vagrancy if he does those things enumerated in paragraphs (a) to (e).

I find it difficult to understand why, in the interests of comprehensiveness and unity, these words were removed. If I know anything about the authorities in the past, on each occasion the judges have stated that an isolated instance is not sufficient to make a person a loose, idle or disorderly person. That is a state of mind that must be continuing. The omission of these words makes it possible for a person who is not working at any particular time, and therefore apparently living without employment, to be brought before the courts and charged with being a vagrant. As I see it that is dangerous, and I suggest reconsideration of this section.

Mr. MacInnis: I am in complete agreement, Mr. Chairman, with the hon. member for Prince Albert. I am glad that a person who has a good knowledge of the law can explain these things, because there are those of us who, no matter how well intentioned we might be, are unable to do so. I found that when we were sitting on the parliamentary committee last year there was a member who was of great help to us because of his legal training.

I think it would be a mistake to have the offence described as not having any apparent means of support or living without employment. These days a great many people live without employment because they cannot get employment. For that reason I would be glad to have the minister give consideration to inserting the words mentioned by the hon. member for Prince Albert.

I should like to know what is meant by paragraph (c) which reads:

—being a common prostitute or night walker is found in a public place and does not, when required, give a good account of herself;

What kind of account would a person in those circumstances give that would be considered good? It occurs to me such a person would find it very difficult to give a good account of herself. I am wondering just what those words may mean, and just exactly what kind of account such a person would have to give to satisfy the law enforcement authorities.

Mr. Henderson: I should like to say a few words on this section, if I may. First of all I might say that I am quite sure no one wants to place the name of vagrant on any citizen, especially in a civilized community. I do not think any police officer would like to take someone from his community and put him in jail without real cause. I feel that our police, no matter at what level in Canada today, properly administered will protect us so that no one will be picked up without good reason.

I think there is another point. Today we hear from all sides of this chamber and from various organizations that we want to protect this country from communism, which we do not want here. This might be a very good section that we could use, with discrimination, to rightfully pick up certain persons within the confines of the law.

We must give the police every opportunity to do their part in the administration of justice in our country. This is particularly true because at the present time Canada is growing very rapidly and is expanding industrially. There is considerable activity in housing and other things of that nature. Therefore we must put ourselves in the position of giving those who are going to administer the law in these communities the best opportunity to do it properly. If we read clause 164(1)(a)(i) we see that it says:

Every one commits vagrancy who, not having any apparent means of support, lives without employment.

The protective word in the subparagraph is the word "lives" because, as I understand it, it would not be the fact that for one day he did not have food; rather the reference would be to the fact that he lived over a period of time, and with the qualification as set out in the section, "not having any apparent means of support".

Therefore I do submit that we would not allow a person to go on living without employment over a period of time, such as is implied in the word "lives", without any apparent means of support. If one of our fellow citizens is doing that it might be well to have him brought before a court so that his character and past activities could be investigated. In many instances there would be no other means of investigating such circumstances other than by bringing him before a court, because there might be certain activities he had been carrying on that could not be investigated. I feel that the clause as it stands, for the reasons I have given, would cover what we are trying to do in this revision of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Fulton: I venture into this matter with some diffidence because, like the Minister of Justice, I have not had any experience in cases under this particular clause. But I wonder if the minister would not agree with me that there is some force in the argument that what is being done now is changing the offence from one of being to one of doing.

In other words, previously the offence was one of being a loose, idle or disorderly person, or vagrant. Now the offence is specifically made that of doing something. Previously, in order to establish that a person was a vagrant—that is, that he was guilty of the offence of being—it was necessary to allege and show a course of conduct. But it was still necessary to establish from that course of conduct that he was a loose, idle or disorderly person, or vagrant.

In other words, you had to establish two things; first, that he had been guilty of a certain course of action or conduct, and then, based upon such conduct and upon his general character, that he was a loose, idle or disorderly person, or vagrant. Now you do not have to establish that he is a loose, idle or disorderly person. You merely have to establish a certain set of facts with respect to conduct, one of which is that he lives without employment. You do not have to go any further than that to prove that he is a loose, idle or disorderly person, and he may stand convicted on the mere fact that he lives without employment.

I base that argument upon the authority of Tremeear, page 256, where it says:

> Sections 238 and 239 are unusual, in that the offence here dealt with consists not in doing, but in being. The doing of one or other of the things specified in section 238 makes the person a vagrant, but is not in itself the offence.

I couple with that a citation from the supplement to Tremeear, which contains the recent case of Rex v. Konkin (1949) 2 Western Weekly Reports, at page 1225. This is a direct quotation from the judgment in that case, as follows:

> The essence of the offence of being a loose, idle or disorderly person lies in a course of conduct. This may not be proven satisfactorily without evidence anterior to the particular date and consistent with the appellant's conduct on that date. The account must be "good" in the sense that it negatives the existence of the other ingredients (viz. wandering abroad and lacking visible means of subsistence).

So it seems to me that case establishes clearly that not only must one prove certain conduct or action, but he must also prove that this conduct, together with the accused's general character, make him a vagrant. But if an accused can establish that he is of good character, and his antecedent history negatives the assumption of vagrancy, that is a good defence to the action.

I do not think that defence will be available any more, because he no longer has to be proved to be a loose, idle or disorderly person, or a vagrant, but merely has to be proven to have indulged in a certain course of conduct as set out in the clause. So I think one of the elements of the offence has been removed by the very substantial change in the wording of the new proposed clause.

Mr. Garson: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, we might call it six o'clock. I was going to say that I think the hon. member for Kamloops has provided the answer to the argument of the hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, no, I have not.

Mr. Garson: And I shall explain why when we resume at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On clause 164—No apparent means of support.

The Chairman: We were dealing with clause 164 when the committee rose at six o'clock. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute; we were discussing this at six o'clock.

Mr. Garson: One of the purposes in the drafting of this new consolidated code was to condense what over the course of some 60 years had become a pretty voluminous and wordy document. In the terms of reference to the commission the members were specifically instructed to bring the code into as short a compass as possible, consistent with preserving its meaning, and that is what they have endeavoured to do in this section which is now before the committee. If any hon. member wishes to compare the extent of the present section with sections 238 and 239, which it replaces, he will see, at least in my judgment, that very much the same ground has been covered with fewer words.

In this clause, concerning which so much discussion took place this afternoon, "every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant" was apparently regarded by the commission and by the legislative bodies which have dealt with it since as being a synonym for vagrant. Hon. members will observe that in the corresponding section of the existing code, and in the case law which has been decided upon this corresponding section on every occasion on which this term has been used they include the whole phrase, "loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant". Since one of the main purposes in redrafting the consolidated code was to get away from this voluminous and archaic language, the members of the royal commission employed just the one term "vagrancy" in this section.

While I have the greatest of respect for the views expressed by those who took part in the debate this afternoon, especially the hon. member for Prince Albert, whose experience in this branch of the law far exceeds my own or, to put it in stronger terms, that of most other hon. members of this house, I am inclined to think that perhaps Chief Justice Martin of Saskatchewan, who was the chairman of the commission, Mr. Justice Fernand Choquette of the Quebec superior appeal court, the court of Queen's Bench of Quebec, and Judge Robert Forsyth, the senior county court judge of the county of York, all of whom have had a great deal of experience in the interpretation of the code, are men whose authority in this matter would not suffer in comparison even with the great authority of the hon. member for Prince Albert.

Therefore I am rather on the horns of a dilemma. I do not want to win an argument; I want to have a good code, and if the use of the words "loose, idle or disorderly person" would be conducive to that end I would be quite willing to accept them and put them in the relevant sections of Bill 7.

I do not think the members of the commission, who are all conscientious people, men who worked very hard on this task for a long period of time, would have drafted clause 164 in its present form if they felt that in doing so they were exceeding their instructions by making any substantial change in the law. Personally I would favour adhering to the language which they have employed, but rather than spend a very long time labouring a point of this kind, I would prefer to employ this phrase "loose, idle or disorderly person", if it will make all the hon. members of the committee who have been arguing along these lines feel that we shall have a better clause if we put these magic words back into it.

If the feeling is very strong on the part of hon. members I would wish to meet them. On the other hand I must confess that I would very much prefer to adhere to the language which was approved by the commission and by all of the legislative bodies which have considered this clause. I am in the hands of the committee in that regard; but I do not think that the difference between those two choices is important enough for us to spend a great deal more time upon it.

Mr. Knowles: May I suggest to the minister that if he finds himself on the horns of a dilemma in trying to choose between the views of Chief Justice Martin of Saskatchewan and the hon. member for Prince Albert, both very eminent men in their profession, he might well consider the views that laymen have expressed. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway put it very clearly this afternoon. If I remember correctly, I believe I was the one who started the discussion on this section, by asking whether its language did not seem a bit wide. It strikes me that the plain, ordinary citizen, taking the plain ordinary meaning that is in these words, would feel that this would make it possible to lay a charge of vagrancy against people on very flimsy grounds. In my view, the minister would do well to insert that phrase in the clause at the appropriate place.

Mr. Fulton: I am quite sure everyone will approve what the minister said and the attitude with which he is approaching the matter. But for the reasons given this afternoon by the hon. member for Prince Albert and, with some deference, the argument advanced by myself and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others, I feel that it is appropriate to urge that the words "being a loose, idle or disorderly person" should continue to form part of this section so that it will be necessary, in addition to proving the allegations with respect to the condition of the person, to show that he is a loose, idle, or disorderly being.

I had drafted an amendment, but I do not want to thrust it forward if the minister has one ready which might be in better form. I was going to suggest, and I put this forward only as a suggestion, that the clause be amended by inserting in subsection 1(a) immediately before the word "not" the following words:

being a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant and

The section would then read:

(1) Every one commits vagrancy who
(a) being a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant and not having any apparent means of support

Then follow the other paragraphs. I put that forward only as a suggestion, because I think it emerged from the discussion this afternoon that it was felt, particularly with respect to paragraph (a), that the use of the words in question should be continued, that is the words "loose, idle or disorderly person." That is why I drafted my suggestion.

Mr. Garson: One of the difficulties about this matter is the multiplicity of opinions. As I understand the point made this afternoon by the hon. member for Prince Albert it was that he preferred to revert to the language of section 238 from which clause 164 was taken.

Mr. Fulton: I would agree with that. I did not think the minister would be prepared to go quite that far, but if he will I would agree entirely.

Mr. Garson: I was wondering if it might be achieved in this way:

164. (1) Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person and commits vagrancy who—

Then follows paragraph (a) and so on.

Mr. Fulton: That is right.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid it is going to be most difficult to get a wording with which everyone will agree. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will look at section 238 from which this clause 164 was taken, what we are discussing is a change in the wording from the way it stood in that section to the way it stands in this present clause 164.

Mr. Knowles: May I draw the attention of the minister to the difference between section 238 as it formerly read and what the minister now proposes. The section reads:

Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant who,
(a) not having any visible means of subsistence, is found wandering abroad—

If you simply put those preliminary words of section 238 into clause 164 you produce this result: Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant who, not having any apparent means of support, lives without employment. That is defining as a loose, idle or disorderly person anyone who just happens to be broke and without a job.

Mr. Fulton: I could not possibly accept the minister's suggested amendment.

Mr. Garson: If I may deal with these matters one at a time, referring to the remarks just made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, if he will look at the end of paragraph (a) of the present section 238 he will see that it is a long paragraph containing a great quantity of language. It was to avoid a repetition of these great quantities of language that an attempt was made by the commission to cast the substance of that section into a more condensed form.

If my hon. friend will look at the bottom of (a) of 238 he will see, "not having any visible means of maintaining himself, lives without employment". That is the language which is carried into the new clause 164. The hon. member for Prince Albert I must confess speaks on this matter with a great deal of authority, because he has had considerable experience in this field of law. He contended that the case law which had been decided on the term "loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant" might be undone if we were to change that phrase. I do not agree with his view in that regard, and I have cited these other gentlemen who apparently do not agree with him.

On the other hand I cannot see that any great harm can come about through retaining these words. They are only five or six more words. That was my reason for suggesting that we might use the same phrase upon which these various cases referred to by the hon. member for Prince Albert had been decided and say, as is said in the present section 238:

Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant who—

—and then go on with the section as it stands. Let us be clear upon one point. There is no possibility whatever of meeting all the varied views that have been expressed during this debate. We have to have one clause 164: we cannot adopt simultaneously half a dozen variations of that clause. In what I am saying now I am trying to go a considerable distance, I must confess without any great amount of conviction upon my part, to meet the views of the committee, and in particular this argument of the hon. member for Prince Albert to the effect that we would be undoing case law by using a different phrase.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, as I said before, everyone must appreciate the effort being made by the minister to meet our views. It is therefore with some diffidence—I ask the minister to believe that those words are used in their exact literal meaning—that I advance the suggestion that his amendment does not actually meet the point of view put forward. It seems to me that the suggestion which has been made would in fact create two offences, or a double-barrelled offence. As I understand the minister's amendment the clause would then read:

Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person and commits vagrancy who—

Is that correct?

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: That would mean that you would be making the fact of living without apparent means of support both the offence of vagrancy and the definition of a loose, idle or disorderly person.

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend answer me this question?

Mr. Fulton: I will try.

Mr. Garson: The present section 238 says:

Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant who—

That loose, idle or disorderly person is not a vagrant, because it says "every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant" who does this, who does that, who does so-and-so. When he does those things he becomes, in the terms of the section, a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant.

The commission regarded that as being slightly ridiculous, but since the offence was in a certain course of conduct which was prohibited by the section it was not necessary to cart with you as you went along all these words. "Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person"—

Mr. Fulton: That is exactly the point.

Mr. Garson: Let me finish it.

Mr. Fulton: You asked me a question; I had the floor.

The Chairman: The Minister of Justice has the floor.

Mr. Fulton: I conceded the floor to permit the minister to ask a question.

The Chairman: The Minister of Justice has the floor.

Mr. Garson: The only point of order I raise is that I be permitted to finish the sentence.

Mr. Fulton: You were asking a question and I conceded the floor for that purpose.

Mr. Garson: In section 238, the existing section, there were listed under subsections (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), (i) and (j) different kinds of actions which were prohibited, and at the head of all of them this statement is made in plain terms:

Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant who, —does any of the acts under subsections (a) to (j). What the commission set out to do in the new clause 164 was to define this substance in a more condensed form namely that everyone commits vagrancy who does any of the acts set out in subsections (a) to (c) of clause 164. Now, according to opposition argument there is some magic merit in using six words to refer to vagrancy. I do not think personally that there is. But if there is some advantage to the accused arising out of the decisions that have been made by the courts upon this long phrase which it is desirable to retain, I am merely proposing that, in an endeavour to meet the views of those who have suggested during this debate that there is such an advantage, and in order to have everyone in the committee feel that we are trying to be fair to the accused and not taking away any possible rights which he may have—if, as I say, there is magic in this long phrase in the present section that "Every one is a loose, idle, or disorderly person or vagrant who" and so on, then let us use it. I do not know how much further than that we can go in order to meet the views of the hon. members for Prince Albert, Winnipeg North Centre, Kamloops, and half a dozen other hon. members, especially if, as it appears, they do not agree with one another.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: But we do. Mr. Chairman, that is the longest question I have ever heard even from the Minister of Justice. If you recollect, he rose to his feet and interrupted me to ask if he could put a question. I consented, and he has now gone on for some five minutes. In the course of his purported question he has laid his finger on the whole weakness of this case, because what we are objecting to is the wording in the proposed clause, which substantially changes the law and makes inapplicable case law previously decided. What the minister has said, and it is very true, is that this clause and his proposed amendment to it try to carry into force the objects of the commission.

Our point is that the decision of the commission went beyond the terms of their reference and the scope of their authority to the extent of effecting a change of substance in the law. The minister said in the course of his argument on this question, and I have taken down his words, that the commission decided, in accordance with the law based on the present code, that the offence is a certain course of conduct. Case law based on the present code is that the offence is an offence of being a vagrant, not a course of conduct. The whole point at issue here—

Mr. Garson: But—

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister going to ask another question? If he is I do not think I can permit him, because I cannot carry on my argument with five-minute interruptions.

Mr. Garson: I was going to contradict your statement.

Mr. Fulton: The minister says he did not state the law correctly and I am prepared to agree, but—

Mr. Garson: I was going to contradict your statement.

Mr. Fulton: My statement on law is based upon the authority of Tremeear and on the cases quoted in Tremeear to which I have already referred the minister, at page 256. Sections 238 and 239 are unusual in that the offences which were dealt with consist not in doing but in being, in other words not doing certain acts which create the offence of being a vagrant. That is followed up by a multitude of cases which are cited. The minister has said the commission decided that the offence is a certain course of conduct. That is diametrically opposite to the present state of the law, so we could not have clearer proof that the proposed clause 164 changes the law as it has been in existence under section 238 for many years.

The minister's proposed amendment, I regret to say—I do not want to use strong language, but as I started to say when the minister rose to ask a question, we do appreciate that he is trying to accommodate us. I can only repeat very briefly—

An hon. Member: And make it brief.

Mr. Fulton: —that the proposed amendment by the minister is the change we are trying to eliminate, in that it changes an element in the offence, namely of having carried on a certain course of conduct and not being a vagrant.

The minister has said that he has proposed his amendment because he thinks it comes closest to meeting the views of the hon. members for Prince Albert, Winnipeg North Centre, Vancouver-Kingsway and myself. I have had the opportunity for only a very brief discussion with my colleagues on this side of the house, but I formed the impression that my proposed amendment comes much closer to being a common denominator of our views. I therefore move that clause 164 be amended by inserting in subsection (a) (i) immediately before the word "not" the following words:

Being a loose, idle or disorderly person, and

The clause would then read:

Every one commits vagrancy who
(a) being a loose, idle or disorderly person, and not having any apparent means of support
(i) lives without employment

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) negatived: Yeas, 20; nays, 54.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fulton: On the clause as a whole I want to make one comment. I brought the matter up earlier, and it has been mentioned several times in the course of this discussion. I hope I shall not have to comment on it again. I have heard on a number of occasions suggestions that lawyers like changes in the code. What we are trying to do, have tried to do and will try to do from time to time throughout the discussion of the code is prevent changes in the substance of the law, because I know very well that changes in the substance of the law are going to result in an immense amount of litigation with great inconvenience to clients and expense to persons who would otherwise have had good defence in law as it previously existed.

Indeed, I am a little bit tired of hearing some hon. members, I suppose in an endeavour to score a point, sneer at the lawyer. Our object is to endeavour to retain the established, clearly understood, and frequently interpreted applied form of wording. The reason we do so is that these words are clearly understood by the courts. Their application is hallowed by long usage, and lawyers are able to advise clients on where they stand under the law as it exists.

What is being done too frequently throughout this bill is not a process of codification and consolidation but changes in the substance of the law which are going to cause great expense to litigants amongst whom I hope the hon. member who made the interjection will never find himself, because it will cost him a lot more after the code has been changed than it ever would have cost him before.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Whenever I hear a group of lawyers arguing about the law I understand why that character said the law is an ass, and I wonder sometimes if it is the law that is the ass.

Mr. Fulton: You are not putting yourself in a very much better light than the law.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Let us take section 164 and try to see what the first part of it means. I suggest that it means nothing whatever.

Mr. Fulton: It meant something in the old form.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I doubt whether it meant anything in the old form, and I would remind the hon. member for Kamloops that under the old form plenty of people were arrested who should not have been arrested. If he does not know that—

Mr. Fulton: There will be far more now.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): All right; just a moment. You had the floor for a long time.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am going to suggest this view, that the way it is worded it means that we actually consider that someone who lives without employment is committing a crime. What we really think is that somebody who lacks employment and visible means of support may commit a crime. That is what we are afraid of. The same applies to the second part. We do not really believe that someone who is found wandering abroad is ipso facto a criminal. We are afraid he may be wandering abroad in order to commit some crime.

All right. Let us wait until he commits a crime. Let us set out quite clearly what the crimes are. In the remainder of this section a few crimes are set out such as begging from door to door or in a public place, or being a common prostitute or night walker. I do not know if the minister can tell us what the difference is, whether it is the day shift and the night shift.

Mr. Garson: I am not an authority upon that subject.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): It is a crime for a woman to be a common prostitute or night walker found in a public place and not, when required, give a good account of herself. Then it also deals with a person who supports himself in whole or in part by gaming or crime. These are the things about which we are really concerned and against which we should have protection.

I suggest that we could well wipe out the whole of paragraph (a) without in any way endangering our control over such people, and by wiping out that paragraph we shall obviate the very real possibility that in time of depression we will again have unfortunate men slapped into jail on a charge of vagrancy merely in order to dispose of them.

Mr. MacInnis: I think what we have to be careful about here is to see that we do not make the fact that a person has no visible means of support a crime. The minister shakes his head, but let me read this as it appears to a layman. It reads:

> Every one commits vagrancy who

[Mr. Fulton.]

It seems that all the other things mentioned here as crimes are predicated upon not having any apparent means of support. That is the way it appears to me.

> Every one commits vagrancy who
> (a) not having any apparent means of support
> (i) lives without employment, or
> (ii) is found wandering abroad or trespassing and does not, when required, justify his presence in the place where he is found . . .

It is obvious that if he had some apparent means of support these things would not apply to him. The only time I was ever in court was when I went bail for a man who was accused of vagrancy. I think the case was appealed from the magistrate to the county court, and I thought the man was very lucky to come before the judge he did because he would not hear any evidence except with respect to whether the man had visible or apparent means of support and whether or not he was wandering about as set out in the old sections 238 and 239. But I do insist that what makes one a vagrant under this clause is having no apparent means of support. A person is also liable to arrest for doing any of these other things. There are many people who are idle but who have the means to live, and this would not apply to them at all. At this particular time when unemployment is increasing I want to be sure we do not make unemployment and want a crime.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It seems to me this section certainly needs modifying. I think the minister will agree that no matter what explanation is given here by the minister or by any other member of the house, such explanations will have no effect when the clause comes before the courts. It is their duty to take it exactly as it is written. While I do not profess to be a lawyer, the words seem very clear to me. It says:

> Every one commits vagrancy who
> (a) not having any apparent means of support

The only evidence that might be heard would be as to whether or not the man was employed and whether or not he had any visible means of support. That is certainly what it indicates, and no other crime would be involved before the court except the charge of vagrancy for having no apparent means of support. If this provision is really enforced it seems to me the courts will be overrun, because now we have the beginning of a rather large unemployment problem. Unemployment means exactly what it says here, that the man has no means of support, and he could not get any means of support no matter how he tried because a job just is not available. This seems to me to be a very vicious section. If it does not mean that, I am sure the committee will be interested to learn what the minister's interpretation is.

Mr. Barnett: I should like to say a word on the same point before the minister replies. I am aware that some considerable time earlier in these proceedings the minister attempted to explain that these words "living without employment" did not mean what they say. At least that is my reaction to it. I also recall that earlier in the discussion on this bill he suggested that one of its purposes was to attempt to put in language which the average citizen could understand more easily the catalogue of crimes that we are prone to commit. I think the reaction of a number of those who have spoken makes it clear that, apart from some of the experts on the matter, the phrase "lives without employment" does create a very grave doubt in the minds of some of us about accepting the clause as it stands.

I think it also goes without saying, as one or two other members have mentioned, that a recollection of what occurred in the early 1930's is fixed very firmly in the minds of some of us. I know I have a recollection of people telling me their personal experiences with respect to how the clause was used, or the threat of the clause was used, to keep men moving from pillar to post across the country. Certainly when we come to a revision of the code it seems to me we should make very sure that no similar use of this clause is made in this country in the future.

With respect to the meaning of the words "living without employment", the question that has been in the back of my mind for some time is, if the meaning of that clause is as restricted as the minister suggested, why is it necessary to have subsection 3, which states that the provision shall not apply to the aged or infirm? I interpret that to mean it does not apply to those who are unemployable in the ordinary sense of the word. The fact that this subsection has been inserted would indicate to me that anyone who is in normal health and in normal working years is liable under this clause if he happens to be living without employment at any particular time.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, first of all I think I should reaffirm for the fourth or fifth time that this clause which is before the committee is the expression of the substance of the present sections 238 and 239 that have been in the code for many decades. We are not, therefore, embarking here on some new, untried law. As the hon. member for Prince Albert said this afternoon, this law has been interpreted on many occasions before the courts of nearly every province of Canada. I do not mean the magistrates' courts; I mean that a conviction which had been registered against an accused in the magistrates' court has been carried to the courts of appeal. The law has been argued, and the case reported in the case books.

The very case the hon. member for Kamloops cited, I thought inaptly to his argument, just before the dinner recess, that of Rex v. Konkin, decided in 1949 by Mr. Justice O'Halloran of the court of appeal of British Columbia, stated this:

> The essence of the offence of being a loose, idle or disorderly person lies in a course of conduct.

My hon. friend says it is when they do something. It is not only necessary to do something but they have to keep on in that course in order to fall within the terms of the section. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is correct when he says that one of the ingredients of the offence is being without employment. That is quite true, but merely being without employment does not constitute the offence. The offence is this course of conduct, and as Mr. Justice O'Halloran says:

> This may not be proven satisfactorily without evidence anterior to the particular date . . .

That is, if they pick up John Jones and charge him with vagrancy, then bring him in and say he was wandering around, they cannot convict him without proving a course of conduct of the same sort before that particular occasion on which he was picked up.

Mr. Fulton: That is under the present law which makes you prove him to be a loose, idle—

Mr. Garson: True that is under the present law; but I would affirm to my hon. friend that the new law does not make any change at all in that regard. Let me take another case to illustrate what I mean. Take the converse of what I have said. Here is a case where a man was brought up and was acquitted. This is the case of Rex v. Law, 1924, 42 Canadian Criminal Cases, 124. The judge states:

> It shocks my sense of justice to hold that a respectable citizen, and there is nothing in the evidence before me to show that accused is not a respectable citizen, should be dubbed a vagrant simply because he had blocked the sidewalk through causing a disturbance . . .

Apparently this man had been raising a little ruckus. They had arrested him and brought him along to court. His case came before the judge, and the judge said it shocked his sense of justice that he should be dubbed a vagrant simply because he had blocked a sidewalk through causing a disturbance.

> I feel that it could not have been the intention of the parliament of Canada to brand a man as a vagrant, unless there was something else to show that he was a loose, idle or disorderly person.

There is another case in my own province of Manitoba, a decision of Chief Justice Prendergast, in which he says:

> The terms, "loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant", convey, in their ordinary meaning, if not necessarily a uniform method of living or a constant habit, at least a condition or manner of behaviour of some duration, and something more at all events than a single act, or even occasional acts spread over a somewhat considerable space of time.

So the manner in which this section of long standing in our law has been interpreted by the courts I think protects the accused against any of the results which have been described by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway or the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. Fulton: But you are taking out the words "loose, idle or disorderly person", so you do not have to prove him to be that sort of person any more.

Mr. Garson: I suggest to my hon. friend if he examines all the cases carefully he will see that in every instance they were decided by a course of conduct, and they will continue to be decided by a course of conduct when referring to the gentleman as a vagrant.

Mr. Fulton: You do not have to refer to him as a vagrant. All you have to say is that he committed vagrancy.

Mr. Garson: Put it in any language my hon. friend wants to specify, but he does not commit vagrancy except on the basis of a course of conduct.

Mr. Fulton: Not any more.

Mr. Garson: I prefer, if my hon. friend will not object to my saying so, the view of the chief justice of Saskatchewan, Mr. Justice Choquette, and Judge Forsyth, to that of my hon. friend.

Mr. Michener: May I ask the minister a question? It is quite possible that the course of conduct of which the minister speaks could be completely orderly. There is no need for the course of conduct to be disorderly in any sense. It seems to me that is the point we have in issue here. A person might have no money and no job, and even though he is a law-abiding, respectable citizen in the sense that he is not offending against any particular section of the code, just because he has no apparent means of support he might be liable to prosecution for vagrancy. It seems to me that is the difficulty under this section. I suppose this is a section which is used to hold people who are suspected of crime when there is no other means of booking them, as the policeman says, and keeping them until some investigation is made. It is conceivable that injustices might occur, as I suppose have occurred to many people in the past when they have been booked as vagrants when they were simply vagrants in the sense that they were drifters, hoboes or perhaps simply unemployed.

Mr. Garson: I would challenge my hon. friend—I say this most amiably—to cite any case decided under this section in which the condition of which he spoke was the basis for successful prosecution.

Mr. Michener: That is, where the conduct was quite orderly?

Mr. Knowles: What about a defeated M.P. the day after an election?

Mr. MacInnis: There seems to be a very keen difference of opinion here, and there must be at least some basis for it. Is this clause changed so much from sections 238 and 239 that the appeal court decisions mentioned by the Minister of Justice do not now apply?

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. MacInnis: I understand the minister to say no and the hon. member for Kamloops to say yes. I am on the horns of a dilemma, as between two very prominent lawyers. But what I was going to suggest was that I found during the sittings of the parliamentary committee that the minister was very anxious to do the right thing. He did not take the position that he and his advisers knew all the law. Questions were referred back time and again. I suggest that this be allowed to stand and that, in view of the debate that has taken place this evening, the minister should look over it again and see if he can find an amendment which, while perhaps not satisfying everyone, would satisfy at least the thinking people in the chamber.

Mr. Low: Would the minister entertain a motion to delete clause (1) (a) so that it would read:

> Every one commits vagrancy who, not having any apparent means of support, is found wandering abroad or trespassing and does not, when required, justify his presence in the place where he is found.

The chief bone of contention seems to be the question of living without employment. Well, I do not see any particular reason why a fellow should not live without employment, if he can, without being accused of committing some offence.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, let us be a little bit realistic about this. The living without employment in my view does not mean being out of work in the ordinary sense. The clause is aimed at the kind of criminal characters against whom the police may not be able to prove any offence, who are there, moving around without employment—perhaps a man who is living on the avails of prostitution, but against whom that fact cannot be proved.

Mr. Low: But it does not say that.

Mr. Garson: That is exactly what it does say. He is round and about, to use one of Damon Runyon's terms.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): If he had money in his pocket you could not convict him as a vagrant.

Mr. Garson: But in these cases, if we are to expect the police to protect society to a reasonable degree we have to leave some measure of discretion with them, and with the courts. If we were bringing into the house tonight a new section in these terms, that had not stood the test of time not for years but for decades, I would expect to meet some scepticism; for I admit there may have been cases with the judgments of the courts in which not everyone would agree.

But this is not a new provision; it has been in the law for decades, and I do not think very many instances can be shown where it has worked unsatisfactorily. I asked the hon. member for St. Paul's to cite one case in which the mere act of being respectably without employment had resulted in a man being brought before the court, and I doubt very much whether any such cases can be shown except, of course, those cases where, having been brought before the courts, they have been acquitted because the charge of vagrancy could not be proved against them.

I cited one of those myself. This was the case of a man who had created a disturbance, was brought up before the court and charged with vagrancy. The judge said, "No, so far as I know this man is perfectly respectable. The mere fact that he created a disturbance does not in my view entitle the crown to convict him of this charge."

Mr. Fulton: That is under the old law.

Mr. Garson: And I say to my hon. friend that I do not think the courts would undertake to interpret the new law differently.

Mr. Fulton: They have in a number of other cases.

Mr. Garson: We will deal with that when we come to those alleged cases. But if my hon. friend cannot establish it any better than he has established this one, it will not prove much.

Mr. Fulton: It was necessary to amend section 116, and even now it is still new law. It is absolutely necessary to go into this in detail. If the minister is disposed to have it stand, then I shall not press the point. However, I am prepared to make an argument, perhaps a detailed one, and one which will take some time. It is an argument which I think should be made.

I appreciate what the minister said, that he agrees with the view of the commission. And he is quite entitled to do so, just as I am quite entitled, with deference to the minister and the commission, to say that I do not accept that view. I feel so definite about it that I feel I must make an argument on the clause. I believe an argument can be made, and that it would be a good argument. As I say, I do not wish to make it tonight if the minister is disposed to let the clause stand. I can assure him, however, that I feel the argument must be made.

Mr. Garson: Of course I would like very much to hear my hon. friend's argument, because his arguments are always so interesting. But the amendment which my hon. friend moved was defeated. We all really want to get a good code, there is no question about it. We do not want to win arguments; we want a good code, so would my hon. friend be prepared to accept the suggestion I made a moment ago, of adding the words "loose, idle or disorderly person"?

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Garson: If it would make my hon. friend any happier I would be glad to include those words.

Mr. Fulton: I am afraid they would be added in the wrong place and would have the opposite effect to what we are trying to do.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at clause 164 he will see it is drafted so that the first five words are "every one commits vagrancy who" and then following those words we have paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e). Now, if my hon. friend adds these other words as he proposes to do—that is, adds them only in (a)—it leaves them absent from (b), (c), (d) and (e).

Mr. Fulton: Yes, but the others are specific offences.

Mr. Garson: Probably so, but—

Mr. Fulton: Begging, or being a common prostitute; no question about those things being specific.

Mr. Garson: But what possible difference could there be? My hon. friend gets it in (a) in any event, and that is what he was seeking by his own amendment. He also gets it in the others, as well; and I think it makes for a more orderly section. I have checked this with our drafting officers and they tell me it would be workable. I am prepared to offer that amendment to the clause, if there is agreement. But if I do not have agreement all we can do is listen to my hon. friend's argument and then have a vote on it.

Mr. Knowles: There will be more after he is through.

Mr. Garson: I hope my hon. friends are not trying to frighten me into submission by threatening to argue interminably.

Mr. Knowles: No, but we think the matter is serious.

Mr. Fulton: I hope the minister is still open to persuasion. I am sure he is, for the reasons advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and in the light of his attitude in committee last year. I shall try to make my argument, but I regret that it has to be somewhat detailed.

The minister has said in effect that under the new proposed clause 164 it will still be necessary to prove a course of conduct. That phrase has been used a number of times, so I would like to look at it in some detail. As I understand it, the words "course of conduct" under the present section 238 are used in the sense of a consistent pattern of conduct extending over some considerable time. I refer there particularly to the case the minister thought I inaptly cited but which I think I aptly cited, namely Rex v. Konkin, where the words of Mr. Justice O'Halloran clearly prove that what is contemplated is a pattern of conduct extending over some considerable period of time, because he said:

> The essence of the offence of being a loose, idle or disorderly person lies in a course of conduct. This may not be proven satisfactorily without evidence anterior to the particular date and consistent with the appellant's conduct on that date.

So under the present section, then, you have the words:

> Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant—

But then in subsection (a) we have:

> not having any visible means of subsistence . . . or who, not having any visible means of maintaining himself, lives without employment.

Now, the cases, some of which have been cited previously and others to which I want to refer my hon. friend without reading them in detail, establish clearly, it seems to me, that the courts in interpreting section 238 have held that you not only have to establish a particular act, or a particular circumstance, that is, not having any visible means of maintaining himself as circumstance one, and living without employment as circumstance two, but particular circumstances which may exist at a particular moment of time.

They have held that in addition to establishing those particular circumstances you have to prove the course of conduct extending over a period of time, because you still have to prove that the accused is a loose, idle, or disorderly person or vagrant. And it is because of the inclusion of the words "Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant" that the courts have in effect laid down now, as the result of a long line of decisions, that not only have you to prove a particular circumstance, that is, not having any visible means of maintaining himself without employment, but you also have to prove this pattern of loose living which extends back over a sufficiently lengthy period to establish a pattern. If I am correct in my interpretation the reason that line of decisions has been established is the use of the words "Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person".

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Fulton: I beg the minister's pardon? Perhaps I am not making myself clear, yet I cannot make myself clearer than by relying on the authority of Tremeear who, with great respect, I consider to be a greater authority than the commission on which the minister relies. Tremeear says that the sections:

> . . . are unusual, in that the offence here dealt with consists not in doing, but in being.

That is in being a vagrant, because you have done not just one act as alleged in the subsection, but you have done that or similar acts over a period of time, and that is what makes you a vagrant, what makes you a loose, idle or disorderly person.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend a short question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Does he think that the word "lives" means something that can be done in five minutes?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Or ten minutes, or a day?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, under the present section, or longer.

Mr. Garson: Lives without employment?

Mr. Fulton: Under the present clause so long as the body is warm they will say he is living, but living without employment.

Mr. Garson: In order to live without employment it has to be a continuing course of conduct.

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Garson: Certainly.

Mr. Macdonnell: How long?

Mr. Fulton: Who is to say? The courts in the past have said that you have to prove this consistent pattern, because you have to prove that he is a loose, idle or disorderly person. That is the element of the offence. Now you have taken out the words, "loose, idle or disorderly person", and therefore all you have to prove is that he lives without employment. My point is that, having taken out those words, it will no longer be necessary to prove the consistent pattern, because it was owing to the inclusion of those words that the courts came to the conclusion that you had to prove a pattern in order to establish the vagrancy. What is there in the present section that shows you have to prove a pattern? Nothing.

Mr. Garson: Does the hon. member want an answer to that question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Garson: The words "lives without employment". Do you mean to say that a man lives without employment if the police go to him and he does not happen to have a job or he does not happen to have a dollar in his pocket? That is not living without employment. Living extends over a period of time.

Mr. Fulton: As my hon. friend close to me says, if he dies without employment then he is not guilty, but if he lives without employment he may be guilty. How long under this clause does he have to live without employment?

Mr. Garson: The same question may be asked in relation to the old section; how long? You will not find that all judges will agree as to how long it is, but they will all agree that it must be for a period constituting a course of conduct.

Mr. Fulton: They agree it has to establish a pattern. The reason it has to establish a pattern is that you have to prove that he is a loose, idle or disorderly person. That was the element in the offence; and they held in effect that you cannot prove he is a loose, idle or disorderly person unless you establish a pattern. Under the proposed new clause you do not have to prove that he is a loose, idle or disorderly person. All you are going to have to prove is that he lives without employment, and then he is automatically a vagrant.

Mr. Michener: I should like to revert to the question I asked the minister which I do not think he answered, namely, is there in the section as it will appear, if this passes, any requirement of the element of disorderly conduct? The minister asked me if I could cite any cases. My concern is that there will be cases in the future in which people will be convicted of vagrancy. You may establish a pattern of conduct, as the minister says. That is living without employment. There is nothing necessarily disorderly in living without employment, nor is there necessarily anything disorderly in having no visible means of support. Therefore you can establish these two patterns of conduct and still not have any conduct that is in any sense disorderly or disruptive. I am asking the minister whether he differs with me in that interpretation?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I do differ with my hon. friend, but I might say that I do not wish to take up the time of the committee in pursuing any difference of that sort. I have said to all of my hon. friends who have advanced those arguments, and the argument which the hon. member for Kamloops has just developed, which turns on the words "loose, idle or disorderly person", that if there is any magic virtue in those words I am prepared not to argue any more but to put them in.

Mr. Michener: In subsection (a)?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is a little unreasonable. He not only must have those words, but he must have them exactly where he wants them.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, I think one is right or one is not, that is all.

Mr. Garson: The government is in a little different position from my hon. friends, in that we have the responsibility for the conduct of the bill.

Mr. Fulton: The minister wants them where he wants them.

Mr. Garson: Yes; and the reason I am suggesting that they be put where I have suggested—where I want them, if you wish to put it that way—is that I have conferred with my draftsmen, and they tell me that this is the proper place for them to go, and I accept their judgment on that. I do not know how much further we can go. I am quite prepared to put them in. We have been talking now for a couple of hours on this point, and without conviction I am prepared to concede it in order to bring the discussion to some sort of a conclusion. My hon. friend will not accept that. He says, "You must not only co-operate to the extent of letting me have those words, but I have to have them in a certain spot." Would he consider an amendment in these words:

Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person and commits vagrancy who

And then would follow paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d) and so on.

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is quite irreconcilable. Might I suggest that I move that amendment, that we put the question and dispose of the matter in that way?

Mr. Fulton: I can only say, without being lengthy about this, that I am sorry my argument has not registered to the slightest extent with the minister. If he puts in the words in that form and in that place he is making it even more certain that you will not have to prove a course of action over a period in order to establish that a person is loose, idle or disorderly. You only have to prove that he lives without employment at a given moment in time, when you prove he has committed vagrancy. You also prove by that one single act that he is a loose, idle or disorderly person. That is the very thing that we are trying to avoid.

I am sure the minister is acting unwittingly and unintentionally and is not trying to pull a fast one, but I can only say that he is doubling the effect of the very thing the effect of which we are trying to minimize. I am sorry, but that is my view.

Mr. Garson: Let me put this to my hon. friend and his colleagues. The present section 238 which my hon. friend admires so much reads:

> Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant who,

Then it lists a lot of items and ends with these words:

> or who, not having any visible means of maintaining himself, lives without employment.

Does my hon. friend agree with those words, for the validity of which he has been arguing?

Mr. Fulton: The present section 238?

Mr. Garson: The present section.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: I think—

Mr. Garson: Just one at a time, please. This will necessitate other changes in clause 164, but perhaps the clause could be recast in this form:

> Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant who

Then would follow paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e). Then we would come to subsection 2 which would read:

> Every one who contravenes subclauses (a) (b) (c) (d) or (e) of subsection one of this section is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Mr. Fulton: Perfectly acceptable.

Mr. Garson: What about the other hon. members?

Mr. Fulton: The minister is suggesting leaving out the words "commits vagrancy". He is suggesting:

> Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant who

Then subsection (a) follows. It said previously:

> Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person and commits vagrancy who

In effect the minister is suggesting leaving out the words "and commits vagrancy". I and my colleagues of the official opposition are perfectly prepared to accept that suggestion, because it goes right back to the old wording of 238 and does not add the words "and commits vagrancy".

Mr. Garson: That is fine. What do the members of the other party say?

Mr. Knowles: I regret to say that as far as I am concerned I still am not satisfied. The hon. member for Kamloops is suggesting that we may argue later, having got those preliminary words in, that the phrase "lives without employment" should be deleted. I can see that at some point we will have to do that, but it seems to me that one of the basic things wrong with this whole argument is that neither the minister nor the other lawyers have looked with questioning eyes at the wording of section 238.

The minister relies on the fact that section 238 has been there for decades. He contends that since the commissioners have reduced the verbiage in that section, therefore it is a job well done. My contention is that the thing that is wrong with the wording the minister now proposes for clause 164 was in fact wrong with section 238. I think section 238 was wrong, for it was saying that everyone was a loose, idle or disorderly person, that everyone was a vagrant who, not having any visible means of maintaining himself, lived without employment.

My view is that before the commissioners did the commendable job of compressing the verbiage in section 238 they should have put that phrase "loose, idle or disorderly person" in some other part of the clause. It should have been put in with a participle instead of with a verb. Even the words the minister is now suggesting will have the effect of doing what the hon. member for St. Paul's said they would a moment ago; they will declare that anyone who is without money and without a job, even though no disorderly conduct is alleged against him, is a loose, idle or disorderly person, and guilty of the crime of vagrancy. It seems to me that is what was wrong with section 238 and that is what is wrong with what the minister is now proposing.

In both cases the wording starts out by saying that every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person who does such-and-such, whether he is disorderly or not. I submit that something along the lines of what the hon. member for Kamloops proposed some time ago would have been better. I realize that that has been voted down, but the minister might reconsider it. I believe the hon. member is trying to redraft it in a way that might still be in order.

I ask the minister not to rely on the assumption that because clause 164 is a nice editorial job in terms of condensing section 238, that necessarily means that it is good law. I still think it is unfair to say to any person who is without any visible means of maintaining himself and is living without employment that, ipso facto, he is a vagrant, he is loose, he is idle, he is disorderly, even if no charge of disorderly conduct may be laid against him. I submit that that is what would arise from the wording the minister now proposes.

I am a little surprised that the hon. member for Kamloops has agreed to it. Certainly we cannot agree that the law should say to a person who has no means of support and is without employment or, to use ordinary language, a person who is without money and without a job, that by virtue of that fact he is a loose, idle or disorderly person and therefore is guilty of the offence of vagrancy.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I must confess that with so much legal verbiage I am befuddled. I support the leader of this party in asking that the particular phrase "lives without employment" be deleted. I rise, as one who is very humble when it comes to legal matters, to support the tramps. I am wondering if a person has not the right to get along without working if he can. I do not know that there is so much wrong with being a tramp. It could be regarded as quite a high profession. A man has leisure; he has ease; he listens to the birds; he breathes a lot of fresh air, and as long as he does not bother anybody else, what is wrong with him? I rise in support of the tramps.

However, what I was going to say was that it occurs to me that no matter what words are used, in the end it will boil down to the administration of the law. What some of us are a little frightened of is that we might have a repetition of things that happened in the hungry thirties when, no matter how people tried to get employment they could not, and as a result young men who did not want to live on the small incomes of their families, and some of whose families did not have any incomes, were travelling from one end of the country to the other trying to eke out a living.

In those days, and I am sure the minister will agree, the law was not always administered in humanitarian fashion. I can give the minister a very choice example, though I shall not take up too much of the time of the committee to do it. I have a friend who was a clergyman, and he had no money. He was not paid very highly, because in those days even churches had quite a struggle to get through and pay their ministers. He decided he wanted to go to the old country to visit his relatives. Not having any money he decided to hitch-hike across the country, because hitch-hiking was the order of the day.

In spite of the fact that he was then in what I believe is a very respectable profession, that man learned how the other half of the world lived, and he brought a good many complaints to the attention of the department in regard to how the law was administered, and how young men were mistreated simply because they happened to be hitch-hiking across this country.

My clergyman friend arrived in a town one Sunday morning with old clothes on and a little, scrubby beard. He went to church and the people in the church, believe it or not, reported this suspicious character. Later they saw him in the town and told him to move on, that he could not stay there. He replied, "I don't know why. I am not doing anything." Indeed, he had not done anything wrong and he was just sitting on the curb talking to some other chaps. "Well, if you are here in the morning we are going to arrest you," he was told. He wondered whether they would arrest him, so he sat on and sure enough they did put him in jail.

Perhaps the minister will know the way in which that case was dealt with. He has read some judgments from judges who are learned men, but the people who try these cases are not learned judges. They are magistrates and sometimes quite ordinary men, and occasionally they have difficulty in unravelling the legal terminology used in the law.

The next day, after my friend had spent a night in jail, they rounded up the magistrate —he was away somewhere—and when my friend showed his identification and they found out who he was they would not believe him. They thought he was pulling some sort of ruse and trying to get away with something. He showed his certificate and his authority for half-fare on the railroad, and the magistrate became a little frightened because they had put a man in jail the night before who should not have been there.

Of course that was an extreme case, though if I gave the minister his name and he looked into the matter he would find that his department has quite a file on that gentleman. As a matter of fact what I have related may have rung a bell in the minister's ear, because I believe he was attorney general of the province of Manitoba at that time.

However, the thing we are frightened of is that that sort of thing is going to happen again. I do not believe there is any crime in being without a job, and if people are going to be picked up on suspicion simply because they are unemployed I believe that is going too far. What the leader of this party has said, Mr. Chairman, seems reasonable to me. Strike out "without employment". I do not think it adds anything to the strength of the section at all, and without that phrase it would read quite logical, namely:

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I believe we should get down to the heart of the matter in this clause. We have heard arguments now for nearly an hour over legal phraseology and whether the clause should contain the words "loose, idle or disorderly". I have consulted the dictionary and checked the definition of the words "loose, idle, and disorderly", and also the dictionary definition for "vagrancy", and quite frankly I cannot see very much difference in the definitions given. They mean more or less the same thing, and I therefore believe we are completely skirting the main issue on this clause. We are simply getting into an argument as to whether certain words should be in the clause. Not being a lawyer I am not going to enter into that argument. However, I do feel that this clause should be given a great deal of consideration before it is passed.

The minister made reference to the fact that this has been the law for a long time. That is just the point. I believe that if we go back and examine conditions in England at the time the vagrancy laws were put into effect, we will find that the apprentices were bound to their employers, the reason being that an apprentice might run away from his employer. The object behind these laws was to protect the employers of that period, to bind the apprentice securely to his employer.

But after all, conditions have changed. Surely when we are going through this bill to enact a new criminal code our purpose should be to revise it and bring it up to date.

We should attempt to weed out some of the more archaic features of the code, and take out language which no longer serves the purpose, particularly such phrases as "being abroad" and "loose, disorderly, idle and loitering", and so forth. These are terms which had a very definite meaning at the time the law first came into effect. But this is the twentieth century, and surely we are not going to re-enact in the year 1954 a criminal code which contains language embodying the very essence of laws which existed several hundred years ago, despite the fact that circumstances have altered.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the unfortunate individual who is taken up before a magistrate, perhaps after spending a night in jail, is going to appreciate the difference between being charged under a section which contains the word "vagrant" or charged under a section which includes the words "loose, idle or disorderly". The minister has pointed out that when a man is brought before a magistrate, that magistrate is not likely to convict under this section. But I suggest that is not the only thing to consider. We have to consider that men are going to be apprehended and lodged in jail. It is true that the charges may be dismissed when they appear before the magistrate, but a situation can develop where a good many innocent people will spend time in jail, and to most people the very thought of incarceration for even a few hours is most distasteful.

I think we have to consider this clause not only from the standpoint of how the magistrate is going to deal with the charge when the person is brought before him, but from the standpoint of how the law enforcement officers are going to interpret and use it. The suggestion is made that we have not had many cases of this kind lately. Economic conditions are slightly different from what they were prior to the outbreak of world war II, but as other hon. members have pointed out the time may very well come when we will have a repetition of such occurrences, one instance of which was mentioned by the previous speaker.

Before this clause is passed I think we should give very serious consideration to whether it is necessary. I think perhaps the real reason for having it in the code was given unwittingly by the minister a while ago when he suggested that it was a catch-all, that where you could not apprehend a man under a specific law and you were suspicious of him you could hale him into court on a vagrancy charge.

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend misunderstood me if he got that impression. I believe he has confused me with some other members who have spoken in the debate. I thought I made it clear not once but several times that in order to get a conviction under this section you had to prove your case.

Mr. Ellis: I am sorry, but I seem to recall that the minister made some reference to a man being charged under the vagrancy law for having lived off the avails of prostitution. It might not have been the minister.

Mr. Garson: No, that is right; but in a case of that sort you would have to prove that he did live off the avails. Would my hon. friend disapprove of the conviction of that sort of man?

Mr. Ellis: No, I would not; but I feel that is a specific offence, that the man is guilty of a specific crime and should be charged with that specific crime. I say this section is so vague that it may be used to charge—

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will read the section he is discussing he will see that further down it includes living off the avails of prostitution.

Mr. Ellis: I am only dealing with subsection 1 (a).

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Ellis: That is the only subsection I have reference to now. Economic conditions may very well reach the point where any unemployed person could be a potential vagrant under the terms of this subsection. It is all very well to say that is not going to be the case, but we know from past experience that during the period we refer to as the great depression many transient unemployed spent the night in jail and were haled before a magistrate on a charge of vagrancy. The fact that there may not have been many such cases lately is a reflection of the changed economic conditions, but since we are revising the Criminal Code and it may be in effect for 20 or 50 years—no one can tell how long it will go without substantial amendments—I think we have to take these things into consideration.

To me it is not a question of arguing over legal phraseology. I want the minister to consider very seriously whether it is absolutely necessary to retain subsection 1 (a) of section 164. The other parts, subsections 1 (b), (c), (d) and (e), have reference to specific offences. Subsection 1 (b) refers to begging from door to door or in a public place. That is a specific offence. A man may be charged with a specific offence. Subsection 1 (c) is also a specific offence, but subsection 1 (a) is so vague that, speaking as a layman, I do not think it makes good law. I want to make a plea to the minister that he give serious consideration to removing this very questionable feature from the section before it is passed by the committee.

Mr. Power (St. John's West): I feel the view that a man who has no job and does not have a dollar is guilty of this offence is a grave misconstruction of what the paragraph says. A person only becomes a vagrant when, first of all, he has no apparent means of support. That does not merely mean a person without money. Surely it means a person without money, without money's worth, without credit, without any lawful means of obtaining money for his support. He also has to be living without employment. If he has no money or money's worth but has a job he soon will have money. It would seem to me that anyone who can live without means of support, without a job and not beg or steal, must be a magician.

Mr. Quelch: I listened to the minister explain at some length that subsection 1(a) does not really mean what it says. Then he went on to explain to hon. members what in his opinion it really did mean, and the interpretation that had grown up over a period of years. But surely in this house we should have enough legal talent to put into plain English exactly what we do mean. I suggest to the minister that the section would be greatly improved by striking out the words "lives without employment or" and the words "wandering abroad or". The section would then read:

> (a) not having any apparent means of support
> (i) is found trespassing and does not, when required, justify his presence in the place where he is found.

I do not think there would be any objection to that. He would have to be found trespassing. He could not be charged just because he was unemployed. If that change were made I think it would remove most of the objection.

Mr. Regier: The statement was made by the hon. member for St. John's West that "means of support" did not necessarily mean how much money you had on you. I know there are some municipalities where the police follow the standard of a definite fixed sum. They will arrest you for vagrancy unless you have so much money on you. It may be they have received that advice to guide them. However, I do know it happens.

The only reasonable argument I have ever heard for the existence of the vagrancy charge at all is that it aids to enforcement of the law in that it gives the law enforcement authorities time to secure evidence on other charges. I wonder whether that is a sound practice. I wonder whether we should be able to arrest a man on a vagrancy charge simply because we think he is possibly guilty of something else. Should we be able to arrest a man for something that does not mean very much merely for the purpose of being able to hold him for a few days?

I am not sure that we should retain this provision. As I understand the old law, when a person was charged with vagrancy the question was whether the man was a vagrant and whether there was evidence to show that he was a loose, idle and vagrant person. According to the wording of the section—and I think the hon. member for Kamloops had a valid point—the issue is not whether or not a man is a vagrant; the issue now is whether or not he has employment. If evidence can be presented that he is without employment and without any apparent means of support, he is automatically guilty of vagrancy. Therefore I feel the whole section should be left over until another day. When we began the revision of the Criminal Code I thought we had a definite understanding that contentious sections would be left over until some other time.

Mr. Michener: I think perhaps the minister will agree that we have pretty well aired the offence under paragraph (a). I should like to make one suggestion to the minister about paragraph (c). This paragraph deals with persons who are prostitutes or night walkers in public places.

The point I wish to make is that this paragraph seems to go so far as to make it an offence for these people to be in a public place. It does not go quite that far, but I am going to suggest to the minister that it is different from the existing section. If the minister will look at the existing section 238, subsection (i), he will see that it speaks of a person as a vagrant who, being a common prostitute or night walker, wanders in the fields, public streets or highways and so on. There is an element of positive action on the part of the prostitute in that section. In the present section we apparently make it illegal for the prostitute or night walker to be in a public place about her ordinary activities as a citizen. Supposing she is going to the market to buy groceries. She is then in a public place, and she has to justify her presence there in order to not commit an offence.

I suggest to the minister that in all these clauses that deal with what we might call the submerged people, it seems to me a sound course to follow is to require some positive offence or action, something that is disorderly or abnormal in a public place before there is an excuse to arrest. I suggest to the minister that the section might very well read, so as to import that element of positive action, "being a common prostitute or night walker, solicits in a public place." That might not be the best way of expressing it, but I am sure the minister understands what I have in mind. Instead of putting such a person under the onus of justifying her existence every time she is in a public place, there should be some positive act on her part before she can be charged and brought into court.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway raised this matter before and I regret that I did not reply to him. I am afraid that I cannot at all agree with the hon. member for St. Paul's. If he will look at the present section he will see that it mentions being a common prostitute or night walker who wanders—the hon. member just mentioned the fields—the public streets or highways. Now, what is the substantial difference as between "public streets or highways" and a "public place" as in the present section? Then it goes on and mentions that if she "does not give a satisfactory account of herself", whereas the new section says "does not, when required, give an account of herself".

Mr. Knowles: It may be that the old section was not worded correctly.

Mr. Garson: The cases under the old section were to the effect that she did not need to give an account of herself unless she was properly asked by the proper people in authority. When certain individuals were brought up and charged who had not been asked, they were acquitted. If the hon. member says she cannot solicit, then what is the position of a street walker who cannot solicit? Is my hon. friend's proposal that we deprive her of her livelihood? The case law under the existing section says, and I recommend this to my hon. friend:

> The mere fact that a woman is a prostitute, however, does not make her a vagrant; nor does the further fact of her wandering abroad. A woman of one of these classes may wander as long as she likes in such public places as she chooses without simply by reason thereof bringing herself within this enactment. It is only when in the course of her wandering she fails to give a satisfactory account of herself that she converts herself into a vagrant.

Supposing a policeman comes along and finds a prostitute with a companion who is picking the pockets of a drunken man. The prostitute is standing by in a public place, and he asks her to give an account of why she is standing by while her companion is picking the pockets of this drunken man. If she cannot give a satisfactory account of that situation, then and only then does she fall afoul of this section. I think if the hon. member will examine with care the new wording and the old, he will see that the real gravamen of the offence is failure to give an account when a request has been made. In all substantial respects the two sections are identical.

Mr. Michener: I appreciate that. My concern is that the wording has been changed. The minister knows as well as I do that in interpreting the new section the courts will impute to parliament some purpose in changing the wording, and they will try to seek some difference in the wording, which in this case is "wandering in a public place". Now, every one is found in a public place who is in a public place, so there is no element of offence; yet you put that person under the onus of explaining her presence there. That is all I suggest to the minister. If he is satisfied there is ample and proper protection to even a person who is a common prostitute going about her normal activity, then all right.

I am suggesting her special activities should be prohibited, not her normal ones, by putting in the words, "soliciting in a public place". After all, the example which the minister gave of picking a man's pockets certainly is an offence, and there is the capacity to arrest. Being found in a public place, as every one is who is in a public place, seems to me to be the wrong type of wording for this kind of section.

Mr. Garson: But being found in a public place is not the gravamen of the offence either under the existing wording or under the proposed new wording. The gravamen of the offence is that when requested to do so she fails to give a satisfactory account of herself. In all these matters I admit that the degree of ability and judgment of the police forces varies a great deal from one part of the country to the other. But in drafting the laws of the country, I do not think we can do so upon the assumption that the police forces are corrupt and incompetent, or that they are going to abuse powers that are given to them; otherwise we are going to have a difficult time drafting laws to protect society.

What I suggest is that in relation to this whole clause and every subclause under it we must make the necessary assumption that the Canadian police forces have reasonable professional integrity, and that they are reasonably competent, and that no abuses will arise if we empower them to use reasonable discretion. Of course, if in certain cases the police are not honest and competent; if in certain places these abuses mentioned by the hon. member for Macleod take place, then I do not think we are entitled to pay too much attention to these exceptional cases in drafting what we think should be a law of general application.

There was one other point made by the hon. member for Regina City to which I think I should refer, when he said that we are drafting a law or considering a law that may be in effect for a long time. That could leave quite a wrong impression if I were to leave it uncorrected. It is true that the bill we are now considering has not been consolidated for 60 years; but during that interval of time I do not think there has been a single year in which amendments to certain sections have not been required.

I beg my colleagues in the committee to understand that if, by chance, this present clause is as defective as some arguments by my hon. friends opposite would seem to indicate, especially those of the hon. member for Kamloops, for example, and if his fears prove to be well founded, then it would be a very simple matter at the next session of this parliament to bring in amendments to cure the defects so disclosed.

As the minister in charge of the bill and the minister responsible for recommending the appointment of the commission which drafted the bill in the first place, I wish to say that there certainly is no reason why I should wish personally to have any of these defects in the bill, if it were possible to keep them out. The only reason I have been, as perhaps my hon. friends may think, somewhat obdurate in relation to their suggestions is that I think the commission did a good job. They have greatly condensed and improved—streamlined, if you like—the code, while at the same time retaining its substance. And I suggest that in its present form the clause now before the committee will retain the case law which was decided under the old section, and work quite satisfactorily.

Mr. Fulton: Several arguments are advanced by the minister as to why we should allow the clause to go through in its present form which, I regret, I cannot accept. The minister said that in drafting laws of this type we must assume that the police and other law enforcement officers are reasonable men and men of integrity. That is of course true.

But if we believe conscientiously that the clause is so drafted that it admits of abuses, whether intentional or unintentional, then I do not accept the principle that we can rely upon the judgment of law enforcement officers never to bring about such abuse.

On the contrary I would assume that the law enforcement officers, and particularly a crown prosecutor who would have it as his duty to enforce the law as it is drafted and exists on the statute books, would be bound to enforce the clause which would result in abuses, whether or not it did in fact result in such abuses. In the case of the crown prosecutor, that would be his duty. It is not his duty to say, "Oh, I do not like this clause. I do not like its application; therefore I will not enforce it." That would be a breach of duty on his part.

Therefore the minister's argument, when he was trying to say we were suggesting that the law enforcement might be unreasonable, is not applicable. It is not because we think they are going to give an unreasonable enforcement to this clause, but rather because we do not want law enforcement officers placed in the position where they will have to enforce unreasonable law. That is why we object.

Further, the minister has said, in referring to the argument of the hon. member for St. Paul's, that the case law in connection with this subclause referring to prostitutes is well decided and well established, and that the present wording being in substance almost the same as the previous wording, the case law will continue to apply. I believe that was the effect of his argument. That argument, it seems to me, has established the validity of our objection to the change in the earlier part of the clause, because what we are saying is that you have substantially changed the words. You eliminated the words "loose, idle or disorderly" and therefore the case law which depended upon those words will no longer be applicable. That is the very point we made, and I am glad the minister accepts it now—because, of course, he must accept it, having used the same argument in connection with the subclause on prostitution.

I see it is nearly ten o'clock. I would hope, however, that rather than merely talk it out at ten o'clock, the minister would appreciate that we have objections to this clause. Without attempting in any way to use any threat, or to threaten further argument, we have objections which we do not feel have been properly disposed of. I would hope the minister would allow the clause to stand so that, when we return to a discussion of this bill, it might be dealt with properly. I should hope there would be opportunity for further discussion before it is brought back to the floor of the house.

Mr. Garson: Do I understand my hon. friend to mean that it is to stand—as it certainly must stand, because it is ten o'clock—until the next time the Criminal Code is under discussion; or does he mean to have it stand until we finish all the other clauses in the bill, and then come back to it?

Mr. Knowles: It depends upon what the minister does in the meantime.

Mr. Fulton: That is about it. If the minister between now and the time it comes back —that is, now and the next day we have the Criminal Code before us—considers that in the light of what has been said there should be an amendment made to clause 164, and comes to tell us that he now proposes to make this, that or the other change, then I think we would be prepared to go ahead with the discussion on it. But if the minister says, "I am sorry, but I cannot accept any of your arguments. I want it to go through as it now stands", then I would ask that the clause stand to the end of the deliberations of the committee of the whole, in the same way that the other controversial clauses are being stood over.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Is it agreed that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Mr. Drew: With the consent of the Minister of Justice, might I make a short observation. It does seem to me there is something to be borne in mind to which perhaps due consideration has not been given. In the case where changes have been made in some of the clauses it has been recognized that this was done with the intention of improving the wording of existing sections, to which there has been no objection. But certainly in the minds of a number of hon. members there is a feeling that the old section in this instance was a dangerous one, because it was being used loosely to hold people when specific charges were not being laid. Many of us know that people were held under the vagrancy section when there was no thought that a vagrancy charge was going to be pressed.

It was simply a procedure for holding a person until the authorities made up their minds what kind of charge was going to be laid.

There are some of us who would like to see a clearly stated provision, if there is going to be some basis on which a prisoner can be held, rather than enlarge still further a section which had that objection, and which was used for the purpose simply of holding prisoners until the minds of the prosecuting authorities could be made up as to what specific charge would be laid.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Garson: On Monday next the first item of business will be the Salaries Act. Then we shall move to go into supply. If we succeed in getting there we shall call four departments: first, public works; second, veterans affairs; third, agriculture; fourth, mines and technical surveys.

Mr. Fulton: And stand them?

Mr. Garson: Continue in public works.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 22, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—TABLING OF REPORT CONCERNING PARLIAMENTARY LIBRARY EMPLOYEES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to transmit to the house a report from the civil service commission of Canada concerning the salaries of the employees of the parliamentary library.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

FIRST AND SECOND REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln) presented the first and second reports on the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the second report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ON STATUS OF UNITED NATIONS FORCES IN JAPAN

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to inform the house that an agreement regarding the status of United Nations forces in Japan was signed in Tokyo on February 19. The parties to the agreement are, on the one hand, the government of Japan, and on the other hand, the governments of Canada, the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa and the government of the United States, acting as the unified command of the United Nations.

As soon as we receive from Tokyo the authentic text of the agreement as signed, it will be tabled in parliament. In the meantime, I have a draft copy available if any member wishes to see it.

BANK OF CANADA ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MANAGEMENT, EXCHANGE, TO PERMIT SHORT TERM LOANS ON INSURED MORTGAGES, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 297, to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Abbott: Since parliament in this session will be considering matters pertaining to the Canadian banking system in connection with the decennial revision of the Bank Act, it is appropriate that the Bank of Canada Act should also be revised at this time. The Bank of Canada Act was passed in 1934 and amended in 1936 and 1938. Since then the act has been amended in a number of ways by provisions in other statutes. As a result of these amendments and changing circumstances, a number of provisions of the act are either no longer operative or no longer appropriate. In addition, to bring the act up to date in these respects, it is proposed that certain revisions should be made.

In view of the proposed provision in the National Housing Act allowing chartered banks to make insured mortgage loans, it is proposed that the Bank of Canada should have the power to make short-term loans to banks on the pledge or hypothecation of insured mortgages held by them.

In addition, changes will be made in the limitations on the bank's holdings of government of Canada securities, in the amount of its rest or reserve fund and the provisions regarding cash reserves to be maintained by the chartered banks.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 296, an act respecting Brazilian Telephone Company.—Mr. Hunter.

QUESTIONS

SMUGGLING, MARITIME PORTS

Mr. Bell:

1. Have any cases been reported or investigations conducted into the smuggling of liquor or any other goods from the United States into Canada through Saint John or any other maritime ports, during the past two years?
2. If so, were any employees or agents of the United States government, United States army, or United States companies presently in Canada, involved?
3. What were the quantities and amounts involved?
4. What course of action has the government taken to prevent a recurrence?

Questions

Mr. McCann:

1. Yes.

2. Records of alleged or proven cases of smuggling are not segregated according to nationality, occupation or personal status of individual.

3. Quantities and amounts (value) of goods investigated or forfeited under the Customs Act are not maintained on a commodity basis nor by individual ports of entry. The number of customs seizure reports received from the maritime provinces (Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick) during the two-year period February 1, 1952, to January 31, 1954, was 1,329.

4. Continued vigilance and enforcement measures including seizure of goods, seizure of vehicles and vessels used in transporting goods liable to forfeiture, application of penalties and prosecution of individuals under the provisions of the Customs Act.

FEDERAL COLLECTIONS, ALBERTA

Mr. Fair:

During each of the past five years, what amounts have been collected by the federal government from the province of Alberta as a result of: (a) personal income tax; (b) corporation income tax; (c) succession duties; (d) excise taxes; (e) excise duties; (f) customs duties; (g) excess profits tax; (h) any other taxes?

Mr. McCann: (a), (b), (c), (g), (h). See statement attached.

Following is the amount of excise taxes, excise duties, customs duties and sundry other collections collected by customs-excise ports in the province of Alberta for the last five fiscal years:

Year	(d) Excise taxes	(e) Excise duties	(f) Customs duties	(h) Sundry collections
1949	$10,760,329.43	$ 7,235,639.68	$ 5,937,159.52	$13,905.94

ELEVATOR COMPANIES—OVERAGES AND SHORTAGES

Mr. Argue:

1. Does the board of grain commissioners obtain the overage or shortage incurred by each elevator company in its operations at each marketing point in western Canada?

2. If so, what are the most recent figures available showing such overage or shortage for each elevator company at each marketing point?

Mr. Dickey: I shall answer this question orally. The first part of the question asks for the overages or shortages incurred by each elevator company in its operations at each marketing point in western Canada.

[Mr. Bell.]

The answer to that question is that the board obtains from licensees of country elevators, in accordance with regulations made pursuant to subsection 16 of section 15 of the Canada Grain Act, statements for each country elevator in the form of statutory declarations, showing gross and net receipts and shipments during each crop year and stocks in store of each kind of grain at the end of each crop year. From these sworn statements gross and net shortage and overage positions for each country elevator are calculated.

Then the second part of the question asks for the most recent figures available showing such overage or shortage for each elevator company at each marketing point.

The answer is that the most recent figures available showing shortages and overages for each elevator company at each marketing point are those for the crop year 1952-53. This information is contained in 5,042 documents. It is obvious therefore that it would be a most laborious task to have these copied. If the hon. member has some particular marketing point in mind, I would be happy to get the information for him, but I doubt if he wants to put the board of grain commissioners to the trouble and expense of copying the entire material.

ASSISTED PASSAGE LOAN SCHEME

Mr. Bell:

1. How much money has been made available under the assisted passage loan scheme, during each of the years 1951, 1952 and 1953, to (a) British immigrants; (b) non-British immigrants?
2. What percentages of said loans remain outstanding?
3. What steps are taken to collect same?
4. From information obtained in conducting 3, and otherwise, (a) what percentage of those assisted immigrants remained in their assigned or intended occupations; (b) what percentage left before the expiration of the one-year period?

Mr. Harris:

1 and 2. Statistics maintained respecting assisted passage loans show office of issue of transportation warrants, not nationality or ethnic origin of the immigrants. The statement below provides as close an answer to the question as can be given. For every dollar actually paid out for loans, 79·8 cents had been recovered by the end of December, 1953. 27,391 loans had been made, for which billing to transportation companies had been paid, and of this number 17,037 or 62·2 per cent had been repaid in full. Loans are payable over a 24-month period from date of arrival of the immigrant in Canada.

	Immigration offices, United Kingdom	All other offices
Warrants issued	3,528	12,028
Value	$580,179.60	$1,978,004.60
1952
Warrants issued	185	4,077
Value	$ 30,423.25	$ 670,462.65
1953

Note: The figures for 1953 include 1,012 warrants which were issued at a cost of $166,423.40 for which accounts had not been received from the shipping companies due to these persons having sailed late in 1953 or early in 1954.

Total warrants issued, 28,403; total value of warrants issued, $4,670,953.05; total cost of transportation accounts paid as of Dec. 31, 1953, $4,504,529.65; collections for the period, Feb. 1, 1951, to Dec. 31, 1953, $3,599,087.21. Collections are, of course, continuing.

3. In most cases arrangements are made with the employer to have monthly deductions made from the individual's wages and forwarded to Ottawa to be credited against the individual's loan. In the other cases individuals make their payments direct to the immigration branch, Department of Labour, and in some cases, to provincial government officials. Automatic collection procedure, consisting of notices of arrears, and if necessary, followed by letter, is instituted when accounts indicate instalments have not been received when due. Immigration officers in or near the person's place of residence are also used to contact the individual and an endeavour is made to have the individual make his monthly payments. Close check is kept of all delinquent accounts and every effort is made to locate individuals.

VITAMIN PRODUCTS

Mr. Knight:

1. Has the government during 1952-53 and to date, investigated potency of the vitamin products of certain manufacturers?
2. If so, how many such (a) products; (b) manufacturers were investigated?
3. What percentage of the products investigated were below labelled potency?
4. What were the products, by advertised name, and who were the manufacturers of the products which were found to be below labelled potency?
5. What action has the government taken as a result of these findings?

Mr. Martin:

1. Yes. The potency of vitamin products on the Canadian market is under constant review.

2. Approximately 1,500 products were examined from January 1, 1952 to January 31, 1954. These products were obtained from approximately 200 manufacturers.

3. Particular attention was paid to the products of those companies which it was felt might have products below the labelled potency. Furthermore an effort was made to concentrate on those types of products which experience has shown may be more often below label claim. Of the 1,500 such products which were analysed approximately 300 were found to be below the labelled potency in one or more vitamins. However the fact that one-fifth of the products analysed did not meet label claim should not be interpreted to mean that one-fifth of the vitamin products on the Canadian market do not meet label claim as the above figures apply only to those companies which were studied and not to the industry as a whole. It is known that the great bulk of vitamin products now on the market conform to labelled potency and are adequately labelled.

4. Generally speaking vitamins are unstable compounds and precautions must be taken to ensure that the potency of the vitamin product is still satisfactory when it reaches the consumer. It has been found that practically all pharmaceutical companies have had on the market at some time a product which did not meet label claim for at least one vitamin. During the period January 1, 1952 to the present not all products nor all companies have been examined, hence it would be unfair to reveal the identity of those companies whose products happened to be analysed and were found to be below labelled potency in that period. Furthermore, most products which were found to be below labelled potency have subsequently been corrected or withdrawn from the market by the company. Thus it would not be desirable to name a product which was below claim two years ago but has subsequently been found to meet label claim. The survey of the vitamin products produced in Canada is still not complete. Therefore it would be grossly discriminatory to release the findings at this time.

5. The first approach to a manufacturer whose product has been found to be below the labelled potency has been educational. Experience has clearly shown that those companies who have adequate control facilities and who analyse their products before placing them on the market, usually have products which meet label claim. Advice is given to the manufacturer when requested regarding possible causes of the low vitamin content of the product and the institution of proper control measures. If a manufacturer persists in placing on the market a product which does not meet label claim he is given a final warning and if necessary prosecuted. If seriously below labelled potency, existing stocks of the product may be seized by the crown. Goods under seizure are forfeited to the crown and disposed of, either by reprocessing under supervision, if considered feasible, or by destruction on the order of the minister.

PUBLIC HEALTH GRANTS—PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Kickham:

How much did the province of Prince Edward Island receive by way of assistance in new construction, repairs and equipment to hospitals in each year since 1946, including all federal public health grants?

Mr. Martin:

The health grants program commenced in 1948-49. Since that time the following expenditures have been made by the federal government—

SOCIAL SECURITY PAYMENTS, MANITOBA

Mr. Pommer:

1. How much money was paid by the federal government in the province of Manitoba, during the year 1953, for (a) family allowance; (b) old age security; (c) old age assistance?

2. How many families were in receipt of family allowance during the same year, and for how many children?

3. During the same year, in the province of Manitoba, how many received (a) old age security; (b) old age assistance?

[Mr. Martin.]

1. (a) $17,827,134; (b) $19,825,848; (c) $1,089,381.

2. 115,338 families were paid family allowances for 251,021 children during the month of December, 1953, in the province of Manitoba.

3. In December, 1953, in the province of Manitoba: (a) old age security payments were made to 42,157 persons; (b) old age assistance payments were made to 4,816 persons.

CAMP GAGETOWN—HOUSING

Mr. Brooks:

1. Has the federal government either through one of its departments or through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation purchased any land for construction of houses for Camp Gagetown administration personnel?

2. If so, (a) where is land located; (b) from whom purchased; (c) what was the cost per acre; (d) number of acres?

Mr. Bourget:

1 and 2 (a). Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have purchased land in Fredericton, New Brunswick, for possible future housing developments. The plot is part of the area enclosed by College road, Third crossroad, Regent street, and Second crossroad.

2 (b). Randolph and Doris Mae Wood.

IMMIGRATION—DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CO-ORDINATION

Mr. Fulton:

1. Does there exist any intergovernmental committee or organization whose purpose is to ensure co-ordination and avoid duplication as between dominion and provincial programs of immigration and settlement?

2. If so, what is the name of such committee, who are its members, how often does it meet, and when did it hold its last meeting?

3. If there is no such committee or organization, are any steps taken to ensure that there is such co-ordination, particularly in connection with placement of immigrants, land settlement and agricultural worker schemes, and generally to ensure that the population requirements of the nation and the rights and responsibilities of the provinces are kept in harmony?

4. What is the nature and extent of any such arrangements as may be covered in part 3, and how are they implemented?

Mr. Harris:

1. No.

2. Not applicable in view of answer to No. 1.

3. Yes.

4. (a) Continuous liaison on departmental level is maintained between federal officials of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and officials of provincial government departments concerned on all problems of mutual interest affecting the placement of immigrants, land settlement as it pertains to immigrants and agricultural workers schemes. Early in 1953, all provincial governments were invited to have senior departmental officials attend meetings with senior federal officers on immigration matters of mutual interest. To date, eight of the provinces have sent representatives to such meetings which were concerned principally with the development of ways and means to achieve closer co-operation and co-ordination in the fields mentioned above. This co-operation and co-ordination is being pursued and extended wherever possible, in field activities in Canada.

(b) As the successful establishment of immigrants is closely related to the welfare of immigrants during the early period after their arrival in Canada, the federal government, early in 1952, offered to conclude with each of the provincial governments an agreement for the sharing on a basis of equal cost of necessary hospitalization and welfare assistance for immigrants who became indigent through accident or illness during the first year after their arrival in Canada. To date, agreements have been concluded with six of the provinces covering both hospitalization and welfare assistance, while an agreement covering hospitalization expenses only has been concluded with yet another province. The provincial governments are responsible for the operational administration of these agreements and accounts for the federal share are submitted to the federal Department of Labour.

(c) With particular reference to agricultural workers, federal-provincial farm labour agreements have been entered into by the federal Department of Labour with each of the provinces of Canada with the exception of Newfoundland. These agreements provide for co-operative action in relation to the recruitment, distribution and placement of farm labour. A federal-provincial farm labour committee is set up in each province and in all cases includes representatives of the provincial department of agriculture and the national employment service. In addition, in most provinces, representatives of farm organizations and other groups are also included in the membership of the committee. These committees are concerned not only with local and interprovincial recruitment and movement and placement of farm workers, but also make recommendations relative to the importation of immigrant agricultural workers and their recommendations are cleared through the Department of Labour to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration which selects the immigrants overseas.

STOCKS OF BUTTER

Mr. Proudfoot:

What stocks of butter are now held by the agricultural prices support board, (a) 1952; (b) 1953?

Mr. Gardiner:

Stocks held on February 19, 1954, were: (a) 5,089,224 pounds of 1952 butter; (b) 34,000,732 pounds of 1953 butter.

NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS—POSTAGE RATES

Mr. Knowles:

1. What persons, organizations and/or periodicals, if any, have made representations to the government for an amendment to the Post Office Act to permit a newspaper or periodical to be posted in some other postal area than the one in which it is published and still get the benefit of the reduced rates of postage accorded to newspapers and periodicals?

2. On what dates were such representations made, (a) by letter or other means of correspondence; (b) by personal calls on cabinet ministers, individually or collectively?

3. What replies were made to such representations?

4. Have any persons or organizations made representations to the government in opposition to such an amendment?

5. If so, what are the names of such persons and organizations, and on what dates were such representations made?

6. What replies were made to such representations?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, in the normal course this question should be made an order for return. However, in view of the general interest and the simplicity of the matter perhaps I could answer part of it orally.

Representations were made to a committee of ministers consisting of the Prime Minister, the Postmaster General and myself on January 21 by the periodical press association. The delegation consisted of Mr. Napier Moore, Mr. Roy Parry, Mr. Floyd Chalmers, Mr. J. Kent Cooke, Mr. Charles Sauriol and Mr. George Mansfield, all members of that association. They came to make representations about the competitive disadvantage which they considered Canadian periodicals were under as compared with American periodicals.

Among the suggestions they made was the suggestion referred to in the question. The answer to part 3 is that the Prime Minister undertook to see that such representations were given consideration. I understand from the office of the Postmaster General that one or two representations have been received recently in answer to No. 4. Perhaps parts 4, 5 and 6 could be made an order for return, and the return will be tabled in a day or two.

Mr. Speaker: Part of this question is answered, and part will be made an order for return, subject to the minister's remarks.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the return the Secretary of State is prepared to bring down might include a list of the periodicals represented by that periodical press association referred to by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly, sir.

SALARIES OF LETTER CARRIERS, HALIFAX

Mr. Balcom:

FEDERAL BUILDING, VERNON, B.C.

Mr. McLeod:

1. What progress is being made with plans to construct a federal building in the city of Vernon, British Columbia?

2. Has the vote for this project been reduced?

3. If so, in what amount, and for what purpose will this amount be used in the current year?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Bourget:

1, 2 and 3. The estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955, contain at page 447 the amount voted by parliament for the fiscal year 1953-54, and the amount sought for the fiscal year 1954-55. The latter amount is for the purpose of completing plans which are in the course of preparation.

OLD AGE ASSISTANCE

Mr. Knowles:

FOOD AND DRUGS—DAIRY PRODUCTS

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley):

1. How many examinations of domestic dairy products were made by the food and drug divisions of the Department of National Health and Welfare, from 1st April, 1952 to 31st March, 1953?

2. How many cases of adulteration were discovered?

3. How many cases of misbranding were discovered?

4. How many prosecutions were launched under (3) and (4)?

Mr. Martin: Examinations of domestic dairy products are made by the food and drug divisions of the Department of National Health and Welfare for both the Department of Agriculture and the Department of National Health and Welfare. The following information gives the figures for each department:

	National Health and Welfare	Agriculture	Total
1.	654	1,730	2,384
2.	64	1,104	1,168
3.	78	—	78
4. Number of prosecutions for adulteration:	7	20	27
Number of prosecutions for misbranding:	—	—	—

MALLEABLE IRON PIPE FITTINGS

Mr. Starr:

What was the total amount of malleable iron pipe fittings imported into Canada month by month, during the year 1953 and in January 1954, from (a) Germany; (b) Italy; (c) Belgium?

Mr. Dickey: Information not available. Malleable iron pipe fittings are not separately classified in Canadian import trade statistics but are included in the general item of "Pipe fittings, n.o.p.". Canadian imports by countries under this general item during the months January to November, 1953, the latest figures available, are as follows:

"FAREWELL TO OAK STREET"

Mr. Henry:

1. Is the government aware that the national film board has plans to distribute a picture deeply offensive to the human dignity of many Canadians, the title being "Farewell to Oak Street"?

2. Has the government considered the advisability of a restricted distribution?

3. What distribution of the picture is being made under present plans of the national film board?

Mr. Harris:

1. "Farewell to Oak Street" is currently being shown in the city of Toronto. Three complaints about it have been received.

2. No.

3. It is included in the theatrical series "Canada Carries On" which is distributed for the national film board by Columbia pictures. In the normal course of events it will find its way into a large number of Canadian theatres.

Questions

CUSTOMS TARIFF—CANNED MIXED FRUIT*

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has mixed fruit been declared recently to be regarded as peaches for purpose of the customs tariff?
2. If so, by whom was such a change made, and by what authority was it made?
3. Has any increase in the tariff on mixed fruits resulted from this change?
4. If so, what does this increase amount to in respect of tins of mixed fruit when purchased by the consumer?

Mr. McCann: Answered.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, I believe there is an asterisk opposite the question.

Mr. Speaker: The answer to the question will have to be given orally.

Mr. McCann: The first question is:

Has mixed fruit been declared recently to be regarded as peaches for purpose of the Customs Tariff?

The answer is that certain canned mixed fruit was classified as peaches, effective January 30, 1953.

The second question is:

If so, by whom was such a change made, and by what authority was it made?

The answer is, by a decision of the deputy minister that the goods were properly dutiable as peaches, based on the premise that they consisted of a large proportion of peaches. The authority for that is found in section 43 (2) of the Customs Act.

The third question is:

Has any increase in the tariff on mixed fruits resulted from this change?

The answer is: yes; one and one-half cents per pound.

Then the fourth question:

If so, what does this increase amount to in respect of tins of mixed fruit when purchased by the consumer?

The answer is that there is no information.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

SALT FISH GIFTS—PURCHASES IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Balcom:

1. Of the gift of salt fish by the federal government to Korea and Greece, what amount in dollar value is to be purchased in Nova Scotia?
2. Approximately what amount in dollars has already been purchased in Nova Scotia?

1. $190,000.

2. $140,000.

[Mr. Harris.]

BOARD OF GRAIN COMMISSIONERS

Mr. Argue:

1. What are the names of the members of the board of grain commissioners?
2. Is any member of the board of grain commissioners on loan to any other department of government or filling any government position in addition to that of member of the board?
3. If so, is such second position of a temporary or permanent nature?
4. When is it intended that all members of the board of grain commissioners shall devote full time to the administration of the Canada Grain Act?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Donald Gordon McKenzie, John Vallance, Roy Wilfred Milner.

2. Mr. Roy W. Milner was appointed transport controller.

3. Temporary and part time.

4. Answered by No. 3.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

STEEP ROCK IRON MINES—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Knowles:

HALLS HARBOUR, N.S.—WHARF

Mr. Nowlan:

For a copy of all payrolls for work, labour and services performed, as well as a copy of all accounts and vouchers for goods and material used or supplied in connection with repairs, additions or construction of the government wharf or wharves at Halls Harbour, Kings county, Nova Scotia, during the calendar years 1952 and 1953.

HARBOURVILLE, N.S.—WHARF

Mr. Nowlan:

For a copy of all payrolls for work, labour and services performed, as well as a copy of all accounts and vouchers for goods and material used or supplied in connection with repairs, additions or construction of the government wharf or wharves at Harbourville, Kings county, Nova Scotia, during the calendar years 1952 and 1953.

SCOTTS BAY, N.S.—WHARF

Mr. Nowlan:

For a copy of all payrolls for work, labour and services performed, as well as a copy of all accounts and vouchers for goods and material used or supplied in connection with repairs, additions or construction of the government wharf or wharves at Scotts Bay, Kings county, Nova Scotia, during the calendar years 1952 and 1953.

BRITISH EMPIRE GAMES—BROADCASTING

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of the contract between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the British Empire games committee for the radio broadcasting rights for the British Empire games to be held in Vancouver in 1954, together with a copy of any correspondence or telegrams that have passed between private broadcasting companies and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation relative to the rights of private radio stations to broadcast during the games.

Mr. McCann: I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he would let this motion stand for a day or so, and I shall take it up with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED STATEMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Has the attention of the Acting Prime Minister been drawn to a report today over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), when speaking in the United States yesterday, pledged Canada's help to the United States in the event of war and used these words:

> We range ourselves on the side of freedom, under the leadership of the United States of America.

If the Acting Prime Minister has had this drawn to his attention, will he inform the house whether it represents a new declaration of policy by the government?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): I have not seen the dispatch nor have I seen the Secretary of State for External Affairs for a few days. Perhaps my hon. friend would let the question stand as notice until I can consult with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

OPPOSITION BY INDIA TO UNITED STATES SUPPLYING ARMS TO PAKISTAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to inquire whether or not radio and newspaper reports are correct that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will deal with India's opposition to reported plans of the United States to supply arms to Pakistan.

In view of remarks also attributed to the Prime Minister in Pakistan, will the government inform the house of its policy about a matter which is causing concern to friends of both India and Pakistan?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): I have not been in communication with the Prime Minister for a few days. I have no information as to what was said, but I take it from the dispatch that he talked of Canada's aid to Pakistan and not of the United States' aid to Pakistan. I would think that I would have to be convinced by the Prime Minister himself that he did that.

Mr. Coldwell: Newspaper reports definitely mentioned the United States.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Sometimes the newspapers get a little confused.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the Acting Prime Minister inquire and let us know about it?

[Later:]

REPRESENTATION AT GENEVA CONFERENCE ON KOREA AND INDO-CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs which has to do with the convening of the conference in Geneva in connection with the Korean and Indo-China situation. Was Canada consulted prior to the decision to hold this conference and did Canada agree to the absence of representatives of the Formosan government and to the inclusion of representatives of red China?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have not received notice of this question, but subject to further inquiry I can tell my hon. friend that we did not receive advance information about this but we were informed on February 19 of the result, at the same time as the other nations participating in action in Korea were informed. This took place at a conference at Washington at which the situation was examined. It was felt that the agreement was satisfactory and in line with the United Nations resolution adopted last year. My impression is that the Chinese government would be represented there, but I am not sure and was not informed at the same time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You mean the Formosan government?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. Further, I can say that it is understood that Canada would be afforded an opportunity to attend the meeting at Geneva as one of the sixteen participating nations.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

APPOINTMENT OF HAROLD C. BANKS AS CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister explain why, in appointing a Canadian representative to attend the proceedings now being held at Geneva under the auspices of the international labour organization, the government saw fit to appoint Harold C. Banks, who is a citizen of the United States and who has a record of court convictions in Canada and in the United States?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): In this case, as in others where labour representatives are required, the recommendations of the national organization were passed on to the I.L.O.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I ask a supplementary question? Do I understand that this appointment is made not by the Canadian government but by I.L.O., when the delegate is representing the Canadian government?

Mr. Gregg: The Canadian Minister of Labour concurs with and transmits the recommendation of the national organization required to provide a delegate to I.L.O., so that in that sense the appointment is made by the Minister of Labour.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a supplementary question. In such transmission does the Minister of Labour not express his own judgment as to the advisability of the choice that has been made, or make any inquiry as to the suitability of the person being sent?

Mr. Gregg: The Minister of Labour has the right to make inquiries, and inquiries were made in this case, and it was confirmed that it was the desire of the national organization who made the nomination that this should be their nominee.

Mr. Drew: Another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the Minister of Labour in this case take cognizance of the representations that had been made in regard to the unsuitability of this man, and did he obtain information from the Department of Justice in regard to the record of this man that was placed before the Department of Labour? Is the minister not prepared to answer whether he did exercise his judgment in this case?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Gregg: In response to the question as to whether I conferred with my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), on the appointment, the answer is no.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Speaker; the question was perfectly clear. Did the Minister of Labour exercise his judgment in this case, which he says he had a right to do, to determine that this was a suitable man to send as the Canadian representative on this occasion?

Mr. Gregg: Of course, Mr. Speaker, I exercised my own judgment.

SUGAR BEETS

INQUIRY AS TO ALLEGED TAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): I should like to direct questions to the Minister of Finance, arising from a statement by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) when speaking in St. Thomas and reported in the London Free Press on February 19, referring to taxes on sugar beets? My questions are: Is there any tax on sugar beets? Has there ever been a tax on sugar beets?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): There has never been a tax on sugar beets so far as I am aware. In 1933 my predecessor, Mr. Rhodes, recommended a tax on sugar and that tax was finally repealed in 1947.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO SALE OF PRINCE RUPERT DRYDOCK AND SHIPYARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that the C.N.R. drydock at Prince Rupert has been listed for sale and, in any event, will be closed in March, thereby injuring both the fishing and the shipping industries of British Columbia?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I made a statement on that matter last week, but since then there has been a change. Perhaps I should advise the house that the change came about because of representations made to myself and to certain of my colleagues of the government by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite), and the fact that he brought a delegation from Prince Rupert in the riding of Skeena.

The change is that the Canadian National Railways have now agreed to postpone the sale for a period of six months in the hope that a purchaser may be found and also with the expectation that those keenly interested in the fishing industry in that area may be able to find someone who would be a satisfactory purchaser either of the whole drydock or of a portion thereof.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

CLASSIFICATION OF CANNED MIXED FRUIT AS PEACHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Was the decision of the deputy minister respecting mixed fruits, to which reference was made a few minutes ago, made on his own initiative or after instructions from any member of the cabinet?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The decision made by the deputy minister was made after consultation with the minister.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON OPERATIONS OF WHEAT TERMINALS AT VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to whom I sent notice this morning with a copy of a telegram in which the grain workers' union of Vancouver say that coastal wheat terminals are operating at only 70 per cent of capacity.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member must not read from a telegram. Will he now put his question.

Mr. Winch: I am not reading from a telegram. Can the minister comment on the statement of the trade union in Vancouver that the facilities on the coast are operating at only 70 per cent capacity, and their fear that this is going to cause unemployment, in view of the statement made by the minister the other day on grain prices?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My comment would be that more grain is being shipped from Vancouver today than ever before in history. It is the opinion of competent grain men, including my own officers, that the port is working practically at capacity. If there is unemployment at this level of operation in Vancouver, I am unable to understand how that unemployment could arise.

WHEAT

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF REDUCED PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. For the purpose of clarifying the effect of the reduced price at which wheat is being offered at the lakehead, so far as domestic purchases are concerned, would the Acting Prime Minister state whether or not this price reduction will be borne by the producers of wheat?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The wheat board is the agency of the producers charged with the marketing of wheat on account of the producers. The board is authorized to use its best judgment as to the prices and other factors affecting the sale of wheat. The gross receipts will be divided among all the producers and the amount returned to the producers will be the recovery made by the board from the sale of that wheat.

Mr. Zaplitny: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the result of this reduction at the lakehead mean a lower over-all return to the producers?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Lower than what? I suppose if the board was not able to sell wheat at all the return would be lower. It would certainly be later anyway. As I say, the sales are made by the wheat board on account of the producers with the board using its best judgment as to the basis of the sales. Perhaps my hon. friend can sit back quietly and answer his own question.

[Later:]

PRICE EQUALIZATION POLICY AT FORT WILLIAM, PORT ARTHUR AND VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question arising out of the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). Is it the intention that the setting of different prices for wheat at Fort William and Port Arthur and at Vancouver is to be a permanent policy or is it merely to meet a temporary situation?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In announcing the policy on Thursday last, I said it was a policy of the day. I announced the prices of that day and I said that tomorrow they might be different. The purpose of the policy is to equalize delivered prices from the two ports as far as shipments to England and the continent are concerned. We have had for two or three months a rather absurd situation in that grain destined for the United Kingdom is hauled west from Saskatchewan to Vancouver, then from Vancouver through the Panama canal to England, whereas logical pricing would make it possible to move that grain through eastern ports at a price that would equalize with west coast shipments at the destination. The purpose was to equalize prices at destination, and that will be the purpose in the future. As navigation opens and the St. Lawrence comes into use the price differential will of course be reduced.

Mr. Green: Then in future prices are to be dropped at Vancouver over other points if the quantity of grain going through there does not happen to be of the right proportion?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I did not say that prices would be dropped at Vancouver; I said that prices at delivery points would be equalized.

POLIOMYELITIS

INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION OF POLIO VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if his attention has been drawn to a news item entitled "School Test for Polio Vaccine" which appeared in the New York Times of Monday, February 15, 1954, wherein Dr. Van Riper indicated that the vaccine trials in the United States scheduled to begin February 8 will be delayed owing to a shortage of vaccine? Will the minister comment on the situation and state whether or not production of virus at the Connaught laboratories has in any way delayed this program?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should think that this is the kind of question that could easily go on the order paper, but lest there be any suggestion that this is a matter of great urgency may I say that I did see this article and if there is delay in the testing that delay is as a result of operations outside this country. I visited the Connaught laboratories on Monday last and the production of virus is going on according to plan.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF RUSSIAN TRADE REPRESENTATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and in his absence perhaps the Acting Prime Minister will undertake to answer. Has the government any information concerning the appointment of U.S.S.R. trade representatives to Canada? In the event of such appointments has the government any announcement to make that such ostensible trade representatives may not be used as espionage agents?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the officers of my department have been advised that the U.S.S.R. are sending trade representatives here. We have trade representatives from most countries in the world here in Ottawa and we are prepared to assume that this is a bona fide trade appointment. We have no reason to assume otherwise.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS FOLLOWING REQUEST BY MANITOBA GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if it is his intention to recommend to the house amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act along the lines requested by the government of Manitoba.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the request made by the government of Manitoba was made last November. There have been considerable discussions since and it has been determined here that any decisions which could have been made under an amendment to the act with regard to applications made by the province of Manitoba have been made already to the satisfaction of most farmers, in so far as we could give satisfaction under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. Zaplitny: May I ask a supplementary question. Were the changes referred to by the minister made in the regulations or were they made by order in council?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, no changes were made in the regulations. The administration of the regulations is under a committee of three which meets from time to time and considers any objections that are taken by farmers as to the treatment they receive under the act and regulations. In considering the objections that were taken by farmers in the Dauphin area the committee made decisions which I understand were as near to the satisfaction of the farmers in the area as anything that could be made under any amendments which could have been made without changing the principle of the act itself.

[Mr. Trainor.]

DUMPING

INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION OF AMENDMENT TO ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. The Toronto Daily Star of February 18 contains an article under the headline "Ruling Bars U. S. Bargain Refrigerators." This article refers to a ruling by the minister's department based on a recent amendment to the Customs Act. Would the minister please advise to what particular products this amendment to the Customs Act has so far been applied in order to reduce imports, either by the creation of a mass of red tape or by increasing the percentage rate of the import duty?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): That is a rather detailed question and I shall take it as notice and give an answer later.

SALARIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE SALARIES OF MINISTERS

The house resumed, from Friday, February 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the second reading of Bill No. 172, to amend the Salaries Act.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether, in proposing this legislation, the members of the cabinet appreciate what their colleagues, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), are going to do to them as a result of this increase. It is apparent that the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) has not yet realized the position because, speaking on Friday last, he said, as reported at page 2250 of Hansard:

> Assuming that a minister is a married man with two dependent children, which may be flattering to some of my colleagues, his tax deduction today would be $3,700.

That may have been correct a week ago, but it was not correct on Friday when the Acting Prime Minister spoke.

According to my calculations, a married man with two dependent children, with no other income, would be liable to a tax of $5,375. I hope the Acting Prime Minister will check his figures. I am sure he has no one from the Department of National Revenue or his own bureau of statistics working out his income tax return, because there is a considerable difference between $5,375 and the figure the Acting Prime Minister gave on Friday of $3,700. There is a difference, in fact, of $1,675, and the tax on the new amount will be $2,250. I am not suggesting that these are not sizeable amounts, but I have paid some attention to instructions regarding relevancy since Friday, Mr. Speaker, and if one gives consideration to the relevant amount the present position is this.

A member of the cabinet who has no other income receives a salary on the present basis of $20,000, less $5,375 tax, which would leave $14,625, plus a car allowance of $2,000, which is not taxable, and he would have a total amount of $16,625, or $1,385 per month.

In all seriousness I want to suggest that when one is in a position of obtaining $1,385 per month one should ask oneself whether it is worth it to meet the criticism one must meet in order to receive an extra $230 per month.

I will concede that I do not know a member of the cabinet who would not be in a better position today than he is now if he had never entered public life; but a number of years ago, I am sure for very good reasons, the members of this cabinet decided to enter public life and I for one cannot express a great deal of sympathy for those who have missed making a great fortune.

In fact, I believe some of the unhappiest people I have ever known during my lifetime have been people who made the mistake of trying to accumulate money, and with few exceptions, whether they made a lot or very little money, they missed a great deal in life.

Even if the members of the cabinet were able to save every cent of this increase for ten years it would amount to only $27,500. Again I am not suggesting that is not a considerable sum, but it is a very small amount compared with the fantastic fortunes that have been made by some people in Canadian history.

There was the case of the member of the other place who died recently. In one report I saw his estate valued at $1,750,000 and in another it was estimated at $1,200,000. It takes a long time to save that amount of money even if one saved the entire indemnity of a senator, previous to the last increase. If a senator did not spend one cent of that $6,000, it would take 200 years saving that amount per year to accumulate $1,200,000.

I therefore suggest it is too late now for the members of the cabinet to feel sorry for themselves and to wonder what their position might have been if they had stayed out of public life and devoted their time to practising law or pursuing a business career or doing anything else that might enable them to accumulate a sizeable fortune.

It has been demonstrated in Canadian history that a cabinet can so organize the affairs of the country that we can plan our production and consumption with unemployment and a low standard of living, or full employment and a high standard of living. If the cabinet will so organize our affairs that we can have a high level of employment and a rising standard of living, then they will have no need to worry about the future.

If, on the other hand, our economy cannot be organized so we can have full employment and a high standard of living, then I submit that for them to try to put themselves in a preferred position is folly. I suggest it must be very difficult to explain how one cannot get along on $1,385 per month but that an additional $230 or a total of $1,615 per month after payment of tax would be adequate.

I wish to add before I conclude that I have a very high personal regard for the members of the cabinet. I have never thought that, because I am in opposition, my constituents have suffered. I feel sure that in spite of these critical remarks the views I express will not be held against my constituents when I have occasion to consult members of the cabinet in connection with various problems.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I want to go on record, along with other hon. members, as opposing the bill now before the house for increasing by $5,000 a year the salaries of members of the cabinet. I also want to associate myself with those who have emphasized that their remarks were in no way directed against the persons who compose the present Canadian cabinet.

My opposition to this bill is based on my belief that this bill would not be in the best interests of the people of Canada if it were passed by parliament at this time. I believe hon. members should bear in mind, and I believe the cabinet should also remember this, that they are now assured of an increase in salary amounting to $4,000 a year because of the fact that they are members of parliament. Members of the cabinet will now receive a salary of $22,000 per year instead of $18,000 per year which prevailed when this parliament began.

I believe $22,000 a year is sufficient for a cabinet minister and in keeping with our concept of democracy and the present economic prospects for the rest of the people of this country. I can think of occasions when an increase in the salaries of cabinet ministers would be absolutely necessary. I believe such an increase would be necessary if we had gone through a period of violent inflation which had made the purchasing power of salaries so low that an increase became absolutely necessary. It is true that we have gone through a period of inflation. However, I believe the result of that inflation has been overcome, as far as the cabinet is concerned, to a considerable extent by the increase that has already been placed in effect. I would think, too, that it would be quite in order for the government to move an increase in cabinet ministers' salaries in keeping with general increases in the economic standard of living of the people of Canada. But it seems to me that at the present time the prospects for the average Canadian are perhaps for a lowering of the standard of living rather than for an increase in it.

An hon. Member: It has never been better.

Mr. Argue: Certainly the most optimistic prediction I have heard from any minister of the government is that the rate of improvement in our standard of living is likely to be less in the future than it has been in the recent past. I say that if the vast majority of Canadians could look forward to a continuing increase in the standard of living over the next few years, then perhaps a move like this one might be justified.

Just previous to the present debate we had a debate on unemployment. The business for the house today is, first, the measure we are now discussing, to be followed by a debate on unemployment. I cannot see any consistency in the proposal now advanced to increase the salaries of members of the government and I cannot understand how their arguments for an increase can be justified if they are to be followed in a few moments perhaps by the very opposite arguments against doing something immediate about unemployment. In other words, when unemployed workers come to the House of Commons and to parliament they are met by ministers of the government saying to them, "Your wages have gone up by a tremendous rate; you are helping to price yourselves out of the market; the best thing you can do is to change employment", and then the next time saying, "We need an increase in cabinet ministers' salaries".

Mr. Fulton: Is the hon. member suggesting a change of employment on the opposite side of the house?

Mr. Argue: That change might follow. I do not know. The public decided a year ago that there should be no change in employment. Of course, I think the public came to their conclusion without the benefit of any advance knowledge of the bill now under discussion. Nevertheless, the country decided the political party that should form the government, and that political party will continue in office during this parliament. I do not know who is the author of the note that was just handed to me, but it says "They will price themselves out of the market". I do not know just what that means but at any rate it sounds like something I could support. To suggest an increase of $9,000 a year, made up of $4,000 increase as a member of parliament and $5,000 as a cabinet minister, is advancing a proposition that, at this stage in our economic development, is fantastic. People working in the farm implement industry have been told that their wages are too high in relation to the competitive position of the country. They have been told that $2.14 an hour for the members of that industry is a wage that has resulted in pricing themselves out of the market. A wage of $2.14 an hour in that industry means an income of $60 a week or $3,000 a year. This bill when enacted—if it is enacted—will result in a total increase of $9,000 a year; in other words, the amount of that increase is three times as much as the income of these individuals who were told, not so long ago, that their wages were at a point where they were pricing themselves out of the market.

I may not be the brightest student of economics but I cannot understand how one moment you can say to workers that $2.14 an hour is such a high wage that you are pricing yourselves out of the market and then come to parliament with a bill such as the one we have before us this afternoon.

The net income of farmers went down last year and the year before, 1952. The forecasts are that farm income in 1954 will go down. The forecasts are that the cost of living will level out or will go down. I for one believe that the present rate of pay, without this measure, to members of the government is sufficient. In a democracy such as ours I believe that members of the government—yes, members of parliament—should be paid an income in keeping with their responsibilities, if you like, one that will give them and their families, while they are carrying on in public life, an amount sufficient to remove severe financial worries. I imagine that it would be rather difficult to give your undivided attention to the needs of the country if you are compelled to consider your own economic situation and if you are faced with a good deal of worry on that account. However, it seems to me that if this bill were turned down, the present state of affairs would give the cabinet ministers a reasonable remuneration.

I suppose that the personnel of the cabinet are like the personnel in the House of Commons, or in the C.C.F. group or that you may meet in any walk of life. You have the kind of people you have in a school class. You have good students, fair students and below average students. I suppose that in the cabinet there are cabinet ministers—I do not know which ones they are—who have not quite so much ability as have certain other cabinet ministers. But the cabinet ministers whom I see in the front row of the government benches this afternoon in this house could go out of parliament, I am sure, and earn far more than they will get even with the passage of this measure.

Mr. Hodgson: Not all of them.

Mr. Argue: I said "those in the front row". I was being careful. I think I could perhaps even move into the second row and include the cabinet ministers that I see in their seats there this afternoon. As I say, I do not know which ones you would put ahead of which other members of the cabinet, but I am sure that a great many of the cabinet ministers could in private life earn far more than they will get from the passage of this measure. So whether this bill is passed or not, it will not bring the same financial remuneration that they would have if they had not come into public service. I know that the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe)—and this is well known—could have continued to make far more in his private business than he could representing the country. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) came from a very responsible position, the premier of a province, into the cabinet. I believe that the members of the cabinet, yes members of parliament generally, come to parliament hoping that they will be able to render a public service by accepting such a position.

I do not really believe this increase will get better cabinet ministers. I do not believe it will result in getting cabinet ministers of any lesser ability than we now have. I do not believe people join a political party, run for office as members of parliament, and are accepted into the cabinet because of the pay that is involved. Rather, I think they accept those responsibilities in the hope that they will be rendering a service to their country. I feel that the remuneration now provided, without this measure, is in keeping with the responsibilities and the dignity of the position that they now have.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) speaks now, he will close the debate.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): I have been amazed at the course of this debate. A good many reasons have been advanced as to why members in this house will oppose this bill. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) opposes it because he thinks other systems of remuneration might be more appropriate. The method of remuneration that is proposed is the traditional method. It was established at confederation and has continued throughout the years. From my experience, I believe that it is the proper method of remuneration for men who are asked to work as a team in the cabinet of this country.

The Leader of the Opposition spoke of the British system. There is a little variation in the British system. The Prime Minister receives, as first lord of the treasury rather than as Prime Minister, a salary of £10,000 per annum, and that continues throughout his lifetime. The Lord Chancellor also receives £10,000 per annum. The Attorney General receives £10,000 per annum, and the Solicitor General receives £7,000 per annum. All members of the cabinet other than those named receive £5,000 per annum. It might be of interest to note that under that system the chief whip in the Commons receives £3,000 per annum and the Leader of the Opposition receives £2,000 per annum. I doubt if the Leader of the Opposition would be too well pleased with his salary under that system, nor would he be pleased for long with the situation that obtains now.

At the moment the Prime Minister of this country and the Leader of the Opposition receive exactly the same salary and exactly the same perquisites.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister if he is not wrong in that statement? He said the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister received the same salary.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): At the moment.

Mr. Fulton: But they do not receive the same perquisites.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They get a free house and free travel.

Mr. Green: No, not from the taxpayers.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What rent does the Leader of the Opposition pay?

Mr. Fulton: I know the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) would not want to leave a wrong impression in the country. The taxpayers do not provide the Leader of the Opposition with a house.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is provided by friends of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Macdonnell: We are talking about taxpayers.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They both get free houses, except that the Prime Minister chooses to pay $5,000 a year rent for his house. However, I am simply pointing out that I think the Leader of the Opposition would be the first to agree that the Prime Minister carries responsibilities in this country which do not fall upon the shoulders of the Leader of the Opposition. In the absence of the Leader of the Opposition I think I can say fairly that he would not be happy to have the present position maintained.

I see the Leader of the Opposition is now entering the chamber, so I shall repeat my statement and he can object if he wishes. I was pointing out the British scale of salaries, and I was saying that I did not think the Leader of the Opposition would be too happy if we adopted the pattern that is used there. I said also I did not think he would be too happy about the situation that obtains at the moment, when the salaries and the perquisites of the Prime Minister and Leader of the Opposition are exactly the same. I think I am correct in that.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps since this has been directed to me I might point out that that is only an accident of circumstances. The reason the leader of the opposition is receiving the same as the Prime Minister is that it happens that the leader of the opposition in Westminster was prime minister and is receiving—

Mr. Abbott: No, in Canada.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with that, because the Acting Prime Minister obviously has not read the measure.

Mr. Abbott: The measure is not through yet. You are opposing it.

Mr. Knowles: Some of us know the circumstances upon which the Acting Prime Minister is basing that statement. He makes it clear when he says "at the moment" that he is referring to the fact that the bill amending the Senate and House of Commons Act was given royal assent last Tuesday. Since that date the salary of the Leader of the Opposition has been raised to the salary the Prime Minister is receiving until this bill is passed. It is only an accident in the timing of these bills that enables him to make that statement, and I suggest that the minister should admit he is having a bit of fun at the expense of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My statement is correct, at the moment.

Mr. Hodgson: The Acting Prime Minister is leaving a wrong inference there, which I feel he ought to clarify.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It has been said by several speakers that the glory of being a cabinet minister should be compensation enough; the salary should not matter. Perhaps it is enough for the head of the family; but is it enough for his wife and children? After all, most members of this cabinet are spending the most productive years of their lives in the service of the crown, years when I think all of them could be making provision not only for their old age but for the future and education of their family. I know from my experience in the cabinet over the years that the salaries are not sufficient in themselves to permit suitable provision for their wives and children.

People may think it is rather embarrassing for me to stand here and plead for a raise in pay for myself. I may say that this is not a movement by the cabinet as a whole. It is a movement by three or four older members of the cabinet who are not particularly concerned about their own salary, and who no longer have dependents. They are trying to right an injustice which has been allowed to continue far too long.

This is the fourth time since confederation that the salaries of cabinet ministers have been increased. They are not increased often. The period which has elapsed since the last increase is the longest by far of any of the periods during which cabinet ministers' salaries have been unchanged. The present salaries were fixed in 1920. When any changes have been made in the past, the increase has been about 50 per cent, and we are following that pattern once again. Does anyone know of any class of salaries that have not been increased by 50 per cent since 1920? I do not know of any class of salaries that have not. I believe that in fixing the rate of increase we have not only followed the pattern, but have made a reasonable adjustment of the salary scales referred to in the bill.

Mr. Bennett was discussing these very same salaries I am discussing today when he spoke back in 1931; and that was a year, as my hon. friends from Saskatchewan will know, when wheat was selling at 20 cents a bushel on the farms. This was what Mr. Bennett had to say, as it appears at page 4507 of Hansard for that year:

> But it is unfair to ask men to leave their homes and their professions, in many instances their future, and come to the city of Ottawa and live here, maintaining that position which they are bound to maintain by virtue of their office, and then find themselves, at the end of a term of office, hopelessly bankrupt. That has happened in this city. It has happened during the last few years that one of the leading ministers of the crown found himself in that position, and when he departed this life his estate indicated that that was so.

Men in politics should not be compelled to rely upon the benefaction of friends or otherwise, so far as the duty they owe the state is concerned; and when men serve Canada for the miserable pittance they get, as compared with what they would receive if they were practising their professions—they would get twice as much—to say that they should come here and find themselves, after a term of office, with their little savings gone, with their families on the threshold of life, without much opportunity to get an education because of the cost, and then to expect them to maintain the dignity of their office, entertaining, dispensing hospitality, treating visitors as they should treat them, moving to and fro, from one place to another, maintaining cars, I do not believe that anybody would suggest that this is at all reasonable.

Mr. Bennett, speaking in 1931, was talking about present-day cabinet ministers' salaries. As I say, I think the comment that other systems should be reviewed is hardly one that would lead hon. members to vote against this measure.

I was very interested in what was said by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), who said that he does not know enough about the salaries position to be able to vote for the bill, and that therefore he would vote against it. I would point out that the hon. member for many years was general manager of one of the greatest trust companies in the country, a company with branches from coast to coast; and I think if anyone should know about salaries, the hon. member for Greenwood should be that man—and about pensions, as well.

I hope the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) will not vote against the measure for the reason he is not sure we are not paying cabinet ministers too much. In his idle moments he can go out, after he has performed his duties as a member of parliament, and, as the head of one of the great pulp and paper companies in the country, draw a salary three or four times as great as the salaries we are discussing here.

I could pass along the same thought to several other members in the house. I see the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle) in his seat. I hope he is not going to say that he will vote against the measure because he thinks no man can earn that much money. I could even find a member in the C.C.F. party who should not be appalled at the scale of salary indicated in the measure. I think he knows something about salaries as large as that, and that he has also earned as large a salary in his idle moments, after completing his duties here in the house.

However, I do not know that we want to pursue that point any farther. I was interested in the reason given by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for not supporting the measure. He said he could not support it because he does not think the car allowance provision is legal. All we know about the car allowance legislation—and he tells us it was drafted by the present Auditor General—is that it was sponsored in the house by the then prime minister of Canada, who was certainly one of the great legal authorities of his generation. It has been passed upon from time to time by law officers of the crown. And, just to make sure, in the last two or three days I referred it to the law officers of the crown, and they tell me that the provision introduced by Mr. Bennett, in 1931, is a continuing provision that will be the law of the land until it is repealed by parliament. The argument that it could be regarded as a temporary measure is one that would convince no one, except the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

It has been suggested by others that if we pass the bill it will upset the welfare legislation that we have enacted. I have heard some statements about unemployment insurance payments. I have heard it suggested that the $24 a week unemployment insurance payment, what has been described as a mere pittance, will be cut if this bill is passed. I have heard it suggested that payments to veterans will be cut, and that somehow this bill is going to affect payments to the blind. I did not hear a similar reference with regard to family allowances; I am sure hon. members must have overlooked them. Let me give an assurance that none of those benefits will be cut if this bill passes the house.

It has been suggested by the leader of the C.C.F. party that he speaks for his group in opposing the measure.

An hon. Member: No, no.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, I was going to say that I think there is at least one hon. member sitting in that group whose feet are on the ground, and who had a down to earth view of practical problems. And I have often thought I would like to attend a C.C.F. caucus when certain measures were being discussed. I am sure I would enjoy that, but that cannot be my privilege.

I do not wish to discuss the matter further. As I say, this measure is being sponsored by three or four older members of the government. We think it is a duty we owe to our successors and to our younger colleagues who, we have reason to know, cannot carry on the very onerous duties of their positions without also having on their minds domestic financial problems that certainly should not have to be a source of worry to them.

That is my submission, Mr. Speaker.

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Salaries of ministers.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, when the Acting Prime Minister spoke a few moments ago he made two statements to which I must take exception. First he indicated that my reason for being opposed to this legislation had to do solely with the matter of the motorcar allowances. I think he will be the first to admit that when I began my remarks on Friday I indicated my opposition to the bill was in relation to its substance. I am opposed to the proposed increases. I introduced the question of the motorcar allowance as a subsidiary reason why I was opposed to the bill.

The other statement which the Acting Prime Minister made to which I must take exception was his remark that I had alleged that the paying of the motorcar allowance was illegal. Had it not been for the fact that I knew we would shortly be in committee of the whole when I would be able to deal with the point I would have raised a point of order or a question of privilege at that time. I felt that this was the easier way to do it. I would remind the Acting Prime Minister that when I discussed this question of the motorcar allowance on Friday, February 19, I said, as reported on page 2259 of Hansard:

> I am not alleging that the paying out of this money is illegal.

I made that quite clear on Friday, as I have done on previous occasions. I then went on to say:

> If it were the Auditor General would have said so long ago. But I am asserting in the words of the Auditor General that although it may be proper to deal with a transitory matter by means of items in the estimates, it is not fair to parliament nor to the recipients to continue year after year making payments of this kind on the basis of an item in the Appropriation Act of 1931, which was spent long ago.

I certainly do not intend to take the time of the committee in repeating the arguments which I advanced on Friday of last week, but I would remind the government that Mr. Watson Sellar, the Auditor General, made it perfectly clear that although this practice was legal it had undesirable characteristics, that it was not the proper way to make a payment which is to be made year after year and that it should be dealt with in some other manner. The Auditor General has suggested two or three times that there were other ways in which an item such as this should be handled.

Just in case you may be wondering, Mr. Chairman, and it would be a perfectly proper point for you to wonder about, how this question of motorcar allowances comes in in relation to the salaries of ministers, I would point out to you and to members of the committee generally that the bill before us is to amend the Salaries Act. That act now provides for each minister a salary of $10,000, but if you open the blue book of estimates to the first item of any department—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Look at page 152.

Mr. Knowles: Page 152 is in the breakdown in the back of the book and the minister is perfectly correct in drawing attention to that. He is referring to his own department, the Department of Defence Production, but I remind the Acting Prime Minister that we do not pass the details in the back of the book; we deal with the estimates as they are set out in the front.

On page 12 we find the item to which the minister is now referring, "Minister of Defence Production—salary and motorcar allowance, $12,000". My point is that since the present $10,000 item in the statute becomes an item of $12,000 in the estimates we can only assume that if this bill should pass and the minister's salary becomes $15,000, in next year's blue book of estimates that $15,000 will turn up as $17,000. True it may be shown as salary and motorcar allowance, but the two will be put together in that way.

If one were to ask next year as to the basis upon which that amount is called statutory, he will no doubt be told that $15,000 of it is on the basis of the Salaries Act and the other $2,000 is on the basis of an item in the 1931 estimates. My colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, says that in other words there is no statutory authority. The authorities would argue about that point back and forth. Those who would take the government side would say that it is what is known as a continuing item. I think Mr. Watson Sellar has been very clear that a continuing item is all right for something that is transitory, but it is not all right for an item being continued across the years. The remarks of the Acting Prime Minister when he closed the debate on second reading today implied that it was going to stay there in that way for a long time to come.

As I said on Friday, when we get to clause 2 of this bill we will find that we are tidying up a matter that is parallel to this one. I shall not discuss it now because that is under another clause, but I think it is proper for me to point out that if we are tidying up a point parallel to this one, we should be tidying up this one at the same time. I for one am disappointed that this has not been dealt with on this occasion. If it is not dealt with now when the Salaries Act is being amended the chances of it being dealt with so far as this statute is concerned become very poor.

Of course, there is one other way it could be handled. The government could pay some attention not merely to what I have said but to what the Auditor General has said and provide in next year's estimates an item for the motorcar allowance set out separately from each minister's salary, and put it in as a numbered item rather than as an "S" item, so that parliament could actually vote upon it.

I have referred to this matter a number of times and on several occasions I thought the Prime Minister appreciated the point and was interested in having matters of this kind tidied up. The last occasion on which I drew the matter to his attention was on June 29, 1951, when I related this item in a general way to other items similar to it and asked him if any progress was being made in tidying up these matters. The answer the Prime Minister gave, as reported at page 4970 of Hansard, is as follows:

Progress is being made, but we have not yet reached the end we shall have achieved when the progress has been completed.

Well, of course, that produced a laugh in the house and brought that particular exchange to an end, but I dared to hope that it signified that attention was being given to the point. I see that attention has been given to one of these matters and we are being asked to deal with it in this bill. That comes up under the next clause. But this one has not been touched. I had hoped that consideration might be given to this matter over the week end and that that consideration would result in a willingness on the part of the government to deal with it in this statute. The words of the Acting Prime Minister a few moments ago do not suggest that that has been the result of such thinking, though I still hope it might be considered.

If the government is not prepared to make this change by a change in the Salaries Act, then I ask that consideration be given to separating the motorcar allowance from the salaries in the estimates, and putting it in as an item that we can vote every year, in the same way in which we vote an item covering the extra $4,000 paid to parliamentary assistants. No one has ever suggested putting the word "annually" into that item and no one has ever tried to make it a continuing item. We vote on it every year and the same should be done with respect to the motorcar allowance.

If the situation is not to be dealt with in a more satisfactory manner than has been the case thus far, I would like to hear from the Acting Prime Minister, or the Minister of Finance, or any other member of the cabinet who wishes to answer the question, as to when and by whom the decision was made that this motorcar allowance was to be free of income tax.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, the point at issue is an interesting one. It is really a battle between legal giants. As I said, the statute was framed by Mr. R. B. Bennett, when he was prime minister, and it has been discussed by Mr. St. Laurent, who is also a legal authority. My hon. friend, on the basis of his legal training and experience, does not like it. I do not know that we can do much about it. We are told that this statute is a statute of Canada and it is binding until it is repealed. The purpose of this bill is not to repeal it. This is a separate piece of legislation. The hon. member asks why the allowance is tax-free. The answer is, because it was voted to cover an expenditure for a definite purpose. Before 1931, from the time when automobiles were invented, each minister of the crown had an automobile and a chauffeur at his disposal. That is still true in most of the countries I have visited. I do not think I have ever been in a country where members of the government were not furnished with motorcars and drivers. We do not have that provision here and I personally am not sorry. If we have an official visitor I can lend him my car, providing my wife is not using it and I do not require it. Otherwise he would have to travel by taxi. That is all right, but in 1931 it was not the desire to lower, if you like, the standard of government representation, and it was the intention to do away with that practice of providing automobiles and instead make an allowance which could be used for the purpose indicated.

An expenditure of that kind is, of course, when properly authorized, not taxable and that is the reason an expenditure for a definite purpose by a minister is tax free. My hon. friend will realize that even parliamentary salaries paid to members of parliament include $2,000 which is set aside as an expense account and it is not taxed. The two items are on a par. An hon. member not a member of the government receives $2,000 which is set aside for his expenses and a minister receives $2,000 which is set aside for automobile expense.

Mr. Knowles: On that particular point, the $2,000 expense allowance is covered by a section in the Senate and House of Commons Act. The wording there, if I recall it, is odd; at least it is odd to me, in that it is in a negative form. It does not say that the expense allowance paid to private members is tax free. On the contrary, it says that the expense allowance in the case of senators, cabinet ministers and the Leader of the Opposition is taxable; but I take it it has been resolved from that that since the other recipients of that allowance are not included in the taxable category therefore in their case it is tax free.

I am getting some free legal advice from a very good lawyer here who tells me that it is not on that basis at all but because it is referred to as an expense allowance. The point I would like to have cleared up then is this. Who actually made the decision that the motorcar allowance was the type of allowance that through all these years should be free of income tax? Was it made by someone in the income tax department, someone in the justice department, or was it made by the cabinet? Certainly it was not made by parliament.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The wording of the item indicates that it was to be a continuing payment to cover an expenditure.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to go into the realm of the legal aspects of the motorcar allowance. It has been in existence since 1931 and it is about time somebody made up his mind about it. I do not think I am the person to give advice about that. My experience with the income tax people has been that if there is anything coming to them they generally get it.

But I want to make a few observations of a general nature on this first item, Mr. Chairman, because I anticipate that as we go through the different clauses of the bill there are going to be amendments. I voted for the resolution which preceded this bill and the indemnity bill and I am going to vote for this bill all the way through, as I indicated when I voted on the resolution. I will do so because I do not believe, after listening to all of the arguments on unemployment, social security measures, and so forth, that they enter into this picture at all. I do not believe you can strengthen the weak by weakening the strong. That has been my attitude from the very start of discussions on this bill.

I also like to see a difference of opinion even among a group because if you get one, two or three people thinking exactly alike it indicates that only one of these people is thinking at all. The rest are merely going along.

Mr. MacInnis: There must be a lot of people on that side of the house not thinking.

Mr. Gillis: I am drawing no distinction between the two sides of the house.

Mr. MacInnis: About 170 I should think.

Mr. Gillis: In this particular case there are at least two of us in this group who are trying to do our own thinking. However, putting this increase for cabinet ministers on the basis of income or salary is in my opinion basing it on the wrong premise. I believe the Acting Prime Minister put it in its proper perspective when he said the cabinet minister's indemnity is a compensation which permits him to meet the commitments imposed upon him because of the office he occupies.

Commitments made by cabinet ministers or by members of this house are not organized or brought about by themselves. They are commitments that are organized for them by someone else. They are passed on to you. You meet the bill whether you like it or not. I have never looked upon the compensation paid either to members or to the cabinet as being a matter of salaries. It is a straight matter of enabling you to meet your commitments.

As the Acting Prime Minister pointed out, there is only one thing wrong with this legislation, namely that it should have been brought in in 1941 or 1942. That is when it should have been brought in. I think the cabinet of that day and the prime minister of that day missed the boat. I am sure that most hon. members who take a reasonable view of the matter will agree that, after a lapse of 33 years, it is time there was an adjustment in the indemnities that are paid in this house, all round. As far as the cabinet is concerned, that indemnity was fixed back in 1933, when their commitments were relatively simple compared with what you have got to meet today. As far as I am concerned, I am going to say this quite frankly. I would not accept a cabinet post for any money, because no money could compensate you for the misery you are obliged to go through; and I have seen enough of it. You go to a dinner; it is a delegation; and you pay for the dinner, generally. You go to a luncheon; it is a delegation; and the same thing occurs. Then someone out in Vancouver decides that they want you in Vancouver, so you go to Vancouver whether you like it or not and you pay the shot for what it costs you. If you are wanted down in Nova Scotia, you do the same thing whether you like it or not or whether it is important or not. You get the call and you go.

When you get right down to it, on the question "Will you run?" there are members of this cabinet who were drafted since I came into this house. The Prime Minister was drafted. There is not any question about that fact. I was here when he first came into the house and took over the justice portfolio. At that time he made it quite clear that the end of the war was the end of his term, and that he came in for the purpose of making his contribution towards the war. We all know—those who are honest enough to admit it—that he wanted to get out when the war was over but that he was "pressured" into staying by a large number of people in this country.

The Minister of Labour was drafted. He was taken in in the same way. He was given a cabinet post before he came into the house. If members are thinking in terms of the future of this country and not in terms of votes, they will take the view that any reasonable person will take when he considers this fact. Back in 1931 when the indemnity was fixed, you came in here, took a cabinet post and ran the little show that was going on in Canada, with a billion dollars or so of gross national product. It was a relatively simple matter to administer the affairs of Canada at that time. But it is not so simple today, as will be seen when you take a look at the expenditures for veterans, pensions and social security measures you have gone into. Those are perhaps not so hard to handle but when you take a look at the development of T.C.A., you will realize that you must have in the cabinet someone who knows something about Trans-Canada Air Lines. You cannot just pick up somebody off the street and send him in to supervise that vast organization under which comes steamships, Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines. There must be someone in there who knows something about these matters.

Again, consider the development of Polymer Corporation. You have to have someone in the cabinet who knows something about it. When the present Acting Prime Minister decides to hang up the boxing gloves, I sometimes wonder how long we are going to hold on to some of these crown companies that were developed with a great deal of opposition from the outside, and also from the inside in this chamber. You are going to need someone in there who knows something about that Polymer set-up and the value it will have to Canada in the future. We do not want to find ourselves in our bare feet, for want of rubber, again in the middle of a war —as happened last time—while the synthetic formula that was held in the United States was sent over and given to the Germans when Burma fell and the rest of our rubber resources were folding up. The Acting Prime Minister I think was the prime mover in the development of Polymer. It is a big job to watch that organization and to see that it makes proper progress.

The situation is the same with regard to Canadian Arsenals, the basis of the munitions industry, something that we in this group all fought for. Today it is doing most of the research in developing patents for small arms, munitions, and so forth. You want in the cabinet somebody who is going to be able to make a fair appraisal of that kind of organization.

I do not look upon the amount of money involved today as a salary or as a compensation for the job at all. I think you are recognizing the fact that since the indemnity was set, the commitments that a cabinet minister has to meet have gone up not by 50 per cent but by 500 per cent; and that is not saying anything at all about the work involved. You are now making an attempt to adjust the matter. I want to say this also. If we want to be fair, we will realize that there are not many members in that cabinet who are going to enjoy that income for very long. They are all about in the same position as that in which I am, thinking about hanging up the boxing gloves and playing with their grandchildren.

Mr. Knowles: They may find themselves going on unemployment insurance.

Mr. Gillis: I believe that the cabinet today is doing something that is going to be of benefit to those who may come after us. What did we have to do during the war when we swung over into a planned economy? You did not pick technicians out of the air. Someone had to run the show, and it had to be someone who knew something about it. We had to go to industry all across this country. When the government went into a partially planned economy, at least to plan the war, they had to go out and take technicians from all over the country, from industry and from commerce, establishing everything that was needed by way of technical services, and they had to pay them. It is not reasonable for us to take the position that, when we take a man like Donald Gordon, say to him, "You run the Canadian National Railways" and pay him $50,000 a year, yet as to the man who supervises the operation, namely the Minister of Transport, $10,000 is good enough for him. Why the difference? Who is working for whom? Who is supposed to be the best qualified person? I think the man who supervises the whole set-up and is responsible to the people of Canada has the greatest responsibility. He has to have a great deal of knowledge.

Then there is the governor of the Bank of Canada, and his assistant. You pay him $30,000 a year. The Minister of Finance is his boss. So the boss works for $10,000 and the man he is bossing is entitled to $30,000. And so it goes right on through your civil service in the top brackets. I think the time is long past when we should have made some kind of adjustment like this. As I said before, the timing is bad. I do not think that bringing in unemployment insurance and all these things is relevant at all. I initiated the debate in this house on unemployment.

Mr. Fulton: You certainly did not.

Mr. Gillis: Oh, I did. The opposition—and I will leave the leader out this time—

Mr. Fulton: We just waited for the appropriate time.

Mr. Gillis: If the Leader of the Opposition had been in the house he would not have taken that short-cut. I would have had the floor, as it was understood I would have had it the day before. I did not bring that matter up—

Mr. Fulton: You tried to get it in at the wrong time, knowing that it was the wrong time.

Mr. Gillis: My immature political friend from Kamloops should not have raised it. It merely gave me a chance to put on the record the fact that I think the opposition played a very discourteous trick that day in exercising their prerogative of getting up first because they are closer to the Speaker. However, that debate is continuing, and I have not changed my opinion so far as the unemployed are concerned. I shall fight as hard as anyone in this house for them. I always have. The same facts apply not only to the unemployed but to all these social security measures, because that is something I have been doing all my life. I do not intend to change that.

However, I also have this complex. I have had to go before a good many employers over the years and negotiate wages with them. This time the position is reversed. The cabinet are negotiating wages with us. We happen to be in the position of the employer. We can say we will grant it or we will not grant it. I have thought a lot about this, and I have read a lot about it. I made the statement at the resolution stage that a proportionate adjustment was being made for the members of parliament and the cabinet to enable them to meet commitments that the general public had fixed for them. I think they are fair, just and reasonable. It is a measure that is long overdue.

I do not think the dragging in of extraneous matters, these other little things, has any relevancy to the subject at all. Either the ministers are entitled to it or they are not. So far as I am concerned they are entitled to it.

I said when the resolution was before us that I intended to follow the measure all the way through, and I still intend to do so. I just wanted to take a few minutes to put my opinion concerning this matter on the record, as I had not done so before, and because of some statements I have heard this afternoon.

Mr. Drew: I rise particularly, Mr. Chairman, to deal with a remark made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South concerning a motion that is before the house in regard to another subject matter. He stated that if I had been here the motion would not have been introduced, referring to the question of unemployment. Might I assure the hon. member that if I had been here I would have introduced the motion myself. There was no agreement, there was no understanding, and it would have been entirely inconsistent with what has taken place in this house if the opposition, which has been constantly demanding action to create employment, had not been the party to raise the motion that was raised. I most certainly would have presented it myself had I been here.

May I say to the bubbling Secretary of State, who finds this so amusing, that he may well recall some of the statements already on the record concerning what the predecessor of the present Prime Minister had to say about this same problem on an earlier occasion. He might bear in mind his close association with those facts, perhaps even some of the words, when he deals with the subject so lightly on this occasion.

I want to refer briefly to the point that has been made. I must say that what has been said by the hon. member who just sat down must be music to the ears of the Acting Prime Minister, and it certainly was obviously music to the ears of hon. members opposite. It is indeed special pleading of a very interesting kind in support of the measure that is now before us. In so far as this party is concerned, the arguments that have been presented have not been inconsistent with anything that may be said about the dignity of the office of prime minister or any member of the government.

We have made it quite clear that we recognize the need for the service in government of men of the highest ability. The position we have taken is that this is something that calls for examination and inquiry as to the best way in which it should be done. We are not bound by the precedents of Westminster by any manner of means. Nevertheless, we have borrowed our whole parliamentary system from Westminster, and have not hesitated to admit that fact. On many occasions the present Prime Minister has made it clear that he recognizes our debt to Westminster in that respect.

It may be notable that only within the last few days a select committee appointed by that house has been dealing with the very problem we have been discussing here. This committee has made recommendations, and those recommendations have already raised a storm in Britain, not merely because the amounts are to be increased but because of the belief that it is inappropriate to deal with the subject in this way without due regard to the wider factors that are before them.

There are alternative methods of recognizing executive ability. I have no doubt that the hon. member who just sat down would be the last to suggest that every union organizer in this country receives the same remuneration. Experience and responsibility do count, and the very nature of the office has some bearing on the amount that will be received. I believe we are in agreement on the basic considerations. Having accepted that proposition, and taking the argument of the Prime Minister that we should examine this from the point of view of recognizing executive ability, then I can only go one step farther and say that executive ability is not recognized by the same flat salary. It is recognized by seeking to make the salary an amount that will be in keeping with the responsibilities.

Mr. Abbott: Will the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. Abbott: What policy did he follow when he was premier of Ontario with respect to the members of his cabinet? Did he recommend a difference in salaries between them?

Mr. Drew: Salaries were not differentiated there, Mr. Chairman, nor were the salaries anything comparable with what is mentioned here. The salaries were so small that it would have been impossible to have a differentiation between them. Of course I remember that when those salaries were paid at the time I was there, the recipients had not the heavy load of taxes that has come about because of the waste and extravagance of this government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Actually we had not yet reached that level of taxation that has been imposed upon the people during the past few years. In reply to the statement made by the Minister of Finance may I say that I put forward precisely the same view in Ontario that I am putting forward now. This subject was dealt with by a committee of the legislature.

Mr. Abbott: I am sure the hon. member would not want to be inaccurate. When he was premier of Ontario income taxes were very much higher than they are today.

Mr. Drew: A casual interjection of that kind does not get away from the fact that this year the people of Canada are going to pay more in taxes than they have ever paid before in peace or war. In spite of the interjection by the Minister of Finance, I am going to come back to the matter that is before us.

An hon. Member: Yes; that is wiser.

Mr. Drew: Yes, as the Minister of Finance has said, wisely.

Mr. Abbott: I did not say that at all.

Mr. Drew: I was going to compliment him upon the wisdom of that remark. I withdraw it, if he did not make it, because I was going to say it would be wise if we were to carry forward the discussion, after the remark he made which carried us away from it.

I would simply point out that what we have sought to do is make it clear to the house that when hon. members are telling other people, who are dependent upon decisions of parliament, that we must be fully informed in regard to all the facts before we act in any of those matters, that is the very time we ourselves should be fully informed in regard to any possible alternative, or as to the right figures that should be dealt with.

We have suggested one way in which this can be done. We have made it clear that we will support the idea of either a royal commission or a select committee of the house. Either method would be following the same procedure which has been so satisfactory in relation to other proceedings in this house and in relation to proceedings of this very kind at Westminster, from which we have borrowed so many of our practices.

I can only repeat what I have said before, that if we followed this course we would in no way be shelving responsibility. No royal commission or select committee can make any legislative decisions. These are proper and sensible devices by which a whole situation can be examined independently and without pressure. These are methods by which alternative proposals can be considered, and appropriate action decided in each case.

I did not say I was convinced that we must of necessity have a sliding scale, or that we must have different levels. I pointed out that in other jurisdictions there are different levels of ministerial salaries. I pointed out the fact that, for instance, in Great Britain a prime minister receives a salary not only while he is prime minister but for the rest of his life, if he accepts it. Other jurisdictions have dealt with the matter in other ways.

I have simply proposed in relation to this measure, and in relation to another measure with which we dealt on an earlier occasion, that we should, when this whole matter is under review, follow the wise and sensible course of examining the possibility of arriving at figures by some consideration of what the real factors actually are. Then in reaching this decision we would be able to say that we followed the same tests in reaching conclusions as we apply over and over again when other people depending upon the decisions of parliament ask us for consideration.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I thought I had said all I intended to say on this subject the other day; and it is with a great deal of reluctance that I take up the time of the committee now. I think we should be fair enough with each other, when we take sides on any issue, not to consider that we are just little white saints and that those who take the opposite view are doing it from dirty political motives.

I mentioned the other day that I like the members of the cabinet very much. Nothing would please me better than to please them: but even to please them I am not going to tell them that I think they are supermen, because I do not believe they are. I believe they are just ordinary run of the mill individuals. Take any of the members back here in this corner, and put them in those cabinet positions, with the civil service staff and the deputy ministers available, and they would give just as good an account of themselves as the present ministers.

I have seen cabinet ministers come and go. I could go through the whole lot of them and ask them—and also ask my hon. friend from Cape Breton South—what qualifications they had for those positions when they were promoted to them.

Mr. Rowe: What have some of them got now?

Mr. MacInnis: Quite true; but that is not in issue in this instance.

Mr. Abbott: It certainly is not.

Mr. MacInnis: That is not in issue here. I am not opposing these salaries—an increase of $9,000 in cabinet ministers' salaries—just because I do not think cabinet ministers are worth it.

Mr. Harris: For the record, $5,000.

Mr. MacInnis: You already have $4,000 of an increase in the indemnity as a member of parliament. Now there is a $5,000 increase as a cabinet minister, and that comes to $9,000 no matter how you look at it. No matter how you look at it, when this bill goes through each cabinet minister will be getting $9,000 more than he was getting before.

Mr. Harris: $5,000.

Mr. MacInnis: The minister will be getting $9,000 more than he was getting before; and he will pay income tax on $9,000 more than he was paying on before. It has been said that things are particularly hard for the cabinet ministers now, so much harder than they were in the thirties. I would say that this is a picnic compared with the problems facing the cabinet ministers in the thirties. I was here; I know what it was like throughout the country. Why, during the last 15 years the country has been going on its own momentum; you could not keep it back if you tried.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If it goes well, it is going well of its own momentum; if it goes badly, then it is the government's fault.

Mr. Rowe: You used to say that.

Mr. MacInnis: I think the Acting Prime Minister will agree that I have not criticized him very much during the years he has been here.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I agree.

Mr. MacInnis: And I am not criticizing him today. In fact I have often felt I was not a very good member of the opposition because I could see so much justification for what was being done that I could not conscientiously criticize. But when things are done as they are now I have no hesitation whatsoever in criticizing.

Just let me state one point here. It may not be particularly germane to the bill, but the fact is that up to now not much of what has been said has been germane. What is the record of this government? One of the last acts of the Conservative regime, when it went out of office in 1935, was to put an Unemployment Insurance Act on the statute books of Canada. The Liberal party of that day opposed the passage of that act because they said it was ultra vires of the dominion government. When the Liberals came into office they referred it to the courts, and that is how it was found to be.

But did the Liberal government bring in an unemployment insurance act in 1937? No. Did they bring in an unemployment insurance act in 1938? No. Did they bring in an unemployment insurance act in 1939? No. Did they seek an amendment to the constitution in order to bring one in? No. But they sought an amendment in 1940, and later introduced an unemployment insurance bill. When it was introduced it was not as a social security measure; it came in as an anti-inflationary measure.

And so here is the government's record in regard to unemployment and conditions in the country from 1935 to 1940. They could not put unemployment insurance into effect until recruiting for the armed services and war industries had taken sufficient workers off the unemployment rolls. There you have the picture.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know the hon. member wants to be fair. Mr. Mackenzie King addressed a letter to the premiers of all the provinces on the 5th day of November, 1937, I think it was, seeking provincial acquiescence in a constitutional amendment to make unemployment insurance possible, and three of the provinces would not accede to it; otherwise we would have had it at that time.

Mr. MacInnis: Did all the provinces agree in 1940?

The Deputy Chairman: Both the hon. gentlemen who have just spoken are out of order, for which I take the blame. Not only is the subject which is now being discussed not by any stretch of the imagination under clause 1 of this bill, but it is also out of order in that the hon. members are anticipating a discussion which is the next order of business of this house. Therefore I would hope that we could get back to the Salaries Act.

Mr. MacInnis: I agree with you, Mr. Chairman. I am out of order; and the speakers who preceded me were out of order. The main point I want to make is that when we are debating these matters we should take it for granted that one is motivated by good intentions. If anybody feels that his conscience pricks him, and because of that he must justify himself, that is all right; he must salve his conscience in some way, but I am not in that position.

One thing I do know is the feeling of the people of the country. I know the feeling of the people in my own constituency, and I know that the feeling of the people in Vancouver is no different from that of the people in Halifax, in Toronto or anywhere else. Seventy-five per cent of them are in opposition to these increases which we are putting into effect. Surely what we are doing here is relevant to unemployment, to old age pensions and to other things. If I were sent here at all I was sent for the one purpose of raising the standard of living of those whose standard of living is low. I was not sent here—and I am not going to stay here under false pretences by giving the impression that I was—to raise our own indemnities and the salaries of the cabinet ministers. I have nothing to gain from opposing these increases. Nothing has been offered to me and I would not accept it anyway. Therefore I have not that to worry about.

Mr. Abbott: I had not really intended to say anything in this debate, because among other things it is always a little more difficult to talk about matters that concern yourself. I am sorry the discussion has taken just the turn it has. Hypocrisy is not a human quality that I particularly admire, and I try not to practise it myself. Therefore let me say without hesitation that so far as I am concerned I feel that I have been underpaid ever since I have been here.

I readily concede that a man in public life should not be able to command as high a financial return as he might if he stayed outside. I think if we had to rely on the services of men who would only come to parliament or serve in the government if they could get a financial return as high as they could get outside, we would be deprived of the service in public life of some people that we ought to have. I readily concede that to those of us who are in public life there are great compensations other than the financial returns that we get. There is the satisfaction of public service performed and then to put it on the lower ground, the contacts that we make, the speeches that we deliver here in the House of Commons and the hands that we shake around the country. All that, I know, gives a great personal satisfaction to some of us. It keeps us in the public eye and we probably like that, some perhaps more than others.

But, as the Acting Prime Minister said, all of us, or most of us at any rate, have responsibilities to some people other than ourselves. I think some of those people do not derive the personal satisfactions out of public life that those of us who are in the forefront of it get, and I personally feel that there should not be too great a difference between what a man can command in the public service and what he can get outside.

That is important in order that we should be able to attract men to public life at a reasonably early age. They should not have to wait until they have made the future of their families and dependents secure before they enter public life. And even more important, they should not have to be dependent upon assistance from those who are outside parliament. I can only speak from personal experience, and I always hesitate to do this, but I live fairly modestly, as those of you who know me are aware. I have gone behind just a little bit every year since I have been here, and I have had to use such other modest resources as I might have. I do not think that is a good thing for public life, and I for one will never use the argument that because a man who is in a particular occupation averages only $3,000 or $4,000 a year a cabinet minister should not get more.

We all know that there are inequalities in life. Perhaps it is unfair that there should be, but we all know that even the leaders of great labour unions make a great deal more than cabinet ministers, and I daresay earn it. We all know, as the Acting Prime Minister has said, that men in relatively junior positions in industry, in commerce, make more than cabinet ministers will make even after the proposed increase. Therefore I make no point about that, Mr. Chairman. I say quite frankly that I think the proposed increase is fully justified.

I can understand the position taken by people who say that the increase is too much, and I am not questioning their bona fides in saying that. I find a little more difficulty in understanding the position taken by the official opposition. Most of the members of the official opposition—perhaps not all—are sufficiently experienced in public life, in business or in the professions to know first what responsibilities are incurred by a man in public life; and second, what the remuneration is for men of comparable ability in the outside professions or occupations. Therefore I fail to see how anyone as experienced as my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition, my friends the hon. member for Greenwood, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, to mention only a few that I see sitting in front of me, could get any information from a royal commission as to what the appropriate salary should be for a man carrying on the executive responsibilities of a member of the government.

I also cannot agree with the Leader of the Opposition that there should be a difference in salaries between ministers. It may be true, and no doubt is true, that certain departments carry heavier administrative responsibilities than others, but every member of the government has to share in the collective responsibility for government policy, and so far as I know there has never been in Canada in any of the provincial governments, and certainly not in the federal government, any difference between the salaries of various members of the privy council.

Mr. Hansell: I do not rise to make a speech, but when the bill was being discussed on second reading I asked the minister a question. He did not answer it when he replied, and I shall ask the question now because it should be on the record. How many people in the government service or in any crown corporations receive salaries of $10,000 or more?

Mr. Abbott: I have not those figures readily available, but of course in a good many of the crown corporations there are salaries substantially in excess of $10,000. Those salaries are related to the comparable salaries paid in industrial enterprises which have to draw their personnel from the same class of executive. Certainly in a great many crown corporations the salaries paid are substantially higher.

I think I should indicate that there is perhaps some relevance between salaries paid to cabinet ministers and those paid to a number of top-level civil servants, and it tends to establish a ceiling which may not be desirable. We have found great difficulty in holding some of our senior civil servants who have been receiving offers from outside the government service of much higher scales of salary. I am talking of those in the higher ranks of the civil service. So I think it is fair to say that the salaries paid to ministers has some relevance at any rate to those paid to the permanent heads of departments.

Mr. Hansell: I do not think the Minister of Finance was in the house when I spoke on this measure, but the Acting Prime Minister—

Mr. Abbott: I was for part of the time, but I had to leave.

Mr. Hansell: The reason I want the information is that I think the people of Canada should know the relevancy between the salaries of the cabinet and of other civil servants or executives in crown corporations. As I said before, if there is any failure within the civil service in any department of government or in a crown corporation, those men can resign and get out and the government will have to take the punishment. In the final analysis, the responsibility for success or failure in connection with all these things is upon the government and the responsible ministers.

I did not ask the question merely because I wanted that information only; and I am in full agreement with what the minister has said, but some of the average Joes in the country have said that it looks as though this is quite a jump the cabinet are making in their salaries. If those salaries can be compared with other salaries within their range or higher, then the people should know. I should like it to be on the record so the people of Canada may know. Perhaps I could put a question on the order paper, although it might not meet with the approval of the government to answer. Perhaps I shall put it on anyway and see what happens. Could the minister tell us how these salaries compare with the salaries of deputy ministers? Is the salary of any deputy minister higher than the salary of his minister?

Mr. Abbott: Yes. The salaries of deputy ministers are public knowledge. Of course the salaries of officers of crown corporations are not public knowledge. I was going to wait until my hon. friend was finished, but if he will allow me perhaps I could give the reason they are not published.

Certain salaries, such as those of the deputy governor and the governor of the Bank of Canada have been made available, and that of the chairman of the Canadian National Railways; but the salaries of ordinary executive officers in crown corporations like Polymer, Canadian National Railways and so on are not made public. The reason is that the salaries of similar officers or executives, say in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or one of the chartered banks or any commercial company, are not made public. These men say, "Well, if I work for the one company the salary I am paid is my own business, but if I work for this company it is to be made public". There is a certain amount of natural human reluctance to having salaries made public.

I am not arguing the point now, but it does affect the ability of the government to get good executives if they are not required to subject themselves to the rule in the public service that salaries be made public. In other words, we are competing with private industry for executives of this type.

Mr. Green: What does the highest paid deputy minister get?

Mr. Abbott: At the present time it is $17,500.

Mr. Knowles: But that has to be compared with $27,000 for a minister.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief but nonetheless very emphatic in stating my opposition to this bill. I do not want to be over-harsh in my statements, but I think it must be generally agreed throughout the country that this matter has met with tremendous disfavour on the part of the people. What I have to say is in no way a reflection on the cabinet ministers now sitting on the other side of the house. As far as I am personally concerned I believe that they are responsible members, that they are competent, that they carry out their work to the best of their abilities, with a tremendous fidelity to their duty.

However, when I consider this matter I can only come to the conclusion that it is most inopportune at this time. I am quite certain that had the people of this country known prior to August 10 that the government contemplated any such move there would be many members in this house who are not present here today.

The hon. member for Macleod has endeavoured to find out what income is received by certain other people in order to arrive at a decision. I have here a table of incomes received by the Canadian people according to the income tax returns for 1951. A salary of $25,000 would be comparable with those provided under this bill, and according to this table only 8,260 people in Canada received an income of over $25,000 in 1951. In other words, only two-tenths of one per cent of the people of Canada in 1951 had incomes which were comparable to those provided for in the schedule to this bill.

When one considers the former measure which was passed he must realize that a cabinet minister is receiving a considerable amount of additional income which by fair deduction should constitute a fair return. The salary of a cabinet minister has been increased to $12,000 by an additional $4,000 as a member of parliament. Under the new schedule a cabinet minister will have a salary of $15,000, a total indemnity of $8,000, a motorcar allowance of $2,000 and $2,000 tax-free expenses, or a total of $27,000. In my opinion that is fantastic when we consider the incomes reported by people throughout the country.

I do not agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South, who has come to his own conclusion based on his own calculations. I think that as far as parliament is concerned, when we hope that democracy will be accepted as the finest form of government it will be detrimental if we as parliamentarians agree to an increase of this kind in the salaries of cabinet ministers.

When we come asking for increases in old age pensions, veterans allowances, mothers' allowances and so forth, the question is always asked in the house, "What about the cost of living?". We even had increases in civil servants salaries to keep pace with the increase in the cost of living. But in this bill the government comes to this house and asks for an increase not on the basis of any cost of living, but of a straight $9,000 for cabinet ministers.

I believe it is fantastic, Mr. Chairman, that we should be asked to support a measure of this kind. I do not believe it is in the interests of the government or in the interests of our people. I had a letter today informing me that 500 people have been thrown out of work at the Kitimat project. When it is recognized that there are over 500,000 unemployed in this country I say this is a most inopportune moment to introduce a bill of this nature, and I intend to vote against it.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure everyone appreciates the Minister of Finance's approach to this problem and the straightforward and frank way in which he has dealt with it. I will not say that we all agree with him, but I am quite sure we do appreciate the basis on which he has considered it.

There was one thing he said however, which I think deserves some reply. He stated, for instance, that no one here would suggest that the salaries of cabinet ministers might be investigated by a royal commission or even a select committee of this house. Let me give the minister an example based on the proposed new clause 5 which is part of the bill we are now considering. That clause if carried will provide a salary of $15,000 per annum for the Solicitor General of Canada.

It may be, and I would ask the Minister of Finance if he does not think there is some merit in this suggestion, that there are members who would take particular exception to that provision. I believe there is some merit in examining this question, and I will advance the reasons why I think that provision should be brought into question.

What will happen in this case is that we will be battling out this question on the floor of the house. I have chosen this particular example to some extent deliberately, because the person holding that office is not in this house at all. Hon. members will have to battle across the floor of the house on the question of what should be the salary of a particular individual who is not in the house. I do not care on how high a plane you try to put it because it comes down to this, that if any one of us here were to say that this ex-cabinet minister or simply "X" should not have $15,000 a year but only $12,500, then you might talk until you are blue in the face without resolving the matter.

Of course I have nothing personal against the hon. gentleman who holds that position, but I am thinking of the position of a man who is not in the House of Commons and how extremely difficult it is to deal with the matter fairly, just as it is extremely difficult to be impartial about the matter of our own indemnities when it has to be battled out across the floor of the house.

Surely there could be no clearer reason why this matter should be considered by some such body as a royal commission or a parliamentary committee. I understand that in the United Kingdom they had before a committee, on a sort of off the record basis, as it were, a number of individual members and ministers who gave them the facts concerning their own cases, so that the committee accumulated, based on their approach to the problem, the actual facts drawn from the personal experience of the ministers or members.

The Minister of Finance has himself told us how much he dislikes speaking of his personal experience in a matter of this kind. Of course he does, and I do not blame him. It must be most distasteful; yet he had to do it in order to justify the increase. I cannot think of a clearer reason than that advanced by the Minister of Finance himself as to why this question should be tackled, initially at any rate, upon the basis we have suggested. It is not on the basis that we might relieve ourselves of something that must become distasteful that we make this suggestion, but in order to arrive at a sounder basis for a decision.

Reverting now to the question of the salary of the Solicitor General, I believe there might well be reasons why this office should not receive the salary which is now to be attached to it. The Solicitor General is not even a member of the cabinet. He is not a cabinet minister.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You are quite mistaken. I assure you that he is.

Mr. Fulton: I do not believe there has been any amendment to the act so far. The Solicitor General's Act states:

> The governor in council may appoint an officer who shall be called the Solicitor General of Canada and who shall assist the Minister of Justice in the counsel work of the Department of Justice, and shall be charged with such other duties as are at any time assigned to him by the governor in council.

Now, it may be true that the person who holds the post of Solicitor General is, in another capacity, a privy councillor or a member of the cabinet. I am not denying that; but the post of Solicitor General is not a cabinet post.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to correct him. A member of the cabinet is appointed by the Governor General and takes the oath as a cabinet minister. The Solicitor General has been so called by His Excellency the Governor General, and he is just as much a member of the cabinet as I am.

Mr. Fulton: That is the point I am trying to make. The person who has the post may be a member of the cabinet, but the post of Solicitor General is not one which by any stretch of the imagination could be said to be within the definition of a cabinet post.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The post of Minister of Defence Production is a cabinet post but—

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Defence Production is the head of a department and of course he is a cabinet minister.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My hon. friend can put his own definition on who is a cabinet minister.

Mr. Fulton: I believe the courts would take judicial notice of what is a cabinet minister, and the head of a department in ordinary parlance, in my understanding, is understood to be a cabinet minister. Despite the different view expressed by the Acting Prime Minister I suggest that in ordinary parlance the post of Solicitor General is not what would commonly be called a cabinet post. Certainly the duties of the Solicitor General as defined here raise some question, I believe, as to whether that post alone should carry with it the same salary as that which is attached to other cabinet posts, such as the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of National Defence.

It may well be that the time has arrived in the expansion and growth of Canada, and considering the role we have now assumed in international affairs, coupled with the new problems which are arising, when the number comprising the government should be increased, and that they should not all necessarily be of a cabinet rank carrying the same salary as senior ministers. It may be there should be some measure of reorganization along these lines. It certainly cannot be denied that at the present time some departments carry responsibilities in the national picture which make them more important than others.

These things, and the salaries to be attached to such posts as may be designated or recommended, are it seems to me subjects for inquiry by a royal commission or a select committee of this house. We might then determine whether a position involving a lesser degree of responsibility should carry the same salary, simply because at the present time it happens to carry with it a cabinet position, as that accorded to a ministerial post with a great deal heavier responsibility.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: I am asking for information, Mr. Chairman. I recognize that although in some instances it might be possible for the same person to obtain two salaries, there are special provisions to make sure that this does not happen. For example, in the case of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Minister of Defence Production there is a special clause in the Defence Production Act to make sure that two ministerial salaries are not paid to one person. Similarly, the leader of the government in the Senate cannot draw that salary and a salary under the Salaries Act at the same time.

However, I should be glad if someone on the government benches would indicate to me where there is a provision to ensure that the $25,000 for the member of the Queen's privy council holding the recognized position of first minister and the $15,000 for the president of the Queen's privy council for Canada are not paid to one and the same person. My understanding is that at the moment the Prime Minister holds both those positions. I know that he gets only the one salary, but where is the legislative protection on that point?

Mr. Abbott: I would have to refresh my memory on that point, Mr. Chairman. I am certain there is somewhere a provision in the law which provides that a man shall not draw two salaries as a member of the government, although he may be carrying on the duties of two portfolios. I could get that information for my hon. friend very quickly. I shall send out for it.

Mr. Knowles: I shall be glad if the minister will do that.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Repeal.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support clause 2.

Mr. McCann: That is enough.

Mr. Knowles: I was opposed to clause 1, as hon. members know, but I support clause 2 because it is an instance where an untidy way of dealing with a matter has been cleared up. For many years the Salaries Act has said that the secretary of the governor general was to be paid $2,400 a year. Apparently it was thought that was not enough and provision has been made for him to receive a salary of $10,000 a year. But instead of changing the statute it was done by putting an amount of $7,600 in the estimates each year. In other words, this person received two salaries, despite what the Minister of Finance said a moment ago.

I think it should be kept clear that there is no general rule that says people cannot receive two government salaries or two government cheques. There has to be a special rule in every case. Without commenting on the amount of this salary, I am glad that this matter has been tidied up and that from here on the salary of the secretary to the Governor General will be provided in one place. I may say, however, that I am disappointed that that same tidying up process was not carried through with reference to the question of motorcar allowances.

I have one other question with respect to this item. Perhaps I might address it to the Minister of Finance. We have had before us, a few days ago and today, two bills, namely Bills Nos. 171 and 172, that make certain changes in the indemnities of members and senators, in the salaries of ministers and so on. In connection with this question of the salary of the secretary to the Governor General, I notice that the estimates for 1954-55 anticipate the passing of Bill No. 172. Personally I think that procedure is inappropriate. I do not believe the people who drew up the book of estimates should have taken it for granted that any bill brought in by the government would go through. In practice I suppose that does happen, but how does it come about that in one instance it was anticipated that the bill would go through, but not in the other instances?

Mr. Abbott: I think it must just have been an oversight. My hon. friend is quite right. In preparing the estimates the usual rule followed is that we do not include items which have to be approved or authorized—if by parliament, by parliament; or if by some other procedure, by executive action—until they have been approved. I think this must have been an oversight.

Mr. Knowles: Don't let it happen again.

Mr. Abbott: That is the only explanation I can give.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—1952-53, c. 6, s. 2.

Mr. Knowles: With respect to clause 3 there is a question I should like to ask, and it can be directed either to the Minister of Finance or to the Acting Prime Minister. I think I have made my position against this bill, with its increases, sufficiently clear that I will not be misunderstood if I draw attention to the fact that there seems to be one place where the increase has been overlooked. As the members of the government will notice, the bill now before us—I refer to the bill to amend the Salaries Act—makes no reference to the Minister of Defence Production. There is a reference to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and of course that is the item under which the minister in question draws his salary. As for the Minister of Defence Production, that salary is set out in the Defence Production Act. I think I should read the appropriate lines—they are very brief—of section 3 of the Defence Production Act. There is the usual wording "There shall be a department" and then subsection 2 of section 3 says this:

> The salary of the minister, unless he is in receipt of a salary as the minister of another department of the government of Canada, shall be $10,000 per annum.

For all practical purposes, at least so far as the present situation is concerned, there is no need to amend subsection 2 of section 3 of the Defence Production Act because the Minister of Defence Production is not drawing that salary. He is drawing his salary as Minister of Trade and Commerce. But just suppose that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Defence Production divided himself in two or suppose that the portfolios were divided, and that one portfolio were given to someone else. Unless the law were changed we would find that the Minister of Defence Production would be paid only $10,000 as opposed to $15,000 for the other ministers.

The answer to this anomaly may be that it is the intention to wind up the Department of Defence Production, or maybe it is another of those oversights. I am not arguing that this amount should be increased. I think the others should have been kept down to the $10,000 figure. However, I should be interested in an explanation of this point.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The Defence Production Act is a temporary act with an expiry date. If I am not mistaken it expires in 1956. It may be renewed. As my hon. friend says, the salary of the minister is fixed in the act. However, if the salary were to be increased the act would have to be amended, or an item would have to be put in the estimates for that purpose. Frankly I think it is just an oversight. I think the salary in question might just as well have been listed here, but it is not listed and I am not going to ask for an amendment. Somehow or other I hope to get my salary.

Mr. Knowles: I take it, Mr. Chairman,—just to keep the technical position clear, that since no change is to be made in this respect—and I am now addressing myself to the Minister of Finance—when the blue book of estimates comes out next year the salary listed for the Minister of Defence Production will have to remain at $10,000.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend will appreciate the fact that the salaries are statutory. It would either have to be $10,000 or an item would have to be put in the estimates for an extra $5,000 and be voted. That could be done. It would be perfectly legal to do that. If there were another minister next year, one of two courses could be followed. Either the Defence Production Act could be amended or an item could be put in the estimates to provide that the salary would be $15,000.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Coming into force.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, may I make a very small plea in a very quiet way and suggest that we might save four words here and be tidier and better draftsmen if we said "This act shall come into force on the 1st day of April, 1954". At present the clause reads:

> This act shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of April, 1954.

We have not yet reached the 1st of April. Even if it does not come into effect until after the 1st of April, if the statute does say "shall come into force on the first day of April" it would have the same effect. I have looked up one or two other acts and it seems to me that is the usual way to do it. I am suggesting a saving of words so I will not say any more words, but will merely suggest that it would be better to do it in that way.

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

Mr. Abbott: This clause was drafted by one of the most competent draftsmen in the public service. I shall not mention his name, but he is one of the assistant deputy ministers of justice. I feel sure he gave that point consideration. As a lawyer, I think he may have anticipated that this bill would not be reached in the course of public business until after the commencement of the next fiscal year. I would really hesitate to amend a measure which had been so carefully considered.

Clause agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Knowles: No.

Title agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Mr. Knowles: No.

The Deputy Chairman: On division?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: No.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

SUPPLY

UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION FOR EXAMINATION BY COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

The house resumed, from Wednesday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Green, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gillis.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Before the adjournment of this debate on Wednesday of last week, I expressed my pleasure that at long last the members of the cabinet had agreed that in Canada we had over half a million unemployed. I find that admission on page 2085 of Hansard for February 15, 1954, when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) said that the number of applications for jobs listed with the national employment services offices across Canada was 524,000 on January 21, 1954. However, I regret that following that statement, as recorded on page 2088 of Hansard he said he did not believe there were that many unemployed in Canada. He said he felt our national unemployment estimate for this year was greater than those who were actually out of work.

[Mr. Fulton.]

I regret that very much, because for a number of weeks now the leaders of labour unions in the dominion had been saying that Canada had over half a million unemployed. We were informed for some time in this house that those union leaders did not know what they were talking about; that they were exaggerating the situation, and that unemployment had not nearly reached that stage. I notice that it is agreed by most responsible people in Canada that the union leaders were quite accurate in the statements they made.

I think the qualification the Minister of Labour made ignores a number of other factors. I know quite well that not everyone applying for a job would be in a position to accept it if he were offered a job a few days later. However, there are also thousands of people in Canada who do not register for employment with the unemployment insurance commission, yet they are looking for work. Think of all the people who have reached 35 or 40; we know that thousands of them have long since given up any hope of finding help at the offices of the local unemployment commission. They are not on record. What about those people whose unemployment insurance benefits have expired? Some of them have long since been taken off the record.

I believe a good idea of the extent of unemployment in Canada can be gained when we look at the census report for 1951. We find the labour force listed at just slightly over 4 million. Of those 4 million people, half a million in the course of that year earned less than $500. Another half million people earned between $500 and $1,000. In other words, almost 1 million people out of the 4 million total working force in that year earned less than $1,000. I believe that indicates there must have been a great deal more unemployment in 1951 than any of the statistics we had revealed. We can take the taxation statistics and see that in the taxation year 1951 about 42·8 per cent of the people of Canada earned less than $2,000 per year. When the average wage earner earns less than $2,000 per year, and when we know the average weekly wage in industry, it indicates that the average wage earner has been unemployed for almost half of that year.

I said that I was happy that at last the integrity of our labour leaders in Canada had been established. I prefer to accept the statement of our democratically elected labour leaders in Canada to the statements we sometimes hear from other would-be responsible people. For example, I cannot agree at all with the statements made by one spokesman of the Liberal party who occupies a seat right next to that of a cabinet minister. On page 2132 of Hansard for February 16, 1954, he made an attack on the labour unions in this country. I have noticed that three Liberal spokesmen have followed the hon. member, and not one has denied that this hon. member spoke on behalf of the Liberal party. In referring to the labour leaders this hon. member said that they blamed everybody for their own mistakes.

In this section of the house we are not particularly blaming anyone for the incidence of unemployment. In this unplanned economy of ours, unemployment is inevitable. That has always been our contention and will continue to be our contention.

Now, over the past week end I have had a number of experiences—

Mr. Dickey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just referred to the statements of another hon. member in this house, but he has identified him in what I think is a rather roundabout way. I would, on a point of order, request the hon. member to do that member the courtesy of identifying him by naming his constituency in the usual way.

Mr. Regier: I shall be very pleased to do so. I regret the omission. The speaker to whom I referred as having made certain remarks at page 2132 of Hansard was the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot).

Mr. Pouliot: If the hon. member will permit me, may I say that I speak on my own behalf, and engage no one else by saying what I have to say.

Mr. Regier: I am very pleased that the interjection will show up on Hansard, because I think it would be tragic if the people of Canada were to have the feeling, after having just elected this government, that the government had let them down in such a severe manner.

Mr. Pouliot: If the hon. member will permit me, I just want to say once again that I am not against labour, but I have the right to criticize the leaders.

Mr. Regier: Upon returning from a week end in Toronto I found a telegram on my desk which had something to do with the unemployment situation. Just a few moments ago I indicated how the statements of our responsible labour leaders had been vindicated by statistics. Turning to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) as recorded at page 2197 of Hansard of February 18, 1954, I find he said:

> While the port of Vancouver has been working to full capacity . . .

This telegram relates to that statement and the unemployment situation. It reads:

> Demand immediate reversal of government decision to equalize east-west grain movements. Trade minister Howe misinformed. West coast terminals utilizing only 70 per cent capacity, lack of ships. Loss of trade will result in unemployment. Immediate action imperative.
> Grain Workers Union Local 333.

Then, as I indicated, I was away this week end, speaking to the rubber workers in Toronto. They are very worried about the unemployment situation. They see where, right in their own factories, the technological advances of the day are throwing hundreds of them out of work. They indicated to me that their position is very insecure because of collapsing world market conditions, and they fear that any tightening up of the local economy would cause a decline in their local market and aggravate the situation even more.

We do not think we are being unreasonable when we ask this government to make the resources of the unemployment insurance fund available now to ease the situation. After all, by this time the fund has built up to almost a billion dollars. Everyone realizes that in the event of a major catastrophe the fund would disappear; but if there is any way of halting the trend, then the time to use that method is now. We think the workers who own this money have a reasonable request when they ask that the period during which benefits are payable be extended. This is particularly necessary at the present time, when the cost of living is so high.

Much mention has been made of the relationship between unemployment and the high cost of living. There are many who blame high living costs on excessive wage demands. Mr. Speaker, the high cost of living is the result of the deliberate early lifting of price controls. Prices, including wages, began to rise very soon thereafter, and that rise has only recently been halted. We think the high cost of living is due more to an error in judgment on the part of the government's advisers than it is to any rise in wages.

I have noticed also in the debate interjections to the effect that people are unable to find work because of industrial disputes. This business of talking about strikes during this debate is nothing but a red herring. Lost man-hours due to strikes between 1919 and 1953 would not be as great as lost man-hours caused by six months of unemployment.

I agree wholeheartedly with the sound advice given by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) when he emphasized that the government's share in the national economy was a relatively minor one, even though at times the most effective. He pointed out that the government alone was unable to solve the difficulty, and that it was high time it called in those who are able to wield such an effective influence in the economic life of the country.

I regret that some hon. members representing ridings in which there are large numbers of industrial workers have tried to place the blame for the hungry thirties. I have never been able to blame the Conservative government which was in office between 1930 and 1935 for the conditions of those days. I have often had the feeling that that government did not take the measures necessary to soften the blow; the blow was felt before it took office. If any government can be blamed—and I am not sure that it can, because most governments in the world either could not or would not know what was coming—that blame would belong to the Liberal government which held office until late in 1930.

To say that in this matter of dealing with unemployment the record of the Liberal government has been the finest in the world is to stretch the imagination to the breaking point. When we see what happened in the United States in the hungry thirties; when we see what happened in some countries of the commonwealth, we see numerous cases where government action was able in large measure to soften the blow and make the hardship less severe on the unemployed.

I am not content to wait to get the facts from some government department concerning this situation. The attitude seems to be to wait until some senior civil servant tells us that we are facing a desperate situation. I say that the members in this house are in daily communication with the people in their ridings. We ought to know what the situation is, from one end of Canada to the other. We know it is not a happy situation. I am not prepared to sit down and wait, or to think that perhaps the warmth of springtime will bring comfort to these people, many of whom, particularly those in the category over 40 years of age, have been without work now for a number of years. May I remind the house that even the President of the United States is not prepared to wait until the warm spring sunshine appears. He has indicated that if these danger signs are still in evidence at the end of next month he will take definite action. I wish we could have the same assurance from the benches of this government.

I know it is felt by some government supporters that the new housing legislation will help relieve the unemployment situation. I think it is timely to point out, however, that it is agreed by the suppliers of building materials, as well as the suppliers of mortgage money, that we cannot expect to see as many houses built in 1954 as were built in 1953. It is not that the money is not available in the nation, only that it is going to the wrong places. Money at this time should go into the financing of consumer goods, and the building of homes is one such outlet. Because money can make more money elsewhere it is not going into the financing of consumer goods.

I believe there is still plenty of money. I find in this morning's issue of the Globe and Mail an article which reads in part as follows:

> Canadian corporations are paying out a total of $28,917,582 in dividends this month, compared with $28,312,571 a year ago and $27,387,006 in February, 1952.

In other words, money available for reinvestment purposes is still being made, and in greater amounts than ever before. However, the main difficulty is, it is not going into the field of consumer goods. There is a great need for an expansion of housing to relieve unemployment, and for other reasons.

The last issue of the British Columbian that I received from New Westminster has a page full of houses of people who are the direct responsibility of the federal government. They are the people who live between the water's edge and the land that is privately owned. I have a lot of that type of land in my riding, and there are hundreds and hundreds of old age pensioners eking out an existence in mere shacks there. Now a British industry is coming along and a causeway is to be built in New Westminster, and many of these old age pensioners are going to be evicted. I would say that the federal government could relieve the unemployment situation by assuring us that they are going to take all these people who are merely existing on federal land in all these municipalities that are on salt water and build decent houses for them.

I should also say, as mentioned, that President Eisenhower is not content to wait until the warm summer sun, and the European nations are not waiting in order to solve their economic difficulties, even if it means doing business with countries behind the iron curtain.

I have often heard it asked, what are your solutions? I think our solutions are well-known, but I should like to remind the government that they have been elected to office and the responsibility for safely guiding the ship of state is theirs and not the opposition's. The responsibility of the opposition is to warn the government, if possible, of the errors that the government may make.

There is a bit of a suspicion in the ranks of labour that to some a certain amount of unemployment may be fine, is looked forward to, and is even favourably looked upon by those who have to do business with the unions over the bargaining table. I ask this government in all seriousness, is clause 164 of the new Criminal Code the only answer it has to the unemployment situation? It is the section which, if passed, will give the right to arrest all the unemployed of Canada on a vagrancy charge. We ask you in all seriousness to investigate the situation and not to accept the assurance that everything will be all right.

The social needs of the nation are great, and call for an immediate expenditure on public works. We need hospitals; we need highways; we need schools; we need a lot of things. I wonder whether the government, especially the Department of Labour, has considered the possibility of the annual wage. I know there are industries where the annual wage is not practical. However, there are also other industries where the annual wage is a perfectly feasible thing. Where I come from we can build houses the year round, if the building of houses goes forward in an orderly and planned way. I daresay there is not a carpenters' union that would not be prepared to build a house for $500 less, if it could be assured of year-round employment. In our part of the country year-round employment in the house building industry is possible, but it has to be planned. You must have a roof over your head when it rains, or you do not like to work.

Has the government investigated all the possibilities of taking part payment in sterling so that our factories can continue in operation? I wonder whether they fully investigated the possibilities of making more of our goods available to the nations of the world that need those goods. I wonder whether they have investigated the possibilities of increasing the consuming possibilities of the nation.

One of the difficulties of our immigration department, as I see it, is that it has catered to the wishes of those who want to hire cheap labour. I notice, again in this morning's Globe and Mail, an article on a migration plan proposed for homeless United Kingdom children. It is a plan being considered by the government of Great Britain for the emptying of some of their orphanages. In Canada we have a situation not very far from here where up to $3,000 was paid by people who wanted to adopt youngsters. This article says that top government officials at Ottawa are cool in their reactions to the plans that are being formulated in Britain. I can think of no finer way of helping Canada with many of her difficulties, and also in the matter of employment and the sale of our goods, than by adding to the small population of Canada. Let us add not only workers to the population; let us let in every orphan in the world who wants to come and live here, and who has an assured home here. We need these people. If we can get them while they are young they will make top-notch citizens later.

The government are not willing to adopt the remedies offered by this section of the house. They are willing to adopt the theory of a planned economy only in time of war, or in some phases of it. I feel that the government is able to do a lot to relieve unemployment, even within the orbit of its own economic thinking.

The great battle of the world today cannot be won with armaments. You must have devoted people to go along with the armaments. Unemployed people and people who are in need are no people to fight a war with. You may have all the armaments you like, but unless the morale of the nation is high you are never going to defeat communism. The fight for peace is worthy of a lot more of sacrifice and a greater effort and devotion than is the battle of war.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, we all agree that the matter presently before the house is of grave concern not only to those who presently find themselves unemployed but to every man, woman and child in this country. If things are as black as they are pictured, then we have much to be concerned about. I feel it is regrettable that this debate has been carried on almost to the point of recrimination and in some cases close to slander of individuals and I could say almost equally of groups of people.

The Conservative party without too much recrimination are blaming the Liberals for the weaknesses in our economic system which caused the great depression, while Liberals have been equally vociferous in their declarations that the Conservative party was the cause of the great depression. In the minds of the C.C.F. party we are heading into the same disastrous conditions, while they seek to convince the people that through some magic wand of controls, such as those during the second great war, the present unemployment situation could have been avoided.

I think these matters might well have been left to the historians. Perhaps the prophets of gloom could be better employed in thinking up some more constructive programs. I have yet to hear any constructive propositions brought forward. Perhaps it is coincidental, but during the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) when, in his usual forceful and if I may say so somewhat indignant manner, he was berating the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) for having made certain remarks regarding a previous prime minister, a page boy brought to my desk a magazine or booklet called Cominco. It is published by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company for the purpose of giving information to its employees and anyone else who may show an interest in the activities of that company.

There was an article describing the last stages of a $35 million power development on the Pend-d'Oreille river. This power is to be used in the many and varied, and I may say expanding, operations of this company. The power developed at this point will produce enough electricity to light a 60-watt bulb in every home in Canada. It seems to me that is a great concrete example—I may be facetious—of capital investment. It is analogous to the superfluity of words we have heard during this debate, and is a long-time answer in my opinion to the unemployment question.

As I have said, there have been recriminations between political parties, and certain charges have been made. Wishing to be completely fair perhaps I should not say "charges", but there have been inferences drawn on the part of hon. members on this side of the house and, if I recall correctly, by hon. members on the other side, that the labour leaders of Canada are one of the main causes of the present unemployment situation. I think this is most unfortunate as well as being untrue. It is the responsibility of a union leader to see that the workers under his particular jurisdiction maintain an economic balance with every other worker and, for that matter, with the farmers in the Dominion of Canada. I recall that long before I became a member of a trade union my father was a member of a farm organization, a farm union. All these economic units do get together to maintain their proper balance in our economic system.

It has been said that production costs and wages are the reasons for high prices since the end of the second world war. It has been argued, of course, that high prices are the cause of the present unemployment. I think it may be said with equal force that high wages and high prices are perhaps one of the reasons we have in Canada one of the highest standards of living of any country in the world, so that is hardly a sound argument. We cannot have it both ways.

I think we should look at some of the economic facts that have brought about this situation. It will be recalled that a tremendous productive potential was built up by our factories during the war. Vast sums of money were spent in research and development, which left the country with an internal economy capable of a very high standard. Then what is the cause of high prices? I think we have to remember that almost all non-combatants in Canada during the war made some sacrifice. They bought war savings bonds, they worked harder, and did without some of the amenities of life.

I can remember my own little town, which at the beginning of the war had about 1,200 employees who owned around 800 automobiles. Almost everyone employed was driving an automobile. No new automobiles came into the city during the war, while large numbers were sold to people on farms or people who were in a better position to buy tires and gasoline in the pursuit of their various employments. Undoubtedly it was a small sacrifice when we look back, but we did make sacrifices and because of that there was a vast development.

We were not financing the war entirely by our sacrifices and commitments. Money was created in various ways to the point that after the war there was cash in the banks and securities capable of being converted into cash about three times what there had been before the war. Despite this vast development and stimulus to production, our production did not increase much more than twice. Without some measure of taxation which would have been almost confiscatory, it was inevitable that wages and prices and production would equalize themselves. The labour unions had the inescapable responsibility of maintaining a balance between the wages of employees and the profits of employers. To my mind they have been neither arrogant nor unreasonable.

The hon. member who spoke before me reiterated the C.C.F. claim that the imposition of price controls at this point would have been the answer. I cannot agree with that suggestion. I disagreed with it from the very moment when price controls were removed, and I shall continue to disagree with it so long as I believe in the free enterprise system. I do not believe that was the answer to our problems. Price control could not have meant anything but state control or a further conglomeration of bureaucracy and interference which would result in lower production. I believe there would have been a considerable amount of bootlegging, black marketing, and so forth.

There is one other aspect of this question which concerns the United States, with whom we have very close economic ties. There we have our greatest market, but they did not see fit at the close of the war to maintain wage and price controls, and if we had clamped on wage and price controls it would also have been necessary to clamp on export controls, because I cannot conceive of a manufacturer manufacturing and selling goods in this country at a price which was pegged, if he could sell to people across the line. Certainly with wages and prices increasing over there the average Joe here would have been left in a very sad state.

There are all kinds of arguments with respect to price controls, but that is one which I believe should be taken into consideration. The underlying and most important objection is that it means statism, and we all know that those countries which have resorted to statism have not yet been able to produce and maintain a standard of living comparable with that enjoyed in this country. That itself should be a sufficient argument.

There is also the question of those who are employed in Canada in industries whose markets enjoy a measure of tariff protection. Some supply the internal market exclusively, and they are perhaps in a more fortunate position. But those who work in industries which depend to a large degree on the export market, and suffer from its fluctuations, are not quite so well off. People in these industries cannot be expected to reduce their standard of living beyond that which is enjoyed by their fellow Canadians. Their standards must be kept in line, and if the export market weakens we have to find ways and means of adjusting the situation.

There is further evidence that it was not wage demands which caused high prices in the base metal and lumber industries. In the metal industry particularly, because of stockpiling by those countries which were preparing for an emergency, prices soared to unheard-of heights. Of course what happened was that the marginal operations came into production. There was high-grading of rich seams, and so forth, until the demand was oversupplied, and naturally the base metal industry is now suffering a depression.

The point I wish to emphasize is that the prices were out of line. I can recall negotiating for a wage increase with the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company at a time when these prices were high. The negotiations were not conducted on the basis of the ability of the company to pay. In fact they admitted that prices were high, but claimed they could not pay more despite the fact that they realized there must inevitably be wage demands.

I believe it is commendable that even during this period of high prices some of the large mining companies with great foresight brought in simplified methods of production which improved their over-all efficiency. In co-operation with the unions they doubled their production while using approximately the same labour force. It will be difficult to convince an unemployed miner that this was advisable, but one could point out on the other hand that if this had not been done some of the larger mining companies would be out of business today.

Let us not forget that union leaders, like members of parliament, are elected representatives, and like us they seek only to do a good job. In the same manner as we do, they must face criticism from the members of their unions and be responsible to them for their actions. Like many hon. members of parliament they can always find someone to give them good advice, and there is always someone who feels that given the opportunity he could do the job much better than they are doing it. Union and labour leaders are plagued with advice to desert their present affiliation and join up with some other less militant organization. If they accept that advice they may find to their consternation that their new affiliation has deteriorated greatly in the eyes of the public. In the eyes of many people in Canada, and many employers, the only good union is one which is not asking for something.

Some hon. members have already referred to the rather loose accusations made by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) against some labour union officers, and I must confess that in all the years I have been in the labour unions I have never met any of the individuals described by the hon. member. My reaction to the hon. member's speech might be compared with the feelings of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) when he was rebuking the hon. member for his attack on a former prime minister in regard to the claim that the latter was manipulating the stock market at will.

On February 16 the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) had this to say as reported at page 2127 of Hansard:

> Personally, I am opposed to the professional bargainer. I think it is wrong in principle, because the very existence of the professional bargainer depends on the animosity between the employer and the employee. I will agree that expert advice is desirable. I think we should have expert advice, but I believe it is wrong in principle for people to set themselves up in business as professional bargainers—

I might add professional politicians. I suppose there are some, though I have never met them. The quotation continues:

—because their livelihood depends on the animosity between the employer and employee. As soon as good will is created between the employer and the employee the professional bargainer is out of a job.

And further:

I feel that we would be better off and have a higher level of employment if bargaining were conducted on a local level as much as possible.

I have a few remarks I should like to make with regard to this statement. I am wondering if the hon. member has ever sat in on a session of negotiations with a large corporation represented by their top officials, with the highest legal authority on their side. They are experts in their own fields; for that matter they are specialists. Does the hon. member feel that it is presumptuous on the part of the union to have spokesmen who may have come up from the ranks—and in many cases they have come up from the ranks and gained experience in the process—speak for them? Is this a presumptuous attitude? Or for that matter does he feel that the union takes an unfair advantage by bringing along an adviser trained in research and economics? With regard to this statement, let me say further that a union officer's livelihood does not depend upon perpetuating the class struggle or, in the words of the hon. member, animosity between employer and employee.

Mr. Shaw: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Byrne: Yes.

Mr. Shaw: Would the hon. member regard the professional bargainer as being a union officer? I refer to the professional bargainer as known in British Columbia. Is he a union officer?

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I have never had the pleasure of meeting a professional bargainer; that is, apart from union officials. They are union officials who, with their experience, are called upon to go from place to place and assist in the bargaining. The successful labour leader, of whom I think there are quite a large number, is one who mostly knits the labour-management relationships, and who makes economic gains without any strike whatsoever. To be sure, the final decision for action should rest at the local level; that is, with the decision of the rank and file, by their ballots. But the hon. gentleman's plan would result only in a local company union which in effect is no union at all.

I listened with considerable interest to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), in order to find out whether we had here an answer to the problem. But again there was little light. He sought to prove, perhaps in a different way than I, that wages were not the reason for unemployment today. In his statement he drew to our attention two contracts that had been let in British Columbia.

Mr. Winch: One.

Mr. Byrne: As reported at page 2155 of Hansard, he said:

In British Columbia, within the last twelve months, the British Columbia Electric Railway Company had occasion to call for tenders for a major high-tension power line and for the supplying of the towers. Canadian companies and companies throughout the world put in bids on the supplying of these towers. The lowest Canadian tender was in the neighbourhood of $1,600,000. The contract went to Italy at a price well below $1 million. No one can say that it is the cost of wages that did that, because if the Canadian workers had given their services entirely free of charge no Canadian company could have touched that Italian tender.

Then further, with regard to another contract he had been speaking to an executive of a firm in eastern Canada, I presume.

Mr. Winch: In Ontario.

Mr. Byrne: This is what the executive of the firm in eastern Canada had to say with respect to a contract on which he bid:

He said, "If our firm had given completely free the use of our factory and machinery, the costs of administration and the raw material required, we could not have matched the price of the English firm, who are up against a 20 per cent tariff when they come into Canada on that contract". He said, "We could not have matched it". That job meant approximately 300,000 man-hours of work.

And so on. I am not taking issue with this argument. I agree with the hon. member that wages are not the cause of the present situation. I went over that speech time and again, and I am going to ask the hon. member if he will allow me to come to his office sometime so I could just get the sense of what the argument brings out.

Mr. Winch: Yes. Examine my recommendation and you will find it. I gave it.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I am still at a loss to know just what the hon. member meant.

Mr. Winch: That is not new for you.

Mr. Argue: It is just continuing.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Byrne: In my opinion the conclusion that was drawn is about as conclusive as any possible answer to the old conundrum of "How much oats and a little bit of hay does it take to winter a few head of cattle?"

I regret that I cannot support this amendment or the subamendment. Neither present a solution to the problem. Either would defeat the government, thus necessitating another general election. While it may be the opinion of the members of the opposition that this is a solution, I cannot agree because I have not heard from anyone on the opposition side of the house as to what the solution is.

Mr. Winch: What is yours?

An hon. Member: What is the problem?

Mr. Byrne: I do not pretend to have all the answers, but I think there is a possible solution; for example, one may be found if we look at the statement made by the Acting Prime Minister during this debate relating to the proposed capital investment for 1954. I have said before that I believe the only answer is investment. The long-term answer to our unemployment is work and jobs, and jobs cannot be created overnight. Jobs can be created only by investment.

Mr. Zaplitny: Why were they lost?

Mr. Byrne: I am quoting the words of the Acting Prime Minister who was making a statement on what is forecast by way of investment for the coming year. As reported at page 2104 of Hansard he stated:

> The survey indicates a capital expenditure program for 1954 of $5·8 billion, roughly 3 per cent above the previous record achieved last year.

Having regard to all the gloom expressed in this house, may I say that I know the matter is serious and that there are many unemployed; but if we let this thing spread too rapidly, it may be possible that some of this investment will not be made. If that investment is made it should mean that there will be a considerable uptrend in the unemployment situation. To continue:

> Expenditures for new construction are estimated at $3,865 million, an increase of 6 per cent, while outlays for new machinery and equipment are expected to be 3 per cent lower.

There is still about a 3 per cent increase in the over-all projected capital investment for the coming year.

Mr. Winch: What is the increase in the number of unemployed?

Mr. Byrne: The increase has been variously stated here, from 3 per cent to 10 per cent; the hon. member can take his choice. I do not think the situation is as bad as some say it is. It is bad; I do not disagree there, but it is not as bad as they picture it.

There are a number of other large developments projected, perhaps not for the immediate future but in the foreseeable future. I think every possible step is being taken to further the St. Lawrence seaway project, not only by this government but the governments of Ontario and the state of New York. We have the projected trans-Canada pipe line, and we hope there is to be a pipe line from northern Alberta—I would prefer to say southern Alberta and coming through the southern part of British Columbia but I shall stay with the facts, something some members do not do. There is this projected pipe line from the northern part of Alberta down through British Columbia and over to the west coast, which will also supply the Pacific states.

As I have said, these projects are no immediate solution. They do not feed the families of those who are hungry today. The only answer to the immediate problem is perhaps an increase in the unemployment insurance benefits and the extension of those benefits. Why did we institute unemployment insurance if we did not think at some date there was going to be a levelling off, a readjustment of our economy? We have the fund, so let us use it, and let us not be stampeded into a depression.

The estimates before the house contain large expenditures for various projects. I feel we would be well advised to expedite the business of the house so that an early start can be made on these projects. The processing of contracts and so forth requires a considerable time. I suggest that we expedite matters sufficiently to enable these projects to be started by the spring break-up rather than the fall freeze-up. It might be remembered also that under the new arrangements for members' indemnities, the house can adjourn and we can be called together in the early summer without any additional cost to the taxpayers or without any of the formalities required for a normal session. Then we could get down to the business of hammering out a solution to the problem, if that should become necessary.

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): I rise to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that perhaps I may be able to shed some small ray of light on what has seemed to me to be a very confused argument. On one point only does there appear to be complete agreement, a true meeting of minds. Everyone believes unemployment to be a bad thing. Even here there is an element of unrealistic thinking. The Acting Prime Minister has said that even one person unemployed is a serious thing, and the C.C.F. agrees with him. One unemployed person may represent an undesirable circumstance, perhaps even serious from the point of view of the individual concerned, but it hardly represents a serious condition in the nation.

The C.C.F. introduced a subamendment which is found on page 2096 of Hansard for February 15, 1954 and reads as follows:

. . . the serious and mounting unemployment situation now facing this country calls for immediate action by the federal government to prevent further economic distress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us put alongside of that the amendment sponsored by the official opposition and moved by my colleague the member for Vancouver-Quadra, which states that this house is of the opinion that the standing committee on industrial relations should immediately examine into and report upon the actual unemployment situation throughout Canada and present recommendations to this house as to the short-term and long-term methods of dealing effectively with this problem. The C.C.F. subamendment says, in effect, that the unemployment problem calls for immediate action by the federal government. The federal government, however, in the persons of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), the Acting Prime Minister, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), along with the customary echoes, say there is no unemployment problem or if there is it is of such minor proportions as to be inconsequential.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how in the world can you get action on an unemployment problem from a government that says the problem does not exist? The very premise of your argument is denied. Consequently all subsequent argument is a waste of breath. The C.C.F. in supporting their subamendment, where any effort was made to support it, urged the adoption of shopworn socialist solutions which are usually trotted out in cases such as this. Such tinkering with the economy in defiance of economic law is no more likely to be successful here than it has been in other countries. Do the C.C.F. seriously expect, by the sound and fury of their oratory or by the exposition of the socialist dialectic, to convert the government? They cannot possibly be so naive. These oratorical pyrotechnics are designed for public consumption, and in the hope that they may possibly impress unthinking and uncritical people.

In contrast, the amendment of the official opposition is a serious and reasonable attempt to persuade the government to look at the problem and examine the evidence. It recognizes the fact that the government does not believe there is a problem, and reaches the obvious conclusion that as long as the government believes this there is no possible hope of remedial action. The amendment says to the government, in effect, "We do not believe your contention that everything is rosy, but let us take a critical look at all the available evidence. If it shows you are right everybody, including the Canadian people, will be happy. If it does not show this, you will be advised you are in error, and in addition will possess a body of expert opinion which cannot fail but be of help in devising suitable remedial measures."

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend in the highest terms the contribution made to this debate by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden). I thought that in the main he presented a thoughtful and well-reasoned effort. He put his finger on the basic fact in this whole discussion, that employment in this country depends upon the maintenance of export trade. Export trade, in turn, depends upon a price structure that is really competitive. Apart from an occasional irrelevant remark and his somewhat naive and childlike faith in price controls, his speech was a valuable contribution and I should like to compliment him.

Apparently, however, the hon. member does not realize that price controls mean wage controls, and that they extend to wheat and other farm commodities. Moreover, controls as used in wartime were designed to counteract the pressure of scarcity on the price structure, whereas now there is no scarcity but rather an oversupply. Should we embark upon a program of peacetime controls I am afraid it might have consequences far from palatable to the hon. member's constituents—compulsory acreage reduction; dictation as to kind, quantity and variety of crop, to name but a few. This is not a piecemeal proposition. Once you start you have to go all the way.

The hon. member was pleased to use a medical analogy, stressing the fact that you must first diagnose a disease before treating it—a wellnigh perfect argument in support of the amendment put forth by the official opposition. Diagnosis is often a difficult and time-consuming procedure. It requires careful examination of all the available evidence, and in difficult cases the consultation of whatever experts may be available. It is not a haphazard and offhand procedure. The so-called snap diagnosis is the mark of the quack and the charlatan. Could there be a better illustration of the necessity for the objective study of this difficult and complicated subject of unemployment by a committee?

For the foregoing reasons I seriously question whether the C.C.F., in bringing forward their subamendment, are particularly concerned about unemployment, or whether they regard it as a convenient club to belabour the government for fancied political advantage. Bear in mind that only the government can cure unemployment, and they say it does not exist.

I may say I intend to vote for the sub-amendment, for three reasons; first and most important, because I will have a subsequent opportunity to vote for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), which really gives some prospect of coming to grips with the problem that, despite what the government says, we in this party believe really exists; and second, because it does say that there is an unemployment problem in this country, something which the government denies; and third, because it is really innocuous and can do no harm.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, in a country which is adequately equipped with resources and with the means of processing those resources into consumable goods, I think it could be safely said that unemployment is completely unnecessary and is not to be tolerated.

I have listened with considerable interest to speeches from all sides of the house; I think it is pretty well agreed among all hon. members that any degree of unemployment in this country is entirely regrettable and something we all should attempt to remove. Thus far we are all agreed.

The next question is how to do it; what to do to remove this condition of unemployment. It has been suggested that a number of new projects are being contemplated, and that these will provide employment for a large number of men. Whether there will be places for as many men as there are unemployed, or whether those projects will require the kind of men who are now without work, we do not know. We have to take a chance on that. But it is agreed that that is a possible way out of the difficulty.

May I draw to the attention of all concerned something else upon which I think we shall all agree, namely that where there is enough production and productive capacity and resources, we ought to be able to supply everybody in the country with a job. And if we cannot supply him with a job we should be able to provide him with an income, because where a nation is able to produce enough to supply the needs of everybody in the country, then surely it ought to be possible to provide means whereby everybody can obtain his share of the production or at least that share which will keep him living in comfort. I fancy all would agree to that. All would agree that what is physically possible it ought to be possible to make financially possible. If we can produce enough to supply everybody, then it ought to be possible somehow or another to render available the finances with which to enable everybody to enjoy a fair share of that production. Otherwise we are faced with what looks like foolishness, are we not?

In the days when the Indians owned this country, if they were able to get enough buffalo and enough fish and firewood they were able to live. In our day, if we can produce enough buffalo and enough fish and firewood we ought to be able to live. In order to live we have to have access to an income which will enable us to obtain the share of those goods we need. I believe that up to the present point everyone will agree with what I have said.

Our whole problem is that of rendering financially possible to everyone a good share of the production we can bring into being. There is hardly any doubt that we can produce enough food for everyone in the country, especially enough food to supply the great necessities of life such as wheat, cream, butter and fruit—those things which, taken together, will supply all the real needs of life. We can produce all the shelter required. It is obvious that we can produce all the clothing of the kind required. And so, all down the line, we can produce enough of practically every commodity necessary for life, and physically we can supply everybody in the country with those commodities. If we are not able to do that there must be something wrong with our system of distribution.

Then, since we have begun talking about the system of distribution, there comes to mind the matter of money, because we use money as a means of distribution. If a man cannot obtain access to money he cannot obtain adequate access to goods or services. Consequently the whole matter breaks down to a financial problem, and this is the general approach of the members of the Social Credit movement. We Social Crediters say "Now, if the problem is a financial problem, then let us attack it as such, and see if there is not some way in which we can render financially possible that which is physically possible".

We all admit that what we desire is physically possible, but up to the present time we have not learned how to make it financially possible. Now, how can we make it financially possible? In the last analysis may I repeat to all hon. members and to people throughout the country that the great problem is one of finance, how to create a financial system which will enable the people to enjoy all the goods we can produce.

I do not propose to proceed any further along that line this evening. I think all hon. members will agree with what I have thus far said in this connection.

We have before us in this debate something which, in a way, touched off the debate in the first instance. I refer to the joint submission to the government on February 11 by the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. I fancy that since so many have referred to the document in question it might be well for me to give some measure of attention to it.

We find that the drafters of the submission make five main recommendations. I believe one of the great desires in the house, something which concerns members on all sides, is to grant to our labouring people what they feel is their right. Now, are we agreed that what they suggest as being desirable, as a means of attacking this problem, is good?

They advocate first Unemployment Insurance Act amendments. I think we will all agree that these would be desirable. Second, a nation-wide program of public assistance in co-operation with provinces and municipalities; I think everybody in all parties will agree that that would be desirable. Third, a public works assistance program: no specifications are given as to the detailed nature of the program envisaged, but in a general way I think everybody in the house will agree that that also would be desirable. Fourth, a greater encouragement of home building; I am sure everyone will agree that that is desirable. Fifth, increased aid to underdeveloped countries; and I am sure every member of every party in the house will agree that that recommendation is desirable.

The next question which arises in every mind, I presume, is where are we going to get the money to do all this? So once more the problem works itself out to one of finance. I do not think there is anyone in the house who doubts that we have the physical capacity in Canada to provide each of those five remedies. We do not say we have not the timber with which to build houses; we do not say we have not the coal to provide warmth; we do not say we lack the physical capacity to do all that is envisaged here, but we do worry about finances; therefore once more we find our problem is primarily one of finances. If we cannot find some way of raising money other than those which we have hitherto used and are now contemplating, then we might just as well give up in despair. That would be the general conclusion.

Inasmuch as our labouring men have not exactly told us where we can get the money, they have not contributed very much to our enlightenment in this all-important aspect. However, I do believe there is a way in which we can find that money.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Before leaving this submission I would say in a general way that it is highly commendable. We owe a debt of gratitude to the earnest men in charge of our labour congresses who devoted so much attention to the planning and presentation of this submission. I am impressed with two paragraphs near the end of the submission. They are to be found on page 14, as follows:

> When unemployment reaches the proportions now being experienced in Canada it has more than economic effects. It carries with it social problems and political potentials which cannot be ignored.

I am sure everyone agrees with that. Then we find this passage:

> Unemployed workers and their families must be relieved of their hardship and suffering, but equally important, we must create and maintain a stable Canada, economically, socially and politically.

I am sure everyone will agree with that. Once more the question is, where are we going to get the money to do it? If we can only get the money we can do it. I will say this concerning this submission, before I leave it: Subject to a reservation or two because of the need of clarification, in my opinion, of certain phrases in some of these suggestions, I would support the submission wholeheartedly.

There seems to be a disagreement among the people in the house, the government on one side and the opposition on the other, mainly as to whether the unemployment we now have in Canada is of such a serious nature that we need to fear that it indicates the onset of a depression. It is too early for people to tell. It is natural for those who might feel it would be to their political advantage to have a depression, and who would like to blame the government for something very soon, to say this is a serious depression. It is natural for the government to say, "Well, now, it is not quite so serious as you think; at least, we hope it is not". And so we are inclined to disagree to some extent; but facing facts just exactly as they are, I think a good many members on all sides and of all parties think that it is serious enough. I think it is also pretty well agreed on all sides that unless something fundamental is done there will be a serious unemployment problem.

For the last number of years we have been able to keep ourselves employed because we have been fighting a war, or we have been preparing for a war, or we have been indulging in extensive foreign aid programs; mutual aid we have called it, lend-lease we have called it, and various other names. But we are pretty well all agreed that experience has taught us during the last almost 20 years, at least, that we simply must have some means whereby there is a great deal of expenditure on goods that we are not going to use, to consume—such goods and services, we will say, as armaments, training soldiers, dressing soldiers and that sort of thing. We can say this, that sooner or later there will be a depression unless war develops, or there are heavy expenditures in preparation for war, or that extraordinary expenditures for mutual aid or domestic improvements or both come to be a permanent and normal feature of Canada's governmental procedure.

Once more the question arises, where is the money going to come from? Wherever we go we run into that difficulty. Where are we going to get the money? The United States can go on and spend vast sums of money in preparation for war, supporting various nations in their troubles with communism, and all that; but in due time they will reach the limit of their borrowing capacity. They have already reached the limit of their safely taxable capacity. Therefore the question arises, what are they going to do, and what are we going to do when we get into a position similar to that which they have reached?

Without at present going too much into detail as to where we are going to get the money, may I just leave the question temporarily and devote attention to this matter of getting money, raising money. We are taxing just as much as we dare tax anybody. We must not go further into debt. We need a great deal more money. Where are we going to get it?

While I am speaking I would suggest that there are some five measures which would give us a good deal of help if we can get the money, and I am sure we can. First is the payment to farmers of a substantial advance per bushel on the grain they store on their farms, provision for adequate storage facilities on the farms, and the payment to farmers for storage of grain stored on their farms.

Those of you who were in the chamber on November 17, 1953, will remember that I outlined a program which I believed would solve the problem of western farmers. I still stand by that program. There have been a good many who found fault with that in one way or another, but sooner or later they have agreed that when I made the suggestions I did on that occasion I was putting my finger right on the essential needs of the situation. I proposed that money should be made available to farmers at not more than 2 per cent, with which to build adequate storage facilities on the farm. That seems so simple that you would believe everyone would say, well, certainly, that is good common sense.

A good many people misunderstood my proposal. They thought I meant that the money would be advanced out of wheat board funds. That is not right. That money should be advanced by the dominion government. Let us consider our Bank of Canada, which was set up in 1934 with a great deal of fanfare. Everybody thought it was going to do wonders for us. Pretty nearly anyone would agree that we ought to be able to get money from the Bank of Canada at 2 per cent to build storage on farms. If the Bank of Canada cannot supply the money we need at 2 per cent to build storage on the farms, then it ought to disestablish itself because it is of little value to us. I think pretty nearly everyone will agree with that.

I advocated that an advance of 75 cents a bushel be made on all grain adequately stored. I believe everybody will agree that that is desirable. I advocated also that there should be a payment of storage on grain stored on the farm, to encourage the farmer to take care of the grain himself and have it on the farm in case of an emergency.

I suggested that Canadian dollars should be advanced to assist prospective buyers of Canadian wheat abroad. I do not think anyone will object to that. We should do that. That principle was applied by the United States, and it worked with great success. They lent money abroad for many years after 1920 with which outside people were able to buy their goods. There is no reason why we should not do the same. It could be done by taking money out of that Bank of Canada. It would be pretty hard to see how anything better could be done with the Bank of Canada.

I suggested also that measures similar to these should be adopted in respect of our coarse grains. If this set of measures alone were adopted all over the three prairie provinces I believe you would find there would be a tremendous loosening up in pretty nearly every aspect of our economy. You would find that those who had sold clothing to the farmers, for example, would be able to get their pay. Merchants would be able to get their pay and would be able to buy clothing and other supplies from Ontario and Quebec which they have been in the habit of buying. To a surprising degree people would be going back into employment, people would begin to buy lumber for houses and all that sort of thing. I venture that you would find probably no measure which would be more immediately beneficial in the matter of restoring employment conditions in Canada than just that set of suggestions which I made on November 17.

I would suggest as a second means of relieving our problem immediately that we adopt a realistic housing program, one that would make financially possible what is physically possible in the matter of housing in Canada. I am sure it must strike everybody as being simply preposterous that we should have people in this country who are not able to get houses when we have forests of timber in British Columbia all ready to be made into lumber. There are great quantities of lumber in British Columbia just waiting to be brought out to be made into houses. Surely everybody must realize that a preposterous situation now exists.

Once more we come to the matter of finance; and once more I suggest that the financing should be done by the Bank of Canada, which was set up back in 1934. At that time everybody was led to believe that all our financial problems would be solved the minute we got this glorious Bank of Canada. When we got this glorious Bank of Canada it became an impediment to us rather than an assistance in respect of all these vital matters. If the Bank of Canada is not able to do the job then it is time we found out what is the matter. If the Bank of Canada cannot do the job, let us go back to the means we used before we had the Bank of Canada. We had a set-up then which could do this kind of job.

I suggest a realistic housing scheme which would enable people to get money at 2 per cent or even lower in order to build houses, without having to spend $8,000 or $10,000 for a house. Men should be able to build their own houses if they want to, and be able to get the money with which to build those houses without having to comply with a dozen and one regulations that only those with the best kind of incomes are able to comply with.

I suggest as a third measure that we have an extensive and comprehensive reforestation project. We have been wasting our forests up to the present time. I think anyone who contemplates the great forest regions that existed in this country 65 or 70 years ago must feel ashamed because those forests have been wasted in large measure. There are children who will be our descendants in 75 years and who will need forests. What are we doing to provide them with forests? Are we going further to waste this huge heritage that we have, or are we going to rebuild our forests and leave to them fruitful fields for endeavour?

I think everyone agrees that it would be a highly desirable thing if we cultivated our forests. The Germans were able to cultivate their forests to the extent that one hardly saw a stick lying around on the forest floor.

They cared for their forests as though they were gardens. There is no conceivable reason why we should not do the same. By this means we could provide work for many who are now idle. It would not require too great skill to go into the forests and start them growing again. As I have suggested, we need not fear having any unemployed if we embarked on a wide-scale program of reforestation.

People will say, where are you going to get the money? What is that Bank of Canada for? That is what we have to ask. Let us ask ourselves over and over again. When will someone venture to go over to the governor of the Bank of Canada and ask him what they are there for? Ask him what this bank is there for, anyway. Ask him if it was put there as an impediment to Canada or as a benefit to Canada. How can they benefit Canada today except by providing us with money when we need money?

Mr. Blackmore: There is somebody down there who is forgetting his responsibility. I am sure that he would not want his constituents to know that that is the kind of thing he is saying in a serious moment like this. Let us just be serious now.

I can remember in 1933 and 1934 when the Bank of Canada was being talked up all over. We were given to understand that it was going to solve our financial problems. Well, it has not begun to do as well as we did under the Finance Act of 1923 and the Finance Act of 1914 in the matter of providing us with money to meet contingencies of this kind. No one has ever taken the trouble to explain why it is not doing that service.

Now, the fourth suggestion I have to make I think was impressed upon us in southern Alberta and in other parts of the country last year particularly, because of the great amount of rain we had there. We should have a comprehensive program of flood and erosion control all across Canada. I hear men rise in this house and talk about how river banks are being worn away by high waters. They talk about the floods that are occurring, that are washing out bridges and all that sort of thing. It is not too soon in this young nation to go to work in real earnest to establish the means of controlling floods.

I know of strategic points all over southern Alberta where control projects could be constructed to stop disastrous floods such as those that struck us in June of last year and which did such tremendous damage. They might have done much more. Similar conditions must exist all over the Dominion of Canada. Why do we not arrange for the controlling of floods like these before too much damage is done? Already enough damage has been done. If we provided for the controlling of floods all over this country I imagine we would not have very many people unemployed. Of course they would have to be used in the warmer season, but there are things they could do in the winter-time.

I would suggest as a fifth measure that we go right to work in real earnest to build roads all over this country, and do not leave the building of roads entirely to the provinces. Generally speaking the provinces are simply not able to bear the financial burden of building the roads which are necessary. But the dominion can assume that burden if the dominion will use the Bank of Canada, or a Bank of Canada that is modified as it needs to be from what the Bank of Canada now is. I believe that everybody who thinks about this realistically will agree with me.

It is time we had roads all over this country, for many reasons. It is beyond the power of the provinces financially to build those roads. There is only one agency able to supply the finances necessary to build these roads. We certainly have all the means available to build roads. We have the soil that is necessary; we have the rock that is necessary; we can have all the asphalt that is necessary to build these roads. We have people enough to do it. Why not go to work to do it? What is physically possible should become financially possible.

I suggest that by the time we have dealt with these five proposals which I have advanced—they are not original; they have been advanced by various members in the house in this debate—by the time we get done building all these projects, then we can look for other projects. If we cannot find the money, let me repeat once more that the Bank of Canada was established presumably to provide the people of Canada with money. Let those who have the responsibility remember that we are here to find a solution to this problem, not to make silly wisecracks. We were sent here by 15 million people to find the solution, and every single one of us is responsible. Let us bear that in mind, and let us face the problem.

The Finance Act of 1923 and the Finance Act of 1914 provided Canadians with the money to do things. Let us now go on and do things. Let us re-enact the financial measure that can meet the purpose, if the Bank of Canada is too puny to do it. The Finance Act of 1923 was strong enough to do things, and through the strain of world war I the Finance Act of 1914 enabled Canada to do great things. It should be remembered, incidentally, that after the end of world war I we had no increases in prices such as we have had at the end of world war II.

That will be enough to start with. I leave this contribution for the consideration of hon. members and the country with the promise that at a later date I shall go on with the story.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I believe that in many respects this is the most important debate that has taken place in this house. There has been some disagreement about the extent to which we have unemployment. There has been some disagreement as to the solution for the problem. But I think the important thing to watch is not the figures, which are subject to change from day to day and have often changed for the worse in the past few months, but the trend which has been developing within the past year. That trend is quite noticeable, and I do not believe there is any chance of mistaking it. We are heading back into an unemployment situation. It may recover at times, and at times it may appear to be getting worse, but the general trend is back to the situation which obtained in 1929.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has moved an amendment, and that amendment calls for immediate action on the part of the government. I regret that it was necessary for the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Trainor), who comes from my own province, to criticize that amendment, particularly from the angle that we might rush into something, and say that in his opinion it was more desirable to set up a committee, or use the committee which existed before, the industrial relations committee, to study this situation and get the facts. I would be rather more impressed with that suggestion were it not for certain historical facts. I have in my hand a publication which appeared in 1934 and which contains quotations from some of the speeches of the then leader of the opposition, Mr. R. B. Bennett.

An hon. Member: His government?

Mr. Zaplitny: No, this goes back to 1930, when he was still leader of the opposition. These speeches were made at various points during the election campaign of 1930. As we know, 1930 was perhaps the beginning of what we call the depression. At that time we already had an unemployment situation in Canada, though it was not as bad as it turned out to be later on. But at that time the leader of the opposition, the late Mr. Bennett, apparently did not believe in setting up committees or holding conferences.

I quote his own words as taken from one of his speeches, made on July 10, 1930, when he said:

> The Conservative party is going to find work for all who are willing to work, or perish in the attempt.

Then later on, speaking of the government he said:

> Mr. King promises consideration of the problems of unemployment. I promise to end unemployment. Which plan do you like best?

Further on he said:

> Mr. King promises you conferences, I promise you action.

That is the kind of language I like. Unfortunately, events proved he was not able to carry out his pledges. I do not wish to lay any particular blame at his doorstep, because the situation did not develop after the Conservative administration took office. It developed before that.

I want to make this quite clear. What we are debating now is not a temporary situation. It is not seasonal unemployment, although there is an element of seasonal unemployment in it. We are debating a problem which has been unsolved in this country since 1929. It is true we have had periods of nearly full employment, but the situation which developed in 1929 and continued until 1939 and well into 1940, under both Conservative and Liberal administrations, was not solved by any government.

One needs only to look over recent pages of history to find that as late as 1938, after three years of a Liberal administration which quite often took credit for having solved the unemployment situation in Canada, there were almost one million people on relief. These are the facts, and any hon. member is at liberty to go back and check them for himself.

It was not until 1940, when world war II came upon us, that the unemployment situation began to disappear. That continued throughout the war. However, let me point this out for the benefit of those who have a habit of sneering at the suggestions we put to the government, and to those who have great faith in private enterprise and its ability to make all things right—and here I am not being critical of private enterprise, but simply stating the facts—that even in 1940 private enterprise was not the motivating force in our economy which solved our problem. The Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) will remember when he, in his capacity as minister of munitions and supply, I believe it was, had to report to this house that with the war already upon us he was not able to place war contracts with a limitation of 5 per cent profit because private industry refused to produce on that limit of profit, and it had to be done away with and they finally received what they wanted.

It was public enterprise by the people of Canada through their war bonds, under the direction of their government it is true, which supplied the war effort, and at the same time as a by-product solved the unemployment problem. During the war when we were devoting half and at times more than half of our total potential to war, and perhaps more than 50 per cent of that was going overseas in war material, the people of Canada lived better, on the average, than they had ever lived before.

That in itself proves that it was not private enterprise, it was not any magic solution by the government, but the fact that for the first time in years the government had used the resources and the power of the nation toward a definite objective which solved the problem. Even when that objective absorbed the best of our population, the best young men most capable of work, and took away more than 50 per cent of the materials that were being produced, the by-product of that effort kept the people of this country on a higher standard of living than they had ever experienced before.

That was the situation when we entered 1945. Again what did we find? When the war ended our so-called prosperity continued. We were quite capable of making outright gifts and extending loans amounting to millions of dollars in the aggregate after the war ended, and despite the fact that we were giving away these things, making these loans, and still using half of our production for purposes other than domestic consumption, we continued to provide the people of Canada with goods and services to a greater extent than they had experienced before the war.

That went on until 1949. By that time great pressure had been exerted upon the government from various sources, some of them in this house, to get rid of wartime controls. There were those who said that we must return as quickly as possible to what they called "normal". I have never been able to find out exactly what they meant by normal. However, they wanted to get rid of all controls and go back to the free enterprise system. Hence by 1949 we began again to have an unemployment situation in this country.

Then came Korea. That is one of the things I find members on the government side do not like to mention very often, namely the fact that in 1949 we were already beginning to drift back into an unemployment situation. The Korean war did what? It made our national defence budget run into $2 billion and more. Again almost half our potential in this country was devoted to war. Again our economy got a shot in the arm, unemployment began to disappear and things began to move once more. It took a large war and a small one within the last 15 years to burst the financial dams in this country, which had dried up the sources of the medium of exchange, in order to permit us to supply ourselves with the goods and services which have been at our fingertips ever since Canada existed. Those are things we have to recognize. We may agree or disagree upon the solution, but let us at least recognize the facts as they are.

The war in Korea ended, to the relief of millions of people across the world, and we hope that peace will be with us. Now we could turn our attention to the many social problems facing us, and to the improvement and development of this country which is one of the greatest on earth. But what do we find? Instead of entering upon a period of greater prosperity than ever before, and to which every economic and physical factor points, we again find that we are drifting back into what some call recession while others even use that horrible word "depression". Let us call a spade a spade. We are drifting back into a depression; and unless the government are willing to take action they are going to find themselves in the middle of it before they are ready to recognize it or admit it.

We now have—and I am going to use round figures—approximately half a million unemployed. There are those on the government side who say that there are not that many; there are those in the labour ranks who say there are more. But even taking the figures given by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg)—and he stated there were something over 500,000 who had made application for work at the various employment agencies across Canada—and even making some allowance for duplication, if there may be some, it is quite safe to say that there are in the neighbourhood of half a million unemployed in Canada.

This figure represents almost 10 per cent of our Canadian labour force. No one can shrug that fact off or brush it aside by saying it is seasonal unemployment. Now when we are entering the spring season, when that part of the unemployment which is seasonal should be clearing up, what do we find? We find that lay-offs are continuing. The unemployment figures are increasing rather than decreasing. That fact in itself proves that the unemployment is not a seasonal matter, and that it is owing to one of the weaknesses in our economic set-up.

There are those who say, "It is all right to talk about giving people jobs, but perhaps there is not enough to do. Perhaps there are just not enough jobs to go around." One has only to travel across the country to see some of the things that need doing. Let me put it this way. In 1953, according to the figures issued by the government itself, our gross national product was in the neighbourhood of $24 billion; in fact it was a little bit over $24 billion. Our population is roughly 15 million. If you do some simple arithmetic you will find that that gross national product comes to a per capita amount of $1,600 for every man, woman and child in our country. Let us take the average family of four; that works out to $6,400 per family.

This means that the nation has already produced or is capable of producing goods and services in order to supply every family in Canada with $6,400 of goods and services if we wanted to use it all in consumer goods. But let us allow one-third of that amount for depreciation and capital expansion; and that figure is one which is considered to be fair. It still means that every family, on the average, in Canada would require an income of over $4,000—about $4,400—to buy back the goods and services which we have already produced.

If we look at the statistics, what do we find? We find that 74 per cent of the wage earners or the people who work in Canada have an income of less than $3,000. We find that 40 per cent of them have an income of less than $2,000. We even find that 14 per cent of them have an income of less than $1,000. How in the world are those people going to buy back the production which they themselves have produced? It stands to reason that there is going to be an apparent surplus.

I say "apparent surplus" because it is not a real surplus. One has only to go through the country—as almost every hon. member does from time to time—go into the cities or the rural areas, to see how many families are living on the bare necessities of life; how many families cannot buy the very simplest luxuries or the very simplest things which make life worth living, apart from food, clothing and shelter; how many are living in homes which are not fit for human habitation; how many schools have not been painted for the last 50 years; how many hospitals need to be built, and how many first-class roads we could use in this country. Let us think of the hundreds of accidents which occur every year at level crossings across Canada where trains and automobiles collide, and consider the tragedy of it.

Everywhere you turn there is work waiting to be done. Yet we are told by some of our so-called leaders in government, "You just have to get used to the situation; you just have to adjust yourself to the competitive position". Whom are we competing against? This nation is producing $24 billion worth of goods a year and is capable perhaps of producing much more, because we are doing that while we are keeping 500,000 persons idle. If everybody were working our national product would run over the $25 billion mark. Yet we are told that we must get used or adjust ourselves to a competitive position. With whom are we competing? Apparently with ourselves. The goods are there; the services are there. What is lacking is the purchasing power—I refer to the effective purchasing power—in the hands of the people.

The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) this afternoon was more or less critical of the members of this group for bringing these matters to the attention of the government, the house and the country without putting forward any constructive proposals. That is not an accurate statement, because proposals have been made. But just so that no one will think I am trying to be critical of the government without placing anything before this house, I am going to make some proposals and offer a few comments on at least one of them.

I believe there are five things which the government or this parliament could do and which would be designed to place purchasing power in the hands of the people who could effectively use it. Let me again repeat that it would require an average per family of $4,400 to buy back our production; and that is only that part of the production which can be devoted to consumer goods, after allowing one-third for depreciation and capital expansion. I propose, first, that we should reimpose price controls; second, that we should increase old age pensions, family allowances and war veterans allowances; third, we can reduce the sales tax, which is now 10 per cent, and reimpose the excess profits tax; fourth, that the government proceed with a large-scale public investment program; fifth, reduce interest rates in order to cut the cost of doing business.

I should like to refer briefly to one or two of these points, and I shall start with the question of price control. I have heard a number of members on both sides of the house express themselves as being opposed to price control.

Mr. Nickle: Do you accept wage controls too?

Mr. Zaplitny: Just possess your soul in patience, and I shall come to that before I am finished. There are those who say they are opposed to controls as a matter of their basic political philosophy. Let us approach it from that angle for a moment. Let us not kid ourselves that we do not have price control in this country today. We did have price control during the war years down to about 1946 or 1947, administered by a board set up by the government. In my opinion that was the most democratic way in which it could be done. There were improvements that could have been made, but at least it was always under the control of the public representatives elected by the people. If there were any grievances or any injustices they could be brought to the attention of the government in this house.

Starting in 1946 the government saw fit to wipe price controls from our statute books. Some people were under the impression when the process was finished around 1949 that we no longer had any price control. Nothing could be further from the truth, Mr. Speaker. We have price controls just as effectively today as we had them in 1945, 1942 or any of those years during the war. The only difference is that price control now has been transferred from the hands of the government to the hands of private industry. No economy, particularly an economy such as ours, could operate without controls. Let no one kid himself that it is possible to do so. It would be no more possible to carry on the economy of this country without some type of control than it would be to drive one of these modern 200 horsepower motor cars without any brakes or steering gear. You would wind up climbing a telephone pole.

Somebody is always going to control the economy of this country. It is for us to decide whether it is going to be the representatives of the people who will set up a system of controls for the benefit of the people, or whether we are going to leave it to private industry to do it for us. They are not going to do it for us; they are going to do it for themselves. They have been doing it very effectively. One has only to glance at the annual reports published by the big companies themselves, and by our financial institutions in recent years, to find that their annual profits are climbing at a great rate.

The other day a reference was made to the farm implement industry. One has only to glance at the reports from that industry to find that from 1946 to 1951 their profits increased by approximately 223 per cent. They exercise price control very intelligently for themselves. They are not exercising it for the benefit of all people in Canada; and I, for one, would not expect them to do so. It is not their function. The board of directors of the Bank of Commerce, Canada Packers, Massey-Harris or International Nickel were not set up by the shareholders in order to establish a system of price controls for the benefit of the consumers in Canada. They were put in there to create profits. I want to give them credit for doing a good job. They are making enormous profits. One has only to check their annual reports to ascertain that. You will find that after taxes their profits are still much higher than in any period since 1946, and have been increasing every year.

Mr. Trainor: Why not put them on the record?

Mr. Zaplitny: If I were to put everything on the record to which I made reference I would not get it all into one speech. The hon. member does not need to take my word; he has only to refer to the statistics, and he will find that those profits have been increasing enormously every year since 1946.

The trouble is that while those profits have been increasing, the result of the removal of purchasing power from the people has been dumped, so to speak, in the lap of the government. The government has only the result of the situation but has no control over it. I, for one, have no hesitation in suggesting price control. Let us not get the impression that price control means holding prices down, because in its essence it does not mean anything of the sort. It means bringing about a proper relationship between prices. For example, it is well known today that farmers across Canada are receiving a smaller income for their produce than they have been enjoying in recent years, while at the same time they are paying higher prices for their farm implements, their fuel, their fertilizer and the other things which go into the cost of production.

We are told that trade is one of the ways in which we can keep full employment in Canada. How is a farmer going to produce agricultural products which can sell on world markets at lower prices when his cost of production is going up? Certainly if the government had maintained a sensible system of controls the farmer would be in a position today to produce his products at lower prices, and his price relationship would allow him to sell his goods on the markets of the world. His standard of living would not be impaired.

A question was asked a while ago as to whether or not I was in favour of wage controls. Let me tell my hon. friend that what I said a moment ago about industry taking over price control holds true for labour. Industry is doing a job in controlling wages. Ask any labour union about that, and they will give you the full story about wage control. What we need is control of prices which are being manipulated by monopolies and combines at an international level.

Again let me say it is not the business of private industry to maintain a proper price level; that is not their function. Their function is to produce goods and make a profit. I have no criticism of the fact that they are making huge profits. It is the function of this parliament to watch and protect the welfare of the consumer in this country, particularly the welfare of those senior citizens of ours and the veterans who are on fixed incomes or pensions. They are the first to be hurt when the cost of living begins to spiral.

I want to refer also to the question of public investment. From time to time, in fact since 1945 when the famous green book proposals were put out—the government has been putting out so many of these books we get our colours mixed, but I believe it was the green book proposals—we have been told that it was the intention of this government to launch upon a wide scheme of public investment by way of necessary public works, and also to initiate certain industries where necessary. The years have gone by since 1945, and nothing has come out of it. In recent months announcements have appeared in the press to the effect that the government has some sort of plan, "built-in stabilizers" as they call them, and certain fiscal policies which would prevent a recession.

I think it is time these mysterious hat tricks of the government were brought to light. Let us see what these built-in stabilizers are. Let us see where their public investment program is. For what reason are they holding back? We were told, in 1946 I believe it was, that the government had a shelf of public works that was being held for just such an emergency as this. So far as I can see it is still on the shelf. It has not been brought before this parliament. It has not been brought to the attention of the country, and the situation is becoming worse each day.

We say, Mr. Speaker, that there is an immediate problem. I hope something can be done immediately now that the problem is here. At the same time let us not kid ourselves into thinking that within a few months we are not going to have an unemployment situation, and that we can just sit back and wait until next year, or until the problem reappears. It will not work out that way. The purchasing power of the people is being drained off in the form of profits at a greater rate today than ever in the history of Canada. If that process continues, and if there is nothing in the form of government policy to replace that purchasing power in the hands of the people who need it and who will use it, then our unemployment problem will increase and snowball until we reach a major depression within a very short time.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): Mr. Speaker, now that parliament has increased my yearly remuneration by some $4,000—and, I might add, without my consent—I for one intend to do my very best to try to earn that extra money. Perhaps that is a challenge to some other members who may wish to do likewise. I would warn them, however, that if no effort is made to place themselves in the position of $10,000 a year men, many of them will never get past the next general election, and will not be here to enjoy that remuneration.

I had not intended taking part in the debate because, as hon. members know, we are getting on toward the end of it. However, no one has mentioned the point I intend to discuss at this time, and that is my reason for rising. If someone had said these few words I intend to say I would not have bothered getting to my feet.

The government most certainly must accept a share of responsibility for the unemployment situation as it exists today. The government, and in particular the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris), are responsible to a greater extent than they care to admit. Hundreds of thousands of immigrants were brought to this country as agriculturists, their contracts stating that they were to stay on the farms for a period of one year. What happened? Many of them left their employment in one or two weeks, leaving farmers high and dry, and migrated to the towns or cities to find employment, perhaps to be absorbed in industry.

I remember warning the minister about three years ago that the immigration laws should be changed, extending the time to about five years. This would have stopped many of the immigrants coming here as agriculturists. They found the only way they could get into Canada was to come as agriculturists, and we know that many of them were not qualified for that work when they came here and had no intention of remaining on the farms. If they had been told that they would be kept on the farms for a longer period of time they would not have come out in the first place. This, to my mind, would have done more than anything else to assure jobs for thousands of men, because it would have stopped many others from coming to Canada in the first place.

Their only way to get into Canada was to come here as agriculturists, and I say the government should have compelled those men to fulfil their contracts. The second mistake was made when the government refused to accept advice to change the provision in the immigration law from one year to a period of from three to five years. This would not have been any hardship for those who intended to make agriculture their life's work, and I am sure it would have had the result that many who now are unemployed would have been working steadily.

There are many farms in this country that could absorb more men than are now available. In addition to this, many farmers cannot afford to match the prices offered in industry. That is one reason men have left the farms; they can get higher wages elsewhere. But had they been compelled to fulfil their contracts when they were brought out here in the first instance we would have found that a great many men who are now walking the streets would have been on those farms and doing good work. However, as these men were probably the last to be absorbed into industry, they have been the first to be let out. That is one of the reasons why unemployment figures run so high at the present time.

To work is not a hardship—that is, unless there is something else one would rather do. One reason there are so many out of work in the farm machinery plants is that the farmers have stopped buying farm machinery. The machine companies have priced themselves out of the market, and the farmer cannot afford to pay farm machinery prices. Labour costs are too high. How can we expect anything but unemployment when the farm income has dropped by about 30 per cent? If the government wants to lessen the degree of unemployment all it has to do is to step up farm prices, and just watch the unemployment situation disappear.

Another factor that is unfair to the farmer is the income tax. Working hours should be considered when farm income is being computed. Why should farmers pay the same rate of tax on income earned when it requires twice as many hours to acquire the same amount of money? And we know, too, that farming is always a risk. The farmer never knows, after having worked to prepare land for a crop, whether he will receive a suitable return, because much depends on the weatherman.

In closing let me say that the government must accept responsibility for at least a third of the number of unemployed, by reason of not having done those ordinary things one would expect it to do to assist the workingman. Export markets as we know are not very encouraging, and the world demand for wheat has been less buoyant. Continued surplus production in the United States does not brighten the hopes for Canadian producers. Cattle prices have dropped by at least a half in the last two years.

Then federal taxation has done as much as any other single thing to create unemployment. If taxes were to go down the cost of living would go down, as well as the cost of production. We should then find ourselves in a better position to compete for world markets. I most certainly hope the government will consider these problems.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, every now and again the biologists and the anthropologists flatter the human race by telling us we are superior to the lower animals because we learn by experience. However, having listened to the comments of some government spokesmen in recent days I begin to wonder whether that flattery is justified.

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am speaking for myself, as a human being.

An hon. Member: Not for the government.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): No, not for the government. Looking over the debates of the House of Commons of about 20 years ago, I came across precisely the same sort of debate we are having today, on the subject of unemployment, by way of an amendment to the motion to go into supply. I find that almost the same kind of thing was being said then as we have heard today.

For instance, at page 1275 of Hansard for April 4, 1930, I find a speech by my old friend Henry Spencer, in which he speaks of the unemployment situation and points out that at that time the number of unemployed in Canada stood, in round figures, at 100,000. That interested me, because at that time it was quite obvious that members of the house on all sides were taking the unemployment situation extremely seriously. Yet here we had a figure of 100,000 out of an admittedly lower population of about 10 million. That is, there was only a fifth of the number of unemployed we have today, at a time when the population was two-thirds of today's population.

Now, of course not all people at that time took the same serious view of the matter that Mr. Henry Spencer did. We had another gentleman who was, need I say, a government supporter of the day, a member of the Liberal party in 1930, and he had this to say in part, as reported at page 1347 of Hansard for April 7, 1930:

> During the summer season of 1929 this country enjoyed the greatest era of prosperity that it had known since confederation. Never in the history of this nation have we enjoyed greater prosperity, greater development and greater contentment, and nowhere else in the world could a labouring class be found who enjoyed a higher standard of living than did the people of Canada during the year 1929.

Mr. Speaker, one might almost have imagined that the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) was speaking. Yes; and then, as my Conservative friend says, "came the deluge". But the deluge was in the form of a Conservative government, which arrived in 1930. In Hansard for 1931 we have the report of speeches made at that time, in which the prime minister of the day is quoted as having said this, as reported at page 465:

> I tell you that when parliament meets, if there is not then evident further increase in employment, additional steps will be taken to meet the situation.

And the hon. member who quoted him said this:

> I believe, Mr. Speaker, we have a right to know what those additional steps are to be.

Again that is curiously reminiscent. I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to a more recent Hansard, as recent as February 12 of this year. At page 2026 we find a statement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in answer to a question regarding the fiscal and monetary measures which, according to the Acting Prime Minister, this government is now implementing to prevent a rise in the level of unemployment. I find in it very much the same sort of vague assurance that the people of Canada were receiving from their spokesmen in 1930 and 1931.

I suggest that it is time the government began to take a little serious interest in the actual state of affairs in Canada, that they should take their heads out of the sand, that they should, for instance, perhaps listen to the voice of the executive commission of the Canadian association of social workers whose corresponding secretary had a letter in the Toronto Globe and Mail this morning, from which I should like to quote a few rather striking sentences:

> Last year, after most careful study by the Canadian Welfare Council and its membership across Canada, representations were made to the government at Ottawa and to all provincial governments regarding the urgent necessity of having some over-all and permanent provision made to meet the situation and avoid the destitution and disruption of normal family living which today faces many families through no fault of their own. As far as can be observed, nothing has been done to make effective the recommendations made in this report or to evolve any satisfactory alternatives. Unemployment of able-bodied employable people who need and want work is a national problem which strikes at the very roots of family life and causes untold suffering.

There is more in the same vein, Mr. Speaker, which indicates that people whose daily work brings them into close contact with the unemployed are viewing the situation today with a great deal more gravity than our spokesmen on the government benches are doing.

It may be that such champions of free enterprise as the government of Canada will pay more attention to such sturdy enterprises as Messrs. Dun and Bradstreet rather than to the presumably soft-hearted and sentimental social workers. Messrs. Dun and Bradstreet have some rather shattering information for us too, as published in the Financial Post of February 13 of this year, where they report the number of business failures in the years 1952 and 1953. They tell us that in 1952 we had 843 business failures; in 1953, 1,039, an increase of 23 per cent. But worse than that, the number of business failures in the last quarter of 1952 were 192. In the last quarter of 1953 there were 317 failures, an increase of 65 per cent.

The liabilities of those failing concerns presented an even more serious picture. In 1952 the total liabilities of business failures amounted to $21,823,000. In 1953 the liabilities amounted to $30,704,000, an increase of 40 per cent. But here again we find that the final quarters of each year present an even more depressing picture. In the last quarter of 1952 the liabilities of business failures amounted to $4,605,000; whereas in the last quarter of 1953 the liabilities amounted to $10,325,000, an increase of 125 per cent.

Since it is ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take third reading of the amendments to the Salaries Act. Then we shall continue this debate, and if it is concluded we shall call the four departments which we mentioned on Friday evening, standing them all. Then we shall proceed with second reading of the amendment to the Exports Credits Insurance Act and the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Labour, and then the Criminal Code.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 23, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HIGHWAY TRANSPORT

DECISION OF PRIVY COUNCIL—CONFERENCE OF PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short statement with respect to interprovincial and international highway transport.

In view of the decision of the privy council in the case of Winner v. S.M.T. (Eastern) Limited et al., it appears that an interprovincial or international undertaking within the meaning of section 92, head 10(a) of the British North America Act, is not subject to the provincial law relating to public carriers.

In our view it would not be in the public interest to have a divided jurisdiction, with the provincial boards controlling the traffic within the provinces, and a federal board controlling the traffic moving between the provinces or between a province and the United States, and for this amongst other reasons we are reluctant to enter this field and thereby bring about divided jurisdiction.

In view of this situation I propose to call a conference of provincial ministers having jurisdiction over highways to discuss the problems arising herein and to endeavour to find a common ground on the best way to regulate and control highway transport, whether intraprovincial, interprovincial or international.

Among ten provinces, all interested in the control of the traffic using their highways, there may be different views expressed on this subject. I am hopeful that a common understanding may be reached to the end that the provinces will be able to regulate and control all motor transport using provincial highways.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question. I take it that it is the hope of the government that the board of transport commissioners will not be called upon to exercise any jurisdiction over highways, and that no other dominion government body will be called upon to exercise such jurisdiction either.

Mr. Chevrier: The statement has been carefully prepared and speaks for itself. I would not like either to add to or subtract from it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATION AT GENEVA CONFERENCE ON KOREA AND INDO-CHINA

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked a question concerning the proposed Korean political conference to be held in Geneva on April 26. I should add to what I said yesterday that during the Berlin conference we were kept informed of the progress of the talks and the proposals being put forward by the western powers. Further, as nationalist China was not one of the nations participating in the United Nations action in Korea, she was not present at the meeting in Washington to which I referred.

[Later:]

ALLEGED STATEMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is he now ready to answer the question which I asked yesterday and which he said he would accept as notice.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will return to Ottawa tomorrow. I have not yet been able to get in touch with him to find out what he did say, and until then I cannot answer the question.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

APPOINTMENT OF HAROLD C. BANKS AS CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question, or questions, of the Acting Prime Minister, of which I have given notice. Since this matter involves the responsibilities of three departments of government it seemed proper to ask the questions of the Acting Prime Minister. However, there are several questions, and I shall be guided by his wishes as to whether he would like me to read them all at once, or would prefer to answer them one at a time.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are eight questions here, all referring to matters outside my own department. I would urge that my hon. friend place them on the order paper.

Mr. Drew: No, no.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not see the urgency of the questions.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am quite willing to handle this in a manner that will be most convenient, but I cannot agree to put them on the order paper, because some urgency attaches to them. If Your Honour wishes to pass upon that, I shall be glad to read the questions at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would ask the first question, and then we would see about the urgency of it.

Mrs. Fairclough: In that regard I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if, following reports of court proceedings in Montreal, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) or his officials took steps to inform themselves regarding the background of Mr. Harold C. Banks, at the time of his appointment as Canadian representative—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: As there are eight questions, perhaps we should let the hon. member read the first one in full.

Mrs. Fairclough: And perhaps I had better start over again.

An hon. Member: Dispense.

Mrs. Fairclough: Following press reports of court proceedings in Montreal, did the Minister of Labour or his officials take steps to inform themselves regarding Mr. Harold C. Banks, at the time his appointment as Canadian representative to the conference at Geneva was approved?

Mr. Speaker: I would not wish to prejudge the other questions the hon. member said she wishes to ask; but if the others are in the same vein, in view of the fact that a question was asked by the same member yesterday, to which the Minister of Labour has attempted to reply, I would imagine that better satisfaction could be given to the hon. member if these questions were put on the order paper. I have no knowledge of my own in the matter but, like all other hon. members, I read the newspapers, and I understand that this gentleman has already gone to attend the conference. So whatever is being done now is not going to change the situation.

An hon. Member: He can be recalled.

Mr. Speaker: I imagine that if the questions are put on the order paper they could be answered properly. Of course the hon. member realizes my difficulty. According to our practice it is not required that an hon. member send notice to the Speaker concerning his questions. But I cannot judge as to the urgency or the nature of a question unless I have heard it.

As I say, in all fairness to all hon. members, I do not think a member should prepare a list of seven or eight questions to be asked when the orders of the day are called, especially when they relate to the same subject matter. It is not the spirit of the practice we now follow in connection with asking questions on the orders of the day. They should be short questions, and such as can be answered briefly. If they are long, and relate to the same subject matter, then they should be on the order paper.

Mrs. Fairclough: I quite understand the nature of the questions which should be asked. And I might say I am doing this in the most expeditious manner. I could have asked questions of each of the various ministers, which probably would have amounted to the same number of questions, but it seemed to me that because of the interlocking nature—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mrs. Fairclough: —it was better to do it in this way. I would be glad—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is giving an excellent reason why these questions should be put on the order paper, namely, precisely the fact that several departments are concerned. The hon. member could not expect to ask these questions of the ministry and have each cabinet minister interested, without having the chance to consult with one another, answer these questions one after the other. My ruling would be that these questions should be put on the order paper.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I read one more question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member will allow the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) to ask his question, and then ask another question. The house does not have to know that it is exactly one of these same questions.

Mr. Drew: There has been some measure of flexibility in this practice.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Too much.

Some hon. Members: Too much.

Mr. Drew: I hear the comment from several points "too much", and I recognize that there are many who think that any discussion is too much. But I was going to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is not only the question of the rather useful and helpful procedure that has been adopted but also the fact that urgency may be a matter of very great importance in a question of this kind. In this instance the questions are directed to the possibility that the Canadian government would disavow this man immediately, if the information in their possession were disclosed. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to reconsider the proposal that has been made, and, rather than have questions intervene, to permit this first question that is clear to be answered, because I know the question can be answered, and by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe).

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should like to refer hon. members to citation 297 of Beauchesne's third edition:

> A certain number of oral questions are permitted in practice by members, without notice, before the orders of the day are called; but these are merely allowed by courtesy in connection with the business of the house or with very urgent and important matters of public concern. They are always brief, no debate being permitted, and the replies are as concise as possible. The minister interrogated may reply at once or may direct that the usual notice be given. Such questions are governed by the same rules of order as questions of which notice has been given.

I realize the interest that the hon. member has in these questions; but in view of the practice that has always been followed, hon. members will be somewhat agreeable with what I say, that it is not the practice on orders of the day for one member to rise in his place and say: "I have eight questions to ask." There are several members who are anxious to ask questions of a similar nature. In their view their questions may be just as important as the eight questions the hon. member for Hamilton West wishes to ask of the ministry at this moment. That is why I suggested that the hon. member for Broadview ask his question, and then an hon. member of the C.C.F. party or of the Social Credit party may ask a question. Then the hon. member may get another try at some of these questions that she has. But I do not think it is normal practice for an hon. member to rise and say, "I have eight questions, and I want to monopolize the time for those eight questions until my answers are given." That is the position, and that is exactly the reason why I asked the hon. member to let other hon. members proceed with their questions, and perhaps later she may ask another question, and if the question is in order I am sure the cabinet ministers will be anxious to reply.

Hon. members will realize as well that it is my duty to decide whether the questions being asked are urgent. My judgment may not be a hundred per cent correct at all times, but that is the penalty which hon. members must pay at times for having a Speaker who is perhaps unable to render his decisions properly. That is my decision. I rule that the first question that I heard is of the type that could be put on the order paper; and I have advised the hon. member to do so.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Would the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration care to advise the house if his department is going to admit Mr. Harold C. Banks, a United States citizen with a record of court convictions in Canada and the United States, into Canada when he returns from filling his present government appointment as representative of the Canadian people at the international labour organization conference in Geneva?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there are two comments I have to make. First, I would repeat what you said a moment ago, that questions are for the purpose of eliciting information and not giving it. Second, if my hon. friend would like to wait for two or three days I may be able to answer his question.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister not know the record of Mr. Banks so that he could give us this information at the present time? Has the government given any thought to the matter?

Mr. Harris: I can only repeat what I said, that if these questions are put on the order paper or if I obtain reasonable notice of them I shall be in a position to answer.

Mr. Fulton: Are we to assume that the minister has not—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Are we to assume from the minister's answer that he does not have the necessary information now?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is very quick at assuming many things in this house. He can assume anything he likes from my remarks but he cannot assume that he will not get an answer as quickly as I can possibly give it to him.

[Later:]

Mr. Hamilton: Can the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration tell the house whether he will be able to give an answer to my previous question before Mr. Banks has returned to Canada?

Mr. Fulton: Answer.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Did the minister himself consider, or did his officials convey to the Minister of Labour, information regarding the court record of Mr. Harold C. Banks?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I must object to the hon. member's question on the ground that it was answered yesterday by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Drew: It certainly was not.

Mr. Rowe: That is why it is being asked today.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON STATEMENT OF ONTARIO MINISTER OF WELFARE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour of which I have given him notice. My question is: Would the Minister of Labour care to comment on the statement of the Hon. William Goodfellow, minister of welfare in the Ontario government, as reported in the Globe and Mail this morning, as follows:

Full responsibility for able-bodied unemployed in Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The purpose of asking questions on the orders of the day is not to supply information but to obtain information. The hon. member's question is based on a statement that was made elsewhere. He will kindly put his question.

Mr. Hees: Does the Minister of Labour agree with the minister of welfare in Ontario that the full responsibility for able-bodied unemployed in Canada should be accepted by the federal government as the major taxing authority in Canada and receiver of the greatest revenue?

Mr. Lesage: No urgency.

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. Speaker: It is not even a question which could properly be placed on the order paper. The hon. member is asking the minister in effect if he shares the views of another minister in a different jurisdiction on a certain subject. I recall having read not very long ago that Mr. Speaker Black had a similar problem. It was in 1933, I think. It had to do with an opinion given, in the legislature of Ontario precisely. The question was asked by Mr. Heenan, and is reported at page 3805 of Hansard of April 7, 1933, as follows:

Mr. Heenan: This report states that the legislature is going to investigate and I want it to investigate the figures I gave on the floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: The figures the hon. member gave are properly quoted in Hansard. This house has no control over the Ontario legislature as to what investigation it shall make.

The discussion then carries on in the same vein and the then Speaker went on to say:

I call the hon. member to order. I want the hon. member to understand that there is nothing personal in my remarks with regard to this matter but when the Speaker rises to address the house it is the duty of any hon. member to take his seat.

Then later on:

Mr. Heenan: On a question of privilege: Surely if I am misquoted in the press or in the legislature, I am entitled to make a correction.

That was denied by the Speaker of the day. We have no jurisdiction over what takes place in another legislature or over an opinion given by ministers who are autonomous in their own jurisdiction. I do not think that we ought to bring into this house matters which are foreign to our own jurisdiction. Perhaps I can take advantage of the question which has been asked by the hon. member for Broadview to say that matters pertaining to provincial legislatures should not be brought up in this house.

Mr. Hees: May I phrase my question in a slightly different way. The Minister of Labour has had considerable time to think this over. May I ask: Is it the opinion of the government that full responsibility for the able-bodied unemployed in Canada should be accepted by the federal government as the major taxing authority in Canada and the receiver of the greatest revenue? Is it the opinion of the government that that is so or is not so?

Mr. Speaker: Questions on matters of policy are being asked. Questions are asked of the government, "Is it government policy that this or that be done?" Hon. members know that inevitably the answer is that that is a question of government policy which will be announced in due course. I think it was back in 1792 when the rule about this matter was being approved in the house of Lower Canada and it was definitely stated that questions of policy should not be asked of a minister. We have gone a long way since then. If the minister wishes to make any comment I have no objection.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The hon. member sent me a copy of his original question and the press clipping that has been discussed. As I am sure he knows, the topic referred to there is related to government policy. At the present I am unable to make a statement.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPORTED ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Labour prepared to comment on Reginald Hardy's report that an increase in unemployment insurance benefits may be expected soon?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I think I answered that the other day in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). I stated that the Unemployment Insurance Act had been constantly under study this winter but no decision had been reached and I have made no recommendations to the government in regard to it.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN WEDGE CAP INSIGNIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if it was on his authority that the crown has been taken from the badge of the Royal Canadian Air Force and replaced with an eagle?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The badges of the R.C.A.F. are matters for the chief of air staff. In this case my recollection is that the cap badge worn by officers and warrant officers of the R.C.A.F. consisted of a crown and eagle. Up to recently other ranks have worn a different type of badge. For purposes of uniformity other ranks now wear on the wedge cap an eagle without the crown, which is worn only by officers and warrant officers.

Mr. Ferguson: In my opinion—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Standing order 40 reads:

> A member addressing the house, if called to order either by Mr. Speaker or on a point raised by another member, shall sit down while the point is being stated, after which he may explain.

As soon as the hon. member received a reply to his question he stood up again and began to speak, saying "in my opinion." Therefore I judged that he was not going to ask a supplementary question and I rose to call him to order. Notwithstanding the fact that the hon. member could have seen me standing up he carried on, putting on Hansard remarks which I could not hear because of the tumult in the house. I think having due respect to the rules the hon. member will not object if I direct Hansard to expunge from the record all the remarks he made from the moment I stood up and called him to order.

If the hon. member wishes to ask a supplementary question, he is entitled to do so, but he is not entitled to debate an answer which he has received.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I contend that no minister of the crown has the right to remove the crown from our uniforms.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: He has no right to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member that the question he has stated is not one of privilege; it is one of debate, and he may debate the matter whenever the proper opportunity presents itself.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister of defence if he is able yet to reply to the question asked a week ago Monday in the house relating to the subject raised today by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson).

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to give the reply.

WHEAT

EQUALIZATION OF PRICES—INQUIRY AS TO RESCISSION OF ANNOUNCED POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Have representations been received from grain exporters in Vancouver urging the rescission of the policy announced on February 18 having as its purpose the equalization of prices for wheat at its destination in the United Kingdom, and if so will the minister comment on these representations?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since the announcement of this policy no representations have been received from grain exporters. The only representation that has been received was from Mr. H. F. Martin, president of the grain workers union, local 333, referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) in the question he asked yesterday as reported at page 2302 of Hansard.

DUMPING

INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION OF AMENDMENT TO ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Could the minister give us his reply to the question I asked yesterday concerning the application by his department of the amendment to the Customs Act?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to give a reply immediately. The matter has been brought to the attention of the officials and as soon as the information is supplied to me I will pass it on to the hon. gentleman and to the house.

POST OFFICE

VANCOUVER—HIRING OF CASUAL LABOUR ON SATURDAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Has there been any change in the plans which have been announced for the hiring of casual labour in the Vancouver post office on Saturdays after April 1?

Hon. Alcide Coté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for calling my office this morning to inform me of the nature of this question, and also the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott), who called my office yesterday on the same subject. As I stated during the recent debate, I am considering this whole question and I hope to make a statement within the next day or two.

[Mr. Green.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE—RADIO QUIZ PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. I see by the press that the minister has been justifiably annoyed by a rash of impersonal calls—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will not be surprised if I treat him as I do other hon. members. He will have to ask his question and not read a statement.

Mr. Nickle: My question, sir, is this. Might not the annoyance caused the minister be quickly ended if some program listeners would send in as their answer "The career of C. D. Howe"?

Mr. Speaker: This question, of course, will not be taken notice of. Any other questions?

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN OFFICIAL BADGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the official badge of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police been changed recently? If so, what are the changes?

SALARIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE SALARIES OF MINISTERS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 172, to amend the Salaries Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that this motion be agreed to?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION FOR EXAMINATION BY COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

The house resumed, from Monday, February 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Green, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gillis.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, before we adjourned last night I was delving into the history of Canada and this house with regard to unemployment and dealing with the situation in 1930 and 1931. Today I want to bring the matter a little further up to date.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member for Nanaimo please resume his seat for a few moments so that hon. members who wish to converse with their colleagues may leave the house and do so in the lobbies provided for that purpose.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): This afternoon I would like to bring the history of the discussion on unemployment up a little closer to our own time and quote from some of the proceedings in this house relating to the year 1935. At that time our representatives here in parliament were having a debate on unemployment and the leader of the opposition of that day, Mr. William Lyon Mackenzie King, was speaking on the state of affairs in Canada as the result of five years of Conservative administration. He told us in this speech, as reported at page 59 of Hansard of 1935, that there were at that time over one million people on direct relief. He added that the total was not as great as it had been two years previously when 1,240,000 were unemployed, but that there were still over one million on relief, which was being paid from dominion, provincial and the other sources concerned.

I should like to remind hon. members that this was stated in the house after five years of Conservative administration, after five years in office by a government which had come into office on the promise that it would cure this problem of unemployment. But before our Liberal friends become too excited we will move on to 1936, when they were back in office again. In this connection I should like to quote from a speech delivered by my friend Mr. C. G. MacNeil, at that time the member for Vancouver North. He said then that in December last there were in Canada 1,206,429 persons in receipt of some form of relief. In February, 1935, there were 1,054,821, and in February, 1934, there were 1,154,822 persons receiving some form of relief. He suggested at that time that this number included some 400,000 wholly unemployed wage earners.

The point I wish to stress is this. I have no wish to throw stones at past administrations. I realize that those who were in charge of the government at that time were facing a situation which had no precedent in human history and that they grappled with it presumably to the best of their ability. In fact, it is to their credit, Mr. Speaker, that they apparently took the symptoms and signs of economic decay much more seriously than their counterpart of the present day.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we must remember that at that time we did not have in the seats of office the intellectual giants we have today. But even such minor political figures as the late Mr. Mackenzie King, the late Viscount Bennett and their colleagues—and they had a certain measure of political standing—were unable to do anything about this problem, although at least they admitted that there was a problem. Today we have government spokesmen—and the leading one among them is the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe)—refusing to admit that there is any serious situation at all in the country.

Last night I quoted some figures from Messrs. Dun and Bradstreet. This afternoon I should like to quote some figures from the dominion bureau of statistics. In fact, I would recommend these to the Acting Prime Minister as desirable reading at the present time. Here we have a table of commercial failures in Canada, showing the assets and liabilities for the third quarter of 1953, with comparisons with the third quarters of other years. These are extremely interesting figures because, by the comparisons they draw, they show us precisely what is happening in our economy. They go back as far as the year 1929. In the third quarter of that year the total liabilities of commercial failures had been $9,300,000. Then we move up to 1932, when we find that the situation had improved a little bit and that we had only $8,791,000. Then in 1939 when, of course, we were beginning to get into the war, when by the help of war expenditures we were rapidly coming out of the depression, we had failures amounting to only $3,789,000. Five years later, in 1944, just towards the end of the war, we had a mere three-quarters of a million dollars of liabilities in our commercial failures. But from that date on the figures got steadily worse. In 1947 the liabilities were $2,500,000; in 1948, they were $4,139,000; in 1950, $5,798,000; in 1951, $6,469,000; in 1952, $6,750,000; and in the third quarter of 1953, last year, $8,074,000.

I think we have here, without any doubt, plain evidence in front of us that there is something radically wrong with our economy, something that will not be cured by mere glad cries of optimism, and something that I think should be studied by all responsible people today, particularly those who are in the seats of office.

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

I have been particularly struck by the comments of the Acting Prime Minister because—and I say this in all sincerity—they come from a man of most outstanding ability.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Oh yes; you people opposite do well to pound your desks because, Mr. Speaker, there were a lot of mediocrities, nonentities and plain political knotheads who came into power on the coattails of the extremely able Acting Prime Minister. I am very much afraid that when he goes the way of all flesh, some of them will also go the way of all flesh. However, as I say, this optimistic spirit coming from a man of the capacity of the Acting Prime Minister gives one pause. If he were a stupid or an ignorant man or if he were a man with no experience, we could dismiss his statements with a shrug of the shoulders. But when we know what kind of man he is; when we know the job he did during the war when, as a result in no small measure of his vigour and his activities, and his ability to organize, we came out of the depression as revealed by the figures I have just quoted, I think we have the right to expect that now, when we are facing another serious problem, the right hon. gentleman will consent to apply his mind to that problem and to seek a solution for it rather than seek to persuade us that no problem exists. In fact, Mr. Speaker, when I hear the right hon. gentleman giving voice to these optimistic predictions, I am reminded of a famous gentleman of some years ago—some hon. members of my age will remember him; I refer to Dr. Coué—who was going to solve all our problems by the simple little formula of saying over and over again to himself and everybody around him, "Every day, in every way, things are getting better and better". Of course they did not get better. Dr. Coué flourished during the darkest days of the depression. Since then he has disappeared from view unless indeed, Mr. Speaker, we have now discovered what became of Dr. Coué, and find that he has become the Acting Prime Minister of Canada.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, when I see this man to whom Canada owes a most tremendous debt—and I hope he realizes I am saying this in all sincerity—I wonder why it is that we cannot call on him today to face this extremely serious problem that confronts us.

The other day when my colleague the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) was speaking, some comments were made from the right of us here with regard to the curtailment of wages or the fixing of wages. I have here today some figures to show that that perhaps is not the area in our economy that we should be worrying too much about and that perhaps we would be better advised to turn to some of the other areas in the economy. For instance, we might turn to the report presented to us by the superintendent of insurance for Canada, who gives us some very interesting information on page 7 of his preparatory index. He tells us that out of every $100 income of the life insurance companies, there was expended in disbursements under contracts, $36.88; for general expenses, $16.65; taxes, $1.52; other disbursements including dividends, $10.44, making a total of $65.49. There was left to be carried to reserves an amount of $35.51 out of every $100 collected.

As the superintendent of insurance also tells us, the total income of life insurance companies in Canada in the year 1951 was $839,500,000. We can assume that nearly $300 million was taken from the pockets of the Canadian people by the life insurance companies and placed in their reserves. I know, of course, that many people will say that these vast sums have to be invested in order to ensure the safety of the policyholders. I regret to say, however, that that is a complete delusion. Here we have to deal not with an ordinary type of business but really with what is after all merely a legalized form of gambling. Let us take one particular company which is reported at page 408 of the report of the superintendent of insurance. This particular company reports $19¼ million for premium income and investment income of $5,500,000. It also reports that its disbursements in insurance and annuity contracts amounted to $8¼ million. The interesting point about this is that, in spite of all its investments, this company is obliged to rely on its continuing stream of premium income in order to fulfil its obligations to its policyholders. Having done that, and having paid all its other costs of $7,110,000, it had a surplus of some $12 million. This is the point that I have been coming to.

In connection with this question of unemployment we cannot overlook the government's policy with regard to the investment of the surplus savings of the Canadian people. Here is a large pool of these savings which we are permitting to fall into the hands of a comparatively small group of corporations and over which, as we have seen only too painfully in recent weeks, the government has little or no control. All its efforts to induce investment of these funds in the areas in which the government considers they should be invested appear to be falling on deaf ears.

The figures that I have quoted are merely symptoms of the underlying disease of our society which was plain to be seen in the 1930's and which was not cured by this government or its predecessors but was cured entirely by force of circumstances. It was cured because of the necessity of turning from our unplanned dog-eat-dog economy to a planned economy fixed on certain goals. I would point out that although it was popular to say throughout the debates from 1930 to 1935, as it is today, that the depressed condition of the world was the result of world-wide circumstances over which no government had any control, nevertheless the measures which were taken under the extremely capable and vigorous leadership of the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) were in final essence purely domestic measures completely within the competence of the government of Canada.

I would point out that, although vast quantities of materials were shipped abroad to Canada's allies, vast quantities of materials and machines of destruction were sent to our own forces in the field and large loans were made to our allies, in the final analysis the Canadian people paid for every cent of those expenditures and it was entirely the domestic measures that were taken which, incidental to helping to win the war, solved the economic problems of Canada of that day. These problems are now coming home again to us, and I think the Canadian people have the right to ask this government, which assumed power with such a fanfare of trumpets last August, what it proposes to do now in the present circumstances.

I must confess that I have been bitterly disappointed at the statements of government spokesmen in this regard, and particularly disappointed with statements of the Acting Prime Minister because, as I have said before, he is a man of outstanding capacity, vigour and attainments. The only conclusion I can come to is that perhaps the situation is like that of an old French woman I heard of once who, after peering out the window for six weeks at incessant rain, gave it as her considered opinion that ce bon Dieu was getting too old for His job. I wonder if we are perhaps in the same circumstances today and whether we have to have a complete change of administration before we can hope to have these problems tackled with the same vigour with which they were tackled in the 1930's.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow in any detail the arguments we have just heard from the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron). However, I should like to take exception to certain remarks he made at the beginning of his speech last night. The hon. member at that time was referring to the situation in 1929 and the fact that the government of the day had claimed that everything was very rosy and that there was then prosperity in the country. The hon. member for Nanaimo went on to say, as found at page 2343 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, one might almost have imagined that the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) was speaking. Yes; and then, as my Conservative friend says, "came the deluge". But the deluge was in the form of a Conservative government, which arrived in 1930.

We have heard that statement made in varying forms over a long period of years. I am not surprised when I hear it made by some people outside the house, perhaps in back country districts where they have not had much opportunity to study history, but I must say that I am very much surprised to hear it made by a member of parliament, one of our so-called $10,000 a year men. I should like to call his attention to the fact that the deluge also came in the United States, and it came under the Republican government of Mr. Hoover, who I suppose is one of the greatest men produced in the United States in the last thirty-five or forty years.

I should now like to call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that in Great Britain in 1929 none other than Ramsay MacDonald, the Labour leader, headed the government of that country, and the deluge to which the hon. member referred as coming about in Canada under a Conservative government happened to just as great an extent in Great Britain under Ramsay MacDonald, the Labour leader. I could go on and refer to France. I can come nearer home and refer to the situation that existed in Newfoundland, which at that time was not a part of Canada. We remember that the situation became so bad there that a commission of government was formed and the affairs of the country were conducted under a commission for quite a number of years.

These wisecracks, if I may call them that, and they are nothing more or less than cheap wisecracks to anyone who knows anything about the situation in Canada and other countries in the past twenty-five years, have no place today in arguments in the House of Commons. The fact of the matter is that from 1929 to 1940 almost no country in the world was in a position to repair its economic situation any better than we did in Canada. I think it is about time that that sort of argument was relegated to the past.

I wish to say a few words about the unemployment situation in Canada today. We have had a very interesting debate, although it is perhaps unfortunate that a debate of this kind is necessary at the present time. There has been some disagreement as to the amount of unemployment in Canada. The labour leaders of the country claim that there are something like 530,000 out of work. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) states that the number is nearer 280,000 or 300,000. Be that as it may, I do not think this is the time to either exaggerate or minimize the situation in any way. I know something about conditions in my own province and the maritime provinces generally. Possibly I may be pardoned if I confine my remarks to that part of Canada particularly.

I should like to point out, because it is a known fact, that when a recession hits this country it always seems to strike the maritime provinces first and always seems to hit them the hardest. That there is in the maritimes a situation which is not good is not merely my opinion but that of some of the outstanding men in that part of the country. I should like to refer to the remarks made by Dr. Coady of St. Francis Xavier University when only a few weeks ago he was speaking to a convention of fishermen in the town of Amherst. He had this to say about conditions:

> Our present recession in the maritime provinces, amounting almost to a depression, is embarrassing and saddening.

That was Dr. Coady's opinion. And I might point out—although perhaps it is not necessary—that Dr. Coady is one of the outstanding economists and students of economics in this country. He is also one of the most practical economists in the Dominion of Canada.

I would also like to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Moncton Times a short time ago under the heading "Shocks to Economic Stability of New Brunswick." I am not going to quote the whole editorial. It speaks about the situation in general in our province, and concludes in this way:

> These shocks to the economic stability of New Brunswick are definitely a cause for serious concern. Indeed, the situation which has developed to adversely affect a growing number of the workers in this province clearly calls for immediate and direct intervention by the federal administration to activate any of the work projects claimed to be in readiness to counteract the trends towards a recession at the outset.

I shall not quote any further articles or newspaper editorials. What are these shocks to the economic stability of the maritime provinces, and to New Brunswick in particular? Well, I might point out first of all the textile industry in our province. Mention has already been made of this industry. In the textile mill in the town of Marysville, very near the city of Fredericton, the home of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), 550 men have been let out of employment. But that is not the worst feature. The factory itself has been closed down, and closed down permanently. This is a factory which has been operating in that part of the country for three-quarters of a century or more. This does not mean only that the people employed in the mill are being laid off; it means that this industry, around which the town has been built and the whole life of the community developed, is now out of business. Not only are the men who worked in the factory affected, but also it has affected the merchants, the businessmen, the taxi men—all these people. And you must add to the 550 in the town of Marysville who are out of employment all these others who depend indirectly upon the factory for their work.

These people have been trained to do a definite kind of work. They cannot very easily go out and find employment in other jobs, because they are textile workers. Their fathers before them were textile workers. Their grandfathers were textile workers. Their children are textile workers. Through the generations all these people have been working in this industry, and when the industry is closed down it means far more than would appear on the surface.

Not only is the town of Marysville affected, but the town of Milltown and other large textile centres are suffering similar difficulties. I do not know whether the mill at Milltown is going to close down or not, but I do know that in the last few months 690 employees have been laid off.

Another large lay-off we have had in the maritime provinces has been in our railways, and this affects more than the maritime provinces. I know my own province and the town of Moncton perhaps better than I know the rest of the area affected, and I can tell the house that 240 men have been laid off in the last few weeks. Moncton is the Canadian National Railways centre; and I am informed that at McAdam, the Canadian Pacific Railway centre, a similar number have been discharged from employment. I am told that in Moncton alone the loss of employment suffered by these 240 to whom I have referred means a loss in payroll amounting to $600,000 in that community. One can readily understand what that means to the economic life of a city of moderate size.

We might very well ask ourselves the reason for this decline in work on our railways. Well, I have my own opinion, and it is that at least one reason is the lack of freight being shipped overseas and entering from overseas. As we know, almost 60 per cent of our trade in recent years has been with the United States. This means that the railway companies are not receiving the amount of freight they otherwise would have. Of necessity our freight is moving north and south instead of east and west. The economy of this country was built up for trade to move from the centre of the country to the Pacific and Atlantic ports. Our great ports of Vancouver, Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and Saint John were all built on an economy under which they would be fed by the east-west railways, and on the understanding that our trade would flow overseas.

In the last few years, owing perhaps to the fact that we could not get overseas trade, our trade has been flowing north and south more than it is east and west. The Moncton Times of January 30 had this to say about car loadings in Canada:

> In the period from July 1 to December 31, 1953, revenue loadings were consistently below the comparable months of 1952, December recording a particularly marked drop of 13 per cent. It was the lowest figure to be registered in that month since 1949. Taking the entire year 1953 the total tonnage moved reached 119,343,000 tons, a drop of 6 million tons or 4¾ per cent from the 1952 total movement.

As I say, that is the reason that these men are out of work in Moncton and McAdam, and other railway centres across Canada.

The port of Saint John has found it a very dull winter. I heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) make reference yesterday to trade in the city of Vancouver. It appears that this year most of our wheat has been shipped through that port instead of through Atlantic ports. This is just one reason, of course; but it is one reason why the situation has been bad at Saint John and Halifax. Mr. J. G. Farquahar, special representative of the Canadian international trade fair, made a report a short time ago which appeared in a recent issue of the Loyalist, a paper published in Saint John. The article is headed:

> Heavy business loss for port; cargo drops 464,000 tons.

It refers to the port of Saint John. The article goes on to say:

> While 1953 showed an encouraging increase of some 50,000 tons in imports, and grain exports increased materially, the exportation of general cargo declined 464,000 tons, or about 35 per cent.

Then he makes reference to the discontinuance of the Marshall plan, which really does not have much to do with the subject, so far as the port of Saint John is concerned. But the fact of the matter is that the import and export of goods through the port of Saint John had declined to the extent of some 35 per cent which, as I am sure everyone will agree, is a very high percentage.

I could also speak about lumbering and pit props and the loss to these industries in New Brunswick. I have spoken of it in the house before, and our party has spoken of it a number of times. We have pointed out that because of the lack of convertibility of sterling it has been almost impossible for us to sell our lumber and pit prop products in Great Britain. This also means a great loss in employment as far as our particular section of the country is concerned.

When he was speaking the other day, the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) mentioned the fishing industry, and I shall not deal with it this afternoon. The mining industry in the maritimes was dealt with fully by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). That is more or less the picture of the maritime provinces, and particularly of my own province of New Brunswick. I do not wish to paint too black a picture. I realize that there has been seasonal unemployment in our province and in our section nearly every year, but I do wish to point out that at the present time it has reached a stage that is not seasonal, and something must be done to correct the situation.

What happens when our people become unemployed? We have had unemployment during the very best times. We have had good times in Canada since the last war, but many of our people had to go to Ontario, to Quebec and to other parts of Canada to obtain employment. They have two alternatives: one is to migrate to some other part of the country and the other is to join the army.

Only last Sunday as I was walking up Elgin street I met a young man in uniform. I did not know him, but he knew me. He had been in my basic training centre in Fredericton during the war, he said. He came from Moncton. He was in uniform and on his way to Petawawa. I asked him when he joined up. He said: "I have lost my job with the Canadian National Railways in Moncton and I and four other boys are going through to Petawawa to join the army." He was a young married man, 35 years old, with two children. He told me that besides working on the railway he had spent three years before that as an apprentice with the railway. That man has had to give up practically his life's work. Now he has joined the army and gone to Petawawa. These are just natural results of the situation that I have outlined.

What does the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) say with reference to unemployment and the government's responsibility? Well, I shall quote one paragraph which is to be found at page 2089 of Hansard of February 15:

> The provinces have responsibilities to help guard their people against hardship. I for one have no reason to believe other than that the provinces are effectively helping this winter if and where they find it necessary.

I agree that the provinces have some responsibilities. There is no question about that. But these instances of unemployment in the country that I have mentioned are all due to the policies of the federal government and not in any way due to any action of the provincial government. I contend that the full responsibility for the unemployment in the country at the present time is the federal government's. It is all very well to say that the provincial governments have responsibility. The people who are living in the provinces cannot get away, and the provinces must of necessity help in some way. So far as the basic responsibility is concerned, I contend it is entirely the federal government's.

Let us take Marysville, a mill town. So far as the provincial government is concerned, it has no responsibility there for what has happened. I know that the provincial government, probably in co-operation with the Minister of Labour, is doing all it can. It is trying to encourage some other industry to come to that town. I am afraid the provincial government will have a difficult time in that regard. I would say the Department of Defence Production has a responsibility there. I have said this time and time again. At Marysville we have a factory that employed some 550 men. We are putting out hundreds of millions of dollars for defence production in this country. If some private concern does not take over the operation of some industry in that town, here is an opportunity for the federal government to do some work there in connection with defence production. The town has the men; it has the mill; and the federal government owes it to our province.

The last issue of the defence production report that I read showed that out of millions spent in this country on defence production only $50,000 was spent in New Brunswick and nearly half of that went to the Swift Company of Moncton for meat which is brought in from other parts of Canada. This matter should be thoroughly investigated. There is a great responsibility on the federal government which they could and should assume. I am also satisfied that the local government can and will do all that is within its power.

I now come to the amendment of the opposition, and I should like to read the last paragraph:

> Now, therefore, be it resolved that this house is of the opinion that a select committee should be appointed immediately for the purpose of examining into and reporting upon the actual unemployment situation throughout Canada and for the purpose of making recommendations to this house as to short-term and long-term methods for dealing effectively with this problem.

I might point out that when he spoke the other day the minister said that we have unemployment insurance. We had unemployment insurance before this mass unemployment occurred. The minister also mentioned family allowances and old age pensions. We had family allowances and old age pensions when there was a hundred per cent employment in this country. As far as old age pensions are concerned, they have nothing to do with employment. They are paid only to people 70 years of age and over, people who are not in the unemployment ranks at all.

Let me take our amendment, which I consider is divided into three parts. First, it has to do with the unemployment situation and the number of unemployed in the country. As I said, there has been considerable doubt as to the number. The minister's department contends that it is around 300,000. The heads of the labour unions claim that it is over 500,000, and we have had figures even higher than that. A committee such as is recommended by our amendment would find out definitely what the unemployment situation is in this country. I think that is the first thing that should be found out. We want to get the facts. We do not want to see the situation exaggerated, and certainly by no means do we want to see it minimized.

The second recommendation in the amendment is that there should be some short-term method of looking after unemployment. That seems to me to be a recommendation that we more or less speed up certain public works programs in order to look after the situation at the present time. There are possibly men and women who are hungry today, a situation which should not be allowed to continue. The short-term method which is recommended would be something that could be put into force at once, so that in these times, when there is plenty in this country, there would be no one going hungry.

The third recommendation is that a long-term method be adopted. I think that this is the most important. We should do something in order to see that this condition does not recur to any great extent. There are a great many people in this country who think there should not be any unemployment at all. We are a great rich country; we have everything in abundance. If proper steps are taken there is no reason why there should not be employment for every man or woman who wants employment in this dominion of Canada.

We are considered, and rightly so, to be the most fortunate people in the world today. I would point out that Canada was not devastated in any way during the last war. European countries and countries in other parts of the world were devastated. People lost their homes, cities were destroyed and factories were ruined. When the war was over it was impossible for those countries to carry on manufacturing or other normal pursuits. We had none of that in this country. In addition there was a ready market for practically everything that we could manufacture after the war.

Today the situation is changing. Those countries which were devastated during the war have now built up their factories, and their people are back to work. They are producing in competition with our Canadian people. Our trouble seems to be that our economy has been carried on in such a way that we cannot compete with these people who have built up their factories and gone back to work. Today they are taking overseas markets from us which in the past were so necessary to our economy.

So I say that the third part of this amendment moved by the opposition is the most important. It may be that we have been carrying on the wrong type of businesses in this country. I do not know whether all of them should be continued. It may be that we should concentrate mostly on manufacturing the great raw materials which we have within our borders. These are all things that could be studied by a committee.

I have pointed out before that it is not right for us to concentrate most of our industry in the central parts of this country. There should be a policy of decentralization so that people in the maritimes and in western Canada would have an opportunity to get employment without having to leave their homes and go to other parts of the country. It may be that our channels of trade are changing, that instead of moving across the country from the east and west, as the economy of this country was set up, they are moving north and south. We have lost those overseas markets which were so precious to us in the past. We have been concentrating on one market, a market which I am sorry to say could be closed against us at any time at the whim or pleasure of the people with whom we trade. Then there is the matter of tariffs. I am not an authority on tariffs and I do not intend to discuss them at this time.

I was quite impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) the other day when he spoke of taxes and wondered if we were not taxing ourselves, not only out of the foreign market but also out of the domestic markets. Foreign countries are able to produce much more cheaply than we can here in Canada. The hon. member claimed, and I think rightly, that taxes are so heavy today in this country that the individual cannot buy the goods manufactured in his own country. The taxes paid by the manufacturer are so high that he cannot compete with manufacturers in countries like Japan and Germany and numerous others in other parts of the world.

I think there is a lot in that argument. All these things could and should be studied by the committee which our party has recommended should be set up. We may be told that this is a function which the cabinet should perform. I am not going to discredit the cabinet, nor do I agree with the hon. member for Halifax or the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), that the ministers are as capable as they say they are. I am no hero worshipper, when it comes to this cabinet. I agree that it contains some able men, but I am inclined to agree also with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) when he says that most of them are just run of the mine. I have sat across from them here for 18 or 19 years. Some of them are indeed able men and the service they have given to this country is incalculable. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway says, the majority of them could be replaced by the backbenchers at any time and from most any place in the house. Not from the C.C.F., as was suggested by an hon. member who spoke; but I think I could go to any cross-section of this house and pick just as good men, yes, dozens of them, as sit in the cabinet today.

Mr. McIvor: You are a good picker.

Mr. Brooks: Yes, I would be a good picker. We know that geography plays a great part in the selection of the cabinet. We know that you do not get the best men when you are confined to certain sections of the country. Religion, race and all these things come into the picture. I am not questioning the system, as I think probably it is the most proper and the best system, but you certainly do not get the best man.

This is not what I intended to say. What I started out to say was that it may be claimed that this work suggested by the amendment is the prerogative of the government. If our government were made up entirely of men who were thoroughly acquainted with business, that might be true. As an hon. member who spoke the other day said, if you took their staffs away from them most of them would be lost. But the civil servants are not specialists as far as business is concerned. They are good men as far as assisting in administration is concerned, but if we had a committee as suggested in the amendment we could call in businessmen, we could call in heads of labour, we could call in the heads of banks—most of them come from the maritime provinces—and the heads of our transportation systems. Surely with a group of men of that kind we would get the best advice it was possible to get.

I am one of those who believe that Canada is passing through an economic change. Years ago we had what was known as a national policy, and it may be that we need another national policy in Canada today. I believe the best way it can be done is by getting the best brains of this country together, such as the heads of businesses, and discussing this matter and outlining the path to the future.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I just wish to add that I am entirely in accord with the amendment which has been moved by the official opposition and I intend to support it.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise mainly to challenge the government to take at least one step in connection with this matter right away. When I say "right away" I mean that the government might well hold a cabinet meeting yet today, or certainly before the house meets tomorrow, with a view to bringing in a bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

That has already been suggested by delegations which have waited upon the government, and it has been suggested a number of times during the course of this debate that the time has come for the benefit rates paid under the Unemployment Insurance Act to be increased, and for the length of time for which unemployment insurance benefits can be paid to be extended.

I remind the government that on a former occasion, when the unemployment situation was regarded as serious, even though the number of unemployed was not as great as it is today, action of this kind was taken in a commendably short period of time by the government on the other side of the house. I refer to the situation in the winter of 1949-50. Hon. members will recall that at that time the unemployment figures were worse than they had been at any time following the end of world war II. We came down here for the 1950 session of parliament on the 16th of February. In the speech from the throne which was read at the opening of that session on February 16, 1950, as reported at page 2 of Hansard for that date, a bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, to widen the scope and extend the benefits of unemployment insurance, was forecast. The then minister of labour, the late Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, was away from the house because of illness and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) was the acting minister of labour. I am sure he will recall, no doubt with pride, that it was only eight days from the time of that announcement on February 16, 1950, until the bill amending the Unemployment Insurance Act, and extending its scope, had been given third reading by this house. That third reading was given on the 24th of February, 1950. Incidentally, it did not take very long for the other place to pass the bill. They can pass bills they regard as urgent in record time, as we well know. Indeed, royal assent had been given to that bill on February 28.

Let me summarize that schedule once again. We met on February 16. On that day there was an announcement that something was going to be done about unemployment insurance, and within 12 days the amending bill was law.

In this instance, the situation is far worse. On that occasion the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as acting minister of labour, gave on page 157 of Hansard for February 23, 1950, the number who were looking for employment as 375,600. The comparable figure today, according to the Minister of Labour, is over 500,000. On that occasion that action was taken, as I say, in a total time of 12 days from the day when the house met until the bill amending the Unemployment Insurance Act became law.

Mr. Dickey: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) says, "hear, hear". I knew they would be proud on that side of the house to have this reminder of the speed with which they acted on that occasion. But what has gone wrong with the hon. member for Halifax and the rest of the people on that side of the house? On this occasion when the situation is considerably worse nothing is being done. It is in fact 15 days since I first asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) a question similar to the one I asked today as to whether consideration was being given to increasing the benefits payable under the Unemployment Insurance Act. The Minister of Labour gave me on February 8 the same answer which he gave to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) last Friday, and which he gave me again today, namely that this matter is being studied continuously by the officials of the unemployment insurance commission.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if they are studying the situation, if they remember the speed with which action was taken by parliament in 1950, and if they realize that the situation is much more serious today than it was then, surely the logical conclusion of that study and that understanding should be the immediate introduction of a bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I do not know on which day of the week the cabinet meets, though I believe they meet more than once a week, but certainly it would not be difficult for ministers to get together so that they can discuss this matter and as a result bring a bill in this week to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act so as to increase the benefits to be paid under the provisions of that act.

I contend also that where the recipients of unemployment insurance benefits have exhausted the benefits to which they are entitled under the act those benefits should be continued. I agree with the contention made by the labour congresses that that payment, pending an actuarial adjustment, might well be made out of the consolidated revenue fund, and if it is necessary to do so the government could provide for that in a legislative way by putting an item in the supplementary estimates.

This government knows that where there is a will there is a way and if they want to do it there is no problem. They can do it fast, and I do mean fast, when they want to. I would again remind hon. members that once a matter has been taken care of in this house it does not take very long for the other place to deal with it. We had that drawn to our attention recently.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have stressed this recommendation fully conscious of the fact that unemployment insurance is not a solution to the unemployment problem. It is only one of the ways of preventing further economic distress, to which reference was made in the subamendment moved on behalf of this group by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). It does seem to me that this is the kind of specific step that could be taken immediately and I would submit to the government that there is no excuse for failing to take that step right away.

As the house is aware, the Minister of Labour has answered questions on this subject on several occasions, and I referred to his answer a moment ago, namely that the matter is continually under study. Nevertheless, I was interested in an article by Reginald Hardy which appeared in last Saturday's issue of the Ottawa Citizen and in an issue of the same date of the Winnipeg Tribune in which he forecast that a change of this kind might come soon. Whether Mr. Hardy knows what is in the mind of the government, it is not of course for me to say, but I was glad to note in that article the author's satisfaction over the fact that the government was not going to yield to the pressure which is sometimes put upon it by the Canadian Manufacturers Association to reduce the amount of the daily payment by employers and employees into the unemployment insurance fund. That is one suggestion which is sometimes made by the employers when they come to face with the fact that the unemployment insurance fund now contains a sum of well over $900 million.

It seems to me quite clear that the size of that fund makes it evident that it is actuarially out of line with the actual experience that we have had and that the time has come to make the appropriate changes so that the people who have been paying for that insurance will get the protection for which they have paid. The purpose of an unemployment insurance fund is not to arrange so that the people of one generation will build up a fund to take care of unemployment in the next generation. Those who pay the premiums in an insurance fund should get the benefit. I submit that the time has come for this present generation of workers to get the benefit of the huge fund that has been built up. As I said when I rose, I call upon this government to hold a cabinet meeting right away, to take this matter seriously, and without further delay to bring in a bill amending the Unemployment Insurance Act.

There are two or three other things I wish to say while I am on my feet. We feel that the government is not appreciating the full seriousness of the unemployment situation. Indeed, in our view, even the best construction that is put upon it by the government leaves it in an unsatisfactory situation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) tells us that if we will wait until the end of the year we shall be able to look back and see that 1954 was just as good a year as was 1953. I do not know what aspect of the two years the minister has in mind but I imagine he is thinking in terms of total production. May I say this to the minister and to the members on the government side. If at the end of 1954 the gross national product in this country is no more than it was in 1953, and if all that can be said is that it was just as good as it was in 1953, then unemployment will have been a definite reality. The technological progress that goes along from year to year creates unemployment unless we take advantage of that technological progress by increasing the total volume of the goods and services that we produce. That is the way it should be. In the past number of years that increase in the gross national product from year to year has been of the order of about 4 per cent. In other words, we have to increase our total production by about 4 per cent a year in order to hold our own in terms of employment figures. Hence, taking the government's picture at its best, the situation is a serious one. In our view the statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by others reflect the government's failure to realize how serious it is.

Another way to look at this problem in order to realize how serious it is is to face the fact that, following the end of world war II, the unemployment figures in each of the winters 1946-47, 1947-48, 1948-49 and 1949-50 got worse.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The hon. member made this speech in each one of those years, did he not?

Mr. Knowles: Yes. The tragedy is that the government leaves it necessary for the speech to continue to be made.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The hon. member is making it anyway.

Mr. Knowles: I should think the minister would be glad to obviate the necessity for making it, and I wish he would do so.

Mr. Martin: Do you know of any man in this country who has ever done as much—

Mr. Knowles: The people over there on the opposite side are so delighted with the fact—

Mr. Martin: Does my hon. friend know of any man in Canada who has done as much to provide employment as has the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Knowles: I have the greatest of respect for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is now Acting Prime Minister. It is because we have respect for his capacity to get things done that we continue to make this appeal to the government now under the direction of the Acting Prime Minister, in the hope that he will yet do something about it, as he can, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has just testified.

If I may, I should like to get back to these figures which the Minister of Trade and Commerce says I have referred to every year. May I draw his attention again to the fact that in each of the years between world war II and the outbreak of the war in Korea, the unemployment figures were worse than they were the winter before. The outbreak of the war in Korea checked that rise from winter to winter. But surely it should give the government cause for concern to find that now, when the situation in Korea has cleared up, the very first winter after that war is over we start off with unemployment figures which are worse than they were in the winter just before the Korean war. Do the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of National Health and Welfare not see the ominous picture that arises from that fact? Unless something is done, it means that the next winter and the winter after that will be even worse and we will be right in the midst of the serious situation to which the government is trying to blind itself.

I know that the ministers over there on the opposite side do not like this kind of talk. They deprecate it in every possible way. They and others in the house as well as people outside the house do not like the use of the word "recession" or the word "depression"; but in my view the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) was perfectly correct last night when he pointed out that this is not another recession or another depression but that we are still in the same economic condition that started in 1929. It has been relieved for a few years by world war II, by the cold war and by the war in Korea, but the basic economic problems facing the Canadian economy are still with us. Until we are prepared to tackle the necessity of producing the things that people need for peaceful living in the same way as the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as minister of munitions and supply, was prepared to tackle the job of producing the necessities of war, we shall continue to have these economic dislocations which mean unemployment for hundreds of thousands of people and economic distress for a great many of our people.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the seriousness of this situation calls for more than the type of interruptions that we get from across the way and for more than speeches from the government side with regard to which set of figures is correct. I submit that it calls for real action along the lines that have been suggested from this side of the house. The one specific point on which I have urged action this week is not the whole solution to the problem by any means, but it would be one step towards relieving economic distress and it would give the country an indication that the government means business. I hope that some action along that line will be taken with the least possible delay. My main purpose in rising, Mr. Speaker, was to remind the government of the speed with which action was taken in 1950 and to call for an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act to be presented to this house by the government this week.

Mr. A. H. Hollingworth (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, Canada is a vibrant, buoyant, young, industrial giant with a bright destiny which no other country in the world can approach. I therefore respectfully suggest that we consider the economic problems and the present economic situation with the maturity and the confidence that we have shown in the last decade. Canadians of all people should not be harbingers of gloom or purveyors of lamentation and woe.

The all-important point to note here is that the Canadian economy is basically sound and that the conditions which were conducive to the depression in the thirties are not prevalent today. This point, Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour to amplify in a few moments.

The dominion bureau of statistics cites the unemployment figure for January, 1954, at 280,000, which exceeds the figure for January, 1953, by 93,000. At the outset I should point out that this is the figure we should take rather than the 524,000 figure of the national employment service because this latter figure includes many thousands who are looking for better jobs and so on.

I know this has been cited and sufficiently explained by other government speakers, but I feel this point should be reiterated because of the glib manner in which the opposition quite deliberately twist figures to suit their own advantage. I think to understand the economic situation today it is pertinent to discuss the expansion of Canada thoroughly from the end of the second world war to the present. The Canadian economy had expanded at a prodigious rate from the early forties. In 1945 we were faced with various inflationary tendencies which were controlled by farsighted fiscal, monetary and economic policies. The most striking post-war development was the discovery and development of important new natural resources, oil in Alberta and Saskatchewan, iron ore in Labrador and Quebec, uranium in northern Saskatchewan and the Northwest Territories, and now natural gas in Alberta and base metals in New Brunswick.

These discoveries resulted in an upsurge in the demand for and production of capital goods and capital investment. For example, between 1946 and 1951 $13 billion was invested in capital goods and equipment, but in 1952 alone the investment was $5½ billion. The part of our total production going into capital investment averaged 20 per cent, a very high rate indeed. This had very definite inflationary tendencies and implications.

Then again there was the huge backlog of consumer demand built up over the war years and later the Korean war when defence goods competed with consumer goods, creating an additional strain on our economy. These inflationary tendencies were successfully combated by the following measures:

1. Fiscal and tax measures—for example, increasing the interest rates to discourage borrowing, and higher taxes to cut down on the consumption of consumer goods, particularly the so-called luxury goods.

2. Monetary and credit restraints—for example, the inception of consumer credit controls.

3. Restraints on capital investment—for example, the deferred depreciation on capital goods allowable for taxation purposes except for the production of defence goods and equipment and the development of basic natural resources.

4. Encouragement to thrift companies for an increased volume of savings and encouragement to maximum production by business of the things needed most.

5. Government withdrawal of its official rates on foreign exchange and its allowing the Canadian dollar to seek its own level in response to the normal forces of supply and demand in the current market, which had as one result the lowering of the cost of imports.

This whole policy was predicated on these basic assumptions. The first was that the so-called cold war was more than temporary. Second, the Canadian economy was to be as free as possible; and third, foreign trade, while not now as important as domestic trade relatively, was still a cardinal tenet of government and Canadian economic policy.

My submission, Mr. Speaker, is that if, as has often been said, the government cannot take credit for the tremendous expansion after the war, nevertheless I feel it is fair to say that it has assisted to a great extent by its far-reaching fiscal and economic policies. We have heard a great deal about the loss of export markets and I should like to make a few observations in this field. I believe that there is one thing that is not understood fully by the Canadian people and that is that the export market is declining in relative importance to the domestic Canadian market.

In 1928 exports constituted 22 per cent of our gross national product; in 1951, 18 per cent; and in 1953, 17 per cent. In real terms, in the twenty-three year period between 1928 and 1951 the domestic market has expanded at almost twice the rate of the foreign market —4½ per cent to 2½ per cent. The reasons are that Canada has been the fastest growing country in the world and that international trade seemed like a war casualty in being slow to recover.

Another important observation is that Canada has changed from an exporter of raw materials and agricultural produce to an exporter of processed primary goods and manufactured consumer and capital goods. Manufactured goods constituted 52 per cent of our exports in 1945 and agriculture only 21 per cent, and the variation is even wider today. Forestry and mining processed goods, for example, newsprint and non-ferrous metals such as aluminum and nickel, are likewise supplanting agriculture in importance in the Canadian export field.

I should like to point out the important role played by aluminum in our economy. Canada exports four-fifths of the aluminum it produces, and the Kitimat plant built in British Columbia, because of the happy combination of cheap power and readily accessible ocean transportation, will play an increasingly important role in our economy, as will the development of natural gas in Alberta. There have been adverse comments about our unfavourable balance of trade in the last fiscal year, but that is not unexpected because of the lower prices of our staple products, more stringent import quotas imposed by dollar short countries, an increase of imports as a result of our higher standard of living, and because of the diversion of funds to capital goods and the release of the anti-inflationary deferred depreciation provision to which I referred above.

The Canadian economy has always fluctuated with respect to the balance of trade, but a sure sign of the continued confidence in the Canadian economy is the stability of the Canadian dollar on the world monetary markets. I do not want it believed that I do not think trade is important. On the contrary; but relatively speaking we are not as dependent on foreign markets as formerly. It has been the policy of the government to encourage trade between the countries, and that has been amply demonstrated by our allegiance to such organizations as the general agreement on tariffs and trade, GATT, that central institution for international trade relations. Tariffs have been reduced and fair trade practices have been established. I think all Canadians can be proud of the role that the government has played in this important organization.

I stated categorically earlier that there is no parallel in the conditions now with those of 1929, the year of the pre-depression boom. Speculative excesses have been absent from our economy and commodity prices have been moving slowly downward or are relatively stable. Business sentiment has been cautious. Business has not left itself open by overexpansion. Then there is the tremendous cumulative volume of purchasing power continually being put into the hands of the Canadian purchaser through family allowances and old age pensions. Again, there are the unemployment insurance payments.

Recently we have had the new housing bill with its novel principle of the insured mortgage placing credit in the hands of the chartered banks which will expand the circulation of money. Finally, there is the realization among Canadians that we shall not tolerate conditions as in the thirties. Depressions are not acts of God. They are man-made, and I sincerely believe that we have learned enough economics since the thirties not only to arrest but to forestall such a calamity.

There are some I know who have a depression psychosis. I sometimes believe that some of my friends in the C.C.F., while certainly not hoping for a depression, are the residuary legatees of the gloom-mongers of the thirties. As I understand it, the Progressive Conservative party would turn over this problem to some committee; but it has always been my impression, with respect, that that party has never faced up to the economic facts of life. Any kind of planning to them is ipso facto bad, undemocratic and worse. They are always sniping at the moderate degree of public ownership in Canadian life, as witness the ill-conceived attempts to fight Trans-Canada Air Lines, the world's best air line, and the C.B.C. which, with all its faults, is developing, as much as anything else in Canada, a truly Canadian culture.

I feel, in short, that without the sound government policy in fiscal matters which I have just related, inflation would have been a much more serious thing and might well have impeded the development of the Canadian economy. On the other hand, private enterprise has been encouraged and on the whole has done an excellent job in helping in the development of Canada. I think the government role is best set out in a speech by the Acting Prime Minister at Dalhousie University in 1948, when he said:

1. Canada is a free enterprise economy and the initiative for industrial expansion rests with private individuals and firms.

2. The government will endeavour, through its policies, to create a climate within which private initiative thrives and industrial expansion is encouraged.

3. The government will take the initiative and do what it can to co-ordinate the efforts of governmental, business and other interested groups in achieving full and effective utilization of industrial expansion in the interests of all citizens in the country.

4. If industrial expansion and economic development is hampered by the lack of initiative, the government, where the national interest demands, will take appropriate action.

In conclusion may I say that I do not think it matters too much whether the figures used are those supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics or by some other body. As has been demonstrated in the house, the important thing is that we are all concerned about people being out of work. I am sure every member is greatly concerned about this matter of unemployment.

Sometimes when I hear speeches which leave the impression that the attitude of the government is indifferent or callous, I think they are most unfair, because every member in the house, regardless of party, is lending his best efforts to solve this problem. And my experience has been that, with a man like the Acting Prime Minister in charge of trade and commerce, the Canadian people will never have to worry, and we shall come through this thing with flying colours.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in this debate on unemployment by reason of the fact that this has been a problem in my constituency for several years. In that constituency the present situation is not seasonal. There is a large coal mining industry in the southern part of the constituency of Macleod and, by reason of circumstances, coal miners in that part of the country have been on short time for a number of years. They have been working one or two or, at the most, three days a week. In fact they are experiencing something in the nature of the hardships which were experienced in the hungry thirties. Therefore I wish to say a few words on this subject.

I do believe there is no use simply blaming governments, blaming individuals, or blaming this, that or the other for this condition. When all is said and done, and when we think the problem through to its ultimate conclusion, we will have to agree that basically it is a matter of policy, and we must decide whether the policy is right or wrong.

In order to do this, sometimes we have to review our thinking and make some adjustments in it. For instance, in a good many cases I find that some people presume that the chief purpose of industry is to give jobs to people, to give employment to the nation; and I believe we must adjust our thinking in that regard. The main purpose of industry is not to provide employment. The purpose of the coal mining industry is to produce coal. The purpose of agriculture is to produce the foodstuffs of the nation. The purpose of the factory is to produce goods. The purpose of the textile industry is to produce textiles. The purpose of the clothing industry is to produce clothes. The purpose of industry, therefore, is not to provide employment but to produce goods. Therefore it devolves upon the government to see that those goods are distributed, as a basic policy.

Another thing we must discover in our investigations is just how this condition of unemployment developed. How is it that many of our people are now unemployed? What is the reason? Have we come to a point where we have produced an adequate supply of goods for which there is no relative market? Must we reach that conclusion? I believe the Acting Prime Minister, who must be advised of this situation, should be able to tell us whether we have reached a point which, in general terms, might be described as overproduction. We in this corner of the house do not use that expression. Instead of saying that we have reached a point of overproduction, we say we have reached a point of underconsumption.

The Acting Prime Minister should be able to tell us whether a stockpiling of goods is now taking place in Canada, no matter what those goods may be. Is that the situation? I was informed the other day of a certain industry in Canada—I believe the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) referred to the same industry—which had produced to the point where it had a stockpile sufficient to supply the normal market requirements for the next five years, and as a result they had laid off their men. Some of these men had been with them for 18 or 20 years.

But that is the condition in only one industry. The Acting Prime Minister should know whether that is characteristic of industry generally in Canada. If it is, then the problem cannot be solved by putting these men back to work in the same industry, because that industry has reached its peak of production and has difficulty in finding markets. When we talk about markets we must think in terms of whether or not people have money with which to buy, because that is the only way we can have markets. There is no market where people have no money.

I have listened to the speeches made in this debate, many of which have been reasonably good. However, I have found something lacking in many of them. I have listened to a good deal of history and to the recitation of many figures. I have heard a lot of pulse feeling. We have heard diagnoses aplenty; we have heard about symptoms aplenty. But in reality we have not heard very much about an adequate remedy. I have listened to the speeches with a good deal of interest. If any remedies at all have been proposed they have been only temporary, in the end amounting to nothing more or less than palliatives.

If the liver is sluggish—I can see a doctor looking at me—we take a pill. The pill can do the trick for a little while, but after the effects of the pill have worn off the liver is in the same condition as it was before; it is still sluggish. You can keep on giving pills as long as you like, but that will not make a new liver. We must have something more than palliatives.

I should like to make another diagnosis with respect to the speeches that have been made. I am not going to blame the government for everything. We have been suggesting for a good many years that there should be a reduction in taxes. It is a good suggestion to make, but let us be realistic as well. The government must have revenue, and I am not one to rise in my place and say that the government would not reduce taxes if it felt it could. We believe it can be done, but we also believe that under present financial policy the government is unable to do it.

We have heard a good deal about foreign trade and the loss of foreign markets, and that we must regain those foreign markets. Well, it is easy to say that, but when we ask how you are going to regain them, we find that that is another problem. As I look at the government I am quite willing to suggest that they are just as anxious as anyone else to find foreign markets, and if they could find foreign markets they certainly would.

Then we talk of other matters. Am I going to stand here in this house and believe that the government is so heartless that it would not do something about the matter of unemployment if it could? The problem is there. It is all very well to say that a solution must be found, but what solutions have we proposed? That is the big question.

I know that we want to get through by five o'clock, if we can. Whether or not we can is another matter. I was going to refer to a good many of the speeches that have been made and to read from Hansard, but I shall forgo that and say this. There is a solution to this problem. It could be solved in one of three ways. It could be solved by bringing in a state of extreme socialism. That will solve the unemployment problem; it will put everybody to work, if that is what we want.

I say once again that it is not up to industry to provide jobs. That is not the purpose of industry. We have to readjust our thinking when we consider this problem in those terms. Industry is there to provide goods, to do that job. Somebody over here says that industry is there to make profits. Well, it is all very well to say that. We go a little further than that and diagnose the situation at its roots.

I want to say this to you, Mr. Speaker. After industry has produced all the goods the nation requires, what should our position be? The worker should be able to go home; he should be able to lean back in his easy chair; he should be able to light his pipe and say well, now, we have surely done a good job. We have produced all of this nation's goods, and now the factory is going to close down; now we can rest for a while. He should be able to do that, but can he? No. And why not? Has industry failed to produce the goods? No; they have done a good job. But instead of that we find everyone running around, arguing and fighting and sending delegations, which of course under present policies they have to do, and working up a great frenzy over a problem that should be regarded as an achievement. We should be able to sit back and say we have produced so much; now, look at what we have achieved. My, we are a great country, we are a great people to be able to do that. No, that is not what we do. We fight among ourselves because our achievement has produced a terrible problem.

I go back and I say that if all we want is to solve the unemployment problem and put people to work, we can do that by bringing in a state of extreme socialism where the whole country becomes a machine and each and every individual in it becomes a cog in that machine. We can do it in that way if we want to. We may have a few barbed wire fences around; we may have a few guards there to watch us and see that we work, but that will solve the problem, if that is what we want.

There is a second way in which this problem can be solved, if all you want is to put men to work. The second way is to bring on a war. Well, now, nobody wants to do that; but a war will put every man to work. Believe me, it is a strange thing, and perhaps we should hang our heads in shame, that it takes a war to distribute the goods we produce. Sometimes it distributes them by destruction and death, nevertheless war is the great distributor.

You can have the extreme socialist state, which will put everybody to work; you can have war which will put everybody to work, but there is a third way to solve it, and that is an adjustment of financial policy that will provide enough money in the people's pockets to enable them to enjoy the vast production that has resulted from a good job done well. Yes, if you want to reduce the hours of labour, all well and good. If you want men to work two, three, four or five days a week, all well and good if, as the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said yesterday, you can provide them with incomes. But if incomes must come from a delinquent financial policy, from a financial system that is not self-liquidating, then we shall see times of booms and depressions, times of war and times of unemployment continually throughout future generations.

The problem can be solved in one of three ways, and I challenge anyone to say there is any other way to solve it, apart from these three. I will use the three. If you wish, first, sovietism, that will solve it, if all you want is employment. Second, slaughter; that will solve it, if that is what you want. Third, believe it or not, is a proper adjustment of financial policy which we in this corner of the house call Social Credit. It can be done. I am quite aware that the members of the government want to solve this problem. We talk about old age pensions not being high enough. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is in the house. He is a human being; he is a humanitarian. Do you not think that he would like to raise pensions if he could? Certainly he would, but under our present fiscal policy it cannot be done.

The government is bound by a false financial policy which ties its hands. Let us adjust that financial policy. Let us see that our consuming power matched with money will equate our productive power. Then we will not have the problem of unemployment. We may have shorter hours for peaceful pursuits, and as long as we have our income and can consume we will reach the stage where we will have one of the highest orders of civilization known to man.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the various speakers who have dealt with this problem and the more I have listened the more I am convinced that the problem is only beginning. I feel that we are in the first phase of a new age, a mechanical age, and our growing pains will increase still more as we develop into the atomic age. Therefore we are dealing now merely with an emergency condition.

I shall not repeat what has been said already as to the general conditions existing throughout the country, because I feel there is general agreement on the main fact that we have roughly half a million unemployed in Canada. Two speakers at least have argued that work could be made available for these half million people by a change in government policy. I look at it from this point of view. When there are half a million unemployed within the dominion it means that billions of precious man-hours are lost forever, man-hours of valuable labour are gone forever because of the time element. This is not so much a loss to the individual as it is to the nation. True, there is the loss to the individual of his employment and in many cases his self-respect, and his dependents are penalized through his being idle even temporarily.

During the depression I was active in municipal affairs in British Columbia. Immediately after that depression period the provincial and municipal governments of British Columbia pooled their experiences in an effort to provide a scheme whereby the conditions of the thirties could not be repeated, at least in our particular province. The result is that we have a blueprint of self-liquidating projects ready to be implemented, depending upon federal aid or the provision of funds by the federal government at a low rate of interest. With federal aid British Columbia could eliminate its present unemployment situation by starting these proposed schemes. Every scheme is a sound scheme which has been examined by the engineers of the provincial government, and every one would be a tangible asset to the province and the nation as a whole.

Possibly other provinces as well had the same experience and plans were worked out in case of another depression; therefore I shall not deal with that phase of the matter. The federal government could utilize this valuable fleeting asset of human labour. I suggest that if it wanted to it could develop our national assets without hurting anyone, and employ the maximum amount of human labour.

A total of 125,000 men could be used in reforestation and conservation schemes, for which we already have plans in Canada. Another 125,000 could be used to speed up the construction of the trans-Canada highway, which is bogging down badly throughout the dominion. Another 125,000 could be directed toward the building of homes which are so badly needed, and the construction of public buildings with which we are so far behind throughout Canada, particularly in the way of post offices. Another 125,000 could be employed under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to develop irrigation schemes for which we have blueprints in British Columbia and for which they have blueprints on the prairies. This would include the Saskatchewan river scheme.

Instead of these half million men remaining idle they could be employed and thus constitute a valuable asset to this dominion. It would cost very little more than will be spent in the way of unemployment relief and the provision of social services to the families of these people, plus the heavy administration costs for those services.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

The house in committee on Bill No. 252, respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company—Mr. McIlraith—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—May construct line of railway.

The Deputy Chairman: I might remind the committee that this bill comes to us after having been carefully considered by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Macdonnell: May we have a word of explanation?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I do not know that there is much that I can usefully add to what I said on the second reading of this bill. The branch line proposed will be 15 miles in length extending from Havelock, a divisional point on the main line of the Canadian Pacific between Smiths Falls and Toronto, northward to the site of the American Nepheline mine operation at Nephton. At the present time the mine employs some 150 people. It produces a rock product known as nepheline syenite, which is used in the manufacture of glass and pottery. About 70 to 75 per cent of the product is exported to the United States, with most of the remainder being used in Canada, although there are some exports to other countries.

At the present time the product is transported by truck some 24 miles over a road that is part township, part county and part private, to Lakefield, Ontario, there to be shipped by rail. The maintenance of the road has been largely contributed to by the mining company.

Having a railway line come right to the mine will improve the operation for two reasons. Because of its nature, the shipment and transshipment of this product by truck is not satisfactory, as the rock is reduced to a powder-like consistency before being shipped. The other difficulty is that in addition to the maintenance of the road being an expense, shipment by truck over the road is more inconvenient because the road cannot be kept open during all seasons of the year, and many plants require regular shipments. One week's delay in shipment may be an important matter in their manufacturing process.

The bill before the house is necessary because the Railway Act requires that any branch line of more than six miles in length can only be undertaken after authority is granted by parliament. The bill of course places no burden on the public treasury. The extension of this line will cost $1,500,000 and is being financed partly by the Canadian Pacific Railway, which will meet one-half the expenditure, and the other half will be recovered from the mining company at the rate of 80 cents per ton bonus on the freight handled until the $750,000 is repaid. Even with the payment of that bonus on the first part of these shipments, the operation will be made more economic by reason of the construction of this railway.

It is anticipated, subject to the necessary authority being granted by this parliament and the concurrence of the board of transport commissioners being obtained, that construction will be undertaken immediately and will be completed in this present summer season. Construction will commence as soon as weather permits, and the project should be completed by the fall.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, one factor in connection with this bill which I believe should be drawn to the attention of the committee when it is discussing this matter, and which was not mentioned by the previous speaker, is that the result of this bill will be to transfer the business of hauling this material from the Canadian National Railways to the Canadian Pacific Railway. In stating that I am in no way opposing the passage of this measure, but I believe members of the committee should be aware of that fact in view of the interest we have in the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I believe it should be stated in all fairness that the reason this is being done is that the Canadian Pacific line is closer than the Canadian National line, and it is simply a matter of the economics of railway construction over a greater distance.

Mr. MacInnis: In regard to that point, what distance away is the line owned by the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. McIlraith: Twenty-four miles.

Mr. MacInnis: And when this line is built stretching for 15 miles will it go right to the mine?

Mr. McIlraith: It goes right to the mine.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause agreed to.

BRAZILIAN TELEPHONE COMPANY

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved the second reading of Bill No. 296, respecting Brazilian Telephone Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Brazilian Telephone Company is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited. The purpose of the present bill is to transfer the head office of the Brazilian Telephone Company from Toronto to the city of Sao Paulo, the capital of the state of Sao Paulo. That is the first intention of this bill.

The second point is that if the company is to do this, then it must be authorized by a bylaw sanctioned by the unanimous agreement of a special meeting of shareholders held for that purpose. A memorandum from the Brazilian Telephone Company goes on to say:

> When said company is by a decree of the Brazilian government declared to be a Brazilian domestic company, then the Companies Act of Canada shall cease to apply to the company.

There is a third portion of the bill providing for the filing of the Brazilian decree with the Secretary of State. This is more a procedural section than a substantive one.

The memorandum continues:

> The reasons why it is desired to transfer the head office to Brazil are mainly twofold:
> 1. In order to carry out the very large expansion program, it is necessary to spend very large sums of money on services and equipment. These large sums of money are not at present available on any suitable terms either in Canada or in the United States. It is believed that these moneys will be available in the united states of Brazil if the companies raising these funds are Brazilian domestic companies.
> 2. It is believed that the Brazilian people will be more satisfied with the operations of these companies if they are permitted to become shareholders in them, and participate in their profits.
> It should be pointed out that the Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company Ltd., which is at present the sole owner of the shares of Brazilian Telephone Company, will, either directly or through a holding company, continue to have control of these telephone companies.

—of which this is one.

> Therefore the shareholders of Brazilian Traction are in no way prejudiced, and in fact should be benefited by changing the head office to Brazil, and by making this company a Brazilian domestic company.

The loss in taxes and fees to Canada amounts to $180 per annum and is negligible.

> As far as I know an act of this type, changing the head office of a Canadian company to a foreign country, and taking said company out from under the provisions of the Companies Act of Canada, has not previously been done in Canada. However, by the Rho Anglo Group Act, 1953, the imperial parliament at Westminster made provision whereby a group of companies ceased to be English companies, and became companies subject to the Companies Act of Northern Rhodesia. According to a news item in the London Times December 4, 1953, the Wankie Colliery Co. is introducing a bill into the present parliament of the United Kingdom, transferring the company to Southern Rhodesia under the latter's Companies Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 152, REVISED STATUTES OF 1952—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving second reading of Bill No. 4 I feel that I am but giving this house the opportunity to approve of a statute the principle of which was endorsed by the last parliament. I am also giving each of the parties in this house an opportunity to support a measure the principle of which has received the support and endorsation of all the major political parties in this country.

That support has been expressed by the opposition groups in this house on a number of occasions, and on several occasions there have been members of the Liberal party who have also voted for the second reading of this bill. I regret to say, however, that as yet the bill itself has not been passed by parliament. Nevertheless I dare to hope that we are getting nearer the day when the voluntary revocable check-off or some form of union security will be written into our national labour code.

May I indicate briefly what this bill proposes. It proposes that a new subsection be written into the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which is our national labour code. When that new subsection has been written into the national labour code it will then be possible for a trade union—provided that trade union has been recognized under the labour code—to request that the employer concerned deduct or check off the trade union dues of those members of the union who in writing express their desire that that be done, whereupon that check-off would be made. In other words, Mr. Speaker, this is what is known as the very minimum of union security.

I for one—and there are other members in the house, I know, who agree with me—would like to see a greater measure of union security written into our labour legislation. Indeed, some of those who appeared before the committee on industrial relations last year indicated that their only complaint about this legislation was that it did not go far enough. I must make it clear also, of course, that there were those who thought it went too far. But as far as the platforms of the four parties in this house are concerned, all have indicated their approval of the principle of union security; and as I say, this bill proposes the very minimum of union security.

May I take a moment to give the history of this bill, at least so far as recent years are concerned. Back in 1948 we had before us the then new national labour code, namely the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. After second reading it was referred to the committee on industrial relations. When it went to that committee it did not have in it any provision for the voluntary revocable check-off or for any other form of check-off or union security. In that committee, however, my good friend the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll)—who likes having reference made to this matter as often as possible; I am sure it does not embarrass him—proposed that the voluntary revocable check-off should be written into the labour code.

That was not an easy thing to achieve in that committee—the lines of division were fairly close—but we succeeded. The committee passed my hon. friend's amendment and it was written into the code in that committee. We dared to hope that that battle had been won; but when that bill came back to the committee of the whole house in June, 1948, another member on the government side who is no longer with us moved as an amendment that the good work of the industrial relations committee be nullified. His amendment was to the effect that the voluntary revocable check-off provision be struck out of the bill. I regret to say that that Liberal amendment, striking out what the Liberal member for Spadina had moved in the committee, carried in this house and so we lost the day. However, on that occasion there were 35 members of the House of Commons who voted to keep the voluntary revocable check-off in the labour code.

In 1949 a bill was introduced along this line, but it did not reach the point of a vote. In 1950 this bill which is now before the house was presented in my name, and it reached a vote. When the votes were counted it was found that 45 members had voted for it. That was an improvement over 1948. In 1951 the bill was introduced again. I would point out that on each of these occasions the wording has been exactly the same as the wording that was first evolved in the committee on industrial relations back in 1948. In 1951, when the vote was taken, we found we had made still further progress; 67 members voted for it. That group of 67 included not only all members on the opposition side of the house who were present at the time, but 17 members on the Liberal side of the house. When that number of Liberals differ with their party I submit that we are really making headway. It does not often happen in this house.

The matter did not reach a vote in 1952. Talking out was the order of the day that year. In 1953, however, something else happened. After a fair amount of debate on my bill for the voluntary revocable check-off, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) moved an amendment to the motion for second reading. His amendment was the well-known proposal that the bill be not then read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the committee on industrial relations. I expressed the view that I was prepared to accept that amendment at that time. I said I would rather have seen the bill passed, but that I could see the possibility that if we could get the subject matter to a committee we might do an educational job, might make headway, and might eventually get this provision onto our statute books.

We did not get the law passed, but we made some headway. That committee in 1953 considered the matter very thoroughly and made a most interesting report to the house on Tuesday, April 28, 1953. It read as follows:

> Your committee has considered the subject matter of Bill No. 2, "an act to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off)", and has agreed to report as follows:
> Your committee endorses the principle of Bill No. 2—

I think I should repeat that sentence, as the pith of the report is there: "Your committee endorses the principle of Bill No. 2". Incidentally, last year's Bill No. 2 was exactly the same as this year's Bill No. 4, which is now before us. The report goes on to say:

—and recommends that the principle of the said bill, together with the submissions included in the printed minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee on the subject matter of this bill, be considered by the government in its review and proposed revision of the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which the committee is informed is now under study.

As I have indicated, Mr. Speaker, that report was made to the house on April 28, 1953. On May 5, 1953, as recorded at page 4773 of Hansard, the then chairman of the standing committee on industrial relations moved that the report be concurred in, and after a very short debate the motion was passed. In other words, the report of the committee became the report of the house. The position taken by the committee that the principle of last year's Bill No. 2 should be endorsed became the stand of the House of Commons on May 5, 1953.

I recognize, although that stand was taken by the committee and the house, that the report goes on to suggest that the matter might be further studied by the government in the light of the review we were informed was being made of the whole of the labour code. Still I think it should not be lost sight of that the principle of the voluntary revocable check-off itself was clearly endorsed both by the committee and by the house.

Since that is the position with regard to this matter, I hope it will not take much longer until we have this provision written into the labour law of the country. May I point out that the voluntary revocable check-off or some form of union security is already in a number of provincial labour codes. I know for a fact that it is in the trade union act of Saskatchewan, the Nova Scotia labour code, the British Columbia labour code, and two or three others as well.

Let it also be pointed out that during the years we have been discussing this matter in the House of Commons considerable progress has been made by those workers who come under federal labour jurisdiction in getting the check-off provision. For example, the railway workers, who constitute the largest group of employees coming under federal labour jurisdiction, now have even more than is sought by the bill. They now not only have a check-off in the voluntary revocable terms that the bill suggests, but they have the Rand formula so that the advantages gained by trade unions for workers on the railways are being paid for by all those who enjoy those advantages. However, some of us still feel very strongly that this is a principle which should be written into our labour law at the federal level so that it will give a lead and encourage the same kind of legislation in those labour codes that do not yet have it, and also so that under the law of this country there will be full recognition of the part that labour plays in our economy.

It is somewhat strange to me that it has taken so long to win a law of this kind. After all, the check-off is something that is practised in respect of a great many other types of payment. We know that during the war there were payroll check-offs for victory bonds and that now in peacetime there are payroll check-offs for Canada savings bonds. There are payroll check-offs for income tax, and also for donations to the Red Cross and various other charitable organizations. It does seem strange that when one comes to this matter there should be the employer resistance to it that there is. It has been argued at times that it would involve a bookkeeping task of some proportions, but I have not heard any great complaint from the railways over the fact that they now have the check-off as the result of negotiations a year or two ago. As I say, the bill before us would have the effect of recognizing in law what a great many workers already have; it would extend that right to the few who do not have it yet; and it would also serve to recognize in law the important position that labour occupies in this country.

I have deliberately refrained from trying to be provocative in presenting the case on this occasion, because it does seem to me that the case for this measure is stronger than it ever was. In view of the history I have already recounted, in view of the growing support for this measure across the years, in view of the fact that all parties are in favour of it, in view of the fact that the last parliament endorsed the principle of this bill almost at the end of its term, I hope that this time the measure will not be longer delayed.

I know the answers that have been made from the other side of the house on former occasions. I know what I think of some of the replies that have been made, but I shall not bother to say that now. I hope that on this occasion there will be no excuses, but that the government, which was the government last May when parliament endorsed the principle of the bill, will on this occasion agree that it is time this minimum form of union security, the voluntary revocable check-off of trade union dues, should be written into our national labour law.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is any part of my duty this afternoon, and it is certainly not my intention, to discuss the history of the bill as the sponsor has already done, or to discuss the merits or demerits of the voluntary revocable check-off as described in the bill. Year after year this matter has been brought forward and discussed at some length. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, it was discussed last session, and when the bill came before the house on second reading it was referred on my motion to the standing committee on industrial relations. The committee gave it very careful study and received a great many representations pro and con, and all of that is duly recorded in the minutes of proceedings and evidence of that committee. Perhaps members of the house who were not here last year would like to refer to that report.

On the 28th of April last the committee made its report to the house, and that report has been read this afternoon by the sponsor of the bill. I think the house will agree that the mandatory part of the report is briefly that the principle of last year's bill be considered while the review and proposed revision of the act is under study by the government. As was stated, the report was accepted by the house on Tuesday, May 5, 1953, and the consideration indicated in the report has been going forward. My department has been carrying out what perhaps might be called a long-term but careful study of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. It has been working out a number of proposed amendments.

I should like to say a word right here about the act. It is not an old one. It is one act that has not been subject to very many amendments, and to my mind it is an act with respect to which the greatest austerity should be exercised in introducing amendments. I am confident that the simpler it can be kept the better, as long as it is a suitable instrument to carry out the tasks in hand. The federal labour relations law should never attempt, I think, to be an omnibus act with the pious hope that it will thus end all real or alleged evils associated with any group of organized employers or organizers workers, because the spirit of conciliation on the part of the bargaining parties to a dispute is of more value than all the amendments that can be attached to the act.

Therefore the officials of my department have wanted to take time in which to review these amendments based upon useful years of experience since the end of the second world war. In fact it might well be that we should take more time in making sure that, on the one hand, all amendments that would be useful are included and, on the other, that all amendments we do include are absolutely essential. In a process such as this I do not think the committee in the department that has been working on this matter should be rushed. Because of this the group of amendments have not yet been completed by my department, and I of course have not yet recommended that group of amendments to the government.

Now, what has the House of Commons said about the matter? The committee recommended to the house last spring that the principle be considered during the review of amendments I have been talking about. The house endorsed that recommendation. We in the Department of Labour are, in our own time, carrying out that recommendation for consideration.

I am not able to say at this time when I shall be able to submit a final list of amendments to the government. I cannot undertake to give the house the exact time when this action can be taken, or to forecast the results thereof. I do not think the matter is of such great urgency that I should take this step at a time when I would like to have further study given to all the proposed amendments, and also at a time when there still exists in the public mind a very strong feeling regarding the check-off concept, due to certain disputes in which the check-off, even though not this kind of check-off, was an important factor under other jurisdictions.

Therefore I hope the sponsor of the bill will not consider it a discourtesy if, after a reasonable discussion, I should ask one of my colleagues to move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of talking this bill out; but I cannot understand in this day and age, with the experience we have had with the voluntary revocable check-off, why there should be opposition to this type of union security, particularly opposition from the government.

For a start, the government is pretty well committed to the principle in the bill. The government checks off income tax at the source. This is done in respect of the indemnities of members of parliament. The government also has a very excellent recreation association in Ottawa, and we know that the members of that association pay their dues by the check-off, through government payrolls.

This is not something new in this country. The government has adopted the principle.

I would just like to ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) how he would collect his income tax, or how many inspectors and auditors and policemen he would have to employ to gather the taxes he gathers today, if it were not for the fact that those taxes are deducted at the source, by government order.

So, you see, when we begin to argue the principle it becomes clear that that principle is very well established, so far as the federal government is concerned. Some members in the house would say, "This is pretty wide; it is pretty sweeping." Well, it is not. The type of check-off that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) advocates in the bill merely covers industry in this country that may be under federal jurisdiction. There are not many of them—the national harbours board, Polymer, Canadian Arsenals—and most of them have it already.

So there is nothing wide or sweeping about it at all. Organizations that are organized provincially come under the provincial codes, and in most provinces they have this type of check-off. Even if it is accepted and is placed in the code, it is not mandatory. It is arrived at generally by agreement. When a union, recognized through due processes prescribed by law, sits down to write an agreement, such agreement is arrived at between employers and employees, and neither the union nor the employer in this type of check-off can compel anyone engaged in the industry or standing as a member of a union to accept this type of check-off. It becomes a matter of individual selection. With the voluntary revocable check-off the individual must place a card signed by himself in the company office, authorizing the employer to make the deductions. Otherwise such deductions are not made.

On the other hand, if during the term of an agreement union officials get out of line, or a union is not functioning as it should, the employee has the right to go to the office and withdraw his card. There is no compulsion in it. When one considers the fact that throughout the country today this type of check-off is in operation, the present request does not seem unreasonable. I know that in my own province we pay for hospitalization in this way. We pay for our doctors in the same way, under a group system. The churches receive their money by the same process.

I do not see that anyone in the house has anything to fear by writing into the national labour code something that will bring a little more democracy into the industries coming under that code. It is pretty nearly time we got around to this type of legislation, not only because the government accepts the principle but because it is implementing that principle in practically every organization coming under its control, with the exception of the national labour code.

Someone has said that he cannot understand resistance by employers. Well, I can understand it. An employer knows it is very difficult for an organization to function unless this type of dues collection is in operation. If it is not operating, then it means that union officials who wish to collect their dues have to travel continuously, thus occupying the major portion of their time. An employer knows that when a union must function through the voluntary collection of dues it is pretty badly hampered, and that is why he resists. He resists because he does not want the efficient functioning of union financial matters in or around his industry. It is a refusal to grant a little more democracy and to make things a little easier for those who are trying to look after the interests of employees. That is why he resists; make no mistake about that.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, and as the Minister of Labour well knows, we have had this kind of check-off in my end of the country for at least 60 years, and it has not caused any great revolution. The unions established it first, and it worked so effectively that other organizations followed suit, even to the federal government in the collection of income tax. In Ontario a learned judge, Mr. Justice Rand, headed a commission which made a thorough study of the whole question and recommended what has come to be known as the Rand formula. That is a little tighter form of union security, because no member is permitted to contract out of the organization during the life of the agreement. All members must pay their dues during that period.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is not even asking for that. He is asking the government to write into the code a principle that is accepted by themselves, one they have in operation, that gives the employee the right to put a card in the office saying that his employer may take his dues and pass them over to the secretary-treasurer of the organization. And, on the other hand, if he does not like what is going on in the union he has the right to withdraw that card and not support the organization financially. In my judgment there is nothing wrong with it. Those who fear it do so because of the propaganda that is put out by the employer who wants no organization of any kind, and who realizes that this is one of the ways of stopping the union from functioning.

I could give the house a lot of instances in this country where this question has caused a great deal of upset and economic upheaval, loss of wages and all the rest of it. Fortunately in most industries in this country today, where the employer is a sensible and moderate man, it is recognized that a well-established union, with proper leadership, is one of the biggest assets of the organization. I am sure that if the management of the mining industry, the automobile industry and the Canadian National Railways were questioned as to the desirability of having a union or otherwise, they would say, "Leave it there. The best advice we can get in most of our operations is received from the union officials, because they have someone there who meets with us and goes back to the men; therefore we get a lot of things done that we would not get done otherwise".

This means of getting the dues of the employees of an organization is one thing that is necessary to give the union the stability it needs to consider problems that affect industry, rather than have the officials chasing around trying to collect dues and occupying their time in that way. I am sure the Minister of Labour realizes that as well as I do. It seems that there are some stop-blocks behind the scenes that will not give him the green light. He has the red light, and has had it for a long time. I hope that at this time the house will say, let us pass this. The trade union movement is part of the structure of this country; it is as much a part of the country as industry itself, because the ultimate objective of the organization and of the people who work in the industry is to bring it to the point where it may accept responsibility for a share of the management of industry and give us a more effective machine to produce more in this country, for our people to enjoy.

I trust at this time, without any further discussion, this bill will pass and another milestone will be passed in the establishment of industrial democracy in the country.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour has made it clear that it is not the intention of the government to permit this bill to go to a vote. He has stated that he will welcome a motion to adjourn the debate, and I am not in much doubt that he will have the opportunity of extending that welcome, and that he was sure of it before he made the suggestion.

One of the things that interest me today is the different procedure being followed by the Minister of Labour in relation to the measure now before us. Last year when this same measure was under discussion the government moved that its subject matter be referred to the committee on industrial relations. The motion of the minister on that occasion was:

> That Bill No. 2 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations.

I suppose it would have seemed peculiarly inappropriate at this particular time to introduce a motion of that nature suggesting that a select committee or a standing committee could obtain useful information, because we have heard so often in the last two weeks that the reference of any subject to a committee would be to divest hon. members of their responsibility. So it would hardly be consistent on this occasion to turn around and say well, we were quite ready to improve our own position but we are not ready to do that in the case of something that affects the general rights of labour in this country. Possibly the Minister of Labour would not admit that, but at least there is strong reason to believe that something of that kind might have suggested that the axe be used instead of the reference.

I must say that I do not believe it is good practice in regard to this or any other measure simply to rise and say we are going to have a motion introduced which will have the effect of ending this debate. The government may feel that that is a proper course, but it is one which does savour of a denial of the ordinary rights of private members to bring a matter of this kind to its conclusion. Since that position has been stated, in putting before this house certain views that I think I should put forward I am not doing so in apprehension that if I occupy the ten minutes at my disposal I shall be avoiding the possibility of a vote. It has been made quite clear that it is not the intention of the government to permit a vote on this measure.

Mr. Harris: Now.

Mr. Drew: The interjection was not sufficiently clear. If the minister wishes to make a statement in clear words I shall be very happy to sit down. I could not hear what the interjection was.

Mr. Harris: At the end of the hon. gentleman's sentence I said, "Now".

Mr. Drew: Oh, I see; no vote now. That ties it to the statement of the Minister of Labour when he said: "I do not think that the committee in the department should be rushed." This committee in the department has been working for years, and when the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) says the time is not now, then we know that it is to be at some distant date in the future when the committee will finally be ready to make some proposals.

Last year, as on earlier occasions, this same plea was made. We were to wait for the appropriate time. Since we are not going to have a vote now, according to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, then the best we can do on this occasion is to avail ourselves of this opportunity to put forward certain views which have a direct bearing on this subject, particularly on the statement of the Minister of Labour that he does not think the committee in the department should be rushed. Just when this committee would not consider that it was being rushed is something that would really be a matter of interest to some of us. We heard these same discussions on this same bill on earlier occasions.

Since this bill has been up before, and since this does afford us an opportunity to present our views, may I repeat the arguments I presented last year, which were presented on earlier occasions and which I hope may receive the support of the government, because this is an important subject.

I must say that we do not need to be told by any hon. member that the trade union movement is now part of the social and economic structure of our country. That is recognized by every person who has the slightest knowledge of the essential requirements of the relationship between management and labour. However, what is not as readily accepted is the fact that the basic requirement of union security is collective bargaining and the assurance that the duly certified bargaining agents in any industry or occupation will be able to carry forward the work that they are set up to undertake under laws which have as their purpose a balanced relationship among workers, management and the public, who have a very direct interest in the end result of that relationship.

Due consideration must also be given to the inevitable and important relationship between governments and their agencies which have so constant an association with labour and management. The field is divided between national and provincial responsibility. That is something which always must be borne in mind.

We have contended on earlier occasions that this act should not be amended piecemeal, that what is greatly required is a review of the whole act and that an opportunity be provided for organized labour, for management and for representatives of the public generally to place their views before some competent body which will in turn be able to make recommendations which can be the basis of legislation.

Do not let any member of this government or any supporter of this government get up at this time and say this is simply another suggestion to pass over the responsibility of parliament to some outside body. After all, it was this same government that appointed the McTague commission more than eleven years ago. That was the last time a comprehensive survey was made in Canada of possible labour legislation. True, there have been references to the standing committee on industrial relations; true, there have been discussions in this house from time to time on individual measures, but those who have had the responsibility for the administration of legislation of this kind—at one time I also shared some measure of responsibility for the administration of labour legislation—know that piecemeal amendments without due regard to the impact of any amendment on other parts of the act can sometimes defeat the very purpose for which the amendments are made.

At the time the McTague commission made its report after very extensive inquiry the government acted under the wide emergency powers then available to it, and which it was prepared to use. It has just as wide emergency powers today and we are very glad it does not use them, for the present at any rate, or not now, to use the words the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration prefers.

At that time they employed the wide powers of the emergency legislation then available to them and introduced what amounted to a labour code. We came nearer to having uniformity of labour legislation at that time than ever before in Canadian history. Some of the provinces adopted the labour code outright as the provincial code, and as a result there were some provinces in which there was uniform labour legislation, which is highly desirable if it can be reached by agreement.

Eleven years have passed, during which time this country has expanded as an industrial producer beyond the expectations of anyone in those days. That expansion has brought new problems; that expansion has brought new pressures on the legislation we now have before us. If it was wise for this same government to appoint a public inquiry of three under the chairmanship of a distinguished jurist of that time, then I submit it is equally wise that the same course be followed today.

It should not be said that this is divesting us of responsibility, nor should it be said that a judge, or in this case one who has been a judge, is not a suitable person to head such a commission. Without in any way expecting that the government will accept my suggestion in a case of this kind, I may say that I for one would welcome their decision to appoint the same man as chairman of another commission. I think most members of the unions in Canada approved of the appointment at that time of Mr. Justice McTague, and would approve today the appointment of Mr. McTague as chairman of a commission to conduct an inquiry with similarly wide terms of reference.

Since this government has already demonstrated its belief in that method; since they were able to act so satisfactorily on the recommendations then presented to them, and since they incorporated most of the provisions of the order in council resulting from those recommendations into subsequent legislation which is still on the statute books, I repeat my request that a similar committee be set up because the government is not ready to act now, and I underline the word "now".

Since they are not ready to act now, then will they follow the same course they followed before and appoint a competent body, including someone with a wide knowledge of labour relations, including at least one representative of organized labour and one representative of management? If they were going to appoint a committee of three that would seem to be a well-balanced body. On that basis we might then have recommendations before us which would make it possible for us to have as fine labour legislation as would be available anywhere, and next year we would not be faced once again with the statement that the government is not ready to act now.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume consideration at eight o'clock of the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION FOR EXAMINATION BY COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Green, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gillis.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I tried to point out the serious loss unemployment meant to our economy. Half a million idle men means billions of man-hours of labour lost, especially when the idleness is prolonged. Idleness means billions of dollars to our economy. I outlined briefly the plans drawn up some years ago by the British Columbia government in co-operation with the various municipalities affected, and in view of the fact that these plans could be put into operation if the government would assist them I think the matter should now be considered.

The government, I feel, should perhaps consider giving to the towns and provinces which are prepared to co-operate once again some assistance by means of low interest long-term loans, especially for self-liquidating projects and those things in which the money could be safely invested in the form of mortgage finance, if necessary. During the thirties the government did actually assist the municipalities to tide over a very embarrassing period of unemployment by outright money gifts, financial help, and by making other funds available. I remember when I was on the Kelowna council we received quite a substantial grant from the federal government to assist us in putting numerous men to work on a sewer project.

I always look back to those days and feel that instead of keeping those men on relief—there was no unemployment insurance in those days—we saved the social services money and produced real, valuable assets of a permanent nature which were necessary to the town's development with labour which otherwise would have been lost forever, instead of subsidizing the social services which in turn would permit men to remain idle.

I listened last evening to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) reiterating the statement that what is physically possible could be financially possible. I agree with him. That statement is quite correct. But I do not agree with his method of printing money to make it possible. To my mind that is straight inflation. I would suggest a logical and proper way of bringing these two factors together and making financially possible what is physically possible, and that is by the government making loans through the Bank of Canada to municipalities for investment in self-liquidating projects where possible. The cost of the operation and the service charge for bookkeeping and other expenses in connection with the issuance of that money at no more than 2 per cent could be borne by the municipalities. I am satisfied it could be done. I am not suggesting even then that this is a permanent solution, but it might meet the present emergency and grant us time to really meet the problem which arises out of machine age development.

To my mind the day is not far distant when we shall be compelled to adjust our whole economy to meet the challenge of machine-produced abundance, because we know that today it embarrasses us, and will embarrass us to a greater degree when the atom is fully harnessed, to produce commodities that will create such abundance that human labour will become absolutely redundant. The present unemployment problem is simply an advance warning of the trouble to come from that source, and it is for the government to advance policies which will immediately take care of the displaced human labour today.

Some years ago I remember reading in a western paper about a wealthy easterner, I think he lived in Toronto, who had a habit of throwing his money out of hotel windows with a prodigal disregard for his own security. Probably some hon. members will remember the incident. At that time his sanity was questioned, and possibly rightly so; nevertheless that was what happened. I feel the government today is doing just that. We are throwing away billions of precious man-hours of labour which are being wasted and becoming an embarrassment instead of an asset through being channelled into productive work.

I realize that we are living in an age when human labour is becoming more redundant every day. With the advance of science and technology today we are witnessing the need for labour in industry receding accordingly. Private enterprise has no solution for our present problem. It has no solution for the displaced labour at this time except in terms of a hot or cold war, neither of which is acceptable to the Canadian people.

This condition to my mind calls for skilful direction by the government to protect the victims of the modern industrial process. Private enterprise will not do it. It is their failure in this respect that we have been discussing in the last few days. They naturally prefer the machine, where possible, to human labour. The machine operates 24 hours a day, does not strike for better conditions and produces more profits at a quicker pace than human labour. But such a policy will inevitably lead to chaos and distress even for the industrialists themselves.

Long-range planning should therefore be undertaken by a government which should be prepared to study even social credit and socialistic proposals to find a possible solution. Immediately, however, the government should set up a committee, or instruct the Department of Labour in co-operation with the provinces and municipalities, to study and produce a program of development which would be of permanent value to the nation. Why fritter away millions in supporting enforced idleness when such labour could be utilized to increase our national wealth? The unemployed are themselves chafing at the bit for work to do, and the government must give the lead.

We in the opposition will gladly co-operate in any way we can to make it possible for the government itself to bring order out of what may possibly become extreme chaos and hardship for our workers here in Canada.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take just a few minutes of the time of the house to comment on this subject, and I make no apology for explaining my position in this connection. I have just listened, as did other hon. members, to the last speaker. I hold no brief for the government, but when I hear someone in this house get up and say private enterprise has no solution to this problem except a hot or cold war, then I am rather surprised. I can understand the socialists saying that private enterprise has no solution, because that is the basis of their philosophy. They and they alone have a solution. But though I have listened to a great many speeches by members of the C.C.F. party, thus far I have not detected their solution. I do not think the government obtains any information of value from that particular section of this house.

The hon. member who has just spoken, at the tail end of his remarks, said we were discussing the failure of private enterprise, and that in this country we preferred machines to human labour. Well, I wonder how far this country, the United States, or any other progressive country would have developed if it had not been for the technological research and the evident skill and ability which private enterprise produced, which is manifest in the economic situation prevailing in this country and in the United States today. We do have machines in this country. We have an automobile industry in Windsor and Oshawa which could compete with any other in the world today except for taxes.

Machines create employment for labour, as the record of history will prove, and no socialist inside this house or out will ever convince me that machines replace human labour. We are told they are chaos and distress machines. I do not think anyone outside that party will agree with that. True enough we all admit—the members on both sides of the house—that we have an unemployment situation. We have yet to find anything in the socialist doctrine that is going to solve that problem.

I must say first that over the last several years we have heard the government justifiably boast that they are going to maintain full employment. What is meant by unemployment? Is it half a million people out of work? Or is it seasonal unemployment? I want to be fair, and I think every hon. member in this house wants to be fair. No one can tell me or anyone else in this house that we have not seasonal unemployment. We have other unemployment as well. The other day I think a suggestion was made by one hon. member—I am sorry I have forgotten his name—who said it should be the responsibility of government to devise, maybe through advisory boards, some way by which these seasonal employees could be employed for a longer time. I think the idea is well worth consideration. I have no doubt that the government advisers are considering such ideas with that as an objective.

I want to be quite frank and say here that while I am sympathetic to labour, I do not quite agree with their idea expressed here and there that industry has the responsibility of maintaining full employment by the year or, in other words, paying a yearly wage. That will come in time. It may come sooner than many of us expect, but at the moment I cannot see it, in this changing economy, with the competition facing us today, when industry would naturally be placed at a disadvantage if it should overproduce. Today in this country and in the United States we are in the position where we have overproduced. True enough that is a better position to be in than to be underproducing, whether it be wheat, automobiles or socks.

In the course of this debate we have heard about the unemployment in the textile industry and the farm implement industry. I was amazed, as I think many people were, the other day when a delegation met some of the members of the cabinet. When this situation was being discussed by the cabinet members and the representatives of labour the Acting Prime Minister told this particular delegation representing those who were out of work in either the farm implement industry or the textile industry that they should go somewhere else to seek employment. I rather think it was one of those statements made on impulse.

Of course what strikes me is this. That is a rather impossible position for those people to face. In the first place, where would they go? In the second place, the town or the city to which they went might also have unemployment. After all is said and done, I do not think there are many places in the Dominion of Canada today which have not unemployment. If these people were to migrate from one town to another and were to almost vacate some particular town or small city, there would be a bankrupt municipality.

I think the federal government must accept some responsibility. I am not saying that this philosophy of ignoring the almighty dollar, the value of that dollar, its purchasing power, and the necessity for conserving it, is not worthy of great consideration. I never did like the philosophy of "What's a million?" or "What's three million?" Nor do I subscribe to the theory that building, say, a $6 million national film board building is going to alleviate unemployment, especially when there is some doubt in the minds of many people as to the necessity for that particular building.

With respect to public spending, I am going to say here that I think the federal government should be the first agency in this country to endeavour to alleviate present conditions and get the wheels of industry turning so the dinner-bucket man can take home his weekly pay cheque. In that connection I am going to say this, and it is something which has been supported recently by press editorials. We in this country have been enjoying an export trade as well as taking care of our own requirements and competing against foreign imports into our country to replace those things we manufacture. I think what we must keep in mind in this country is that we have excessive taxes including the sales tax, the excise tax and other hidden taxes which go into the costs of the product which we hope to export in competition with foreign products, and with which we hope to supply our domestic market in spite of foreign competition.

I am rather afraid that many of us in this country will have to agree that these excessive taxes are pricing us out of the export market, and are also pricing us out of the local market as against foreign competitors. We in this country have become an industrial nation during and since the war. Prior to that time, of course, we were an agricultural country. In order to maintain a healthy economy I think we must enjoy a fair export market. Otherwise these men who depend on weekly pay cheques are going to find those pay cheques smaller, and that later on they will cease to come.

I would say that the responsibility today is on the federal government to take the initiative in this country, as was done on the other side of the border some few weeks ago by curtailing expenses as far as they possibly could. I think they appreciate the situation their country is in. In all fairness to any government that is in power I am going to say that what happens in the country to the south of us, whether it is good times or bad times, is bound to be reflected in this country. We just cannot get away from that nearness and the fact that they produce much the same things as we do, especially those products that we export and that they export to this country.

When we see people out of jobs it reminds me of something I heard on the radio a few weeks ago—and probably many other hon. members heard it—when they were talking about "recession" and "depression" which we heard a great deal about in the thirties. A recession is when the other fellow is out of a job, and a depression is when you are out of a job. I think that is quite true. You do not realize how hard up you are, what position you are in or what you have to face until the ordinary man with the dinner bucket finds himself on the short end of a pay envelope.

We are faced with that situation. We must acknowledge that fact. I will say that governments must realize that they are in somewhat the same position as that of housewives. There are some things they cannot afford; and if they cannot afford them, they cannot spend themselves into a recovery. I believe in public spending—I am one of those in this house who do believe in it, and I think I have many associated with me—but I believe there is a long-term view as well as a short-term view of this particular situation.

The government has taken the stand that this is a temporary situation. That may be right. By the end of another month we may reach the turning point. I hope we do. In any event it would appear that the budget is not going to be brought down until sometime in April, and that will give the government an opportunity to homestead for another six weeks before doing anything about the matter.

I think my interpretation of public spending should be acceptable to many people, and I hope to members of the cabinet. I make no apology for saying that the construction of public buildings, the filling of the backlog of orders so to speak, in case we ever run into a recession, which we discussed some years ago when municipalities were urged to put forward their ideas as to what should be done, would afford but temporary relief to the unemployed. I agree with an hon. member from Nova Scotia who spoke a few nights ago, who said that in so many of these projects in this country and elsewhere the amount of labour involved is so small compared with the total capital investment as to cast doubt on the wisdom of certain types of public spending even in times like the present.

I do not think we can spend ourselves out of a recession. My idea of public spending at a time like this would be along the lines of that held by private industries who see a future expanding market and want to enlarge, and who would invest $1 million, $2 million or $5 million, as the case may be, to expand their particular industries in order to take care of business two, four, five, ten or twenty-five years from now.

With the technological advances that have taken place today I think even some of our most modern industries will not be modern four or five years from now. The point I have in mind with respect to the idea I have been trying to convey is simply this. To my mind there are projects in this country that we could undertake which would be beneficial in this respect, namely if the government would do as industry does and spend $2 million, $4 million, $5 million, $50 million or even $100 million it would help to alleviate present conditions and at the same time would have long-range benefits.

For instance, there is the Passamaquoddy power project in the maritimes, which would be a federal matter and would mean a great deal to that particular part of the country. I could go on and recite others such as a power and conservation development on the Fraser river at the other end of Canada, as a result of which acreage under production would be increased in the course of time and the yield would be many times what it is today. I would call such projects developments of productive capacity which would appeal to the imagination of every Canadian. I cannot see, for instance, why the Saskatchewan river project could not be undertaken at the present time as a federal matter. Here we have a power project that in the years to come will benefit thousands, hundreds of thousands and possibly even millions of Canadian people. It may take 10, 15 or 25 years to achieve the benefits, but let us look ahead.

We are going to get over the hump. Let there be no mistake about it. Canadians will remain Canadians and will face any difficulty. All we want is good leadership, and we need not worry about what is going to happen tomorrow or the next day. Let us take a long-range view. These are the types of projects which the government should undertake because they are self-liquidating.

With respect to hidden taxes, I think the time has come when the government must realize that if we are going to have a sound economy, keep our industries growing and reopen the ones that have been closed, we must remove some of these nuisance taxes, the sales tax, the excise tax and other excessive hidden taxes, because we are pricing ourselves out of the market. I say quite frankly, and I will say so to any labour organization in Canada, that labour as well as management has a responsibility to co-operate. If they are true Canadians then they must accept the responsibility that is theirs. The necessity for endeavour on the part of every Canadian was never more apparent since the thirties than it is today. No one party, no one government, no one province, no one municipality can solve the problem. It requires the co-operation of everybody.

I say it is the responsibility of the federal government to give leadership. So far as hidden taxes are concerned, we had an illustration a few years ago of the result of excessive taxes on cigarettes. Since I first entered the house these taxes have been increased, and the government were told that their revenue would be decreased. I am not going to discuss the necessity for the reduction of taxes on cigarettes, but the point I make is simply that when taxes were increased on this particular product the revenue decreased. We urged that the taxes be reduced. I am sure the government will admit in all fairness, because the records are there to prove what I say, that they are very pleased with what has happened during the last year as a result of the reduction of these taxes. If the taxes had not been reduced we would not have had the same consumption, and as a result would not have had the revenue.

Because we have these excessive taxes we are bound to encourage smuggling. We are actually subsidizing foreign manufacturers by our excessive taxes. That applies without any question to cigarettes and to many other products. In this country we have a great acreage of tobacco and should have much more. By reducing taxes we increased revenue. I say the same principle should apply to the taxes on so many things we buy. I repeat, and I do not mind doing so because if an idea is worth uttering it is worth repeating, that I think the public realize today as never before that hidden taxes, the sales tax and so on, are so oppressive that the workingman is losing his job. Why? I think he realizes today as never before that he is being taxed out of his job by the policies of the present government.

[Mr. Murphy (Lambton West).]

I could give several quotations but I do not intend to. However, here is one that substantiates what I said about the construction industry. Representatives of the Canadian construction association presented a brief to members of the cabinet the other day. I have here an article from the Ottawa Journal of February 22 dealing with that meeting, from which I intend to quote only a paragraph, as follows:

> It said construction is desirable in times of general decline in business activity, but this year Canada will have a high volume of construction anyway. "It is very doubtful", the brief said, "that a substantial increase in the public works program would affect the present seasonal unemployment . . . or help the textile, marine, agricultural implement and other industries currently beset with serious unemployment problems".

That is in line with what I said a few moments ago. While we are bound to have a construction program this year of no mean amount, as I endeavoured to emphasize a few moments ago, in my conception public spending during this period on a works program of buildings and so on would provide only temporary relief. I would much prefer to see that coupled with a long-range program involving projects such as I have put forward. I refer to the Fraser valley, the Passamaquoddy, the South Saskatchewan and many other projects in which the federal government could participate.

I want to say something else related to this particular subject with which I do not think anybody will disagree. We have in this country the greatest potential tourist industry on the continent per capita, and we are not getting our fair share. While the tourist industry affects every section of our economy, and everyone in business, we seem to disregard it. I would say that this is one industry in Canada from which everyone benefits, when our American friends come here and when in return we export good will. I think the government should take the lead in this matter, but it never has. It cannot make the claim that it has done anything to promote the tourist industry. Instead of obtaining something more than $300 million from the tourist industry, I say we should be obtaining a billion dollars, and I said that ten years ago. The tourist industry has actually decreased in dollar value in the last few years.

I believe that under an aggressive program initiated by the government we could bring in that amount of money. This would mean a great deal to people in Canada from coast to coast, not only those operating tourist services and resorts, but people in all sorts of businesses.

I hope the government will consider at this time the plight in which the municipalities find themselves. My own conviction is that many of those municipalities are going to find themselves under a very severe strain because of this unemployment, the necessity of supplying relief, and also because of the high taxation policy of the government. For many years now they have not received their fair share of tax revenues. I am inclined to think that if this matter goes much further the government will have to appreciate the position in which the municipalities are finding themselves. I am sure no hon. member would like to see his own municipality suffer and not be able to meet its obligations, or to take care of relief measures, or fulfil those other requirements which, as municipalities, they must fulfil.

I would express the hope that before too long this government will realize that governments at lower levels have responsibilities. This applies to provinces as well as to municipalities, and affects all the people. In my opinion it is about time these lower levels of government secured some kind of agreement under which they would be placed in a respectable and responsible position, so they could meet their obligations and not feel called upon to be under any obligation to any other government.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I make no apology for speaking on the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). In my opinion the very serious unemployment problem now under debate demands the utmost attention from those in responsible positions. As a representative of the people of Canada I wish to express my opinion as to what should be done, and to make some comments concerning the whole situation.

It has been established, and I believe accepted on the government side of the house, that the figure of about 525,000 unemployed is accurate. This represents about 7 per cent of the total labour force in Canada. So no one can underestimate the serious situation facing our country unless something can be done to rectify the situation and to put those people back to work under some program.

I listened with keen interest to the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) who attempted to castigate the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Jones) for his references to the capitalist system. I refer to it as a capitalist system, not a so-called free enterprise system, because certainly there is nothing free and there is nothing very enterprising about the system under which we operate. It is a capitalist system; and I quite agree with the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary and other members of the C.C.F. who have expressed little or no faith in capitalism as a means of obtaining security in peacetime for our Canadian people. Looking back as far as I can recall, over a period of years we have gone the full cycle of employment, recession, non-employment and then back to full employment, when our people had jobs and a decent standard of living.

When he reflects upon what he has said I believe the hon. member for Lambton West will realize the truth of what I am saying, and that he was mistaken when he applauded the capitalist system which has done nothing but bring unrest, unemployment and insecurity to the world. Today when we have such great opportunities through technological advances we should be able to use our natural resources in order to get jobs for everyone, so that all people may have a decent standard of living, and security.

I was interested before the dinner recess to listen to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) who tried, as he said, to indicate three methods by which the situation could be corrected. One of those methods he said would be a very clear socialist policy. I do not know what he meant by that; he did not go to any length to indicate his meaning. In any case I want to take issue with him, and to correct his statement that industry does not operate to give employment. Let me tell the hon. member that if in Canada we have investors and if we have people in control of multi-million dollar companies, then it is their responsibility to give employment to our people. They have a responsibility to keep the factories open to give our people jobs.

It is true that the giving of jobs is not the primary endeavour of industry; nor is it as he suggested, the production of goods. The production of goods in industry, I say, is only secondary to the profit motive. The production of goods is only incidental to the making of profits. It is clear that on those occasions when they cannot sell their goods and make profits, neither goods are produced nor people employed. And that is pretty well what we are finding in the Canadian economy today.

Therefore I suggest that we must give consideration to ways and means by which our people can share equitably in the economy of this country. Today we have in Canada, even under the system now operating, a condition under which we are using about $2 billion of our Canadian gross product for war preparedness, or defence production. Our total gross product in Canada in 1953 amounted to about $24 billion. If we take that figure of $24 billion and take also the population of Canada which, roughly, can be placed at 15 million people, and allow a certain amount—perhaps a third—for capital investment, we still have a figure under which every family of four would enjoy an income of $6,400. When we make allowance for depreciation in capital investment to the extent of one-third of our national product, and make an equitable division, we still have a family income of $4,500. We know for certain that it is not possible to divide it equally. Perhaps we would not be justified in dividing it equally, but it does show that in Canada we are producing a gross national product which could take care of any hardship in the country.

That is not being done. I hold in my hand a sessional paper dated January 29, which I received some time ago. This sessional paper gives the number of people making income tax returns for 1951-52 in certain salary ranges. It shows that 452,427 people earned less than $500 a year; 443,140 earned between $500 and $999; 601,655 earned between $1,000 and $1,499; 690,792 earned between $1,500 and $1,999; 750,889 earned between 2,000 and $2,499 and 476,134 earned between $2,500 and $2,999. This sessional paper shows that today our people are not enjoying what might be called a decent income.

This government has a definite responsibility to see to it that our people are protected in their jobs. We can pick up almost any paper today and see the large profits that are being made by our large industries, particularly those in a monopoly position or with such control over the market that they can demand from the consumer practically any price for the commodities they have to sell. From that we can see why our Canadian products are being priced out of the picture in so far as international trade is concerned.

I know some hon. members will say that labour itself has so increased the cost of Canadian products that our goods are no longer able to compete in the foreign market. That is not true. For proof of this statement all we have to do is to look at the farm implement industry. That is one of the industries that sent delegates to Ottawa to interview the cabinet and ask that something be done. We find that despite the increases in wages from 1946 the profits of the machinery companies per dollar of product produced have increased to a far greater extent than have wages.

Therefore we find ourselves in a situation similar to that of the 1930's. Sufficient money is not going back into the pockets of the people who produce the goods to buy back that which they produce. Great technological strides have been made in the production of commodities, and the Canadian people should be able to buy those products for use in their homes to enable them to maintain a better standard of living. Our government should take the responsibility of seeing to it that more money goes back into the pockets of the people to buy back what is produced. If that is not done, exactly the same thing will happen as happened in the 1930's, when we had unemployed men riding the box cars throughout the country. Our factories were shut down, and that may happen again.

I do not think it is to the credit of any system that we have to have war or threats of war in order to keep our people employed, or to give them a high standard of living. The cruel irony of it, Mr. Speaker, is that our people have never had a higher standard of living or fuller employment than when we were at war, when almost half of our national product and our resources of manpower were engaged in war production. Surely it does not take too much common sense to be able to make the point that when we are coming back to a peacetime position we should be able to organize our economy and use technological improvements to increase the standard of living of our people.

Here is the position in which we find ourselves, in spite of the fact that certain people are willing to start new enterprises. The figures I am about to give the house do not in themselves indicate that it is of necessity a good thing, but in the last quarter of 1953 there was an increase in the total number of established commercial enterprises. In the third quarter of 1953 the number increased from 2,554 enterprises to 3,131. In the month of September there was an acceleration of commercial failure. The total number of commercial enterprises operating at the end of September was in excess of those operating at the end of July, but that is not the point. The point is that in dollars the total volume of money invested in those enterprises had declined.

I think hon. members will be interested in the figures I am about to give. They indicate the grand total amount of money in such commercial enterprises. We find that until 1929, up to the time we had the crash, we were enjoying a period of pretty good prosperity. Then the crash come. From then until 1939 there were a very large number of commercial failures. The situation began to get better; the amount of money invested in such commercial enterprises began to go up until the war came, when there was great investment in commercial enterprises. Then we find in 1953, after the period of the cold war, an increase in commercial failures.

I have tried to outline some of the reasons why the government should take immediate action in this field. I would suggest that some of the measures the government has taken in the last two or three years are not going to be effective to stave off a calamity for any long period unless something else is done.

I recall that in 1951 the government took off practically all credit controls, and we found that instalment and credit buying increased very rapidly. We found that by September 30, 1953, an appalling situation existed in connection with outstanding instalment debt. At that time there was $225 outstanding in instalment debt for every Canadian. This has almost tripled in the last 18 months. The total instalment debt, charge accounts and personal loans up to date stand at $500 per family. The debt situation of the Canadian family is increasing to an alarming extent. I think the government should find ways and means of dealing with that sort of situation.

There are some things the government could do in order to restore the purchasing power of the Canadian people and put many of our people back to work. First, I would suggest that farm purchasing power be restored. Someone will hasten to his feet to say that in 1953 we had an all-time record farm income, but when we take the farm income for 1953 and the figures of farm purchasing power in connection with the things the farmer has to buy, we find that the farmer is in a very bad position in that relationship.

I ask the government to consider putting adequate floor prices under farm commodities and taking over immediately, through the wheat board, 500 million bushels of wheat. I feel that the Canadian farmer, along with every other Canadian, is willing to do his share in seeing to it that the hungry people of the world are fed. I think that would be a tremendous gesture on the part of a democratic world to help alleviate hunger as well as win support for democracy. In addition, I submit that the government should increase the old age pensions. The present payments to our older citizens in the form of old age pensions are a disgrace. This would give our older people a more decent income so they could enjoy some of the amenities of life and buy some of the goods now on the shelves that Canadians have produced, and thereby help the situation. I suggest to the government that it abolish the 10 per cent sales tax which today has the effect of increasing the cost of farm machinery and reducing the effective demand of the farmer for such machinery, as well as increasing the prices of commodities to the general consumer.

In addition I think the government should undertake a very comprehensive and imaginative program in respect to public works projects. I recall that when I was here from 1945 to 1949 we as members of parliament understood that the government had a shelf of public projects which it was prepared to utilize in case unemployment ever struck the Canadian scene. If that is true then I think it is high time they pulled out of the dark any secrets they may have in this regard. The Canadian people are asking that something be done.

Then, I feel that the government should take steps to reduce the interest rate so farmers and others may be able to obtain credit at lower rates. It is nothing short of usury the interest which people have to pay, whether on farm improvement loans or when they get a loan from the bank. Certainly those people who through force of circumstance have to go to these finance corporation people in order to get short-term credit at 24 per cent interest are paying rates which are a disgrace to the country.

I just want to close by saying that this is a serious problem, but a solution can be found if the government has the will to do it. Just as we won the war so we can win the peace. The veterans and all our people generally are placing the responsibility at this time on the people right here in this government, namely the Liberal government. The delegation representing the unemployed people in the farm implement industry who came here were not at all satisfied with the answer they got from the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe). A statement appeared in the press to the effect that the Acting Prime Minister had told them that they must find other jobs. The headline read:

> Must find other jobs, Howe bluntly advises farm implement men.

I want to say to the right hon. minister and to the government that these workers are victims of circumstances beyond their control. All they can do is come to their elected representatives and ask them to do something. Under our complex society most of the jobs are governed by industrial employment, and the wheels of the factories must turn. If it is a matter of public investment, then it has to come from the people in charge of the public treasury, namely the dominion government. On these two counts I would ask the government to do something.

It is not sufficient to tell these labour people to leave their former places of employment, to leave their homes and families and go to hunt other jobs. These people are not Dick Whittingtons who can put their little bags on their backs and strike out to find work. If they think the streets of Ottawa are paved with gold because of the money talk there has been around the house these last few weeks, they will find otherwise. These people want work, and they want it now.

These 500,000 unemployed represent potential wealth. After all, wealth is only that which is produced by the working people applied to the natural resources. If we consider the daily output of each of these people when fully employed to be worth $10 to the nation, it would mean that these 500,000 men could in 200 days produce $1,000 million of wealth a year. If we consider that in terms of $10,000 homes, we find that 100,000 homes could be built for people who need them.

So I ask the government to consider this matter seriously. The people want an answer. The motion of the hon. member for Cape Breton South indicates that we want action now.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knight: —I presume it is my privilege to speak despite the protests from my hon. friends on the other side of the house.

Mr. McIlraith: Your hon. friends did not protest. The hon. member has no right to make that remark.

Mr. Knight: We shall let that go for the moment.

Mr. McIlraith: You had better.

Mr. Knight: Let me remind my hon. friend that I am responsible for what I say in this house. If someone on the other side groans I have the privilege of saying that I shall speak in spite of the groans of my hon. friends.

Mr. McIlraith: You have no right to say what is not true.

Mr. Knight: I was intrigued by the wishful thinking on the part of the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough) when he indicated that he expected that the industrialists of this country might use the benevolent despotism which it was the custom of the early industrialists to use. I think we have reached a situation where we have a corporate industry which has very little human sympathy. Indeed we cannot expect that human sympathy will be exercised.

I can remember what has happened even within as short a period as my own lifetime. I am thinking of a factory owner in my native Northern Ireland who produced linen. When unemployment came along he used his assets and the profits which he had plowed back into business in order to keep what he called "my people" in employment, and he did that until he had used up all the resources he had in his possession. I would suggest that now he would be considered as a man not quite right in his mind.

I was intrigued by something said by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), and particularly by his three S's, sovietism, slaughter and social credit. It was a neat piece of alliteration, and I suppose my hon. friend would not like me to suggest that these things are three of a kind. I shall not do so. But I would like to point out to my hon. friend that if his solution of handing out purchasing power is correct, then there are only two ways in which to do it. You can take this purchasing power and say to a man, "Now, here is what you need. When you need more come back and we will give you some more." That is the first method. The second method would be simply to hand out this scrip or money indiscriminately—

An hon. Member: You know that is wrong.

Mr. Knight: I would like to ask my hon. friend who is to take charge of this public purse, because whoever has charge of it will have a regimenting and dictatorial power greater than any power any democratic socialist ever dreamed of, and one to which I am sure no one here has ever aspired.

On the question of unemployment, we in the prairie country are perhaps more fortunate than people in industrial areas. We have not very many industries, and such industries as we do have are largely connected with the construction business. It is admitted, though, that when the temperature is 30 or 40 degrees below zero there must be some seasonal unemployment, and I would point out that that seasonal unemployment is serious to the people who are concerned. I would like to see some way of overcoming the difficulty.

I have a good deal of sympathy with the government in their difficulties in dealing with this situation, because they have come around to what my hon. friend from Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough) has described as the difficult stage in an inevitable cycle, which during my lifetime has cropped up on several occasions. We have always been faced with the three conditions of depression, followed by war, followed by depression and then back again, and we have reached a definite place in that cycle which has occurred for the third time in my lifetime.

Many people here have said, and I expect there are many others who agree with them, that war seems to be the thing which does away with unemployment and depression. I am very interested in young people and in the education of young people, as some of my friends know, and I think one of the most serious aspects of this situation is that these young people are faced with this alternative, whether to choose war or choose depression. The danger is that they may make the decision in favour of war. As a matter of fact, I noticed in a United States magazine the other day that a survey had been conducted among some colleges in that country and the young people there had been asked, "What has war done for you?" Nearly all of them, I was horrified to observe, agreed that "War is the thing to which I owe my chance for an education."

That, Mr. Speaker, is a terrible condition of affairs, and I am worried lest the young people may come to believe that the only way they can avoid a depression, or the only way in which they can get a job or an education, is by means of war, or lest they conclude that that is the lesser of the two evils. As a matter of fact one of these young men said, "Yes, a few of us kids may get killed, but there will be lots of us left and it will be a lot better for those who are left." That is not a dream. That is an actual fact, and it is something we have to be prepared to face.

I have already mentioned the unemployment situation in my own city. There is considerable unemployment there, though I believe it is mostly seasonal. The condition, of course, is worse in those cities where we have industries which are making consumer goods, and here again we run into that same cycle at a time when the shelves have become full. That is true in the textile and agricultural machinery industries; most of these industries which are producing consumer goods are now, in the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, piling up a backlog, so much so that he was forced to say to a labour delegation, in my hearing, that that was the sort of trouble they had to expect in times of peace—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): He said no such thing.

Mr. Knight: —and that they had better find themselves jobs in another industry. But I would suggest that if these men do go and find themselves jobs in another industry they will overproduce that industry until again we have the condition of full shelves, in which the wages earned by the workers in these plants do not enable them to purchase back the goods they are producing. When the shelves are full then those in modern Canadian industry—and we could not call them benevolent despots—cannot afford to keep men in employment, and they shut the mills down so that unless we have a Korea or war or some other crisis there is a long period of attrition during which these shelves are being emptied of their goods, and the men are out of work. They have fulfilled their function for the time being and filled the shelves, and they can go on unemployment relief. It takes money to purchase goods, and the result is that in peacetime it takes a lengthy period before conditions are brought about again in which there is a demand for those goods and the men can be put back to work.

That condition has been aggravated by the process of mechanization, and I would suggest in that regard that the situation is liable to become worse in time rather than better. It is an old story. We have had it since the time of the industrial revolution, when men burned the looms because they believed they were depriving them of employment. I suggest the time has come when we must accept these problems and arrange to meet this process of mechanization. It is the government's responsibility—I am glad it is not mine—to take these bumps out of business so we can have an economy which will work. The problem, then, seems to be to get the goods off the shelf.

There is one other word I wish to add, namely that in the meantime I believe some of the recommendations we have heard here are going to be of some help. The problem concerns that fabulous or fabled shelf of public works of which we heard in 1945 or 1946. If some of these suggested solutions were put into operation they would, I believe, provide some alleviation, but I do think the main problem has never been answered. So I would be pleased if I could hear from some of my friends on the government side who would be prepared to answer this simple question. What is the government's solution?

When we have overproduction, when the shelves have been filled with goods, what is your solution short of war for getting rid of those goods in order that you may put the men who made those goods back to work again?

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) a short time ago, I was pleased to note that I found myself in complete agreement with one rather weighty observation he made. That observation was to the effect that it was the responsibility of government to give leadership. Prior to that I had been thinking that possibly he and I might be able to get together in a mutual admiration society in reverse in respect of the contributions which our political groups were making to this debate.

As far as I have been able to understand the remarks coming from that section of the house, I can briefly sum up their contribution by suggesting that they are advocating that we set up a committee to call before it certain people who will give us the statistics on unemployment which have already been given to us by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). Had they suggested that the government and the Minister of Labour should consider revising their methods of gathering and tabulating figures so they might possibly be more accurate and more complete in detail than they are at the present time, there might have been some point to their argument.

In the course of this debate some of my colleagues have discussed some of the broader aspects of unemployment as a symptom of an economic disease in our society. I shall therefore attempt to confine myself for a short time to some of the aspects of this matter within the terms of reference which have been set by the government itself. I recall that earlier in this debate the Acting Prime Minister made note of the fact that plans have been laid for an investment of something over $5 billion in Canada in the coming year. He suggested that this investment would be a means of eliminating, in large part, the present unemployment that everyone agrees exists, even though we may have varying ideas as to its proportions. In passing I should like to point out that while $5 billion sounds like quite a lot of money to most of us, a quick calculation shows that if it were all spent in wages it would provide $1,000 to each of the 500,000 unemployed that some people have suggested there are in this country today. However, as I say, I mention that matter simply in passing.

I would agree that some of that $5 billion about which the Acting Prime Minister was talking is going to be spent in that great nation-building tradition of this country which was set when the Canadian parliament quite some time ago launched the building of the first national transcontinental railway in this country. I would suggest that such things as the oil pipe line and the St. Lawrence seaway are in that nation-building tradition. I wish the Acting Prime Minister had elaborated a little bit more on just how and by whom this $5 billion was going to be spent. I have a feeling that the largest part of it will be spent by a relatively few large corporations. I should like to give one example of what actually can happen when these large corporations are investing capital in new plant and equipment.

I call to mind an investment which was made last year by one of the largest and, in my opinion on the basis of its record, one of the most efficiently and intelligently managed corporations operating within the province of British Columbia. They made additional capital investment in their plywood industry. It is perfectly true that for a period during the summer months there was a great humming of activity, and that jobs were provided for a large number of men in the construction trade. As a matter of fact they were being called upon to work a good deal of overtime in order that the project might be completed and brought into production. Of course quite a large number of people flocked in to secure jobs in the production line in that enlarged plant.

The actual situation, as it developed, was that before that new plant had been run in to the point of its maximum output, that company found itself in the position where it was laying off some of these recently-hired employees, some of the people who had come there in good faith expecting to find continuous employment. Not only were the workers who had been engaged in the construction of that plant out of work; people who had the expectation of normally steady employment in the production line were also out of work.

I use that example to show that large capital investment in itself is not necessarily any guarantee of continuous and stable employment. I would further suggest that when you find large investments being made by a few perhaps competing corporations simply to improve their own position and secure for themselves a larger share of an existing market, the result of that investment is simply going to be instability and insecurity of employment.

In my opinion the real solution to this problem, as has been suggested by some of the other hon. members who have spoken, lies in the adoption of investment, trade and industrial management policies which this government have indicated they are not prepared to adopt. Of course the fact that these people are sitting in the seats of government is, as far as I am concerned, an indication that the majority of the Canadian people have not as yet seen the necessity for adopting those policies either. But there is one policy and one principle which I submit this government has accepted as being valid and proper. I refer to the insurance principle.

We have a national unemployment insurance plan. I would say there is no question that the majority of the members of this house have accepted that plan as basically a good idea, and also that the majority of the Canadian people have accepted it as a good idea. The only criticism that arises in respect of it is as to its inadequacies, as many people see them.

What does this plan of unemployment insurance that we have today do? I think that subject was fairly well outlined by the Minister of Labour when he suggested that it provided some protection against what he called frictional unemployment, and against seasonal unemployment. That is perfectly true. While many of us might point out that the amounts payable are in many respects inadequate, we would not deny that it does offer at least some measure of protection to those who become unemployed and who have been contributors to the fund. But I do not think anyone in the house would argue that it is not correct to say there are wide gaps in the coverage provided by the present plan.

There is the question of having to have the required number of contribution days. In the case of the lay-off that took place last summer, to which I referred a few minutes ago, I know that a large percentage of the people caught in that lay-off were recent immigrants to this country who did not have the required number of contribution days under the plan in order to qualify for unemployment insurance. Consequently people whom we had welcomed to this country, people to whom we had opened our doors, in many cases found themselves suffering severe hardship, with no prospect of gainful employment throughout the winter and no prospect of being able to draw unemployment insurance benefits.

I remember quite well an incident that occurred on an airplane trip I made last summer, and I think this is a rather good illustration of what happens to some people who follow the advice given by the Acting Prime Minister and go other places to look for jobs. I was travelling on the plane over a rather rugged section of the west coast of Vancouver island. My seatmate turned to me and said, "See those poor chaps sitting over there on the other side of the plane." I said, "Yes". To me they were obviously people who had come from one of the eastern sections of Canada. He said, "Those four men are going to land in Vancouver within the next half hour, and they are going to land there broke."

These young chaps had followed the dictum of the Acting Prime Minister, and in line with his and another such dictum has gone west, as far west in this country as they could go. They had landed in a logging camp, and had been given jobs. About a week later they were laid off because of the fire season. They had paid their fare there and their fare out. They had paid for their logging boots and other necessary heavy clothing. But they were going to land in Vancouver broke through no fault of their own but rather as the result of their initiative in going to that rather remote part of our country. I doubt very much if those men would receive any help under our present unemployment insurance plan.

If the insurance principle is valid, and if the government is prepared to admit that it is, then I suggest that the time has come to bring the unemployment insurance plan in line with what is the generally accepted concept of insurance coverage. If I take out a life insurance policy this evening and through some misfortune I am not living tomorrow morning, I expect that my wife will be covered by the benefits provided by that plan. I suggest to the Minister of Labour and the government that the time has come when there should be no question in the house and in the minds of the people of Canada about the acceptance of the principle that unemployment insurance should provide such coverage that if a man goes to work and makes only one contribution, he will have become insured and will be able to enjoy the protection of the plan if through no fault of his own he no longer has a job. That is the kind of change in our present unemployment insurance scheme which, while not offering a solution to the unemployment problem, undoubtedly would alleviate much of the distress existing in the country today concerning which the amendment proposed by this group suggests that there should be some action.

I respect the concern of the Minister of Labour, who is responsible for the administration of the unemployment insurance fund, that the fund should be maintained in a sound position. I think there can be no quarrel with that, but I suggest that the amount of between $900 million and $1 billion now in the fund represents a sufficient cushion to enable the government to make the necessary adjustments and establish a basis which will give greater coverage under an actuarially sound plan. If the predictions of the Acting Prime Minister prove to be correct and the various things he has outlined do produce relatively full employment during the coming year, I suggest that is all the more reason why such a change should be made in the unemployment insurance plan at the present time. If his predictions do not prove to be correct, then I would suggest that again is all the more reason the government should make haste to make adjustments which will provide the proper kind of protection for all people who become unemployed. People who are not covered and people whose benefits are running out need, more than any others, to be brought under the umbrella of a comprehensive insurance plan.

However, even if that kind of change is made in our unemployment insurance scheme it still will not cover much of the unemployment existing in the country today. The plan will still leave protection against unemployment and the problems arising therefrom unprovided in many respects. It will cover seasonal unemployment, frictional unemployment, any unemployment of a relatively temporary nature, but will still leave uncovered all those who become unemployed on a more permanent basis through changes in market demands.

According to statements made from the government benches, the textile and farm implement industries are good examples of industries faced with such a situation. As the Acting Prime Minister said, he sees no prospect of all the people who were employed in the farm implement industry being re-employed. The plan will still leave uncovered people who become unemployed through various technological advances. In this respect I suggest that the situation of the coal miners of the country is a good illustration of what is happening. It still leaves uncovered those who become unemployed through depletion of our natural resources, such as our mines and forests.

I remember a number of years ago a friend telling me that he had walked out of a certain community in British Columbia leaving twelve houses and a steam laundry. He was at that time a man in his middle years, and had to walk away and leave what represented half a lifetime of industry and thrift on his part. Following that, in his middle years he was engaged as a labourer, with no possibility of ever again accumulating the sort of protection for his old age which he had thought he was building up. And if he had been living today—he is not—I am quite sure he would be having to subsist on $40 or $50 a month from an old age pension.

All-wise captains of private industry move in and establish industries. People come flocking to them in good faith, expecting to be able to fill jobs. They build homes and establish communities. In their financial calculations these industries make provision for the depreciation of plant and the depletion of resources, all of which are deductible for income tax purposes. In many cases these plants during a period of adverse market conditions can be placed on a caretaker basis for an indefinite period of time, or can be operated on a restricted scale.

I know that in the section of the country in which I live, for the last number of years industrial plants have been operating to capacity on a two or three shift basis. Overnight that picture could change to a point where half that community would be cut off, simply by a decision that it was necessary to reduce the operation to a single shift basis.

In all of this no provision is made for the protection of the workingman's only capital asset, which is his labour. I would suggest that that is a capital asset which cannot be put in mothballs, like a navy waiting for another war. When a man's labour ceases to bring in returns, everything depending upon it must go by the board. People have simply to walk away from a lifetime of work, leaving everything to rot or in the hands of financial wolves who are only too ready to move in when circumstances of that kind develop.

I suggest it is time to do something more than review our unemployment insurance plan. It is time for the government, in line with its acceptance of the validity of the insurance principle, to launch a new insurance plan, one which I would call re-establishment insurance. This plan would cover those people the Acting Prime Minister has advised to go elsewhere to seek work. It would insure them against the loss of their homes, and against having to walk away and simply leave behind everything they have accumulated over a period of years. It would be a plan which would cover retraining these people in another industry, so they might continue to enjoy a level of income comparable with that which they had in the industry from which they had been squeezed out. It would also cover those workers who have reached advanced years. While they might not yet have reached the point where they were eligible for old age pensions or benefits of that kind, it would cover their enforced retirement so they could continue living on a decent scale.

A short time ago the government had no hesitation in introducing a provision in a bill to insure mortgages. I suggest there are circumstances in which things more important than mortgages should be insured. To my mind it would be more important to provide insurance which would act as a guarantee of stability for the individual worker, so that he would not have to sacrifice all that he had spent years working for.

If the government agrees with the insurance principle, then I say here is a field into which it could enter at the present time. There is very little quarrel in Canada over the fact that plans which in effect were a form of insurance were made for the re-establishment of veterans returning from the last war. Generally speaking that procedure was acceptable to the people of Canada. It was considered sound and valid, and all across the country we have seen beneficial results flowing from it.

I see no reason why some expert study should not make it possible to work out a plan on an actuarially sound basis which would provide a similar kind of insurance for people who have been displaced in industry because of technological change, changes in trade policies of the government, activities of competitive industries in other countries, or any of those other things which are certainly far beyond the control of the individual working man. Without trying to go into detail as to how it could be worked out actuarially, I suggest such a plan could be financed at least in part by a depletion allowance taken from industries when they are created, such sums to be paid into a public reserve fund instead of a private fund, in the manner in which funds for the depreciation of plant and the depletion of natural resources are allocated.

What I have been saying is in line with the one point upon which I was pleased to note the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the Acting Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance seemed to be in complete agreement, and that was that unemployment was important even to one unemployed person, in so far as that individual himself was concerned. In the light of statements made by various ministers in which they have set forth in general terms the manner in which they are willing to act, I suggest the matters I have brought to the attention of the house are such as to merit serious consideration by the government at this time.

If nothing else is accomplished in this debate, I would hope that it would result in the government bringing forward some concrete proposals which at least would insure the people against unemployment, even though it would appear that the government is not prepared to do anything to prevent this situation developing.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—APPROVAL OF REPORT CONCERNING PARLIAMENTARY LIBRARY EMPLOYEES

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the house will have noticed that on Monday the Speaker laid before the house a report of the civil service commission with respect to the revision of salaries in the parliamentary library. By leave of the house, therefore, I should like to move:

That the report of the civil service commission respecting revisions in the salary ranges of certain employees of the library of parliament, laid upon the table of the house, Monday, February 22, 1954, be now approved.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—BASIC PENSION

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has the government given consideration to the request of the retired Canadian National Railways veterans association for an increase to retired employees of the Canadian National Railways who are receiving only the basic pension of $25 per month?
2. If so, has a decision been made as to whether legislation will be introduced at the present session to provide for such increase?

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to answer this orally, if I may. The question is of the same nature as that asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) first in November last and again in January. On both occasions he agreed to withdraw his question on the understanding that he would renew it at the time certain statistical data he was also requesting would be ready, which will probably not be for some weeks yet.

The request of the retired Canadian National Railways veterans association for an increase in the basic pension granted to retired employees of the Canadian National Railways has been received, but there has been no change in the position since it was fully discussed in the house and in the railways and shipping committee in 1952.

ARMED FORCES—OFFICERS RELEASED

Mr. Harkness:

1. How many officers of the Royal Canadian Navy have been released, or have been given notice during the past year that they will be released, because there is a surplus in their rank to the authorized establishment?

Questions

2. Have similar releases, or notices of release of officers taken place in the Canadian army and in the Royal Canadian Air Force? If so, what are the numbers?

3. What are the ranks in which this action has been taken, and how many officers are affected in each rank?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. None.

2. No.

3. Not applicable.

BRITISH EMPIRE GAMES—BROADCASTING

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation entered into a contract to broadcast the British Empire games to be held in Vancouver this summer?

2. If so, what is the price to be paid?

Mr. McCann:

1. Yes. The franchise covers world rights for sound radio, television, and motion picture coverage.

2. $50,000.

CANADIAN NAVY—"WAR AT SEA"

Mr. Fulton:

1. Did the Department of National Defence expend any funds for the purpose of securing any coverage of the role played by the Royal Canadian Navy in world war II, in the Columbia Broadcasting System production "War at Sea"?

2. Did this production deal mainly with the role of the United States navy?

3. How much was paid to secure mention of the role of the Royal Canadian Navy?

4. Approximately what percentage of the total coverage of the production was devoted to the Royal Canadian Navy?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. No. In co-operation with the United States navy, the National Broadcasting Company produced a film, "Victory at Sea", dealing principally with the role of the United States navy. It is understood that 14 other nations, including Canada, were asked to contribute film records of the work of their navies. To meet this request in behalf of an allied power, selected film from the library of the national film board was made available and some of this was used. The cost of this film of $1,651.22 was paid by the Department of National Defence.

2. Yes.

3. Nothing.

4. Approximately 2 per cent to 4 per cent.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—EMPIRE GAMES

Mr. Fulton:

1. Did the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation enter a bid for exclusive rights to radio, television, motion picture and photographic coverage of the forthcoming British Empire games at Vancouver, or for any such rights?

[Mr. Harkness.]

2. If so, was the bid wholly or partly successful?

3. What are the particulars of the successful portion or portions, and the amounts involved?

4. If a tender was entered as to motion picture or photographic rights, on what basis was it decided that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should interest itself in this field, and how is it proposed to handle these rights?

5. If no bid was entered for motion picture or photographic rights as such, will the effect of such rights as have been granted be to exclude any other person or concern from obtaining the right to take motion pictures or photographs of the games for commercial use?

Mr. McCann:

1. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation first entered a bid for the right to broadcast the British Empire games by sound and television. It later found that sale of inclusive world rights for radio, television and motion picture coverage in one unit was being considered, and it felt it should bid for this in competition with private advertising interests in order to assure good sound and television broadcasting coverage in Canada and other commonwealth countries. The latter bid for this at $50,000 was successful. The franchise of the corporation does not include rights for news coverage. It does include still photographs for use in conjunction with television and theatrical exhibition. Parties interested in motion picture coverage can apply to the corporation.

2, 3, 4 and 5. See answer to No. 1.

DOMINION BONDS PURCHASED BY U.S. CITIZENS

Mr. Quelch:

What is the amount of dominion bonds purchased by American citizens non-resident in Canada, in each of the years from 1946 to 1953?

Mr. Dickey:

Detailed information not available as requested but the annual changes in holdings by United States residents of government of Canada direct funded debt are estimated as follows:

(Millions of dollars)

1946	+ 19
1947	— 36
1948	+110
1949	+ 69
1950	+165
1951	—122
1952	—140
1953	—130

(preliminary)

These changes reflect international trading in outstanding issues, sales of new issues, and retirements, as well as estimated effects of migration, inheritances, etc.

Questions

WHEAT PRICES, LIVERPOOL AND FORT WILLIAM

Mr. Thatcher:

1. What was the date of the last sale of No. 1 northern wheat on the Liverpool grain exchange?
2. What was the price per bushel of this wheat sale?
3. On the same date, what price was the Canadian wheat board offering to sell No. 1 northern wheat f.o.b. Fort William?

Mr. Dickey:

1. As the Canadian wheat board does not sell wheat on the Liverpool grain exchange, the government has no knowledge as to the date of the last sale of No. 1 northern wheat on the Liverpool grain exchange.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. See answer to No. 1.

BRITISH EMPIRE GAMES—BROADCASTING

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Will private radio broadcasting companies be permitted by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to broadcast from the British Empire games in Vancouver during the coming summer?
2. If so, will actuality broadcasts or descriptions of the games recorded on tape require specific permission from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation before the same can be put on the air?
3. If live broadcasts by private radio are commercially sponsored, will payment be asked for by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?
4. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation any plans whereby it can recover or be reimbursed for the price paid, or obligated to be paid, by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the British Empire games committee?
5. If so, how much of the said contract price does the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation expect to recover, and by what means?
6. To what extent will routine newspaper coverage of the games be restricted or affected by the terms of the contract between the British Empire games committee and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. McCann:

1. Yes, on a sustaining basis subject to prior permission from the corporation in order to co-ordinate use of facilities.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

5. The corporation expects to recover part of the contract price through payments from other broadcasting, film and commercial interests. The amount cannot yet be determined.

6. Routine newspaper coverage will not be affected at all.

WEST KILDONAN, MANITOBA, SUB-POST OFFICES

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. Have any changes taken place this year in sub-post offices in West Kildonan?
2. If so, what changes and who were the applicants for a sub-post office?
3. Were petitions presented to the department advocating any particular location for a sub-post office?
4. If so, on whose behalf were such petitions signed?
5. How many signatures were there on the petitions?
6. Was the final decision made as to any changes, in Ottawa or Winnipeg?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare):

1. Yes.

2. Winnipeg-Kildonan West was moved to another site with a new sub-postmaster following the resignation of the previous incumbent.

The applicants were:

Myron Hunter (Hrankowski), 1785 Main St.; A. E. Beek, 1757 Main St.; W. R. Gunn, 1839 Main St.

3 and 4. Yes—favouring Beeks Pharmacy, 1757 Main St.

5. 109.

6. Ottawa.

BUTTER PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION

Mr. Boisvert:

1. What was the production of butter in Canada, by provinces, for the following years: 1950, 1951, 1952 and 1953?
2. What was the consumption of butter per capita in Canada, during the same years?

Mr. Dickey:

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BENEFITS TO THE BLIND

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many persons, by provinces, are in receipt of pensions under the provisions of the Blind Persons Act?
2. What is the average monthly payment, by provinces, being made under the provisions of the Blind Persons Act?
3. Are any persons 70 years of age or over in receipt of pensions under the provisions of the Blind Persons Act?
4. How many blind persons are in receipt of pensions under the provisions of the Old Age Security Act?
5. How many persons in receipt of pensions for blindness, under the provisions of the former old age pensions act, as at December 31, 1951, have been transferred to pensions under the provisions of the Old Age Security Act?
6. Are any benefits or provisions accorded by federal legislation to blind persons under 70 years of age, other than the means test pension under the provisions of the Blind Persons Act?
7. Are any benefits or provisions accorded by federal legislation to blind persons 70 years of age or over, other than the $40 pension under the provisions of the Old Age Security Act?

CANADIAN INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. Pouliot:

1. What is the total amount of the assets and investments of the life insurance companies in Canada?
2. To what extent did they co-operate with the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to provide loans for housing?
3. What is the total amount of the assets and investments of the fire insurance companies in Canada?

[Mr. Green.]

4. To what extent did they co-operate with the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to provide loans for housing?

EXPERIMENTAL STATIONS, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Kickham:

How much money has been spent by the federal government in Prince Edward Island since 1946 in connection with the experimental station at Charlottetown and other illustrative stations in the province, including rentals and salaries of personnel?

FLUORSPAR IMPORTS

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac):

1. From what countries does Canada import fluorspar?
2. What was the total amount (a) by tons; (b) by dollars, of fluorspar imported into Canada from each of these countries, during the years 1948 to 1953 inclusive?
3. What was the rate of duty on fluorspar?

TALC IMPORTS

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac):

1. From what countries does Canada import talc?
2. What was the total amount (a) by tons; (b) by dollars, of talc imported into Canada from each of these countries, during the years 1948 to 1953 inclusive?
3. What was the rate of duty on talc?

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What are the unemployment figures in Canada for each year since 1929?
2. What sums were paid out from the federal treasury in unemployment relief each year from 1929 until the inauguration of the Unemployment Insurance Act?
3. What sums have been paid out annually in unemployment insurance benefits since the inauguration of the scheme?

2. What was the total value of liquor sales in Canada in 1953?

MOTOR VEHICLES—TAXES

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

How much was collected by the government in the year 1953, by provinces, from (a) sales tax on motor vehicles; (b) excise tax on motor vehicles; (c) customs duty on motor vehicles?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS, P.E.I.

Mr. Kickham:

How much money was paid out in the province of Prince Edward Island since 1946 in connection with unemployment insurance benefits, including administration, rentals and salaries of personnel?

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE EFFECTS OF DIVERSION AT CHICAGO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. If the legislation recently passed by the House of Representatives in the United States permitting Chicago to make a water diversion from the St. Lawrence watershed becomes law and is acted upon, will it prejudice the seaway or power projects?

Mr. Speaker: That is a hypothetical question, and it is not in order to ask such questions. There would be no point to the question if the legislation contemplated does not pass. I would imagine that if the legislation had been passed the hon. member could ask what would be its effect, but the hon. member is basing his question upon the possibility of the legislation passing.

Mr. Green: If I may point out to Your Honour, I believe that Canada has made strong representations against this legislation. It is a very urgent matter and time is of the essence. I would ask that the minister be allowed to answer the question which is of great importance to Canada.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Ask the question.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister feels that he can comment upon it, all right; I leave it to him.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I agree fully that the question is based upon what is likely to happen in congress, and whether or not congress does approve of the application for the diversion of certain waters. I would hesitate to make any comment upon it, but should congress approve of the diversion, against which Canada has protested very vigorously through the office of the minister of external affairs, I would say that I am informed that it would have some effect on power but little effect on navigation.

When one realizes that the application is for the diversion of 1,000 c.f.s. for a trial period of three years and the present flow in this month of the year is 240,000 c.f.s., one can make a calculation as to just what the effect will be. The engineers inform me that from the point of view of power it will mean a loss of 31,000 horsepower to Canada, about one-half of it at Niagara, and it will have a slight effect in lowering the levels. To answer the hon. member's question, in so far as what the prejudicial effect may be upon the St. Lawrence seaway is concerned, I would say that it will reduce power to the extent that I have mentioned but would have little effect upon the navigational features of the St. Lawrence seaway.

INQUIRY AS TO LITIGATION IN UNITED STATES COURTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. A. Enfield (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he tell us the present status of the litigation in the United States courts regarding the licensing of the power authority of the state of New York as federal agent to carry out the power phase of the St. Lawrence seaway project? Can he also give us a reliable estimate as to when the final judgment of the United States courts will be rendered?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to send me notice of his intention to ask this question. It is rather difficult for me to answer, because when one attempts to say with any degree of reliability when a judgment is likely to be handed down in one's own country the answer is difficult to give. But when it has to do with another country it is even more difficult.

However, in order to assist the hon. member, perhaps I can say that the licence which was applied for by the power authority of the state of New York to the federal power commission has been granted. From this grant there was an appeal by three different groups to the court of appeals of the district of Columbia at Washington and three appeals have been dismissed by that court. One of the appellants has since withdrawn from the case but there is a period of 90 days for appeal by the two remaining parties from the court of appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States. The period of 90 days runs from February 19. I am afraid I cannot enlighten the hon. member further except to say that I hope there will be a rapid and favourable disposal of the case by the court of last analysis.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

OPPOSITION BY INDIA TO UNITED STATES SUPPLYING ARMS TO PAKISTAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I addressed a question to the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) which I think should more properly have been addressed to the minister of external affairs. Because of the very conflicting reports of the matter to which I referred I should like to ask him now whether or not the newspaper reports are correct that the Prime Minister will deal with India's opposition to reported plans of the United States to supply arms to Pakistan. I added, as reported on page 2301 of Hansard:

> In view of remarks also attributed to the Prime Minister in Pakistan, will the government inform the house of its policy about a matter which is causing concern to friends of both India and Pakistan.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion in the press statement that the Prime Minister had dealt with or was intending to deal with this matter of United States aid to Pakistan, in the sense that he was intervening in discussions in Karachi or New Delhi, is inaccurate. It is quite true that he has had talks at New Delhi and Pakistan with members of those governments, and in the course of these talks that subject may well have arisen. But it is certainly not the intention of the Prime Minister to deal with it in any way which would constitute intervention in this matter.

ALLEGED STATEMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I direct another question to the minister of external affairs, and I do this because of the interest which has been raised by the questions asked earlier. The suggestion has been made that the minister pledged Canadian help to the United States in the event of war. He is reported to have said:

> We range ourselves on the side of freedom, under the leadership of the United States of America.

I have now read the minister's speech and I think it would be well if he would elucidate the report.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this morning I sent a copy of the statement in question to my hon. friend and also to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) who had expressed interest in this matter. I think that in reading the text those hon. members will feel, as I do, that there was nothing in that speech which would justify the interpretation given to it by certain press accounts. To make that quite clear I think possibly I had better put on the record the last paragraphs of this statement as so much attention seems to have been devoted to it. I said in the statement which I made at Rollins College, Florida:

> You will find Canada no automatic "yes man" but a staunch and loyal friend, especially in time of difficulty.

I went on to give some evidence of that in peace and war, and then I finished my statement as follows:

> Canada is a young country, crying out for development; a country of vast distances, expensive and difficult to govern and to administer. Hers is not a determining voice when the big international decisions are to be made, nor will her contribution be decisive in the conference room or where the conflict rages. It might therefore be tempting to try to stand aside in any struggle between the giants and excuse that course by arguing that those who call the tune should pay the piper.
> But that is not the way we feel about it. The conflict today is not between empires, or between one super-power and another, but between freedom and slavery, despotism and democracy, right and wrong. So we range ourselves on the side of freedom, under the leadership of the United States of America, and we will play, I hope, a good part in the long and unending fight for peace and a decent world.

[Later:]

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At what time did this government decide that the United States had taken the place of Great Britain as the leading nation in the struggle for freedom?

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO OBSERVER AT INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF FARM ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): May I direct a question to the right hon. Minister of Agriculture. Does the government have a representative or an observer at the international conference of farm organizations presently meeting in Washington and, if so, would the minister care to make a statement on the matter?

Right. Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The answer to the question is no, but I might enlarge upon it by saying that Mr. Hannam did inform me some time before the meeting that it was going to be held and that they would be represented in Washington. At no time was any suggestion made that the government should be represented. I think the reason is obvious. If that meeting decides upon anything, no doubt representations will be made to the governments at Washington and here, so I doubt if it would be appropriate for us to be represented there.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Could the Minister of Public Works advise when the government expects to be able to announce the interest rate to be charged on National Housing Act mortgages?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): It will be necessary first of all to have the bill passed and I would hope that that could be done at the earliest possible date.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

ALLUMETTE ISLAND-PEMBROKE BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Proudfoot (Pontiac-Timiskaming): Is the Minister of Public Works in a position to table copies of correspondence exchanged between the provincial governments of Ontario and Quebec and the federal government relative to the proposed Allumette island-Pembroke bridge, which was passed as an order for return last December 7?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): The house will recall that this motion was passed subject to the reservation that it would be necessary to obtain the consent of the provincial governments concerned. We have that consent from the government of Ontario but have not yet received it from the government of Quebec.

Mr. Proudfoot: Could the minister say just what correspondence he has had with Quebec? Was it by letter or telegram?

Mr. Winters: I dispatched several communications. I wrote the minister of highways, Mr. Talbot, on December 8. He replied saying that the communication should more appropriately be directed to his colleague the minister of public works, and that he was so doing. I wrote to Mr. Lorrain on the 12th of January. I wrote to him again on February 2 and sent him a telegram on February 16, and I have no reply.

Mr. Proudfoot: Pending receipt of the necessary permission from the province of Quebec, would the minister table the correspondence between the federal government and the province of Ontario pertaining to this bridge?

Mr. Winters: I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Might I ask, Mr. Speaker, to what extent this courtesy is to be extended? It seems to me that if the hon. member is to be given the reply, then in the interests of the house and the public the minister should table that return if the provincial government does not respond to this parliament's act of courtesy.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NUMBER OF PERSONS ON SHORT TIME IN TEXTILE INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Labour and I trust he will take this as notice. Has the Minister of Labour any recent information with respect to the number of persons on short time in the textile industry?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of that question.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN WEDGE CAP INSIGNIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he is yet in a position to reply to the question I asked a week ago Monday concerning the badge of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not yet in a position to reply.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT OF SUBCONTRACTOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. I did not give him notice because he does not require it. I received an urgent request from a man who subcontracted on the trans-Canada highway—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McIvor:—and he wants to be paid. I am asking the minister, to whom shall I direct his plea for payment? Is it to be directed to him or to whom?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, contracts for the trans-Canada highway are awarded by the provincial governments, and I would therefore suggest that the hon. member advise his friend to direct his plea to the provincial government.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE AUTHORIZED CAPITAL STOCK, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 295, to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, there is not much that can be added to the very full statement made by the minister in moving the resolution preceding this legislation, but perhaps it might be helpful to hon. members if I were to deal briefly with various points raised during the debate on the resolution stage.

One of the questions asked was whether the corporation would agree to insure shipments to so-called iron curtain countries, and also whether any business of this nature had been turned down. As the minister pointed out in the debate on the resolution, the main criterion which is employed by the corporation in dealing with applications for the insurance of exports is whether it can be reasonably anticipated that the purchase price of these exports will be paid on the due date.

Naturally, the corporation has to consider other matters such as the proposed terms of payment and the nature of the commodity concerned. But the important and essential consideration is whether they think in their judgment the account will be paid when due.

The corporation has insured shipments aggregating $3,800,000 to Czechoslovakia and some $600,000 to Poland. Most of the commodities covered by these figures were moved during the years 1948, 1949 and 1950. Some $138,000 was insured to China but that was prior to the establishment of the red regime. I think, Mr. Speaker, it should be emphasized once again that so far as the corporation is concerned there are no restrictions and they will insure exports to all countries. As long as an exporter can get an export permit, and as long as the sale is considered to be an insurable risk from the point of view of the corporation, there is no reason why that insurance should not be provided.

However, as the house is aware, there are other agencies of government which have the responsibility of deciding whether an export permit to iron curtain countries should be granted.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has asked if figures could be given covering the approximate amount of business outstanding at any one moment. In answer to that, Mr. Speaker, I might say that under the policies in force at December 31, 1953, the corporation had a maximum liability of about $31 million. This liability is set at 50 per cent of the total shipments an exporter expects to make during the currency of his policy, and accordingly that figure is based on anticipated exports of about $60 million. Today, as of this date, the maximum liability of the corporation under all policies in force is $37·6 million.

This figure is the maximum amount the corporation could be called upon to pay. While the corporation cannot tell what might be actually outstanding from day to day, I am advised that a reasonable guess might be that it would be somewhere in the order of $15 million. In other words, that is the amount the corporation might have to pay out in claims today if all the outstanding accounts with respect to all commodities and to all countries were to go bad at once. The provision of the additional capital proposed in the present bill will enable the corporation to insure additional exports even where the concentration of risk in individual countries is greater than it can handle under the present capitalization.

In looking at the volume of business the corporation has covered in relation to Canada's total exports, it should not be forgotten that the corporation does not generally insure exports to the United States of America. There is a private insurance company which insures credit risks on shipments between Canada and the United States. It is for that reason that the corporation does not generally insure exports to that country. For this reason two-thirds of Canada's total exports are not eligible for insurance under the corporation. Similarly, many of Canada's major exports such as wheat, newsprint and metal are sold on a cash basis, and accordingly no insurance is required.

Some time ago the corporation made a detailed analysis of the maximum volume of business that they might reasonably hope to do, and the conclusion at which they arrived was that at that time they were covering approximately 50 per cent of the available business. A few weeks ago the corporation had serious inquiries on hand for insurance covering prospective sales of capital goods totalling some $110 million to several countries. Of this total, $9 million has already materialized; that has occurred in a period of about two weeks. This is export business that the manufacturers would not have taken themselves had the facilities of the corporation not been available to protect them against the possibility of non-payment by the foreign purchaser.

I think it should be reiterated, Mr. Speaker, that there are no private insurance companies anywhere in the world carrying on the type of business done by the corporation. In other countries where similar insurance protection is provided, it is invariably done through the medium of a government department, a government-owned company or a company with direct government backing.

I should like to advise hon. members that at the committee stage an additional amendment will be proposed. It is an amendment which is consequential upon the amendments contained in the printed bill. I will explain it more fully at the committee stage.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the parliamentary assistant for the statement which he has made. If my memory serves me correctly, it covered practically all of the questions asked at the resolution stage except the one with regard to the Ming Sung affair. Perhaps that matter can be raised when we get into committee again.

As I think I pointed out the other day, this corporation was brought into existence with the approbation, I think, of everyone in the house and with high hopes for its success. I think it is fair to say that it has succeeded. It has had the advantage of some able and senior civil servants at the head of it as executive officers. It has also had the advantage of the advice of the board which has included a wide range of businessmen. Further, I think it is fair to say—as the parliamentary assistant has already said—that it has covered a field which is not covered by private enterprise because of the unpredictable risks which are involved.

The parliamentary assistant has explained that a good deal of the export business is not subject to insurance because it is done on a cash basis. He has also explained that exports to the United States are not included. That statement goes far to explain what would otherwise be a disappointing total. When I first heard the total of $235 million or thereabouts, as the statement of the business over the years, I was disappointed. But when one takes these other matters into account, I think the disappointment is inclined to be less. It is perhaps more disappointing that the business has actually been shrinking in the last three years. The rough figures are as follows, beginning with 1949. In 1949 the total was $36 million; 1950, $33 million; 1951, $49 million and 1952, $36 million; and for the first eight months of 1953, $15 million or just over $20 million for the year. I take it that the simple explanation of that shrinkage, particularly in 1953, is that our exports to the countries where the business was being done are substantially down. For example, if you look at Latin America, where a good deal of the insuring was done, the figures are as follows: In 1950, the total was $12 million; in 1951, $17 million; in 1952, $15 million and in 1953, for eight months, $8 million.

One might have thought that with business showing a shrinkage and not an expansion, it would be rather unnatural to come and ask for additional capital. But on that point the minister the other day gave an explanation from which I should like to read briefly because I think it is important that we should have that point covered. I think the minister has covered it. In the debate the other day, as reported at page 2218 of Hansard, the minister said:

> In considering applications for insurance the board must exercise reasonable prudence, and it feels it cannot take on liabilities in any one foreign country which may be excessive in relation to its capital. Accordingly the present capital limits the corporation's effective scope particularly because today's pattern of sales of agricultural equipment and capital goods such as locomotives tends to concentrate large sums at risk in individual countries. While it is not practicable to determine the precise extent to which the corporation should commit itself in any one market, as an example the corporation was recently asked to consider a program involving several million dollars in one country on normal payment terms. But it was already committed in that country to the extent of about $5 million. This additional business would obviously involve too great a concentration of risk in relation to its $10 million capital. And yet it is this type of business which the corporation was originally set up to encourage.

I remark again in passing that the figures of the corporation do not include the Ming Sung transaction, which was under part II of the legislation and which was carried out by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) with no relation whatever to the operations of the Export Credits Insurance Act.

One point on which I should like to make a few comments was raised the other day. I refer to trade beyond the iron curtain with respect to which the minister answered a question and which the parliamentary assistant has also mentioned. In answer to a question on that point the minister said, as recorded at page 2170 of Hansard of February 17:

> Trade between Canada and any country behind the iron curtain is carried on subject to permit. In other words a permit must be issued by my department for any transaction concerning exports to those countries. There has never been any prohibition against trade in certain commodities, while there is a definite prohibition against trade in commodities that are on the restricted list. I refer to strategic materials. Subject to that reservation, if any Canadian merchants can arrange trade with Soviet Russia, his application will be considered by the department.

Further on he said:

. . . the government will be glad to consider the nature of the transaction and either to issue a permit or not do so, as the circumstances warrant.

I am not going to dwell on the matter of strategic materials. I suppose if you want to press the definition to the utmost you can argue that almost anything is a strategic material to the extent that it helps the economy of the importing country. But I am not going to pursue that at the moment. As to the general desirability of trade beyond the iron curtain, it seems to me in the broad that if there are any genuine signs of wanting to trade we should be responsive to them, and I emphasize the word "genuine". It does not seem to me there is much hope for peace and a quiet life as long as our chief joint occupations with people beyond the iron curtain are to make faces at each other and listen while they call us names.

Therefore I say that we should trade when there are genuine opportunities. However, on that point there is a great deal of room for uncertainty, and as I think the matter important I want to put on the record one or two short statements from London which I have run across and which seem sensible to me on this point. I read them into the record for two reasons, first of all because I think we should not allow ourselves to exaggerate the possibilities of this trade, and second, because I think it is desirable to have on the record what has been and what apparently is the attitude of business and government in Great Britain inasmuch as there have been rather loose statements made as to the attitude of the United Kingdom and perhaps other European countries towards trade beyond the iron curtain. I wish to read briefly first from an article which appeared recently in the Daily Telegraph of London. It is by David Floyd, who is the Daily Telegraph special correspondent on communist affairs. He has this to say:

The steady post-war decline in the volume of trade between east and west probably slowed down during 1953, although precise figures are not yet available. We know that the Soviet government, having appeared in a more reasonable frame of mind at the Geneva conference on east-west trade in April last year, concluded a series of bilateral trading agreements with eleven non-communist countries including Iran, France, Sweden, Greece, Argentina, Italy and Egypt.

Dr. Gunnar Myrdal, the director of the economic commission for Europe and an untiring advocate of east-west trade, is about to leave for Moscow, convinced that the Russians are genuinely anxious to extend trade. It is reported that the Soviet government is prepared to allow a group of British businessmen to visit Moscow privately, without the help of communist sponsored "promotion committees".

Further on in the same article he says:

Interested propaganda of the left would have us believe that the countries of the Soviet bloc and communist China represent vast and ever-expanding markets for the products of western manufacturers and an inexhaustible source of much-needed foodstuffs and raw materials. This is far from the truth. Even before the last war, the countries which now constitute the Soviet bloc accounted for less than 3 per cent of total British exports and for only 5 per cent of our imports.

After the war, but before the Labour government imposed restrictions on the export of strategic goods in April, 1949, the relative importance of this trade declined still further. In 1948 the communist countries took only just over one per cent of British exports and provided only 2½ per cent of our imports. Direct trade with China declined to about half its pre-war level, although there was some increase in our exports to Hong Kong.

Later he says:

Explaining this policy—

That is to say, Soviet policy.

—in the pages of the official journal of the Soviet ministry of foreign trade, Mr. B. Vaganov said:

"The establishment of a monopoly in foreign trade prevents the formation of contacts between the capitalist elements, still to be found in the countries of people's democracy, and international capital . . . At the same time, the concentration of foreign trade in the hands of the state guarantees the countries of people's democracy the possibility of conducting a successful battle against the hostile foreign trade policy of the capitalist countries."

Again, he says:

We saw in 1948 how, in a matter of weeks, it was possible for the Kremlin to bring all trade between eastern Europe and Yugoslavia to a halt as part of the campaign to bring Marshal Tito to his knees. Politics always take precedence over economics, as in 1947, when the Kremlin forced its satellites to reject the offer of Marshall aid, despite their crying needs. The danger of becoming too deeply involved with such a totalitarian economic empire is obvious.

Finally, I quote:

It is certainly not the Soviet government's intention to allow trade with the west to rise to more than a marginal amount of the eastern bloc's foreign trade. Nor are there any signs that it proposes to let such trade interfere with the steady integration of the satellite economies with its own.

I should like to read a word or two from the report of the East-West trade panel of the federation of British industries. It is very much along the lines of what I have just read but I think it is worth putting on the record as a statement of the feeling of British industry. It reads:

Summarizing our conclusions, we are of the opinion:

(i) that trade with countries of the eastern bloc is likely permanently to offer fewer opportunities than before the war, and that trade with China has only modest scope for expansion on account of her limited capacity as an exporter and earner of sterling coupled with the reduced market for Chinese exports;

(ii) that such opportunities of east-west trade as exist in non-strategic goods should, nevertheless, be pursued without any inhibitions arising from political considerations;

(iii) that members of the federation in their dealings with Russia, countries of the eastern bloc, and China, should avoid panels which are likely to turn matters of commerce pure and simple to account for the purposes of communist political propaganda.

I should like to give a further quotation to explain the last point. They say:

Since the Moscow economic conference in April, 1952, there have come into prominence a number of bodies, including the British council for the promotion of international trade which, it has been stated by the president of the board of trade, and more recently by the foreign secretary, have as their object the furtherance in the economic sphere of the general purposes of communist propaganda in the cold war.

I have taken the time of the house to put these statements on the record because it seems to me that they are relevant, having regard to the discussions of trade beyond the iron curtain, concerning which we are hearing a good deal now.

In view of the record of the corporation, despite the recent shrinkage in its operations, and in view of the explanation given by the minister and the parliamentary assistant, I think that this measure is worthy of support.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Agent of Her Majesty.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to say a word on this, Mr. Chairman. We are glad to support this bill, attempting as it does to strengthen the Export Credits Insurance Act. We understand that the purpose of this legislation is to make possible trade which otherwise might not have taken place. We believe that it is good for the economy of Canada, that it is good for the well-being of the whole world, to free the channels of trade. In pursuit of that purpose, we are glad to see legislation of this kind on the statute books.

Perhaps what I have said goes without saying, but I felt I should like to say not only that but to welcome the remarks that were made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Greenwood. He was, if I may so put it, echoing in part at least the view expressed a few days ago by my colleague the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. If the principle is a valid one that trade is good for our own economy, and that it is good for the world not to have sections of it isolated from other sections, I think it follows that trade with any country should be encouraged without too much fear of the political colour of any particular country. I was glad to hear the statement made by the hon. member for Greenwood. I hope, if there is a genuine effort on the part of the Soviet union or other countries associated with that country to develop trade with us, that we will pursue any such efforts as effectively as it is possible to do.

At the same time, might I offer this suggestion to the minister and to the government? The purpose of this legislation is to make possible trade which otherwise might not have taken place. He has indicated that this has nothing to do with trade with the United States. Nevertheless, I hope that while the minister is being concerned about trade with other countries he will not overlook the importance to our economy of trade back and forth with the United States. I hope he may pay some attention to some of the things that are happening in the department of his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue. It seems to me that steps are being taken there which interfere with trade with that country, and that seems to me to be in the opposite direction to the aim of the legislation which is now before us. I for one do not like departmental or administrative interference with trade with that country.

Mr. Henderson: I should like to say a few words in favour of the purpose of this bill. I should like to congratulate the minister and the staff that administers this act upon the fine co-operation and work they have done in order to encourage trade at this time throughout the world, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned. Probably we could best realize the benefits of this bill if we examined the operations of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation.

From the commencement of operations in 1945 to the end of 1952 the corporation paid claims of $1,702,704. The recoveries amounted to $592,000, while irrecoverable losses totalled $18,000, leaving a net outstanding of $1,092,000. As to whether or not the work of the corporation is increasing, it might be noticed that at December 31, 1952, there were 180 policies in force as against 168 on December 31, 1951. This leads us to believe there is more need for this corporation. The policies in 1952 were divided as follows: general commodity policies, $55 million and capital goods policies $1,800,000. This is trade which, under normal circumstances, Canadian exporters would not have had because, as the parliamentary assistant has stated, there are no private insurance companies that would underwrite the risks involved.

I believe that if we analyse the operations of this corporation during 1952, the year for which we have a report, we will find that there were twenty commonwealth countries dealt with by way of trade in an amount of some $9 million, and sixty-three foreign countries dealt with in the amount of some $26 million. I believe those facts bring great credit to our government, to the minister and to those who administer the corporation. This provision will enable us to encourage our exporters to trade with other countries, and trade with safety.

Mr. Macdonnell: I asked the minister the other day about the position of the Ming Sung company, and my recollection is that he said he would advise us on second reading.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The original amount of the loan, Mr. Chairman, was $12,750,000, with interest at 3 per cent. It was to be repaid in ten equal instalments beginning on January 30, 1951. The first payment of $26,855.22 was made in 1950. Interest payments were kept up until the middle of 1951, whereupon this government started to pay the banks interest and principal, and interest on interest. This latter payment was due to the lapse of time involved in ascertaining whether the Chinese were going to pay.

The balance outstanding of principal, to which has been added the interest, is $12,723,-174.78. I may say that the government regards this as possibly recoverable. The boats are still in existence and there have been some approaches which lead us to believe that those now in possession would value a good title. While I am not promising the house that the amount due will be collected, I am not saying it is a hopeless account.

Mr. Macdonnell: Have the ships, at the moment, just been confiscated by the Chinese government or do we know who purports to own them?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They were taken over and are being operated by the Chinese government. They can only be operated in Chinese waters because if they come out of Chinese waters they will be seized.

Mr. Pearkes: Might I ask whether the transactions which are now taking place, the transfer of Canadian vessels to foreign flags, will be under this corporation? Will this corporation make any guarantee?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, there is no cash involved in such transfers; it is simply a transfer of registration. This corporation has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Green: Are these Ming Sung ships still flying the Canadian flag?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have not seen them; I could not tell you, but I think it is very unlikely.

[Mr. Henderson.]

Mr. Green: Surely, some department of the government has some information concerning the ships.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The Secretary of State for External Affairs confirms my position that they are in Chinese waters, and neither of us has any informants from that area; we do not know. They may not be flying any flag at all.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does the minister not think that he should have made clear that this Ming Sung transaction had nothing to do with the officials of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation at all; it was entirely a government matter, carried out by the governor in council through the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I feel under no obligation to make that clear at all. I think it was a creditable transaction, whoever carried it out. I do not think that either the insurance company or the government expected a revolution in China at that time.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am not commenting on that at all. I am just saying that the credit or discredit does not belong to the executive officers of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation.

Mr. Green: There is discredit on somebody else's part in the government when they allowed the Chinese to fly the Canadian flag after the ships had been turned over to China.

Mr. Monteith: Can the minister tell me whether or not there is any breakdown of the type of exports made possible under this act?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Generally speaking, they are non-perishable items; that is, they are machinery or some capital item. It does not always apply, but it is usual.

Mr. Monteith: Is any percentage available at all as to the amount of farm machinery that comes under it?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, we have. This corporation has insured a very considerable value of farm machinery.

Mr. Macdonnell: On that question, it seems to me it would be of great interest if we could know whether the general impression given, indeed I think the minister strengthened it the other day, that the market for farm machinery was not any too good, is actually the fact. I am just wondering whether, in view of what he has said, and particularly what I read this afternoon as to one of the needs of new capital being to assist exports of farm machinery, he can in fact indicate the amounts, and whether they are significant in the operation of our farm machinery companies.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): On the occasion of the visit of agricultural workers I was able to point out that in that week we had guaranteed loans on agricultural implements up to $10 million. I think over the years it would easily be perhaps ten times that amount.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, as I informed the house, at this stage I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to move an amendment which is a consequential amendment on the increase in capital. As the committee will observe, in section 10 of the present act which is quoted in the explanation of clause 4 of the bill, the original capital was all to be subscribed and paid up, and in fact the present capital is all paid up. One of the main purposes of this amendment is to increase the limitation on the maximum business that the corporation can underwrite in terms of ten times the aggregate of the amount of the capital plus the surplus.

Section 14 of the act sets out this limitation, and in the act the term "paid up capital" is used. That was perfectly satisfactory and applicable when all the subscribed capital was paid up, as was the case of the original capitalization.

The proposal in this new bill is to create new capital, which will be subscribed, but not paid up. Therefore there is a consequential amendment required to section 14, substituting the words, "subscribed capital" for the word "paid-up".

Mr. Harris: I move that Bill No. 295 be amended by adding thereto the following clause:

6. Section 14 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"14. The liability of the corporation under the contracts of insurance issued and outstanding shall not at any time exceed a total of ten times the aggregate of the amount of the subscribed capital and the surplus of the corporation."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fraser (St. John's East): Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Next sitting.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Friday, February 19, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee reported progress last time we were considering clause No. 164. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: No.

On clause 164—No apparent means of support.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the minister has done some good hard thinking on this matter since it was last before the committee.

Mr. Garson: I am going to suggest to the committee that we let this clause stand in the fond hope that it will be possible for representatives of the opposition parties and myself to work out a wording which will meet the point which they have raised without in any way damaging the enforceability of this clause against vagrancy.

Perhaps I was personally at fault in that during the last debate, when it became apparent that there was a deep-rooted difference of opinion concerning certain aspects of this clause, I did not suggest earlier that it should stand. In line with the policy which I indicated when we were on second reading in relation to the disposition of these clauses in committee of the whole, I should like, where it appears when we come to similar clauses that there is a deep-seated difference of opinion, to stand them over at an early stage of the debate. Then we can come back to them later on at a specified time, when I think we can do a greater amount of justice to them in a shorter period of time than we can with the more extemporaneous debate that we had the other day. On that basis I would like to suggest that 164 stand, and that at the request of the hon. member for Prince Albert 165 should also stand.

Mr. Campbell: Before clause 165 is allowed to stand I should like to make a suggestion with regard to it if you are through with 164.

Mr. Knowles: With respect to 164, I am sure that all of us are glad to have the suggestion that this clause stand for the time being and

I dare to hope that in the meantime something can be worked out that will be satisfactory to all concerned. However, I would not want the minister to assume that we will necessarily get together, as he indicated just now. The feelings indicated last time we were dealing with this matter were pretty sharply divided. Our main concern is that there not be any law that baldly says that a person who is without money and without a job is automatically to be declared a vagrant. Perhaps I should not have said even this much if I am going to agree with the idea that the matter stand. At any rate, that is our position. We are glad to allow 164 to stand.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee agree to the arrangement outlined by the Minister of Justice, which I understand is that where a clause is called, upon which hon. members wish to speak extensively or provoke a debate, it shall be allowed to stand and that we consider at this first run through the code those clauses upon which there is no major disagreement? May I take it that that is agreed to by the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

On clause 165—Common nuisance.

Mr. Campbell: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he is considering bringing in an amendment to this clause that would prevent the pollution of interprovincial rivers.

Mr. Garson: I thought that I had made it clear on previous occasions—I certainly tried to—that we are prepared to consider whether, in the light of such facts as may be apparent from the investigation now going on into the North Saskatchewan river, this clause 165 should continue in its present form or whether those facts would make it appear that 165 is not adequate and that some amendment should be made to it in order to make it adequate. Until we get those facts I do not think anyone, no matter what his attitude may be toward amending clause 165, could really reach a proper opinion as to whether an amendment should be made or not.

Mr. Campbell: I am receiving many wires and so many letters asking me to try to get the government to bring in legislation which would protect the people in one province when pollution is taking place in another province. The minister well knows, and the house should know by this time, what the situation is in Saskatchewan. I am going to run over it briefly. Pollution of the North Saskatchewan river is taking place in Alberta.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the committee will agree with me that in a discussion of the wording of clauses of the Criminal Code, to discuss a situation existing between two provinces, and the pollution of a river, which so far as I know is not specifically referred to in the sections of the code, is not in order. I think the committee will sympathize with the Chair, as I try to sympathize with the hon. members concerned. The subject which the hon. member now proposes to discuss has been discussed in this house on the orders of the day and at other times. I ask him to agree with me that a discussion of the situation now existing on the North Saskatchewan river is not in order when we are discussing the wording of sections of the Criminal Code.

If it were in order, perhaps the hon. member would then agree with me and, if he has extensive remarks to make, abide by the agreement of the committee that the sections which are going to be the subject of long discussion should stand and not be taken up at this first reading of the code. Therefore I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks at this time to clause 165, which I understand was to be permitted to stand, and bring his remarks clearly within the purview of the code.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order, it was my understanding that the clause was to stand and the purpose of asking that it stand was to avoid discussion at this time which probably would be pointless in view of possible amendments which might be made or further explanations that might be given. While I completely sympathize with the hon. member for The Battlefords in his desire to bring to the attention of the committee conditions which have been discussed on many occasions, I feel his purpose would be much better served if we allowed the Minister of Justice to give to this section that consideration that has been promised by having the clause stand.

Mr. Campbell: If I was quite certain that the minister would bring in legislation within the next two or three weeks that would provide protection for people, I would be satisfied; but I am not sure. That assurance has not been given. To bring myself in order, I am going to move that clause 165, which comes under the heading of "nuisances"—

The Deputy Chairman: Before the hon. member reads his amendment, which I am not ruling out of order in advance, may I say that it is my understanding that there is a rule in Beauchesne that where an amendment is moved to a clause, the clause cannot stand. I draw the hon. member's attention to it without looking it up so that he will realize the position in which he is going to put himself.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if I might make a suggestion. The hon. member for The Battlefords has an amendment which he would like to propose and he understands that the minister wishes the clause to stand for further consideration. I am sure that my colleague has no objection to that. Would it not be helpful if he were permitted to read his amendment and place it on the record so that it would be there for the minister to consider along with the other points in connection with this clause that are to be considered?

The Deputy Chairman: I am in the hands of the committee. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Campbell: I shall not move the amendment but I will place it on the record so that the minister may see what the idea is behind it. I have had legal advice and I believe that if the amendment were put in the Criminal Code it would answer the purpose. My suggestion is:

That subclause (2) be renumbered as "(3)" and that the following be inserted as subclause (2):

"(2) Every one who, by himself, his agent or employee, places or discharges, or causes to be placed or discharged, or suffers to be placed or discharged, in, upon or near, springs, lakes, streams, or rivers, any industrial waste or any other polluting material of any kind whatsoever, which either by itself or in connection with other matter may corrupt or impair the quality of the water thereof in another province or render such water in such other province unfit for accustomed or ordinary use is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for two years."

An amendment of this kind would not interfere with provincial rights in connection with any river wholly within a province. I believe it would give protection where pollution, taking place in one province, does no harm to people in that province but, when it reaches the next province, creates harm to the people there. As I said, I will not try to impose my views on the committee if the minister will consider this. If the situation is not cleared up by the Alberta government in the very near future—and I think they could deal with it if they so desired—we could turn that water the other way—

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, this does show the danger of relenting. The committee was good enough to allow the hon. member to put forward the amendment which is now before us, but he is now going on and accusing people and stating that he is not satisfied the Alberta government is doing everything it can. I am precluded by the rules of debate from even answering that point, and I would suggest that this is a matter for discussion. I do not believe it is fair to suggest that one hon. member more than another is anxious to see this matter corrected. I would urge you, Mr. Chairman, to see that the hon. member is held strictly to account.

The Deputy Chairman: A point of order has been raised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I think he must be right, because his point is along the same lines as the point I raised myself. I would suggest to the hon. member for The Battlefords that since he has placed an amendment before the minister for consideration, and if it is the intention of the committee, as suggested by the minister, that clause 165 be allowed to stand, it should now stand, and when the clause is recalled for full discussion, as it must be, that will be the moment to enter into a full discussion, at which time the then chairman will have to decide whether the remarks being made are strictly in order.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I did not quite complete what I was saying. If we could reverse the flow of the river running through Edmonton for 24 hours so as to make it—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that you cannot reverse the flow of a river under the Criminal Code. Does clause 165 stand?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Clause 165 stands.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to intrude into the proceedings, at this time, the particular matter I have in mind, but I did unsuccessfully attempt to catch your eye a number of days ago on this point. I am referring to a certain matter in clause 160, subsection (c), and we seem to have moved on so quickly with other clauses that I was not able to make my point. With your permission I would like to raise it now.

The Deputy Chairman: It is not within the purview of the chairman to grant permission to revert to clause 160, which has been carried, unless the hon. member has the unanimous consent of the committee, in whose hands I am.

Mr. Garson: There is really no objection to a single instance of this kind, but if we do it for one we will have to extend the same privilege to every hon. member. We have a long, heavy, and very extensive task before us. Unless we have some order in our procedure we are not going to make very satisfactory progress. I do not think any great hardship would be caused the hon. member if he would raise this matter again when we are going back through some of the more difficult clauses, because I believe it would be better if we proceeded at the present time according to the agreed order.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I happened to be in the house when my hon. friend tried to catch the chairman's eye. I believe he was on his feet on three or four different occasions and failed to obtain a hearing. However, I do not know if there will be another opportunity.

Mr. Barnett: In order to avoid any discussion on this matter at this time, might I ask whether it would be possible to allow clause 160 to be considered as having been permitted to stand instead of carried in order that it might be brought up later on with, shall I say, the more contentious clauses. The matter I have in mind is related to questions which are covered in certain other general sections of the code which will be up for discussion at a later stage.

Mr. Garson: Might I suggest to the hon. member that if the matter he was proposing to raise, in addition to being related to clause 160, to which he has already made reference, also relates to some other clauses we have not yet come to, then he should raise it when we come to such clauses. I think he would find me very receptive if he brought the matter to me personally so that at this time we would not need to detain the whole committee to cover the point he has in mind.

Mr. Barnett: I would be agreeable to that.

On clause 166—Spreading false news.

Mr. Knowles: I wish the minister would comment on this clause. In the first place, I believe the penalty has been raised. It used to be one year, as set out in the former section 136, and the penalty is now two years. Secondly, what does the minister understand by the phrase "spreading false news?" The clause reads:

> Every one who wilfully publishes a statement, tale or news that he knows is false and that causes or is likely to cause injury or mischief to a public interest is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

Hardly a week goes by—in fact we had a point of this nature raised today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs—when someone does not raise in this house a claim that our friends of the press have misinterpreted something that was said. Does that sort of thing come under the ban of clause 166, or is there a line drawn somewhere?

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: In all these cases there is a line to be drawn. This line clearly is indicated in the clause before us. The accused must wilfully publish a tale or news that he knows is false. The crown must prove such knowledge. In the case my hon. friend refers to I imagine that those who were responsible for publishing the news would certainly deny that they knew it was false. The crown must also prove that the publication is of matter which in the language of clause 166 is "likely to cause injury or mischief to a public interest".

Mr. Knowles: What is "a public interest" in that context?

Mr. Garson: I think probably as good a way to answer that question is to cite—

Mr. Knowles: Tremeear.

Mr. Garson: —yes, Tremeear in reference to an actual case which arose, because the best test of how a section operates is to examine the way in which it has been invoked and in which it operated in a given case. The facts of this case set out in Tremeear at page 142 were these. A merchant in Alberta announced a "closing out" sale by using these words:

> I have decided to leave Canada. Americans not wanted in Canada. Investigate before buying land and taking homesteads in this country.

It was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under this clause. The news was false and wilfully published and was against the public interest, which at that time was to attract settlers to Alberta. That is a case in point.

I admit that the problem arises every time a matter of this kind comes up, the prosecuting authorities have to make up their mind whether the facts appear to disclose an offence. If they think it does then they lay a charge. They then have to prove their charge. If they cannot prove it the case under this clause fails.

Mr. Knowles: Might I revert to the first question I asked. Why has the penalty been increased from one to two years?

Mr. Garson: Because, as I have explained on several occasions previously, it was thought desirable by the commission that we should not have an assortment of offences under the code but that they should be all included under some five separate groupings. The lowest of these is two years, then five years and so on. This particular case fell into the lowest grouping, but that had the effect of increasing the penalty from one to two years. My hon. friend himself, I think, during the previous debate on this bill raised the point that these are all maximum sentences. In a proper case the judge might impose a penalty of one day's imprisonment, if he wished to do so. There is no minimum penalty under the new code.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to say a word on this clause. I am not now particularly asking the minister to comment. I cannot see that there is any great difference between this clause and the Alberta press act that was passed some few years ago. That act, of course, was sent to the courts and was declared to be unconstitutional. It can therefore perhaps be regarded as a dead issue today. Nevertheless there are a good many people in the country who will not permit it to be a dead issue and who are bringing it up continually as a means of attack upon our own Social Credit position by saying that if ever we got into power we would attempt to control the press.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think this clause attempts to control the press any more than did the press act passed some years ago by the Alberta government. In fact, on comparing the press act of a few years ago with this section, I think that act was quite a modification of this particular section. All that press act did was provide that when there was a news release by the government, should that news release be printed falsely or give a false impression or include false statements, the same periodical or paper would be compelled to print the correct release in a place just as prominent as that in which the false one was printed.

A great deal of comment on that act in recent years, in fact in the last election campaign, would leave the impression that a newspaper or periodical would not be permitted to criticize the actions of the government. There was nothing of that kind at all in that press act. Editorial comment could be made. They could criticize the government. They could call the government anything for which they could find appropriate phraseology. There was nothing at all wrong with that course. It was simply a press act that insisted that when false statements were made with respect to news, they had to be corrected the next day. I rose to point that out, because I fancy those who are our opponents will continue to mislead the people with regard to the matter. It is a dead issue today. We have no desire to control the press.

I am not talking against this section. I think it should be there. I do not know whether this is the section that necessarily covers libel, but it appears to me that it does. I want to have that statement on the record. False news should not be reported. What we want is the truth. Just so long as the truth is published, no one is going to complain. We believe in the freedom of the press, but we believe that the press is free to print that which is right.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 167—Not burying dead.

Mr. Coldwell: I want to ask a question about this clause, as the result of reading it over. How does this clause affect cremation and the remains of those who have been cremated? It would seem to compel burial. What is the interpretation?

Mr. Garson: Again I think the answer can be found in the wording of the section which reads as follows:

> Every one who
> (a) neglects, without lawful excuse, to perform any duty that is imposed upon him by law or that he undertakes with reference to the burial of a dead human body or human remains, . . .

I take that to refer to the proper carrying out of burial, if that be the method which he chooses to dispose of the human body or human remains.

Mr. Rowe: Would they be human remains?

Mr. Coldwell: After cremation, are they human remains? That is the point.

Mr. Garson: In any event, it is only where he fails to perform a duty that is imposed upon him by law or that he undertakes. I think it has to do more with the manner in which he carries out that duty than with the question of burial or cremation; that is, as to whether it is burial of the body in the ground or burial of its ashes in an urn. In other words, the gravamen of the offence is in the carrying out of the burial in a manner, for example, which is disrespectful to the dead body, in a careless and indifferent manner and so on, and not whether they bury the human body or cremate it.

Mr. Coldwell: The point I had in mind was as to burial of the remains. In cremation the remains may not be buried. That is the point. In cremation the remains may not be buried for a considerable time or may not be buried at all. What is the interpretation of the word "burial"? That is the point I had in mind.

Mr. Garson: I still come back to my point that the gravamen of the offence is neglect to perform a duty that is imposed by law or that a person undertakes to carry out, as my hon. friend will see, with reference to the burial of a dead body or human remains. That is all it says. It does not necessarily make any reference at all to cremation. If cremation is lawful under relevant statutes, then it is just as lawful as burial.

Mr. Coldwell: That would constitute burial?

Mr. Garson: In such case it would be lawful.

Mr. Coldwell: The fact that the body was cremated would be burial, under this clause. Is that right?

Mr. Garson: Oh, no.

Mr. Coldwell: That is the point I am making. Suppose the remains after cremation are not buried.

Mr. Garson: There is no offence unless there is a breach of duty.

Mr. Coldwell: There is no offence if the remains are not buried?

Mr. Garson: This is an offence in respect of the manner in which burial is carried out.

Mr. Coldwell: It is an interpretation of the word "burial" that I am after.

Mr. Trainor: I should like to ask the minister whether this clause is supplementary to or was designed to reinforce provincial laws. Are there provincial laws existing with regard to burial which this clause is designed to reinforce?

Mr. Garson: Yes; because it says:

Every one who
(a) neglects, without lawful excuse, to perform any duty that is imposed upon him by law . . .

Mr. Trainor: That is provincial law?

Mr. Garson: Yes. The law may vary from one province to another, but it is his duty as a citizen to carry out that direction of the law. If he fails to do that in respect of burial, then he brings himself under this provision of the Criminal Code.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 168—Bet.

Mr. Hahn: We find here that a new subsection 3 has been added, which places the onus on the accused. We had the same thing with respect to clause 162, trespassing at night, in which the onus was placed upon the accused. I wonder if we are not setting a dangerous precedent and losing a fundamental and basic principle of British freedom when the onus is placed entirely on the accused rather than the state having to prove that the accused is guilty.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will examine the preceding subsection I think he will see a provision there to the effect that a place is not a common gaming house within the meaning of the various subparagraphs there listed when it is occupied or used by an incorporated bona fide social club or branch thereof, when certain conditions which are prescribed prevail. If an accused in a case of this sort is actually innocent the facts in proof of that innocence are entirely in his possession, and it would be a matter of no difficulty at all for him to show that the place which had been raided was actually not a common gaming house.

The necessity for subsection 3 arises from the fact that as a rule when these raids are made, especially if it is a gaming house run by an experienced operator, the police may have some difficulty in securing entry in the first place. When they do get in they often find that the proprietor has made provision for doing away with great rapidity with all of the indications of gaming and the like. The people who are found there are all just innocent people taking part in a friendly game without any professional element in it at all. In order to give protection to society in a case of this kind, it does not seem unreasonable to say that the onus of proving that it is not a gaming house can be fairly placed upon the accused when, if that be the fact, it is so easy for him to establish.

Mr. MacInnis: I am suspicious of any section of the Criminal Code that puts the onus of proof of innocence upon the accused. I think it is a departure from the British practice that we have followed for so long, and if we begin by putting such a provision in one section we may wind up by having it in all sections, with the result that no matter what the charge against an accused may be he will have to prove that he is innocent.

The minister says it will be an easy matter for an accused to prove that it is not a common gaming house. If it is an easy matter for him to prove that it is not, then it should be an equally easy matter for the crown to prove that it is. The crown is only going to assume the onus of proof when it is easy for the crown to do so, but when it is hard the crown will shift the burden to the accused. As a principle in our Criminal Code I dislike it very much.

Mr. Garson: I am in complete agreement with my hon. friend in disliking just as much as he does this principle in any criminal law of shifting the onus of proof upon the accused. But in those cases in which the means of proof are peculiarly in the possession of the accused; where it is almost impossible for the crown to offer the necessary proof, if the proprietor and found-ins stand mute then I think this is not the first occasion by any means when an accused has been called by statute to adduce evidence peculiarly in his possession to disprove the charge against him. With great deference to my hon. friend I would not agree that because this provision is put into a section respecting an offence of this sort, it would be proper to put it into other sections dealing with other offences. My hon. friend can see, as we go through the code, that there are very few sections in which it has been put, and that such provisions are confined to a very few sections which are of the same general character as this one.

Mr. MacInnis: My understanding is that this part of the clause is new and was not in the old law. We carried on for quite a long time with the law as it was, and I do not think anything very serious happened. Surely if a place is kept as a common gaming house the necessary paraphernalia will be visible, and surely every time the police care to raid a place the occupants or owners should not have to bring forward proof that it is not a common gaming house. The minister said a few minutes ago that this is the first time this provision has been introduced. That is my point. It will be such an easy thing to make a practice of introducing such a provision here and there. We are all looking for easy ways to perform our various duties, and it will be an easy way for the police or the crown, whichever term one uses, to make an accused prove that he is not guilty. I think we should be very careful about it.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think I am qualified nor do I desire to defend the Minister of Justice or, indeed, the new Criminal Code in matters of this sort. But if I were to let the comments of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, for whom I have high regard, particularly with respect to his interest in persons who may be accused and who require every assistance to defend themselves, go without reply it might be taken as meaning that we do not share the concern he has expressed that as a general principle a man is innocent until he is proved guilty and that the onus of proof of his guilt should be on the crown. No one could subscribe more strongly to that conviction than I or my colleagues sitting around me and those who are members of this party generally.

Therefore, while I do not agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, I felt that if I kept silent and simply let the matter go without any comment it might be taken that we were not as concerned about these things as he is. But there is a reply to him in this particular case which can and should be made. Taking clause 168 and comparing it with the old sections 226 and 227, one sees that the new clause proceeds on a rather different basis. The old sections 226 and 227 defined a common gaming house and made no exceptions. Under the new clause 168 an exception is created by subsection 2. In other words, it is continued as an offence to keep or to be in a common gaming house, but there is now an exception. Subsection 2 says:

> A place is not a common gaming house within the meaning of paragraph (i) or clause (B) or (C) . . .

—if it conforms to certain standards which are then laid down.

What is now said is that we continue the offence of a common gaming house but we create an exception to that offence. We create an exception if the place falls within the category described, and it is then not a common gaming house; but we put upon the accused the onus of proving that the place falls within the exception. When you are in effect creating a specific defence to a charge, which defence is that the accused's place falls within the description of the exception to a common gaming house, it is fair to place the onus of proving that defence, by proving that the place falls within that exception, upon the accused. The crown still has to establish its case by proving that the place is a common gaming house, and it is up to the accused to prove that the place falls within the exception. This exception is now defined by the statute in a form in which it did not exist before.

Mr. Hansell: I just wonder, if we should not let this item stand, particularly when we realize that lotteries come into this section and I notice that the committee on capital and corporal punishment and lotteries is meeting now. In any event, what I have in mind is that a good many of the members of the house who were members of the criminal code committee a year ago and are familiar with the code are also members of the present committee on capital and corporal punishment and lotteries. I am just wondering as a general practice whether we are not stealing a march on those men who are in another place and would like to be here.

My attention has been drawn to the fact that this section does not cover lotteries, so perhaps I am barking up the wrong tree. I know that our representative on the present committee on lotteries spent a tremendous amount of time and was a conscientious member of this criminal code committee a year ago. I know he would like to be here while the Criminal Code is being discussed. Perhaps at future sittings we might bring up the Criminal Code with that in mind, to avoid conflicting with the other committee.

Mr. Barnett: I should like to raise a point in connection with subclause 2(b), which I understand from a remark that has been made is a new provision. I am wondering what interpretation can be placed upon the words "charitable organization"? To illustrate my point, I would ask the minister whether under this clause a trade union organization, as part of its social activities, might arrange an evening when games of this sort would be played, possibly for some social or charitable purpose, and be covered by this saving clause? I realize that in the ordinary sense of the word a trade union is not a charitable organization, but could they be covered by this saving clause? If not, would the minister consider inserting some such words as "or other non-commercial organization" or something of that kind?

Mr. Garson: Perhaps I might comment upon the remarks of the last two speakers because they are really related to one another. On two or three previous occasions I have explained that the setting up of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons to consider capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries was upon the understanding that the house would pass these sections dealing with gambling, lotteries and so forth, subject to any amendments that might occur to us as we considered them in the form in which they are.

This was to be done so that when the new code comes into effect we will have this subject matter covered by legislation. If we repeal the old code and in the meantime do not provide these new sections dealing with lotteries, corporal punishment and capital punishment, then we are going to have a gap in our law pending the report of the joint committee. The understanding was that we would pass these sections now. Then when the committee's report came in the government would move amendments, or if the government did not feel it was appropriate to do so, members of the opposition would move them. In that event, the government would expedite consideration of any amending legislation which might be brought forward to implement the report of the committee. For that reason I am asking hon. members to pass this legislation as we go along.

Now, that does not mean we cannot examine it on its own merits in the course of passing it.

[Mr. Hansell.]

In connection with the question raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni as to what constitutes a charitable or religious organization, if I understood his question he wanted to know whether, even although the organizations were not charitable or religious but were doing this thing for religious or charitable purposes, would that constitute a defence? Offhand I would not think it would, but that would be my own very casual opinion. The hon. member asked a hypothetical question, and with some hesitation I give that hypothetical answer.

This question has come up for interpretation by the courts; the case is Rex v. McGee. It arose in my own province of Manitoba and is reported in 50, Man. R. at page 152. There is a reference to the second exception under paragraph (b) (ii), as re-enacted in 1938. This was the former wording:

> . . . while occasionally being used by charitable or religious organizations for playing games therein for which a direct fee is charged to the players if the proceeds are to be used for the benefit of any charitable or religious object.

Now I quote from the judgment:

> This provision is intended to protect such people as trustees of club houses, or parish halls, who permit the occasional use of their premises for charitable or religious objects without gain or profit to themselves.

Whether that would apply to a trade union would depend upon the view the court took of the facts of the particular case. I should think a trade union might have some difficulty in proving that it was a charitable or religious organization within the meaning of the section.

Mr. Barnett: I did make one other suggestion upon which the minister has not commented, as to whether in this particular clause it might not be advisable to insert some words which would cover such a situation. If an organization to which I belong, such as a trade union, decides to do something of that sort even though they might not be organized mainly for that particular purpose, why should they not have the protection of this saving clause?

Mr. Garson: In that connection might I suggest that while my hon. friend can examine those clauses as they go through now, we should take some cognizance in this committee of the whole of the fact that a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate has been set up which I should think will certainly consider this very point to which he is now referring. I really think we shall be in a better informed and more intelligent position to consider this point after the joint committee shall have gone into it in somewhat more detail than we can in this committee of the whole. I would therefore urge that amendments of the nature suggested by the hon. member might be left over until we get the report from the committee.

Mr. Dupuis: Until a few years ago some churches organized what they called bingoes. I understand that even those bingo games for charitable purposes were outlawed. It was said that the code did not permit the playing of such games even for charitable purposes. Do I understand that subclause 2 (b) now makes bingoes lawful? Perhaps I do not make myself plain; I am not talking in my own language. I want it made clear whether bingoes can now be played legally if they are played for charitable purposes.

Mr. Garson: The answer to my hon. friend is that in this particular subclause there is no change from the existing law. It may be that when we get the report of the joint committee we shall consider some change, but that is for the future. This present bill introduces no change in the law as it is in the existing code.

Mr. Patterson: I should like to have some assurance that this clause will definitely be brought up at a future date under lotteries; otherwise it ought to be given consideration right now, or we should let it stand. Personally I feel that if a thing is wrong it is hardly right for a church or a religious organization to do it. I believe that the principle involved is altogether wrong; therefore I cannot see why a religious organization should have any preference over any other group. Unless this matter is definitely going to be brought up at a future date under lotteries I should like to say something further on it at the present time.

Mr. Garson: On that point, Mr. Chairman, I should like to reiterate once more that this subject matter is definitely being considered by the Senate and the House of Commons committee. I have undertaken, with the approval of my colleagues in the government, that when its report comes in the government will bring in legislation to implement that report; or that if to do so does not commend itself to our judgment, we shall expedite the consideration by the house of amending legislation brought in by any member of the opposition, including my hon. friend.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister forgotten the proviso that there has to be some recommendation in the report?

Mr. Garson: Yes; "to implement the report" was the language I used, which means that we will be carrying out what the report indicates.

Mr. Hansell: I should like the minister's opinion with respect to paragraph (f) of this clause which reads:

"game" means a game of chance or mixed chance and skill.

Where does the common slot machine come in, in this connection? I am not an expert on the constitutional angle of these things, but I do believe that several of the provinces have taken up this matter of slot machines. I see the minister has his finger up, which means he must have something that he wants to say.

Mr. Garson: Would my hon. friend look at clause 170, which we have not reached, but which deals with slot machines?

Clause agreed to.

Clause 169 agreed to.

On clause 170—Conclusive presumption from slot machine.

Mr. Knowles: We have now reached the clause that has to do with slot machines. I do not wish to take the floor from the hon. member for Macleod, but I would like to say this, after having read this clause. To use legal phraseology, I think I can say I have not knowingly gone into a common gaming house, but having read this clause I begin to wonder whether millions of people do not go into common gaming houses every day of their lives. Almost every time you go into a corner store you go into a place where there is a slot machine. Look at the wording of this:

For the purpose of proceedings under this part, a place that is found to be equipped with a slot machine shall be conclusively presumed to be a common gaming house.

Then we are told that a slot machine means any automatic machine or slot machine:

(a) that is used or intended to be used for any purpose other than vending merchandise or services; or

(b) that is used or intended to be used for the purpose of vending merchandise or services if

(i) the result of one of any number of operations of the machine is a matter of chance or uncertainty to the operator.

Every time you use a pay telephone you do that. There is a matter of uncertainty. Sometimes you will get your nickel back and sometimes you will get your number.

Mr. Rowe: And sometimes you get neither.

Mr. Knowles: Hon. members are laughing, and I do not blame them. But what about these little slot machines that children put pennies in. Sometimes they get a bit of bubble gum and sometimes they get trinkets of some sort.

Mr. Rowe: They are buying something.

Mr. Knowles: Someone says that is not a matter of chance. That is the reason the kiddies keep putting in their pennies or nickels; they hope to get something better than they got the last time.

Mr. Garson: Would my hon. friend look at 170 (2) (a) and (b)? If he does that he will see that they cover the point that he has just made.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, but my point is that what is set out in (a) is altered by what is set out in (b):

> that is used or intended to be used for the purpose of vending merchandise or services . . .

Some of these machines are there for the purpose of vending merchandise or services, but there is also an element of chance as to what item of merchandise you get.

Mr. Garson: Is the difference not this? In a vending machine you put the coin in the slot and you get back merchandise presumably at least of the value of the coin.

Mr. McIvor: Your weight.

Mr. Garson: Yes, or your weight, if you are interested in being weighed. You get value; but in a slot machine you put your money in and you may not get it back at all, or you may get back much more money than you put in. Therefore it is a gambling machine. I may say, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing new about this section. If my hon. friend is worried about having been in a gambling hell because he was in a drug store with a slot machine, he already has been doing that, perhaps unconsciously, for many years.

Mr. Hahn: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice this question. Are the machines in which you put ten cents and get nine cents worth of stamps slot machines or not?

Mr. Garson: No, certainly not.

Mr. Hansell: The position as I see it is this. I do not know a great deal about the slot machines, never having played them, but I do know that those who operate the machines can get away with having the customer put in a nickel or a dime and get back one chiclet. That by-passes the law, because it can be considered to be a merchandising machine. Of course they do not put in the nickel or dime to get a chiclet, they put in the nickel or dime or whatever it is in the hope that they are going to hit the jackpot and get a dollar's worth of nickels or pennies or whatever it is that comes out. That is the thing I think is dangerous. I had an experience with one of my boys when he was just knee-high to a grasshopper. The hon. member for Red Deer says, "Like his daddy". He did not grow to be much bigger than I am.

That boy went into one of these places without knowing anything about these machines, and a youngster told him to put in a penny. He put in a penny, he hit the jackpot and he came running out of that place with his hands together holding a fistful of pennies. He must have had 60 or 70 pennies. He wanted me to see what he had done. I took him aside and I said, "Son, I am going to tell you something. You may be able to put all those pennies in there and come away without a penny in your pocket, having lost your original penny; but if you never again play one of these slot machines you will be the one man in a million who will be able to say that in his lifetime he has been able to beat the slot machines."

I am sure the minister will agree that the slot machine is made to skin the public. It could not be otherwise. No slot machine has ever been made from which in the long run the public could win. That is what I was going to say when I rose several minutes ago. I cannot quite understand why the provinces have started an investigation of slot machines if they are covered by the Criminal Code. Why would they have to do that? I realize that the provinces administer the criminal law which comes under the department of the attorney general, but if there is any question as to the right or wrong of slot machines it seems to me it should be the minister who should carry on the investigation instead of an attorney general.

Mr. Garson: The last point raised by the hon. member for Macleod is extremely important. We have the power and the responsibility in this parliament of enacting the criminal law. Under subsection 14 of section 92 of the British North America Act the responsibility for the administration of justice, which includes the enforcement of law, is exclusively that of the provincial authorities.

The investigation to which my hon. friend refers has to do with administration. If my hon. friend will examine the evidence he will see that the allegations upon which the investigations are usually based is that in this, that or the other part of a given province, or in the province as a whole, the enforcement of the law in respect to slot machines has been inadequate.

But I would not admit for a moment that the law we are now considering is inadequate, because in substance it is a re-enactment of an existing section which has been in the code for a great many years. If it had been inadequate I should think that long since we would have had representations from the provinces to that effect. If my hon. friend is worried about the point with which he opened his remarks, that a defence could perhaps be made by the person accused of operating a slot machine that the purpose of the machine was to vend merchandise, although still importing an element of gambling, I think his mind will be cleared up if he reads subsection 2 of clause 170 which reads:

> In this section "slot machine" means any automatic machine or slot machine
> (a) that is used or intended to be used for any purpose other than vending merchandise or services; or
> (b) that is used or intended to be used for the purpose of vending merchandise or services if
> (i) the result of one of any number of operations of the machine is a matter of chance or uncertainty to the operator,
> (ii) as a result of a given number of successive operations by the operator the machine produces different results, or—

Such as were produced for my hon. friend's son when he hit the jackpot. He got in at the proper sequence and that great gain was poured into his hands.

> (iii) on any operation of the machine it discharges or emits a slug or token.

Sometimes the accused argues that if it does not put out money, that lets him out. I think there has been a successful attempt in this legislation to cover all of these possible defences to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. Hansell: I have one other question for the purpose of enlightening myself only. Are slot machines declared to be legal in any one province while they are still considered illegal in other provinces?

Mr. Garson: As I said a few moments ago, the responsibility for and the power of enacting criminal law, saying that which is a crime, is upon this parliament and upon no other legislative body in Canada. If we say by the Criminal Code that a slot machine is illegal and that its employment by a proprietor is a crime, as I understand the Canadian constitution it is not within the power of any province to make it legal.

Mr. McIvor: I was asking the question, how can a slot machine that just tells your weight be a machine of chance?

Mr. Brown (Brantford): Would the minister indicate whether there has been a change in the existing law. Clause 170 defines a slot machine, but in the old section there was no definition. It referred simply to certain automatic machines which were assumed to be contrivances for playing games of chance. In this clause it seems to be defined.

Mr. Garson: Has my hon. friend read section 986 (4) of the Criminal Code?

Mr. Brown (Brantford): Yes.

Mr. Garson: If he will go down to about the centre he will see that it says:

> —any automatic machine intended to be used for vending merchandise or for any other purpose, the result of one or any number of operations of which is as regards the operator a matter of chance or uncertainty, or which as a consequence of any given number of successive operations yields different results to the operator—

I think if my hon. friend will examine that he will find that the substance is substantially the same as that of the present clause. I think it is put in a more intelligible form and in somewhat shorter compass.

Mr. Fulton: It seems to me there are two matters of unfinished business before us. I am quite sure the minister will agree that my curiosity is pardonable if I ask him whether he will enlighten us on two matters. First, was the hon. member for Macleod or his son in a common gaming house under the circumstances which he defined and, second, what happened to the shower of pennies which was emitted from the slot machine? I do not think we should proceed until we have an answer to those two questions.

Mr. Jones: I understand that a lot of these slot machines are imported from the United States. Why does the Department of National Revenue allow the importation of illegal machines and collect duty on them?

Mr. Garson: I think that question should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Jones: I think the question should be dealt with now. If it is illegal to operate these machines, why does the government allow them to be manufactured in Canada. I understand that most of them do come in from the United States. Why are no steps taken to stop their manufacture or importation before they become a temptation to children?

Mr. Knowles: If that question is not going to be answered I think the first of the two questions asked by the hon. member for Kamloops should be taken seriously. It is in effect the question I tried to put some time ago as to whether the wording of clause 170 is not a little too broad. If I may deal with this matter for half a moment, I take it from the description given by the hon. member for Macleod that the machine from which his son got a handful of pennies was by the definition set out in this clause a slot machine, and it must have been found in a place. According to the initial part of clause 170—

> . . . a place that is found to be equipped with a slot machine shall be conclusively presumed to be a common gaming house.

I am not attempting to hang any stigma on the particular corner store to which my hon. friend and his son went. I am more concerned with whether the wording of this clause is sensible. If that was a slot machine in the place which my friend and his son visited, then that place must be a common gaming house under the interpretation of the law.

Mr. Garson: Yes, Mr. Chairman, it was. I am sorry if I gave the impression that I was trying to avoid the question. That was not my intention. The method by which this clause operates, as I apprehend it, is that instead of charging a person with a number of different offences such as operating a slot machine, these various things are defined as being included in the offence of keeping a common gaming house. If my hon. friend will look at clause 176, to which we have not yet come, he will find that every one who keeps a common gaming house is guilty of an indictable offence, and so on. When these illegal slot machines are found the charge which is laid against the owner of the establishment in which it is being operated is one of keeping a common gaming house, and in that way the charge laid will cover one of a number of offences which are included in the definition of "keeping common gaming house", rather than the particular offence of operating a slot machine.

Mr. Knowles: I certainly do not want it to be thought that I would condone a practice of this kind, but it does seem to me we should be practical about this matter. What the minister said a moment ago in direct answer to my question in effect describes half the corner stores in Canada as common gaming houses. I do not presume on that basis that the police in all the provinces of Canada are going to swoop down on all these corner stores. But is not that what the wording of this clause means? Otherwise the language conveys something which it does not mean. Should not there be either stricter enforcement of slot machines to the extent suggested by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary, or some kind of wording which will make it clear that a corner store or drug store, which has many other purposes, is not described by the Criminal Code of Canada as a common gaming house by virtue of the fact there is a gum slot machine to which there is attached some element of chance.

Some hon. Members: Why not?

Mr. Knowles: Some hon. members ask, "Why not?". If that is going to be the meaning of this description, then let us call upon the police in all the provinces to swoop down upon all these places. Otherwise let us use words that mean what we have in mind.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is a godly and righteous man, but he is probably not too well acquainted with the possibilities of profit in these slot machines. A year or so before I came to Ottawa I visited a town in a western state in the United States where their country club was entirely financed by slot machines which were kept there and were "played" by the members. If there are a sufficient number of players who are prepared to put their money into slot machines the profits are not inconsiderable. I suppose my hon. friend was perhaps making a moral argument, but I do not know what moral difference there would be between a man who is getting a rake-off on a poker game from which he makes a lot of money, or in operating a slot machine to do the same thing.

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister misapprehends the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The point made by the hon. member was to the effect that under the present definition a large number of corner stores, though not I believe as many as has been suggested, have slot machines within the scope of that definition and are therefore common gaming houses. The point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is that we should either narrow our definition or change it in some way so that these corner stores, which do not exist for the sole purpose of operating slot machines, would not be included within the definition of a common gaming house. The alternative is that if we decide they should be brought within the definition of a common gaming house because of these slot machines, then let us enforce the law as it now stands.

I might add that I believe my hon. friend goes much too far in saying that half the corner stores in this country keep slot machines. I believe they have vending machines for the purpose of vending merchandise or affording services of some kind, but I do not believe there are very many corner stores such as one would include in the general description of being decent places run by law-abiding citizens which keep slot machines of the type referred to by another hon. member in this debate. The one referred to was to my mind a slot machine as defined in this clause and the store, probably unwittingly, was a common gaming house. That type of store is very much in the minority, though I would not mind seeing that particular owner prosecuted. However, I do not think we have very many examples of that type of corner store.

Mr. Garson: I entirely agree with what the hon. member for Kamloops has said. There are a great number of vending machines in corner stores and there may be a number of slot machines, in the proper sense, in these corner stores. The situation depends in large measure upon the policy of law enforcement being pursued by the provincial or municipal authorities in the area under which these slot machines are operated. My hon. friend suggests we should enforce the law, but I am sure he would be the first to agree that we unfortunately do not have the task of enforcing this law. That is entirely within the jurisdiction of the provinces. However, where this law, which has been on the statute books for some time, is enforced with reasonable strictness by the provincial authorities we agree with the hon. member for Kamloops that you would not find many slot machines in corner stores, although there may be a great many vending machines.

Mr. Rowe: Surely no one is discussing the type of machine which is there for the purpose of selling gum or Coca-Cola. The T.C.A. offices have such machines, and surely the T.C.A. offices could not be described as common gaming houses. I believe the act clearly sets out the matter; and with all due deference to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, it seems to me no one would suggest for a moment that the growing tendency to vend merchandise through so-called slot machines would come within the definition of slot machines used for the purpose of gambling. There is a clear-cut definition. As the minister has stated, there are many places in the United States and in Canada where all sorts of things are sold by this type of slot machine.

Mr. Garson: You can get a hot meal in New York through one of these machines.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, and you can get Coca-Cola, gum, ladies' hosiery, cigarettes, and all sorts of things. In many cases this machine is used to take the place of a clerk. I believe there is a clear-cut distinction. I think we have wasted a lot of time.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, there are two types of slot machines about which I wish to question the minister even yet. One type I referred to a moment ago, but apparently it was missed. There are these slot machines into which children put coppers—I do not know whether they go as high as a nickel or not—and out of which they get something every time. Sometimes it is a chiclet, sometimes it is a ball of bubble gum, and sometimes it is a trinket. The value varies. An hon. member near me says sometimes there is a jackpot, when there is the handful of coppers to which the hon. member referred. But there is a difference in value each time. I have seen children play these things not because of the particular article obtained but because they enjoy the chance connected with it. They are hoping to get something better next time. Is that kind of machine a slot machine?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: It was that kind of machine I had in mind when I suggested that they are to be found in a large number of corner stores in this country. I want to call the minister's attention to another kind of slot machine. I forget what the price of soft drinks is now but a while ago, at any rate, it was seven cents. I have seen these machines that were not equipped to take coppers, so there was a sign which said to put in five cents. But every sixth or seventh nickel, whichever it is—I have not figured out the arithmetic of it for the moment—that is put in draws a blank. A moment ago the minister mentioned being in the right sequence. On some occasions you put a nickel in and you get a bottle of Coca-Cola. Once in a while you put in a nickel and you are not in the right sequence so you get nothing. Is that a slot machine?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is very ingenious at asking these hypothetical questions.

Mr. Knowles: That is not a hypothetical question.

Mr. Garson: I do not blame him for it.

Mr. Knowles: This is a real machine.

Mr. Garson: I would suggest that one of the criteria is this. With any genuine slot machine you will find that, as the result of a number of operations, the machine does not make a profit upon the sale of merchandise but makes a profit by taking money from its patrons by gambling. In the case cited by my hon. friend, the machine which is placed there is for the convenience of the patrons who may not have a nickel and two coppers, so they put in nickels. At the end of a week's operation that machine will not have produced for its proprietor one penny of gambling profit. It will have provided Coca-Cola for all its patrons equal in value to the amount of money that was put into it. Therefore I would not think it would be regarded as a slot machine within this provision; nor do I think it should be so regarded, becauses that arrangement is solely for the convenience of the public.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 171 to 176 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 177—Betting, pool selling, bookmaking, etc.

Mr. Hahn: I was just wondering how many convictions under section 177 (d) of the old act may have been registered in this country. During the baseball series or the hockey series I do not think there is any little town in the country that does not have a pool of some kind on it. I was just wondering if there were any convictions under the act.

Mr. Garson: With all the good will in the world I am afraid I could not answer that question because, as I have indicated two or three times already this afternoon, the enforcement of these provisions is in the hands of the provinces. I doubt very much whether they keep any record of these convictions that is available to us. I would, however, draw this distinction. If two or three people make a pool amongst themselves, I think they are in a much different position from that of the bookmaker who accepts bets in contravention of the law.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 178 agreed to.

On clause 179—Lotteries.

Mr. Shaw: Probably the minister can enlighten me on this point. I notice one exception that is made under subsection 8 is this. It refers to raffles for prizes of small value. Earlier we learned that it was not an offence if it were done occasionally. What is the thinking behind this? Can the minister tell me that? What justification can there be for saying that it is either morally or legally right to have prizes of small value, yet to have prizes of medium value is wrong; or that it is all right if you do a thing occasionally, but if you go beyond that it is an offence? I should like to know what the thinking is on the part of those who support this type of thing. That has always been a conundrum to me.

Mr. Garson: My friend the hon. member for Red Deer, with his usual discernment and some gentle irony, has put his finger upon the main reason why the subject of lotteries is now being investigated by a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate. I would suggest that he await the report of that committee for an answer to his question.

Mr. Shaw: May I just point out to the minister, Mr. Chairman, that I will not have to wait that long. I am a member of that committee.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 180 to 190 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 191—Criminal negligence.

Mr. Fulton: This is a new section, Mr. Chairman. I have here a note from a person who is learned in the law, far more learned than I, to the effect that this section does not really accomplish anything.

Mr. Knowles: Somebody very learned in the law must have drafted it.

Mr. Fulton: The point of the criticism which I shall try to reproduce is that at the present time, under the present code, it is true that there is a distinction between criminal negligence and ordinary negligence such as that which will found an action at common law. This is apparently an attempt to carry that distinction into statutory language.

I know the section is new. The meat of the note which I have received is that when you define or attempt to define criminal negligence, it is by that very fact suggested that you are trying to define in statutory form a type of negligence which differs in some respects from negligence at common law but that this statutory definition fails to do so, and that it is going to confront courts and juries with considerable difficulty in interpreting this section to leave it in this form.

I wonder whether the minister could make any comment. I realize it is really a theoretical matter, but inasmuch as my informant says that, in his considered opinion, it will confront the courts with great difficulty, I think perhaps we should have a word about it.

Mr. Garson: Clause 191 represents an attempt, and I think a successful one, by the commission to derive a statutory provision from the case law, which holds that before there can be criminal responsibility for a breach of duty it must amount to such conduct as shows a wanton and reckless disregard for the lives or safety of others. Perhaps my hon. friend's correspondent means, when he says that this does not make any change in the law, that it merely restates that law which has already been established by the cases. If that be a correct interpretation of my hon. friend's correspondent's attitude I think clause 191 at least has the merit of being put in a lucid and condensed form that the ordinary person can read and understand. He then will not have to go to the case books to read the judgments and abstract from them the principles that are stated here.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 192—Causing death by criminal negligence.

Mr. Shaw: My question may not apply specifically to this clause; I am merely seeking information. Under what clause of the code is a charge usually laid when parents leave a tiny child alone in the home and a fire breaks out, or something happens that results in the death of the child? Those things seem to be cropping up with grim frequency lately, and I am wondering what charge is usually laid in such cases.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend asks what charge is usually laid. I have not had occasion to check the total number of charges that have been laid in these cases of which he speaks to see whether the charge usually laid is under this clause. But I can say that a charge that could be laid and in many cases is laid on a set of facts of that sort, depending upon their gravity, would be under this section which, as my hon. friend can see, can carry a penalty of imprisonment for life.

Mr. Knight: I should like to ask the minister whether under this clause there is a way of dealing with people who refuse certain medical treatment for their children which in the opinion of medical men is necessary to save the lives of those children. I have noticed many cases lately where people of certain so-called religious faiths have refused to have a child treated in the case of diphtheria, for instance, by serum or something else which under ordinary circumstances would save the life of the child. They refuse the treatment and the child is allowed to die. I am merely a layman and do not understand these matters, but I am wondering if the code contains any provision to deal with such a situation or if it is dealt with under clause 192.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend will realize that these charges of neglecting to provide proper medical attention will vary a good deal in their seriousness from one case to another. Some will be very serious indeed, perhaps resulting in the death of the child, and others not so serious either in the offence or in its consequences. Where gross criminal negligence had been shown I would think that a charge could be laid under section 192, but there is also a clause in the code which makes it a crime to fail to provide the necessities of life for those for whom one as a parent, for example, is responsible.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if I might have your permission, Mr. Chairman, and that of the committee to consider clauses 191 and 192 together. You will observe that clause 192 states:

> Every one who by criminal negligence causes death to another person is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

That is a new section. Criminal negligence is defined in clause 191 which reads as follows:

> (1) Every one is criminally negligent who
> (a) in doing anything, or
> (b) in omitting to do anything that it is his duty to do, shows wanton or reckless disregard for the lives or safety of other persons.

As section 191 reads now, it seems to me it could be that a person who in doing something shows wanton or reckless disregard for the lives or safety of other persons is guilty of criminal negligence, and is then liable by clause 192 to imprisonment for life. Certainly a person who takes a gun and shoots another person, even although he does it deliberately, could be said to be doing something and in doing that something showing a wanton or reckless disregard for the lives or safety of other persons. It is certainly a wanton disregard for the life of the other person.

Therefore it might be alleged that such a man is guilty of criminal negligence in that he has taken a life, and is therefore guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life, whereas in fact he is guilty of murder. I am quite sure it is obvious that the intention was that this particular offence should not come under clause 192, but I suggest it does by virtue of the fact that the words "that it is his duty to do" in 191(b) are not inserted in such a position that they also qualify "in doing anything" in 191(a).

It is not a man's duty to shoot somebody else. Therefore I suggest the clause might be put this way:

> 191. (1) Every one is criminally negligent who
> (a) in doing anything that it is his duty to do, or
> (b) in omitting to do anything that it is his duty to do, shows wanton or reckless disregard for the lives or safety of other persons.

Then you will avoid the possibility that a deliberate crime of murder might be alleged to come under clause 192, and also the possibilities of confusion. If you would insert the words "that it is his duty to do" after the word "anything" in paragraph 1 (a) of 191 I should think you would better reflect the intention of the drafters.

Mr. Garson: I am not entirely sure that I got my hon. friend's point, but if I indicate in my comments that I do not apprehend it correctly I hope he will clear up the point for me. I cannot agree with him for this reason. Clause 191 (1) states that everyone is criminally negligent who in doing anything shows wanton or reckless disregard for the lives or safety of other persons. The gravamen of that offence is not whether he is doing something that it is his duty to do. If it is not his duty to do it, then that is all the more reason why he should not show wanton negligence in doing it. But the gravamen of the offence is that in doing anything, whether it is his duty to do it or whether it is not his duty to do it, he shows wanton and reckless disregard for the lives and safety of others.

Mr. Rowe: That could include an automobile case.

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes. If he is doing something that it is not his duty to do, if he is doing something that he should not be doing, and he does it with wanton and reckless disregard, then the fact that it is not his duty to do it makes his offence all the more culpable.

Mr. Fulton: He can be found guilty of killing a man by criminal negligence under clause 192 and be liable to imprisonment for life. But that is not the case. He murdered him. He did something that it was not his duty to do, and he did it with such wanton disregard for the life of another that he murdered him. Yet he is also covered by clause 192. Take the case of the driver of a motor car. To follow the minister's answer, the person who is driving a car does not have to do so. Therefore the minister says that in doing so he should be more careful and if he does so with wanton carelessness he should be punished. Well, he will be under the words of (b), even if it is entirely independent of (a), because if in driving that car he does so in a wanton or reckless manner he is omitting to take care, which it is his duty to do. It is the duty of everybody to take reasonable care; that is a duty imposed by law at the present time. In omitting to take reasonable care he is omitting to do something it is his duty to do.

I suggest that everybody is, in fact, covered in that regard. In driving a car without regard for the safety of a person he is omitting to do something it is his duty to do. I think those words should be qualified in (a) by "in doing anything", for the reasons I have put forward. If that is not done, you are going to get some measure of conflict between homicide caused by criminal negligence and homicide meaning murder, because at the present time murder would also be covered by section 191 read in conjunction with section 192. A person would be doing something, and showing wanton disregard for the lives of other persons, if he shot a man deliberately. There could not be any more wanton disregard for the life of another person.

As a result, according to this definition, he has committed nothing more than criminal negligence. Actually, he has. He is guilty of murder, and could be hanged. I do not want to have any confusion between the two. Therefore I suggest that would be taken care of entirely if (a) read, "in doing anything it is his duty to do", and (b) read, "in omitting to do anything it is his duty to do". If a man is careless in driving a car or in operating anything else, whether or not it is his duty to do it, he is omitting to do something he should do. It is his duty to take reasonable care, and that is a duty imposed upon him by law. You are not, therefore, weakening (b) but you are strengthening (a).

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I cannot agree with my learned friend, either as to his conclusion or the reasoning by which he reaches it. It seems to me that clause 191 describes two forms of criminal negligence. The first one reads this way:

> Every one is criminally negligent who
> (a) in doing anything,

Now, that seems to me to be as clear as anything could be. If he does anything, and in the doing of it shows wanton disregard, then that is criminal negligence. For example, if he is out shooting with a friend and shoots in such a way that he shows wanton and reckless disregard for the lives or safety of others and thereby shoots his friend's head off, he is obviously doing something, and in doing it he may be showing a wanton and reckless disregard for the lives and safety of others. In such case his conduct clearly falls within that section.

When my hon. friend suggests there is danger of confusion with a charge of murder, if he will look down the page a bit he will see that clause 194, subclause 5, states that a person commits culpable homicide when he causes the death of a human being by criminal negligence. In a given case the crown prosecutor has the choice of bringing in an indictment either for culpable homicide or for criminal negligence. I think my hon. friend would agree that in some cases, if my memory serves me rightly, on a charge of culpable homicide the jury will bring in a verdict of criminal negligence and the sentence is imposed accordingly. Each of those cases is disposed of on the facts before the crown prosecutor in deciding what charge he should lay, and on the facts before the jury in deciding of what crime the accused is guilty.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 193 agreed to.

On clause 194—Homicide.

Mr. Knight: Again I should like to raise with the minister this matter of innocent children suffering from being under the control of ignorant or fanatical parents. According to clause 194, subclause 5, a person commits culpable homicide when he causes the death of a human being by criminal negligence. I do not know the minister's interpretation of this clause in regard to homicide, whether that is the crime committed by these people of whom I have spoken, but there have been several instances of little children being left by people in rickety old wooden houses in which there was danger of fire. The parents go off for an evening's entertainment. They come back to find the children as well as the house in ashes. That is one thing.

There are even more serious cases, and I am thinking of diphtheria. In these days medical science can do wonders to save lives. There are also instances of children needing blood transfusions, and the parents simply refuse to permit it. Surely we have got past the stage when we believe that because a child has the misfortune to be born to certain types of parents, the parents then have that child as a possession and can do anything they like. So far as I am concerned the child is a new being by virtue of birth, and has certain rights. Surely society has some obligation in that matter. I am wondering if anything is done or if it is proposed to do anything in these particular cases.

The minister will tell me, of course, that the law is here and anyone can prosecute. It is a matter for the provinces, and this is the law by which they can prosecute. We have had some rather drastic cases in the past and, so far as I am concerned, if anything is homicide, that is it. Would the minister care to comment on what I have said?

Mr. Garson: The only comment I would offer, Mr. Chairman—I am sorry I cannot recall the names of the cases now—is that there have been cases where the parents have been prosecuted by reason of their failure, sometimes for the most conscientious of reasons, to provide medical attention. There have been convictions registered against those parents. I am thinking of a couple of cases in my own province, and perhaps my hon. friend can recall cases in his. It is not as if we had a gap in our law under this heading. It is just a case of the prosecuting authorities applying the existing law to the facts in those cases as they arise, as has been done on several occasions in the past.

Mr. Zaplitny: I wonder if the minister would throw some light on subclause 6 of clause 194, which makes an exception in the case of a person procuring, by false evidence, the conviction and death of a human being by sentence of the law. There must be some reason for making that exception. I can foresee that a person might procure evidence in good faith, and which they believe is true, but which might turn out to be false. Whether that is the reason, or whether there are other reasons, I should like to know why that exception is made because on its face it appears to be an equally vile offence when compared with the preceding one.

Mr. Garson: I do not know in what way I can answer my hon. friend better than by quoting from Stephen, "History of the Criminal Law", where he refers to the trial for perjury of Titus Oates and says in volume III at page 9:

> Oates directly and distinctly caused the death of several innocent persons by perjury, but the fact that the judges and juries who tried the cases acted upon their own responsibility and because they chose to believe Oates's testimony, so disconnected his perjury from the death which he caused that even in 1685—

They had a very strict view of the criminal law in 1685.

> —it was not thought possible to convict him of murder.

Mr. Zaplitny: That is partly what I had in mind, but the minister will notice that this does not refer particularly to a person giving false evidence; it refers to procuring by false evidence. That could go beyond the witness himself, beyond the person who is giving the false evidence. It could also include the officials. For example, the prosecutor may procure false evidence knowing that it is false. It would appear that in a case of that kind he is doing something which is culpable, and on the face of it I see no reason for the exception. What I am trying to get at is this. This exception is made by virtue of the fact that it refers to evidence which the prosecutor believes to be true but which turns out later to be false. Would we have this blanket exception under certain circumstances? Whether he knew the evidence was false or not, he is set free of a culpable charge.

Mr. Garson: Well, I think one of the main reasons why the subclause is retained in the law is that if there were not some saving clause of this kind one can understand that no one would regard with a great deal of enthusiasm appearing as a witness in a capital case. They would fear that if the accused were found guilty and it later turned out that the evidence which the witness gave in good faith was wrong, the witness might then be open to be charged with the murder of the accused by reason of the fact that his evidence was wrong. As a result there might not be too many people come forward as volunteers to be witnesses in capital cases.

In addition to that, there is this principle that I have already enunciated; that is, that while our courts are made up of human and therefore fallible judges, and human and therefore fallible juries, they have an unavoidable responsibility of appraising the evidence which is given by all of the witnesses and forming their opinions concerning it. Therefore it is very difficult later on to say that there is a direct nexus or connection between the false evidence given by a particular witness and the incorrect verdict.

Mr. Zaplitny: I appreciate that, particularly the last part of the explanation. It makes good sense. But I was wondering whether or not it would be wise to make a distinction there in the connective "by procuring by false evidence". I am wondering whether it should not include the words "in good faith". It does make a difference.

Mr. Garson: It is procuring a conviction by false evidence. There is a comma there. If there were any doubt, there is a comma after procuring.

Mr. Nowlan: I was wondering about the definition of "homicide". In subclause 5 (a) it says "by means of an unlawful act." Then we go back to clause 191 which gives the definition of criminal negligence. It says:

> Every one is criminally negligent who
> (a) in doing anything, or
> (b) in omitting to do anything that it is his duty to do, shows wanton or reckless disregard for the lives or safety of other persons.

Without having a chance to check the authorities—and frankly the committee has made more progress in the last 20 minutes than I thought we were going to make, for which it should be commended—my impression is that at one time it was "owing a duty". You have that in 191 (b):

> In omitting to do anything that it is his duty to do,

Then you go back to (a) and you find:

> in doing anything—

—whether one owes a duty or not. Then you come down to clause 194 and you find that a man is guilty of culpable homicide when he causes the death of a human being by means of certain acts.

I think we are going the wrong way about this matter, Mr. Chairman. I am not asking the Minister of Justice, as some have been doing, to give his opinion on something which obviously will have to be interpreted by the courts later on, but you are opening up a whole new field in this matter when you refer to an unlawful act. Take the motor vehicles acts of the various provinces. If you drive over 20 miles an hour, or perhaps it is 10 miles an hour, you are committing an unlawful act. Now, are you going to be guilty of homicide because you happen to be guilty of not stopping at a stop sign in my town of Wolfville? You are guilty of an unlawful act. Possibly, and apparently probably under this code, you are going to be guilty of culpable homicide for so doing.

Of course the Minister of Justice will appreciate that heretofore we have had the common law and the statute law. Now, as I understand it, the whole law is included in this new code. I think we are going on very dangerous ground. Under the common law you had to owe a duty to somebody.

I go into the woods on a hunting trip and engage in some reckless target practice, we will say, in the morning after we have had a successful trip. I do not know that my friend, the hon. member for Kamloops, is anywhere within a thousand miles. I try to hit the target, and as a result he is struck and killed. I do not owe him any duty. I do not know he is there. I knew the Minister of Justice was hunting, and therefore I would owe him a duty, but I do not owe the member for Kamloops any duty; yet he is struck and killed. I was not doing anything that showed wanton or reckless disregard for the lives or safety of other persons.

I know we have passed clause 191 and that we are now dealing with clause 194. I say we should not have this definition—I will not say we should not have; it is not for me to say—but the committee should give very careful thought to this proposition, because undoubtedly we are enlarging the scope of the criminal law to an extent which I do not think many of us have appreciated, and which I think the minister himself will have to admit is going to open the question to various interpretations in the courts.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I cannot agree with what my hon. friend has said. If he will look at clause 194, which he has before him, he will see that it replaces portions of sections 250, 252 (1), 252 (4), 252 (3) and 252 (2). The substance of this has been carried into the new clause 194. If the hon. member will look at section 252 of the existing code he will find this in subsection 2:

Homicide is culpable when it consists in the killing of any person, either by an unlawful act—

—which is exactly the language being used in subsection 5 (a) of clause 194 of Bill No. 7.

—or by an omission, without lawful excuse, to perform or observe any legal duty—

—which is the substance of criminal negligence in clause 191 of this bill. Then if the hon. member will turn to clause 194 (5) he will see this:

A person commits culpable homicide when he causes the death of a human being,
(a) by means of an unlawful act,
(b) by criminal negligence.

What has been done is this. The provisions in 252 (2) of the existing Criminal Code have been carried forward into clause 194 of Bill 7, using the words "by means of an unlawful act" as a straight repetition of language from the existing section, and then referring to the phrase which appears in section 252 of the existing Criminal Code:

—or by an omission, without lawful excuse, to perform or observe any legal duty—

—by referring to that as criminal negligence, as it is made to be by clause 191 of Bill 7. Does my hon. friend follow that?

In just a moment I shall deal with this question of an unlawful act. My hon. friend is worried that a man should be brought up on a charge of homicide based upon an unlawful act. The language to which he is referring, as it appears in the existing code, has been before the courts on a number of occasions and has been interpreted by the judges. I am now referring to Tremeear, fifth edition, page 284, which states:

It has been held that the unlawful act which results in death must, to render homicide culpable, be not merely malum prohibitum,—

That is a wrong which is prohibited by law.

—but malum in se: R. v. Oxley (1914), 23 C.C.C. 262; R. v. Lawson (1938) 70 C.C.C. 384. In both these cases deceased was accidentally shot by accused while hunting in violation of provincial game laws: compare R. v. Forseille (1920) 35 C.C.C. 171.

But in R. v. Nickle (1920) 34 C.C.C. 15,—Stuart, J. with whom Harvey, C. J., concurred, said:

"In my opinion there can be no question, where we find a statute passed obviously to protect the members of the public from danger, from the danger of bodily injury, and where that statute for that purpose forbids the doing of a certain act, that the act if done contrary to the statute is such an unlawful act as is contemplated by sec. 252 . . . The circumstance that the statute is provincial can, if it is intra vires, make no difference."

This decision has not escaped criticism, but has not been definitely overruled; see R. v. Constable (1936) 66 C.C.C. 206; R. v. Wilmot (1940) 74 C.C.C. 1;

A view which might harmonize these decisions was expressed by Ferguson, J.A., in R. v. D'Angelo, 1927, 48 C.C.C. 127, where, after referring to the authorities, he said:

"—the weight of authority and the proper view of the law is that where without intent to do injury to the person or property of another death results from the doing of an act which is not malum in se but is merely malum prohibitum, the wrongful act is not the kind of an act that the criminal law requires as a foundation for a charge of manslaughter unless the statute or prohibition violated is one designed and intended to prevent injury to the person, or the prohibited act is accompanied by negligence."

My hon. friend can see therefore that this is not new law as he is suggesting; it is law which has been interpreted in a number of decisions and in the form of case law which has been clearly settled.

Mr. Nowlan: I quite agree with the minister in so far as this definition of homicide and the particular section with which we are dealing at the moment is concerned. Of course what he has stated is correct and in accordance with the law as he and I both understand it. The point which I raised, and which takes us back of necessity to clause 191, is that the present clause 194 says:

A person commits culpable homicide when he causes the death of a human being,

I am saying that the definition of criminal negligence in clause 191 has changed the law as I understand it. I do not think there is any conflict between the minister and myself as to the words, but there is a conflict in the conclusions at which we arrive. If I am right in saying that by omitting the duty part of clause 191 you are enlarging the basis of criminal negligence, then you certainly are widening the matter as set forth in clause 194 (5) (b). I say again that, as I have understood criminal negligence in the past, it consisted of doing something to someone to whom you owed a duty, or to whom you should have known you owed a duty. Clause 191 reads:

Every one is criminally negligent who
(a) in doing anything, or
(b) in omitting to do anything that it is his duty to do, shows wanton or reckless disregard for the lives or safety of other persons.

I am suggesting that as I understand the law, you have a duty under (b) and you have not a duty under (a). I could refer the minister to section 284 of the code, with which I know he is familiar, or to the reckless driving and other sections which deal with this matter and which judges have to read at great length to juries when they are charging them as to murder and so on. Section 284 reads:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, by any unlawful act, or by doing negligently or omitting to do any act which it is his duty to do, causes grievous bodily injury to any other person.

Under clause 191 as we have it now that has been struck out. I would not think it so serious if it were not for the fact, as the minister pointed out the other day, that we are doing away with the common law. We are codifying the whole matter within the pages of this statute. I am not going to take time to argue what is obviously a legal question and in connection with which frankly I am not prepared to deliver a Jovian judgment.

Despite what the minister has said, I do feel that this is enlarging to a substantial degree the scope of the criminal law as heretofore dealt with in our courts. We are removing the common law entirely from this, and are creating a situation which certainly is going to be determined not in this building but in one not too far away from here, in the very near future.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 195 to 205 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 206—Punishment for murder.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words with respect to clause 206, which provides for capital punishment. I realize this clause deals with a matter which has been referred to a special committee. I think, too, it can be said that we are now quite familiar with the position taken by the Minister of Justice in regard to matters which have been referred to that committee. Nevertheless, even though I fully understand the minister's view that a gap cannot be left in the law, the fact of the matter is that we are now being called upon to enact this clause so far as the Criminal Code of Canada is concerned.

If the suggestion I am going to make in a moment cannot be acceded to, then those of us who are opposed to the continuation of capital punishment will have no alternative but to vote against this clause. The suggestion I offer to the minister is that clause 206 be permitted to stand. My reason is that I do not believe any one of us knows how long that committee will take in its deliberations, nor have we any idea when it will make its final report on capital punishment and the other subjects assigned to it. Neither does anyone here know how long this committee of the whole is going to take in dealing with the Criminal Code. It is possible that the special committee might make its report before we have finished with all the clauses of the code here in the committee of the whole.

Bearing that in mind, I wonder if the minister would be willing to let clause 206 stand.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, might I just emphasize what we will become involved in by allowing this clause to stand. I have not the slightest objection to allowing clause 206 to stand in the same manner in which we have allowed other clauses to stand, and if this is all my hon. friend refers to then I shall raise no objection. However, if he means that by allowing it to stand we should not pass it when we pass Bill No. 7 and repeal the existing code, and that we thereby leave out of the new code for an interval of time any prohibition of the crime of murder—but I do not think he means that, does he?

Mr. Knowles: I am sure the minister would not suggest that is what I meant. In fact when I made my request I admitted that a gap could not be left in the code. Something has to be put in the code dealing with the crime of murder. My point was that conceivably the special committee might make its report before we have finished with all the clauses in committee of the whole, and conceivably it might recommend against capital punishment. If that were the result of the committee's deliberation we could, if my suggestion were accepted, then consider the report of that committee.

Mr. Garson: In the meantime it would save my hon. friend and his colleagues from giving even a small measure of support to something to which they might be opposed in principle. If that is the purpose I would be quite in sympathy with the suggestion put forward by my hon. friend.

Mr. Knowles: That is a correct statement of the purpose of my request.

The Deputy Chairman: Clause 206 stands.

Mr. Nowlan: Might I ask one question, Mr. Chairman. We have passed through a number of very important sections in an extremely rapid manner. The minister knows that the courts very often say that parliament has done so and so, and just for the record I would like to say that if the courts look at what parliament has done in dealing with these clauses they must wonder.

I would like to refer to clause 203, which I have cause to remember, and the clause thereof dealing with provocation. Can the minister tell us whether that clause makes any change in the law as that law is interpreted by the courts today, or is it merely a matter of changing the drafting of the subclause? I would like to have an explanation of that on the record.

Mr. Garson: It is a change in form only. This concerns the existing section 261, and if my hon. friend will look at that and compare it with the proposed clause he will see there has been no change in substance.

On clause 207—Punishment for manslaughter.

Mr. Lusby: I wonder whether I may ask the minister whether section 207 is really necessary in view of the provisions of clause 192? It seems to me this is merely a duplication. Surely manslaughter comes within the provisions of clause 192.

Mr. Garson: Yes, I think it is necessary. While my hon. friend is no doubt referring to the fact that punishment in each case is imprisonment for life, the clause is still necessary because while the maximum punishment may happen to be the same, the set of facts you have in one case might enable you to prove criminal negligence and no more than that, and in another case you might be able to establish a charge of manslaughter. It is therefore necessary to preserve the two clauses.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 207 carry?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take third reading of the amendment to the Export Credits Insurance Act; second reading of the Bank of Canada Act; second reading of the War Service Grants Act amendment, and then the Criminal Code.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 25, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

FURTHER STATEMENT ON POSSIBLE EFFECTS OF DIVERSION AT CHICAGO

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, yesterday in answer to a question by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) I stated that 1,000 c.f.s. diversion at Chicago would have some effect on the seaway project. I said that it would have a serious effect on power but little adverse effect on navigation. I think at this time I should make this clarification, that the hon. member's question was directed to me in so far as the seaway project itself was concerned and had nothing to do with the effect on water levels in the great lakes or in downstream interests.

Mr. Green: I included the power project.

Mr. Chevrier: In case I may have created a misapprehension or left the house under a misunderstanding, I think I should state now that the additional diversion of 1,000 c.f.s. will have an adverse effect upon navigation in the great lakes, and so far as the St. Lawrence river is concerned, while it is true that it would have little adverse effect during a high water cycle, I am informed it would have a detrimental effect on downstream interests during a period of low water.

[Later:]

SUGGESTED REPRESENTATIONS TO GOVERNMENT OF UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the seriousness of the proposed diversion of water from the great lakes, as emphasized by the Minister of Transport—I regret that I have not notified the Secretary of State for External Affairs of my question—I should like to know whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs is giving or would give consideration to recommending to the government that a special representation from the government of Canada be made to the government of the United States, having regard to the possible serious effect on our power development and transportation developments on the great St. Lawrence project?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, representations have already been made on this subject. I should be glad to table tomorrow the note from the Canadian government to the United States government.

WHEAT

STATEMENT WITH REGARD TO 1952-53 WHEAT POOL

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement to the house in regard to the 1952-53 wheat pool. Briefly, the record of the 1952-53 pool is as follows:

Receipts from producers from August 1, 1952 to July 31, 1953 amounted to 533,016,978·9 bushels. The pool also received 103,208,409·5 bushels from the 1951-52 pool by transfer and 2,110,381·9 bushels were received from others than producers. The total volume of wheat received by the 1952-53 pool was therefore 638,335,770·3 bushels. The pool commenced with an initial payment of $1.40 per bushel basis No. 1 northern in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver. On March 2, 1953 the initial price was increased to $1.60 per bushel and an adjustment payment of 20 cents per bushel was made on all grades of wheat except Durums, delivered to the pool between August 1, 1952 and February 28, 1953. On September 24, 1953 an interim payment of 12 cents per bushel was authorized and paid on all grades of wheat delivered to the 1952-53 pool by producers.

Of these total receipts of 638,335,770·3 bushels, remaining stocks on January 30, 1954 were 148,679,561·7 bushels against which the board had priced open sales contracts of 21,404,291·1 bushels. The net stock position on January 30, 1954 was 127,275,270·6 bushels.

The Canadian wheat board has recommended that the 1952-53 pool be closed as at January 30, 1954 and remaining stocks as well as priced open contracts be transferred to the 1953-54 pool as at January 30, 1954. The board further recommended that priced open contracts should be transferred on the basis of contract prices and that unsold stocks of wheat should be transferred basis at market prices less an allowance for carrying charges subsequent to the transfer and for market risks.

The government has concurred in the wheat board's recommendation in respect to closing the 1952-53 pools and the basis of the transfer to the 1953-54 pool.

The final surplus in the 1952-53 pool is $58,282,438.38 after deducting the Prairie Farm Assistance Act levy and final payment expenses and adding estimated interest earnings subsequent to January 30, 1954. This is the net surplus payable to producers and amounts to an average of 10·934 cents per bushel on their deliveries to the 1952-53 pool.

I might add that including the proceeds of the interim payment last fall, which amounted to $63,962,036.83, the total surplus in the 1952-53 pool was $122,244,475.21 over and above the adjusted initial price of $1.60 per bushel basis No. 1 northern in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver. This compares with the final surplus in the 1951-52 pool of $114,585,112.69.

The final 1952-53 payment to producers on the principal grades of wheat will be as follows: No. 1 northern, 9·653 cents per bushel; No. 2 northern, 9·963 cents per bushel; No. 3 northern, 10·341 cents per bushel; No. 4 northern 13·454 cents per bushel; No. 5 wheat 9·292 cents per bushel; No. 6 wheat 14·397 cents per bushel; feed wheat, 14·679 cents per bushel.

The foregoing payments also apply on toughs and damps of each grade.

Prior to the deduction of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act levy, the net price realized by producers for No. 1 northern wheat basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver will be $1·81871 per bushel. The corresponding realized price for the 1951-52 pool was $1·83569 per bushel.

The house will be interested in the results obtained in respect to milling grades of Durum wheat. During 1952-53 board receipts of Durum wheat were 8,288,289·8 bushels. Hon. members will recall that effective March 2, 1953, the initial price of Durum grades of wheat was increased to $1.65 per bushel basis No. 1 amber Durum and the adjustment payment on all grades of Durum was 25 cents per bushel. The final payment on the principal grades of Durum wheat are as follows: No. 1 amber Durum, 45·747 cents per bushel; No. 2 amber Durum, 47·472 cents per bushel; No. 3 amber Durum, 53·646 cents per bushel; No. 4 amber Durum, 52·115 cents per bushel.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

The above payment will also apply to toughs and damps of each grade. Prior to the deduction of P.F.A.A. levy, the net price realized by producers for No. 1 amber Durum basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur was or will be $2·2330 per bushel as compared with $1·83569 per bushel in 1951-52. The high final payments on milling grades of Durum wheat are due to a very active demand for this variety of wheat and a limited supply not only in Canada but in other exporting countries.

The wheat board is in a position to commence the distribution of the final payment on the 1952-53 wheat pool on or about March 15.

Mr. Fulton: Explain.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Perhaps you need an education.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a supplementary question, though before doing so I would intimate that the prices he has announced are quite satisfactory. My supplementary question is this. Can the minister inform the house whether it will be government policy this year, as in recent years, to make an interim payment on the current wheat crop? As the minister is no doubt aware, this is about the date in previous years when an interim payment was made.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, government policy will be announced in due course. I may say, however, for the information of the hon. member, that an interim payment will not be made at the present time for the very good reason that we have not as yet sold any wheat from the last crop.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

THIRD AND FOURTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT

Mr. H. B. McCulloch (Pictou) presented the third and fourth reports of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the fourth report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

DEFENCE WORKERS HOUSING, HALIFAX

Mr. Balcom:

1. How many houses have been built in Halifax area under the defence workers housing loans regulations?
2. What is the amount of the loans on these houses?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Houses built or in the process of being built number 80.

2. Individual loans range from $6,000 minimum to $10,000 maximum and in total amount to $615,890.

WOLFVILLE, N.S., PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. Nowlan:

1. During the calendar years 1952 and 1953, what was the total amount of money expended for repairs, renovations and additions to the dominion public building at Wolfville, Nova Scotia?

2. During the same period, what was the total amount of money expended on the grounds of the said building for (a) grading; (b) paving?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Calendar year 1952, $48,943.35; calendar year 1953, $117,336.85.

2. (a) and (b) calendar year 1952, $3,077.82; calendar year 1953, $2,353.98.

Note: It is not possible to give the breakdown for grading and paving, as both are included in one general contract.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—CHARCOAL

Mr. Pouliot:

1. From whom did the Canadian National buy its charcoal during each of the last five years, and at what price?

2. What was the address of the suppliers of such charcoal?

3. What quantity was bought from each of them?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. (a) Mr. Alexandre Paquet.

(b) It is not the policy of the company to divulge the nature and details of contracts or orders between the railway and other parties for the supply of materials required for company use.

2. St. Raymond, Que.

3. See answer to No. 1(b).

TENDER C-18-1T-24-14

Mrs. Fairclough:

1. To whom did the Department of Defence Production award the contract covering item No. 48 of tender C-18-1T-24-14?

2. What price was quoted by the successful tenderer?

3. What was the range of prices quoted by all tenderers?

4. How many tenders were received?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Sterling Stamp and Stencil Company, London, Ont.

2. $5.88 per set, sales tax included, terms net, delivered.

3. $5.88 per set to $17.82 per set.

4. Eleven.

Questions

BILINGUAL CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. Girard:

1. What proportion of civil servants are bilingual?

2. What proportion of civil servants of English origin are bilingual?

3. What proportion of civil servants of French origin are bilingual?

4. What is the proportion of government publications and stationery printed in both languages?

Mr. Pickersgill:

1, 2 and 3. No information is available. Except where bilingualism is a qualification for a position, no attempt is made to determine whether candidates for the public service are bilingual though they are usually asked about the extent of their knowledge of the two official languages. Many public servants, of course, have considerable knowledge of both official languages who would hesitate to describe themselves as bilingual.

4. So far as publications are concerned, the proportions are approximately 70 per cent in English and 30 per cent in French. No attempt is made to measure the proportions for stationery as any standard of measurement would be practically meaningless.

TAX COLLECTIONS, 1953

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

How much was collected by the government in 1953 from (a) excise tax; (b) sales tax?

Mr. McCann:

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

HAROLD C. BANKS

Mrs. Fairclough:

1. Did the Minister of Labour or his officials, following the press reports of court proceedings in Montreal, take steps to inform themselves as to the background of Harold C. Banks before his appointment as the Canadian representative to the conference of I.L.O. at Geneva was approved?

2. If so, did the Minister of Labour consider the said Harold C. Banks an appropriate representative of Canadian organized labour at such a conference?

3. When Mr. Banks' appointment and intended departure for Geneva was fully reported in the press, did the Minister of Justice or his officials inform the Minister of Labour regarding Mr. Banks' court record? If so, on what date?

4. At the time Mr. Banks came to Canada did he enter as an immigrant intending to reside in Canada, or as an organizer coming to this country temporarily for the purpose of organization?

5. If he came as an immigrant, did his declaration disclose his court record in the United States?

6. If so, why was he admitted?

7. If not, on what date was it discovered that the declaration was incorrect and what action was taken in pursuance of such discovery?

Inquiries of the Ministry

8. If Mr. Banks did not enter as an immigrant, under what arrangements has he remained in Canada during the past five years?
9. Was the Department of Citizenship and Immigration at any time made aware of the court record of Mr. Banks in the United States?
10. If so, what action did the Department of Citizenship and Immigration take in regard to this matter?

COMMUNISM

ALLEGED COMMUNIST PUBLICATIONS IN CANADA SUBSIDIZED FROM ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. It is based on an article in today's Montreal Gazette, reporting a statement made by an official of the citizenship branch, to which I have called the minister's attention. My question is this. Does the government hold the view there expressed that there exists in Canada a group of communist publications whose aim is the furtherance in Canada of the objects of international communism, which are subsidized from abroad, guided from Toronto, and aimed chiefly at new Canadians?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member indicated that he intended to ask a question but until I heard him speak just now I did not know what the question was going to be. I have seen the article referred to in the Montreal Gazette. It is a report, which is not in quotation marks, of a lecture delivered last evening to a group known as the Montreal co-ordinating council for new immigrants. In so far as the report is concerned I see in it nothing that is contrary to the knowledge that exists in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. The citizenship branch particularly has in it liaison officers whose duty it is to visit groups of new Canadians, to see that they understand the perils of communism as it is preached in Canada, and to take active steps to prevent new immigrants from coming under the influence of these people. Parliament votes the money for that purpose, and I think that duty is being carried out reasonably well.

So far as concerns the opinion expressed that there is in Toronto a headquarters from which communist propaganda is disseminated, I think it is common knowledge that the headquarters of the Labour-Progressive party was at one time, if it is not now, in the city of Toronto. I think it is also common knowledge that there are 12 or 14 foreign language newspapers which follow the communist line. The speaker, Mr. Boyd, was attempting to show how they followed a common line in almost everything, including an effort to undermine all the institutions in Canada that we try to uphold.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration or possibly the Minister of Justice, or both. I should like to ask whether there exists in Canada any legislation under which effective action can be taken to deal with this alleged communist-directed group who are aiming newspaper propaganda at new citizens. If so, I should like to ask what plan the government has for action accordingly?

Mr. Speaker: Is that question not in the nature of asking the minister to give a legal opinion?

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Speaker: If there is legislation in existence, the hon. member can certainly make his own research on the matter. If the minister knows of one statute that he can quote to the hon. member, so that he can satisfy him, that is all right; but I would imagine that the hon. member could perhaps make his own research on the point.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, a question similar to that one has been asked on a number of previous occasions; but if there is objection to the form of the question, perhaps I could put it this way. What action does the government propose to take to deal with the serious situation disclosed by an official of the citizenship branch of the minister's own department?

Mr. Harris: I thought I made it clear that the citizenship branch engages in activities designed to reach new Canadians especially—but all Canadians, as a matter of fact—in order to warn them of the evils of communist doctrines. As to the legal position with regard to any action to be taken against persons, I think my hon. friend will know perfectly well that that matter rests with the attorneys general of the provinces to prefer prosecutions under any laws there may be on the subject and for offences under them.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CANCELLATION OF COAL ORDER—DRUMMOND COLLIERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the house the reasons why the Canadian National Railways cancelled a coal order that was to be supplied by the Drummond colliery located at Westville, Nova Scotia?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was courteous enough to send me notice of his question. I had been expecting this question now for some days and I had asked the Canadian National Railways for an explanation of the position. This is what the railways tell me.

The Intercolonial Coal Company ceased operations on October 29, 1953, after the mine was closed down. It was purchased by a Mr. Henry Thompson of New Glasgow and reopened as the Drummond Coal Company. The coal was never good but since the mine has reopened it has been even worse. There were delays in train service in December, January and early February due to the use of Drummond coal which was supplied to our locomotives at Joffre. On account of the complaints received from the operating department our fuel department has recently been sampling and analysing a number of cars of Drummond coal received at Joffre. The average ash content was 22·7 per cent which was about 3½ per cent higher than that of the coal we previously received from the Intercolonial Coal Company. Additional impurities have been found in the coal in the form of a hard heavy stone which the railways understand is known locally in Westville as "iron stone". The samples of this material indicate that it is hard and large enough to cause serious trouble to stokers of our locomotives. Apart from a small tonnage, the C.N.R. are receiving no coal from any other source that approaches 19 per cent ash, and for the reasons given above the C.N.R. have refused to continue taking Drummond coal. The maximum ash content accepted on United States coal is 10 per cent and on Canadian coal it is 14 per cent.

That is the purport of the information given to me by the Canadian National Railways.

WHEAT

SUGGESTED GIFT OF SURPLUS TO NEEDY COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, as a result of many letters I have received from persons in my own riding and in other ridings, I should like to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister and Minister of Defence Production. Has the government received any resolutions or petitions from various organizations across Canada asking that some of our surplus wheat be given to those countries which are unable to supply their needy people with sufficient food? Has consideration been given to this matter?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have had no notice of this question. I would have to look through the files in order to make sure whether or not we have had any such letters. I believe we have had some from time to time. The question of giving away the property of the western producers is a serious matter. There might be objections. However, I shall be glad to prepare an answer and to give it at a later time.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Thank you.

POST OFFICE

HIRING OF CASUAL LABOUR ON SATURDAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General in view of press reports of recent days. Will the Postmaster General say whether or not his department has decided to abandon its previously announced intention of using casual help for the Saturday delivery of mail?

Hon. Alcide Coté (Postmaster General): I can only refer my hon. friend to the reply I made the day before yesterday to a question on the matter, wherein I promised to make a statement. I am hoping to make a statement tomorrow.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY PROJECT—INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION IN ECONOMIC FEASIBILITY SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he prepared to answer a question that I asked on the orders of the day on February 15? My question then was as follows:

In view of the fact that the United States government has decided to investigate the feasibility of the development of the Passamaquoddy power project, is it the intention of the government to join in that investigation?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am in a position to answer this question now. It is one about which I have also received inquiries from the hon. member for Charlotte. The answer is that the Canadian government has not been informed that the United States government has decided to investigate or to ask for an investigation of the feasibility of the development of the Passamaquoddy power project. The position is almost the same as it was when I answered a similar question by the hon. member for Royal on January 19 of this year. A resolution to request the international joint commission to undertake such a survey has been approved by the United States Senate but it has not yet been considered by the House of Representatives in Washington.

If the resolution is passed, and if as a result the United States government wishes the international joint commission to undertake the survey, the Canadian government would be prepared of course to give consideration to any proposal for a joint reference for that purpose. As I mentioned on January 19, the proposed survey is not a new idea. It was indicated in a report by the international joint commission, dated October 20, 1950, that a full-scale survey of this type would be necessary if the economic feasibility of the project is to be fully determined.

LIVESTOCK

EXPECTED OUTBREAK OF EQUINE ENCEPHALOMYELITIS—PREVENTIVE MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister's attention been drawn to reports that a very serious outbreak of equine encephalomyelitis is expected in Saskatchewan this spring? If so, can the minister state whether or not the department is taking any steps to assure a sufficient amount of vaccine to combat the situation or to encourage farmers to vaccinate all horses?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the hon. member gave me notice of his question. In reply to the first part I may say that I have not seen the article referred to by the hon. member for Moose Mountain. With regard to the second part of the question, I am advised that this is not a reportable disease under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and therefore is a matter which will be dealt with by the provincial authorities. I am further informed that the vaccine is manufactured at the University of Saskatchewan and is available in commercial quantities. It is customary, however, for officers of the health of animals division of this department to closely observe all developments of this nature in order to be kept informed regarding the situation, and that is true with regard to this particular case.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO JOINT MEETING TO CONSIDER INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I have a question which I wish to direct to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, but as he is not in his seat it can stand as notice. I sent him a copy. Can the minister inform the house of the approximate date when representatives of his department will be meeting with the coal operators of Nova Scotia and the mine workers jointly for the purpose of determining the future of the coal industry? I may say that if we can have that meeting we may get some answers to the statement made by the Minister of Transport.

DUMPING

INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION OF AMENDMENT TO ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. member for Calgary South on Monday, February 22, and again on Tuesday, February 23, asked what products had been affected by the recent amendment to section 35 of the Customs Act. It will be recalled that on December 8, in reply to a question from the hon. member for Greenwood, I indicated that under this measure any industry which found itself suffering from unfair competition in the same form as the textile industry would be in a position to receive the same relief. To date action has been taken in respect of cotton dress goods and refrigerators.

Mr. Knowles: Does the answer the minister has given mean that there have been representations to his department from Canadian manufacturers interested in refrigerators?

Mr. McCann: It means exactly what I said. To date action has been taken in respect of cotton dress goods and refrigerators.

Mr. Knowles: When the legislation was brought in was it anticipated that it would cover refrigerators?

An hon. Member: For one who knows the rules—

IMMIGRATION

READMISSION OF HAROLD C. BANKS TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether he is now in a position to answer my question of February 23 regarding Mr. Banks.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The answer to the present question is yes and the answer to the former question is yes.

Mr. Hamilton: I should like to ask the minister whether his department has located its file on Mr. Banks, which an official stated a couple of months ago had been mislaid.

Mr. Harris: For the second time I point out in answer to my hon. friend's question that I think you have ruled many times, Mr. Speaker, that the purpose of the question period is to obtain information. I have no knowledge whatever about his present question. It has not been drawn to my attention that any official of my department said that the file had been mislaid. If he will be good enough to tell me about it, I shall look into the matter.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE AUTHORIZED CAPITAL STOCK, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 295, to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BANK OF CANADA ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MANAGEMENT, EXCHANGE, TO PERMIT SHORT TERM LOANS ON INSURED MORTGAGES, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 297, to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned on the first reading of this bill, many of the proposed amendments to the Bank of Canada Act deal with rather minor matters and to a considerable extent involve a tidying up of the act. Since it is the intention that this bill be sent to the banking and commerce committee as soon as it has received second reading, it does not seem to me necessary or desirable that I should go into these matters of detail in the house at this stage. However, with respect to the more important amendments which are being proposed, members might find it of some help if I gave a brief review of the considerations underlying the changes involved.

Perhaps I might start by reviewing the present and proposed provisions regarding the chartered banks' cash reserves. At the present time the chartered banks are required to maintain at all times a cash reserve equal to at least 5 per cent of their Canadian dollar deposit liabilities. This requirement was established in 1934 following a period in which the cash reserves of individual banks had on occasion fallen to rather low levels. I might say that now, with a central bank in operation, it is inconceivable that a situation would arise where there would be a shortage of cash reserves such as existed in the early 1930's.

Minimum cash reserve requirements are important not only because they ensure that banks will maintain an adequate liquid position but also because of their relationship to the cash reserve policy of the central bank. The most important function of the Bank of Canada is to influence the volume of money and credit, and the normal way in which this influence is brought to bear is through changes in the cash reserves of the banks. An increase in cash reserves tends to encourage banks to expand their assets; a decrease tends to discourage expansion. However, the effectiveness of the cash reserve policy depends to a considerable extent on the firmness of the relationship between the banks' cash reserves and deposit liabilities. If the banks allow the relationship to vary much, there may be no response, or only a very slow response, to a change in cash reserves. The minimum cash reserve requirement is important in this connection since it establishes a level at which banks must respond to decreases in their cash reserves.

Experience has shown that the 5 per cent minimum is too far below the ratio which each bank normally regards as its target—in the neighbourhood of 10 per cent—to prevent the banks in certain circumstances from allowing, even though reluctantly, their average cash ratio to fall well below the target level. In an inflationary period, when demands for bank loans are at a peak, and when it is appropriate for the central bank to attempt to restrain the expansion of money and credit, banks are sometimes willing to allow their average cash ratios to fall below the normal target level and the size of the central bank's task becomes very much greater. In such a situation the present methods of central bank action available to the Bank of Canada may not always be sufficient to cope with the problem of restraining credit expansion in an effective and orderly way. This is also true of situations where other special factors, such as the inflow of foreign funds, may create a temporary but substantial excess of cash reserves.

To overcome these difficulties it is proposed that the minimum cash reserve requirement, based on the daily average for each calendar month, be 8 per cent of deposit liabilities and that the Bank of Canada be given power to vary this minimum requirement between 8 and 12 per cent, provided that the chartered banks are given a minimum period of one month's notice before each increase becomes effective and that any one increase is not more than 1 per cent. When this legislation comes into force, the initial minimum requirement will of course be 8 per cent. Having in mind that the 8 per cent minimum will be calculated on a daily average basis, I do not feel that the practical result will involve a more onerous requirement than the present arrangement.

The addition of the power to vary reserve requirements to the techniques now available to the Bank of Canada in implementing monetary policy will bring them into line with those of central banks in other countries. However, it is not the intention or expectation that this power is one which will be frequently used. Much more likely it will be limited to special and temporary situations where the present methods of restraining monetary expansion need to be supplemented. Incidentally, it is believed that an announcement by the central bank of an increase in reserve requirements would have helpful psychological effects. It would be a specific indication to the chartered banks' customers that restraint in the use of credit was necessary, and that the banks' capacity to increase loans was being restricted.

Until now, the requirement that banks observe a minimum cash reserve requirement has appeared in both the Bank of Canada Act and the Bank Act. It is now proposed that only the provisions regarding the power to vary the requirement should be included in the Bank of Canada Act. All other provisions relating to cash reserve requirements, including the detailed provisions with respect to the basis on which the requirement is to be observed and the statistical information and declarations which are to be maintained, will be made part of the Bank Act and will be available for discussion when the amending legislation is introduced.

In addition to the amendment regarding cash reserve requirements, there are three other important proposed revisions which I might mention briefly. In view of the proposed provision in the National Housing Act allowing banks to make insured mortgage loans, it is proposed that the Bank of Canada should have the power to make short-term loans to banks on the pledge or hypothecation of mortgages held by them.

At the present time there are certain limitations on the amount of securities, issued or guaranteed by the government of Canada or any province, which the Bank of Canada is allowed to hold. Holdings of such securities which do not mature within two years are limited to 50 per cent of the bank's outstanding note issue and deposit liabilities, and holdings of securities which do not mature within ten years are limited to an amount equal to five times the paid-up capital and rest fund of the bank. It is felt that these arbitrary limitations are no longer necessary or desirable and it is proposed to remove them. At the same time it is proposed that greater detail of the bank's securities holdings be given in the weekly and monthly returns to the Minister of Finance which are published in the Canada Gazette.

The rest fund of the bank is now just over $10 million, having been provided out of profits in accordance with the original act. Owing to the substantial growth of the total assets of the bank, it is thought that additional capital funds should be provided by increasing the rest fund to $25 million. This would be accomplished by appropriating one-fifth of the annual profits to the rest fund each year until the desired level is reached.

As I indicated at the outset of my statement, Mr. Speaker, I propose, at the conclusion of the debate on second reading, to move that the bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee, and the governor of the Bank of Canada will be available to explain the technical aspects of the amendments which are being made to the act.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As the minister has indicated, this measure will go to the banking and commerce committee, so it is neither desirable nor possible at the moment to talk about the details. It seems to me that the measure is of great importance in extending the powers of the Bank of Canada, and it seems to me also it is worthwhile to dwell just for a few moments on the vast powers which the Bank of Canada has, and has had over the last 20 years. We have come to take them so much for granted that we do not often think about them. I propose to spend a very short time in directing attention to them.

As the minister has indicated, apart from details of personnel of directors and their remuneration, the three things that this measure really does are, first, to introduce a new power with regard to mortgages and real estate; secondly, to extend to some extent the general investment powers of the bank, though that is not very far-reaching; and thirdly, to deal with the question of chartered banks' reserves and their relationship to the Bank of Canada.

I said a moment ago I though it was worthwhile to draw attention to the really vast powers over our day to day lives that have been vested in the Bank of Canada. I think these powers could best be indicated by reading the preamble to the act, but even before that I should read a short extract from the Macmillan report outlining what that commission considered to be the duties of a central bank.

I hope you are not getting uneasy, Mr. Speaker, because it does seem to me—I assure you I shall be brief—that when we are extending substantially the powers of this institution, as we are, it is relevant to spend a very few moments in reminding ourselves, as we very seldom do, of the very great powers that institution has. I submit that with deference, Mr. Speaker, and also with a good deal of earnestness. The Macmillan report says briefly at page 63:

> . . . the central bank . . . should endeavour to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation and should so far as possible control and defend the external value of the national monetary unit. In the second place, from the international point of view, the central bank by wise and timely co-operation with similar institutions in other countries, should seek, so far as may lie within the scope of monetary action, to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of economic activity.

I now wish to read the preamble to the Bank of Canada Act, because it really echoes some of the words of the Macmillan report. The preamble is short and says:

> Whereas it is desirable to establish a central bank in Canada to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation, to control and protect the external value of the national monetary unit and to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action, and generally to promote the economic and financial welfare . . . etc.

I just wish, Mr. Speaker, to say a further word about the extreme range of those powers—to regulate credit and currency, to control and protect the external value of the monetary unit. It is no exaggeration to say that the action of the Bank of Canada affects every one of us in our lives because, to go no farther, here you have a power placed in the hands of a few men who are in close conjunction with the government. These few men have the power of controlling the spendable money in circulation in Canada. I need not point out what that means to all of us. It means that the central bank, by its actions, can stimulate or slow down the economic activity of the country. It can have a great influence on prices, and I need not explain why. The argument is perfectly obvious.

Then the central bank has great power over the chartered banks. We have discussed that in the house before. It is no exaggeration to say that the chartered banks really need nothing but a request from the central bank in order to comply with that request.

At any rate, I think that is a fair summary of what has happened in the last 20 years, and particularly the last 15 years, during which time the central bank has played a very important part in our lives. I am referring of course to the 15 years since the outbreak of war.

That would lead one to ask this question: is there any restriction of any kind on the powers of the central bank, or is it left to the judgment of a group of men to exercise this important function?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but since he has indicated to me that he is dealing with the powers under which the Bank of Canada operates, I have listened carefully to him and, unless he wishes to go back to the principle of the amending bill, I think I must warn him that we are not discussing the Bank of Canada Act at the moment. We are, rather, discussing a bill to amend the Bank of Canada Act, which is a quite different proposition.

The hon. member may say, of course, "My line of argument, as you will see, Mr. Speaker, will bring me back to the amending bill." But my problem is that the hon. member is entitled in this instance to speak as long as he wishes in the debate on second reading; and if he is going to speak for, let us say, 35 minutes, about the general powers of the Bank of Canada, and then tie that up with the amending bill for perhaps five minutes, it would defeat the purpose asserted in the rules.

I know the hon. member will co-operate. I must say I have looked closely at the marginal notes in the bill, and I do not see how the powers of the Bank of Canada generally, put as he says in the hands of a group of men, can be considered to be relevant to the principle of the amending bill. With one exception, I do not think these clauses in the bill affect the powers of the Bank of Canada Act at all.

Mr. Macdonnell: I defer to Your Honour's ruling, of course; perhaps unintentionally I may have wandered. However, I think Your Honour will agree that the point I am now going to make is entirely relevant, because it has to do with the question of whether there should be any restriction of power in any way. And I suggest to Your Honour that the real principle of the measure before us is that it does extend very substantially the powers of the Bank of Canada.

I am now about to refer—this is really my last point, and I can reassure Your Honour as to the question of the time during which I shall speak—to a restriction of the bank's power which, I suggest, is relevant because in the measure the government seeks actually to make the powers still wider.

The point I wish to raise now, one which I am sure Your Honour will find is well within the limits of the rules, is that I now ask the question whether there is at the present time any restriction—and I can answer that there is not, and that the Bank of Canada at the present time really has no restrictions over its powers of creating currency. But I would point out that when the bank was set up there was such a restriction, which has now been done away with. It is the doing away with that restriction to which I wish to refer, and in that connection to quote some of the experts who have expressed opinions in the matter.

I repeat that when we are extending powers, as we are in this measure, surely it is relevant to consider whether the powers are unlimited, whether they were always unlimited, and the reason for the removal of the limitations. We must consider whether there is an argument to be made for the restoration of some limitation.

In this connection I should like to read section 23, formerly section 26, of the Bank of Canada Act which says:

(1) The bank shall always maintain a reserve, as hereinafter provided, as security against its outstanding notes and deposit liabilities.

(2) The reserve required by this section to be maintained shall consist of gold coin and bullion in the unrestricted ownership of the bank equal to an amount not less than 25 per cent of the notes and deposit liabilities aforesaid.

That restriction, I am informed, was removed in 1940, during the war, and all the gold that was in the custody of the bank was then transferred to the management of the foreign exchange control board for the foreign exchange fund. And from that time until 1952 an order in council was passed, year by year, rendering the maintenance of the reserve unnecessary.

Then in 1952 the following section was passed in the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act:

Notwithstanding section 26—

And that is now section 23.

—of the Bank of Canada Act, the Bank of Canada is not, unless the governor in council otherwise prescribes, required to maintain a minimum or fixed reserve ratio of gold or foreign exchange to its liabilities.

In other words, Your Honour, we now have a situation wherein the brake which did exist has been entirely removed.

I should like in that connection to refer to an extract from the Macmillan report, which was the basis of the setting up of the bank. I refer particularly to a statement made by Sir Thomas White who, at one time, occupied the position now occupied by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). Sir Thomas White has very strong words to say about the maintenance of a 25 per cent gold reserve. It will be noted that Sir Thomas White and Mr. Leman of Montreal, who was at that time the general manager of one of the banks, filed dissenting memoranda. Sir Thomas White said:

I join with my colleague, Mr. Leman, in his strong criticism of granting to the board of the proposed bank the power to carry their cash reserves either in gold or foreign exchange. He has pointed out the grave risk involved in relying to too great an extent upon the stability of such exchange and to the necessity for maintaining a 25 per cent gold reserve in Canada.

I mention that merely to show that that view was held by competent people at that time. And as I have mentioned Sir Thomas White I should like to add that some of the views he held which some people were inclined to regard as old-fashioned eight or nine years ago, have now proved to be not so old-fashioned, at a time when Dominion of Canada bonds are selling on a 3·75 basis.

In the committee on the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act of two years ago we had a very interesting sitting attended by the late Dr. Clark, then deputy minister. I should like to read briefly from one or two of the answers he gave, because I think they are relevant. Dr. Clark answered a question I had asked him—and which purposely I had put in a rather extreme form—in this way:

Perhaps I should ask you now whether you accept fully the view that after all we have a managed currency and there is no check of any kind on it except the judgment of a group of men of whose judgment we think highly and if that is a fair statement of your attitude does that mean that you feel that we should entirely dismiss from our minds the idea of reserve, that we have outgrown them?

To that he answered, "no, no." Mr. Dumas also asked Dr. Clark:

Would you say that it would be in the interest of the country, if in our reserve we had more gold than we have, if we had gold instead of U.S. dollars.

To that Dr. Clark answered:

I do not think it makes very much difference. There are reasons for which you want gold and there are reasons for which you want U.S. dollars. We keep a certain amount in both . . . the amount we are holding in gold has been increasing recently.

I want now to apologize here for quoting briefly from my own remarks when speaking two years ago in the committee of the whole in the debate on the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act. I was pleased to find this because I am glad to know that I am not talking differently today from the way I talked two years ago. That is always a satisfaction to anyone in our way of life. I should like to quote from page 3786 of Hansard of June 26, 1952, where I am reported as follows:

In the discussion in the banking and commerce committee yesterday this point of a fixed reserve was raised, and I should like to put this discussion briefly on the record.

Let me say here, lest I forget, that I am not suggesting that Dr. Clark had committed himself to the 25 per cent gold reserve. I am suggesting merely that he did not sweep out the idea of a reserve as something which sensible men could not talk about.

There is of course the view which has been expressed in this house this afternoon that money should be entirely a managed thing, that there should be no attempt to impose a check of any kind.

I want to interject here to say that it will be remembered that in 1947 there were strong differences of opinion among us as to the parity at which the Canadian dollar had been fixed and there was a great loss at that time of gold and American exchange. I think anyone, whether he agrees or not with the desirability of having a gold reserve, will agree that if there had been a provision for a gold reserve we would at that time have had to stop, look and listen earlier, and to some of us that would have been an advantage.

That was discussed in the committee yesterday, and I think it would be fair to say the view of the experts was that while at the present time they felt that it was wise to leave in abeyance clause 26—

Now clause 23.

—of the Bank of Canada Act—in other words they did not think it was wise to reimpose the requirement of 25 per cent gold backing of the currency—nevertheless they did not go the length of saying that a reserve check of some kind was an outmoded superstition.

And then later on I said:

I am not going to pursue this at length, but I do want to have it on the record that I think the question of a reserve of some kind, a check on the purely managed currency, should not be regarded as an outworn superstition. I think it should be seriously considered. I am not going to ask the committee to spend time considering it this afternoon. I am anxious just to put it on the record.

Incidentally, when we come to the committee I hope that that will be considered seriously. We are in danger I think of having almost too much satisfaction in our supreme wisdom and forgetting that there are events beyond our control. We have in fact been going through 15 years of boom and that does not always give one all the answers.

I want to thank you, sir, for your kindness in allowing me to put forward these views and I on my part intend to co-operate with you by carrying out what I said about not speaking at length. I do hope that when we get to committee this matter will be taken seriously. I think we should remember that, as I said at the outset, we have under this act put in the power of a few men almost unbelievable control over the lives of the rest of us.

As I have said, for 15 years we have been in a boom and we are inclined to think that that was due to our supreme wisdom. It has been due very largely to events over which we have no control. Therefore I hope that when we come to the committee we shall be ready with open minds to consider the situation and I hope that the chairman of the committee will be as indulgent as you have been and permit a discussion again of metallic reserves.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this bill, as has already been said by the minister and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), will go to the banking and commerce committee. I am sure that we all hope that in the banking and commerce committee there will be a very thorough review of the Bank of Canada Act and that the proposals contained in this bill will be thoroughly considered and discussed.

I may say that in a general way we are in support of this bill. There are details which our members on the committee will inquire into, question and perhaps make some further proposals. I think time has vindicated the establishment of the Bank of Canada.

Perhaps it may not be out of place if I paid a tribute to the people who pioneered the idea very largely in this house, and indeed across the country. An examination of Hansard in the period from 1921 to 1935 will, I think, indicate very clearly who they were. Mainly they were the members of a very able group of farmers and labour men who occupied the southeast corner of this chamber. It was a strange turn of events in 1935 that saw most of them eliminated from this house. I think the educational work which they did was used and that the monetary proposals they made were brought to an illogical conclusion, mainly in the province of Alberta in 1934 and 1935.

This bank was established first by the government of the late Viscount Bennett, partly as a publicly-owned and partly as a privately-owned institution. In 1936 it was thought proper that it should be brought under public control and made entirely a publicly-owned institution. As this bill very clearly indicates, the bank was established to serve a number of purposes. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Greenwood, its primary function then was and still is "to control or regulate the volume of credit and money in circulation".

Prior to that time the legislation pertaining to the issue of notes, paper currency, money and so on, was unsatisfactory. Then again central banks were being created throughout the commonwealth. We therefore created this institution. We are now called upon to consider and amend the act under which it was created. In the years before there was very little control over bank policies by the parliament of Canada or by any institution reporting to the parliament of Canada.

The chartered banks had the privilege of extending credit and issuing their own bank notes. The only control was within the institutions themselves, within the chartered banks. Mainly they thought in terms of the safety of their depositors' money. I readily recognize that, although there was the added incentive of protecting their own institutions and of profit to their shareholders.

The factors which brought about this act, factors which are still with us and therefore would come under a discussion of the amendments, are dangers inherent in any banking system. The general public became anxious about the safety of their deposits. This was brought home to them at the time of the failure of the Home Bank and the difficulties into which the Merchants Bank got in the 1920's. Then of course there was the financially dangerous situation which developed in the early thirties when the government of that day found it necessary, in order to prevent panic, to allow the banks to publish balance sheets showing their securities at the figures of a few years earlier, when the assets were greatly inflated.

I say this because when this bill comes before the banking and commerce committee and amendments are considered I think these facts should be borne in mind. Another factor, of course, which promoted the original bill was the fact that under a competitive commercial banking system there should be a central bank to control currency and credit. That was evident in the twenties and thirties when credit was extended in boom times, and called in when depression came. I think a cursory reading of the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada, in 1933, will confirm that this was so.

The purpose of this bill, I take it, is to do what we have actually been doing over the last 20 years or more, namely to define more clearly the powers and function of this institution in the light of experience. No one seeks to change that complete monopoly over the issue of all forms of currency, but under the Bank Act of 1934 it was contemplated that the banks would continue to issue some currency. However, in 1944 it was decided that that privilege would cease immediately, and in 1950 any outstanding notes issued by the chartered banks were taken over by the Bank of Canada and the banks paid the Bank of Canada the value of those remaining in circulation at that time.

As the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) said, these amendments do not interfere in any respect with the monopoly given to the Bank of Canada in these matters, nor does it in any way interfere with their responsibilities in carrying out their functions in accordance with the act. Consequently, the issue of credit and particularly currency today is, of course, not only the responsibility of the Bank of Canada but, indeed, the responsibility of this parliament, whose instrument the Bank of Canada is.

The minister is now suggesting that the legal reserves which must be carried with the Bank of Canada by the chartered banks shall be increased from 5 to 8 per cent, and under certain circumstances up to 12 per cent. I believe that was the figure the minister gave. That is an increased safety factor.

As a matter of fact, I believe the banks themselves in the last few years have not maintained a reserve of 5 per cent, but have maintained reserves considerably in excess of that figure extending at times to the higher figure which the minister mentioned in the course of his remarks. Hence, from now on, the banks will have rather less discretion than they had before as to the ratio of cash reserves to their liabilities to their depositors. I believe this will be satisfactory to the people of Canada who will feel that this is a more adequate protection or will be when these amendments are written into the Bank of Canada Act.

Of course, this ratio which the minister proposes is an important factor in the regulation or control of the credit the banks may issue to the public. Our central bank through its operations can expand or contract the country's credit simply by increasing or decreasing the reserves of the chartered banks, and to my mind, though this may not be the most important, it is a most important function of the Bank of Canada.

I believe that was demonstrated in the early years of the depression in another country, and I remember when this act was under discussion trying to bring to the attention of the house the operations carried on in Sweden, where they used the open market and where, when they needed to put money into circulation, they bought government securities. When they wanted to take money out of circulation they sold government securities with the result that in the early 1930's, when we had financial and grave economic difficulties, Sweden was in a fairly happy position. They were able to bring about a certain amount of stability in their economic relations and in their financial system through open market operations. Now the Bank of Canada can reduce the cash reserves of the banks by selling some of its large holdings of government securities. Conversely it can buy securities and thus increase the amount of credit available for loans.

I believe that, because of the provision in the bill for an increase of legal cash reserves, we are protected to an extent that we were not protected in the early years of the 1930's or in any other period of boom which came before the depression of the 1930's. When the central bank has paid for securities by means of a cheque drawn on the chartered bank concerned, and when this cheque is presented for payment at the chartered bank, it results in the reduction of its reserve deposits with the Bank of Canada and therefore limits the amount of credit it may grant. Conversely, if they wish to adopt the other course they can expand credit to an extent.

The late Dr. Clark, whom the hon. member for Greenwood quoted a few moments ago, gave another very interesting slant to the Bank of Canada Act which I would like to draw to the attention of the house, because these amendments emphasize Dr. Clark's opinions. Speaking before the banking and commerce committee of 1944 when the last decennial review of the chartered banks' charters and the Bank of Canada Act were under discussion, Dr. Clark said:

> The Bank of Canada is the channel through which the monetary policy of the government is put into effect.

In other words, Dr. Clark believed that in reviewing the charters and the Bank of Canada Act we were not only reviewing the policies of the banks and of the central bank but were also reviewing the financial policy of the government, because it is the financial policy of the government which is carried out by the central bank.

It seems then that this institution is not by itself responsible for the policies which it puts into effect, for it puts into effect the policies approved by the government. Consequently, the government must take responsibility for the success or failure of policies which are put into effect through the central bank.

May I also add that I hope the committee will make a pretty thorough review of what these policies have been in recent years. I believe that that can be done, because the bill contains wide powers and considerable latitude. For example, the bank may buy and sell bullion from the United States. It may also buy and sell:

> . . . short term securities issued by the United Kingdom . . . having a maturity not exceeding six months from the date of acquisition by the bank;

There is an indication of government policy, a policy which lays it down that certain securities of the United States may be bought without limitation as to the period, but that the United Kingdom securities may be bought provided that they have a maturity not exceeding six months from the date of acquisition by the bank. I think that that is a matter into which the committee should inquire very carefully, namely, as to why this provision is in the bill. It has puzzled me and I have no doubt that the committee will try to elucidate it.

I think that we should also inquire into the effect of the government's policies regarding currency and credit upon the economy and the people of Canada over the last number of years. In looking over the reports of the Bank of Canada I have been struck with the fact that the money supply in Canada has largely outrun or gone beyond the gross national production. Why was that the policy of the government since the war? Was it that another policy might have interfered with the value of government securities in Canada such as bonds and so on? I do not know. However, I think that matter should be looked into very carefully.

I think also that when the committee considers these amendments, they might consider how the efficiency of the control of currency and credit can be improved. Of course, at the moment, you have the central bank and you have the chartered banks and at times there is to some extent a conflict of interest between them. The chartered banks are profit-making institutions naturally and their interests do not always lie along the same road as that of the policy which the Bank of Canada is carrying out. It seems to me that when you have an increase in the money supply at a time when the production of goods is not keeping pace with that increase, you are bound to have inflation. I would ask the committee to go into the situation with a view to seeing what effect the policies of the bank and the banking institutions have had in the last seven or eight years on inflation in Canada.

I do not want to go beyond the scope of this bill. I had perhaps intended to do so but when Mr. Speaker suggested to my friend the hon. member for Greenwood that he should not do so and my hon. friend agreed, I felt that I would try to do the same thing. However, I should like to point this out. In 1945 the gross national production in dollars of constant value—and I am using as a dollar of constant value the dollar in its purchasing power between 1935 and 1939—was $9,315 million; in 1950 it was $10,330 million, again using what I have termed "dollars of constant value". In 1945, our total money supply was $5,905 million. In 1950 it had risen to $8,712 million. That is a rise of approximately $1,000 million in gross national production compared with a rise of approximately $2,800 million in the money supply. By "money supply" I mean the public's deposits with the banks, ignoring Canada savings bonds, short-term government securities or other savings of the public that are found in other financial institutions.

As I say, such figures raise in my mind at least an immediate question. Is the central bank of Canada, with its present powers under this act, and with the amendments that we are proposing to make in this bill, able to control the supply of money to the extent necessary to combat inflation or—what is equally important—to prevent deflation? We may be entering upon a time when deflation may be as significant to us as inflation has been over the last few years.

Of course we believe that other powers are required than those which are contained in the act or in the proposed amendments to the act. As is generally known, we favour the public ownership and control of the commercial banks because we believe that eventually that course will be necessary. We also point out the desirability of controlling the flow of investments, a matter which I will not discuss this afternoon. We think that a national investment board to direct investments into socially desirable channels is a step which should be taken. We set up an industrial development bank. I do not know just how successful it has been and I am not going to discuss that matter now. But we believe that there exists a gap which should be filled. May I say to my friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that it is not a new idea to him because it was in the Liberal election platform during more than one election campaign some years ago.

Mr. Macdonnell: Along with reform of the Senate.

Mr. Coldwell: I have forgotten whether it was in 1919 or in 1925 or 1926; it was some years ago. I do not think it was ever removed, as a matter of fact.

Mr. Knowles: It was just put on the shelf.

Mr. Coldwell: What I am getting at is this. I do not think that the government has used all the powers given in the Bank of Canada Act. Perhaps in seeking the new powers it has in mind doing something more. However, it has not used the powers it has to control credit to the extent which under the act—I mean under the main act—would have helped to prevent the post-war inflation that we have suffered. Indeed, it was not until 1951 that the governor of the Bank of Canada met the managements of the chartered banks, and came to an agreement with them that certain changes would be made, and that action was taken after the inflationary damage had very largely been done.

If I may, I should like to quote from a document in support of what I have just said, namely an article entitled "Recent Developments in Canadian Monetary Policy" published in the American Economic Review last May, at page 55. The author is Mabel F. Timlin of the University of Saskatchewan. The quotation is as follows:

> In only one year shown in the annual reports of the bank (namely 1947) did the record show a decline in chartered bank reserves and the governor has explained (annual report of the Bank of Canada, 1947, pages 23 to 24) that the correlative decline in security holdings of the central bank was a consequence of government redemptions at a time when the bank was otherwise an active purchaser of short and medium-term bonds. The total series of reports (i.e. annual reports covering the bank's entire history) shows a reserve expansion of nearly $670 million and the astonishing thing is that 31 per cent, or $208 million of this expansion, took place since 1945; that is, after the extraordinary expansions of the war. Perhaps still more surprising is the fact that two-thirds of the post-war expansion took place in the years 1950 and 1951 when the bank was supposed to be following a "definitely restrictive approach to the whole question of credit restriction".

That quotation, of course, ties in with what I have just said about the amendments to the bill. Since this article was written—and it was written in May, 1953—the annual report of the Bank of Canada indicates a decrease in chartered bank reserves of $11·4 million in 1953. Thus only in two years since the war, namely in 1947 and 1953, have chartered bank reserves decreased; in other words their ability to issue credit and to make loans declined only in those two years.

In all the other years since the war the reserves of the chartered banks showed an increase and hence, in our opinion, inflation was promoted. Consequently the suggestions made in the bill with regard to bank reserves are very important. An examination of the production and monetary situation since the end of the war leads me to say that I think the government itself can be blamed for failure to promote a better balance between fiscal and monetary policies and production to combat inflation. This taken in conjunction with the removal of wartime controls explains the manner in which the costs of living have increased and gives valid reasons why both farmers and workers have been asking for better returns for their produce and their labour.

The main point I wish to make is that either because of insufficient control of the chartered banks, which we believe can only be effectively undertaken by public ownership of these institutions, or by failure of the government to use the central bank as effectively as it might have done, inflation got out of hand. I say that the committee should inquire into this matter, and I think the government and not the bank must assume responsibility for it.

I should like to summarize what I have in mind by a quotation from the monthly report of the Bank of Nova Scotia for the month of March, 1952. It reads as follows:

> Judging by the experience of the past quarter century, there is no doubt that changes in the money supply are much more important than changes in the rate at which money is used. It is, therefore, clear that effective control of the money supply is of great importance in maintaining orderly economic conditions, and in combating inflation. From the standpoint of inflation, what matters is not so much the actual increase in the supply of currency and bank deposits but whether the supply of money is increasing more rapidly than the quantity of national production.

It seems to us that has been the case in the years between 1945 and 1953. Therefore we say, because the powers in the act which are now to be extended have not been used to the extent that they should have been, that Canadians have suffered from preventable inflation since the end of the war. I will not develop the thought I have in mind because, in view of what the Speaker said, it might be considered to be outside the scope of the bill at the present time. But I would hope that some consideration will be given to the setting up of a national investment board. I believe there is a gap there. With the large funds accumulated by various financial institutions in the country, I believe that the time has come when we should endeavour, through an institution answerable to parliament, to direct the flow of such funds into fields that are socially desirable, into the development of our resources, into housing, into great projects like the South Saskatchewan river dam, the St. Lawrence seaway and so on which we need for the expansion of Canadian resources.

Therefore I hope that when the committee meets it will review the operations of the Bank of Canada very thoroughly and go into many other phases of the problem upon which I have not touched because I do not want to go outside the principle of the bill. I sincerely trust that a very thorough inquiry will be made and that we may get a report from the committee recommending further improvements in this very useful and, indeed, most essential of our Canadian financial institutions.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks let me say that we consider the major proposals contained in the bill a definite step in the right direction. I refer to the amendments dealing with cash reserve requirements, and I am going to confine my remarks mainly to that matter. But on the other hand we feel that they are too restricted in degree to permit the government to institute what we consider to be a sound financial policy. By that I mean a policy that will encourage optimum development of our resources and permit the equitable distribution of the goods and services resulting from that development. I think most members would agree that during any long period of peace that has not been the case.

I want to say a few words with regard to the division of responsibility between the chartered banks, the Bank of Canada and the government with relation to the question of cash reserves. First of all, may I say that we in the Social Credit group are not critical of the chartered banks. I know that impression has got abroad, but we consider the chartered banks to be a highly efficient organization. On the other hand, we believe that they could give even greater service under a sound financial policy that would help to level out the booms and depressions from which we have suffered in the past. The chartered banks, in considering the question of whether or not they should expand their loans, have, I think, to consider three main points. First of all, they must consider the creditworthiness of the borrower. I would say that is the main consideration. Then they must consider the effect that that expansion will have upon their cash reserves. The third point is the relationship between the amount of loans they make and the securities that they may hold—in other words, their position of liquidity.

I would say that it is not the responsibility of the chartered banks to decide whether or not the action of making additional loans will be an inflationary one. The question as to whether an over-all expansion of credit would be unduly inflationary is a matter for the Bank of Canada to decide in conjunction and in consultation with the government of the day. Then the Bank of Canada controls the expansion and contraction of credit by either expanding or contracting the cash reserves of the chartered banks. We are of the opinion that the amendments proposed in the bill will provide greater efficiency in controlling the cash reserves of the chartered banks. However, the actual responsibility for financial policy must rest with the government and not with the Bank of Canada.

I would certainly take issue with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) on that point. I know that many people in this country will blame the Bank of Canada for financial policy instead of the government. I think that has perhaps arisen from the statement made some years ago by the then deputy governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Osborne. It will be recalled that some years ago Mr. Osborne stated that no self-respecting central bank would accept from the government a policy with which it did not agree. That matter was brought up in the House of Commons and the minister of finance of that day, Mr. Charles Dunning, pointed out that the statement did not really mean what it appeared to say. He said that all it meant was that if the policy of the government was one with which the Bank of Canada did not agree then the governor of the bank and his officials would resign, but the policy of the government would prevail.

While it is true that the government's financial policy has provided the money required to maintain a maximum war effort and has also operated quite satisfactorily in periods activated by the fear of war or in periods after war when the costs of war are still being met in the form of rehabilitation, reconversion and many other things, such is not the case during any prolonged period of peace.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Now, the Bank of Canada was set up in 1934 as a privately-owned institution. Then, when the Liberals came into power it was turned into a publicly-owned bank. I believe we were all pleased, at least in this party, when that change was made. The interesting point to note is that, in spite of the fact that the central bank was set up in 1934 and continued in operation from then on, we continued in a depression up until 1939. From 1936 to 1939 we repeatedly urged that the government borrow from the Bank of Canada in order to finance the various national projects, housing projects and others, not merely for the purpose of providing employment but for the purpose of providing the services that the people desired and that we were capable of providing.

It is interesting to note the objection that was taken at that time to that proposal. It was argued that borrowing from the Bank of Canada would be more inflationary than borrowing from the chartered banks, the argument being that when money was paid out by the Bank of Canada it would increase the cash reserves of the chartered banks which would enable them to expand their loans on the ratio of 10 to 1 for the increased cash reserves. We suggested that argument could be overcome by the adoption of what was known as the 100 per cent cash reserve system. Under it we would have amended the Bank Act to compel the chartered banks to maintain a 100 per cent cash reserve behind their demand deposit liabilities. In order to secure the necessary cash they would have been able either to sell securities to the Bank of Canada or to borrow against them.

The argument against that, as presented by the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada, was that it would be too hard upon the chartered banks because they would lose the revenue from the securities that were turned over. As was pointed out by Babson back in 1936, that would not be necessary. All that would be necessary would be for the Bank of Canada to make a loan at a nominal rate of interest against the securities turned over by the chartered banks, and in that way the 100 per cent cash reserve would be maintained without any loss of revenue on the part of the chartered bank by the securing of that cash against their securities.

We pointed out at that time that that was one means. We were never dogmatic on the subject. We pointed out there were many other ways the chartered banks could be prevented from expanding their loans as a result of utilizing the services of the Bank of Canada. The simplest proposal that we made was merely that, when money was issued through the Bank of Canada, the chartered banks would be required to increase their cash reserves in order to take care of the amount of money that had been issued, thereby denying them the right to expand their loans on the basis of the increased cash reserve. It is for that reason we welcome this measure because it provides for action of that kind, so that in the future we can make the cash reserve requirement variable as the situation warrants.

It will be recalled that upon the outbreak of war in 1939 the government borrowed from the chartered banks about $200 million within three months, I think it was, and expanded the savings of the people. Then, we borrowed the savings of the people by floating bond issues. Then, we borrowed again from the chartered banks in order to expand the amount of money in circulation and still further expand the savings of the people. Then, we borrowed the savings of the people. We carried out that process during the war. The net result of those transactions was a very heavy increase in the debt of the country. I note that, according to the Canada Year Book for 1948-49 and 1952-53, the gross debt in 1939 was $3,700 million and increased to $18,900 million in 1946; then dropped to $17,250 million in 1952.

Perhaps it would be fairer to take the net debt, so I will give the net debt for the same years. In 1939 it was $3,152 million; in 1946, $13,421 million; and in 1952 dropped down to $11,185 million. The interest charges on the net debt were $114,800,000 in 1939; $338 million in 1946 and down to $314 million in 1952. Unfortunately, today interest rates are going up so the interest charge on that net debt will also be going up correspondingly. While it is true that the government did finance the war in a way that provided whatever money was needed to maintain the maximum war effort, it cannot be argued for one minute that we maintained a pay as you go policy. It will be recalled that at the start of this war it was the intention of the government to maintain a pay as you go policy to the greatest degree possible.

On several occasions during the war we urged that, to the extent that heavy taxation and heavy borrowing from the savings of the people failed to meet government expenditures and it became necessary to have expansion of credit, that expansion of credit should take place through the Bank of Canada instead of the chartered banks. Then again we argued that in order to prevent that having an inflationary effect as a result of action by the chartered banks, we should increase the cash reserve requirements of the chartered banks to the amount necessary to make it impossible for them to use this increased cash as a basis for the expansion of loans.

After the war the Canadian economy remained in what you might call high gear, mainly as a result of reconversion of plant and equipment and the large loans that were made to foreign nations as well as the fact that people were spending the savings that had been developed during the war as a result of the compulsory savings feature of government policy. But by 1950 the situation had become tight again. Then, the Korean war blew the government economic policy off the rocks once again, and the situation became fairly liquid. Today we appear to be right back in the situation in which we were in 1950. I notice that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) stated that the situation today is similar to the situation that existed in 1950. No doubt many people are now asking whether or not there is another war around the corner that will once again help to revive economic activity within this country. No doubt when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) returns from his tour around the world he will be in a position to reassure the members of the house on this point.

It does seem to me that one thing is certain. If it looks as though we are now entering a prolonged period of peace the government will be forced to take action to maintain the development of the resources of this country, to provide employment, to provide markets, and to provide for loans at a low rate of interest for housing the people in the low income brackets. It is quite evident that financial corporations are not going to be able to make that money available. The next question then is, if that is going to be done, how will a program of that type be financed? In 1943 I participated in a broadcast with the governor of the Bank of Canada entitled "The Shape of Things to Come". The subject was post-war finance. During that broadcast I asked Mr. Graham Towers a question—and I quote it now because I think it has a very direct relationship to the situation we are in at the present time. This was my question:

> After the war the need will be to encourage private spending. Heavy taxes and public borrowing will be contrary to the public welfare. Will the government finance all desirable public projects by credit expansion when necessary?

To this Mr. Towers replied:

> In circumstances such as Mr. Quelch describes, I would say that there would be grounds for the government not meeting the entire cost of its program by taxing and drawing on public savings. The desire would be to encourage private spending and make government investment more of a residual item. If part of the necessary money had to come from credit expansion—and the projects were sound and in the public interest—then I would say go ahead.

Mr. Speaker, I would say that is just about the type of situation we appear to be running into at the present time. Some people look at the reports of the chartered banks, read that there is $5 billion of savings deposits, and jump to the conclusion that there is a large amount of money available for investment. But as was mentioned the other day by the president of the bankers association, that is not money available for investment. It is money that has already been lent, and is represented by loans. And therefore at the present time, if the chartered banks desire to expand loans, steps would have to be taken to increase cash reserves to allow them to make an expansion of credit on the basis of the increased cash reserves.

I say we have that situation today, because we hear a lot about unemployment increasing and we hear a good deal about the accumulation of inventories and surpluses. We read that today in some cases industries are having to reduce their production by 50 per cent. Then, in addition, we read that there is a very heavy program of instalment buying. I read that this amounts to 30 per cent of all sales—and I do not know whether that is a correct figure. However, we do know that there is a very heavy program of buying on the instalment plan, which shows that people who desire to acquire those things available for sale have not the money with which to buy them and, hence, are buying on time.

I think most hon. members will agree that perhaps the most immediate problem which needs to be met is that of providing houses for people in the low income groups. This cannot be provided by money from the various financial institutions, such as life insurance and mortgage companies. It seems to us that the logical body to provide finances for the financing of projects of that kind—housing, irrigation and any other projects—would be the government, through the Bank of Canada. And if there is to be credit expansion, then we certainly believe that that credit expansion should take place through the government's borrowing from the Bank of Canada.

Now, the proposed amendment gives the Bank of Canada the power to alter the minimum cash ratio to be maintained by the chartered banks within the limit of 8 per cent and 12 per cent of deposit liabilities. That is, the minimum cash reserve requirement will be raised from 5 per cent to 8 per cent; and then the amount to be held as cash reserve by the chartered banks will be made variable at the discretion of the Bank of Canada. There will be no change made in cash reserve requirements in excess of one per cent in any one month.

Having in mind that at the present time, in round figures, the deposit liability of the chartered banks is in the neighbourhood of $9 billion, and their cash reserves are in the neighbourhood of $900 million, then we find this situation. The general practice of the chartered banks is to maintain a 10 per cent cash reserve, so even if we raise the cash reserve requirements of the chartered banks to the full 12 per cent, it would only allow the government to borrow approximately $180 million from the Bank of Canada, without expanding the cash reserves of the chartered banks above the 12 per cent level. If they did, then the chartered banks would be able to expand their loans to 10 times the amount of the excess cash over that reserve.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we feel that the 12 per cent figure should be raised to at least 16 per cent, as a start. Then, as time goes on, and if it becomes necessary to increase the cash reserve requirements beyond that figure, it could be done, in order to allow greater leeway in borrowing by the government from the Bank of Canada.

Furthermore, we are of the opinion that there is no justification for limiting to one year the period of repayment of loans by the Bank of Canada to the government. We feel that the limit should be removed entirely. However, I realize that perhaps the government has no intention whatsoever of borrowing from the Bank of Canada. It will no doubt say that the amendments being made in connection with cash reserves are not for that purpose. But on the other hand we are faced with a situation where money must be available at a low rate of interest for various projects such as those I have mentioned—housing, irrigation and many other projects which may be considered worth while—in order to provide employment for the large number of unemployed we have in this country and thereby raise their standard of living.

After all, this is the government's responsibility. We have suggested a means by which it might be done, with only slight modification of the amendments proposed in the bill. Our suggestion would provide means of directing money to depressed areas at a low rate of interest through the government making loans to municipalities. It is all very well to have power to expand the cash reserves of the chartered banks in order to provide a high level of activity, on the general level; but it is high time we had the means by which we could actually direct money into a depressed area. It appears that we do not have the power to do that; we do not have the machinery.

The minister has pointed out that this bill is to be referred to the committee on banking and commerce. Therefore I shall leave anything further I have to say to a time when the bill is before that committee. So far as some of the other amendments are concerned, I do not consider them of very great importance. There is the matter of arranging for the Bank of Canada to take mortgages into their portfolio on short-term loans. But I think it is quite evident that, in so far as the chartered banks are concerned, they are not likely to make much use of that provision; because they hold somewhere near $2,500 million in dominion bonds. Therefore, why should they try to get short-term loans on mortgages when they can obtain satisfactory returns on some of the securities they already hold? And certainly, judging from the remarks we have already heard from the president of the bankers association, they do not consider that provision is going to amount to very much.

In closing, let me say that we are not at any time attempting to be dogmatic in suggesting what should be done. We are merely pointing out that we have a situation in which there are large numbers of unemployed, a situation where there is urgent need for national housing to satisfy the requirements of people in low income groups. The evidence has shown that those people in the low income groups can obtain housing only if the money is loaned at a low rate of interest. We feel the government would be the logical body to do this. After all, this is a question of governmental responsibility; and we will back the government in any measures they may take in order to solve that problem, whether or not such measures are in line with the proposals we advocate.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make only two brief observations about the bill. The first is in connection with the bank's right to buy gold in coin or in bullion form, as of course it has the right to buy silver in coin or bullion form or, of course, nickel and copper coins. I want to mention this because should an open bullion market be established in Canada, nothing would preclude the Bank of Canada from entering that market and buying either bullion or coin on the open market, just as at the present time it buys securities of the Dominion of Canada and I presume of other nations. I do not know whether it buys United States securities, but I would imagine that it would at times buy short-term American securities. So if a bullion market were established it would not mean that bullion gold would be hoarded, because of this provision of the Bank of Canada Act.

I want to make one further observation on the question of the definition of foreign exchange. Acceptable foreign exchange to the bank can be boiled down to currency convertible on demand at a fixed price into exportable gold. That is the sole qualification of a convertible currency. Let us assume that even if Russian rubles were freely convertible into gold at a fixed rate they would be acceptable as foreign exchange under the meaning of this act.

I think that shows more clearly than perhaps anything I could say the importance of the restoration by Canada of gold as a medium of exchange, and the facilitation of all measures by which currencies can be brought within this definition of acceptable foreign exchange as soon as possible, that is, convertible at a fixed rate into exportable gold.

I think that shows that gold is the one common denominator which is acceptable as a medium of convertibility. I would, as I shall on another occasion, urge that all possible steps be taken to bring gold out of the national hoards where it is now and use it as a measure to facilitate convertibility of all currencies. Canada in this regard is in a unique position to take the lead.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I have been very interested in this measure and in the remarks of the minister. While in full support of the amendment, I wonder why the provision with regard to the reserves of the chartered banks is put within rather tight limits, and why it is not left to the discretion of the governor and the board of the Bank of Canada. I presume the reason for this measure has been the need for greater control over the purchasing power in the country.

I think this is the time and the suitable place to call the attention of the house to the rather remarkable history of the Bank of Canada during the years since the end of the war. As we all know, we experienced a period of rapid upward spiralling of prices and a spiralling of cost of living which caused considerable embarrassment to various governmental authorities. During that period, for a curious reason which I shall refer to later, the Bank of Canada, far from acting to curb that inflationary spiral, apparently acted in precisely a contrary manner, as is revealed by its own Bank of Canada statistical survey.

We find that in 1945 the gross national product of Canada amounted to $9,315 million and the total money supply to $5,905 million. In 1950, five years later and after we had gone through some of the worst inflationary periods of our history, we find curiously enough that the gross national product was $10,330 million and the total money supply $8,712 million. In the case of the gross national product there was an increase of 11 per cent, while in the case of the money supply there was an increase of over 50 per cent. I presume that must have been the result of open market operations on the part of the Bank of Canada.

The question arises as to why they followed that course during a time when inflation was giving governmental authorities many headaches. The only conclusion I can come to is that it was necessary to maintain the market value of dominion government bonds. Possibly that was a perfectly logical reason for that action on the part of the Bank of Canada, because the government had virtually promised the people during the war years that their investment in government bonds would be readily redeemable at par any time. Moreover, as the government was facing the necessity periodically of refinancing, it was necessary to maintain public confidence in government bonds.

Here was the problem the government faced, working through the Bank of Canada. It was impossible to do the two things at the same time, maintain the market value of dominion government bonds and decrease the cash reserves of the chartered banks and by that means decrease the total money supply of the country. The government chose to maintain the level of government bonds.

I suggest that that points to two things, one of which was mentioned by the leader of this group when he was speaking; that is, the necessity of the government of Canada ultimately controlling the entire banking system of the country. It points also to something else, and I have a particularly personal interest in this. It points to the fact that this all stems from the government's financing policies during the years of the war.

As I say, I have a personal interest in this matter because I recall that on one occasion I was attacked in this chamber by a member of the House of Commons—I was a member of another legislative body at the time—who urged the authorities to have me arrested because I had suggested that the government's method of financing the war was bound to lead to serious inflation and trouble after the war, that the method of financing by over 50 per cent loans was merely piling up trouble for the future. We are meeting that trouble today.

I presume that the government is hoping to cope with this trouble by means of various fiscal and monetary measures about which we have been told on occasion. I would point out that we are now entering a policy of economic contraction—I doubt whether my right hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) would object to that modest expression—and it will not be possible for the government, purely by fiscal means, purely by monetary means, purely by the operations of the Bank of Canada, to combat that contracting tendency in the economy. In order to initiate expansion there will have to be something similar in nature to the projects which were undertaken by the government of Canada during the war, and from which stemmed the credit expansions which at that time had to be pooled or dammed, shall we say, and which at the present time are causing the inflationary troubles which have been in existence for the past few years.

I would commend to the government their own economic and financial history in facing the problems we have to face, including the problem of housing the Canadian people; and I would suggest to them that they will require to use the same sort of powers and mechanisms which they used in order to launch Canada upon its program of production during the war years.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind hon. members that if the minister speaks now he will conclude the debate.

Mr. Abbott: My principal purpose in rising now is to thank those who have taken part in this debate for the contributions which they have made. I think it has been a very useful and helpful debate. As I indicated at the outset, the bill is to be referred to the banking and commerce committee. I shall be present at that committee, as will my deputy minister and the governor of the Bank of Canada, and the rather technical questions which are involved in this measure in connection with the operations of the Bank of Canada can be discussed there. Questions which have been raised here by hon. members can be more fully elaborated in committee.

I agree with my hon. friend from Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) that the Bank of Canada does exercise very considerable powers. It was intended that it should. Its main responsibility has been to control the volume of credit and currency in Canada. I agree too though, as the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) pointed out, that these responsibilities cannot be entirely divorced from government responsibility; and the fiscal policy of the government can, of course, have a very significant effect on the operations of the central bank.

Fortunately in this country there have never been, as far as I know, any differences of opinion between the management of the central bank and the minister of finance of the day. That has not always been true in other countries, and in my opinion the effects of these controversies are sometimes very unfortunate. However, I am sure hon. members will not expect me to discuss in detail or even refer specifically to the particular points which they have raised, all of which I believe we can deal with in the banking and commerce committee.

I would just like to make one reference, though, to the statement made by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) to the effect that during the war the government asserted that victory bonds issued at that time would always be—I use his own words because I have a note of them here—"readily redeemable at par at any time".

Mr. Coldwell: That was the inference drawn from Mr. Ilsley's remarks at that time.

Mr. Abbott: It was an entirely unjustified inference. I have had occasion to deal with it before, and the statement Mr. Ilsley made was to the effect that a ready market would be available for government bonds at all times and that they would be redeemable at par on their due date. That has always been true, and that was the meaning of the statement made by the Minister of Finance. It may be, however, that some salesmen in their enthusiasm paraphrased his statement; but anyone who knows anything about these matters would realize that if the government undertook to guarantee that its very long-term securities would be redeemable at any time at par they would be in effect converting long-term securities into demand obligations; and as I have said many times, and I repeat, you cannot have absolute security, absolute liquidity, and a reasonably high interest rate all in the same instrument.

As I said, I simply wanted to clear up what I thought was an unjustifiable inference which may have been drawn from a statement made by the hon. member for Nanaimo. I hope that in the banking and commerce committee we shall have a very useful and profitable discussion on this measure.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

WAR SERVICE GRANTS ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING TIME LIMIT ON RE-ESTABLISHMENT CREDITS, EXTENDING BENEFITS, ETC.

Hon. James Sinclair (for the Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 82, to amend the War Service Grants Act.

Mr. Brooks: Is the parliamentary assistant going to give an explanation?

Mr. C. E. Bennett (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) made a full statement in connection with this bill at the resolution stage, and I do not think I can add very much to what the minister said on that occasion.

The War Service Grants Act, as hon. members know, was passed in 1944, and this is a bill to amend that act in certain respects. Under the proposed legislation the time within which a veteran may apply for his re-establishment credit is extended by five years. As of December 31, 1953, there remained unused $35,045,209.23 on behalf of 174,729 world war II veterans. The amount of $3,283,786.50 has been set up on behalf of Korean veterans. As of December 31, 1953, 12,624 applications had been received from Korean veterans, with payments totalling $1,267,875.29.

Another amendment fixes January 1, 1957, as the final date for a veteran to take advantage of the benefits of the Veterans Land Act as the result of an adjustment made pursuant to section 13 of the War Service Grants Act. This bill also broadens the scope of the section dealing with the use of the re-establishment credit of a deceased veteran.

Another amendment will also permit a veteran who has unused re-establishment credit to obtain a contract of insurance under the Veterans Insurance Act, despite the expiration of the time limit under the Veterans Insurance Act.

It is also provided in this bill that December 31, 1954, shall be the last day upon which a member of the forces may apply for the war service gratuity, unless the person has had overseas service and the minister is satisfied there are circumstances which justify the delay. World war II gratuities amount to a total of $469,788,790. As of June 30, 1953, approximately $500,000 remained to be paid to about 8,500 veterans. The cut-off date for the payment of gratuities after world war I was April 21, 1924, so the time limit after world war II for the payment of these gratuities has been considerably longer. The $500,000 now on hand represents, for the most part, gratuities payable to veterans who had short service and service in Canada only.

After the War Service Grants Act was passed in 1944, the payment of gratuities became a normal part of the discharge routine. Personnel discharged before 1944 had to apply for their gratuities and, as I say, some 8,500 veterans have not yet applied. Since 1951 letters have been sent to all veterans who had not applied for their war service gratuity, and approximately 3,400 applications have been received and the gratuities paid.

It is proposed to examine the files of the 8,500 veterans, and every attempt will be made to advise each veteran of his entitlement. District offices of the Department of Veterans Affairs will be used to try to find the veterans, as also will the facilities of the press. The Canadian Legion, along with other veterans' organizations, will be asked to co-operate.

As the minister has already informed the house it is the intention, if it meets with the approval of the house, to refer this bill to the special committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the parliamentary assistant for his explanation, which is very much the same as that given by the minister when the resolution was before the house. We all remember the War Service Grants Act very well. It was one of the most comprehensive acts dealt with by the veterans affairs committee in 1944.

The principle in this present bill, as the parliamentary assistant has stated, is to extend the time during which veterans may apply for their re-establishment credit. It seems strange that there are still some 170,000 veterans who have not yet applied for this credit. The amount involved, I understand, is about $35 million. I agree entirely with the bill. I feel that the extension for another five years is necessary, having regard to the large amount involved and also the strange fact that so many veterans have not applied.

As was pointed out, the bill does not extend the time by five years in all instances. There was a rather anomalous situation, I think, with reference to one section of the bill which I shall not discuss at this time. We shall have ample opportunity to do so when the bill is before the committee.

While the time is extended for the veteran to make application for other purposes—I note that particularly under this section of the Veterans Land Act and also section 13 of the War Service Grants Act—provision was made for a veteran to take advantage of his re-establishment credit either in whole or in part for the construction of a home using the National Housing Act. While an extension until 1960 is granted under other circumstances, it is only extended from 1955 to 1957 as far as this housing section is concerned.

It is not necessary for me to point out to the house that housing is probably one of the most important problems which the veteran has to face. The Legion, in their brief to the cabinet a short time ago, particularly stressed the necessity for veterans housing. When this bill is sent to the committee I hope this section dealing with veterans housing will be given very careful consideration, and that the time will be extended.

The thought occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps in the Veterans Land Act some provision is being made for this omission which I have mentioned. In the press a short time ago I noticed a report that the Veterans Land Act is to be amended to provide for veterans constructing their homes in towns and cities on smaller lots than are required under the act at the present time. It occurred to me that if the Veterans Land Act is to be amended, it is quite possible that this omission is being dealt with. As I say, I hope the matter is being dealt with, because an extension of two years to assist the veteran in the construction of a house is certainly not a long enough time. When the matter comes before the committee I know it is something with regard to which an extremely strong protest will be presented.

I do not think there is much else I wish to say, Mr. Speaker. Having regard to the fact that there is still an amount of $500,000 owing in gratuities, I agree with the bill; I think that for those who had overseas service the time for application should be extended five years. It is not so necessary for the veteran who had service only in Canada. I also agree that the re-establishment credit should be made payable to orphan children under certain circumstances as provided in the bill, and also to dependent mothers who are not wholly dependent. With all of these features of the bill I am in perfect accord, Mr. Speaker. As I say, this bill is going before the veterans affairs committee. At that time we shall have every opportunity to discuss and study it further.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). There is not much necessity for a debate on this matter at this time. It is hard to understand the fact that so many veterans are leaving their credits and gratuities outstanding. It is something I cannot figure out. Of course, the cut-off date will come some time; and as in the case of several other bonuses that we established, it is when that cut-off date is reached that you have a good deal of trouble. Everybody will realize then that they have applications to make. It might not be a bad idea for hon. members, when they are making their parliamentary broadcast records to send back home, to comment on this matter and urge anyone who has an outstanding account in that regard to get his application in.

There are two points with regard to gratuity credits that I have argued over the years. The first is the fact that gratuity credits are not payable outside of the country. That fact has worked a considerable hardship on veterans, both men and women, who found that it was easier for them to rehabilitate themselves in the United States, particularly, than in Canada, and who moved there. Of course their gratuity credits are not payable outside of Canada. It even appears to be quite difficult to convert the credits into insurance. If you wanted to buy insurance with them, it was difficult to do that. That is a matter that requires looking into.

There is another angle to gratuity credits which works hardship, and that is the fact that if the soldier dies after coming back to this country and his credits are still in the hands of the department, they are not payable to his next of kin. I have wrestled with several cases like that and have never succeeded in getting them straightened out. Of course the act says that the dependent must be wholly dependent upon the deceased soldier for support at the time of his death. The interpretation of the words "wholly dependent" seems to be rather difficult to sort out. However, when the bill is before the veterans affairs committee we shall have the chance to argue out this detail. I hope the committee will be set up as soon as possible so we can get at these things.

While I am at it I should like to say this, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to use all the influence at his disposal to have the War Veterans Allowance Act referred to the committee so that we may give it a working over at this time and finalize it as far as it is possible to do that.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, before the minister replies and closes the debate, I wish to say a few words. I do not know that I have a great deal to say on the bill. I understand that it is going to the committee on veterans affairs, a committee which has not yet been set up. Since it is going to the committee I should like to say this, and I want to remain within the rules in saying it. I am not quite satisfied that when the minister spoke the other day he indicated what the committee's terms of reference were going to be. I urge that the terms of reference should give that committee the widest possible scope.

I believe this is the time for those who are interested in war veterans allowances to be heard. I believe that the briefs which have been submitted to the government and to members of the house in the last while by various local Legion groups as well as Legion headquarters should be given the greatest possible consideration, and this whole thing should be revised. We are beginning to get letters from all over the country from elderly war veterans, burnt-out men, war veterans widows and others who are in sad need.

Therefore in these few remarks I do urge the minister and his parliamentary assistant to see to it that the committee to be set up has the widest terms of reference, for if there is one class of people in the country who have ample justification for real consideration it is these men who offered their lives in the past for the country, and their families, who are now forced to eke out a living. I make that suggestion to the minister, and I trust that he will indeed take note of it.

Mr. C. E. Bennett (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind hon. members that if the parliamentary assistant speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Bennett: I am not sure that I understood exactly what the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) meant, but I should like to assure him that as far as the availability of the re-establishment credit to veterans for use in purchasing homes under the National Housing Act is concerned, this bill does not change the time limit. It is still 1960. The only change in this regard is that the word "home" is inserted in the new bill in place of the word "house". The word "house" was erroneously put in the revised statutes when they were printed. The amending section merely substitutes the word "home", thus restoring the original intent.

Mr. Brooks: I do not have reference to that.

Mr. Bennett: If the hon. member just meant qualification under the Veterans Land Act, he is quite right. Under section 13 of the War Service Grants Act the date is January 1, 1957, but that has nothing to do with the National Housing Act.

Mr. Brooks: I think you will find there is a reference there.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Hon. J. J. McCann (for the Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That the said bill be referred to the special committee on veterans affairs to be appointed by the house at a later date.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, February 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 208—Punishment for infanticide.

Mr. Knowles: Clause 208 has to do with the punishment for infanticide. I would invite the minister's comment on a question similar to one I have asked in relation to certain other sections. I hope, however, that he will not make the same answer that I have received on previous occasions. I find it difficult to see the virtue of uniformity so far as penalties are concerned. I realize that the minister has indicated that there are two or three classes within which these penalties fall, but even so that is based on the idea of as much uniformity in length of sentence as possible.

I think it is correct to say that the maximum penalty upon conviction for infanticide has been increased from three years to five years. I wonder—although I am willing to listen to argument from the minister—if that is not a rather severe sentence in view of the definition of infanticide that we have already been given. That definition is set out in clause 204, and perhaps I might be permitted to read it. I am not reverting to clause 204, but merely quoting the definition as it has a bearing on this clause. It reads as follows:

A female person commits infanticide when by a wilful act or omission she causes the death of her newly born child, if at the time of the act or omission she is not fully recovered from the effects of giving birth to the child and by reason thereof or of the effect of lactation consequent on the birth of the child her mind is then disturbed.

As I understand the definition, there is imported into it exceptional or unusual circumstances. It seems to me that causing the death of a child, in the sense of it being outright murder, is covered in other sections. Causing the death of an unborn child is covered in clause 209. But I come back to my question, namely, in view of the fact that infanticide is defined as something that happens under exceptional and understandable circumstances, is it not rather severe to increase the penalty from three to five years?

Mr. Garson: I am sorry to disappoint my hon. friend but I am afraid I will have to again answer him in the same terms. Might I point out that under the new bill it is proposed to have five types of penalties, those two years and under, those five years and under and so on. Since the present penalty under the existing code is three years, that penalty would fall within the five year group.

Mr. Knowles: Was consideration given to reducing it to two years?

Mr. Garson: Consideration was given, but on the basis of the cases which had arisen it was thought desirable to leave that much leeway with the court. The commissioners either had to reduce it from three to two years or bring it in under five, and they chose the latter of the two courses.

Mr. Knowles: On that point, does the minister know the considerations that were taken into account when that decision was made? I presume that the decision to adopt five years rather than two years was made by the commissioners rather than by the Senate committee or our own committee of last session. It would appear to me that the decision was made simply on a mathematical basis. It looks to me as though, the penalty having been three years and there now being no three year penalty, it either had to be two or five, so they adopted the period that covered the existing sentence.

Mr. Garson: Oh no, I think it would be quite wrong to suggest that it was done solely on such a mathematical basis as that. I assure my hon. friend that the decision as to whether the penalty of three years should be cut down to two would be based upon criteria which were not mathematical. As I said a moment ago, they would consider a variety of circumstances which had arisen in cases under this section. The question which they would, I think, pose for themselves and answer would be whether, in covering a variety of circumstances, it was desirable to have a penalty of five years or two years. They decided on the five years. Now, that decision was reviewed by the other place on two different occasions and by the special committee of the House of Commons at the last session of parliament, and no change has been made. There is nothing to prevent us from making a change here if it is thought desirable.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 209—Killing unborn child.

Mr. Stick: Clause 209, subclause 2, states:

> This section does not apply to a person who, by means that, in good faith, he considers necessary to preserve the life of the mother of a child that has not become a human being, causes the death of the child.

I take it that provision applies more to the medical profession?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Stick: The medical profession is not specifically mentioned there, so anyone else who may have to take action in such circumstances may be leaving himself open to a charge. An ordinary person, under those circumstances, may have to act as a doctor and may be acting in good faith. In what position is he placed then?

Mr. Garson: He is placed, I suggest, in the position which is indicated by the language of the section itself. In the case in which he is charged, if he can establish that he did this act in good faith because he thought it was necessary to preserve the life of the mother of the child, then he could establish that defence and could be acquitted. I know that in the great majority of cases this will apply to the medical profession. But there are cases that arise in some hamlet remote from medical attendance, in which a midwife might be involved, or perhaps not even a midwife. If the lady who was ill had no other skilled service available, it might be some individual who had no medical training at all.

Where anyone acted in good faith when he was faced with that emergency, I think there will be general agreement that it would be desirable that he should not be left wide open, by the terms of the statute, to being found guilty, as he might be if there were not a saving clause in the section.

Mr. Stick: The reason I asked is that in some parts of Newfoundland and Labrador the medical services are rather scattered, and ordinary men have had to act in such cases. They would be safeguarded by this clause?

Mr. Garson: Yes, my hon. friend is quite correct in that. As a matter of fact, in replying to his question I could not help but think that was perhaps the point he had in mind. It is a point very well taken.

Mr. Hansell: I am a little confused by the wording of the section, Mr. Chairman. I fancy that this section is the section in the Criminal Code that deals with abortion.

Mr. Garson: No, the one that deals with abortion is section 237.

Mr. Hansell: Perhaps I should reserve anything I have to say until that section is called.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Hansell: I do not know whether the minister can answer a medical question, but at what time in the prenatal existence does the child become a human being? I cannot quite understand that, and perhaps I should not bother my mind about it.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend has the bill in front of him, would he look at clause 195? It reads:

> A child becomes a human being within the meaning of this act when it has completely proceeded, in a living state, from the body of its mother whether or not > (a) it has breathed,
> (b) it has an independent circulation, or
> (c) the navel string is severed.

Mr. Gillis: If clause 209 does not mean abortion, what does it mean?

Mr. Garson: An illegal operation which, I suppose, my friend might argue is a form of abortion.

Mr. Gillis: It is the same thing.

Mr. Garson: No, this is the killing of the fetus, that has not become a human being. If my hon. friend will look at clause 237 I think he will see the answer to his question.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 210 to 220 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 221—Criminal negligence in operation of motor vehicle.

Mr. Nowlan: I wonder if the minister would comment on the effect of this section, which is entirely new, on that very important matter of motor manslaughter. What is the difference between the law as it will be after this clause is passed and the law as we now have it under the existing Criminal Code?

Mr. Garson: While in the printed bill on the right hand side of the page it is indicated that clause 221 (1) is new, actually it replaces in part section 285 (6) of the present code.

The present clause 221 (1) is I think, in its clear terms, pretty well self-explanatory. In drawing it in the form in which my hon. friend now finds it, it was felt that in so far as the operation of motor vehicles was concerned, an offence should be created only when there was wanton and reckless disregard for the safety of others, leaving it for the provinces to deal with the less serious forms of careless driving under their motor vehicle control acts. Accordingly this provision is found in the form in which it is.

Mr. Nowlan: As the law is now, Mr. Chairman, as I recall it, we have three classifications, shall we say, of criminal negligence with respect to motor vehicle accidents. In the first place we have the dangerous driving section. Then we have reckless driving, and ultimately we have manslaughter.

Mr. Garson: No, we have criminal negligence in the operation of a motor vehicle under this clause 221 (1). Then if the criminal negligence which could be charged under this clause causes death or bodily injury, such cases could fall under clauses 192 and 193 which we considered yesterday.

Mr. Fulton: And also under clause 207.

Mr. Nowlan: As I was saying, under the existing law I have heard judges instruct juries, when dealing with manslaughter, somewhat along these lines: "There are four classes of negligence. First of all there is civil negligence with which, gentlemen, we are not concerned. Then you come to the question of dangerous driving"—and I heard one judge, rightly or wrongly, and not too long ago, say that is the first step on the ladder. "Then we go up one step farther on the ladder and we come to reckless driving. That is the second step. And then," as this judge pointed out, "if we stand on the top of the ladder we have come to the charge of manslaughter."

I am not sure that charge to the jury was one which would stand the test before a judge who is not too far removed from this building. Nevertheless that was the way the judge charged at that time, and he had some cases to support him. I understand that this has been changed to some extent by this all-inclusive definition of criminal negligence, and I am curious to learn what changes, if any, that judge would have to make in his charge if the code we have in front of us is passed, as compared with the charge he did make.

Mr. Garson: As regards the judge's charge apart from some clarification and simplification I doubt if there is any substantial change effected. As I have said, you begin by laying a set of facts before a crown prosecutor. It is the crown prosecutor's task to consider those facts and make up his mind as to what sort of charge the facts would prove and therefore as to what charge he thinks might properly be laid.

If those facts will prove only a charge under the present clause 221, then he lays a charge under that clause. But if death has supervened, then he may lay a charge of manslaughter, or of criminal negligence occasioning death, as set out in clause 192. Or, if it was a case of occasioning bodily harm, he would lay a charge under clause 193. Then the courts would proceed to consider such a charge in the same way they would consider charges under the existing code.

Mr. Fulton: We really have three clauses under which charges arising from deaths caused by motor vehicles can be laid, have we not? We have clauses 192, 207 and 221.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member is referring to the existing code, is he?

Mr. Fulton: No, the new code, or the code as it will be when this bill is passed.

Mr. Garson: Clause 119 has to do with obstructing justice.

Mr. Fulton: No, I was referring to clause 192. After this bill becomes law, in connection with a person driving a motor vehicle I understand there are three clauses under which he can be charged; these are clauses 192, 207 or 221.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Nowlan: I was not in the committee last year which dealt with the Criminal Code, but what I have in mind may be covered in a clause we have not yet reached. However, as the minister knows, if today a man is charged with manslaughter there are several alternatives. The jury may find him not guilty of manslaughter and may find him guilty of (a) reckless driving or (b) dangerous driving. I take it that clause 192, which has slipped in so quietly, indicates that the minister and the commissioners have been trying to avoid what we might describe as the repugnance of juries to convict on a manslaughter charge. So now we are going to have this new offence under clause 192 involving death by criminal negligence. And, as the minister said a moment ago, this might be the charge in connection with a death caused by an automobile.

Now, what is the situation? If a charge is laid under clause 192, death by criminal negligence, is there a proposition which says that a jury may find him not guilty of that charge but guilty of an offence under another clause.

Mr. Garson: Yes, there is.

Mr. Nowlan: Then why is there an increase in the sentence under clause 221? Under the present section 285 (4) anyone guilty of reckless driving, or of wanton and wilful misconduct, is liable on conviction to a fine of a small amount, or a certain length of time in jail. Now, under clause 221 in the bill, there is provision for a penalty of five years, which is certainly substantial and well above the one now prevailing in the Criminal Code.

I should think that we are going to be faced with four possible convictions. There is the possibility of a conviction under clause 192, death by criminal negligence. Then a person not guilty of that could be charged under clause 221, with being criminally negligent in the operation of a motor vehicle. Then we still have reckless driving and dangerous driving; or are they both abrogated by this clause?

Mr. Garson: Well, I think on a set of facts under which a crown prosecutor would be warranted in laying a charge of criminal negligence, it would be pretty difficult, in the result, to end up with a charge of reckless driving.

Mr. Nowlan: It can be done today, as the minister knows, even with a charge of manslaughter.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: There is no equivalent for reckless driving in the proposed new code, is there?

Mr. Garson: No; because it was felt, as I said a moment ago, that it was desirable to leave those lesser offences to the provincial statutes, and that we would deal with those offences having to do with the operations of motor vehicles which were criminal in their nature.

Mr. Fulton: Then that leaves unanswered the question asked by my honourable and learned friend, the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, regarding the increase in penalty. Both sections 284 and 285 provide maximum penalties of two years. Now these are to a large extent being replaced, in connection with the driving of motor vehicles, by clause 221 in the bill, under which the maximum penalty is five years. Would the minister indicate why it was felt proper to increase the maximum penalty to that extent?

Mr. Garson: Well, the answer to my hon. friend's question is that, in relation to this present charge, it was the view of the commission that it was appropriate to bring the penalty into that second grade of offences which make provision for imprisonment up to five years. This is a quite serious charge. If my hon. friends will take a look at the definition of criminal negligence in clause 191 they will see that in order to prove a charge of that nature it has to be shown that in doing anything or omitting to do anything that it was his duty to do, the accused exhibited wanton or reckless disregard for the lives or safety of other persons.

Mr. Fulton: I understand that.

Mr. Garson: Now, I think it would be hard to argue that that type of criminal negligence when proven should carry a lesser penalty than five years as a maximum. Or, to put it this way, it would be hard to imagine that it was impossible for a set of circumstances to arise somewhere in Canada in which criminal negligence had been shown that was of a sufficiently grave nature to merit a penalty of five years.

As my hon. friend knows, in each of these cases the penalty is in the discretion of the court. If the court should see fit it could send an accused to jail for two days. For my part, I am in agreement with the commission. When we have motor car criminal negligence defined the way it is in this new Bill 7 it is a very different offence from that under section 285 (6) under the present code, and should carry a penalty of five years. Anything less than that would be too small. As a matter of fact, I think perhaps an argument could be made that it might even go higher.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know. Let me direct the attention of the minister to the wording of section 285, which is largely replaced by clause 221 and subsequent clauses. Section 285 starts off as follows:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, having the charge of any carriage or motor vehicle, automobile, or other vehicle, by wanton or furious driving, or racing or other wilful misconduct, or by wilful neglect, does or causes to be done any bodily harm to any person.

I suggest that the words "by wanton or furious driving, or racing or other wilful misconduct, or by wilful neglect" are quite as strong as the words "shows wanton or reckless disregard for the lives and safety of other persons". To any layman they would mean very much the same thing. Wanton or furious driving, or racing or other wilful misconduct while in charge of an automobile, is certainly very wide. Would it not be included in the words "shows wanton or reckless disregard for the lives and safety of other persons"? In driving wantonly or recklessly you come pretty well under the old section which had a maximum penalty of two years, whereas now it is going to be five years.

Mr. Garson: With great respect I suggest to my hon. friend that wanton or furious driving is not the equivalent of doing anything that shows wanton and reckless disregard for the lives and safety of other persons. If I drive furiously and recklessly down an empty road in the country and there is no person there, I can bring myself under the definition which my hon. friend was quoting, but I am very much more criminally negligent if I drive down that road when there is a crowd of people walking on it, or many persons walking on it, whose lives or safety may be endangered.

Mr. Fulton: The minister misapprehends the point. In section 285 there must be a person there for a charge to be laid. Therefore if the minister is driving wantonly or furiously and there is nobody there, he could not hit him and therefore could not be charged. I suggest that wanton or furious driving and racing down a road on which people are present, as must be the case for a charge to be laid under section 285, is the same as driving with a disregard for the lives and safety of other people.

I am not going to press the point, as I think perhaps it is taken care of by the maximum, though I do not think the courts would be more inclined to approach near the maximum than otherwise. I would point out that it is possible for an offence, which it seems to me under the old code could not attract a penalty of more than two years, to now attract a penalty of five years.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to clear up this one point raised by the hon. member for Kamloops, and then I am through. I want to reinforce what my hon. friend said with respect to this matter of punishment. I say with all respect to the minister that I feel the commissioners who were responsible for drafting these sentences were not too conversant with the practice in the criminal courts. Frankly I cannot see any reason for having three platforms on which to stand, the two year platform, the five year platform and something else. This happens to come within the five year category.

What is happening under this motor manslaughter charge, if I may use that term, as now found within the code is that heretofore juries have been reluctant to convict and as a result have been prone to bring in verdicts of not guilty of manslaughter but guilty of reckless driving or dangerous driving. If a man is convicted of motor manslaughter, depending on the circumstances of the negligence, he may get from three years to five years. If he is convicted of reckless driving the chances are that he will get two years in the penitentiary. If he is convicted of dangerous driving he may get from four to six months in jail. I think that is the general practice followed by the courts, at least those in which I have had a little experience.

We have done away with motor manslaughter, to all intents and purposes. We still have manslaughter. We have the new clause 192 which gets rid of that. We now say:

> Every one who by criminal negligence causes death to another person is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

Instead of having charges of manslaughter we are going to have charges of death by criminal negligence. We have abolished reckless and dangerous driving, and we come down to clause 221 under which anyone convicted could receive a sentence of five years in the penitentiary.

I am suggesting that this is not a realistic approach to the matter of punishment. The minister says that if there is criminal negligence anyone convicted should be given five years. I think you will find that nine juries out of ten will never convict. Undoubtedly there are many cases where the criminal negligence warrants a sentence of five years or more, but I say that in 90 out of 100 cases there will be difficulty in getting a conviction for criminal negligence. A jury may find a verdict, but usually there are extenuating circumstances of time and conditions, and I think it would be very seldom that a sentence of five years would be imposed even for manslaughter.

Now we have reached the stage where we have a lesser charge which is carrying a maximum sentence of five years. I contend that one of two things will happen. We will be imposing too heavy a sentence for the offence. It is all right to say that this is a maximum sentence and the judge could give two days, but no judge is going to give a two-day sentence under circumstances such as these if a man is charged and found guilty. I think very often a judge will feel compelled to impose a more severe sentence than the circumstances warrant.

On the other hand I can envisage a jury, with perhaps the judge intimating to them that there are only two charges on which the accused can be convicted and for which the sentences are life in the one case and five years in the other, considering that five years is too much. I am sure the minister knows from his correspondence that thousands of people have been acquitted of manslaughter because the jury felt that if they convicted the judge would sentence the accused to life. It was an awe-inspiring, frightful term, and they did not want to convict. Very often they would bring in a verdict according to the last rung on the ladder, a verdict of dangerous driving.

Now you have only one rung on the ladder under the clause we are dealing with now. In my humble opinion, if convictions are made the sentences will be more severe than they should be. I am not speaking now of certain types of cases where the sentence could not be too severe. I feel that in many cases there will be opportunities for the defence to argue in that way. One might intimate to the jury that this is a most unfair thing the government has done, and thus get an acquittal. It is not as easy as the minister suggests.

Mr. Knowles: As the minister knows, I have on a number of previous occasions protested the increases in penalties set out in this revised code. I have also objected to the blanket idea that penalties have to be placed in certain categories. I appreciate the argument that has just been made by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, and I appreciate also the position of the minister, namely that criminal negligence when it is related to the operation of an automobile is a very serious matter and that something very serious has to be done about it.

However, I am not sure that stiffer penalties should be considered as the only answer, as the only serious reply to this very menacing situation. I do not suppose there is anything we shall be dealing with today, so far as the Criminal Code is concerned, that is more serious than this question of death on our highways. I refer not only to the tremendous number of deaths that take place, but to the tremendous number of bodies that are maimed and lives that are ruined because of accidents. These deaths and accidents arise in part from carelessness, recklessness and criminal negligence, covered by the words used in this clause, and they rise in a very large degree from alcoholic intoxication, and other matters which will be discussed under later clauses.

I wonder if this whole subject is not something that should be given much greater study than it has been given thus far. I am mindful of the fact that some questions have been referred to a special committee and that one question is to be referred to a royal commission. I do not wish to make invidious comparisons, but I believe the question of death on our highways is a more important matter than the question of whether we should revise our attitude towards lotteries.

I would still like to see matters which are involved in this clause, and in the next several clauses, given a much more thorough study than has yet been the case. I have in mind the possibility of this whole subject being studied by the special committee which has already been set up, or by some other special committee. Despite my reluctance to agree to too many of these federal-provincial conferences, I can see that this might be a field in which that device could be employed.

The minister has suggested that there are certain traffic offences which come within provincial law. That being the case I offer this as a suggestion. I am not at this point able to move a motion that something be done, but I am throwing out this suggestion because I feel that even if we have no alternative at the moment but to go through these clauses and pass them as they are, with slight amendments and improvements which might be made, even after that is done it is high time a serious attempt should be made in this country to grapple with this problem of death on our highways.

Perhaps the immediate reaction people feel is that stiffer penalties would be a good idea. Certainly the Minister of Justice expressed that immediate reaction when he rose a moment ago. But the proposal that penalties be stiffened does not always represent the kind of serious thought that really goes to the heart of the problem. Perhaps I am challenging myself to do something which I am not in a position to do. What is the answer? I do not claim to know, but I do know that an answer simply must be found. It is not reasonable that we as intelligent human beings in this latter part of the twentieth century should go on permitting the number of deaths which take place on our highways the year round, not to mention the very heavy toll over week ends or when traffic is heavy.

I feel very strongly about the clauses which are to come in a moment or so, particularly those that deal with intoxication and alcoholism. It seems to me something should be done about that major cause of highway accidents and again I appreciate the minister's instinctive response, shared by others, when he recommends stiffer penalties. But is that the final answer? The fact is that we simply must find ways and means of preventing accidents on the highways. Does it restore a life that has been taken, or does it give back the health that has been ruined, simply because someone has to spend two years or five years or even life in jail as the result of an accident which has taken place?

We can get off into all the theories and ideas we have about crime and its prevention, but perhaps the reason I am taking a few moments to say what I might have said in a few sentences is that I feel it is extremely important that whatever we do to these clauses of the code, this must not be the end of Canada's attempt to deal with the problem of death on our highways. One of the dangers of putting through legislation in this house is that there is a tendency to say, "Well, that matter has been dealt with. A law has been passed and put on the statute books. We can go on and deal with something else." But we cannot take that attitude toward this very serious problem, and I believe the people of Canada have a right to expect of us something more than just a few changes in this part of the Criminal Code.

I believe my proposal for a committee, a royal commission or a federal-provincial conference on the whole question should be taken very seriously. The minister suggested a while ago that this clause involved something more, but little more, than a codification of the existing law. I contend that this problem is so serious that it calls for a great deal more.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I am sure there is no one in this chamber, certainly not I at any rate, who would differ in any way with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in regarding this matter of, as he puts it, death upon the highway as one of the most serious problems with which not only Canada but most civilized countries in which there is heavy automobile traffic are faced.

I am in agreement with him when he states that we cannot solve this or any of our other social problems solely by means of the criminal law. I believe it is the view of people who have made a study of this matter that personal courtesy or the lack of it shown by many motorists, who seem to be very courteous people until they get behind the wheel of a car, has a great deal to do with our high accident rate. I am sure the consumption of liquor by certain car drivers also has a great deal to do with it.

I would be the last one to suggest that a dominion-provincial conference or a conference of those who have some special training in this field, with a view to curing this problem, would not be a very desirable step to take. But in our approach to this problem in connection with the clauses we are now considering, it is rather important that we retain as accurate an impression as possible of what we are doing here. We are not dealing with courtesy. We are certainly not dealing directly with the relationship of the liquor traffic to highway traffic. We are simply dealing with a question which is only one facet of the problem of death on the highway, namely what are the proper clauses which can be put in the Criminal Code which will help to ameliorate if not cure this problem?

That is our task; and when my hon. friend from Digby-Annapolis-Kings or my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre suggests that we should send these clauses on to a royal commission, a parliamentary committee or something of that sort—

Mr. Nowlan: I did not suggest that.

Mr. Garson: I know my hon. friend did not —or casts any aspersions upon them directly or by implication, I think, with deference he is being a little bit unrealistic in refusing to recognize the competence of the commission which dealt with this matter, a competence based on their actual experience in dealing with the subject matters of these sections as men who, from their own actions at the bar and their own long experience on the bench, knew what they were talking about in this matter just as well as any committee that we are ever likely to set up here.

Let us consider some of them. One is the chief justice of Saskatchewan who, for several decades now, has been on the bench hearing amongst others cases of this sort. Another is the senior county court judge of the county of York, His Honour Robert Forsyth, who had long experience in this field. Another is Mr. Justice Fernand Choquette. Another who participated in this drafting work was Joseph Sedgwick, one of the most distinguished criminal defence lawyers in Ontario. Another is Arthur Slaght, who is certainly in the same category. Then in the later stages we had the lawyer members of the special committee of the House of Commons last year, some of whom had had legal experience in this field. Then there was Mr. A. A. Moffat, who for many long years was crown prosecutor in the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. Nowlan: Just what I said; the prosecutor complex.

Mr. Garson: He was also for many years after that crown counsel in the department of the attorney general, and for several years after that he was deputy attorney general of Manitoba.

My hon. friend says that he has a crown prosecutor complex, but no person can charge that he is ignorant of this subject or that he does not know what the problem is. I would venture to say that this last gentleman of whom I am speaking has probably had more cases of this kind, either as a defence or prosecuting lawyer, than perhaps any lawyer here in the House of Commons, and he knew exactly what he was dealing with in this bill. If he has a crown prosecutor complex, what about Senator Farris of Vancouver, who was one of the chief members of the subcommittee of the other place, who was a distinguished criminal lawyer and who has had a whole lifetime of experience?

Mr. Fulton: As attorney general.

Mr. Garson: What about Senator Arthur Roebuck, who for many years was attorney general of Ontario?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, to what extent are we allowed to discuss senators in this chamber? I would be interested in knowing.

Mr. Garson: I think we can discuss the membership of these committees which have considered this bill without in any way dealing with what transpired in the other place.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I should like to make this suggestion to the minister, not on the point of order raised by the hon. member who just raised it but on the general scheme of debate. If, every time we raise a question as to a section of the code, we are going to come back and discuss the merits of the commission on the Criminal Code, I am afraid we are not going to get very far. I think perhaps the minister might come to the remarks which have been made on the section itself.

Mr. Garson: I accept your suggestion, Mr. Chairman. I was not addressing myself to the section before us but was addressing my remarks to the suggestion that we should now turn this matter over to a competent body to consider. I was merely making the point that it has been considered by an extremely competent body and last year was reviewed by, I think it is fair to say, the membership of the House of Commons committee.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister permit an interruption, or a question?

Mr. Garson: Certainly.

Mr. Fulton: Which is it going to be now?

Mr. Nowlan: An inter-question?

Mr. Knowles: Did the minister himself not say a few moments ago that all of this relates only to what we do in the Criminal Code about this matter?

Mr. Garson: Quite so.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, is it not fair to say that as yet nothing has been done about the broader question of taking steps to prevent death on our highways? My suggestion was not that the commission or anybody else had been incompetent so far as this aspect of the matter was concerned but rather that, after this is all done, there is still more to do.

Mr. Garson: I am sorry if I misunderstood my hon. friend. I thought what he had in mind was that we should send these sections off to be considered by some body of that sort. If my hon. friend means that after passing these sections it might be desirable for our government to call a conference with the provinces upon this matter, or that the law enforcement officers in the provinces might get together on the matter—because they are the prosecuting authorities—I am in complete agreement.

Mr. Knowles: That is what I am asking for, a study of the broader subject.

Mr. Garson: I am in complete agreement. I agree with my hon. friend, as I said when I opened my remarks, that it is an extremely important problem which is deserving of the best attention that we can give to it. However, my point is this. I do not think we are going to help solve the problem particularly by not proceeding to pass these clauses now, for they represent, in my judgment, a very excellent disposition of that facet of the problem which comes within the purview of the criminal law.

Mr. Drew: In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to express my keen interest in the confidence the minister has indicated he has in royal commissions. Recently in this chamber there have been certain comments which suggested that the government had no faith in them. I find it extremely comforting to realize that this instrument of inquiry commands the measure of confidence now expressed by the Minister of Justice. The fact is that in naming the people who were appointed to this commission, and in emphasizing his own belief that they were competent to make a finding, he has supported the contention we have made, and will make on other occasions, that this is an extremely useful instrument to inquire into and report upon facts that cannot be brought together loosely here in this chamber and digested by the members in the course of a debate.

As to this section and the problem before us, there may be different points of view. There are different points of view that are related perhaps to the experience members have had in this field. My own belief is that we are dealing with one of the most serious problems facing this country, and that it is going to be an increasingly serious problem as each year goes by, as we see the power of automobiles increasing beyond anything we would have imagined possible a few years ago. When we realize that cars of 200 horsepower, 220 horsepower and 240 horsepower are going to be second-hand cars in the hands of youngsters on the highways in only a few years from now, we realize something of the threat that is presented. When we also realize the increasing size of the trucks, occupying so much space on whatever highways are available, I do not think we should be in any way reluctant to do anything that will lessen the slaughter on the highways. It is a slaughter that has become manslaughter in many cases through the carelessness of those who are driving the vehicles.

As I wish to say a few more words on this subject, Mr. Chairman, I would ask you to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On clause 221—Criminal negligence in operation of motor vehicle.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. At six o'clock we were discussing clause 221.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I wish to continue the remarks I was making with respect to the subject now under discussion. Perhaps I speak with some feeling about it, having returned this afternoon from visiting a recent victim of one of these many tragic accidents. I only mention that because in hospitals all over the country today, from one side of Canada to the other, there are people on the verge of death or people on the way to recovery whose whole future is uncertain because of circumstances entirely beyond their control, and where there can be no possible remuneration as the result of any court proceedings that would compensate in any way for the uncertain position of the whole family in the years ahead and for the long years of suffering that may result from accidents of this kind.

Without emotionalism, I think we should realize that we are dealing with something that has now reached the proportions of a major national tragedy. As we see the total figures of deaths and serious accidents piling up, reaching figures that almost have the appearance of heavy battle casualties, the time has come for us to devote all the thought we can to ways in which the proper use of our highways can be brought within reasonable bounds and some measure of safety restored to this vitally important part of our ordinary daily movement from place to place.

The Minister of Justice said quite correctly that you cannot deal with this problem alone by any words you introduce into the Criminal Code, or by the penalties you impose. I certainly agree with that statement. I think this is an appropriate time to mention one aspect of the problem that it is proper to mention in the House of Commons inasmuch as the policing of our highways is divided among police under the authority of the federal government, police under the authority of the provincial governments and police under the authority of municipal councils. Therefore any remarks I may make in that respect are general remarks applying to policing of our highways, and are made without any suggestion that I presume to advise either the provincial or municipal authorities as to what they should do. Nevertheless I think remarks that would apply to police under the authority of the federal government would apply to the others with equal force, because the problem is the same; and as we all know, much policing is now done in the provinces and municipalities by police coming under federal authority.

It seems to me that the time to stop fatal accidents is when recklessness first becomes apparent. The time to avoid a fatal accident is when it is evident that someone is driving recklessly, in a manner that may cause a fatal accident. It happened that I was on highways in different parts of this country during the heavy snowstorms last week, and as I travelled along I saw several accidents. They were caused by a number of contributing circumstances. Undoubtedly the major contributing factor was the heavy snowstorm itself with its resulting slippery conditions, but I saw something that must impress itself on everyone who has occasion to drive under such conditions. I saw heavy truck after heavy truck occupying so much of the road that under difficult driving conditions and with low visibility the driver of an automobile whose view was obscured by these trucks had great difficulty in seeing what was coming some distance beyond.

I know it is easy to say that the driver behind a truck should simply stay there. Nevertheless the fact remains that the law permits certain speeds which are regarded as reasonably safe, with certain modifications in the light of general conditions. I noticed on a number of occasions that these very large trucks would not move to the right if a car was coming from behind in the same way they were bound to move over when a car or another truck was approaching them. I wish to make it perfectly clear that I am offering no general condemnation of those who operate or drive these trucks. It is legal to do so. It is a part of our transportation system, and I am satisfied that in most cases truck drivers are doing the best they can under very difficult conditions.

Nevertheless this is a problem we must all face. Whether it be the careless truck driver or the careless driver of an automobile, I think more can be done to stop carelessness before it reaches the stage of tragedy than has been done. Certainly there were different occasions last week during the heavy snowstorms, if it had been pointed out to these drivers that what they were doing was extremely dangerous it might have been very useful at some time in the future. I feel sure we will all agree that this is a part of the general problem. There can be no sweeping statement made as to the limitation of the use of our highways or a suggestion that any special rules should apply to one or another type of motor vehicle operation.

I repeat that most truck drivers are performing their daily task to the best of their ability. However, we have placed on highways never built to be great freight carriers, vehicles that are little short of freight trains; and it does seem to me that in the policing of our highways the greatest care should be exercised to assure that these trucks will observe the law because their very size and the extent to which they block the ordinary view contribute greatly to many accidents.

I am not going to speak at the moment about one of the very serious contributing factors, the use of alcohol by those driving trucks, because that will be dealt with under another section. I am speaking simply about careless driving, reckless driving or driving with no regard for the possible consequences that may flow from what is done. Under our Criminal Code a person who uses a lethal weapon with complete disregard for the outcome, and in such a way that what he does causes death, may be guilty of murder. What is happening on the highways today in many cases is little short of murder.

That applies to the drivers of automobiles just as much as to the drivers of other vehicles. This appalling toll of death and destruction that is unfolded to us day by day through the press and over the radio, with all the consequent tragedy that will go on for many long years, is something that should engage the most careful thoughts of every one of us.

I recognize that any punishment that is too severe may well defeat its own purpose, because courts are disinclined to inflict a punishment that may seem unreasonable. On the other hand I have a very strong feeling that if there is real negligence and real disregard for the consequences, when the jury recognizes the tragedy that has resulted they will not be disinclined to impose a heavy penalty. This penalty is not merely for the purpose of punishing a person who has erred, but is for the purpose of discouraging recklessness in others and making safer the highways, where so much of the movement of our people now takes place. I do not think there is one of us today who is not worried when those near and dear to him are on long trips on the highways. We may have complete confidence in their ability or our own, yet we know this may prove to be no safeguard under the conditions which arise.

I hope that in approaching this problem we will recognize that we are dealing with no mere minor departure from reasonable caution. We are dealing with something that can bring the gravest tragedy to families which had every reason to expect a long and happy life together. If a young man is going to drive the engine of a railway train, guide a street car or any other fast, heavy vehicle of that kind, it is customary to make sure he is skilled before he gets behind the controls. We are strangely lax in the measure of supervision that is imposed before people can get behind the wheel of an automobile that can move at 100 miles an hour or more, and can carry death and destruction to people who had no reason to be in any doubt that they were going to arrive safely at their destination.

I simply repeat what I said before, that while we cannot prevent accidents the place to stop recklessness is before it has caused death or tragedy. Wherever it comes within the jurisdiction of the federal government I would hope that instructions are very definite that such reckless driving as has not yet caused tragedy will be dealt with in a way that is likely to prevent some subsequent tragedy.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to say a brief word on this, Mr. Chairman. I think we should deal with the cause of highway accidents. It has been my experience to find a good many young men, who had broken the law, in the police station. What was the cause? Well, they had been taking something that the government licenses, and I have a good deal of sympathy with them. I can see a group of six at Christmas going out and having a time. They had an accident and ran into the police patrol car before they got home. Of course they were in the police station the next morning. I thought it was a kind of a joke, but we should call a spade a spade.

We not only license the cause of many highway tragedies but we allow it to be advertised in many of our leading magazines, and I think that is asking for trouble. I should like to speak for an hour about this, but I think I have shown where I stand on the cause of highway accidents. If we, as members of parliament, do not get on the water wagon how can we expect other young fellows to do so?

Mr. MacInnis: The particular matter dealt with by the hon. member for Fort William is covered in the sections immediately following this one. I feel we all must agree with the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition and by the member for Winnipeg North Centre before the dinner recess. The question is how much can be done through the Criminal Code, and how much has to be done outside of it?

In the matter of the operation of trucks, I think possibly there is not sufficient supervision of truck drivers. A moment ago the Leader of the Opposition mentioned railways, street cars and that sort of thing. They are well regulated. The railways are regulated by the board of transport commissioners, and the speeds at which he can travel are laid down for every driver when he gets into his engine. Buses and trucks are under the control of the provincial authorities, and when an accident occurs I think there should be some investigation of the schedules these drivers have to maintain. If the schedules are such that they have to drive at speeds that are dangerous, then someone should have the authority to see that the schedule is set so the drivers can proceed at safer speeds.

As I said, I do not know just how much we can do here. All we can do is impose penalties. As the Leader of the Opposition said, if we make them too severe then they will not be enforced. Probably one of the difficulties in getting convictions in cases of this kind is that almost everyone drives a vehicle of some kind. When a case comes before the jury, each juryman thinks he had better not be too severe in this case because it might be his turn to have an accident very shortly. It is, therefore, difficult to get a conviction. It seems to me that the punishment in this section is severe enough, indeed very severe. I do not know what else can be done under the code.

Mr. Mitchell (London): The whole field of criminal negligence is one that is new. It is expanding as we in Canada and on this continent expand our way of life. This section constitutes one additional change in this law of criminal negligence. I suggest that in considering the penalties which we prescribe for negligence there are several views we must examine.

The first of these is that the car has become an inherently dangerous object. The minute it leaves the showroom it becomes a dangerous thing in the hands of many people; in fact it is more dangerous than a gun. In the fall we all read of the number of persons who are killed as a result of the improper use of guns, but in fact that number is so infinitesimally small compared to the damage and destruction wrought by cars that it is rather surprising we even notice it.

The second problem in dealing with motor cars is this. I am sure each of us has said at some time or other, when we have referred to a person charged with an offence involving the use of a motor car, "Oh, poor Tom; he is not really a criminal". We are confronted with that state of mind, and this reflects itself not only in the public at large but in the minds of our juries.

Now we are faced with a change in this clause setting a higher penalty in terms of imprisonment. I submit we are bound to run up against juries who will say, "Oh, well, now, this fellow is a perfectly normal citizen who has just made a mistake". They forget all about the damage and havoc he has wrought either through sheer negligence or perhaps for some other reason such as the consumption of alcohol. We also forget the number of cases in which we find that persons have been convicted not only once but perhaps two or three times.

Having said that, we must consider what should be done with those people. I have three suggestions which with your permission, Mr. Chairman, involve consideration of clause 225. The first has been most aptly expressed by the Leader of the Opposition, and has to do with licensing. Upon that I shall say no more. The second has to do with the possibility of setting up separate places of confinement for offenders against the appropriate and ordinary uses of the automobile. In that way we can say, and justifiably so, that they are not convicted as criminals, as such, but are convicted for making our highways places of slaughter.

Third, and most important, we should consider most seriously placing a minimum, and not a maximum, on the licence suspension of offenders. I notice in clause 225 that the court may prescribe in certain cases a prohibition from driving for a period not exceeding three years, or if it is an offence which could carry with it life imprisonment, for any period in the discretion of the judge.

I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that a minimum suspension of at least 10 years, and probably more, should be placed upon a driver convicted under a section involving life imprisonment; and that in respect of any other section a period of at least five years should be prescribed during which there would be prohibition from driving. In that way not only would we rid our highways of the repeaters, but I feel also that we would go a long way toward making people realize that our highways are places where more care is required than in any other facet of modern living.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I endorse fully the remarks just made by the hon. member for London. I should like to take the matter one step farther. In this matter of penalties, while I quite agree that there ought to be a minimum period during which licences should be suspended, I feel that in respect of this clause and clauses 222 and 223 there ought, in addition, to be a minimum penalty of imprisonment as well. Some time ago in this country there was an outbreak of car thefts, and it was found necessary to impose a minimum penalty of one year for that offence. This seems to have had a reasonably salutary effect, although this has been somewhat modified by the provisions of the other section popularly known as the joy-riding section.

I should like to suggest that on any conviction under this clause, in addition to a minimum suspension of licence there should also be a minimum period of imprisonment of possibly three months. We have heard this afternoon and this evening about the greatly increasing numbers of people killed on our highways, due to the mishandling of motor vehicles. It has been pointed out that these fatalities have occurred when people should have known that their actions could have serious results. The fact must be brought home to them more clearly.

I quite agree with what has been said to the effect that juries, magistrates or judges, as the case may be, do not wish to impose heavy sentences, because they say, in effect, "There but for the grace of God go I". The way to get around that is to have a minimum penalty. I suggest some consideration might be given to this point.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, many of the members who have taken part in this discussion have been of the legal profession. However, I have been listening to the discussion, and it has occurred to me that we are considering a problem that comes within the jurisdiction of provincial legislation. When licences for motor cars are controlled exclusively by provincial governments; when drivers' licences are also under the same provincial jurisdiction, and when we consider that the cancellation of a driving licence is a provincial matter, it seems to me that the subject now before us is also provincial. We are discussing a licence that has been provided by a provincial government to a resident of that province.

I shall make only one comparison and then I shall resume my seat. I was on the water for a great many years, and as a young man I was able to obtain my master's certificate. Since that time I have had a good deal to do with young men who have made application for masters' certificates through the Department of Transport. In that connection I have seen young men in their thirties and forties who were denied masters' certificates due to faulty eyesight.

I recall one particular occasion involving a young man, a personal friend of mine, who had a mail and passenger contract during the summer months between Campobello and Eastport, Maine. The trip was made during the afternoon, arriving home before dark. This young man made application for a master's certificate, which was refused by the Department of Transport because of his eyesight. He has served on the water since he was 16 or 17 years of age, and if I know him as well as I think I do, he is on the water tonight and is able to carry on in that capacity without any trouble at all.

Now, I am not criticizing the regulations under which certificates are granted by the Department of Transport, but it would appear to me that we are much too lax in our provincial regulations having to do with the granting of permits to drive motor cars. If the same approach was used in our provincial legislature that is used by the Department of Transport, there would be very few people driving cars who were incapable of driving them. I am convinced that it is from this cause that a great percentage of our trouble comes.

As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, a person will apply for a licence to drive a car at speeds of perhaps 75, 80 or even 100 miles an hour. These people may be wearing spectacles an inch thick, and driving at night in all sorts of weather. Yet they are given drivers' licences. If those same persons applied for masters' certificates to operate boats on the water, travelling at 10 or 12 knots at the outside and with no danger involved, they would be turned down on account of faulty eyesight.

Having followed the discussion which has taken place so far I feel that if we are looking for a remedy the proper place that we may expect to find such remedy is in our provincial legislatures. As I said at the outset, the granting and issuing of licences to drive cars is completely under their jurisdiction, and I feel that the provincial legislature is the one and only body that can deal with the question we have been discussing.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, there are several factors in connection with this clause, and particularly the subsection, with which I should like to deal, but I assume the Minister of Justice will want to deal with the matters that have just been brought forward. I am not going to speak on them for the moment, but later on I shall expect to deal with one or two technical matters in respect to subsection 2.

I think the discussion which has taken place this afternoon and this evening has been most interesting and original, and indicates the evolution which has taken place in our concept of law and society within this country. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Charlotte and others who have spoken, the control of motor vehicles lies within the scope of the provincial legislatures. Only within the last few days I remember reading in the press that the Minister of Transport had stated he thought that the control of motor trucks within Canada should be left to the provinces rather than to the federal government. With that view I am not quarrelling at the moment.

I think the discussion has pointed up the crux of this problem with which we are faced tonight. If we have not already reached it, I suggest to the Minister of Justice that we are rapidly approaching the stage where not only will the punishment of anyone who violates a section of the Criminal Code be a matter of criminal law, but possibly the whole control of driving on the highways should be brought within the ambit and scope of criminal law within this country.

The Leader of the Opposition and other hon. members have referred to this. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway raised the question of the locomotive engineer who is licensed to drive his locomotive at a certain speed. The hon. member for Charlotte raised the question of licensing with respect to motorboat and fishing boat operation. In so far as the highways are concerned there is no control at all; yet if a person happens to come within clause 221, with which we are now dealing, the accused may have committed a criminal offence.

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

With respect to what has been said before, I do not think it is a matter of punishment. I have had some little experience with these matters, covering more years in court than I sometimes like to think about. I suppose I have had to deal in one way or another with 100 or 150 manslaughter cases and never once—I will not say once, but certainly in not more than 5 per cent of those cases—have I heard a person say that he was responsible for doing something wrong. In 95 per cent of the cases the person would sit in my office and say, "I did not do anything wrong. I don't know what happened. It happened so fast I cannot tell you what happened, but I know I am not responsible". You could have a section in the Criminal Code saying that such a man should be hanged by the neck until dead, and he would still operate his car in exactly the same way because he never thinks of himself as a criminal. In other cases the element of mens rea arises, but there is no mens rea in these cases.

I realize that it is a most difficult situation with which to deal, but I doubt if the solution is a matter of punishment. I think it is a matter of education in the first place. We have to go a lot further than we have gone heretofore in dealing with this matter. As the Leader of the Opposition and others have pointed out, we are faced with a great slaughter on our highways today.

Without wanting to set myself up as a constitutional authority, I think it lies within the ambit of this parliament to declare that certain things come within the scope of the criminal law of this country. I do believe we have to approach this matter in an entirely different way than we have heretofore done. This may be only a preliminary discussion, and it may be five or ten years from now before the matter is finalized. There are constitutional problems involved which I am going to deal with on another clause which we will get to later on. There is also a moral problem. There is a problem going to the roots of every home in this country. I think it has reached the stage where it comes properly within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament and our concept of criminal law.

I know I cannot properly discuss at this time the matter of the cancellation of licences. If this parliament is going to determine that licences can be cancelled for a certain length of time we will be impinging upon civil rights, apart from the punishment imposed for the commission of any crime.

Mr. Garson: May I say that we do not cancel licences. We do not grant them, so we cannot cancel them. The accused's provincial licence to drive and his provincial motor vehicle licence are dealt with under clause 225 of this bill by empowering the court to order that the convicted accused cannot drive under his provincial licence. Then I think the provincial authorities follow that up by having the licence cancelled.

Mr. Nowlan: The statute provides that the magistrate may do certain things. That is one example of the approach which can be made to this problem. I am suggesting that sooner or later we will have to approach it on a far different basis than we have heretofore. I think it is going to have to be done by virtue of the Criminal Code, but I do not think it is going to be done simply by increasing sentences or suggesting that they should be more severe.

Mr. Hahn: I believe this clause involves the problem which was raised earlier. Since this is a revision of section 285, or a portion of it, to me the one part that stands out particularly is that the onus is on the driver to prove he is not guilty of a certain offence. From the portion of the debate that I could hear—the acoustics are not too good at this end of the chamber—I understand that a driver will have to prove that he is not guilty. I do not understand from the wording of clause 221 that it is necessary for someone to prove that the accused is guilty of the negligent operation of a motor vehicle, in which case there is no onus on the driver, unless we have a case similar to what was discussed the other day, where the individual must prove that he is not responsible.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend what clause or subclause he is referring to?

Mr. Hahn: I was referring to a section further on, but they all are in the same division. I am aware that we are dealing with clause 221, but from what has been said up to this point by hon. members who have spoken before me I gather that it would be necessary for the individual to prove that he is not guilty.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to express appreciation for the sympathetic attitude which the Minister of Justice indicated this afternoon toward my insistence that there is something more to this problem than just passing the clause now before us. I think it is fair to say that the views of Canadians generally were never better expressed by their representatives in parliament than they have been this afternoon and this evening by hon. members in various parts of the house who have risen to stress the urgent need of something more being done about this problem of death and injury on our highways.

The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, with the concurrence of the Minister of Justice after the minister made one correction, has drawn attention to the fact that constitutional considerations notwithstanding we do have an interest in this question of driving on the highways from the standpoint of the federal Criminal Code. Further, we have an interest because of our concern with respect to criminal negligence, and our concern over the protection of human life. There was one statement made by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings which I hope was not taken too seriously. I refer to his suggestion that it may be four or five years before something is done about this matter.

Mr. Nowlan: Democracy goes slowly.

Mr. Knowles: I realize my hon. friend has been sitting opposite a government that moves slowly, but in this instance I hope he will be pleasantly surprised and that there will be something done in relation to this matter in less time than he indicated.

I wonder if consideration might not be given to this matter being studied along with the other matter which has to be considered by the conference being called by the Minister of Transport. Only two days ago the Minister of Transport announced that in view of another situation he proposed to call a conference of provincial ministers having jurisdiction over highways to discuss the problems arising therefrom and to endeavour to find a common ground on the best way to regulate and control highway transport whether intraprovincial, interprovincial or international.

I recognize that that decision to call together the provincial ministers of highways arose out of a different situation, but in view of the fact that the Minister of Justice this afternoon stated that he concurred in the desirability of a conference being called at a federal-provincial level on this matter, I would ask that serious consideration now be given by the two ministers to whom I am speaking, and perhaps we might add the Minister of National Health and Welfare—I see he is over there and I know he will be interested too—

Mr. Martin: All the big guns are together.

Mr. Fulton: That requires a salvo.

Mr. Knowles: This is something that needs big shots to deal with it. I hope the matter will be treated with the seriousness it merits.

While I am dealing with this subject, Mr. Chairman, and as an indication of a field in which something of great value can be done, I believe that tribute should be paid to the work that is being done in the province from which the Minister of Justice and I both come. As he knows the provincial government's highway safety division has imposed in Manitoba, particularly in the greater Winnipeg area, very strict regulations with regard to the issuance of drivers' licences. I have had some connection with people who have obtained licences there in recent months, and I believe it is fair to say that what the applicants go through is not just a test but a course of training. As a matter of fact, they have had enough experience already in the greater Winnipeg area in the educational work being done by the highways branch to know that it is paying off in terms of less frightening statistics with regard to accidents in that area.

I believe something of that nature could be instituted generally throughout the country. I am not too sure, but I believe something similar is done in British Columbia. At any rate I believe the experience they have already had in some parts of the country and the information they have amassed could be shared at a federal-provincial conference. I agree with those who say that you cannot solve the matter entirely by law. Yet we will have to do something about it at the level of criminal law, and certainly this whole field is wide open for real progress. I hope the federal government will accept its responsibility to give a lead in this important matter.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I hope that if these three big guns who are together over there do finally manage to fire a salvo it will not just be a matter of making a report and then letting the matter drop.

Mr. Knowles: All some of them can do is make a retort.

Mr. Martin: That is as far as you can go with a peashooter.

Mr. Fulton: Some of the suggestions advanced are deserving of serious consideration, though I believe we should get back to a closer study of clause 221. In saying that I do not wish to be critical of what was said before. I say that because I believe it can be related very strictly to the problem now before us.

I wish to refer to the discussion which has arisen out of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and me, namely that it is a mistake to increase the maximum penalty under clause 221 to five years when before, under the same section, it was two years.

What I have to say here follows very closely what was said by the hon. member for London, or at least what was inherent in his remarks, namely that here we are dealing with the subject of criminal negligence. We are dealing with a subject concerning dangerous objects, in other words motor cars on highways; yet at the same time we are dealing with it under the Criminal Code. What we are trying to deal with under the Criminal Code in this instance is something which is not essentially criminal, something which is not essentially a crime. It is a perfectly legal thing to drive a motor vehicle on the highway and, as has been said, before there can be any conviction there has to be proven an element of intent or mens rea. Yet by the introduction both in the present draft bill and in the previous bill of an element of negligence, we eliminate to a large extent the element of intent. You are making a crime of that which a person did not intend to do. You are making him guilty of a crime simply because he was careless.

I am not questioning the right of parliament to do that. That right has been established. But the fact is that you are making a crime out of something or continuing as a crime something which does not necessarily involve the element of intent. I would therefore suggest, particularly in regard to the subject matter now under discussion, that by this negligence arising out of the use of motor vehicles you are creating what I might call a quasi-criminal offence for which the proper punishment may be not so much purely criminal, that is a jail sentence, as it may be punishment of what I might call a quasi-civil nature, namely prohibition of the right to drive.

I therefore go right back to clause 221, where I question the advisability of making the maximum penalty five years. I would suggest that the maximum penalty be continued as before at two years and then later, when we come to clause 225, that we greatly increase the prohibition on driving which a magistrate may impose. Possibly under clause 225 (a) if the offence is one which upon conviction could result in a sentence of life, it should be provided that the prohibition against driving should be for not less than 10 years. If it is under clause 225 (b) for an offence which would not result in a sentence for life, the prohibition against driving should be a maximum of 10 years. In other words you relate your penalty more closely to the civil element of the offence, and you diminish the criminal element of the penalty because the offence is not so much a criminal offence as it is quasi-criminal or indeed quasi-civil.

I hope I have not become too technical. I believe the minister follows my reasoning. I do not want to move this—I do not think the minister agrees with me necessarily, but I hope he follows my reasoning—

Mr. Garson: I follow your reasoning, but I disagree.

Mr. Fulton: It is all right if the minister does not agree with it. We are entitled to have a difference of opinion in this house. But I venture to suggest that in the light of everything that has been said here the general consensus of opinion, at least on the part of those who have spoken, is that this is not purely a criminal matter. Indeed one might frequently have raised points of order and said, "Why are you discussing this matter under the Criminal Code?"

As I see it the fact is, of course, that we are dealing in the Criminal Code with a matter which is not essentially a criminal offence. As the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) has pointed out, these men did not intend to do what they did, and they will deny until their dying day that they were responsible in a criminal sense. Yet we have felt it proper to deal with the act which was done under the Criminal Code which, by and large, involves the element of intent.

I do not think I need to say anything more in order to explain my meaning. The minister perhaps will not agree with me but I hope that, even if it is not done now, within a measurable period of time the penalties with respect to the prohibition of the right to drive will be increased; and at the same time I think it would follow that as to the strictly criminal punishment, the length of the prison sentence might be reduced. Otherwise you probably will not get a jury to convict.

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend, in the course of his remarks—as did the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings — dealt with the nub of this matter. The real question here is whether this kind of negligence that we are discussing in this section is criminal negligence. That is the point. As I indicated previously in this new code the commissioners have deliberately left out lesser motor vehicle offences as coming more appropriately under provincial legislation, which I take it would be in accord with the views of both of my hon. friends.

Is this which we are discussing criminal negligence? I do not think a better answer to that question can be found than in a brief quotation, which perhaps I might put on the record, from the report of the royal commission on the Criminal Code itself. This is what it says:

Mr. Fulton: What page?

Mr. Garson: This is page 12.

> The definition of criminal negligence in clause 191 is in accord with the judicial authorities which state that wanton or reckless misconduct is required to support a charge involving criminal negligence.

In other words, before the negligence that is in question in a prosecution can be shown to be criminal negligence, the crown must prove wanton or reckless conduct. They quote there as authority Rex v. Bateman, 94 L.J.K.B., 791; Andrews v. Director of Public Prosecutions, 106 L.J.K.B., 37; Rex v. Greisman, 59 L.R., 151 and 46 Canadian Criminal Cases, 179; Rex v. Baker, (1929) Supreme Court Reports, 354. Then the report goes on to say:

> In Rex v. Bateman supra, Lord Hewart stated that to support an indictment for manslaughter based on criminal negligence the prosecution must prove the matters necessary to establish civil liability (except pecuniary loss) and in addition—

That is the point.

> —must satisfy the court that the negligence alleged "went beyond a mere matter of compensation and showed such disregard for the lives and safety of others as to amount to a crime against the state and conduct deserving of punishment".

That is the point of this clause. What we are defining is criminal negligence; and we are providing punishment for that criminal negligence. I agree with everything that has been so well said by the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for London—

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings?

Mr. Garson: Yes, by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Oxford.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister left out the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Garson: Yes, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who was pre-eminent.

Mr. Knowles: Don't forget the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Garson: I agree with them when they say that the place to prevent this death on the highways is in the licensing and in provincial legislation such as that to which my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre properly referred in the province of Manitoba where, under that legislation, they have cancelled the licences of thousands of drivers because they showed, by their conduct, that they were not fit to have a licence. But the licensing of motor cars is a matter of property and civil rights which comes under provincial jurisdiction. The licensing of drivers likewise comes under provincial jurisdiction. The rules of the road are under provincial jurisdiction. The policing of the roads, even when it is done by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police under contract with the various provinces, is under the direction of the provincial authorities. We here are powerless to accomplish anything in that particular field of the prevention of highway accidents. The only thing in this connection that is under our jurisdiction is the criminal law and, as a result of the recent privy council judgment, the question of interprovincial or international traffic but not intraprovincial traffic.

The great bulk of the traffic we are now discussing as the source of traffic accidents and deaths takes place wholly within the confines of one province. These things being so, we have to confine our contribution to the stamping out of death upon the highways to those matters which come under our jurisdiction. To that end the royal commission has recommended, and I think very wisely, that we should undertake to state, as we do in the section under discussion, that where the negligence of a motor car driver is of such a serious character as to be a crime against the state, we should so designate it and should so penalize for it.

We have so designated it, and we have provided a maximum penalty of five years. Surely a maximum penalty of five years is not too much where, as a result of gross negligence, one man—a motor car driver—may have crippled a fellow citizen for life. I am sure the victim would be very glad to change places with him, to have his body back whole again and serve the penalty for him. With all deference to my friend the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings—who, I admit, has had a great deal more experience in these matters than I—I do not think the jury are going to shrink from bringing in a verdict of guilty if the facts of a case are sufficiently heinous, because the judge may impose a sentence of not more than five years or maybe as little as one day, following their verdict.

I agree with much that has been said in this very constructive debate, and I want to express my appreciation for the non-partisan, fair-minded, sincerely constructive and co-operative manner in which all members have taken part in the discussion. I agree with much of what they have said; but I also emphasize that our best contribution toward a solution of the matter is that we in this house should deal now with those things which are within our power. Having done this we then can go on and do our part toward encouraging the provincial and municipal authorities to do the best they can in their spheres.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, probably I know more about automobiles than I do about law, and I am not rising merely in order that I may have a chance to attach my name to the distinguished list of legal authorities given by the minister but because there is one idea arising out of my own experience that I thought I might interject.

I was very much interested in the suggestion of the hon. member for London, I believe it was, that suspension of the permit to drive is likely to be one of the best deterrents. I agree with him completely in that respect. Having said that as an introduction, I merely want to say this. I have had two or three people from my own city of Saskatoon write me after they got into difficulties through infractions of the law of the province of Saskatchewan. I could not help but notice in each case that while it was bad enough to have to pay a fine or go to jail for a week or two, the thing that concerned them particularly was the fact that the province of Saskatchewan had, in view of the offence committed, suspended their permission to drive for three months, six months, a year, or whatever it might happen to be.

I am completely in favour of the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that this matter should be discussed on the dominion-provincial level. I am well aware that licensing lies within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and perhaps it should be discussed at a dominion-provincial conference such as the hon. member proposed. Perhaps it might be discussed at the conference suggested by the Minister of Transport. If it could be discussed the provinces might be able to get together on their ideas with respect to the matter and reach some degree of uniformity, which I think would be an excellent thing from the point of view of licence suspension acting as a deterrent to this criminal negligence.

While most of us drive cars at least partly for pleasure, some of the people who get into trouble make their living by driving trucks, small delivery vans or whatever it may be. The letters I received from constituents of mine who had gotten into trouble were from people of that type. They said that the $40 or $50 fine was not so bad, but the point was that they made their living with the vehicle. These people of course ignore the fact that such vehicles can be driven at 70 miles an hour down a road and, weighing a couple of tons, attain a momentum of I know not what. They ignore the fact that in their hands these vehicles can be dangerous and lethal weapons. I think there is merit in the idea of the suspension of licences, and if some uniformity among the provinces as to what should be done in that regard could be achieved I think it might help to meet the situation.

Mr. Garson: May I make one point. We will shortly come to clause 225, and the hon. member for Saskatoon will see that there we ourselves are taking the power to prohibit a convicted person from driving. That provision will be uniform in effect across Canada.

Mr. Argue: Like the hon. member for Saskatoon, I know far more about automobiles than I do about criminal law. I would not need to know much about automobiles to know more than I do about criminal law, because my knowledge of criminal law is just about zero. It seems to me that even though section 221 may represent the best draftsmanship possible, even though it may be the best that can come out of the discussion tonight, there is nothing in the section that will do much to prevent accidents. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, we should not think that the passing of this section will meet the problem completely.

I have noticed, as have other hon. members, that the federal government is now to have jurisdiction over interprovincial automobile and truck traffic. I have one suggestion to make to the minister if he should attend a dominion-provincial conference on the control of automobile and truck traffic in the interprovincial sphere. In my opinion one thing that would do more to reduce accidents than anything else would be to exercise some control over the horsepower of engines installed in modern automobiles. Automobile manufacturers are making bigger and more powerful cars all the time. You can buy a car now that is—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member must recognize that we are discussing clause 221 and not something having to do with governors on automobiles.

Mr. Argue: I have been sitting here for some time, and I have listened to others discussing what the minister might do as a result of the judicial decision respecting the control of interprovincial highway traffic. I had pretty nearly completed my comment in any event. I believe it is something that the minister might well consider, because it is my opinion that if you put an ordinary human being in one of our very powerful modern cars he is going to try out the automobile irrespective of section 221 of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Nowlan: As I intimated earlier, before the clause carries I have two questions to ask and a general comment to make about subsection 2. Before I leave the lofty plane on which we have been travelling for the last hour and for an hour before dinner, I must say, with all respect, that I am not too impressed by the minister's statement that after all this is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. Just to show you how long, unfortunately, I have been practising law, may I say that I can well remember that one time I was defending a man for driving while intoxicated. He was charged under the Nova Scotia statute. At that time he came under the law of the province of Nova Scotia, but during the period between the time the information was laid and the time he came up for his trial the parliament of Canada decided that it constituted a crime, and made it a section of the Criminal Code. I appeared before the magistrate on that benign morning, pointed out the section of the Criminal Code and got an acquittal under the Nova Scotia statute.

That is how the wheels turn throughout the years and, as I say, it is an admission of more years gone by than I should like to admit. But if that can be done with respect to a prosecution for driving while drunk, some of these other matters which the minister has quite properly said come within provincial jurisdiction can by a declaration of this parliament be transferred, as was the charge of driving while intoxicated, and come within the scope of this volume of law which we have before us tonight.

Having said that, I want to refer to one or two matters of a very mundane nature. The first subsection refers to "every one who is criminally negligent in the operation of a motor vehicle." There is no definition of "motor vehicle". I am wondering whether there may be judicial decisions on this point. I am not certain. I am thinking, for instance, of a farmer driving a tractor, and of various other vehicles operated on the roads. Will they come within the scope of that provision?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at clause 2, subsection 25, page 4, he will see that it reads:

> "Motor vehicle" means a vehicle that is drawn, propelled or driven by any means other than by muscular power, but does not include a vehicle of a railway that operates on rails.

Mr. Fulton: Are horses muscular?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Do you mean the ones that were in the army?

Mr. Nowlan: Turning to subsection 2, again I want to say what has been said by others. Here again we get an increase in the penalty, which has been stepped up from the old section. To illustrate how rapidly the penalty has been increased, I may say that I have in front of me the 1938 edition of Crankshaw which shows the penalty as 30 days. After that the penalty was increased to six months, and now it has been increased to two years.

I quite realize that a reading of that clause, covering one who runs away to avoid this, that and the other thing, indicates it is a very formidable-sounding charge. Actually one finds from experience that in 999 out of 1,000 cases—perhaps that is too many, but certainly in 990 out of 1,000—the man has temporarily lost his head; he is scared, and he acts on an impulse. He is technically guilty of an offence under this clause. If anything of a serious criminal nature has occurred he can be convicted under one of these other clauses with which we are dealing. I doubt very much if it is necessary to increase the penalty under this clause. It seems to me this is a catch-all provision, that if you fail to convict him on some other offence then you convict him under this clause and you can still give him a fairly stiff sentence.

Actually, as anyone who has had experience in defending these cases knows, in most cases if he had remained at the scene there would have been an acquittal anyway because there would not be any suggestion of criminal intent. It is the fact of his running away which probably results in a conviction. With all respect to the Minister of Justice, who this afternoon read this very formidable list of members of this commission, and who says these men are without fault and are the perfect men—

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Nowlan: It is not carried, and it will not be carried for some time if someone keeps interrupting.

As I say we were discussing the matter of the commission this afternoon, and the Minister of Justice read the names of the members. We have great respect for them, but I still say many of those gentlemen have not had much experience in either prosecuting or defending—some of them have prosecuted—for a good many years. Without becoming at all critical of them I say—I have said this privately and I will say it in connection with other clauses—there is a prosecution complex in connection with many of these clauses where the sentences, it seems to me, have been automatically increased without justification. I want to express my protest against that.

There is one other minor question, but still a rather important one, I think. In subclause 2, Mr. Chairman, there is reference to accidents involving a person, horse or vehicle. I wonder why you have the horse in that provision. Apparently it is not an offence to have a collision with a cow. Certainly I realize that is the phraseology from the old section. I know of cases containing judicial comments as to why it is there.

The Minister of Justice referred to these commissioners, and took credit for all the work they had done. I am suggesting that possibly they would have been wise if they had omitted the reference to the horse, because the words "person or vehicle" would be wide enough. As the minister knows, it very often happens that a horse breaks out of a field and runs down a road alone. Why should it be an offence to strike that horse, and not an offence to strike any other animal? I think the phraseology is bad, and some attention should be given to it.

Mr. Garson: I believe I should give some attention to the two points raised by my hon. friend. So far as the penalty is concerned, he will see it is only where the charge is considered by the crown prosecutor to be sufficiently serious that he proceeds by way of indictment that it takes the penalty of two years. My hon. friend is quite right that in the great majority of cases, it is a minor offence. In such cases the crown proceeds by way of summary conviction and, as I recall it, a summary conviction takes a penalty of six months or $500; which is the maximum for a summary conviction.

With reference to the inclusion of the word "horse", my hon. friend is quite right in saying that is the language which was taken from the old section. The reason for its inclusion may be that the phrase has been judicially interpreted, and it was thought desirable to retain it. I would prefer to be cautious and leave it the way it is.

Mr. Fulton: The minister is not quite right, with respect, in saying the wording has been taken as a whole from the other section.

Mr. Garson: The word "horse" has been.

Mr. Fulton: The old section related to a horse in charge of a person, not just an accident involving a horse. The horse or vehicle had to be in charge of a person before the offence of rushing away without stopping and reporting the accident became a criminal offence. As the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings points out, if you run into a horse or a vehicle or an empty car, you now come within the provisions of the proposed section. Under the old section the horse had to be in charge of a person.

Mr. Nowlan: I think there is an anomaly here that should be looked at.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend would look up the proceedings he would see that the very point he is raising was discussed at great length in the committee of the other place and in the House of Commons committee, and after this discussion they decided to keep it as it is.

Mr. Fulton: Why?

Mr. Bell: Why was the joy-riding section, I think it was section 285 (3), taken out of here? I appreciate that it comes in later under car theft, but I wondered why it was not left in here where it was a so-called lesser offence. Is it the intention of the provincial legislatures to cover that?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will make a note of his question, could we consider it when we come to the other clause?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 222—Driving while intoxicated.

Mr. Nesbitt: There are one or two brief observations I should like to make. It has been the custom in the past, as most hon. members are aware, if a person is found in an intoxicated condition in a motor vehicle, even if it is motionless on the side of the road, to convict that person under this section. It has always seemed rather peculiar to me that a person who has obviously been drinking but feels incapable of taking charge of the car and has pulled off to the side of the road, should be punished for having removed himself from the road when he was obviously a menace. It does not seem reasonable to me. I cannot help but feel there ought to be some change in this section to take care of such a situation. I know of two people in my own constituency who, within the last four months, removed their car from the road knowing they were in no condition to drive it, yet received a sentence of seven days upon being convicted of this offence.

Another thing I should like to mention is the difference between the alcoholic and the ordinary, to coin a phrase, Saturday night drunk. There is quite a difference between the two, because the alcoholic is a sick person and seven days in jail is not going to keep him from continuing to drink and drive. I think the punishment in this section is quite suitable for the ordinary Saturday night drunk or the person who is drunk after a party, although the penalties might even be increased a little. I believe there is a difference when we are dealing with alcoholics.

Would the minister take into consideration, either on this clause or at some other point in the Criminal Code, the possibility of some alteration which would give a magistrate discretion, where it is shown that a person is an alcoholic, to send such person to some type of institution? I do not like to refer to it as punishment, because it is not punishment I have in mind. I should think that such person might be sent to an institution for some period of time to take treatment. If he would not go, then the penalty set out in clause 222 could be imposed. This might be worth consideration, because it would draw a distinction between the ordinary party drunk and the type of person who might be considered an alcoholic.

Mr. Knight: Before the minister answers I should like to place before him a situation which I believe causes greater injustice than the one described by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. The presumption would be that if a man was out driving on the road, felt too intoxicated to carry on and pulled in to the side of the road, the crown would not have much difficulty in proving that he had been driving and had been in an intoxicated state.

But, if that is an injustice, then I know of one that is much greater. I know of a case which happened not long ago where a man came to town, went to a dance, had two or three drinks and decided he would not drive home while intoxicated or, in the words of clause 223, "while his ability to drive a motor vehicle was impaired by alcohol". One of the other fellows with him said, "Oh, come on home". He said, "No, I am not going to drive. I might get picked up. I am not going home at all". The other man said, "What are you going to do?" He said, "I am going to stay in town until I am sober". The unfortunate part of it was that he had spent his money and could not afford a hotel bed. The other chap said, "Where are you going to sleep?" He said, "I am going to sleep in my car". So he foolishly climbed into the front seat of his car and went to sleep. He refused to go home. He did not leave town at all—did not even commence his journey. The police came along about three or four o'clock in the morning, wakened him up and laid a charge against him, I presume under this clause, for being in charge of an automobile, even though it was not in motion. I think this has some bearing on my hon. friend's case.

While I am on my feet I should like to make one other remark, and that is that the difference between clauses 222 and 223 is that in one case the person is intoxicated while in the other he is driving his car while his ability is impaired. I suggest that he is still intoxicated; and I do not see any particular difference between being intoxicated and being in a condition where your ability to drive is impaired.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knight: My legal friends have had their turn, and now a mere layman is going to have his inning. I have been reading in the newspapers about blood tests, breath tests, and tests of different varieties—whether they can write their names, whether they can say "three grey geese"—and perhaps my inability to say that clearly may indicate my inability to drive a car, or that my ability is impaired. The point I wish to make is that—

The Chairman: The hon. member appears to be discussing the clause dealing with impaired driving which, I believe, is clause 223. I was wondering whether it might be the wish of the committee to discuss those two clauses together.

Mr. Knight: If my argument follows, that the terms are synonymous, then I am discussing clause 222, which refers to driving while intoxicated; and I shall stick to that.

Mr. MacInnis: Would there be any objection to discussing the two clauses at the same time?

Mr. Garson: The chairman has made an excellent suggestion, that they are two branches of one matter, and I think we might very well discuss them together.

Mr. Hahn: Clause 224 deals with the same matter, and I would hope that it might be included also.

Mr. Knight: I have no objection to adding clause 224, so long as I am allowed to speak.

The Chairman: Then is it agreed that we discuss clauses 222, 223 and 224 at the same time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: I was going to suggest that we go back to clause 221 and allow it to stand.

Mr. Garson: I thought it was passed.

Mr. Fulton: I find I do not quite agree with the minister's statement, because I have checked with my colleagues who served on the House of Commons committee and neither of them recalls a discussion of the question to which we referred. Unfortunately there is no transcript of proceedings; therefore it is impossible to say definitely. Would there be any objection to letting clause 221 (2) stand?

The Chairman: But clause 221 is carried.

Mr. Fulton: I am making this request. The minister made a statement when we were discussing clause 221 (2) to the effect that it was discussed fully in the Senate subcommittee and in the special committee of the House of Commons. I was not able to engage in a discussion of the point because, as I say, there is no transcript of proceedings of the House of Commons committee. However, I checked immediately with my colleagues who were on the committee last year and, without wishing to enter into any controversy, they simply say they cannot recall any such discussion.

All I am asking is that under the circumstances clause 221 (2) be allowed to stand—not the whole clause—because I have some observations which I think are important.

Mr. Knight: May I ask for guidance? Am I in order in speaking?

The Chairman: I am entirely in the hands of the committee. I must remind hon. members, however, that I cannot allow them to revert to clause 221 without unanimous consent, because it has been carried.

Mr. Knight: I am asking, Mr. Chairman, if I am in order in discussing clause 222; that is all I want to know.

The Chairman: I understand the committee has agreed to discuss clauses 222, 223 and 224 at this time.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether there was any objection when the request was made by the hon. member for Kamloops that clause 221 be considered carried so far as subclauses 1 and 3 are concerned, but that subclause 2 be not regarded as carried?

The Chairman: Has the hon. member for Kamloops leave to revert to clause 221 (2)?

Mr. Knowles: And have it stand.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Mr. Fulton: And I would ask that that subclause stand, if there is no objection.

Mr. Garson: I have no objection.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has no objection.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I had only one other thing to say, before I was interrupted.

I wanted to talk about the word "intoxicated" in clause 222. I was saying that I am very hazy as to the definition of that word. I am convinced, however, that a great many of the accidents, and perhaps most of the fatal accidents, are attributable to indulgence in alcohol. I am not for the moment criticizing drinking; but I am going to say this, that if a man is going to drive a car he should not drink at all. I would go so far as to say that he should not have even a single drink. And I think that if we go farther with higher speeds on the road, and better roads and more powerful automobiles, we are going to reach a state of affairs where it will have to be made a criminal offence for a man to drive a motor car if it can be proved that he has indulged at all in alcoholic drinks.

In other words, so far as I am concerned, to save lives I should like to see it made a criminal offence if a man steps into a car and takes charge of it, if it can be proved that he has had even a single drink. It is not a case of being a teetotaller, and I am not now discussing that particular phase of morality, whether you should drink or should not. But I do say that when it is so difficult to prove the state of intoxication of a person after an accident has happened, because there may be an element of shock which is often mistaken for the effects of alcohol, it seems to me that we will get to the point, and it will not be very long, when we will have to decide that a man should not be allowed to drive a car at all if he has had a single drink.

Speaking for myself, if I had to drive two or three hundred miles I would not drink a single glass of beer, because I know perfectly well it is not a good thing to do. It is not safe for me and it is not safe for the people I meet on the road. I wonder if the minister would mind commenting on the case of the man who is wise enough not to go home or even to start to go home because he feels he is not capable of doing so.

Mr. Garson: We are dealing in this instance with what has been referred to as death on the highway, and serious injury on the highway. It is a rather harsh and painful subject for many people and this notion that we can try to stamp it out without hurting anybody's feelings is a mistaken one.

If a man is intoxicated and has the good sense at that particular stage of his intoxication to pull off to the side of the road and go to sleep or stay there in a sort of stupor, there is no guarantee that later on, when his intoxication wears off a little bit, he will not switch on the ignition and start to drive his car.

There is difference of opinion as to what is intoxication and there is some variation in the interpretation of this word by the courts. Several cases have held, and I think quite rightly, that if a man is drunk in his car at the side of the road he should be charged and convicted under the section. If you do not impose that hardship upon him you are going to provide a wide-open defence for every person who has still enough sense to be quiet when the police come along. He will simply say, "I have been sitting here not doing anything at all", and he will get off. If you are going to prohibit driving while intoxicated, in my judgment you have to go the whole way. It is much better to have that injustice, if you like, than to have some person crippled.

Mr. MacInnis: I think the minister has made a very good case for the enforcement of the law when a person is found in a car on the highway, whether the car is in motion or not. Besides what the minister has said, I think it is putting a tremendous responsibility on the police officer if when he is going to arrest a man he has to take the responsibility of saying not only that he is drunk but that he may not drive his car while he is drunk.

We discussed this in committee, and I cannot see that a case can be made out for not invoking the law against a person found in charge of a car, whether the car is or is not in motion. As the minister says, there is no telling when he is going to turn the key and start off.

Mr. Cardiff: Suppose he had given the key to somebody, or somebody had taken it from him and he was left there to sleep; what about that?

Mr. Garson: I think perhaps in that case he could prove that he was not in control of the car within the meaning of the section and would be able to establish a defence, although as a matter of legislative policy I wonder even in that case whether it is not better that the prohibition should be an outright prohibition of an intoxicated man being in a car. In this death and maiming on the highway we are dealing with something we should not trifle with; and in my judgment it is better to make the prohibition outright. You will find that in those provincial jurisdictions where there is a strong enforcement of this law there are lower accident and insurance rates.

Mr. Cardiff: It may be rather difficult to handle a man in that condition. He may be in a mood where you cannot take him out of his car or do anything with him. You want to protect him, so you take his key from him and leave him in the car. Then the police come along and pick him up after you have tried to make him safe. It does not seem exactly right that he should be fined for not doing anything with the car.

Mr. Lusby: With regard to that situation, in my own province it is generally considered that if the car cannot be started, it is not an automobile. There are a series of cases which hold that a disabled car or one that cannot be started is not considered to be an automobile within the meaning of the section.

However, the point I wished to speak on more particularly was the one touched upon by an earlier speaker, that is the question of intention with regard to care or control. I was under the impression that there was a difference of opinion in the courts of the different provinces about whether the intention to drive was a necessary element. I know it has been decided in Nova Scotia in Rex v. Crowe that no intention was necessary. That was a case in which the man was so drunk that he could form no intention whatever. He was found in his car hopelessly drunk.

I was under the impression, which may not be correct, that in some of the other provinces it has been held that it is necessary to show that the man had the intention to drive. I suggest that it would be most desirable that there be no such conflict. The wording of clauses 222 and 223 should make it perfectly clear whether the intention of driving is a necessary element in the charge of care or control.

I have heard it said that clause 224(2), which was an amendment passed I think in 1951, indicated that parliament intended that it must be proved when not presumed that the man had the intention of driving. If that is so, it is a very weak and uncertain way of indicating it. If there is any uncertainty, and I think there is, then I submit that the wording of the section should be changed to make it absolutely certain whether the intention of driving is a necessary element. I am not so much concerned with whether it should or should not be made an element—I think the Minister of Justice considers that the intention of driving should not be a necessary element—but I do suggest that the section should remove any such uncertainty.

Mr. Winch: I am interested in the discussion which is taking place, but before making any comments I should like to ask whether we are dealing only with clause 222 or with clauses 223 and 224?

[Mr. Cardiff.]

The Chairman: I understood that the committee had agreed to discuss clauses 222, 223 and 224 at this time.

Mr. Winch: As I said, I am very interested in this discussion. As a general rule I find that I can go along with the explanations of the Minister of Justice, but this is one time when I certainly cannot go along with his explanation and his thinking. It may be somewhat repetitious, but I wanted to go over it again.

There is one point I should like to make. A man or woman goes into a club or some place where drinks are served. He or she has perhaps one too many and heads for home. If he or she is picked up on the way home, that is just their bad luck under the law. But if he has enough sense left to realize that he is not capable of driving and pulls to the side of the road or a parking place, according to the statement made by the minister he can be charged, and he said he should be charged, because of the fact that he may, while still under the influence of liquor, start driving.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal with this matter. Since when did we in the Dominion of Canada give the police authority to arrest someone under the Criminal Code because they think that person may break the law? It seems to me an extraordinary supposition that a person who has done the right thing should be arrested because in the minutes or perhaps the hour ahead he might do something wrong. To my mind that is an absurd interpretation of the meaning of justice, and there can be no justification for the arrest of a man simply because the policeman thinks he might break the law. I believe a man or a woman who does the right thing in that manner should have a medal instead of being condemned and indicted, because even with befuddled brains they did do the right thing, pulled to one side and stopped.

The minister referred to a later clause relating to a person being in a position to drive. If a person happens to go to sleep in the driver's seat it appears he is then in control of that car, although it is at a standstill. But I honestly cannot understand the Minister of Justice putting forward that kind of proposition. I can understand the provision in clause 222 under which a person can be charged if the vehicle is stationary, because it is conceivable that they might stop in the middle of the street to the danger of the general public simply because of the manner in which they were stopped; but surely if drivers pull to the side and park because they realize they are not in a fit condition to drive, then that should be recognized under some provision in this code, and they should not be considered guilty because they might drive a car afterward and still be under the influence of liquor.

I would like the minister to think that over. However, as the chairman has said, we are discussing three clauses. In this regard I would like the Minister of Justice to consider clause 224 (3) which deals with the chemical analysis of a sample of blood, urine, breath or other bodily substance which may be admitted in evidence. Subsection 3 of clause 224 reads as follows:

> In any proceedings under section 222 or 223, the result of a chemical analysis of a sample of the blood, urine, breath or other bodily substance of a person may be admitted in evidence on the issue whether that person was intoxicated or under the influence of a narcotic drug, or whether his ability to drive was impaired by alcohol or a drug, notwithstanding that he was not, before he gave the sample, warned that he need not give the sample or that the results of the analysis of the sample might be used in evidence.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is the point I would like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Justice. Under this clause, whether a person is warned or not, if the sample is taken upon his being charged it can be introduced in evidence and undoubtedly on being introduced in evidence it will have some influence on the magistrate, judge or perhaps the jury, depending on the procedure under which he is being tried.

The point I am particularly concerned with at this moment is the fact that under subsection 3 of clause 224 there is the right to take a sample of the breath. That sample is taken and it is chemically analysed. But there is nothing whatsoever in this subsection which states that the instrument used in the chemical analysis of the breath must be an approved instrument or machine. The reason I raise this, Mr. Chairman, is that there are, as far as I know, somewhere in the neighbourhood of 12 such machines on the market at the present time, but only three of them are recognized as being fairly accurate. The first is known as an intoximeter, the second is the drunkometer and the third is the alcometer. Tests with these machines are admitted as evidence in, I believe, 17 states in the United States. In spite of that there is nothing in this subsection which states that an approved machine must be used in analysing a sample of the breath.

I wonder if the reason for that omission is that subsection 3 of clause 224 is only a permissive clause, and that ancillary legislation will be required by provincial legislatures or city councils or municipalities. An hon. member beside me says "No" and I hear "No" from other hon. members; it would therefore appear that this is the law. If that is so, then it would appear that as the law reads any chemical test without the use of approved machines can be submitted as evidence as to whether a person is inebriated, or as to the percentage of alcohol in his breath. That is the way I read it, and I believe it is an important point which should be cleared up.

An hon. member beside me says that it depends on the nature of the test, but I am not referring to a test of the urine or the blood. I am referring to a test of the breath. My hon. friend says that the same rule applies, but where has there been a rule established as to the correctness of that medical evidence? That brings me back to my point that there are 12 machines on which the breath can be tested, but only three are recognized in the United States. Have I made my point clear?

Mr. Garson: Yes, quite clear. At the time this legislation was introduced we in the justice department called in some scientists of the University of Toronto to assist us in devising a method of dealing with such matters. There were then two courses of action which might have been followed. One would have been to do as has been done in some European countries; that is, to provide for the taking of blood or other tests by specified and approved apparatus under strict control at all stages by competent technicians, and then use these tests, without any further evidence of intoxication at all, as conclusive evidence of intoxication if these proper tests showed X parts of alcohol in the blood. After careful consideration we came to the conclusion that if this method were to be adopted at all then we thought it would be more consonant with British justice that the burden of proving the case should continue to rest upon the crown, and that we should admit evidence from these technicians and this apparatus for what it was worth in establishing the facts which it purported to prove.

Of course, as is implied by the remarks of my friend the hon. member for Vancouver East, in a case under our legislation here the crown, after having laid the charge and undertaken to prove it by this method, would have to show that the sample of the breath was taken—or a sample of the urine or of the blood—by a certain apparatus, and would have to trace that sample from the body of the accused person to the laboratory, then have the man who had taken the sample and analysed it appear in court and testify and submit to cross-examination as to what the analysis was. They would have to show that it had been handled from beginning to end with such care that the resulting data were accurate.

I should think that in most cases, unless they were careful and expert, using proper apparatus, they would put the case for the crown in a very weak position indeed; for defence counsel, by merely cross-examining those who had had the handling of the sample, would be able to show either that the apparatus was not on the approved list that my hon. friend for Vancouver East referred to and therefore was not reliable, or that the proper precautions were not taken in getting the sample in the first place and in caring for it from the time it was taken until the time it was analysed.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a question before the minister leaves that point?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Winch: Would it be up to the prosecutor then to prove the qualifications of the man who had taken the test and also the approval of the machine? My third question is on the same subject. If a definite figure of 1·5 per cent or 1·537 per cent of alcohol in the blood is accepted by the Department of Justice as a state of intoxication, should it not then be in the act?

Mr. Garson: No. I thought I had made it clear that we rejected the method of X per cent or any other percentage in the blood as being conclusive evidence of intoxication. That was one of the alternatives which we could have adopted, but we rejected it. This present legislation provides for this sampling device being used as evidence for what it is worth to prove a straight question of fact of how many parts of alcohol the accused had in his blood. As I can see from his remarks my hon. friend understands that the crown would have to show that the technician who took the sample was competent. The technician would have to undergo cross-examination on how he took it; what he did with it; if it was kept at a certain temperature; if when he took it from the accused's blood he used alcohol in swabbing the skin before he injected the hypodermic needle and so on. The whole thing would then just be a simple question of fact no different in character from the evidence a policeman gives as to whether the accused could walk a straight line after he was arrested.

We thought in this way the accused's right to a fair trial would be better safeguarded than by our adopting this method of convicting him solely because he had X parts of alcohol in his blood. This was a midway position between the full reliance placed by some European countries on the alcohol content of bodily substances, and our then method of proving intoxication by police evidence of the accused's behaviour. We thought this was a happy compromise.

Mr. Winch: I do not know whether or not I used the correct term, but the minister understands what I have in mind. Is there any case law on this matter at all, on which you are basing this legislation?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Winch: Could I have the information on it?

Mr. Garson: There is not very much, I must confess. I do not think it is going to be of much use to my hon. friend because it establishes, in the province in which it was taken, that the enactment of this subsection (4d) and subsection (4e)—that is of the present section—has not changed the law as laid down in Rex v. McNamara, 51 Ontario Law Reports, that evidence of a blood sample taken from the accused in custody, even without his consent, is admissible. In other words, in the province of Ontario it has been held, before this amendment was brought down in parliament here, that the blood sample could be taken and was admissible in evidence in the courts of Ontario. All this case law establishes is that the enactment of these sections has not changed what the courts, before they were enacted, had declared to be the law.

Mr. Winch: In other words there is no case law as far as your introduction of this subsection is concerned?

Mr. Garson: No, not on any of the points raised by my hon. friend. That is right.

Mr. Stick: I should like to ask a few questions of the minister, but as it is ten o'clock may I move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Fulton: It is not ten o'clock yet.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Fulton: How about letting clauses 222 to 225 inclusive stand?

Mr. Knowles: Clause 225 has not been called.

Mr. Garson: As far as I am concerned I have no objection to that procedure. I would bespeak the co-operation of my hon. friends when we take them up again, that we might put them through fairly expeditiously.

Mr. Winch: And may I bespeak co-operation in having the answers to the other questions?

Mr. Harkness: Do I understand that these sections will not be discussed when we come back to the Criminal Code next?

Mr. Garson: I think what the hon. member for Kamloops meant was that we should let them stand merely from this sitting until the next sitting.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Garson: While I am on my feet I might clear up the other point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I am sorry if he does not agree with my opinion as to what the legislative policy in this matter should be. As I said when I was on my feet the last time, the Canadian courts differ in their interpretations. Some of them take the position that it is not necessary, to use the terms used by the hon. member for Cumberland, to establish mens rea or any guilty intent. Such courts interpret these sections as an absolute prohibition of a person being intoxicated while in a motor car. Notwithstanding my hon. friend's protest, I must confess that that is the interpretation which seems to me to be the more appropriate one.

Mr. Fulton: If I am not mistaken, is that not the case in the United Kingdom where there is not a criminal code?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend may be right in that regard. But on the other hand the courts of other provinces have held that it is necessary to prove mens rea, and that an accused found in a car under the circumstances named by my hon. friend, too drunk to have any criminal intent, should be acquitted.

The suggestion has been made by the hon. member for Cumberland that we should clear up this point by an amendment to this clause. With deference may I say that, unusual as my suggestion may seem to be, it might be better not to clear it up. I say that for this reason. The efficacy of legislation of this kind is directly proportionate to the efficiency with which it is enforced by provincial authorities. When we have not received requests from any of the provinces for a clearing up of this point, it may well be that the interpretation which is made by the courts of the provinces is the one that is most satisfactory to the law enforcement authorities, and under which they would prefer to carry on their work of law enforcement.

Mr. Winch: Where does the authority lie with regard to the machine or the test? Is it federal or provincial authority?

Mr. Garson: I am speaking of the other point my hon. friend raised, as to the position of an accused who has been found in a hopelessly intoxicated condition in a parked car. I think we can probably get a more effective enforcement if we leave each province with that interpretation now in effect which, from the fact that they have not made any representations to us concerning it, they seem to favour.

Mr. Winch: What is the position—

Mr. Fulton: Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think it is generally understood that at ten o'clock clauses 222, 223 and 224 were under discussion. Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clauses stand.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue with the Criminal Code. On Monday we shall move to go into supply and if we do attain that desirable end we shall proceed with public works after calling six departments.

Mr. Knowles: It was four the last time.

Mr. Harris: It goes up two a week.

Mr. Knowles: If you keep raising it you will never get into supply.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 26, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

UNITED NATIONS

VISIT OF SECRETARY GENERAL, MR. DAG HAMMARSKJOLD, TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Speaker: We are all pleased and proud to note the presence in our gallery today of one who is devoting his brilliant talents, vast experience and dynamic energy to the realistic application of the high purposes and principles set forth in the United Nations charter, Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, Secretary General of the United Nations.

(Translation):

Mr. Secretary General of the United Nations Organization, we extend to you a most cordial welcome. We marvel at your splendid career as a statesman and a diplomat, which is a source of inspiration for us. We wish to assure you, in the fulfilment of your task, of our admiration, of our gratefulness and of our best wishes.

(Text):

As hon. members know, Mr. Hammarskjold was elected secretary general of the United Nations on April 7, 1953, less than a year ago. Referring to his appointment, he is reported to have said that he was advocating an active role for the secretary general. "Active", he said, "as an instrument, a catalyst, an inspirer."

Since assuming this high office he has shown not only his ability but his determination to live up to his slogan. He has won general admiration and respect for his devotion to his work, as he said himself in his inaugural speech, "of reconciliation and realistic construction",—"based on respect for the laws by which human civilization has been built."

We do extend to him the best wishes and the warmest possible welcome to the House of Commons of Canada.

DIPLOMATIC INSTRUMENTS

TABLING OF NOTE TO WASHINGTON ON CHICAGO DIVERSION

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the house two copies, in English and in French, of a note dated February 1, 1954, from the Canadian embassy in Washington to the Secretary of State for External Affairs dealing with the Chicago diversion.

POST OFFICE

OPERATION OF FIVE-DAY 40-HOUR WEEK— EFFECT ON LETTER CARRIERS

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in view of the interest hon. members have displayed in the operation of the five-day 40-hour week as it affects letter carriers, I would like to make a statement on the matter.

The introduction of the five-day 40-hour week in the postal service in those places in Canada where it is the prevailing practice will necessitate changes and rearrangements in work schedules. In the case of postal clerks, there must be a system of rotation as mails are received and dispatched every day of the week. In the case of letter carriers, delivery is given six days a week, and after further consideration it has been decided to adopt the rotation letter carrier plan.

Because of misunderstandings that have arisen, it is evident that very few people understand either the rotation letter carrier plan or the casual help plan, both of which were considered very carefully by the department. Thus I feel I should give a concise explanation and show briefly the advantages of each plan.

Under the rotation plan, additional full-time letter carriers would be employed. So as to arrange the complete work week for the full-time help, it would be necessary to rotate the duties of the various carriers. For example, a carrier one week would work Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday and have Saturday off. The next week he might work Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday and have Friday off, and so on.

The main advantages of the rotation plan are: first, the walks would be served by full-time carriers; second, it would follow normal labour practice; third, it would provide a number of additional permanent jobs; fourth, it would ensure an adequate number of employees available for duty at all times, whereas casual help might be more uncertain; fifth, it would be more simple administratively.

The casual help plan presented many problems for the administrative officers, but it offered advantages and benefits to the regular carriers.

The main advantages of the casual help plan are:

1. The regular carriers would be able to enjoy a long week end; that is they would always have Saturday and Sunday off.

2. They could, if they so desired, earn additional pay on Saturdays as casual help, provided they did so of their own free will.

3. Regular carriers and casual help carriers would not have to learn several routes.

4. It would provide an opportunity for competent persons to earn money by delivering mail on Saturdays.

The casual help plan was explained to a number of representatives of the letter carriers. They saw at that time—that is early in December—the advantages which I have already mentioned. More recently, there has been a reaction against the proposal to use casual help.

Since December some misunderstanding also seems to have arisen. For example, it has been stated:

1. That casual help would be employed at reduced rates of pay.

2. That letter carriers ordered back to work on Saturday would lose some of their pay privileges; and

3. That relief carriers would be released.

None of these statements is correct.

For any innovation to be really successful, it is desirable that it should have the wholehearted support of the employees. I mentioned earlier that we have decided to adopt the rotation letter carrier plan. This plan apparently now has the support of the employees. Arrangements are already under way to secure the additional employees who will be required to implement the five-day 40-hour week by the use of the rotation plan.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, I am sure this announcement by the Postmaster General will meet with general approval. I might suggest that it is not too late for him to reconsider some of the other matters that we also suggested.

FINANCE

TABLING OF "OUTLOOK FOR PRIVATE AND PUBLIC INVESTMENT IN CANADA, 1954"

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I lay on the table two copies of "Outlook for Private and Public Investment in Canada, 1954". Sufficient copies of this study are not available for distribution to members at the moment, but we hope to have them early next week. General distribution will be made at that time.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 313, respecting the Dominion Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. McIlraith.

POSTAL SERVICE

ALLEGED DELAY IN MAIL DELIVERIES TO SERVICE PERSONNEL IN KOREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General and to ask him whether his attention has been drawn to complaints with regard to unreasonable delays in the delivery of mail to those in the armed services in Korea. Will he have that question looked into and, if possible, will he do something to speed up deliveries of mail both ways, to and from servicemen in Korea?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): My hon. friend was kind enough to send me notice of this question. It was the first news I had about this alleged delay. I shall be glad to inquire into the matter and to act accordingly.

CUSTOMS ACT

INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION OF RECENT AMENDMENT TO ELECTRIC STOVES, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the Canadian electrical manufacturers association made representations to the government asking that the provisions of this session's Bill No. 29 be applied to electric stoves or any other electrical appliances in addition to refrigerators? What is the government's attitude towards such representations?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was good enough to give me notice of his question. The answer to part 1 is that the Canadian electrical manufacturers association has not made representations to the government asking that the provisions of this session's Bill No. 29 be applied to electric stoves or any other electrical appliances in addition to refrigerators.

As to the second question—what is the government's attitude towards such representations—I can only say that if such representations are made they will be given examination and consideration. I might state, though, that it is the duty of the department to carry out the provisions of this section of the act, the same as with any other section of the act, and it is done without prompting or request from any particular line of manufacturers.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—REPORTED ACTION OF ALBERTA GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister a report to make with regard to the reported action of the Alberta government in connection with one of the chemical plants in Edmonton?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As my hon. friend will note, there is on the order paper a question standing in the name of the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison). On Monday I shall be tabling a complete reply, bringing up to date the reaction of the government of Alberta to this matter and further discoveries resulting from investigations made by our technical officers.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORT OF BOARD OF GRAIN COMMISSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can he inform the house when we might expect the report of the board of grain commissioners from the queen's printer?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): All I can say is that the report is in the hands of the queen's printer and has been there for some two weeks. I will make inquiries as to when the report can be tabled.

Mr. Dinsdale: As a supplementary question may I ask whether that report, when it becomes available, will be referred to the committee on agriculture?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes. I have already said that it would be.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

INQUIRY AS TO DEPARTMENTAL REPORT FOR 1953

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): In regard to the printing of reports, may I ask the Minister of Defence Production when we may expect the report of the Department of Defence Production for the calendar year 1953 to become available?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I shall make inquiries and advise at a later time.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 25, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose previously we were considering clauses 222, 223 and 224. Shall these clauses carry?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, may I at this stage ask the minister, subject to the approval of the other members of the committee, whether sections 222, 223, 224 and 225 might stand. When the committee rose last night we had had considerable discussion on these sections in general. Since that time I have made inquiries amongst the members of the official opposition and can say that it is our desire to discuss these sections further at some considerable length with respect to both the social and the moral implications involved and with respect to the law itself. I have reached the conclusion, with which my colleagues here agree, that it would take us some time to complete the type of discussion we have in mind. I should therefore like to suggest to the minister—as I say, subject to the approval of the other members of the committee—that these sections 222, 223, 224 and 225 should be allowed to stand for later detailed consideration in accordance with the arrangement made when we started consideration of this bill in committee.

Mr. Garson: I have no objection to allowing the clauses to stand as suggested.

The Chairman: Clauses 222, 223, 224 and 225 stand.

Clauses 226 and 227 agreed to.

Criminal Code

On clause 228—Duty to safeguard dangerous places.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a question I should like to ask the minister with respect to subsection 2. In the opinion of the minister, would that provision go so far as to include swimming pools or something of that nature?

Mr. Garson: I am reluctant to express these casual legal opinions on hypothetical cases, but I would be inclined to think that under certain circumstances it would. The gravamen of the offence is the leaving of an excavation, which a swimming pool certainly involves, in an unguarded state which may result in damage to those who stumble into it by accident. I would think that it could cover the case of a swimming pool which, my hon. friend will notice, is an excavation on land that he owns.

Mr. Nesbitt: What I have in mind is that a great many people in large and small cities and towns and elsewhere have on their property such things as fishponds, swimming pools and so on into which children may fall. I was wondering whether under such circumstances these people would be liable to criminal prosecution.

Mr. Winch: As a layman I should like to know whether "excavation" means excavation by any instrument or implement or does it refer to a natural excavation that is below the normal grade level?

Mr. Garson: I think that the term "excavation" clearly indicates the result of excavating, which is a human act applied to the land. I do not think that the word "excavation" could be applied to a natural condition.

Mr. Nesbitt: Would the minister clarify the question that I put? In his opinion does the provision cover such things as fishponds and swimming pools? There are thousands of them throughout the country, and while I am quite sure that sort of thing was not contemplated it could be covered by the wording of the section.

Mr. Garson: I think it might perhaps answer my hon. friend's question if I were to refer to a case decided under the corresponding section of the existing law. This case is Rex v. Eastcrest Oil Company (1945) S.C.R. 191. The note on this case in Tremeear's criminal code supplement page 85 is as follows: "section 287 (6)".

That is the analogous section in the existing code.

. . . requires that an excavation, etc., shall be fenced in such a manner as to prevent an accidental fall into it, not so that entrance is impossible.

[The Chairman.]

Then Mr. Justice Rand of the Supreme Court of Canada is reported as saying:

What is contemplated is the prevention of injury from hidden openings; the fence or guard must protect the unwary; but when the existence of the opening is made evident, the purpose of the fence or guard is accomplished. The owner must protect the trespasser on the land from a trap, but he is not called on to protect against a subsequent danger from trespassing on the guard itself raised against that trap. The duty is not to prevent the person from falling into an opening but falling in "accidentally", that is, accidental as to the existence of the thing holding the threat.

If my hon. friend applies that language to the examples he was posing a moment ago he will see that the great bulk of them would be covered by that statement of the law.

Mr. Nesbitt: I quite agree, but what I mainly had in mind was the question of small children where that judgment would not necessarily apply.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the minister a question having to do with abandoned mines. Very often mining companies go on a private property, work a mine and then abandon it. Would the owner of the property have to take steps to see that no injuries occurred to people coming on the land afterwards? Whose responsibility is it?

Mr. Garson: I am sorry I was not able clearly to hear my hon. friend.

Mr. Brooks: I referred to the case of abandoned mines. Mining companies may go on private property, work a mine and then abandon it. Is it the responsibility of the private individual to see that such mines are protected so far as the public are concerned?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I would think so.

Mr. Brooks: It is quite a responsibility.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry that I have to ask so many questions at this time but I should like to be very clear about the matter. What is the meaning of the words "is under a legal duty to guard"? I ask that because subsection 2 refers to anyone who has an excavation on land which he owns. On the land where I have my home in Vancouver I have three fishpools and they are quite deep. Is there any legal responsibility involved there? I am not quite sure.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I have to draw the line somewhere. I cannot object to being asked to interpret the bill we are considering, but the legal responsibility to which my hon. friend refers may be a legal obligation imposed upon my hon. friend or any other owner of land by the laws or provincial legislation of British Columbia. I am sure that, standing here today, I cannot tell him what the laws of British Columbia are with relation to a matter of this kind.

The wording of this clause 228 (2) which we are discussing is:

> Every one who leaves an excavation on land that he owns or of which he has charge or supervision is under a legal duty to guard it in a manner that is adequate to prevent persons from falling in by accident and is adequate to warn them that the excavation exists.

As long as my hon. friend brings himself within that language then he remains clear of any penalty under this clause. What he has to do is to see that the protection is adequate to prevent persons from falling in by accident and is adequate to warn them that the excavation exists. It may be that the type of excavation my hon. friend has on his land is such that the mere presence of it gives that warning to people coming along. If that be so I would think that to anyone who is reasonably observant at all the presence of that pool would be adequate to warn him that the excavation which had been made to provide the pool existed.

Mr. Winch: I am up against a most difficult problem because what the minister has said drives home to me something that I have been completely unable to understand in our entire discussion of the Criminal Code. Time after time in answering questions and discussing clauses the minister has said that the matter depends upon legislation of provincial governments.

Now, perhaps the minister can gather what I am trying to get at. I find it difficult to understand why the provisions of acts of this house are dependent upon acts of the provincial legislature. This explanation was given in connection with sections 221 to 225 which the minister allowed to stand. How does one reconcile the status of an act passed here with the minister's statement that it depends on an act of the legislature?

Mr. Garson: I suggest that part of the difficulty is that my hon. friend asks as to what his legal responsibility is in relation to a fishpond on his property.

Mr. Winch: Under this act.

Mr. Garson: Only under this act? Well, under this act my hon. friend is not liable to incur a penalty providing the fishpond of which he speaks is guarded in a manner that is adequate to prevent persons from falling in by accident, and the precautions taken are adequate to warn that an excavation exists. If my hon. friend's fishpond is such as to bring him within that language and within the interpretation given by Mr. Justice Rand that I read a few minutes ago, then that clears him so far as this section is concerned.

As to whether or not he is cleared with regard to civil liability is another question entirely. When my hon. friend was speaking I was not too clear which of the two liabilities he meant. In most cases he is in greater danger, I would think, as regards civil liability than he would be under this section.

Mr. Nesbitt: There is only one other point I should like to mention. I am sorry to keep questioning about this rather trivial matter, but if we got it cleared up now it might save a great deal of time in the courts in the future. Since persons would naturally include children, it seems to me that, unless one had a great fence around the fishpond, the proper precaution as against small children would not have been taken under the wording of this section. Small children do tend to wander about the neighbourhood and might very easily fall into a fishpond and be drowned. It would seem to me that to prevent children from falling into a fishpond extreme precautions would have to be taken, such as a high wire fence, to meet the liability imposed by this section. I was wondering if that is what the section contemplates.

Mr. Winch: That is my point. I understand that this Criminal Code, being an act of the House of Commons, takes priority over any other act. Mention is made of an excavation on property which you own. There must be hundreds of thousands of properties across Canada upon which there is an excavation. I do not know how it is at most places, but I know at my place the children from the neighbourhood come there because I happen to have a property with trees, shrubs, and fishponds. As I read this section, because I have an excavation in the shape of a fishpond on my property, if any children accidentally fall into it, I am responsible because I have not given any warning or, as my hon. friend says, erected a fence. I should like to have an explanation from the minister.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I am unable to illuminate this matter any further for my hon. friend. I have read into the record, where he can find it and at his leisure read it carefully, the very carefully considered interpretation of this particular section by one of the best judges in Canada. The section is quite clear to me. I would suggest to my hon. friend that if he reads the judgment at his leisure, as it will appear in Hansard, I think he will find the answer to his question.

Mr. Harkness: The question brought up by the hon. member for Royal, and the minister's answer to it, seems to indicate that the responsibility for this excavation, and the danger to trespassers or others who happen to be going over private property, is in the wrong place. As the minister knows, in Alberta and Saskatchewan most of the surface rights on the land are owned by the farmer but the mineral rights are not. A company may secure the mineral rights and put down a mine or, as in a particular case I know of, an oil company might conduct exploration work and might put down what is known as a slim hole. Last year being a wet year, water came up into the hole and a soft spot developed into which a neighbour's truck sank. It happened that there was no loss of life. However, children pass that spot going back and forth to school, and one of them could have been drowned in that hole.

The responsibility, as I understand the minister's answer, is on the owner of the land although he had no responsibility for putting down the hole or, in the case mentioned by the member for Royal, for digging the mine. A company puts down a hole, then goes off and leaves it and they have no responsibility. The sole responsibility is on the owner of the land.

Mr. Garson: I certainly do not profess to be any expert on mining law problems in Alberta. But it has been my impression, and I think perhaps it is the impression of the hon. member for Calgary North himself, that the owner of the mineral rights has to make an arrangement with the owner of the surface rights in order to use the surface rights for the purpose of realizing upon his minerals. I would imagine that the contract which is made between them, if it is properly drawn, would contain a clause protecting the owner of the surface rights by stating that after the mining operations have been concluded the surface would be restored to that condition which will not leave the owner of the surface rights open to a penalty under a clause such as this clause 228 (2). I am sure that whatever the issue may be as between the owner of the surface rights and the owner of the mineral rights, the law should not leave out of account the position of those who could fall into a trap of that sort and be seriously injured. It is the purpose of this clause 228 (3) to protect these persons. This law has been the law of Canada since the code was passed originally in 1892. In that time there does not seem to have been any great hardship developed under it.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Harkness: Where the mineral rights go with the surface rights, I can see it would be entirely a matter of contract, and there would be no difficulty. Where you have a situation such as that which prevails in most of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, where the mineral rights and surface rights do not go together, you get a different situation. As the hon. member for Kamloops says, you cannot contract out of a criminal liability. The criminal liability, under this provision, applies to the owner of the land.

Mr. Garson: I suggest to my hon. friend that while one cannot directly contract out of a criminal liability, yet if a criminal liability arises because a certain thing is not done, one can have a clause in a contract to provide for the doing of that thing. By so doing, he will get out from under that criminal liability.

Mr. Knight: A good many accidents on the prairies are due to the fact that wells, perhaps abandoned or unfinished, are left without fencing, or the fencing has deteriorated to such a degree that children or livestock can fall in. My understanding of the law is that the owner of the land is liable for the value of such livestock.

Then there is another type of accident that has become more common, where children are drowned in what are considered to be swimming holes, but which are really dugouts, many of which were dug under the auspices or the sponsorship of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act administration. I am wondering what the responsibility would be of the federal government, as the owner of some of these places, in the matter of keeping them fenced, or having warning notices in regard to bathing, and that sort of thing.

Mr. Garson: I dislike repeating a careful statement I read earlier to members of the committee, but perhaps the quickest way to clear up any possible misunderstanding in connection with the clause is to repeat the language of Mr. Justice Rand. I shall do that and ask my hon. friends to take careful note of what it says. Mr. Justice Rand says, in part:

> What is contemplated is the prevention of injury from hidden openings.

That is, a child has gone swimming over a period of time in a pool that has been excavated and has been in existence for a considerable period of time. The child is not drowned because of a hidden opening, but rather because he has suffered a cramp, or may have gone beyond his depth, or could not swim, or some other such reason.

Then, continuing the quotation:

> The fence or guard must protect the unwary; but when the existence of the opening is made evident, then the purpose of the fence or guard is accomplished.

In other words if one had a gravel pit on his farm large enough for anyone to see, even at night, and people came there to swim, and if as a result of doing so someone was drowned, it could not be argued that he stumbled into the hole by accident. Under such circumstances I should think that the language used by Mr. Justice Rand, read in conjunction with the language in this clause, would indicate that there would be no criminal liability.

On the other hand, if one had a dug well, level with the surface of the ground, and a person coming along could not see it until he fell into it, I should think criminal liability under this clause could likely be established.

Mr. Ferguson: With reference to mineral rights in Alberta, if an oil company or a mining company obtained the right from the province to drill a well—and I believe that is necessary now, because they control the mineral rights—

The Chairman: Order. We are discussing a clause which deals with excavations. We are not discussing mineral rights in Alberta.

Mr. Ferguson: My question is apropos of the explanation given by the minister. You could not have an oil well without having an excavation. These are excavations. Perhaps I should not call them oil wells; I shall call them excavations. If an oil company makes an excavation and a child or an adult falls into it, the owner of the land upon which the excavation was made could be sued for damages. Could not the claimant sue the province of Alberta, jointly with the oil company, because the province has given the right to make the excavation? Would they not be jointly responsible?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, there is a limit to irrelevancy and I think in this question we have passed that limit. It seems to me the question as to whether one can sue Her Majesty in the right of the province of Alberta involves many other questions, among others the question of whether they have a petition of right act in Alberta and whether one could obtain permission to sue the provincial crown under that act. I suggest the hon. member's question has no bearing on the clause we are discussing because, as I said before, while a person may have mineral rights, my understanding is that the owner of the mineral rights has to make an arrangement with the owner of the surface rights, by contract. He must pay for the use of those surface rights, so that he can go on the surface in order to get at his minerals. In the course of doing this it is an elementary precaution for the lawyer drawing up the contract to see that there is included in it a clause stating that these holes are to be properly filled in when derricks or other apparatus are removed from the operation.

Mr. Fulton: I agree with the minister, as far as he goes; but I do not think he has dealt with the point raised by the hon. member for Calgary North. I do not know, actually, whether it can be dealt with, or whether there is a way in which the owner of the surface rights can avoid criminal liability. True, he makes a contract with the oil drilling company or the mining company which calls upon them to fence in the excavation and to put up adequate warning. The criminal liability is not going to arise unless that duty is not performed. It is a question of what happens when, admittedly in breach of contract, they fail to put up a fence and someone falls in and is injured. It looks to me as if the owner of the surface rights is the only person criminally liable. As the hon. member for Calgary North has said, he cannot contract out of that criminal liability. He cannot contract for the company to go to jail in his place; he has got to go to jail. I do not see that there is any way out of it.

There certainly is no way under the present law. The answer might be that the owner of the surface rights has to give greater supervision and see that the mining company does fulfil the contract. Has any consideration been given to the matter? Does the minister know of any case where the owner of land has been prosecuted under those circumstances, where an excavation was made by a mine?

Mr. Garson: No.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 229—Sending or taking unseaworthy ship to sea.

Mr. Trainor: Is there any exception on the basis of size or tonnage, or does the clause apply to any boat or vessel, irrespective of size? Would it apply even to a small motorboat, carrying only one person?

Mr. Garson: There is no limitation, provided the vessel in question comes within the reference in the clause to a Canadian ship.

Mr. Trainor: Supposing the ship is only a motorboat driven by its owner and carrying no passengers. If it is unseaworthy, is he liable to prosecution?

Mr. Garson: I would question very much whether a small boat like that would fall within the term "ship".

Clause agreed to.

On clause 230—"Assault".

Mr. Bell: I should like to feel satisfied that this general clause covers two recent cases about which we have been reading in the newspapers. The first of these occurred in the United States where a southern negro was charged with an assault of some kind when he leered across a field at a white woman, a distance of two or three hundred yards. I do not know the outcome of the charge, but I do know the case received publicity.

Then, secondly, I would refer to the slasher cases in Montreal which, I presume, would come under this assault clause. I am wondering if the minister feels satisfied that in these extreme cases the clause is sufficient.

Mr. Garson: Did the hon. member say the first case was that of a negro who leered?

Mr. Bell: Yes, leered—what we do across the floor of the house sometimes.

Mr. Garson: I think this leering would not be an assault under Canadian law. If on the other hand he aimed a loaded rifle at her, it would be different. However, I should think it would be very difficult to assault someone by leering across a distance of—how far did the hon. member say?

Mr. Bell: It was quite a few yards.

Mr. Garson: I thought the hon. member said 200 yards.

Mr. Bell: It was about that distance.

Mr. Garson: Yes. In that connection would my hon. friend look at subclause (b) of this section, which reads:

> A person commits an assault when, without the consent of another person or with consent, where it is obtained by fraud, (b) he attempts or threatens, by an act or gesture, to apply force to the person of the other, if he has or causes the other to believe upon reasonable grounds that he has present ability to effect his purpose.

I do not think it would be possible by leering at a person across a distance of 200 yards to convince the other person that he had the present ability to assault her. Indeed I do not know whether leering would be an act or gesture which attempted or threatened to apply force. It might be a look of admiration.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Bell: I am wondering about the second point I brought up about the slasher in Montreal; I am wondering whether that would be covered by this clause or perhaps by one of the others.

Mr. Garson: Again, if my hon. friend will look at the clause he will find:

> A person commits an assault when . . .
> (a) he applies force intentionally to the person of the other, directly or indirectly.

The application of a razor to the body is the application of force.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 231 and 232 agreed to.

On clause 233—Kidnapping.

Mr. Enfield: This clause reads:

> Every one who kidnaps a person with intent . . .

I do not see any definition of "kidnap" in the definition section of the act. Should that not be included? There is no formal definition of the word "kidnap" in this clause.

Mr. Garson: In the interpretation sections of statutes like the Criminal Code there are included definitions of terms which it is thought might be misinterpreted if they were not defined for the purpose of the act. However, the term "kidnapping" is of a reasonably precise meaning as taken from the dictionary, and I would not think it would be necessary to define its meaning in the interpretation section. When we mention the word "kidnapping" I do not think that anyone would take it to mean other than that which we all take it to mean.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister then mean that in the case of the sale of those babies there is no room for the application of the criminal law under subclause (b) where it is mentioned:

> To cause him to be unlawfully sent or transported out of Canada against his will.

In the case of an infant you cannot get the act of consent. Does the minister not think there is room for argument that absence of consent would bring the offence within the provisions of subclause (b), particularly if the sale was unlawful by virtue of the terms of a provincial statute? Would there not then be room to argue that in addition to the contravention of the provincial statute a criminal offence is committed?

Mr. Garson: Of course, Mr. Chairman, a great difficulty, an almost insuperable difficulty in discussing the Montreal cases that are being reported in the newspapers is that it is impossible to find out with any precision from the newspaper reports what all of the facts are that are within the knowledge of the prosecutors who are laying the charges.

Mr. Fulton: I agree with you there.

Mr. Garson: The last report that I got on these cases indicated that there were three types of charges that had been laid, and none of them was kidnapping. I should not have thought that where the mother—I am not suggesting that this is a fact in the Montreal cases, because I do not know—of an illegitimate child who herself might be impoverished and did not feel that she could properly provide for it, parted with it voluntarily, that the person to whom she surrendered it would be a kidnapper because there would not be any element of taking the child away from her. She might surrender the child voluntarily, and if so it would seem to me that it might be difficult to establish any charge of kidnapping.

Mr. Fulton: I am confining it exclusively to subclause (b) on the ground that the parent has consented. The parent has apparently received payment for the transaction. Certainly the parent has consented. Therefore I agree that the only room for argument along the lines that I am suggesting is whether it has been considered as coming under subclause (b), which refers to the infant itself, by virtue of the fact that the clause will read:

> Every one who kidnaps a person with intent—
> (b) to cause him to be unlawfully sent or transported out of Canada against his will.

That appears to be pretty close to the cases that are taking place. They are transported out of Canada. It is unlawful in that it contravenes a provincial statute, and since the infant is below the age at which he can give an act of consent, it might be argued that it is against his will. I know it is hypothetical and one hesitates to ask the minister to give an opinion on hypothetical cases. I am asking him simply whether he thinks there is any room for an argument of that sort. I should like the matter to be given a little publicity through the medium of the committee here. I am asking whether he does not think that, under the wording of the new clause 233, the prosecuting officer in cases of this sort might well contemplate laying a criminal charge as well as proceeding under the terms of the provincial statute.

Mr. Garson: My understanding is that three groups of criminal charges have already been laid.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What were those charges?

Mr. Garson: They were perjury, falsification of the register and conspiracy to commit an indictable offence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the indictable offence?

Mr. Garson: There was no indication as to what it was. That is the difficulty. You see, we are discussing here cases, which are sub judice and the full facts of which we do not know. That being so, as I suggested the other day in the statement that I made in the house, it seems to me that if legislation be required, we can decide upon the type of legislation that is required much more intelligently when this matter is no longer sub judice and all the facts become known, and thus we could know accurately the nature of the problem that the proposed legislation would be aimed at.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is a very interesting point. Certainly this clause does not cover the situation, because the essence of this clause, as I see it, is the kidnapping of a person with intent to do certain things, namely, to cause him to be unlawfully sent or transported out of Canada against his will. The essence of this offence is the kidnapping. In the circumstances of the cases now before the courts, which we cannot discuss, the essence of the offence is not kidnapping. However, I should like to ask the minister whether his law officers have given any consideration to the creation of an offence to cover facts similar in nature to those that today are receiving such publicity by reason of actions before the courts at the present time. Certainly the rights over children are clearly within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and yet if this type of thing becomes general it has in it all the elements of crime. I would like to ask the minister whether there is any common law offence at the present time to cover the situation disclosed by the investigation and by the evidence which is known to him to exist in these cases, which are at present before the courts in Montreal. The minister says that the accused are charged with forgery—

Mr. Garson: Falsification.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, falsification and—

The Chairman: I am sure the hon. member would not wish to pursue this line of discussion too far especially in view of the explanation which the minister already gave this afternoon and in view of his statement a few days ago. The hon. member will agree that we are discussing clause 233 and surely we should confine our discussion to strictly relevant matters appertaining to that clause.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, we are attempting to determine what set of facts this clause might be applicable to, and we were in an inquiring state of mind; for after all—

The Chairman: Might I suggest that the hon. member confine his inquiries to the clause before the committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But there had been no reference by you, Mr. Chairman, to the effect that this discussion was out of order, and it was only after I started discussing it and tried to find out the degree to which this clause might be applicable that Your Honour saw fit to raise the point of order. With all due deference, sir, and without in any way wishing to continue the discussion, I would like to ask the minister this. What is the nature of the conspiracy? What is the indictable offence?

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member will surely agree with me that he cannot proceed with a discussion of that kind under clause 233.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, with the greatest deference, there is no other clause under which it can be discussed and—

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I believe I can clear the matter up for my hon. friend to his entire satisfaction. I thought I had made it clear on four or five previous occasions that even if it were proper for us to discuss it when it is sub judice, it is extremely difficult to obtain the facts in the case. Therefore, not having the facts, it is impossible for any lawyer to say whether a certain section of the code applies to facts which he does not know.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, there is just one question I would like to ask the minister. What is the nature of the indictable offence? After all, the crown cannot simply say that a person is guilty, or charge him with conspiracy to commit an indictable offence. Is the indictable offence kidnapping or abduction?

The Chairman: We cannot discuss this matter when it is sub judice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to appeal against your ruling, but—

Mr. Garson: Might I say to my hon. friend that while we have competent lawyers in Montreal watching the progress of this case for us, we have had no information as yet as to the indictable offence which is involved in that conspiracy charge.

Mr. Fulton: I suppose forgery might be.

Mr. Garson: It might be either forgery or falsification of the register.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would falsification of the register be a criminal offence?

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes. Fourteen years is the penalty.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

The Chairman: Shall clause 233 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 234 to 236 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 237—Procuring miscarriage.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question with respect to clause 237. When we were on clause 209 there seemed to be some relationship between it and clause 237. However, in the case of clause 209 it was pointed out that there was protective language covering cases carried out in good faith. That protective language does not seem to appear in clause 237. On the other hand, I believe that section 303 in the present code did contain the word "unlawful". I think the minister will see the point I am getting at.

Mr. Garson: Section 303 of the present code?

Mr. Knowles: Yes. Has the minister found it?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: What I am getting at is that under the code as it now stands there would seem to be protection for a doctor who, for example, might perform an abortion for the sake of saving the life of the mother, but that protection which was there in section 303 of the present code seems to be missing from the language of clause 237. Perhaps the minister can point it out to me if it is there.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend might prefer to use the particular term that it is "missing" but if he will look at the existing code section 306, which is the analogue of clause 209 in Bill No. 7, he will see the saving clause, which is subsection 2 of clause 306, and he will note that we have reproduced in the new bill the substance of the enactments under both these headings in the former code.

Mr. Knowles: That is exactly the point I was getting at when I first rose, Mr. Chairman, namely that the protective wording was there in both 303 and 306 of the former code, but in the code now before us the protective language is in clause 209 but is missing from clause 237. Can the minister assure us that such protection as is required—

Mr. Garson: We are discussing two cases here. One, which is under clause 209 of the bill, is an illegal operation and the other under clause 237 is abortions. So far as the illegal operation is concerned, the existing code and the new bill contain a saving clause. In relation to abortion there is no saving clause, so that—

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister say there was not such a clause in the former code?

Mr. Garson: Has my hon. friend the present code?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Will he look at—

Mr. Knowles: Section 303?

Mr. Garson: Yes, and he will see there is no saving clause in the abortion section—

Mr. Knowles: Does not the word "unlawful" cover that?

Mr. Garson: I do not think so. Clause 237, subsection 1, reads:

> Every one who, with intent to procure the miscarriage of a female person, whether or not she is pregnant, uses any means for the purpose of carrying out his intention . . .

Intent is written into that clause. It is obvious that a person who intends to do that in breach of this section would certainly be liable.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister satisfied that a doctor who performs such an operation for the purpose of saving the life of the mother is covered—

Mr. Garson: Yes, I am sure he would be because there would be no mens rea in a case of that sort, and in all these cases, without it being specifically mentioned in each section, it is necessary for the crown as part of its case to prove a guilty mind upon the part of the accused, whether it is so specified or not. I am sure my hon. friend would agree that it is very desirable that when that guilty mind is present, in the case of a doctor, he should be held to account criminally.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Most reputable doctors are very hesitant about performing an operation of this kind unless they take very careful precautions against falling into difficulties of this sort.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister satisfied that the principle of mens rea covers that?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: Who is to say whether it is justified?

Mr. Garson: Whether it is justified or not is a question of fact for the court to decide.

Mr. Trainor: With regard to clause 237, I should like to ask the minister whether he knows of any drug that may be used as a means of procuring an abortion.

Mr. Garson: I think that is a question I should be asking my hon. friend who is himself learned in the science of medicine rather than that he should be asking me. However, I do not think it is particularly material because the gravamen of the offence under clause 238 is this:

> Every one who unlawfully supplies or procures a drug or other thing knowing that it is intended to be used to procure the miscarriage of a female person, whether or not she is pregnant, is guilty of an indictable offence.

The cases indicate that even where there have been used, for the purpose of accomplishing an abortion, drugs which would not be effective for that purpose, the offence is complete under the section if the person supplies it for the purpose of procuring a miscarriage. One of the purposes of a clause of this kind is to discourage the practice of abortion.

Mr. Trainor: There is a case, I submit, Mr. Chairman, where a drug may be given and where the person concerned may know perfectly well that it will not produce an abortion but the person to whom it is given may not know that and may think that it will do so. As a consequence, the person who gives the drug merely, we will say for example, to satisfy the individual person, might still be guilty of an offence, even though he or she knew that it would not be effective but the person to whom the drug was given might think that it was going to be effective. There are cases in which doctors may do that sort of thing where they are approached and are asked for something that would have the effect of procuring an abortion. In order to satisfy the individual, they may give a perfectly innocuous drug.

Mr. Garson: I would suggest that that would be a very dangerous practice indeed for a doctor to engage in.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 238 and 239 agreed to.

On clause 240—Bigamy.

Mr. Knowles: I notice that subclause 2 of clause 240 reads in part as follows:

> No person commits bigamy by going through a form of marriage if . . .

The marginal note out to the left of subparagraph (d) reads: "Annulment". Can the minister tell me what constitutes a court of competent jurisdiction under the heading of "Annulment"?

Mr. Garson: I am afraid that I could not give my hon. friend a comprehensive statement on that matter. It would be that court in the various provinces of Canada that had jurisdiction in respect of annulment. I could look that point up for my hon. friend but I could not give him the answer offhand.

Mr. Knowles: When the minister refers to a court of competent jurisdiction in any particular province, does he have in mind only a civil court or are there other kinds of courts that are recognized by this language?

Mr. Garson: It is not a case of recognition by this language. We have to interpret this language. But the court which determines these questions is a court established by the provincial authorities under the law in effect in a province.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the minister would deal with his own province and describe the situation there. That would probably answer the question.

Mr. Garson: I can do that very easily. In my own province it would be the court of king's bench which is the trial division of the superior court.

Mr. Knowles: It is the court of queen's bench now.

Mr. Garson: That is quite right. It would be the analogue of that court in the other provinces. In all cases the identity of that court is established by provincial law.

Mr. Knowles: I do not want to get into a question here that is too thorny or too embarrassing to anybody nearby or to anyone farther away either. What about the situation with respect to annulments that take place in provinces where they do not have a civil divorce court? Is the voiding of a marriage by the process of annulment in such provinces recognized by the code as the annulment of a marriage by a court of competent jurisdiction?

Mr. Garson: I cannot see my hon. friend's difficulty in this wording at all. It seems to me to be self-explanatory. It says this:

> No person commits bigamy by going through a form of marriage if . . .

Mr. Knowles: What is such a court?

Mr. Garson: That which is a court of competent jurisdiction is determined by the law in effect in the province concerned. If a civil court or an ecclesiastical court has jurisdiction to make such a declaration, then the only question that arises under this wording is whether it is of competent jurisdiction. The word "competent" covers it. You could not determine it in any other way because if it were not competent then the declaration of nullity would itself be void and the marriage would remain in effect.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister know whether the court in the province of Quebec which corresponds to the court of queen's bench in our province, namely the Quebec superior court, entertains petitions for nullification of marriage?

Mr. Fulton: As distinguished from divorce.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid that I do not.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure the minister sees the difficulty that presents itself to us in connection with this matter. As the minister knows, there is no court—no civil court, at any rate—dealing with divorce in two of the provinces of the country. Yet we are informed that annulments take place in those provinces, after which there are instances of remarriage. So far as the Criminal Code is concerned, does that mean that whatever body it is in either of these provinces that annuls marriages, that body is for all practical purposes a court of competent jurisdiction?

Mr. Garson: No. I do not want my hon. friend to put words into my mouth.

Mr. Knowles: Let the minister choose his own words.

Mr. Garson: I know that he does not intend to do that. Clause 240 (2) (d) means that no person commits bigamy by going through a form of marriage either if the first marriage has been by divorce made a nullity or if the first marriage has been declared void on annulment proceedings.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A marriage could not be made a nullity by divorce.

Mr. Fulton: The marriage bond is dissolved.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is right, the relationship between man and wife is dissolved. The point my hon. friend is making is that in annulment proceedings a marriage is treated as null and void. That is the distinction, but in either case there is no longer a marriage. Therefore, since there is no marriage between the accused and any other person, it is not bigamy when he goes through a second form of marriage. Bigamy is the offence of going through a form of marriage when one is already married. If he is not married when he goes through the form of marriage then obviously he does not commit bigamy.

Mr. Knowles: I shall not pursue the matter, partly because I see that we are not getting anywhere. But I wonder if the minister would be good enough to make a note of this point and have someone in his department advise me, even if the information has to be sent to me in the form of a letter, whether it is federal or provincial law or the Quebec civil code that constitutes what is referred to here as a court of competent authority for declaring void marriages that have taken place in that province.

Mr. Maltais: I might give these details to the hon. member by way of further clarification, and I may have some questions to ask. From my own experience, having only been married nine years, it would appear to me that in the province of Quebec competent jurisdiction would be that of the authorities of the religion to which one belongs. The people of Quebec do not recognize the right of courts in the province of Quebec to declare void a marriage that has been consummated legally. So far as paragraph (d) of subsection 2 is concerned, under the Catholic religion the competent authority would not declare that a marriage was void but could give a declaration to the effect that the marriage had never been consummated. That is the situation. In accordance with our old traditions we do not recognize the authority of any civil court to interfere in marriages. That is why I would say that under this clause the only competent authorities would be the ecclesiastical authorities.

Mr. Knowles: We all know that many churches do not follow the practice of dissolving marriages performed under their aegis. The United Church of Canada, for example, the one to which I belong, does not follow the practice of declaring null and void a marriage performed by a United Church clergyman, and I should like to know where is the recognition in law of the practice to which the hon. member for Charlevoix has just referred. Perhaps that is what I was asking for when I asked the minister if he would have the matter investigated. Maybe it is somewhere in the Quebec civil code.

Mr. Maltais: I still say that under the Catholic faith the authorities do not dissolve a marriage that has been consummated, and only interfere very rarely where there has been some serious mistake or misrepresentation. Our authorities would take the position that the marriage never took place, so there is no cancellation of a marriage that has taken place. When something like that happens, then under their concept our authorities just say that the marriage did not take place. They say that there was no former marriage and therefore there is no dissolution. Once you are married under the Catholic faith you are married forever, and that is why we do not want divorce in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Harkness: Are these courts of competent jurisdiction all courts within Canada or are courts outside of Canada recognized?

Mr. Garson: Any court of competent jurisdiction anywhere would be recognized. But to this I must add a warning. Divorces granted by courts of some jurisdictions which are based upon an obviously false residence of some six or eight weeks are not necessarily recognized as effective under Canadian law. But if a Canadian by a business transfer for example establishes genuine domicile in some other place, a domicile recognized under Canadian law, if he has to go there because of business or family considerations and intends to continue to live there; and having thus established a genuine domicile secures a divorce there, then that divorce will be valid. That divorce court will then be a court of competent jurisdiction, and the divorce granted by it will have the effect intended by this subsection 2(c) of clause 240. But if the accused has gone away and got a divorce upon the basis of residence which is not recognized in Canadian law the divorce would not be valid here.

Mr. Harkness: The minister has been referring to divorce generally in foreign countries, but I take it that subsection 2(d) is concerned with annulments rather than divorces. Perhaps I should have framed my question more definitely. Are any courts outside of Canada, whether ecclesiastical or otherwise, looked upon as courts of competent jurisdiction as far as annulment of marriage is concerned?

Mr. Garson: Yes, as long as they are of competent jurisdiction. In addition, so that my answer will not be misunderstood, the court not only has to be of competent jurisdiction but the proceedings taken in that court and the facts in connection with those proceedings must be such as, by the principles of private international law relating to marriage and divorce, will result in a finding by that court which will be effective in Canada in order to have the divorce recognized here.

Mr. Harkness: I am still not clear. Do I understand that if, for example, the ecclesiastical court of the archbishop of Mexico declares the marriage of two Canadian citizens is null and has never taken place that would be recognized in Canada?

Mr. Garson: I have not the faintest idea. This is a purely hypothetical question. It is quite impossible for anyone to sit here and rattle off opinions with respect to whether a personage or a court in Peru or any other country would be a court of competent jurisdiction. Whether the civil or ecclesiastical court that grants the foreign divorce of a Canadian marriage is a court of competent jurisdiction will depend upon the laws of the other country, upon the question of domicile and other difficult points. It is a matter both of the law of that other country and the law of Canada. For example, if a Canadian man and wife go down to Reno to get a Reno divorce, it will not hold water in Canada because Canadian law does not recognize the type of domicile that is established in Reno, which is mere residence for a period of time without any intention whatever of staying there permanently.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 241 to 246 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 247—Newspaper.

Mr. Fulton: Might I ask the minister, if the other members of the committee concur, if he would be kind enough to allow clauses 247 and 248 to stand? It was indicated to him that members on this side would like to make some extended remarks on defamatory libel.

Mr. Garson: That is satisfactory.

Clauses 247 and 248 stand.

Clauses 249 to 251 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 252—Extortion by libel.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the minister to comment on clause 252 in relation to clause 291. It occurs to me that these two clauses are at least in the same field. As a matter of fact, the marginal note on clause 252 is "extortion by libel", and the marginal note opposite clause 291 is just "extortion". As I read the two separate clauses, it strikes me that the offence set out in clause 252 is every bit as serious an offence as that set out in clause 291. In fact, I can see an argument being made for the position that the offence under clause 252 is more serious than the one under clause 291. Let me read a bit of clause 252.

> Every one commits an offence who, with intent
> (a) to extort money from any person, or
> (b) to induce a person to confer upon or procure for another person an appointment or office of profit or trust, publishes or threatens to publish or offers to abstain from publishing or to prevent the publication of a defamatory libel.
> (2) Every one commits an offence who as the result of the refusal of any person to permit money to be extorted or to confer or procure an appointment or office of profit or trust, publishes or threatens to publish a defamatory libel.

Despite the fact that that strikes me as a rather serious offence, the punishment for it is only five years, whereas the penalty under clause 291 is 14 years. Would the minister comment? There certainly does not appear to me to be that much difference in the seriousness of the two offences, and it strikes me that the offence under 252 might be even more serious than that under 291.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend were going to the code and examining these punishments for the various crimes that are listed there, he would see that those which involve violence or the threat of violence to the person of the victim carry a heavier penalty, on the average, than those which do not involve violence. This is certainly true of the two clauses which my hon. friend is comparing now.

Under the present code and in the first draft of the new one, clause 252 only carried a penalty of two years. It was increased to five years in the House of Commons special committee, and appears as five now by reason of that increase. Now, extortion by violence or threat of violence comes under the heading of robbery, which is theft by violence, and it is the element of violence which attracts the heavier penalty. In the case of this clause the penalty is the penalty that has been in the existing code.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 253 to 275 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 276—Theft by person required to account.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has any change been made in this section or is it entirely a reprqduction of the old section 355? I have not a Criminal Code before me.

Mr. Garson: No change.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 277 to 288 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 289—Punishment for robbery.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister care to comment on this clause? Perhaps I should make the same request with respect to it that I made with respect to the clause having to do with capital punishment. Before doing so, may I ask if I understand the situation correctly? It seems to me that the penalty has been increased from what it was in the former code. It was 14 years before, was it not, and it has now been increased to imprisonment for life and whipping. I am sorry, I was only partly right. It was 14 years and whipping and it has been increased to life imprisonment and whipping. I think it would only be reasonable to make the same request I made with respect to capital punishment, and ask that this clause be allowed to stand, just in case the special committee gets through its work before this committee does.

Mr. Garson: I agree with that. You are speaking about clause 289?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Clause stands.

Clauses 290 to 292 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 293—Being unlawfully in dwelling house.

Mr. Knowles: Once again we have this phrase, "proof of which lies upon him". Can the minister answer that satisfactorily in a brief statement or should we ask that the clause stand?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I think I can.

The man who enters or is in a dwelling house with intent to commit an indictable offence therein is in a dwelling house which is not his own; and it does not seem at all unreasonable to expect him to say why he is there. If he is innocent, that is his obvious defence. Prima facie he has no business being there; but if he has a lawful excuse for being there, that can very easily be established.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Kamloops and I have been trying to look up the old section. There certainly is a difference in the wording. We have not yet been able to make up our minds as to whether there is a difference in meaning. The new wording does include for the first time the idea of putting the onus of proof on the accused.

Mr. Garson: It was on him under the old section.

Mr. Knowles: Now that we are getting at this, let us see what the old section says.

Mr. Garson: It is section 462 (2).

Mr. Knowles: Section 462 reads:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence—

Mr. Garson: No, subsection 2 of the section.

Mr. Fulton: That is the same as subclause 2, but the onus of proof is placed on the accused for the first time here. The onus of proof that he is there with lawful excuse is placed upon the accused for the first time by this wording.

Mr. Knowles: The old section read:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who unlawfully enters, or is in, any dwelling-house by night with intent to commit any indictable offence therein.

The term of imprisonment is now being changed to ten years. And then subsection 2 in the old code:

The unlawful entering or being in any dwelling-house by night shall be prima facie evidence of an intent to commit an indictable offence therein.

The suggested wording in the new clause is this:

293 (1) Every one who without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him, enters or is in a dwelling house with intent to commit an indictable offence therein is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years.

It strikes me that the matter of putting the onus of proof on the accused has been imported into the clause, whereas it really was not there before. In other words, I am suggesting this is more than codification; this is a change.

Mr. Garson: No; I suggest that in a case of this kind, if an accused has been found in a dwelling house, both under the old law and the proposed new law, the unlawful entering or being in the dwelling house is prima facie evidence of intent to commit an offence.

When the fact is established in the hearing that an accused was in the house, that fact under subsection 2 is prima facie evidence of his intent to commit an indictable offence therein.

Then if my hon. friend will compare this new clause 293 with the present section 462, he will see that the accused is given what he did not have under the present section. The new clause says, "Every one who without lawful excuse". If he has a lawful excuse for being there, that will protect him.

Mr. Knowles: The old section contained the words "unlawfully enters".

Mr. Garson: Yes, "unlawfully enters"; but under the new clause he has the defence of a lawful excuse if he can establish it. As in several of these cases, when the onus is shifted to the accused it is so shifted because the evidence by which that excuse is established is peculiarly in the possession of the accused. Nobody else can prove his excuse.

He is in the house unlawfully. By the operation of this subclause 2 he is prima facie there for the purpose of committing an indictable offence. The new clause says that if he has a lawful excuse, that will protect him. But he must establish what that excuse is. How could anyone else establish it? The crown does not know what his excuse is. Is it not reasonable that where he is found in a house in that fashion he should have the opportunity of excusing himself by establishing within the terms of the new clause such lawful excuse, and who but the accused himself could establish it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact there is an authority on that point. It is Rex v. St. Clair, 21 Canadian Criminal Cases, 350, which deals with the establishment of a defence in respect of a lawful excuse. At that time they were dealing with section 228, the old section, of being found in a disorderly house without lawful excuse. The case states that the defence may presumably set up not only the circumstances which would at common law justify his presence in the house, but show that he was rightfully there in pursuance of a duty imposed by municipal or provincial authority—for instance as a sanitary officer inspecting premises, and so on.

While this clause does have the appearance of establishing an onus, if I read it correctly, it is in reality putting into legal phraseology the responsibility which has always rested upon an accused person, that of proving he was there by lawful excuse.

Mr. Garson: That is right. I agree entirely with the statement of the hon. member for Prince Albert. If the crown rested its case by proving he was there, where he should not be, and he did not offer any evidence at all, he would have a hard time to avoid conviction.

Mr. Lusby: I am wondering if, when the redrafting was being done, any consideration was given to the advisability of making it an offence when an accused enters a dwelling house without any reasonable excuse, but when such person does not have the intent to commit an indictable offence. As I understand it, a man could under these circumstances come to my house in the dead of night, push open a closed window and roam around the house, and yet he would not be committing a criminal offence. It seems to me that he should be made guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction. In my view there should be an offence of some kind set up under the Criminal Code to deal with those circumstances.

Mr. Garson: Is that not fairly well covered by the existing law, when clause 293 states that if a man enters another man's house unlawfully, the fact that he is there is prima facie evidence that he entered or was in the dwelling house with intent to commit an indictable offence therein. He can be prosecuted for that. Of course my hon. friend is right when he says that, if he can offer a lawful excuse, he will secure acquittal.

I suppose my hon. friend's complaint is that in such case he should be subject to conviction for some lesser offence. It runs in my mind that there is a section in another portion of the Criminal Code or elsewhere defining the offence of trespass and that the circumstances described by the hon. member would come under that section. However, I cannot put my hand on it at the moment.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 294—Entrance.

Mr. Fulton: I suggest that clause 294 is to some extent new, although it says that it is founded on section 340. Yet I find in Tremeear the statement that under the present law a person is not guilty under section 462, which is the section corresponding to the new clause 293, if only his hand or a portion of his body is in the house. It is specifically provided now that:

> A person enters as soon as any part of his body or any part of an instrument that he uses is within any thing that is being entered . . .

I observe that that is very much the same wording as section 340 of the old code. Yet it appears that, as I say, according to the authority of Tremeear's statement at page 113, at the bottom of the page:

> Accused was found at night climbing up the side of the building, with one arm in through an open window. He was convicted under a statute similar to section 462.

As I point out, section 462 is now clause 293. I continue:

> On appeal, held, the conviction must be quashed. The statute required that accused be found in a building, and this accused was found outside the building trying to get in. While he might have been guilty of other offences, he was not guilty of the offence charged.

The case there is an English case, namely Rex v. Parkin, 1929, 2 All England Reports. As Tremeear points out, it is a statute similar to our section 462. I ask the minister why it was decided that clause 293 should be made applicable to a person who was not wholly in but only partly in the building. Was that a deliberate decision, or did it come about by accident?

Mr. Garson: It was quite deliberate. This new clause 293 corresponds to the present section 340.

Mr. Fulton: No, 462.

Mr. Garson: This new clause 294 corresponds to the present section 340, and subparagraph (b) (ii), to which my hon. friend refers, is in part new, and it is the new part that my hon. friend is querying. It was to overcome the difficulty which arose in the case of Rex v. Miller, 91 Criminal Cases, 270, in which it was held that the raising of a window that was already partly open did not constitute a breaking as that term was defined in the law as it then stood, that the change in wording was made.

Mr. Fulton: In other words, as the minister said, Rex v. Miller held in effect that attempting to get in or being found in the act of getting in but not being actually in was not included in the section and a conviction could not be founded upon those circumstances. I do not see that there should be much objection to that intention if it is clearly proven that the man was attempting to get in. I have no objection. I just wanted to establish that it was being deliberately done to bring that set of circumstances within the ambit of the clause.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 295—Possession of housebreaking instruments.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister comment on this clause as well? I note once again that the phrase "the proof of which lies upon him" is in this clause.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was in the old section, too.

Mr. Knowles: All right; I will accept the correction of the hon. member for Prince Albert that the wording was there before, but as a layman it does seem to me that this phrase is in the code a great many times. We hear it said so often that it is one of the basic principles of British justice or Canadian justice that the accused is innocent until he is proven guilty. I certainly do not like to take a position that might be misinterpreted as condoning any of the offences that we are dealing with in this part of the code, and I am sure no one would so misinterpret my position. But I wonder whether in this case consideration was given to this point. While the minister is commenting will he comment on the fact that in this instance the penalty has been increased to 14 years? When I compare clause 295 with clause 293 it turns out that it is a more serious offence to have in one's possession an instrument for housebreaking than it is actually to enter a place. You may have an instrument, I suppose, and do nothing with it. You may have it in your possession and get 14 years. But if you enter without lawful excuse, under clause 293, the maximum penalty is 10 years. Maybe it is just a case of a layman needing a little instruction. On the face of it it looks odd to me.

Mr. Garson: We might examine my hon. friend's contention by seeing how this would read if we took up the language to which he objects and had it say:

> Every one who has in his possession any instrument for housebreaking.

Mr. Knowles: The minister forgets the words "without lawful excuse".

Mr. Garson: All right; I will take it this way, the way in which I have read it, leaving out "without lawful excuse":

> Every one who has in his possession any instrument for housebreaking, vault-breaking or safe-breaking is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for fourteen years.

That would be very hard upon an honest person who might have those instruments for perfectly honest purposes. Therefore it seems reasonable that we should insert the words "without lawful excuse". Once we insert the words "without lawful excuse" we run into the same old difficulty: how is the crown going to prove the accused's excuse? He is the only one who knows what his excuse is. If he has a good excuse, if he is an honest man, all he needs to do is to state his position and he is clear. If he is not an honest man, if he is unlawfully in possession of housebreaking instruments then he should be prosecuted.

Now, with regard to those penalties to which my hon. friend refers, I can only say that the question was considered at great length in the Commons committee and we there came up with the view that the penalty should remain as it is. It, too, is a maximum penalty, and the question which arises is whether the facts of such a case as could arise under this section would be sufficiently serious to warrant the imposition of a penalty of that magnitude.

Mr. Knowles: If I may deal with the latter point first, I should like to point out that under the old code, for what is now under clause 293 the penalty was seven years, and the penalty for what is now under clause 295 was five years. The relationship has been reversed. The first one is now raised to 10 years and the second one to 14 years.

Mr. Garson: With great respect, Mr. Chairman, I think the linking by my hon. friend of the penalty under clause 295, which has to do with the possession of housebreaking tools, with the penalty under clause 293, which has to do with being unlawfully in a dwelling house, is not a proper one. The comparison should be between the penalties under clause 295, I suggest, and those for breaking and entering under clause 292 because there is a distinction drawn between the case of a person who is unlawfully in a dwelling and a man who uses housebreaking tools to break his way in. That distinction goes through the whole piece; and the possession of housebreaking tools was considered to bring the accused into the category of a burglar and the penalty therefore, as in clause 292, is 14 years.

Mr. Knowles: One other point occurs to me. I find I was a bit hasty in accepting the correction of the hon. member for Prince Albert a moment ago. Now I am relying on the advice of another of my legal friends, the hon. member for Kamloops. Apparently in this instance it is a good idea to have two lawyers on your side.

An hon. Member: What about yourself?

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact the only time I had occasion to take a case to court I had one lawyer and my opponent had two and I won the case. However, in this instance I am relying on the judgment of two lawyers. It is pointed out to me that under section 464 the requirement that the proof should lie upon the accused applied only in the case of possession of housebreaking instruments by night. Now there is the necessity of the accused proving that he had a lawful excuse, and that necessity applies to both day and night.

Mr. Garson: The provision of a lawful excuse in the terms of the clause itself is an advantage to him, and he is the only one who can establish it. The clause imposes no disability upon the accused in saying that he is not guilty if he has a lawful excuse. The accused is better off for the inclusion of the words "without lawful excuse", and once they are included the accused is the only man in a position to provide the evidence of his lawful excuse.

Mr. Fulton: In that respect I do not know that a great deal hinges upon it, but I believe we should be clear in our thinking. Under the present code, section 464, the having of tools in a person's possession by night was an offence unless he had a lawful excuse, the onus of proving which was placed upon him. If he had them in his possession by day it was not an offence regardless of whether he had a lawful excuse. Even if he had them in his possession by day the crown had to prove that he intended to commit an offence with them, and the onus on the crown was very great. If the crown could prove that he had them with intent to commit an offence, then that completely negatived the possibility of any lawful excuse. Therefore the onus on the crown in the case of a charge of being in possession of housebreaking instruments by day was a very heavy one, and in connection with the possession of housebreaking instruments by night it was not quite so heavy. It is true, though, that the onus of proving the lawful excuse was on the accused, and that seems reasonable.

In other words there was a difference in the degree of onus and degree of automatic liability, if you like, attaching to the possession of housebreaking instruments by night, as against the possession of these instruments by day, and that difference has been eliminated in the new clause. I wonder if the minister could tell us by what process of reasoning the conclusion to eliminate that difference was arrived at, because it seems to me the clause as it now stands will go hard with the genuine artisan who always carries his tools by day, who might well be faced with the prospect of answering a charge of being in possession of housebreaking instruments.

I believe that is why in the case of possession by day, under the present section, the crown was under that very heavy onus of having to prove intent to commit an unlawful act. People will be walking about with tools or instruments that might be used for housebreaking but which in fact are in their possession for perfectly lawful purposes, yet the onus on the crown to prove the element of intent is less under the new clause. Can the minister say why it was decided to eliminate that difference between possession by night and possession by day?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, as I recall the discussions in the House of Commons committee it was considered desirable that it should be equally unlawful whether by night or by day. Then by providing that the accused was guilty only in those cases where he had no lawful excuse, in view of the fact that asking him to provide the evidence to prove this excuse was not an unreasonable provision, the committee thought that this would be a better clause than the old one.

Mr. Fulton: I understand it was discussed at length in the special committee. I wish a transcript had been kept of the evidence presented at that committee as well as a record of the minutes of their proceedings. I am not very happy about this because the carpenter, the plumber, the road foreman, and the mining foreman are now all in the possession of instruments by day which could certainly be used as housebreaking instruments, yet the legality of their possession is made shakier than it was under the old section. I am not very happy about it, but since it was discussed at length by my colleagues in the committee last year and they were satisfied I shall not press the matter any further.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 296 to 302 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 303—"False pretence".

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering whether subsection 2 of this clause would grant some measure of protection to purchasers of goods, particularly those who sign contracts to purchase goods where the advertisement or approach by salesmen would constitute gross exaggeration. There have been several cases brought to my attention where salesmen have managed by one sales gimmick or another to persuade persons to purchase goods and sign contracts and it was only after they had signed a contract that they realized just what they had become involved in.

I would like to know whether this clause as it is at present constituted would give some measure of protection in cases of that kind. I am well aware of the old maxim "let the buyer beware" and that the purchaser of goods has to exercise a certain amount of judgment, but I do feel there are instances where sales techniques are being used which are not morally sound, and I believe some provision should be made to take care of cases of that kind.

I think perhaps I have made my point clear, and I hope it will be understood that I am referring to sales that are made by means of such methods. I recall being approached by a salesman at one time, and according to him the goods were free. They were going to give me a gift of goods; then of course the next step was to involve me in an agreement to receive perhaps a gift or a particular item. One step would lead to another and eventually the customer would be tied by a contract. I believe there are many instances of that and certainly a number of them have been brought to my attention recently. Does this clause provide a measure of protection against what I consider to be offences of that kind?

Mr. Garson: I presume that what my hon. friend means when he uses the word "protection" is the protection that should be provided by the criminal law.

Mr. Ellis: That is right.

Mr. Garson: I think clause 303 does provide such protection. What I suggest to my hon. friend is that he look at clause 303, subclause 2. It reads:

> Exaggerated commendation or depreciation of the quality of anything is not a false pretence unless it is carried to such an extent that it amounts to a fraudulent misrepresentation of fact.

Concerning this my hon. friend says to me very properly, "What is a fraudulent misrepresentation of fact?" The next subclause gives the answer to that question. It reads:

> For the purposes of subsection (2) it is a question of fact whether commendation or depreciation amounts to a fraudulent misrepresentation of fact.

Therefore it is a question of fact that has to be decided on the facts of a given case as to whether the false pretence charged amounts to a fraudulent misrepresentation of fact. If my hon. friend feels that, in selling him a bill of goods, a salesman has carried this exaggerated commendation to the point where it is fraudulent misrepresentation, then he goes to the crown prosecutor and says, "This salesman has defrauded me by making the following fraudulent misrepresentations to me". The crown prosecutor listens to my hon. friend's story and, if he thinks there is a reasonable case there, he lays an information under this clause. The case then comes before the court for trial. Whether the statements that were made by the accused salesman to my hon. friend constituted a fraudulent misrepresentation is the question of fact which the court has to decide upon the facts of the case. If the court decides that question of fact in my hon. friend's favour it will bring in a verdict of guilty.

Mr. Hahn: In that connection I would say there are thousands of fraudulent misrepresentations of facts over the radio every day of the week in this country in connection with soap advertising. The only reason no action is taken is that so little money is involved per person. I believe that possibly greater care should be taken to see that, with respect to the exchange of goods for small amounts of cash, the householder is more fully protected. It may be only a matter of 30 or 35 cents to the housewife; but if she buys a package of one kind of soap, the next thing she knows she hears that it is the worst soap on earth because it does not get clothes as white as some other product. Is there in the act a section to protect one from such fraudulent practices?

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend look at clause 306? Perhaps I had better put it on the record.

Mr. Knowles: It is a long one.

Mr. Garson: It reads in part as follows:

> Every one who publishes or causes to be published an advertisement containing a statement that purports to be a statement of fact but that is untrue, deceptive or misleading or is intentionally so worded or arranged that it is deceptive or misleading, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years, if the advertisement is published

(a) to promote, directly or indirectly, the sale or disposal of property or any interest therein, or
(b) to promote a business or commercial interest.

Then in other parts of that same section it goes on to prohibit other types of false advertising.

Mr. Hahn: A charge has to be laid by the individual concerned, does it not?

Mr. Fulton: An information has to be preferred.

Mr. Garson: An information would have to be laid; yes.

Mr. Hahn: My point is this. We have thousands and thousands of these cases, let us say, of boxes of soap being sold; but no one individual is going to take the time off to go through court procedure in order to prove that one make of soap is not as good as another.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fulton: May I please have the consent of the committee to revert to section 253 for the following purpose—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Is clause 303 carried?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Fulton: It will be recalled that when we reached sections 247 and 248 I asked for and obtained agreement that they should stand. My colleague gave me a note indicating the sections in question. I was going to blame him and say his handwriting was bad, but I will assume the responsibility myself. I misread his writing. He asked that several clauses should stand. I read his figures as "353" whereas in fact he requested that clause 253 should stand. May we revert to clause 253 for the purpose of having it stand? It deals with the same general subject as do clauses 247 and 248.

The Deputy Chairman: I am of the opinion that, having passed clause 253, we can revert to it only by unanimous consent. Is the committee agreeable that clause 253 shall be treated as having been marked "stand"?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Then clause 253 will stand.

Clauses 304 and 305 agreed to.

On clause 306—Publication of false advertisements.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am asking this question for information. A moment ago mention was made of radio advertising. Has there been any case in the country to the effect that radio advertising constitutes publication?

Mr. Garson: Within the meaning of this clause?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Offhand, I think not. I shall be glad to check up on that matter and see whether there has been or not. If certainly has not come to my notice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister consider that, within the definition of publication, putting information over the radio would indeed be publication?

Mr. Garson: I would think it would be.

Mr. Fulton: What was the minister's answer? I am sorry, but I did not hear it.

Mr. Garson: I would think it would be.

Mr. Hansell: I do not know whether the minister's thoughts on the matter settle the point. We are now revising the Criminal Code for the first time in many years. Here is a new form of advertising that is becoming quite prominent. It may even be displacing some other forms of advertising. I think the meaning of the term "publish" should apply to radio advertising as well as to anything else. The minister says, "I think it would", but the minister thinking so does not make it so. I believe a word or two here in the form of an amendment might make it all-embracing.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend's point is very well taken indeed; my thinking so does not make it so. But I believe we can agree that if that particular point has not yet come before the courts, all that one can do is to express one's own opinion. I am afraid I did not use the word "think" in an exact sense. We will check to see whether there have been any cases decided under this section, and then raise the matter again in committee.

Mr. Fulton: The English case in connection with a libel decided that the broadcast by means of radio constituted publication in order to make it libel as distinguished from slander. That would certainly be fairly powerful argument in this connection under clause 306, would it not, that the broadcasting by means of radio of advertising in the same way constitutes publication?

Mr. Garson: That is another reason I thought so.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 307 agreed to.

On clause 308—Pretending to practise witchcraft, etc.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister tell us whether in this day and age we still need laws against witchcraft?

Mr. Dechene: That refers to the C.C.F.

Mr. Knowles: In the light of the jocular interjection of the hon. member for Athabaska I am glad to note that burning at the stake is not the penalty.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It might be some day.

Mr. Knowles: As I say, the heading "witchcraft" is rather intriguing for a Criminal Code in 1954. I wonder what the word includes. Does even teacup reading come under the ban of the Criminal Code? I was starting to read Tremeear on the point but we moved a little too fast and I did not get to it in time. Perhaps the minister can tell me.

Mr. Garson: I think the significance of this clause turns on the adverb "fraudulently". It is every one who fraudulently pretends to exercise or to use any kind of witchcraft and so on, who fraudulently undertakes, for a consideration, to tell fortunes, who fraudulently pretends from his skill in or knowledge of the occult, and so on. It is not witchcraft in the old sense. It is using these ideas to commit fraud upon naïve people or people who can be imposed upon. That is the gravamen of the offence. If it is not done fraudulently there is no offence under the section.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Bona fide witchcraft is all right, is it?

Mr. Garson: If it is not done fraudulently it does not come under this section. I do not know whether I would say it is all right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Under this section is an offence created in the case of anyone who purports by occult science to have spiritualistic communication with the dead?

Mr. Garson: I can only repeat that if any of these practices are done for a fraudulent purpose there would be an offence. If it is not done for a fraudulent purpose there would not be an offence. Therefore it is not a case of witchcraft or no witchcraft; it is a case of fraud or no fraud.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If it were for the welfare of the state it would not be an offence.

Mr. Ellis: I cannot understand the use of the term "fraudulently" with respect to the exercise of witchcraft. We find at fairs, and I am quite sure in many of our cities, palm-reading establishments.

Mr. McCann: That is amusement.

Mr. Ellis: These people pretend to be able to foretell the future. Am I to understand that the reason they are allowed to do so is that they are doing it for amusement? Is that the escape provision by reason of which they are not dealt with under this section?

Mr. Garson: No. My hon. friend should interpret against me only the language which I myself used. I never said anything about amusement. What I was discussing was fraud. I say that none of these practices constitute an offence unless they are done for a fraudulent purpose. To continue the practice I have been following, let me take the facts of a case that has been decided in order to illustrate my point. It is the case of Rex v. Duncan et al., 1944 K.B., 713. This case was decided in Great Britain in 1944, not very long ago. In Great Britain they have an excellent administration of justice, great respect for individual freedom, and in general a pretty level-headed view of these matters. Their act in question was the witchcraft act of 1735 and the relevant words in this act were these:

> Pretends to exercise or to use any kind of witchcraft, sorcery, enchantment or conjuration.

As to these words the court said:

> What was aimed at, as shown by the language of the statute itself, was that ignorant persons—

I merely used the word "naïve".

> —should not be deluded or defrauded by the pretence to exercise or use any kind of conjuration. The word "conjuration" means traffic with spirits and the words "any kind of" show clearly that the conjuration is not limited to the holding of conversations with evil or wicked spirits.

Suppose, for example, some ignorant person got in the hands of a fraudulent person who pretended to have these occult powers; and that over a period of time the ignorant person paid $1,000 for the fraudulent professional services of this crafty person. I think such a case would come under this section. I do not know why such acts should not be penalized, and I think this section is quite a good one to have in the code.

Mr. Ellis: In my opinion that still does not answer the main point. Clause 308 reads:

> Every one who fraudulently
> (a) pretends to exercise or to use any kind of witchcraft, sorcery, enchantment or conjuration . . .

Take the case of a palm reader who charges a dollar to read a palm. What is the purpose behind the payment of the dollar on the part of the customer, and what is the intent of the palm reader? I mentioned amusement a moment ago because I know many people will go into a cafe, have a cup of tea and have their teacup read. I do not think people generally look upon that as being very serious. It is a matter of entertainment. But I am referring now to persons who read palms for a living and charge a sum of money for doing so. If it is not amusement, if it is not for purposes of entertainment, then these people are claiming to possess certain supernatural powers. Is it not a form of fraud to claim such powers?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

ASSOCIATED CANADIAN TRAVELLERS

The house in committee on Bill No. 170, respecting the Associated Canadian Travellers—Mr. Hanna—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Qualification for membership.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not the bill before me at the moment, but I think a word might be said concerning this bill in general. I feel that it represents a really worth-while change in the laws of this association as they have existed heretofore. All of us have a high respect for the Associated Canadian Travellers, who make a tremendous contribution to every part of our country.

Up until the present time, under the laws of incorporation under which this organization operates, provision was made whereby any white male person over the full age of 18 years might, subject to the terms of the duly enacted bylaws of the association, become a member of the association. I think this organization deserves high praise for removing what was indeed a discrimination based upon colour. Though the purpose of having the legislation in its original form may not at the time have been considered very serious, in the world of today, with the challenge of communism on every hand, nothing is of greater importance in the preservation of democracy than the removal and extirpation of everything that in any way indicates racial discrimination.

The removal of this qualification for becoming a member of this organization, that he be of the white race, is a step forward and deserves commendation and appreciation. Since five out of six persons within this commonwealth belong to the coloured races, anything in the nature of racial discrimination has a mobilizing influence for communism, and is one of those bloodless weapons that communism uses. I think this association, the Associated Canadian Travellers, in asking parliament to grant it the power to have in its membership people of all colours rather than restricting membership to the white race, has given a lead to a course of action that should characterize all of us in every democracy in the world today.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure, Mr. Chairman, we all agree with the words of commendation expressed by the hon. member for Prince Albert with respect to the way in which this bill removes an element of discrimination. We are all happy to approve a bill with such a purpose. May I ask the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, who I believe is the sponsor of this bill, why the bill does not go a step farther and remove discrimination against women? We in this house are glad to welcome any persons—men or women—as members, provided they are elected by their respective constituencies. Formerly, this legislation contained the words, "any white male person", and that is now being revised to read "any male person." Why not remove the other element of discrimination as well?

Mr. Hanna: First of all, if I may, I should like to say that I agree wholeheartedly with the remarks made on clause 1 by the hon. member for Prince Albert. In reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I would say that the amendment is worded according to the request of the Associated Canadian Travellers. I am sorry that I have not had the opportunity of discussing with them whether or not they would object to including women in their membership. I cannot give you their views on that. This is the wording the association requested.

ALFRED RUBENS

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 298 (Letter E-10 of the Senate), intituled: An act for the relief of Alfred Rubens.—Mr. Hunter.

Mr. Adamson: Is the other bill not going to be dealt with now? I merely wanted to speak in support of it, and I notice the sponsor is not here.

Mr. Harris: There is no intention of allowing Bill No. 296 to stand, unless there was an arrangement to do so of which I was not aware.

Mr. Adamson: I merely wanted to support it. I know the principals in the matter, and I merely thought it might go through. I wanted to say a few words in support of it.

Mr. Harris: I would ask you to call order No. 27, Mr. Speaker.

BRAZILIAN TELEPHONE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 296, respecting Brazilian Telephone Company—Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Head office may be transferred.

Mr. Adamson: I merely wanted to make a few brief remarks on this bill. I do so because this company is a clear example of the beneficial results of Canadian capital at work in another country. At the inception of the Brazilian Traction Company and its subsidiary, the Brazilian Telephone Company, they were and still are pioneers in the development of great national public utilities. The success of this company has been due to the intelligent operations of its officers, both Canadian and Brazilian, and its growth has been so phenomenal that in order to obtain the necessary capital to expand, as many other telephone companies in the world find it necessary to do, the head office is being moved to Brazil and the company is having Brazilian incorporation.

An excellent speech was made on February 10 in the other place concerning this matter, and with it I entirely concur. I should like to read the explanatory note of the bill, which says:

> This bill is desired so that the people of Brazil may be given an opportunity to invest in the company in order that capital may be raised in the public market and from other sources in Brazil to enable the company to carry out the expansion of its facilities which is essential to its continued successful development, while at the same time preserving the corporate existence of the company, its liabilities, its rights and obligations under the contracts and concessions through which it operates as well as the good will of its business acquired over the course of many years of operation in Brazil.

I do not think one could find an equally good example of good will between Canada and another country, good will developed through an investment which was risk capital at the time, as is found in this bill. The operations are now being moved in their entirety to the United States of Brazil, a great and friendly nation with which Canada has such intimate associations.

It is for these reasons, Mr. Chairman, that I have said these few words this afternoon in support of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Harris: Under the circumstances it might be desirable to allow this stage to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 152, REVISED STATUTES OF 1952—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No.

4, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Mrs. Ann Shipley (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was hoping that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) was going to continue his remarks. As will be recalled, he spoke until six o'clock the last time the bill was before the house. I listened very carefully to every word he said, because I was anxious to know whether he was for or against the measure. I could not tell, from what was said. However, as apparently the hon. member is not going to speak on this occasion, I have a few words I should like to say in connection with the voluntary revocable check-off.

According to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) it might appear that this is a very simple matter, so simple that there could not possibly be any objection to it. It was so outlined as to leave the impression that any workman, at his will, could simply walk into an employer's office and sign a card to the effect that he wanted union dues deducted from his pay cheque; and if he wanted to discontinue this process then, supposedly, it was just as simple to walk in and lift the card.

I think it is well known to most hon. members that it is not as simple as that. In many cases—I do not say in all cases—it is neither voluntary nor revocable. As reported at page 2372 of Hansard the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said:

> I could give the house a lot of instances in this country where this question has caused a great deal of upset and economic upheaval, loss of wages and all the rest of it.

The hon. member implied, I assume, that if the voluntary revocable check-off were conceded to all union members there would be no strikes. Well, actual experience where it has been made compulsory does not bear out the hon. member's contention, by any means.

I do not want to be misunderstood. I want to make it specifically clear that I am neither against unions nor against the check-off, but I am very strongly against making it compulsory. There are many responsible unions in this country, a great many of which have gained this concession from their employers. No doubt in all cases they have earned it by their responsible behaviour. But there are unions, or branches or locals of unions, that have not shown responsible behaviour; and it is these to which I do not feel any employer should be forced to give this concession. Where the check-off has been in effect, there have been many instances of a great deal of pressure and actual intimidation to have the men working in that plant come in and sign the cards. It is not voluntary.

When one reads in the newspapers the vilification hurled by certain union leaders at the chairmen of boards of conciliation when the particular findings of boards have not met with their approval, or in other words when they have not received all they wanted, one begins to wonder. I was particularly shocked one day recently to pick up a newspaper and read the very harsh words that were hurled at the premier of this province. Well, when things such as these take place it should be very easy for all of us who have not run across this great pressure and intimidation to believe what type of pressure would be applied to an inarticulate employee.

We hear much of the rights and the security of the unions. That is fine; I am all for it. But what of the rights and the security of the individual Canadian worker who does not wish either to join the union or to have his pay reduced by the check-off? Many people fought for many years to obtain the privileges that we have in this democracy, and if we are not careful we are going to lose a great many of them by such compulsory legislation as is here proposed.

When I say that certain unions do not show responsibility and therefore should not be given this concession, that their employers should not be forced to give it to them, I do not just mean responsibility to the company; I mean responsibility to the community, responsibility to their own members, and above all a respect for law and order. That is most important. Any compulsion is a departure from democratic processes, and compulsion of one kind begets more compulsion. It is only reasonable to suppose that if employers, against their will, are forced to concede any kind of check-off to unions, they in turn will ask for certain compulsory measures.

In other words, where is compulsion going to end? What will be the next thing that will be asked by the unions, or by industry, or by the employer? It is perfectly true that if this measure were passed by this house it would affect only those employees who come directly under our jurisdiction, but I think it is a little broader than that. There is no question in my mind but that if we pass such a measure, the fact we had done so would be used as additional pressure on those provinces that do not at this time, perhaps not at any time, wish to pass such a measure.

It is said that the unions should have this measure passed because they have done a great deal of good for labour in this country. No one denies that they have, but on the other hand I do not think that is a very good argument as to why we should pass such a measure as this. After all, churches are probably the strongest and have done the most good of all organizations in this country, but they rely for the collecting of the necessary funds on the good will of their members. Let us take the Canadian Legion, for example. It is well known that the Canadian Legion has done immeasurable good for all veterans, but they do not suggest for one moment that everybody should belong to the Canadian Legion and be forced to pay them dues, or that dues should be forcibly collected. I do not think the argument that the unions have done good justifies a measure such as this.

There is no check-off in Britain; they do not have it there. We can perhaps learn something from the experience in the United States. In some states the check-off has now been outlawed, and they have passed legislation giving a man the right to work. Fancy having to pass legislation to give a man the right to work in a democracy. Let me repeat that I have no objections to unions or to the check-off if the unions earn it, as no doubt they have, by their responsible behaviour. It is only fair to say that in certain locals union leaders change from time to time. The responsible conduct of that local may change for the better; it may change for the worse. Surely an employer should have the right to make this concession or take it away if the circumstances warrant it.

It is my opinion that Canadian unions will grow in strength and responsibility in direct relationship to the number of workers who take an active part in the administration of their particular union; and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that to make the check-off compulsory would only place more money in the hands of some union leaders who are not now demonstrating a proper degree of responsibility. If the members are blessed with serious types of leadership there should be no difficulty in the collection of dues.

It seems to me to be the height of folly to reward those unions who have shown contempt for law and order with any form of check-off, as would happen if this bill were passed.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of repetition I rise again to support this bill introduced annually by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I regret that during the previous debates on this matter I have not been able to convince sufficient of my colleagues of the justification for such a measure. However, like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I shall persist until I either leave the chamber in defeat or finally convince the government that it is a matter worthy of consideration.

It is regrettable that this matter comes before the house in the shadow of what might be considered a valiant struggle on the part of the unions to win union security measures and improved economic conditions here in Ontario. We have perhaps reached a point where we shall not argue the question dispassionately, as it were.

The hon. member who has just taken her seat, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) has brought up some questions which I feel should be answered. Perhaps no one in opposition has said anything which merits a great deal of criticism. Like other hon. members I listened very carefully to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). I read it over again quite thoroughly today. I cannot say I am too sure just what the position of the Conservative party is as expressed by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Drew: You cannot read if you do not know.

Mr. Byrne: It appears that they believe this matter should be referred to a committee or a royal commission. However, I believe there has been sufficient discussion of this question. It was before the industrial relations committee on several occasions, and their report has almost always been favourable. The hon. member for Timiskaming has indicated that in her view this is a matter of compulsion, and is not a voluntary revocable check-off. But in my view it is not a matter of compulsion directed against the person who is being asked to make contributions to a union. It is the employer who is required to make certain notations on a card, which may be run through a tabulating machine, and to make the necessary deductions from the pay cheques. The economic consequence to the employer is practically nil.

If this became law, in the same way as it already has been made law in several of the provinces of Canada, the employer would then be required to make these deductions and remit them to the responsible officers of the unions concerned. Almost every if not every employer makes deductions from the pay of employees for specific purposes. I might even go so far as to say that if the Legion at its different branches decided that its membership wished to have their dues paid in that manner there would be, I imagine, no objection on the part of employers to making the necessary notation and remitting the money so collected. While the Legion is doing an inestimable amount of work on behalf of the legionnaire, it is not an economic entity in our financial system and as such would not expect to enjoy the same perquisites as an organization whose dealings with employees have a direct relationship to the latter's bread and butter. I do not say they are not entitled to these perquisites, but I certainly do not imagine they would seek concessions along these lines.

It is noteworthy but perhaps regrettable that certain newspapers carried banner headlines during recent strikes. The purpose of these headlines was undoubtedly to appeal to the general public, for their object is to sell papers and thereby make money. It is therefore not unusual for them to carry the more sordid side of wage negotiations in headline form, though we cannot draw too many conclusions from that aspect of the reporting of wage disputes between unions and employers.

I do not believe it is the responsibility of the employer to decide whether a union is a responsible body. It is the responsibility of the union membership to decide whether the union is doing a job for them or against them. When they are doing a job which is adequate in the eyes of the union representatives, then in view of the fact that there are two sides to an issue between two economic groups, that is the employees and the employers, it is hard for me to visualize the employers approving of their activities. When an employer is told that his profits were just a little too high compared with the general level of the past year, and when those who are bargaining for a more adequate share of those profits successfully negotiate an agreement, it is hard for me to imagine an employer praising the union as efficient and responsible, particularly if he thought there was a less efficient union which would let him off with a better deal.

After a prolonged economic eruption, or even after the limited economic disturbance such as faces us now, the general public is always inclined to believe that the unions are not doing a good job, and that something should be done to limit their strength. But I do not believe we should allow one unusual incident in the scheme of things to sway our minds too strongly.

Let us look at the over-all picture in Canada today and realize that we have almost a million workkers belonging to trade unions. Many of them are under closed shop agreements; some are under union shop agreements. These unions have the very highest scale of union security measures. We have very responsible unions which are making a great contribution to the economy of the country and to the welfare of the individuals under their jurisdiction. It may be said that it is because of their secure position that they are not having a great upheaval.

To give the unions the very minimum of social security, which is embodied in a simple voluntary revocable check-off slip which the employer must honour when presented, is not going very far in the way of compulsion. The labour code itself has in it some measure of compulsion. The word "shall" is used on many occasions; it sets up various steps that the union and management must take in coming to an agreement and finally, when arbitration is being resorted to, it provides that one side or the other shall accept the decision.

While this measure leaves much to be desired in the way of union security, it gives the union a measure of recognition by the employer and thereby establishes a base on which may be built better labour relations. This measure, if adopted, does not affect the provinces. Labour legislation is normally part of their responsibility in so far as it affects industry within their boundaries. This legislation will affect only those industries which come within the scope of the federal labour code, and perhaps there are not too many such who do not have some type of union security. If this measure did succeed in showing the way to some of the provinces and to some of the employers, if it succeeded in avoiding even one disastrous strike, I feel that it would have accomplished a very good purpose.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word or two on this bill before six o'clock. It is not my intention to endeavour to talk the thing out at all, but I think I should say one or two things with regard to it.

First of all I should like to make our stand clear. We support the voluntary revocable check-off, and we always have done so. We believe that it is in the interests of labour generally to have this type of legislation. I think it was the province of Alberta that took the lead in this field. They have introduced similar legislation. It is therefore not something that is new to us. I recall vividly the benefits that resulted from that legislation with regard to the teaching profession. Some people object to having dues paid to the union by the members. But it was our experience that our teachers' organization in that province could not function efficiently unless they had some source of continuing revenue. It was difficult at first for us to keep our organization intact because very few paid into that organization continuously.

Mr. Byrne: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. Byrne: Can the hon. member tell me in what year Alberta introduced that measure?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I cannot remember the exact date when it was introduced, but I would think the legislation has been in effect for about five or six years.

Mr. Byrne: For teachers?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. Byrne: In British Columbia we have had it for everybody since 1946.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It could have been even longer than five or six years. I cannot just say what the date was. But if the hon. member's province has had it, I would think he should be doing everything possible to facilitate this legislation in this house so it will be incorporated in the labour code.

Mr. Knowles: He is.

Mr. MacDougall: He just finished.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) spoke for the bill.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I shall come to one of his suggestions in a moment. Maybe I should deal with it right now, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Kootenay East says he is in agreement with the measure. Then why, in the same breath, does he recommend that it be sent to another committee of this house, or why does he prefer to have it sent to a royal commission? He knows what the result will be. He knows that if it is sent to a royal commission it may take a few years before it ever comes back here. If it goes to a committee of this house—

Mr. Byrne: I rise on a question of privilege. If the hon. member is saying that I recommended that it go to a royal commission, may I say that he has misinterpreted my words entirely. I was referring to the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew).

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I will have to accept the hon. member's statement; I assume that it is correct. I am sure it is. I was not in the house all the time he was speaking because I was attending a committee. However, I think the hon. member did tell us that it should go to a committee of the house, did he not?

Mr. Byrne: No.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Then the hon. member is entitled to more credit than I was giving him.

Mr. Knowles: Give him full marks on this occasion.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes; I will give him full marks on this occasion. I hope he will give us every assistance.

I was speaking about our organization in Alberta and the benefits which were derived from it. We found this in our organization, and the same thing applies to every union. A great many people who fail to contribute regularly to the union derive the benefits which the union gets for them. As a result of experience in our province we found that some of the teachers would not enter the union until they got into difficulties. Then they would pay their dues for perhaps a year or two until their particular difficulties were settled, whereupon they would cease to pay from then on until they got into trouble again. Obviously a union cannot function in that way.

When the hon. member for Timiskaming was speaking she had something to say about the rights of union members. She did not think that the check-off should be compulsory. I agree with her entirely, but this is not a compulsory measure. It has nothing to do with compulsion. If it did have any compulsion about it I too would be against it. But this is a voluntary thing. The member of the union merely gives a written statement to his employer authorizing the deduction of the dues from his pay. If he decides at any time to withdraw that authorization all he has to do is write a little note and say that he no longer desires to pay dues to the union. That is the end of it. I do not think there can be any objection from that point of view.

We in the house remember only too well the opposition to a measure of this type that has been put forward in the past. I was a member of the committee of 1948 which reviewed this question. The committee was in favour of the check-off, but when the bill was brought back to the house—this was during the time the late Humphrey Mitchell was minister of labour—an amendment was moved withdrawing the check-off provision. Of course it carried, and the result was to kill the effect of the whole bill.

The question of the check-off was again sent to a committee in 1953, and again the committee recommended the principle of the bill. It seems to me that is sufficient evidence to indicate that members of the house generally are in favour of the principle. I know the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) suggested that some changes will be made when the amendments to the labour code he has in mind are brought forward, but I do not think he has informed the house yet whether or not this will be one of the changes. Nevertheless the matter is before the house now, and I think this is a good time for the house to express its opinion so the Minister of Labour will have a little bit more backing for the inclusion of such a provision in his proposed amendments.

I want to make it very plain that one thing which I do object to is trade unions taking part in politics. The larger part of my riding, before redistribution, was industrial. Drumheller and east Calgary are highly industrial areas. We have unions there composed of members with all sorts of political beliefs. There are C.C.F., Social Credit, Liberal, Conservative and even communist supporters. They contribute to the unions. I do not think a union should use its funds to sponsor any political party in an election, or for other political purposes.

Mr. Knowles: Would you let the manufacturers do so?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): No, I do not think that as an organization they should do it either, but two wrongs do not make a right. In our province it causes a good deal of hard feeling.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Do you want a debate on whether or not unions should take part in politics? Is that subject relevant to this bill?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes, it is very relevant. It is relevant to the extent that when unions use their money to assist political movements such action has a very disturbing effect on their membership. Union funds are made up of contributions by all members, or perhaps I should say that the unions hope all members will contribute, and the bill before us will assist unions to obtain a greater amount of revenue. I have found that one thing that disturbs labouring people in my constituency particularly is that they are asked to contribute money in the form of fees and then the unions sponsor a political party which all the members do not endorse.

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Certainly.

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

Mr. Barnett: Does the hon. member not think it might be better to allow the unions to settle that matter themselves rather than for us to try to settle it here?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That is exactly what we are trying to settle here in one particular part of the labour code. We are trying to introduce this agreement, in order to assist unions to obtain greater financial revenue with which to carry on their operations. That comes right within the scope of the bill. Speaking from my own experience as one having a labour riding, I do not think union members should be forced to contribute to any political party in which they do not believe. Some may say that all they have to do is to vote against such action when the matter comes up at the union convention, but past experience shows that while a great many may object, the motion is carried at the convention. Therefore they have to contribute to a political party. If such were not the case I believe there would be greater satisfaction among union members, and it would lead to greater unanimity of thought in the betterment of the unions.

What I have said on this point does not detract from my support of this particular measure. We have always favoured the check-off and do now, but we think the unions should use a little more discretion in the way they spend their money for the betterment of the unions.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind hon. members that at eight o'clock the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 308—Pretending to practise witchcraft, etc.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest very seriously, Mr. Chairman, that the minister at least try to find some other word for the heading which precedes this clause. Some of us were speaking a bit jocularly, perhaps, before five o'clock, but I suggest in all seriousness that in this day and age we do not believe in what is meant by the word "witchcraft", and it hardly seems appropriate now that we should have a law against it.

I went to one of the offices a few moments ago to look up the definition of witchcraft in a modern dictionary. I find it given as follows:

> The occult practices or powers of witches or wizards, especially when regarded as due to dealings with the devil . . .

On the other hand, also in the same dictionary which I believe was Funk and Wagnalls, it says that witchcraft was formerly a crime and it goes on to point out that in the earlier days it was punishable by burning at the stake. I have found it interesting to read some of the case law on the subject as it is set out in Tremeear. I do congratulate last year's special committee for putting the word "fraudulently" in this new section. It is clear from pages 497 and 498 of Tremeear that as matters stood under section 443, almost any form of fortune telling, or pretending, as spiritualists, to be able in seances to receive messages from the spirits of the dead, came under the ban of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Justice Robson, in our own province of Manitoba, on one occasion made the comment that it might be that undertaking to tell fortunes by palm reading would amount to a violation of section 443 of the Criminal Code. The minister knows as well as I do, perhaps better, that that comment was drawn from the precedents which had been established, for example in Stonehouse v. Masson, where a decision was made by a court of five judges that mens rea was unnecessary in this offence. There are a number of other citations with some interesting mouthfuls of Latin which I need not mention now.

I think it is fair to say that section 443 as it stood was certainly very wide in its coverage. I am glad that if we must have something of this nature in the code, we have modernized it a bit by putting in the word "fraudulently". I think for appearance, if for no other reason, we should go a bit further and see if we cannot find a better heading than the word "witchcraft". As a matter of fact, if I may be permitted this slight digression, I might say that if we need anything along this line today what we need is a law not against witchcraft but against witch hunting.

Mr. Garson: I entirely agree with my hon. friend. As a matter of fact the most inappropriate part of this section is its heading. It is the heading that has created a lot of misunderstanding as to the nature of the section. I would go my friend from Winnipeg North Centre one better and say that this section does not deserve a heading at all. If we take the heading out, the next preceding heading in Bill No. 7 is "false pretences" of which the offence under section 308 is another one. This is just another kind of false pretence of fraudulently pretending to put the victim in communication with Marcus Aurelius and that sort of thing.

Mr. Knowles: That would still leave the word "witchcraft" in the section itself, which I think is perhaps unnecessary. But at least the minister has gone a long way, and I will not press him any further, if he will move an amendment to strike out the heading "witchcraft".

Mr. Garson: Suppose you move it.

Mr. Knowles: I move, Mr. Chairman, that Bill No. 7 be amended by striking out the heading "witchcraft" where it appears between lines 19 and 20 on page 102 of the bill.

Mr. McIvor: I feel that having this heading of "witchcraft" would help a student or a lawyer find this more easily.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) agreed to.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to ask a question on this clause. Supposing a person paid $2 to one of these people who promised to find a lost article and he found the lost article, would that be considered fraudulent?

Mr. Garson: I think that would be a case of value received.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 309—Forgery.

Mr. Fulton: I am just going to bring up a small point concerning the insertion of some commas in paragraph (b) of subclause 1. After the words "some person should be induced", would the minister insert a comma, and then insert another comma after the word "genuine"? I think it makes the meaning more clear.

Mr. Garson: Insert a comma after "induced", is it?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, and another one after the word "genuine", so it would read:

> that some person should be induced, by the belief that it is genuine, to do or to refrain from doing anything . . .

Mr. Garson: We would certainly accept that if my hon. friend would move it.

Mr. Fulton: I would move, Mr. Chairman, that in line 34 a comma should be inserted after the word "induced", where that word occurs, and that in line 35 a comma should be inserted after the word "genuine", where that word occurs.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Criminal Code

On clause 310—Punishment for forgery.

Mr. Fulton: I have a question here which could probably be answered by the principles of the law surrounding corroboration. I wonder if the intention here is to require the corroboration of another witness or whether the corroboration could be afforded by the document itself? In other words, it says:

> No person shall be convicted of any offence under this section upon the evidence of only one witness unless the evidence of that witness is corroborated in a material particular by evidence that implicates the accused.

If a witness is giving evidence and says that a document is forged, would the document itself be corroboration of the evidence of the witness, or would it require another witness or another document?

Mr. Garson: No. I think the clear meaning is, as the clause states, "corroborated in a material particular by evidence that implicates the accused." There is no indication that that has to be evidence given orally by another witness.

Mr. Fulton: It would be broad enough to include the document complained of? If something in the document substantiates the statement of the witness, the minister thinks that would be corroboration within the meaning of the clause?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 311 to 324 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 325—Fraudulent manipulation of stock exchange transactions.

Mr. Knowles: What is involved in this clause, and how far does it go? What kind of stock market transactions are illegal?

Mr. Garson: These are what are usually known as wash sales. It is a repetition of section 444A in the existing code, with no change.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 326 to 338 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 339—Salting mine.

Mr. Adamson: Is this an increased penalty for salting?

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is right. The committee considered this at some length and thought it was desirable to offer further discouragement to this practice. Therefore the penalty was increased.

On clause 341—False employment record. Time clock.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not remember the discussion of this clause in the committee. I am wondering what is involved in this reference to punching a time clock. Would an employee in a factory be subject to arrest and conviction if he punched a time clock for somebody else, or someone else punched it for him? It seems to me this is a rather small thing to have in the Criminal Code. Perhaps it is not, but I should like to have the minister's explanation.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, section 415A (b) and (c) in the present code from which clause 341 was taken was passed following the enactment in 1935 of the Minimum Wages Act, the Weekly Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act and the Limitation of Hours of Work Act. All of these acts, as my hon. friend probably recalls, were declared to be ultra vires, and this section 415A was provided to continue the provisions contained in it after these other acts had been declared ultra vires.

Mr. MacInnis: I can understand that if an employment record being used by the unemployment insurance commission, or some such organization, were falsified there might be some reason for prosecution. However, I cannot see the reason for this reference to the punching of a time clock. It says:

> Every one who, with intent to deceive . . . punches a time clock, is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

This seems a rather small thing to have in the Criminal Code.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member will recall the new deal legislation put through in 1935, or some time before that, of which this was a part. When that legislation was declared unconstitutional this particular section was taken from it and put into the Criminal Code, where it has remained ever since. In revising the Criminal Code we have just carried it on. The hon. member will notice that the offence is punishable only on summary conviction. I think it is clear that if an employment record is falsified or a time clock punched in a manner designed to deceive, it is really obtaining wages under false pretences.

Mr. MacInnis: The punching of the time clock would be part of the falsifying of the employment record, would it?

Mr. Garson: That would be one way of doing it.

Mr. Gillis: I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that this should not be in the Criminal Code at all. The manner in which an employer requires his employee either to punch a time clock or sign a sheet, in and out, is a matter of arrangement between employer and employee. To bring it in as an offence under the Criminal Code in my humble opinion opens up many kinds of abuses, if you happened to be dealing with an employer who is not reasonable.

It could happen right in this building. A stenographer could sign a sheet coming in and going out. If she wished to leave a half hour earlier to get her hair fixed up, or if she was feeling indisposed, her member might say, "You may go now." One of the other girls might sign her out, or an arrangement might be made with the boy at the desk whereby she would be signed out. Under this clause of the Criminal Code that could be considered an offence. The same applies in a steel plant or a coal mine. They have their methods of keeping the records of employees as to their coming in and going out. I suggest it is a matter of agreement between employers and employees, and that is where it should be left.

That part of the clause dealing with the falsification of records is all right, and could be used in its relationship to the Unemployment Insurance Act and other measures. But how you go in or go out should be a matter of arrangement between employer and employee, and it should be left as it has been in the past. I suggest that paragraph (b) should be eliminated.

Mr. Garson: I am in a bit of a weak position in this matter, since we have already gone quite a long distance to meet the viewpoint that my hon. friend is now enunciating. Under section 415 (a) of the Criminal Code:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years imprisonment or to a fine not exceeding $5,000, or to both such imprisonment and such fine who, knowingly:

—and so on. Now, at least my hon. friend must give the commission and the committees who have laboured upon this full credit for having reduced this to a summary conviction offence, as it is in the bill now before the committee. In that connection, when bringing down a new code it would be a little bit difficult to maintain all the other offences intact and let this one go. The commission has not done too badly in all the circumstances.

Mrs. Fairclough: I wonder whether there is going to be any differentiation between an individual who in a single instance might falsify an employment record, and the wholesale padding of payrolls.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will read the clause she will see that it is very clear there. It says:

> Every one who, with intent to deceive,
> (a) falsifies an employment record, or > (b) punches a time clock, > is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

This means that the accused is merely brought before a magistrate and the fine is usually fairly nominal. As I say this offence, which in the new deal legislation of 1935 was treated as a very serious indictable offence with large penalties, now has been substantially reduced, and I question very much whether with propriety we could effect a greater reduction. Bringing it down to a summary conviction offence puts it very much in perspective, I think.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Has the minister really thought of all the implications of this punching the time clock? It is not very many months since I was punching a time clock; in fact it is less than a year. I know if this had been in force at the time and I had been prosecuted I would have been haled in front of the magistrate almost every working day of the week.

Mr. Garson: May I put it to my hon. friend that he is in a worse position than that. Under the law as it is at the present time he would not merely come up before the magistrate, he would come up on an indictable offence for which he could get two years, or a $5,000 fine, or both.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): That makes it even worse. I ask the minister, then, would he suggest that it is any part of the business of the courts of this country, for instance, to arrest a man because he had left the place of his employment and sneaked off five minutes, ten minutes or fifteen minutes ahead of time? Would he think that was any part of the job of the courts of this country? Is that not a matter between the employer and the employee? If the employer thinks fit he will fire a man for that?

Mr. Garson: Would my hon. friend say that when a stock promoter comes and fraudulently separates one from $100 or $200 or $500 of hard-earned money, that is a matter only between the salesman and the man who is cheated? I do not think so.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): That is an entirely false analogy, Mr. Chairman. I think that is a straw man the minister has stuck up to knock down with vigour. The fact of the matter is that this clause does take over the job of the employer. It puts on the courts the job of enforcing the conduct of an employee, the work that a competent employer should look after himself, which is to see that his employees give him honest service. If through carelessness on the part of the employer an employee is able to rob him through false punching of the time clock, whether it be a matter of a few minutes—which is always the case in big plants where the man who drives a car gets someone else to punch the time clock for him while he himself gets the car out of the parking lot, which is illegal under this clause, and it is always carelessness on the part of the employer when that is done—it is no part of this parliament and no part of the courts of this country to do work for employers that they should do for themselves.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, with all due deference to my colleagues, on a previous reading I had not seen in this particular clause what they have apparently seen. If this clause were used in the manner in which they have suggested it could be used, then I would be in agreement with them; but the impression I formed from reading it was that this clause was designed to protect both the employer and employee from the wilful falsification of employment records or the wilful punching of a time clock, such as might be done by someone who had a grudge against me and who took this method of wreaking his anger upon me.

I would suggest that by a little rearranging of the words of this clause it might be made plain that something of that sort is the intent, and not what has been suggested by my colleagues. If it were to read "with intent to deceive, falsifies an employment record by punching a time clock or other means", then I think it could be made clear that it is intended to protect people from the wilful misuse of various facilities used for keeping the time of workers. I would say that also would be a protection as far as paragraph (a) is concerned, if an employer through his agent were to falsify employment records with a view to short-changing the employee on his pay cheque. A little rearranging of the wording could make it clear that it is that sort of thing the clause is designed to protect against. It is designed to protect both sides from infractions.

Mr. Garson: With great deference, for I agree with the point my hon. friend is making, I would say that the wording as it is now clearly covers it. If an employer comes along and falsifies his employment records for the purpose of cheating his employees he is just as guilty as the employee who falsifies them.

The law applies to everybody. Or in the case my hon. friend speaks of, if some enemy who had a grudge against the workman came and falsified his record with intent to deceive, he would come under the clause.

The section, much more onerous than the present clause, has been in effect for pretty nearly 18 years. Speaking for myself, I must say that when we considered this it was the first time that I knew it existed. I think that is probably true of most hon. members.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): It is the first time I knew of it.

Mr. Knowles: I have another question I want to ask, if we are through with that aspect of the matter. I notice that section 415A which clause 341 replaces also had a subparagraph (e) which made it an offence to employ any child or minor person contrary to any law of Canada. Am I to understand that that subparagraph was found to be ultra vires, or is there any other federal law against child labour?

Mr. Garson: I cannot answer my hon. friend's question offhand as to whether that was a part of the law which was declared to be ultra vires. The whole of this law, as I understand it, was in the new deal legislation of 1935 and when that legislation was found to be ultra vires section 415A, as it appears in the present code, was set up to take the place of those provisions as they appeared in the new deal legislation which was declared to be ultra vires.

I believe the reason the clause to which my hon. friend referred was not carried into the present section is that there are clauses in other labour laws in the country which cover that matter; and when we bring the present offence down from an indictable offence to a summary conviction offence there is no purpose in retaining clause 415A (a) and (e) which will be in effect by bringing in the new clause which is now before the house.

Mr. Knowles: There is one point on which I certainly agree with the minister and that is that legislation respecting matters of this kind would be more appropriate in our labour legislation rather than in the Criminal Code.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wish to speak?

Mr. Knowles: I defer to my friend from Nanaimo.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I move that clause 341 be amended by striking out the words "or (b) punches a time clock" so that the clause as amended would read:

> Every one who, with intent to deceive,
> (a) falsifies an employment record, is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

The Deputy Chairman: Would the hon. member for Nanaimo please write out his amendment and send it to me.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word before you put the amendment to the committee. It has just occurred to me that this is a record of labour time. When the international labour organization was set up it was declared that labour was not a commodity. Now, if labour is not a commodity I do not see that there is any need for a clause of this kind, because it would appear that no one has been defrauded even if a time clock is wrongly punched.

I agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo that when a man wrongly punches a time clock, whether it is his intention to deceive or otherwise, it should be a matter between an employer and an employee, and discipline should be in the hands of the employer and not written into the Criminal Code.

Mr. Enfield: Mr. Chairman, before you put this amendment there are a few observations I would like to make in regard to this clause. I believe hon. members opposite are inclined to give too little attention to the words "with intent to deceive". Anyone who has had any experience in presenting such cases in court will realize that it is very necessary to absolutely prove the intent, and no one would lightly lay such a charge unless this intent to deceive were present in no uncertain terms.

There seems to me to be some assumption that the clause in all its sections is drawn to protect the employer more than the employee, but there is protection on both sides. An employer by taking the time cards and punching the time clock at different times could obviously obtain a great advantage for himself, just as the employee could. In any event, according to the way the amendment reads, if you merely remove the line "or (b) punches a time clock", you leave the falsification of the employment record. But falsely punching a time clock is in effect falsifying an employment record, so in my opinion the amendment does not accomplish anything.

I would therefore submit on that basis that the clause as it stands is a protection to both parties. The minister has pointed out that during the past 18 years, to his knowledge, we have never come to any real grief in regard to this, and it seems to me it should be left as it is. Apart from that, the offence has been cut down to a point where it involves merely a summary conviction, and I believe we will lose more than we will gain by amending this clause.

Mr. Ellis: The suggestion that because the penalty has been reduced the law is in any way changed is not a proper basis, I believe, from which to view this clause. If the law states that a group of employees by taking certain action are breaking the law, then in the eyes of the law they are lawbreakers regardless of the penalty.

Mr. Garson: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I had something to do with the drafting of this law and I want to say there is no basis for a suggestion of that kind. There is no reason for any person in this house assuming for one moment that this is any more applicable to an employee than an employer. As a matter of fact the employer who wants to cheat is in a far better position to do so on a basis that will give him some real return than is the employee who wants to cheat the employer.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, could I ask one question? The minister has suggested that he did not know this particular clause existed, the implication being that since it has not been used it does not matter whether or not it is left out. That is the point to which I would like to refer. Because a clause of the Criminal Code has not been used, or because it is not likely to be used, is not a valid reason for retaining in the code a clause which does not meet the purpose.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Ellis: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Would he suggest that if in his community they had not had a murder for five years, they should remove from the code the prohibition against murder?

Mr. Ellis: No, certainly not, Mr. Chairman. That is another straw man such as the one raised a few minutes ago. I do not think that is any valid comparison at all. The suggestion has been made that since this section has not been in use or rather that since it has not been applied, there is no particular reason why it should not be kept in the code.

My suggestion is simply this. Whether a man is actually brought before a court and tried for an offence or not, the fact is that under this section Canadian citizens are going to be lawbreakers; they are going to be breaking the law. Whether or not they are going to be running any great risk of being punished for it, the fact is that in the eyes of the law they are lawbreakers. For that reason I think that this section should be amended in the manner suggested by the hon. member for Nanaimo. I have not heard any valid reason suggested this evening to indicate why this provision should be retained. If an employer is not satisfied that the employee is giving good service, then the employer has it in his power to punish him by whatever measures he deems necessary, even to the point of dismissing him.

It seems to me that is the way this problem should be tackled, and not from the standpoint of the Criminal Code or the law enforcement officers. This is a matter which the employer himself should take care of, and where he should take appropriate action against any employee who is not giving full value for the wages he is receiving.

Mr. Shaw: Those of us who served on the committee of the House of Commons which studied Bill No. 7 will recall that the Trades and Labour Congress and the Canadian Congress of Labour both appeared before us, presented their briefs and remained with us for some time for the purpose of questioning. I personally have no recollection of either of those two labour organizations taking exception to this section. May I ask the minister if he has any such recollection?

Mr. Garson: No, I have not.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister one thing that may help us in making up our minds on the amendment. Is it his view that subclause (a), "falsifies an employment record", embraces the punching of a time clock?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I think it does, because a time clock is an employment record. If my thought be correct, then it is going to leave the employee who punches it doing so while not being as familiar as he should be with the fact that it is in breach of the law.

Mr. Fulton: The minister's point there is that he would rather see paragraph (b) kept in not so much because it is necessary for the completeness of the law, but that it is necessary as a warning to those who might otherwise offend?

Mr. Garson: Of course.

Mr. Fulton: I understand.

Mr. Gillis: The minister has not offered many good reasons why it should be kept in there. He tries to justify it by saying that it has been there for 18 years and has never been used, and that it has been modified. That is correct. But this Criminal Code has not had very much advertising in the last 18 years, and it is getting a great deal of advertising right now. We may smarten up the employer to the point where he will say, "Why should I be getting in trouble over taking my employees to task for wrongfully punching the clock or getting someone to punch it for them? Why do I not just turn them over to the law enforcement officers? Then I do not get in trouble with the union".

As for the second point, that it has been there a long time and has not been used, the minister will recall that only within the past few years you had a strike here in Ontario where the employer was exceedingly anxious to crash the picket line but could not find any law against peaceful picketing. They therefore dug away back into the archives and found the law covering watching and besetting. They dragged that law out of the mothballs and used it rather effectively.

I agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo that this matter of the time clock should be out. The minister says it works both ways, or that it is protection both ways. The employer does not punch a time clock, and he is not affected. It is the person who punches the time clock who is affected and about whom I am concerned. I can envisage all kinds of people across this country getting convicted in court for little practices that have grown up over the years and that have become laws by themselves. The employer has all kinds of protection already, in my opinion, with the paragraph "falsifies an employment record"; that is enough. But when you make that time clock stand out like a sore thumb, it is a short-cut.

I know if I were heading up National Steel tomorrow and I was losing a lot of minutes on the time clock, with the signing of sheets in and out, instead of firing four or five men as a matter of discipline I would say, "Why should I get in wrong with the men? I am likely to have a stoppage of work over it. I will therefore call in the law enforcement officers and lay charges against three or four men. They will pay fines, and they will have a conviction against them in court." It is an easy way out for the employer.

In view of his own admission that in 18 years we have not used it and that we do not anticipate using it, I think the minister would be well advised to have it taken out. Let us take out that time clock provision as is suggested by the amendment of the hon. member for Nanaimo. Let us try it with the first part of the section only and see how it works over the next two or three years.

Mr. Montgomery: I am sorry, but I cannot support the amendment. I think there is some protection there for the employee. While it has not been used, perhaps that has been through the good fortune that they have not had any bad employers. I feel that the paragraph should be left there. There are possibilities. It may be one and the same thing. I am not too familiar with how payrolls are made up, but strictly from the legal standpoint I think I can see where it is a good thing to have it there. Even if it has not been used, as the minister said a few moments ago, that is no reason why we should take it out of the code.

Mr. Knowles: Like the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, I should like to look at the matter from the legal viewpoint. The minister has drawn attention to the fact that what is now before us is a boiling down of what was in section 415A. May I point out that section 415A had five subparagraphs. I have read it two or three times while this debate has been going on, and I think it is fair to say that section 415A, taken in its entirety, had provisions which were beamed in some respects more often at employers and in other respects more often at employees. I think it is correct to say that paragraphs (a), (d) and (e) of section 415A were more likely to be violated by employers than by employees, whereas paragraphs (b) and (c) were more likely to be violated by employees than by employers. The minister shakes his head but I think that is a fair summary of section 415A as it stood.

When you come along and take out three parts of that section, and those parts are paragraphs (a), (d) and (e), I think you leave something that has a different flavour from the context of the whole section as it stood before. I point out that Tremeear—and that is my authority when the hon. member for Kamloops is not ready to advise me—suggests that section 415A has been inoperative since the courts ruled ultra vires the so-called Bennett new deal legislation.

Mr. Garson: Did my hon. friend say that it has been inoperative since then?

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps I had better—

Mr. Garson: Oh, no.

Mr. Knowles: —read exactly what is said.

Mr. Garson: It was put in here because it was inoperative in the other form, in order to make it operative here.

Mr. Knowles: With regard to the new deal legislation, Tremeear says:

> These acts were all held to be ultra vires, and section 415A, while it does not appear to have been referred to the courts, would presumably fall with them, with the possible, but doubtful, exception of paragraphs (b) and (c).

Paragraphs (b) and (c) are the subparagraphs that are found in clause 341 of the bill. Notice, however, that Tremeear says they may possibly be excepted from that statement that section 415A falls with the new deal legislation, but he casts doubt even on that. I will read those words again:

> . . . section 415A, while it does not appear to have been referred to the courts, would presumably fall with them, with the possible, but doubtful, exception of paragraphs (b) and (c). In any event, whether or not the section is ultra vires, it is clearly inoperative, with the possible exception referred to, since it refers to "any law of Canada", and there is, and can be, no such law.

It seems to me that from quite a legalistic point of view there is some doubt as to whether that portion, two-fifths of section 415A, should have been carried forward, and I wonder whether the minister would not consider letting the clause stand and giving some further thought to it. I have not noticed that he is very sympathetic as yet toward the amendment moved by the hon. member for Nanaimo, but if he were to give the matter further thought the idea might commend itself to him.

Mr. Garson: I really owe a debt of gratitude to my hon. friend, because I was afraid he was going to ask why the other three clauses were left out. Instead of that he has got up and given the very explanation for which I thought he was going to ask me. I thought his line of attack might be, why did you save these two particular provisions? Why did you carry them forward and leave the other three behind? He has just finished making an excellent statement as to the reason for that.

Mr. Knowles: The minister does not interpret Tremeear in the same way I do.

Mr. Garson: Well, that may be. There is also the additional reason that clauses (a), (d) and (e) all refer to a man doing something which is contrary not only to the code but to other laws of Canada, whereas (b) and (c), the ones we are concerned with here, simply describe as an offence the act of falsifying an employment record with intent to deceive, which would seem to me to be clearly within the provisions of the criminal law, or the act of punching any time clock with intent to deceive, which would be equally within the jurisdiction of the dominion government under its control over the criminal law of Canada.

In view of the fact that the record of employers and employees in Canada during the past 18 years has been so good under this law that it has not been necessary to invoke it very often, I am a little bit more optimistic than the hon. member for Cape Breton South in that I have great confidence that just as we have not had any occasion to use this law during the past 18 years, I do not expect that we will use it in the future. But I cannot imagine a weaker argument against a provision in the criminal law than to say that because we have law-abiding citizens we should repeal the Criminal Code.

When we enact this clause 341 I think we will carry on in the future as we have in the past, and I hope and anticipate that we shall not have to invoke this clause at all. I am fortified in that view because while all the big labour organizations came before the committee and made excellent representations upon other parts of the Criminal Code, I do not remember them raising any objection to this provision. I think they were wise in that, because I think any fair reading of the law will indicate that it protects the employee just as much as the employer.

Mr. MacInnis: Would this apply to members of parliament who sign a form as to days absent every time they receive a pay cheque? If there were any falsification, would this law apply?

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I did not hear my hon. friend's question.

Mr. MacInnis: Members of parliament have to sign a form indicating the number of days they have been absent from duty. Could a member of parliament be charged with falsifying an employment record with intent to deceive?

Mr. Garson: That is an opinion I would rather hesitate to express, for this reason. I have always understood the indemnity of the member of parliament to be what it is termed, an indemnity for the time he loses in carrying out his duties as a member of parliament. While I have never had occasion to check the matter carefully, I would be inclined to suspect that the relationship of employer and employee does not exist with respect to the indemnity that a member of parliament receives. Whether that situation will be changed when we are paid on an annual basis I do not know, but I rather think the position has been maintained that we are still members of parliament and have that independence. The opinion my hon. friend seeks is one that I would prefer not to express without going into the matter more carefully.

Mr. Byrne: I find it somewhat difficult to follow the reasoning of some hon. members, particularly that of the hon. member who proposed the amendment to this clause. First of all, I feel that it is a reflection upon the integrity of the multitude of people who are working and punching time clocks, and I may say that I have heard that old bell ring many times. I cannot conceive of any way in which it would be possible to falsify time clock records unless one were to punch two numbers and by some means or other take two full pays for a day, a week or a month. Certainly if that is done it is a completely dishonest act, and is the same as any other kind of stealing.

What surprises me more is the suggestion that this provision would take away from a union the responsibility of managing its affairs. I have had the responsibility of drawing up a considerable number of clauses in union agreements, and I do not remember ever seeing one instance where a union endeavoured to protect a dishonest worker.

There is one way in which a workman might falsify records, and that is by going home three or four hours earlier and having someone punch the clock for him when the time arrived. I have seen that happen, and certainly when the individual was caught in the act he was not haled before the courts, nor was he discharged. He was given a reprimand and told that sort of thing just could not continue when he returned to work. Either he had to stay on the job or he would not have a job.

There is another way in which a man might falsify the record. He might punch the clock, then go into the factory and not do any work all day. In such a case the union might attempt to prove that the man had accomplished a regular day's work, but that would be the union's responsibility. Possibly that would not be the type of falsification this clause contemplates. It is nice to be friends to all men, but let us be reasonable. If a person is dishonest, whether he is an employer or an employee, I think all should be handled in the same manner.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if I could suggest an amendment to the amendment which might get us out of some of this difficulty. I can appreciate the view of those who feel that the setting out of the time clock in a separate subclause might appear to be aimed at the employees, although I do not share that view myself. On the other hand surely a man, whether employer, employee or anyone else, who does a dishonest act must expect to take the consequences of it. I think it is quite proper, therefore, this being a dishonest act, that it should be included in the code and subject to punishment.

I was impressed by what the minister said, that he felt subclause (a) would embrace subclause (b) but that subclause (b) should be in there to draw attention to the fact that the dishonest punching of the time clock is also a criminal offence. I wonder, therefore, if we could not reconcile all these difficulties by the following, which I move as an amendment to the amendment:

That clause 341 be amended by deleting therefrom all the words after the words "Every one who, with intent to deceive", and substituting the following: "falsifies an employment record by any means, including the punching of a time clock, is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction."

That takes out the time clock as a separate subclause, and just includes it as an example of the falsification of an employment record.

Mr. Hansell: We have been doing quite a bit of talking about this time clock business, but I think perhaps I shall take a little more time. I have never punched a time clock in my life, but I have quite a few people in my constituency who do punch time clocks. I trust that we have not overlooked this fact. It seems to me that this is a protection for the employer in case one of his employees leaves an hour or so early and gets a friend of his to punch the clock for him. The hon. member for Kootenay East has said that the friend will punch the clock twice, once for himself and once for his friend.

Now then, who is the criminal in that case if the offence is under the Criminal Code? Who is it that has deceived? It is the man who leaves work a half an hour early and is paid for half an hour's work that he does not do. He is stealing from his employer half an hour's wages, but he is not the one who gets punished. It is the friend who punches the clock who is punished under this section, yet it is the other man who steals the money.

It appears to me that if you look at this in another light you will get the picture. A man robs a bank. He is the criminal who steals the money. He rushes out the door of the bank, jumps in a car and is driven away by his chauffeur. It is the chauffeur who is punished as well as the thief in that case. In this case of the time clock, however, the man who leaves work early and steals the half hour's wages does not come within the provisions of this section. I do not know whether or not that has been brought out.

In so far as the employer is concerned, I do not suppose any employer ever punches a time clock. It is conceivable that he might slip out into the hall and punch the clock for two or three of his employees an hour or so ahead of time. At the end of the week there would be a dispute as to how many hours these employees had worked, even though the clock might have been punched later by the employees. Such a case could not very well be settled on the basis of management and employee relationships. It is all very well to say that an employer can fire an employee, but an employee cannot fire his employer, so you have to equalize those two and get something which is fair for both. I do not believe for a moment that there would be many employers who would deliberately punch a time clock to falsify their employees' records. However, it could be done.

The one point I wanted to bring to the attention of the committee was that the accessory after the fact rather than the criminal receives the punishment under this section.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I sometimes wonder if some of the people who have been discussing this provision really know what a time clock is or what its purpose is. I have yet to see an employer who, for the fun of it, will punch a time clock to give some of his employees a day's wages if they do not happen to be at work. I think we should recognize that the time clock was devised by the employers, and established as a cheap and easy method of keeping accounts. They have, by virtue of their position as employers, been able to enforce the co-operation of the employees in this cheap and easy method of keeping accounts. That is one point we should bear in mind. If they want to do it in that way, that is their right. Let them do it, but they must take the risk of doing it.

There is another matter I wish to mention. I think it is perhaps time some of the facts of industrial life were imparted to some members of this assembly. The truth of the matter is that in a great many plants, in fact I might say possibly the majority of plants, the time clock is placed in such a position that the employer robs his employees every day of a few minutes' time. I shall describe what happened in the plant in which I was working at the time I was elected to this assembly. The time clock was placed a good six or seven minutes walk from the place where I was actually employed. As a consequence, when I came to work in the morning I had to reach that time clock and punch it in plenty of time to take that six or seven minutes walk and be at my place of employment by the time the whistle blew. At night I had to stay on the job until the whistle blew, and then take the six or seven minutes walk to the time clock afterward.

I believe that is the usual state of affairs in plants, and employees resent it very much.

They try all manner of dodges in order to get that six or seven minutes back from the employer.

They do it in this way on some occasions. One man will arrange to punch the time clock at the gate, on his way out, at such and such a time, for the other. This will indicate that the employees had waited at their place of employment the time they would have had to wait had they punched the clock at the right time. All these dodges are employed.

I can tell of another procedure that is being followed; and I might say that it was only a year or so ago, when I worked in one of Her Majesty's dockyards. We were employed there for the time being. The car parking lot was five or six minutes walk away from the drydock. The time clock was opposite the drydock. If those of us who were driving cars had to wait until the actual time for the punching of the time clock before we went down to the lot to get our cars, we would have had to give our employers another five or six minutes of our time. So what we did was this. Those of us who were driving cars got someone else to stay by the time clock and punch it, while we went down and got our cars. All these things could be punished by summary conviction.

I want to conclude by reiterating that the institution of the time clock was chosen by employers because it is a simple and cheap way of keeping records. It means they do not have to keep such close supervision—and it is expensive supervision—of their working force. All right; in those circumstances they should be prepared to look after that device themselves, and not ask the courts to impose penalties for them.

Mrs. Fairclough: One hon. member who spoke a moment ago said that he did not see how a time clock record could be falsified by an employer. Well, it would be a very simple process, and I think this point has been overlooked in the debate. It would be a simple matter for an employer to put in a half dozen extra time cards and charge them up on his payroll, thus evading income tax. It would not be the first time this has been done. Likewise it would not be the first time a timekeeper had done that, and taken the remuneration when it came to him for distribution and put it into his own pocket. Those things are fairly common, and there have been convictions as a result.

So I say we are barking up the wrong tree when we try to pretend that this clause is intended to trap the employee in some of his nefarious schemes to get a few extra minutes of time out of his employer. I think the employee is protected by the clause just as much as the employer.

Having said that, however, I do think the second subclause is redundant. I believe it could all be handled simply under the (a) part of the clause. I believe the minister has already agreed that the second or (b) part is only a matter of warning, and I think he might still consider it from that standpoint. However, I am forced to admit that I think we are making a great noise about something that is not very important because, the practice being what it is, most of these things are caught in the ordinary course of events.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Kamloops has moved that the amendment be amended so that the clause would read:

> Every one who, with intent to deceive, falsifies an employment record by any means, including the punching of a time clock, is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

I was at first in doubt as to whether the amendment was relevant to the amendment offered by the hon. member for Nanaimo. But, further than that, we have before us clause 341 in a certain wording, and I feel it would be somewhat dangerous to accept an amendment to the amendment in this form. If the hon. member would agree, I would rather accept it in the form of the deletion of certain words and the addition of other words, for purposes of certainty. So if the hon. member would consent, I think the amendment to the amendment might be withdrawn.

Mr. Fulton: I must confess that I offered the amendment to the amendment in an effort to find a middle course, and in the hope that it might be acceptable to the hon. member offering the amendment. I realize that it really does not amend his amendment, but rather states an alternative proposal. However, I have put it forward, and if the hon. member for Nanaimo indicates that he does not accept it as an alternative I would be glad to withdraw it and let him put his amendment. Then, after his amendment is disposed of, I could draw up an amendment in proper form dealing with the clause as amended or as it now stands, if the hon. member's amendment does not carry.

Would the hon. member accept my amendment to the amendment as an alternative proposal? If not, I could then proceed immediately to put it in proper form.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): No, I cannot accept it as an alternative to my amendment.

Mr. Fulton: Then I shall withdraw it.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member for Kamloops leave to withdraw the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. Castleden: Speaking to the amendment, I should like to say I am quite sure the vast majority of workers throughout Canada would be in favour of having such a clause left out of the code. The practice of punching a time clock is quite flexible and, through time, I think has probably suffered as much by abuse as by use. The matter of proving intent to deceive becomes a sort of legal technicality which most Canadians try to avoid, if possible, and keep out of the courts.

Among its other objectionable features, it seems to me that paragraph (b) has the additional feature, which I think should eliminate it immediately, that it might be used to intimidate employees. I do not think the criminal law was ever intended to be used for that purpose. Someone might say, "This man was guilty of punching a time clock incorrectly on a certain day, and because he did so we maintain he did it with intent to deceive, and therefore he is a criminal." In this way there could be included within the provisions of the criminal law a great many men who otherwise would be considered good workmen.

I do not think that is the intention of the law. I strongly urge the adoption of the amendment, and that the subclause be left out of the act.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Cameron, Nanaimo) negatived: Yeas, 13; nays, 67.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fulton: It has been emphasized that there may be some thought in the minds of persons immediately concerned that dishonest punching of a time clock is incorrectly made a criminal offence. Also the use of the word "or", it seems to me, would indicate that the intention to deceive by wrongly punching a time clock is different from the intention to deceive by falsifying employment records. If there is any justification for the inclusion of this as an offence, it seems to me the main justification is that it is a falsification of employment records to punch a time clock incorrectly.

Therefore, in order that the matter might be stated in perhaps more acceptable form and, I suggest with respect, a more strictly accurate form, I would move the amendment which I previously mentioned that clause 341 be deleted and the following substituted therefor—you have the words of the amendment in front of you, Mr. Chairman, which I previously wrote out.

The Chairman: Mr. Fulton moves:

That clause 341 be deleted and that the following be substituted therefor:

Every one who, with intent to deceive, falsifies an employment record by any means, including the punching of a time clock, is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, while I do not think it is very necessary that it should be so amended, the amendment does not change the sense appreciably, and is quite acceptable.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 342 to 344 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 345—Trader failing to keep accounts.

Mr. Leduc: Can the minister tell us whether there is a similar clause in the Bankruptcy Act with regard to this?

Mr. Garson: Yes, there is a clause which, without being identical in language, is substantially similar in effect.

Mr. Shaw: Why the figure $1,000? Is that merely an arbitrary figure?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I think my hon. friend has used the correct term. This is an arbitrary figure which has always been in the section and is carried forward in the present clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 346 to 350 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 351—Passing off.

Mr. Knowles: This is a new clause, according to the explanatory note. It has been suggested to me that perhaps this is a case of transferring certain offences from the civil list to the criminal list, but I will not press that point too far. I should like to hear from the minister as to what is intended by the wording of clause 351, and whether or not it is felt by the authorities that the clause as drafted will deal with the situation the minister has in mind.

Mr. Garson: Clause 351, Mr. Chairman, while it is indicated on the page opposite as a new section, is a combination of section 488 and 489 of the existing code.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute. I wonder whether the minister has examined the matter closely. Clause 350 certainly was drawn from section 488 and clause 349 from section 486. I do not see anything in section 488 or section 489 that is a basis for clause 351. The note on the righthand side is correct; this is new.

Mr. Garson: Yes, my hon. friend is right in that. I was in error in what I said.

Mr. Knowles: We will not call that criminal negligence.

Mr. Garson: Just ordinary negligence. The new clause 351 to which my hon. friend refers and the preceding clause 350 have been adopted in general terms largely from clause 7 of the bill revising the Unfair Competition Act to cover the forgery of trademarks and the passing off of goods.

Mr. Stick: I am not quite sure of this, but can the minister answer this question. If I order goods from a firm and they have not the style of goods on hand that I order but send me something else which I did not order will they be guilty under this act of passing off something to me without first ascertaining from me whether or not I want it?

Mr. Garson: No. I think the case my hon. friend speaks of, if I understand his statement of the facts correctly, would give rise to a civil claim against the other party. In these offences here a criminal element of bad faith and an attempt to deceive come in. Clause 351 provides:

> Every one commits an offence who, with intent to deceive or defraud the public or any person, whether ascertained or not,
> (a) passes off other wares or services as and for those ordered or required—

If my hon. friend ordered goods of a certain type and the person from whom they were ordered sent along to him the closest approach to those goods which he could supply and called my hon. friend's attention to them, then obviously the only claim my hon. friend would have would be some adjustment in the price, or the like. But if my hon. friend ordered goods of a certain brand name or with a certain trade mark on them and he got from the supplier goods which purported to be that same brand with the same trade mark on them but were very fraudulent imitations, then it would fall within this clause.

Mr. Stick: I may be stating borderline cases, but since union we have done a lot of business with mail order houses on the mainland, and some of our people have claimed that a lot of old stuff has been put off on them; that they have ordered certain goods from the catalogue and did not get what they ordered. They got something somewhat similar, but it was not the same thing. I was wondering whether, if that is so, they would be liable under this clause. I am not mentioning any names now.

Mr. Garson: No; but would my hon. friend not agree that the case of which he speaks would hardly fall under the category of deliberate and calculated attempt to deceive as to the nature of the goods?

Mr. Stick: I would call it a borderline case.

Mr. Garson: Paragraph (b) of this clause 351 goes on as follows:

> (b) makes use, in association with wares or services, of any description that is false in a material respect as to
> (i) the kind, quality, quantity or composition,
> (ii) the geographical origin—

That is, representing them as coming from one country when they come from another country. I continue:

> (iii) the mode of the manufacture, production or performance of such wares or services.

—where this is a deliberate attempt to deceive the buyer in such a way as to fraudulently induce him to accept goods which are quite different from those he thought he was getting.

Mr. Knowles: Do we understand that the (b) part of this clause would refer to the wholesale or retail trade in respect of, shall we say, clothes? If someone tries to pass off an article of clothing as 100 per cent wool and it is not, or as made from Australian wool when it is made from something else, that person could be charged under this clause?

Mr. Garson: That is right. If a person attempted to pass off a pair of high grade binoculars that were supposed to have originated, say, in Germany and they originated in a different country altogether and were only superficially of high grade quality, that would come under this clause.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, from now on ladies' fur coats will have to be described as exactly what they are?

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 352 to 364 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if clauses 365 to 367 inclusive could be permitted to stand.

The Chairman: Shall clauses 365 to 367 inclusive stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Clauses 365 to 367 stand.

Clauses 368 to 371 inclusive agreed to.

The Chairman: Clause 372?

Mr. Knowles: Stand.

The Chairman: Clause 372 stands. Clause 373?

Mr. Fulton: Stand.

The Chairman: Clause 373 stands.

On clause 374—Arson.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, under clause 374 there is a question I would like to take up with the minister. I admit it is somewhat general in nature, but I wish to relate it to the clauses having to do with arson and fire. The minister is probably aware that I have raised this question on a number of occasions with one of his colleagues.

I am referring to the large number of fires which are started by cigarettes. Can the minister tell me what the law is with regard to safety matches, and whether any consideration has been given to the enactment of a clause in the Criminal Code with respect to the way in which cigarettes are manufactured? We all know that the Minister of Public Works when he was minister of resources and development had some very interesting memoranda and documents on this question. I believe it has been clearly established that something could be done by way of controlling the manufacture of cigarettes in order to make tailor-made cigarettes less of a fire hazard than they are now.

I need not go into this in detail so far as the subject matter is concerned because I have done it fairly often in the past, but I am wondering whether any consideration has been given to this matter by the Minister of Justice so far as doing something about it in the Criminal Code is concerned.

Mr. Garson: I am not entirely clear as to the point my hon. friend seeks to make with regard to safety matches. Is my hon. friend referring to some treatment which they receive in their manufacture? If so, to what was he referring in connection with them?

Mr. Knowles: It is my impression that there is a law respecting matches which controls the way they are manufactured to the extent of making them less of a fire hazard than they were before that law was put on the statute book.

Mr. Garson: And my hon. friend wishes to apply that same principle to the manufacture of cigarettes?

Mr. Knowles: The minister apprehends correctly.

Mr. Garson: I must confess I do not believe I can tell my hon. friend offhand which law relating to the maintenance of quality in tobacco products the amendment of which would achieve the result he seeks in connection with cigarettes. I take it that my hon. friend is referring to these fires which are caused by people who go to sleep when they are smoking.

Mr. Knowles: There was one in Winnipeg the other night involving a friend of ours.

Mr. Garson: Yes, I know of that. There is some ingredient put in cigarettes, I have heard it said that it is saltpetre, which is put in cigarettes to keep them burning; I imagine the manufacturer in resisting my hon. friend's suggestion would answer that like all democratic people he is seeking the greatest good for the greatest number. The great number of his customers want a cigarette which will stay lit, and they would object rather strongly to one that goes out between puffs. They would probably argue that if there is a small minority of cigarette smokers who are careless enough to go to sleep when smoking cigarettes, that is no reason why the great majority of cigarette smokers should not have a cigarette which would stay lit between puffs.

I think there would be a real contest on that point; and whatever the law may be, I do not think it comes under the Department of Justice.

Mr. Knowles: The minister asserted in another connection, I believe it was yesterday, that if we are going to do something to prevent loss of life from reckless driving we have to have the kind of laws that are going to hurt somebody. I submit that if there is a great deal of loss of life and property from this cause, then we have a responsibility at this level of government to see that something is done about it. When the former independent member for Comox-Alberni, now treasurer of the Liberal party in British Columbia—which indicates how independent he was—was in the house here, and I refer to Mr. Jack Gibson, he pointed out on a number of occasions that to his knowledge those in charge of woods operations would not allow the use of tailor-made cigarettes because of their fire hazard.

There has been a great deal of research done on this question, and—to my knowledge, because I have had correspondence from the tobacco people—there certainly is resistance on the part of tobacco manufacturers to laws of this kind. But many laws which have as their object the protection of life and property were in the first instance resisted by people who had a special interest.

My contention is that we have a responsibility to our people in connection with this matter, and I believe it should be pursued further. I wonder if the minister would be willing to allow one of these clauses—any clause under the heading of arson or fires—to stand, and I will submit to him for his own perusal some memoranda and other material I have on this question.

Mr. Garson: I have no objection whatever to allowing one of these clauses to stand.

Mr. Knowles: Clause 374, for example?

Mr. Garson: Yes, clause 374. I might say that I think there is a great deal of merit in my hon. friend's suggestion, and I shall be glad to co-operate in examining the matter.

The Chairman: Clause 374 stands.

Clauses 375 to 378 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 379—Interfering with saving of wrecked vessels.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am here looking for information more than anything else. I notice that clauses 379 and 380 apply to seafaring activities only. I am wondering how you would cover interference with an aircraft wreck under clause 379 or clause 380, or interference with aerial navigation aids. How would that situation be covered?

Mr. Garson: I think the likelihood is that it is covered by some of our aeronautical legislation. I shall make a note of that question, get the information and give it to my hon. friend.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 380 to 388 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 389—Transportation of cattle by rail or water.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Garson: I was going to suggest that this clause might stand. Would that suit my hon. friend?

Mr. Winch: Oh, yes.

Mr. Garson: There are certain members who are interested in it who are not here tonight.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the clause stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Clauses 390 to 412 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 413—Jurisdiction.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister give us a brief explanation of clause 413?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Garson: Before I deal with that matter, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might deal first with something else. I have treasured this memorandum for a long while, and I do not want to overlook it. I suggest that there is a typographical error in line 5 of page 140. The word "officer" should read "offence".

Mr. Knowles: No wonder I did not understand it.

Mr. Garson: My hon. colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration will move that amendment.

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: It should be easier to explain with that amendment than it was before.

Mr. Garson: That is right. On this question of jurisdiction, I think it would save a good deal of time if we let this clause stand, and I will have a prepared statement on it in which I shall try to cover the matter as succinctly as possible.

The Chairman: Do I understand that clause 413 is to stand?

Mr. Garson: Yes, if that is all right.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Clauses 414 to 416 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 417—Trial without jury in Alberta.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister what efforts were made to try to bring the procedure in Alberta into line with the practice and procedure elsewhere. I understand that the commission's policy was to seek elimination of all procedural provisions peculiar to a province in order to effect uniformity throughout the whole dominion. Yet Alberta appears to have emerged with its major procedural differences under this section and the proposed new section 541. It might be alleged that in both cases the effect is to lessen the weight of the jury.

Will the minister say a word about that matter, namely as to what efforts were made to bring the practice in line in all the provinces, and as to what were the major arguments advanced by the province of Alberta in favour of the retention of their different practice in this case?

Mr. Garson: I have a memorandum here. It is a fairly lengthy document. As a matter of fact there were negotiations extending over some considerable time. I think it will save time if we let this section stand and

I shall try to bring this statement into a shorter compass so it can be handled more expeditiously.

The Chairman: Do I understand that clause 417 is to stand?

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Clause stands.

Clauses 418 to 428 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 429—Information for search warrant.

Mr. Fulton: It has been suggested to me that the word "anything" as it appears as the introductory word in each of paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of subclause 1 of this clause is too narrow. It appears to restrict the search to a search for things. It has been suggested to me that that is going to make it rather difficult in some cases where the obtaining of a search warrant or indeed the taking of action on a search warrant is urgent. Will the minister say a word about that matter?

Mr. Garson: I am not sure that I get my hon. friend's point there. The clause reads as follows:

A justice who is satisfied by information upon oath in Form 1, that there is reasonable ground to believe that there is in a building, receptacle or place,

(a) anything upon or in respect of which any offence against this act has been or is suspected to have been committed . . .

may at any time issue a warrant under his hand authorizing a person named therein or a peace officer to search the building, receptacle or place for any such thing . . .

I think the word "thing" there is of quite wide application. Was it my hon. friend's view that some other noun would have a broader application than the word "anything"?

Mr. Fulton: It is perhaps difficult to suggest anything that might have a wider application than the word "thing", but does the minister think it is possible that the word "anything" might be taken as confining it to an inanimate object? Suppose you were searching for a concealed body or corpse. I think perhaps that is the case in point. Does "anything" include a human body?

Mr. Garson: Offhand I would be inclined to think that "anything" would be a very broad application. In the same way, in getting a charter for a company, if one could persuade the provincial secretary to issue a charter to "engage in trade", that would be the widest kind of charter that one could have. Sometimes it is when we spell out powers that we restrict ourselves. Here he can look for anything. I might say that this is the language of the existing code and has been for many, many years. If it were defective or restrictive in any way, I think the law enforcement officers would have sought to have it amended before now.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 430 agreed to.

On clause 431—Seizure of things not specified.

Mr. Knowles: A number of questions come to my mind with respect to clause 431. First of all, I note that it is new. That fact catches my eye right away. Then I read it, and it does seem to me to place rather wide powers in the hands of peace officers. Let me read it:

Every person who executes a warrant issued under section 429—

That is the one the hon. member for Kamloops was just discussing with the minister, and which is already pretty wide. In fact the minister admitted that.

—may seize, in addition to the things mentioned in the warrant, anything—

The word "anything" is certainly very wide.

—that on reasonable grounds he believes has been obtained by or has been used in the commission of an offence, and carry it before the justice who issued the warrant or some other justice for the same territorial division, to be dealt with in accordance with section 432.

We are back in a sense to this question of warrants, and here is a case where a warrant is drawn up and issued for a search for certain specific things. Yet when the person who is armed with the warrant gets into the place he may go beyond the terms of the warrant. I realize there is the qualification that what is seized must be dealt with in accordance with section 432. As a matter of fact there are some parts of section 432 which are new, and which I want to question when we get to it. But even before we get there we have this power given to a peace officer armed with a warrant to go beyond the terms of the warrant just the same as the government, when it tries to amend a bill, goes beyond the scope of the bill. I do not like that and I do not like this.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend says quite accurately that the objection here is that the person who is executing the warrant is authorized to seize things in addition to those which are covered by the warrant. What are those things? That is the point. We can find the answer to the question as to whether it is wrong to permit him to seize these additional things by asking what they are. The clause says the peace officer—

. . . may seize, in addition to the things mentioned in the warrant, anything that on reasonable grounds he believes has been obtained by or has been used in the commission of an offence, and carry it before the justice who issued the warrant . . .

In other words, without this provision a constable armed with a search warrant could go into a thief's kitchen and find there some article worth a dollar that was covered by the search warrant and not be able to find anything else at all covered by the warrant, while at the same time there might be in the same place a thousand dollars worth of goods which he had every reason to believe, within the terms of the clause, were stolen. But for this section he would have to turn his back on those, go back to the magistrate and swear out a new information for a new warrant for this thousand dollars worth of goods. That does not seem to be a reasonable method of enforcing the law. Therefore as long as the searching police officer is confined to those additional things which upon reasonable grounds he believes to have been obtained by or to have been used in the commission of an offence, I think that the section is quite reasonable.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the fact that this is a new section, what has been the practice thus far?

Mr. Garson: But for this he would not have the power, and that is the reason we are taking it now.

Mr. Knowles: But this is new.

Mr. Garson: Yes, it is new. That is right. My note on this is that officers executing search warrants very often find things which are the proceeds of some other crimes or have been used in the commission of other offences, and the power to seize such things would appear to be fully warranted. That is the justification for the section.

Mr. MacInnis: I think the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has not been answered. What is the procedure under the code as it now stands? If a person is looking for stolen articles and finds something other than what is mentioned in the warrant, is he not able to seize that article as well under the code as it now operates?

Mr. Garson: To be quite candid, I must say that I am not familiar with police practice in that regard, but from the fact that we are seeking the power to do this now I would assume that in the absence of that power he would not do it and could not do it, or if he did take the article then he would be acting unlawfully, with all the risks in which that would involve him.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister has said that he thinks this is normal procedure, but I wonder whether that is so. You have an information laid for one offence and a search warrant is issued to search for a washing machine, an automobile or something else that has been stolen. The police officer enters and finds something that he thinks has been obtained by an offence.

The minister says, and I think quite properly, that this is a new section and that police officers did not have the power to do this before. I know this matter was discussed by the committee. I am told by my learned friend sitting beside me that the matter was discussed in the special committee last spring, that objection was taken to it but that the clause was passed nevertheless.

I know there is no point in discussing the matter at any great length now, but I do suggest that this again is one of these instances where we are departing farther and farther from the principles which we at one time recognized. The minister may say that if you have a search warrant for an article worth a dollar and you find it, and you also find a thousand dollar diamond ring it is an unfortunate thing if you cannot seize the diamond ring, and I think that is true. But there is a fundamental principle that it is better to have somebody escape once in a while provided we follow proper practice.

I also think any information that would ordinarily be laid would be wide enough—the police would see to that—to take in any matter which could be embraced within the particular offence. If, for instance, you are dealing with a theft case and looking for the stolen articles, and you also find that the man has been guilty of bootlegging, shall we say, I am rather doubtful that you should take advantage of the situation and bring in the evidence pertaining to that offence. Otherwise, why have an information at all?

Mr. Knowles: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Nowlan: It is ten o'clock and I am not going to labour the matter further, but I want to protest against it.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, on Monday we shall continue the debate on the motion to go into supply and, as I announced last night, we shall call two additional departments, namely fisheries and transport. It is the intention, and I think there is unanimous agreement, that when we get into supply we shall call the Department of Public Works, deal first with the item having to do with the construction of the national film board building in Montreal and debate that to the exclusion of others until it is completed.

Mr. Green: After that you would go on with administration?

Mr. Harris: After that we would revert to the general item on public works and continue with public works.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister anything in mind now for Tuesday?

Mr. Harris: I have been informed by people whom I thought were well informed that we would not get into supply on Tuesday.

Mr. Knowles: Tuesday's program will be the same as Monday, is that it?

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 1, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Third report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Hunter.

QUESTIONS

UNITED KINGDOM WHEAT PURCHASES

Mr. Argue:

1. What quantity of wheat has the United Kingdom purchased from Canada, during each week from August 1 to January 15, in the crop years 1950-1951, 1951-1952, 1952-1953 and 1953-1954?
2. What was the total quantity purchased, during the period in each of the above years?

Mr. Dickey:

1. In the crop years 1950-51, 1951-52 and 1952-53 arrangements for the sale of Canadian wheat and flour to the United Kingdom were governed for the most part by memoranda of agreement completed by the Canadian wheat board and the United Kingdom ministry of food. These arrangements between the board and the United Kingdom ministry of food covered an extended period of time and were not specifically related to the period included in this question. Board sales to the United Kingdom in 1950-51, 1951-52 and 1952-53 were 97·0, 119·6, 122·2 million bushels respectively. With respect to the crop year 1953-54, it is not the policy of the board to divulge its sales position during a current crop year.

2. See answer to No. 1.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—DIESEL ENGINES

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How many diesel engines are in operation on the Canadian National Railways?
2. How many are on order for the Canadian National Railways?
3. Will there be diesel engines available for operation in the Lindsay and Peterborough yards in 1954?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. At the end of January 1954, there were 512 diesel units in operation on the Canadian National system.

2. At the end of January 1954, there were 31 diesel units on order.

3. The assignment of diesel motive power, as it becomes available, is made from time to time in accordance with the requirements of traffic and in the interests of operating efficiency.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—CEDAR PICKETS

Mr. Pouliot:

1. How many cedar pickets has the Canadian National bought in the province of Quebec during the last 12 months, and at what price?
2. On what date were tenders invited and what was the price submitted by each tenderer, together with his address?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. (a) 87,559; (b) It is not the policy of the company to divulge the nature and details of contracts or orders between the railways and other parties for the supply of materials required for company use.

2. See answer to No. 1(b).

GAGETOWN MILITARY CAMP

Mr. Brooks:

How many men were employed as of February 7, 1954 in construction work at the Gagetown military camp area (a) from camp area; (b) from New Brunswick (outside camp area); (c) from outside New Brunswick?

Mr. Dickey: If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer this question orally.

It is not possible to answer this question through information available from government sources. Apart from supervisory personnel employed by Defence Construction Limited, all persons employed on this project are working for private contractors who are performing the preliminary stages of construction.

These contractors meet their labour requirements, apart from key personnel, mainly through the national employment service. Instructions were issued by the Department of Labour to the national employment service to give preference in making referrals to men from the camp area and individuals who had been displaced by the expropriation. The national employment service has been operating in accordance with this directive in referring applicants to fill vacancies as requests come in from the contractors. However, there is no reliable record of those actually employed or retaining such employment.

Questions

The most recent estimates indicate that out of some 230 employed, approximately 140 are from the camp area and over 70 from elsewhere in New Brunswick. Defence Construction Limited has 30 employees, all supervisory personnel, 6 from the camp area, 19 from elsewhere in New Brunswick and 5 from outside New Brunswick.

WHEAT—PRICE REDUCTIONS

Mr. Argue:

1. Has the United States price for wheat at the Atlantic coast been reduced recently? If so, by how much per bushel?
2. Did the American reduction follow or precede the Canadian reduction?
3. Did Canada or the United States first suggest a reduction in its eastern selling price?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Prices at which United States wheat is sold for export are not published by their government but each day the United States department of agriculture announces a per bushel subsidy covering the shipment of wheat of United States origin to be exported out of various U. S. ports. This has the effect of reducing the price by a similar amount to the foreign buyer. Subsidies announced by the United States department of agriculture covering export shipment out of U. S. east coast ports on February 15, 16, 17 and 18 were as follows:

Announced at 3.30 p.m. eastern standard time February 15 effective until 3.30 p.m. eastern standard time February 16, 57 cents per bushel.

Announced at 3.30 p.m. eastern standard time February 16 effective until 3.30 p.m. eastern standard time February 17, 63 cents per bushel.

Announced at 3.30 p.m. eastern standard time February 17 effective until 3.30 p.m. eastern standard time February 18, 64 cents per bushel.

Announced at 3.30 p.m. eastern standard time February 18 effective until 3.30 p.m. eastern standard time February 19, 64 cents per bushel.

2. At 1.15 p.m. central standard time on each of the following days the Canadian wheat board announced its price for No. 1 Manitoba northern wheat basis in store Fort William-Port Arthur: February 15, $1.85⅞ per bushel; February 16, $1.78⅞ per bushel; February 17, $1.79 per bushel; February 18, $1.79 per bushel.

3. The decision to reduce the in store Fort William-Port Arthur price of Canadian wheat on February 16, 1954 was made by the Canadian wheat board.

[Mr. Dickey.]

WHEAT—PRICES AT VANCOUVER AND FORT WILLIAM

Mr. Argue:

1. When did the Canadian wheat board first establish the price for wheat at Vancouver on the same basis as at Fort William-Port Arthur?
2. Has the wheat board selling price for wheat basis Vancouver exceeded the selling price basis Fort William-Port Arthur?

Mr. Dickey:

1. September 27, 1943.

2. Yes. Since February 16, 1954.

CUSTOMS TARIFF—ANTIFREEZE

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the tariff board received instructions from the Minister of Finance, or from any other person, at any time since July 1, 1953, to investigate the tariff position of so-called antifreeze compounds?
2. If so, when were such instructions given, by whom, and what were their terms?
3. Has any change in the tariff on antifreeze yet been made as the result of any such instructions and investigation?
4. If so, what change has been made? If no change has been made as yet, is such a change in prospect?
5. What is, or what will be, the net effect of any change in the tariff on the purchase price of antifreeze to consumers in Canada?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. Yes.

2. The Minister of Finance on December 28, 1953, referred to the tariff board the following tariff items, as reference No. 114, for investigation and report:

1. Item 208h—so far as this item covers ethylene glycol, at least 97 per cent pure, for use in the manufacture of ethylene glycol antifreezing compounds.

2. Items 711 and 220a(i)—so far as these items cover ethylene glycol less than 97 per cent pure for use in the manufacture of antifreezing compounds.

3. Item 220a(i)—so far as this item covers antifreezing compounds having an ethylene glycol base in sealed containers, or otherwise, ready for use as antifreezing compounds in motor vehicles, etc.

Although item 208h is temporarily bound duty free and the present rates of duty under items 220a(i) and 711 are also bound against increase under the general agreement on tariffs and trade, you should conduct your investigation without taking this point into consideration.

3. No.

4. The tariff board has not rendered its decision.

5. This is a hypothetical question and cannot be answered.

FORMER MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT EMPLOYED

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Have any former members of parliament been employed by the Department of Agriculture or the P.F.R.A. since July 1, 1953?

2. If so, what are their names and addresses, their respective salaries and their duties?

Mr. McCubbin:

1 and 2. W. G. Bock, Eastend, Sask., agricultural supervisor, $3,300 per annum; Georges Bouchard, Ottawa, Ont., assistant deputy minister, $8,500 per annum; A. E. Dewar, Indian Head, Sask., agricultural supervisor, $3,300 per annum.

WATER POLLUTION—NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER

Mr. Harrison:

Has the Minister of National Health and Welfare any further information on the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river?

Mr. Martin:

I should like to outline in some detail the present situation, the steps which have been taken and the proposals which are made for future action.

Before doing so however I am sure that the house will be glad to learn that a number of the substances in the water have been identified, and certain of these are thought by the investigators to be involved in the source of the trouble.

As a result of these findings, recommendations were made to the health authorities of the province, and the members will have already been advised by the press and the radio of the action taken by the provincial department of health in issuing instructions to one of the companies suspected of discharging wastes containing these substances, to discontinue by March 1 the discharge of such wastes into the North Saskatchewan river. It is understood that appropriate steps are being taken to pond or isolate such wastes for subsequent disposition.

It is very much hoped that this action will prove effective in bringing about some alleviation of the distress of the communities which are dependent upon the river for their domestic water supplies.

I can assure the house that my department will continue to assist in every way that it can, to co-operate with provincial authorities and with industry to seek a final solution of the problem, and to give such advice and help as it can to avoid any recurrence, once a solution is found. It may meanwhile be of interest to recapitulate briefly the events which have led up to the present situation and the efforts which have been made at the federal level to assist provincial authorities.

I have from time to time reported to the house on the developments as they have taken place, and it may be useful at this time to say something of the specific plans formulated in co-operation with provincial authorities which are presently being implemented by the technical officers, both at the federal and the provincial level.

While the problem was thought to have resulted from the discharge of industrial wastes into the river at or near the city of Edmonton, the solution to this problem was complicated by a number of factors which include climatic and geographical conditions, as well as the diversity of wastes which are being discharged into the river by a number of industries.

The identification, therefore, of the particular offending substance, as well as of the particular industry responsible for its discharge into the river, represented a scientific project of some magnitude. I think I should say that diligent inquiries were made from all possible sources in Canada, as well as in the United States where similar problems might have been encountered, but it appeared that this particular situation was without exact precedent in any of the communities in North America.

The considered opinion of the scientific investigators, at the federal and provincial and the industry level, was that while an immediate solution was of course the urgent objective to be found, the over-all problem of providing safe but effective means of disposal of industrial wastes made it necessary to obtain a precise chemical answer, and this could only be found through the laborious but nevertheless necessary field work, sampling, analyses and other procedures, whereby the identification of the substance or substances and methods for treatment could be devised.

I emphasize these features because it might otherwise have appeared that the shut-down of all of the industries which could have been involved would provide the answer. This however would not be the case, as it is only through investigation of the river in its present condition that a permanent solution to the problem could be expected.

With the investigations that were made and the information that was available, it was obvious that the problem was accordingly one of great complexity, and it seemed to us that the solution would likely be found only with the full utilization of all available technical resources.

As I previously advised the house, I therefore communicated with the minister of health of Alberta, under date of February 8, offering full co-operation and assistance of the technical officers of the department to participate in a joint study with the provincial authorities and with industries, in seeking an immediate solution with the further objective of making recommendations which would result in an over-all solution to the problem of treating such wastes in that area.

This offer was accepted by the minister of health of Alberta, and immediately technical officers of the department left for Edmonton to work out, in co-operation with provincial and industry officers, procedures which might offer the most expeditious solution.

After an intensive study of the area of industrial development downstream from Edmonton by officers from the occupational health and public health engineering divisions of this department, in company with provincial experts as well as experts from industry, certain procedures were evolved.

The objective of the study as was conceived by the federal representatives was twofold:

1. To eliminate the offensive taste and odour from the waters of the North Saskatchewan river.

2. To carry out a comprehensive investigation of industrial pollution to establish the basis for future control.

It was emphasized that every effort must be made to provide as quickly as possible, a solution for objective No. 1, and if a solution could not readily be found, it would be necessary to recommend drastic action.

The detailed steps which were recommended involved the following:

It was recommended that for purposes of industrial appraisal, arrangements be made to have two investigating teams set up to carry out a rapid but detailed study of the industries. Each team would be composed of an industrial hygienist and public health engineer from federal resources. These federal experts would work closely with experts in industry, the provincial government, the national and the Alberta research councils and the university authorities.

A member of this group would be responsible for the over-all co-ordination of this phase of the study.

In addition to the industrial appraisal, sampling procedures would be developed as rapidly as possible to include analyses of industrial effluents and river water. The sampling process would extend from a point above Edmonton to the various centres complaining of pollution in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, thus covering many hundreds of miles.

[Mr. Martin.]

A third proposal involved analytical investigations to include all possible methods of analysis to determine the nature of the pollutant, as well as intensive investigation of any leads that might indicate its possible nature. It was hoped from the analytical investigations to provide leads as to the nature of the offending substance and thus to achieve objective No. 1 as rapidly as possible.

By way of illustration, one lead has been developed and is being followed at the present time. It was found that a synthetic mixture of propanol and butanol in water produced a material with an odour similar to the odour of the water samples taken from the river at points downstream from the industrial development.

A fourth phase of the investigation involved the extraction of materials from plant effluents which are known to or which might cause offence. This would be developed as part of the industrial appraisal during which time every effort would be made to have the companies remove materials that are known to or which might cause offence from their effluents.

As soon as substances causing the taste and odour nuisance have been identified, suitable procedures would of course be followed for the diversion and disposal of these materials.

The above were the specific steps which the federal officers suggested as constituting the most suitable, but at the same time, expeditious method of proceeding to study the problem and to obtain some alleviation from present distress for the affected communities.

In order to carry out these procedures and to reach the desired objectives as quickly as possible, it was emphasized that a co-ordinated and all-out approach must be adopted. The industries agreed to co-operate actively in the investigation and to make available all technical resources which they possessed. It was also thought desirable that other resources within the province, such as the Alberta research council and the facilities of the university, should be utilized as well as the assistance of the regional laboratory of the national research council at the city of Saskatoon.

In addition the environmental health centre in Cincinnati were asked to assist and their efforts will complement other aspects of the investigation.

The work which was immediately undertaken in accordance with these plans is presently proceeding and, as I mentioned at the outset of this statement, as a result a number of substances have positively been recognized and identified in the water at Prince Albert and certain of these substances may be the ones contributing to the difficulty.

In addition to the specific action which was proposed, I thought it desirable to communicate with the minister of health respecting the measures his government proposed to initiate to rectify the present situation, as well as those involving the general problem of the overloading of the North Saskatchewan river by the discharge of industrial and other wastes.

Under date of February 22, I received from the minister of health a reply to my telegram, in which he outlined the steps which his government had originally taken to prevent the development of this situation and he indicated the progress being made through the technical assistance which had been given and of his hope for an early solution.

He moreover advised that, in default of an immediate solution, the provincial authorities would be prepared to take steps to see that all suspected wastes were diverted into a pond or ravine for subsequent disposal, when this could be done without danger of a recurrence of the present situation.

Action has accordingly been taken in this connection as was announced by the authorities of the province of Alberta on February 25.

I am sure that the house will recognize that the problem is one of great complexity, that its solution is not a simple one, and that the federal government has done everything possible to assist in finding a solution.

The government will continue to assist the responsible authorities in every way that it can, through the provision of technical personnel and facilities, until a solution is found and measures can be adopted which will provide some satisfactory basis for control to avoid further pollution of the waters and consequent distress to the communities that are dependent upon it.

CANNED POULTRY IMPORTS

Mr. MacLean:

What was the amount of canned poultry or game (tariff item 8f) imported during the last quarter of 1953 from the United States of America into (a) Prince Edward Island; (b) Nova Scotia; (c) New Brunswick; (d) all of Canada?

Mr. Dickey:

Canadian imports of canned poultry and game (tariff item 8f) are not separately classified but are included in a general item which reads:—"Canned meats (except beef), poultry and game".

The imports from the United States under this general item entered for consumption in the maritime provinces and total for all Canada, during the period October 1 to December 31, 1953, were as follows:—

Province	Lbs.	Value
Nova Scotia	2,093	$ 798
Prince Edward Island	—	—
New Brunswick	652	309
Total Canada	635,513	$260,830

R.C.M.P. BADGE AND ARMORIAL BEARINGS

Mr. Adamson:

1. Have the official badge and armorial bearings of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police been altered recently?
2. If so, for what reason was the change made?
3. Who authorized the change?
4. Was it approved by the competent heraldic authority?
5. If so, by whom was it approved?
6. What is the nature and description of the alterations made?
7. When did the new design become official?

Mr. Garson:

1. The official badge has been altered.
2. To correct errors in the design.
3. Redesign of badge arranged by the commissioner, R. C. M. Police, approval granted by order in council P.C. 1954-27/256.
4. Yes.
5. The Hon. Sir George Bellew, K.C.V.O., Garter Principal King of Arms.
6. The representation of the St. Edward's crown replaced the Tudor crown. The bison was redrawn to provide a more lifelike looking head. The scroll surrounding "Maintiens le Droit" replaced the buckled garter. The maple leaves were redesigned and brought closer together.
7. February 25, 1954.

HAROLD C. BANKS

Mr. Fulton:

1. Has Mr. Harold C. Banks given notice of intention to apply for Canadian citizenship?
2. If so, when was such notice filed?
3. Has Mr. Banks been granted Canadian citizenship?
4. If so, when?

Mr. Harris:

1. No.
2. See answer to No. 1.
3. No.
4. See answer to No. 3.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

UNEMPLOYED IN SASKATCHEWAN CITIES

Mr. Knight:

1. What are the numbers of unemployed persons registered at Regina, Saskatoon, Moose Jaw and Prince Albert, as at February 1, 1954?

2. How many employees have been laid off by the Canadian National Railways at Saskatoon since November 1, 1953?

DEPUTY MINISTERS AND OTHERS LEAVING PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. MacInnis:

1. How many deputy ministers have left the service of the government of Canada to take positions with private employers, since January 1, 1951 to date?

2. How many civil servants, other than deputy ministers, in the salary range of $12,000 and over have left the service of the government of Canada to take positions with private employers since January 1, 1951 to date?

Mr. Pickersgill: I spoke to the hon. member about this question and pointed out that the government would have no official record of what positions in private employment were taken by officials who had retired from the public service. He agreed to have the question read instead: "How many deputy ministers have left the service of the government of Canada except by retirement?" and to put the same phrase in the next part of the question. If that is understood, I would ask to have it made an order for return.

MARITIME PROVINCES—CANNED CHICKEN IMPORTS

Mr. MacLean:

1. Has the attention of the Department of Agriculture been directed to the alleged importing into the maritime provinces of American canned chicken which, if it were a Canadian product, would not conform to the regulations set out under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, relating to container size and type of label?

2. Has any action been taken to require imported canned chicken and other agricultural products to be of the same standard as similar products produced in Canada?

CANADIAN INDUSTRIES LIMITED

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the attention of the government been drawn to the proposed division of Canadian Industries Limited into two companies, one to be known as Canadian Industries (1954) Limited, and the other to be known as Du Pont of Canada Limited, following a court decision in the United States?

2. Has the government any information as to the products to be manufactured by each of the proposed new companies? If so, what are such products?

3. Has the combines investigation branch examined the basis of the proposed division to ascertain whether either of the new companies is being given monopolistic controls over particular products contrary to the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act?

4. If so, what findings have resulted from such examination?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BRITISH EMPIRE GAMES—BROADCASTING

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of the contract between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the British Empire games committee for the radio broadcasting rights for the British Empire games to be held in Vancouver in 1954, together with a copy of any correspondence or telegrams that have passed between private broadcasting companies and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation relative to the rights of private radio stations to broadcast during the games.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, I shall have to oppose this motion on the ground that the correspondence between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the private broadcasting stations has to do with the internal management of the corporation and is not ordinarily produced on a motion such as the present one. We have no objection, however, to producing a copy of the contract between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the British Empire games committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I feel that I am entitled to this information and that it is not a matter of internal management. I would ask you to call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Regier:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, memoranda and other documents exchanged since January 1, 1952, between the government of Canada and the Squamish board of trade, Mr. Gordon Gibson, the government of British Columbia, and/or any other individuals or organizations, in relation to Garibaldi park.

Mr. Sinclair: This is subject to the usual reservation as to consent of the provincial government concerning any correspondence with that government.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed to, subject to the statement by the minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR ADOPTED CHILDREN, CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Pension Act to make provision for the payment of additional pension for legally adopted children; to extend the benefits of the act in certain other cases; to provide that the salaries of the chairman, deputy chairman and commissioners shall be fixed by the governor in council; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

WHEAT

INDIA'S FAILURE TO TAKE UP QUOTA—EFFECT ON CANADA'S POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister give the house any information regarding the effect on the continuance of the international wheat agreement of the announcement by India that it is not their intention to take up their quota under the agreement this year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I believe the reason for the announcement, Mr. Speaker, is that India had an unusually large crop and they are not importers of wheat in the current year. I know they have been undecided as to whether or not they would take up the quota. An officer of the department returned from there a few days ago and said the reason that they were not signing the agreement was that they were not importers of wheat this year. There is no other implication.

REPORTED SALE OF 250,000 TONS BY RUSSIA TO BRAZIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Might I ask the minister a question along these same lines? Has the minister any comment to make on the statement in the Christian Science Monitor of Saturday last that Brazil has entered into a contract with Russia for the purchase of 250,000 tons of wheat? Does that affect any existing arrangement with Canada?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): A week or two ago, Mr. Speaker, Canada sold 200,000 tons of wheat to Brazil. I have no knowledge of a sale of wheat to Brazil by Russia, and I would think it doubtful whether the statement referred to by the hon. member is correct. If it is, such a sale has nothing to do with Canada.

POST OFFICE

LETTER CARRIERS—CHANGE IN BASIS FOR ANNUAL HOLIDAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General arising out of his announcement on Friday concerning the rotation plan for letter carriers. Has it been decided to alter the long-standing practice of the annual holidays of letter carriers being arranged on the basis of seniority? In view of protests from letter carriers' associations against this decision, will it be reconsidered?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): I must thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. The answer is that seniority will still prevail, but it will have to be modified to take care of new problems brought about by rotation of carriers. We have received no protests from letter carriers' associations, but when any are received we always take them into account. However, the matter has to be settled in the interests of the public as well as the individual.

BASE METALS

PROPOSED IMPOSITION OF TARIFF BY UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the light of reports from Washington that there is a movement under way in congress to raise a tariff against Canadian base metals, if the Canadian government has taken any steps to assert the view of the Canadian government through the Department of State in Washington?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The Canadian government does not interfere with the work of congress. We have made our views about tariffs on metals clear to the administration, but it is not the policy of the government to interfere with the workings of congress, just as it is not, I hope, the policy of the government at Washington to interfere with the workings of this parliament.

Mr. Fleming: I asked simply if the Canadian government had communicated its views on this matter to the Department of State at Washington, which I understand is the proper place for such views to be communicated to.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The answer is yes.

BEEF

INQUIRY AS TO SPREAD IN PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the fact that prime beef is selling at a maximum of $16.75 per hundred at the stockyards? If so, can the minister state why the price of steak in the butcher shops ranges from 59 cents to 69 cents per pound, and a T-bone steak in the dining car costs $4.25?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is not possible, of course, for the department to check all the butcher shops in Canada, but we did very recently make a check in Toronto. That check is connected with the relationship between the price of beef in Toronto and the price of cattle. The check shows both have followed very much the same course. That is, when the price of cattle has gone down, the price of beef has gone down, as a rule; and when the price of cattle has gone up the price of beef has gone up.

Mr. Fulton: And vice versa.

BRIDGES

PEMBROKE-ALLUMETTE ISLAND—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. Would he care to comment on the statement made last Friday by the premier of Quebec relating to the prospective construction of a bridge linking Pembroke, Ontario, and Allumette island, Quebec?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the only comment I can make is that, although I had not received any reply to my letters written to the appropriate ministers in the province of Quebec, asking permission to table correspondence, Mr. Duplessis did apparently say, as reported in the press, that he had no objection to the tabling of such correspondence. And the house will recall that earlier today my parliamentary assistant did table the correspondence.

[Later:]

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works, supplementary to that of the hon. member for Chicoutimi. I wonder if the minister would care to comment on the press report which indicates that the prime minister of Quebec—

An hon. Member: Premier.

Mr. Balcer: —was reported as saying that he had not received a communication from the minister.

Mr. Winters: It is difficult to comment on what the premier of Quebec is reported to have said. But it is a fact that my correspondence was dispatched not to the premier of Quebec but to his appropriate ministers. And I have knowledge from Canadian National Telegraphs that the telegram I dispatched on February 16 to Mr. Lorrain was delivered.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Public Works. May we take it from the answer he has given that from now on the government will believe everything it reads in the newspapers?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INTER-AMERICAN CONFERENCE—REPRESENTATION BY CANADIAN OBSERVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is in connection with a meeting of the inter-American conference convening today at Caracas. Did Canada receive an invitation to that meeting, although not a member of the organization, and is Canada represented either officially or unofficially as an observer there?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer to the first question is no. That covers the second.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Through an inadvertence, I am sure, the Secretary of State for External Affairs failed to say whether or not there was an invitation. Was there any unofficial representation at this conference, either as an observer or otherwise? I think the minister just omitted to answer that.

Mr. Pearson: Well, I do not know of any invitation, unofficial or otherwise, for Canadian representation at the inter-American conference opening at Caracas today. However, I shall be glad to look into the matter and see if any suggestions were made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Were there any observers there?

Mr. Pearson: There is no Canadian observer at the conference.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

LAND SURVEYS—KIPLING, SASK.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works a question. On February 11 I had a question passed as an order for return. I wonder when I may receive an answer to that question.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I will look into it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO HON. MEMBERS FOR WELLINGTON SOUTH AND KOOTENAY WEST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. We have a double thrill today in welcoming back two hon. members who pretty nearly crossed the river Jordan and went on up. We welcome them back. These are the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hosking) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). The mellowing influence of both these members is needed in their corners.

SUPPLY

UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION FOR EXAMINATION BY COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Green.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this is the beginning of the sixth day of this debate. I think if there had been a proper sense of urgency on the part of the government as to the importance of this debate it would not have lasted for even six minutes; because I see no reason whatsoever why the government should not have accepted the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I think the only reason is that the government, in its, shall I say, arrogance, does not like to admit that any wisdom or knowledge can come from any quarter in the house except from themselves.

The attitude throughout has been, "Father knows best; leave everything to us". I want to read from the amendment to show exactly what it asks. It did not ask for any panic action. It did not suggest that it knew the answer. What it said was this:

> . . . that a select committee should be appointed immediately for the purpose of examining into and reporting upon the actual unemployment situation throughout Canada and for the purpose of making recommendations to this house as to short-term and long-term methods for dealing effectively with this problem.

As I say, no blue ruin attitude was taken by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra; there was no suggestion about any "catastrophe" or any "chaos". It was a sensible suggestion that this thing should be looked into. And what have we got from the government? We have nothing but "Wait and see". I say that it did not seem to have any sense of urgency whatever; but I do suggest that there is a feeling of urgency and of great urgency on the part of those who are unemployed. They will find no counterpart to that attitude here; and I feel sure that those people would think it reasonable to examine into and report upon the actual unemployment situation.

Certainly it is not because the facts are clear that nothing needs to be inquired into. The labour people have suggested—they have stated—that there are more than 500,000 unemployed; but from the government we have nothing but a babble of voices. The figures used by the different ministers have differed, not merely by thousands, not merely even by tens of thousands, but by hundreds of thousands. We have seen what could be described as "confusion worse confounded". The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Acting Prime Minister, was frank in the remarks he made about unemployment to the textile and agricultural implement workers. But when we come to the actual figures used by the ministers, as I say, we find confusion. There must be scores of economists in the various departments who prepare those figures; but one can only assume, because we believe they are competent men, that the government has so bedevilled the situation with a variety of views and a variety of approaches to the facts that, as I say, all kinds of figures are given to us.

Again I ask, what is the objection to this inquiry? No sensible objection that I have heard has been raised. On the face of it, it seems sensible. The government in effect say, "Let the situation develop; let us have time". Well, there is a standing committee available, and why on earth should it not be allowed to tackle this problem? No; to allow a committee would apparently involve a most damaging admission. It would involve the admission that the government is not omniscient, and that possible useful suggestions could arise from elsewhere. The reasoning apparently goes like this.

The government is omniscient.

To create a committee would be to admit that the government is not omniscient.

Therefore we must not have a committee.

I want to emphasize the fact that the resolution was moved in moderate terms, and that the words "doom" and "gloom", which I see they use in the United States, have not been used in our debate. I now want to look in more detail at the various complicated figures which we got from various members of the government. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), whose appetite for facts is keener than that of some of the other ministers who spoke, gave us these figures of January 23, at page 2085 of Hansard:

> It is estimated that at January 23, 357,000 people worked fewer than 35 hours; another 139,000 had jobs but did no work during the survey week, owing to temporary lay-offs, illness, labour disputes, bad weather and a number of other miscellaneous reasons; while there were 280,000 persons who were, to quote the phrase of the dominion bureau of statistics, "without jobs and seeking work".

Now, the minister gave us those figures but did not seem to have very much to say as to what was to follow from them. He did not think the time had come for an excursion into public works. He suggested that fiscal and monetary policies, which would come from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), might deal with the situation, and accordingly we asked the Minister of Finance what he had to say about it, and at page 2026 of Hansard the minister said in part:

> If economic activity declines, the government is in a position to take stronger action in these and other directions, but I should like to emphasize that as I and my colleagues view the present situation there is no justification for stronger action and I have a high degree of confidence that when our winter season of normally reduced activity is passed, economic activity in Canada is likely to resume its upward trend at a satisfactory rate.

Well, there is not much sense of urgency there, Mr. Speaker. We also have a reference from the Minister of Finance in an interview that he had with some of the labour people. It is reported in the Montreal Gazette of February 12, and here are the minister's words in quotation marks:

"While we should not bury our heads in the sand and say everything is fine", Mr. Abbott declared, "we should be careful and not paint too gloomy a picture, because I do not think it is justified."

"The plans of people with regard to business can be affected by too much talk of rising unemployment and a possible recession". "I think we should be a little careful about taking too gloomy a view about the prospects."

T.L.C. president Bengough said: "I think there are 580,000 out of work. The situation is serious."

Mr. Abbott replied: "I would not say the situation is serious. I would say it is unpleasant. There certainly is higher unemployment than we would like to see."

You will see, Mr. Speaker, that he was certainly not taking it too seriously; indeed his cheerful attitude almost reminded us of the minister on budget night announcing a large unexpected surplus and referring to "buoyant" revenues.

Now we come to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and I wish to read some comments which he made on the situation because he outlined it in what I think were very sensible terms. The minister described the business situation in what I think were well considered terms. He said, as reported at page 2104 of Hansard:

Toward the latter part of 1953 those indicators which gauged the over-all level of activity in the economy began to level off, and in a few cases have declined slightly. This change in trend reflects largely a reduction in the pressure of demand rather than any decline in over-all volume. In other words requirements, which in the past two or three years have been mounting rapidly, are now simply not expanding at the same rate. This applies to expenditures for defence and for other government requirements, . . .

And later on I read:

This levelling off in demand, taken in conjunction with the moderate decline in activity in the United States' economy, has brought a change in the tempo of business activity in Canada. This type of situation is invariably accompanied by a hesitancy on the part of business in placing orders, more hand-to-mouth buying, and a tendency to reduce inventories. This causes a temporary slow-down in the pace of business which in the present instance has coincided with the seasonally slack period in the economy.

And finally:

Such a situation admittedly gives rise to a good deal of anxiety and, I think, has been prematurely interpreted by many as the beginning of a recessionary trend.

Now, having used these words of moderation and warning, the minister rollicked off to tell us about the billions which he so loves to speak about, and of course billions are important.

His equanimity was considerably assisted by using figures that were very much below those of the Minister of Labour. The only figure which agreed with those of the Minister of Labour was 280,000 "without jobs and seeking work". Instead of 357,000 people who, according to the Minister of Labour, "worked fewer than 35 hours", we heard from the Acting Prime Minister that 65,000 persons were "on short time", or were "laid off for part of the week". Instead of 139,000 who, according to the Minister of Labour, "had jobs but did no work during the survey week", the Minister of Trade and Commerce mentioned 24,000 who "for the full week in question were temporarily laid off".

Moreover, after drastically reducing the numbers, the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out that they should not be added up. The minister is much better at subtraction than he is at addition, apparently. For the rest of his speech the minister found it convenient to refer to the 280,000, ignoring those who had worked fewer than 35 hours a week and also those who during the week of the inquiry were out of work. I suggest that it makes an awful lot of difference whether a man is working 34 hours and 59 minutes or 20 hours, or whether he is working 15 hours or 5 hours, but apparently those considerations were ignored.

Now, the minister's carelessness in that may have been partly due to an explanation that he gave us in regard to the figure of unemployed. He told us about some of those on the list who apparently, as far as I can make out from the explanation of the minister, just put their names down, as you might say, just for the hell of it, or not very seriously.

I think we could call this a real star turn and I should think that it would be of great encouragement to all the poor fellows who are out of work. The reference is to people who go on the lists for special reasons, and particularly to the woods workers in the minister's area. He said, and I quote from page 2106 of Hansard of February 15:

When the cutting is finished the men return to town, and most of them go back to the little farms they have in the vicinity of Port Arthur. Before doing so, however, they stop at the employment office, register as unemployed, and request their unemployment benefits. It is quite proper that they should do so. Then when the drive comes on in the early spring, when the rivers start to open, they return to the forest and take care of the hauling and driving of the timber down the river.

And again:

That has been their program, and it has been going on for a good many years.

In that way, apparently the minister comforts himself. He then comes to the bedtime story of the man we might refer to as the rich unemployed, and I quote again from page 2106:

I recall an incident that occurred when I was there about a year ago. A man I knew from my construction days approached me and said that he had just arrived in town from a lumber camp. He wanted to know if I knew where he could get a job. I said, "Do you really want a job?" He said, "I will take a job." I said, "Have you registered for unemployment insurance?" He said, "No; do you think I would stand in line for $24 a week?" That was his attitude. I said, "How much money have you in your pocket?" I will not name the sum, but it was such as to lead me to believe that he was not very anxious to get employment. That situation applies in many parts of Canada. It applies to a good many jobs that are seasonal and always have been seasonal.

I am sure that that gave comfort to the minister and I suppose it will give comfort to the unemployed. I suggest to the minister that he have that part of his speech printed and sent to all the unemployed. I think it would offer great encouragement to them and stimulate them perhaps to get into the same class themselves.

While I am dealing with the question of figures I will refer to the remarks of the senior hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey). He solved the problem of the figures even more easily than the minister because he ignored all except the 280,000. He had no interest in the 357,000 who are working less than 35 hours a week and the 139,000 who apparently are out of work. His conclusions are very simple and entirely in line with my suggestion. He really just told the rest of us to be good little boys and leave everything to the government and everything will be well. I quote what the hon. member said as reported on page 2177 of Hansard of February 17:

All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that it is my impression that few people have learned the lessons of their experience and know better how to apply them than the Acting Prime Minister in this house.

I should not omit to say that a little earlier in his speech he referred also to the Acting Prime Minister and to an address which he had made some years ago at Dalhousie University. I think it would be suitable also to refer to the eulogy which came also from the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). The hon. member for Fort William does not like to let the sun set without having said something eulogistic about the Acting Prime Minister. That is very nice too, and I do not see why anyone should object. I continue reading from what the hon. member for Halifax said:

I can assure the hon. member that it does not require his suggestion to have the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his colleagues apply to the solution of this problem and the other serious problems that from time to time face the people of Canada and the government of Canada the experiences and the knowledge and the abilities that they have found from their long and useful life in this country in many fields, and not the least their contribution to the public life of this country as members of the government.

I am sure that the minister welcomed what he had to say. As I listened to the debate; as I listened to the way the numbers of unemployed were being whittled down, 10,000 here, 100,000 there; as I listened to the rising tide of eulogies on the government, and particularly on the Acting Prime Minister; it seemed to me that as I looked the unemployed faded away more and more into the distance and the figure of the Acting Prime Minister rose almost with a halo around it. It occurred to me that the title of the debate might be, "To the glory of Howe and in memory of the unemployed."

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Carefully thought out.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am sure the minister would not expect me to be unfair in any way, and it would be very unfair not to point out that he did make a constructive suggestion. It is to that that I wish now to refer. I think it is an original suggestion.

Far be it from me to set myself up as an economist, but I have often talked to economists and near-economists. The suggestion, to be found on page 2106 of Hansard, has the merit of originality and perhaps may have some effect upon the speech to which we will be listening in some weeks by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). It seems to suggest that there is a very simple way to deal with the unemployed, and that is to keep taxes higher and higher. I quote from page 2106 as follows:

We have been reminded that our government expenditures are high. Again they are high because the government foresaw that this would be a difficult year.

It is all there, you see, Mr. Speaker. Everything is foreseen. It is wonderful, really.

The transition from a seller's market to a buyer's market is always difficult. Certainly the worst way in which to meet a transition of that kind is to curtail government investment. That is the old theory that did not work so well back in 1931, that when things get tough the government should stop spending and start squeezing its pocketbook.

I was surprised at comparing 1954 with 1931. I thought hon. members opposite had always thought that such a comparison should not be made.

That is not the time to cut government spending. There were important investments that the government needed to make and, in the light of the general situation, it was decided that this would be a year to loosen the purse strings and step up our public works program, now that military construction is less active. That has been the policy of the government for 1954.

As I say, I had thought that if there was one thing on which there was widespread agreement it was that when there is a business slackening off the best way to stimulate or ginger it up is to reduce taxes. I thought that that was almost universally agreed. I am not overlooking the fact that the minister used the word "investment". I am not suggesting that there is no such thing as sound government investment, but the words that are used seem to me to introduce the most extreme fallacy at a time when we are being warned on all sides that we are becoming a high-cost economy. I should like to quote briefly from one or two statements to show that the minister's view is, I think, not widely held. At the annual meeting of the Royal Bank of Canada the president had this to say:

> I felt obliged last year to voice some doubts about the permanence of a prosperity built so largely on the "treacherous sands of consumer credit."
> Everybody wishes to avoid the evils of recession and at the same time to avoid the risk of further inflation. It seems clear therefore that we must depend more largely on the other two methods of stimulating and sustaining demand, namely, tax reductions and price reductions.

Then there is a voice from the United States. The New York Times recently said:

> The administration had two powerful anti-recession weapons at its disposal, easy money and tax reduction incentives. Few will disagree either in Wall street or Main street that tax reduction probably would be the more effective at this junction.

Without entirely dismissing the idea of government investment, surely if one thing is clear beyond others it is that taxes put up costs and impede exports. There is an interesting comment on this in an article by E. C. Ertl in the current Financial Times as follows:

> We have wilfully, or through default of leadership, given in to every pressure that was leading to higher costs.

And again:

> We have, in fact, insisted that the foreign buyer whose need for our products was great indeed, would subsidize our high standard of living, by charging him prices he could afford to pay just that long.
> To the extent to which his productive capacity has grown again, to that extent does he now refuse to buy from us.

Those are serious words which we should all ponder. It has been demonstrated in this house again and again that taxes do and indeed must put up costs. When we anxiously consider our foreign trade I rather think it will astonish the great bulk of thoughtful people in the business world that the minister should state the reason for which high taxes will remain. But I think we can all imagine that there is one place where the news will be good and where it will be well received. Can you not imagine, Mr. Speaker, when the various departments—which the Minister of Finance assures us and, I am sure, sincerely, that he is trying to keep down to the lowest penny—read these words, the joy with which they will be received. The Acting Prime Minister said, "The worst way in which to meet a transition is to curtail government investment" and, further down, "it was decided that this would be a year to loosen the purse strings".

I can imagine that those words would be received with great enthusiasm throughout all the departments and that the news would percolate like a great fructifying flood to all the people whose requests have been turned down by the Minister of Finance. What a fortunate thing it is for all these people that the supplementary estimates are still available. At any rate, it is nice to think that there will be some people who will be in favour of what the minister says. Incidentally, when we remember that in spite of the lowering of defence expenditures our over-all expenditures are up, we can assume that that attitude has already had its effect throughout the departments.

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, while as I have argued there is no sense of urgency here, events outside are not standing still. There are disquieting reports, which we get in increasing numbers, of Canadian industries that are feeling the pinch here and there; of Canadian companies, controlled in the United States, which are being by-passed by the parent company which can sell its product cheaper in Canada than can the Canadian subsidiary of American companies which are excluding Canadian subsidiaries from the export trade.

As the minister said in his words that I read a while ago, it is a situation which gives rise to a good deal of anxiety. Of course, the fact that there is great anxiety in the United States undoubtedly adds to that feeling. This is the 1st of March. We are beginning a month which is supposed to be the deadline month in the United States. The President has told them that if things were not improving by March, the government would have to step in with more vigorous action.

One of the troubles is that we get optimistic opinions from two quarters that do not amount to much—of course I am referring now to people outside of this house—one group who speak out of the fulness of their ignorance, and others who are well informed but who nevertheless feel that they must not use any but optimistic words lest they actually worsen the situation. Our socialist brethren have offered us their old nostrums. I can only suggest to them that if they will study what is going on in England I think they will find that their English colleagues have turned up their noses already at some of the cure-alls that they were worshipping years ago.

I come back to our resolution, and I stress again the moderation of its terms. I suggest that it would be the most natural thing in the world to adopt it because what the government is saying is this, and I do not criticize them for saying it. They are saying, "Wait and see". That can go a little longer; not much longer but a little bit longer. What on earth would be more natural in that period of waiting and seeing than to do what this resolution calls for? I stress again that the resolution is in moderate terms. It merely suggests in effect that two heads are better than one or that three or four heads are better than one.

Any man of common sense knows that a great deal of inquiry is necessary. The only question is whether the government should make it a party matter, and no reason that appeals to me has been given for that procedure. I shall therefore vote for the amendment.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the hon. member for Greenwood with a great deal of interest. He quite naturally argued in support of the Conservative amendment that the subject of unemployment should be referred to a committee of this house. I am in favour of the amendment. But when the hon. member came to make practical suggestions as to what might be done about unemployment, he seemed to have just one and that was a reduction in taxes. I suggest that is the kind of suggestion that would get almost unanimous support from the people of Canada.

Mr. Martin: He said the same as did the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher). They made identical speeches.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order.

Mr. Argue: I am not making a speech for the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre or for the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). I am not making one either for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). I will endeavour to make my own. I say that the idea of tax reduction may be something that would have almost unanimous support across the country. But before I myself went along with the suggestion now made that taxes should be reduced in the coming budget, I would ask "Whose taxes?" If it is a reduction of taxes of big business, if it is a repetition of reduction in taxes on the wealthy, as we had in last year's budget, then I would not be in favour of such a tax reduction. If it was a reduction in taxes for the mass of the Canadian people who will go out and spend the extra income they receive through a reduction in taxes, then of course I should support such a reduction.

The hon. member for Greenwood quoted another statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Speaking in this debate, as reported at page 2106 of Hansard, the minister said:

> . . . it was decided that this would be a year to loosen the purse strings and step up our public works program, now that military construction is less active.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce said, "This is a year to loosen the purse strings". That is all he said. He did not say how the purse strings were going to be loosened. He did not say in what way government expenditures would be stepped up. The most disturbing thing that has come out of this debate, to my mind, is not really whether one set of figures about the number of unemployed is correct or whether another set of figures is correct but the fact that, as the debate has gone on, it has become more and more clear that the government has no policy with which to deal with unemployment. If unemployment should correct itself when spring comes, it is just good luck as far as the government is concerned. But if unemployment should continue—as there is every sign it will—then the government has not yet told parliament and the people of Canada what it would do as a government to alleviate such unemployment. Back in 1945 after the war a white paper was issued by the government. In it the government set forth the proposals it was making to deal with any possible unemployment that might arise. There was to be a large shelf of public works and as unemployment appeared some of those public works were to be taken off the shelf and be put into operation. This debate has continued for two full weeks and we have heard nothing of the shelf of projects to deal with unemployment that was talked of in 1945. Apparently the idea of this government proceeding with public works on a vast scale as a method of dealing with unemployment and correcting unemployment has long been abandoned.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What about the $300 million worth of public works projects contained in the estimates? Is that not a substantial sum?

Mr. Argue: From the point of view of dealing with the present unemployment situation, I would say no. When there are half a million Canadians out of work $300 million worth of projects will not accomplish the job of re-employment, and I think the minister agrees with that statement. The public works projects listed in the estimates will not correct the unemployment situation prevailing at the present time. A government publication that came to my mail box contains some interesting figures. The minister said in this debate on February 15 that there would be an increase in capital investment of 3 per cent in 1954 over 1953. On reviewing last year's budget I find that at page 14 of the appendix the statement is made that in 1952 capital expenditures increased in real terms by an estimated 8 per cent over 1951. Capital expenditures in 1952 increased by 8 per cent over 1951 in real terms whereas the forecast that is now being made is that capital expenditures will increase by 3 per cent.

When one considers that the population of Canada has recently been increasing by 2½ per cent per year and when one takes into account the added fact that technological improvements each year must put a certain number of individuals out of employment—that is the way we increase our standard of living, by letting a certain number of individuals go into other employment—it is perfectly clear that there must be something more than a 3 per cent increase in capital expenditures if the unemployment problem is to be solved. I have listened to debates in parliament in the past, when some members on the government side have attempted to drive a wedge between farmers and labour. At home in our constituencies and our own provinces we have always had to deal with some who would like to split the farm and trade union movement. I want to pay tribute today to the trade union movement as represented by the delegations from the united automobile workers that have come to Ottawa in recent days to present briefs to the government. These trade union people have demonstrated that their welfare is bound up with that of the farmers.

The farm implement workers, in what I believe to be one of the best briefs ever presented to a government, set forth the problem of unemployment and the reasons therefor in the farm implement industry. They also set forth their proposed solutions to correct such unemployment. In their opinion the main cause of unemployment in the farm implement industry is falling farm income. If the government wants to do something about correcting unemployment in the farm implement industry, all it has to do is to provide agriculture in Canada with some stability, and within six months there will be no unemployment in the farm implement industry. I would even make a more precise statement. If the government will guarantee that western farmers will be able to sell all their wheat at a reasonable price, then the western farmers will buy sufficient agricultural machinery in the next twelve months to put all the unemployed in the farm implement industry back to work.

But of course this government has no policy that will stabilize agricultural income in the coming year any more than it has a policy to stabilize employment and correct existing unemployment. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has recognized in the past at any rate that falling farm income can mean a serious economic recession. As long ago as October 28, 1952, he pointed out, when addressing the junior investment dealers association of Canada in Toronto, that Canada's experience in 1929 was that falling farm prices foreshadowed the oncoming depression. I say that unless the government takes steps soon to correct the drastic declines in farm prices we are going to have a far greater recession than exists at the present time.

In 1952 farm income in Canada fell by 11 per cent. The official figures are not yet have fallen again. We do not have to be any available, but net farm income in 1953 will farther into the year 1954 than we are right now to see the handwriting on the wall so far as agricultural income in the present year is concerned. Talk about falling prices being an indication of what is in store for the Canadian economy! Then look at the price of wheat. Since the first of August the price of wheat has fallen by almost 25 cents a bushel, not a few cents but 25 cents a bushel, and it is still going down. The price of barley is even worse. Farmers obtained for 1951 barley $1.21 per bushel basis No. 1 feed Fort William-Port Arthur. In 1952 the price dropped to $1.13, and from the price of $1.13 a bushel for barley paid to farmers in 1952 the price has dropped another 25 cents a bushel to 88 cents today and that is the Canadian wheat board's selling price from which handling expenses are deducted. What does that mean? It means that with these prices the barley producer will be going out of business. There cannot be an interim or final payment for barley. The price of wheat is down and is continuing to fall. The price of barley is away down. This afternoon the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough) directed a question to the government with respect to the price of beef. He pointed out that the top price for choice steers at Toronto now is $16.75 a hundredweight. That is a drop of three or four dollars a hundredweight in the last few weeks.

Unless the government does something soon to correct the drastic decline in farm income, unemployment in Canada is going to become much worse. We have been warning the government ever since the end of the war in 1945 that it was not in the best interests of the Canadian economy to tie completely our trade to the United States market. But the government paid no attention to our statements that we should maintain the United Kingdom market. Because of government policy we have come to depend more and more on the United States market for our exports. It was pointed out by the farm implement workers in their brief that one of the chief causes of unemployment in that industry today is the fact that 51 per cent of our exports of agricultural machinery have been dependent on the United States market. That market is highly competitive. The United States produces the same type of agricultural machinery that we produce in Canada, and the United States is usually the first nation to institute trade restrictions when competition becomes keen. Right now we are losing the British market for many products, and the result of such loss in that market is shown in our unemployment statistics. The income obtained from the British market for Canadian agricultural products was $35·9 million in 1952, and this dropped to $18·6 million in 1953, a drop of almost 50 per cent.

I criticized the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) for not having advanced some plans as to what the government might do in order to deal with the present unemployment situation. I agree with the inference in the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that this year the government should loosen the public purse strings. It is time now to start on a comprehensive program of public works. I believe one of the best ways by which the government could promote public works would be to assist in the building of adequate roads, an adequate highway transportation system for all Canadians. Today the cost of building roads is a severe burden on provincial budgets and local municipal governments, particularly the budgets of rural municipal governments. The cost of road construction has been going up each year since the end of the war. The tax field of the rural municipality is extremely limited since it is confined to a tax on real property. Taxes on real property, both urban and rural, are today almost at the saturation point.

As far back as 1912 the federal government of the United States started assisting the various states and counties in a road building program. The federal government of Canada has supported a plan for the trans-Canada highway, but I suggest that the government, now that unemployment has reached a total of 500,000, should consider assisting the municipalities by providing grants for the building of market roads. If the government would undertake such grants, I am sure that municipalities generally across this dominion would be prepared to use those grants and thus help correct the severe unemployment problem that is with us now.

Some people have always said, well it is all right to advocate spending money but where are you going to get all the money that is necessary for such a proposal? I say it is not a question of how much money it will cost; it is not a question basically of where we shall get the money. The question is this: Does Canada now have resources that are not being fully utilized? I say the answer is yes, we have a half a million unemployed and we have all the basic raw materials that are necessary for an adequate road and highway system. I suggest that the time has now come when our federal government should be giving greater leadership and more financial assistance to the building of roads. A system of road grants should be inaugurated to enable municipalities to undertake an adequate system of roads. If such were now undertaken in Canada we would be just forty years behind the United States in starting such a road program.

I believe the government should consider also the proposition that has been frequently advanced in this house by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), namely, that there should be federal grants for education. In the brief presented by the UAW—CIO—CCL, it is stated that Canada needs thousands of elementary school classrooms. The brief points out that with Canada's rapidly growing population we now have 63 per cent more children of public school age than we had some ten years ago. I believe the federal government should promote the construction of adequate schools as a further means of dealing with the serious unemployment problem we now have.

For years now I have advocated the expansion of one field of social security, namely, an increase in the family allowances. If family allowances in Canada were increased, there would be an immediate increased demand for Canadian textiles and food, both of which are in surplus supply now. And further, I should like to see the government adopt an adequate and farsighted program to assist agriculture. In advocating such a program I do not think I could put the need for such a program more clearly than it is set forth in the brief presented by the UAW. On page 10, it says:

> The impressive and productive efforts of Canadian farmers to assure Canada abundance of food and fibre should not be rewarded by depressing the living standards of the people who work the land. A full employment program must assure full equity to the farmer in exchanging the things he grows for the things he buys, and include national policies to restore the overseas markets that Canadian farmers have lost since the end of world war II. The 1929 depression proved beyond doubt that the prosperity of industrial workers and the prosperity of farmers are inseparably tied together. Canadian farmers need more tractors, trucks, combines and other agricultural implements which our agricultural implement industry is capable of producing, but our farmers either cannot afford or are not now buying this equipment because of their fear and uncertainty about their economic future.

Here is a document, Mr. Speaker, presented by one of Canada's largest unions, a document that I say might have been drafted by some of our foremost agricultural organizations. In Canada today the farmer and the labourer are coming closer and closer together. The worker realizes that his only chance to obtain a high wage is when the farmer is getting high prices for the commodities he has to sell. Conversely, the only way for the farmer to get high prices for the food products he produces is for the industrial worker to get high wages.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce left me absolutely cold when I heard him say, to the farm implement industry representatives, that wages in the farm implement industry had gone so high that the industry had priced itself out of the market. He said, "I suggest that you find employment elsewhere"—and he described that as being the cold-blooded fact.

I do not think it is a case of high wages pushing up farm machinery prices at all. It is a case of high profits, skyrocketing profits, pushing up farm machinery prices. I would refer the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the brief, at page 5, where it lists increases in profits in the farm implement industry in Canada from 1946 to 1951 and points out that they increased by 223·6 per cent, while the increase in wages during the same period was only 107·1 per cent. The farm implement industry profits far outdistanced the increase in wages of farm implement workers. And if we want employment in the farm implement industry, then the thing to do is not to say to the farm implement workers who are unemployed, "Go to some other place and try to get work somewhere else, so as to bring down the level of wages by competition." That is not the way to solve unemployment in the farm implement industry.

I say the way to solve unemployment in the farm implement industry is to give our agricultural producers a guarantee that they are going to receive reasonable prices for farm products over the next few years. Assure them that the government is not going to let the bottom drop out of farm prices. If our agricultural industry is given that assurance, then the farmers will buy farm machinery. I have not seen a farmer yet who would prefer to drive a tractor 30 years old, if he could have a new one. I have not yet seen a farmer who prefers to stand out on the side of the road and prime the vacuum tank of an old 1927 Chevrolet truck while one of his neighbours drives by at 50 miles an hour in a 1953 or 1954 model.

All the government has to do, to see that increased purchases are made of farm implements—trucks, automobiles, textiles, and every other thing produced in Canada—is to see that all Canadians have the purchasing power with which to buy those goods. If the government will undertake an adequate system of public works, a program that will stabilize farm income and will improve our social security legislation, it can deal effectively with the unemployment problem, and can at the same time raise the general standard of living of the Canadian people.

I want to point out to hon. members on the government side of the house that such a statement cannot be considered radical. Such a statement cannot be considered irresponsible, since that kind of statement was repeated over and over again by the late prime minister during the war, and immediately thereafter.

The war is now a long distance in the past. The objectives that were held out as the reason for our undertaking such terrible sacrifices apparently have now been forgotten. The great new order we were to see is being heralded in 1954 by half a million unemployed. We are waiting to hear from the government what it intends to do to solve unemployment and to prevent further disaster.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, if talk would give employment to people, then we in this chamber would certainly be doing our share to solve the problem in Canada. For two weeks the government has been trying to get into supply. The motion was first moved on February 15. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) then offered an amendment which touched off the present debate on unemployment.

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

I am the forty-sixth speaker on the list, and I believe this is the sixth day on which the debate has been proceeding. It must be obvious of course to the people of Canada that members of parliament do view with some seriousness the present unemployment situation. I feel quite sure that all hon. members, whether they be on the government or on the opposition side of the house, do look with a great many misgivings on the present very large number of Canadians who find themselves out of gainful employment.

Continued unemployment on any substantial scale in Canada unquestionably will have an adverse effect on our economy, and will strike fear into the hearts and minds of many people. As a matter of fact, ever since the apparent change in attitude on the part of Russia, and the beginning of the so-called peace talks, there has been a great deal of fear in the minds of our Canadian people. Early last summer the stock market reacted to the possibility that we might be entering a period of peace. During the election campaign last summer the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in a broadcast felt it necessary to reassure the people in this country about this whole matter. He pointed out that Canadians had been enjoying a number of years of prosperity, which he said we had enjoyed in spite of the fact that the government had been obliged to spend no less than two billions of dollars a year on defence. If, he argued at that time, it were possible to maintain prosperity while at the same time spending two billions of dollars a year on defence, then how much greater prosperity could we achieve finally if we got into a period of peace. He said the government then would no longer have to spend two billions of dollars a year on defence and would be able to use that money for the purpose of raising the general level of economic activity and well-being in Canada.

I am sure that there is substantial agreement with what the Prime Minister said at that time. I certainly agreed with him; and I do not think anyone in the house would differ. But it seems to me the present large and widespread unemployment in Canada is ample evidence that thus far the Liberal administration has failed in peacetime to keep the economy in a condition of well-being. The government minimizes the situation today and makes the claim that we should not be talking about depression. Government members claim that such talk may help to bring on a depression.

Well, of course, I hardly need remind hon. members that in 1929, just before the slump into the depression of the thirties, we were talking about nothing but boom and prosperity. Then the crash came, and we went into what we now call the dirty thirties, and sometimes the hungry thirties. The government also makes the claim that the prosperity we have been enjoying since 1939 has come as a consequence of Liberal policy. Well, we have enjoyed prosperity since 1939; but it was not because of the virtues of Liberal policy. It has been because the Liberal government has been riding a war-horse for all it is worth. That was how we got into prosperity, the prosperity we have enjoyed since 1939; and that is how we have kept in it.

The government claims that as long as the Liberal party is in office we need not worry about unemployment and its possible consequence, depression, among other things. The government I think is again overoptimistic, because I think that such optimism is dangerous, and especially dangerous if it diverts our attention from the problems that we face.

Then, I want to say something about depression this afternoon, a depression which may result from widespread unemployment. No hon. member, certainly no one who has lived since the late 1920's, needs to be convinced that depression is a fact, and that it can come quickly once it gets started. We know, too, that depressions have occurred from time to time throughout the past as far back almost as anyone can remember. The evidence on this point is overwhelming, and all students of economics accept depressions as an established fact. They also accept that depressions result from policies of men and governments.

In recent years a great amount of statistical work has been done in an attempt to find out whether depressions occur at regular intervals, and if so, what the intervals are. The information that they have gathered together is exceedingly important, and in my judgment very valuable. Nevertheless, the tremendous emphasis which economists and students of economics have placed on what they call the periodicity—that is a big word, I know, and certainly it is not original with me—I say the emphasis that the students of economics have placed upon what they call the periodicity or booms and slumps has had a most unfortunate effect upon thinking. A hundred years ago economists denied the possibility of a general and prolonged depression such as we experienced in the 1930's throughout most of the world. They did not attempt to deny the existence of slumps, however, and consequently argued that a slump is a deflationary movement which lets the hot air out of a preceding inflationary movement, thus of course restoring the economic balance. I say that when undue emphasis is placed upon the periodicity of prosperity and depression it naturally serves to nourish a state of mind in which one expects a slump always to be right on the tail of a boom. That is what they call the boom and bust kind of thinking or philosophy.

It seems easy for those people who do think in terms of the boom and bust sequence to get into the habit of thinking of each upward movement as the cause of the following downward movement, and vice versa, just as one might think of the swing of the pendulum as causing the resultant opposite swing. I think such people, in getting into that habit of thinking, ignore such questions as what set the pendulum swinging in the first place, and what kind of mainspring it is that keeps the pendulum in motion perpetually.

Some economists and others refer to this kind of sequence as a self-generating theory, and they say that our economy is given to this self-generation. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe any such tripe. I do not think it is a theory at all; it is only the standardization of ignorance. Then they try to call it a philosophy. At any rate, the habit of pendulum thinking today is quite widespread. There are those people who are talking as though they are perfectly sure that a depression will inevitably follow the period of postwar prosperity that we have had. Most people have learned a great many things since the boom days of 1929. One of the things we have learned is that no economy could possibly swing back and forth so wildly through one extreme to the other as ours has done without there being something very wrong about it. One outstanding United States economist has said:

> There is indeed something very wrong with our economy. It fails to distribute mass consumer purchasing power in sufficient quantity to permit the whole product of industry to be purchased. This failure exists at all times under our system and is bad at all times.

These are the words he used. If our economy were constitutionally sound and well, the expansion which accompanies prosperity would not be unwholesome and dangerous in any way. But, Mr. Speaker, our economy is not sound. The real disease affecting it is a constitutional disease, and we have to look after it in a constitutional manner. In any period of prosperity the flow of mass consumer purchasing power fails to keep pace with the growth of industry. That fact is beginning to become very apparent throughout the whole world.

Throughout the 1920's there was a good deal of talk about the discovery by some wise man that high wages paid off in prosperity. Well, it was tried. I can remember the high wages that I earned as a boy; I can also remember some other things that went along with it. The flow of mass consumer purchasing power through increasing wages, however, was expanding throughout practically the whole of the 1920's; but we know now that it was not increasing anything like as fast as the national production. On the contrary, the discrepancy between mass consumer purchasing power and total productive capacity was steadily increasing all the way from 1922 to 1929. At the peak, in the early months of 1929, according to the Brookings Institution's findings, in its very interesting and most illuminating study, "America's Capacity to Produce and Consume", production was 19 per cent short of existing productive capacity. I emphasize that point because it can mean only one thing, namely, that purchasing power is not generated even in peacetime as fast as goods are produced, and that is the serious thing for our consideration.

In spite of the establishment of this fact beyond all successful contradiction, during the past seven or eight years, we have witnessed a constant struggle on the part of labour throughout the country for higher wages, when all the time they would have been infinitely better off if they had been joining in the great drive to try to increase the flow of mass consumer purchasing power, to try to keep up their own purchasing power rather than just to increase the number of dollars that they called take-home pay.

Well, the break came in October, 1929. I will not pause here to try to discuss the steps by which it had come. I think some hon. members have already done that. Let it be enough to say that a few people had already seen that a crash was inevitable, and that it was bound to come sooner or later. They said so. I remember hearing some of them, and for several years depression came and deepened, with production falling off and unemployment of men and dollars steadily increasing, until the winter of 1932-33 in the United States there was an avalanche of bank failures, which brought about real trouble.

In our Canada, right up until 1935, we gradually slumped into the depths of a depression, the like of which we had never experienced in all our days.

At this point the government of the United States—I am speaking of 1933—began a pump-priming action. At first the amount of money they spent was a mere trickle, but the effect of it was felt almost instantaneously. The flow of that money increased continuously, until the winter of 1936 and 1937, when the soldiers' bonus was pyramided on top of the payments made by various recovery agencies, such as W.P.A. and others, when there was a sharp upturn of prosperity in the United States that did have some effect right here in Canada. However, we had not done very much in this country and as a consequence we did not feel the upturn nearly so readily nor so sharply as they did in the United States.

Finally, in 1939, things began to take on a different complexion; but, Mr. Speaker, it was not recovery measures instituted as a consequence of Liberal policies that ended the depression. It was the war. The most bitter critics of the process of government spending our way out of depression are very insistent on this point, that it was the war that brought us out of the depression. All economists recognize that war is a colossal system of public works in a sense. In the course of war industry booms, the volume of production reaches undreamed-of heights, just as it did in Canada. And the whole thing is financed by government funds, much of which is newly created.

Only a comparatively few short months before the outbreak of the war of 1939 the Social Credit group in this house proposed to the Minister of Finance that the government create and spend into circulation in Canada $200 million to get the wheels of industry started again and to provide employment for the unemployed thousands. The Social Credit members at that time were told that they were a bunch of idiots to think of such a thing, that it would bring on the worst kind of inflation, or in the alternative would wreck our economy.

However, it was only a matter of hours after the declaration of war in the fall of 1939 that Mr. Ilsley went to the chartered banks and on his own word arranged with them a substantial expansion of credit amounting to approximately $200 million in order to get the war effort started. Since that time there have been a good many billions of dollars of new purchasing power created and poured into the bloodstream of the economy of Canada. Well, the government continued pouring the mass purchasing power into the economy all during the war and we were able to finance and prosecute a pretty creditable war effort for a small country of 13,500,000 people. And then came peace.

Now in the first year after the war ended, 1946, the governor of the Bank of Canada, reviewing the economic situation in our country and the trends of the time, issued a warning in the Bank of Canada report of February 8, 1946. I should like to quote briefly from page 9 where, after reviewing a table showing the national expenditure, Mr. Towers had this to say:

> Trends in these components of national expenditure, taken together, will determine whether or not a satisfactory high level of employment and income can be maintained in the years ahead.
> Clearly it is the first two items in the expenditure table, comprising total government outlay, which represented the main driving force behind the very high level of activity which was attained during the war period. Canada's problem now is to expand the other types of expenditure, and particularly domestic private investment and domestic consumption, in order that there will be compensating stimulus as government outlays decline to their post-war level.

It is clear that what Mr. Towers foresaw in 1946 was that the government would experience difficulty in maintaining mass consumer purchasing power at a level high enough to stimulate a high level of economic activity. That, he said, would be one of our major problems. On page 10 of the same annual report of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Towers warned the country in these terms:

> Looking to the future, however, there is no room for complacency. Most of our real problems of post-war adjustment are still ahead. The backlog of demand will not be large in relation to productive capacity when industry has been fully reconverted and inventories built up to normal levels. When the time lag involved in demobilization is over, government expenditures will fall rapidly. Nor will our foreign lending to finance the purchase of Canadian goods remain indefinitely at the present level. The prevailing optimism on the North American continent is dangerous if it diverts attention from the problems which have to be faced.

Those were sober words and they should have been listened to. They should still be considered as a warning to the Canadian people. It now appears from the size of the unemployment backlog in Canada that the words of the governor of the Bank of Canada have at least gone partly unheeded. We have become complacent and we are now facing a dangerous situation as a consequence. The very fact that the government has not made a pronouncement with respect to the means that they propose to adopt in relation to the unemployment crisis is evidence that we have become complacent.

During wartime Canada built up a huge producing machine which made it possible for us to make, as I said before, a very creditable war effort for a population as small as ours. But efficient as that production machine was during the war, unless care is taken it can cause havoc in peacetime. What we need more than anything else today is a policy, a real down-to-earth policy, for adjusting our nation's purchasing power so that it can match our large power of production and our still larger possibilities of the immediate future—what we look upon as the atomic future.

Back in the 1930's, when we were in the depths of the depression, we Social Crediters maintained that the government could induce a flow of consumer purchasing power sufficient to absorb the entire product of industry, that is to distribute it, however large the volume of production might be. We contended that there was no economic bar to doing this and that it was only good common horse sense to see that it was done. However, we were laughed at then.

But time has vindicated our contentions. Nobody with any sense or judgment today will deny that the government can induce a flow of consumer purchasing power sufficient to absorb the entire product of industry. People now know that in this respect war is quite like a great system of public works, as I have already said, except that they do not necessarily involve death and destruction.

Government projects are not limited to the production of munitions of war. On the contrary, a public works program in peacetime may produce monuments of enduring value. That is the kind of thing that we believe is possible. The best example is what happened under W.P.A. in the United States during the thirties. The United States government spent many millions of dollars of public funds and in so doing they built schools, hospitals, community halls and all that sort of thing which will stand for many years as monuments to the vision of men who declared that when unemployment begins to show itself the government should induce the flow of consumer purchasing power so as to get things started, and then make use of the purchasing power to build lasting assets that will serve this generation as well as the next and perhaps the next. I point out at once that the United States ran the country into almost hopeless debt unnecessarily in the process of carrying out public works programs.

I think that public works and housing have come almost universally to be accepted as by far the most desirable of governmental recovery measures. Many of the speakers in the present debate have stressed this point and have asked the government to lose no time in setting up enough works and housing projects so that men who now find themselves out of work will be able to get a job and an income without further delay.

There are so many things that we could be doing. For example, I think we ought to hang our heads in shame as a nation that we have grown to 87 years of age and still have not completed a trans-Canada highway. We should have had one a long while ago and it should have been built by the federal government instead of placing so much of the responsibility upon the provincial governments. This is one of the very few countries in the world which have forced the lesser governments to carry a substantial burden of the cost of a trans-nation highway.

The provinces and municipalities are so heavily laden with taxation today and their financial problems are so great that they cannot build the roads which are required if we are to have a trans-Canada highway or a system of highways throughout the country. Mr. Speaker, I think this government should take the lead and not only build the trans-Canada highway but also join with the provinces in the building of a system of secondary highways throughout the whole country. We need great irrigation projects in the west. My friend the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) has already mentioned the Red Deer diversion scheme. We have heard a great deal here about the Saskatchewan river project. These projects ought to be built, and when they are built they will stand as lasting monuments to the enterprise of a great people and a forward-looking government.

I do not intend to weary the house with an interminable list of all the things we need, but I would be remiss in my duty to my own constituency and people if I did not mention the fact that the great Peace river country—that vast inland empire that will be so important to Canada and its strength in the future—needs a railway to the Pacific coast; and while there is a great backlog of unemployed manpower in this country is the time to get started on the building of that road.

I recall with what enthusiasm we looked forward to the post-war period. During the war this very House of Commons appointed what was called the reconstruction committee, if I remember correctly. I think it was under the able chairmanship of the gentleman who has since become Senator Turgeon. That committee studied the economic situation in Canada and the needs of the post-war years most carefully, and came up with a whole bag of suggestions and proposals which the government called its "shelf of projects" for reconstruction. Sometimes I, along with other members of the house, wonder what has happened to that shelf of projects.

I think the Turgeon committee did a good job, and because I think so I am inclined to the belief that what we ought to do now, instead of referring this whole question of unemployment, its causes and cures, to the standing committee on industrial relations, as has been suggested, is to set up a permanent or standing committee of this house. We should charge that committee with the responsibility of a yearly investigation and report to parliament on the facts of unemployment and the general economic situation; and perhaps it should be asked to make recommendations concerning measures that might be taken to keep Canadians busy and the Canadian economy at a high level of activity and well-being. This committee might be called the economic research and development committee or some such thing; I do not care what the name might be. If the rules of the house did not limit to one the subamendments that can be moved to a motion of this kind, I would seriously consider moving a subamendment asking for the establishment of such a standing committee.

I am one of those who believe that we should not be spending our time castigating the government and blaming it for every single thing that goes wrong. I believe we all must take our responsibility and so must the taxpayers and the electors of this country.

It has occurred to me that a thoughtful observer who might drop in from some other planet, if he should land on the earth today, would have a hard time understanding our present widespread fear of a coming recession. While he listened to us debating here in this house and forecasting all kinds of gloomy things he would see around this country electronics in great profusion. He would see ingenious gas turbines and all kinds of marvellous new types of machinery and factories. He would see this most awe-inspiring atomic power development just about ready to be used for peacetime purposes. He would not know, nor do we, all the fine things which these resources he sees might bring to Canada. We certainly do not yet know whether working hours will decrease or increase in the future. We know, however, that the output from all our resources, when fully developed, could enrich our people beyond our fondest dreams. Continued increasing prosperity would seem to be the logical result of all the things we have at hand today.

When I think of that I have to ask myself, "What in the world is wrong? Why the fears that we are expressing at this time? Who are the culprits in this whole business of unemployment and of gloom"? I think the real trouble lies in the fact that so far we have all failed to accept our responsibilities in a real effort to gear the nation's income to its powers of production. We should not be too much concerned with placing on the government or on anybody else the blame for the present situation. It seems to me that we should be concerned with placing the responsibility for leading the country out of it. That is the important thing. Every voter, every member of the business groups, every member of the labour unions, every member of the professional groups as well as every member of this house governs this nation through his action or his lack of action, and particularly by what he demands of his business group, his labour union and his member of parliament. Therefore I say they must take their responsibility.

As a nation we have a tremendous number of mechanical slaves, gadgets that do the dirty work for us and save us all from drudgery and physical exhaustion and the monotony that we would naturally face if we were to do all the work that we used to have to do by hand, and which kept our noses to the grindstone. These things that we have at hand, these mechanical slaves, do not necessarily mean that we can cut working hours to the vanishing point or even near it, nor need they take away from us our jobs. With these gadgets, these machines and factories, we should be making one of the greatest production and distribution efforts the world has ever seen.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, that we had figures like the ones I found in a magazine not so long ago. We do not have them, but I wish we had. Perhaps if the kind of standing committee I have suggested were to be set up they could set about gathering such figures and publishing them so our people would know them. I was much interested in figures published in 1950 in a well-known United States publication called Factory Management and Maintenance. This magazine and its editors ventured to set up an estimate of future production in the United States. They pointed out that in 1879, 2,733,000 industrial workers supplied the nation with $109 worth of goods per person. In 1939, 7,887,000 workers gave the people $434 worth of goods per person. On the basis of this trend and having in mind all available information on future mechanization, the editors of this magazine expected 11,140,000 workers in 1950 to supply $637 worth of goods per person. By 1960 it is estimated that out of a population of 150 million, 10,050,000 workers will be available and they will likely produce $717 worth of goods per person. As I say, if a standing committee of the kind I have suggested were set up, we could soon gather a great many interesting facts and figures of this kind for our use in estimating what the future is going to hold for this great country.

I see that my time is rapidly being exhausted, Mr. Speaker, and I do not want to weary the house any further. But I do suggest in closing that my sympathies are with those who find themselves without work and without incomes. I still have very poignant memories of two years with a job but without income back in the thirties. I went through that experience. Those early thirties were days when many of us were the fattest, healthiest, nakedest people in the world. I am sure that many people suffered far worse than I did, but I went through enough so that my sympathies are with those who find themselves without incomes today. Many of them have bought homes requiring substantial monthly payments. If they cannot pay their mortgage instalments, out they will go and they will lose whatever equities they have in them. A man with no home to go to has really lost his freedom.

We do not need to have a depression, Mr. Speaker, although it is hard to tell the unemployed head of a Canadian family who is being evicted from his home that we are not in one now. I am referring to a real slump. We do not need to have one, and I do not believe we will have one. Our country has a bright future. Our country has plenty to commend it to any enterprising person who wants to live and work here. The greatest blessing that can come to any man in my judgment is to have all the work he can do all the days of his life. We have every cause for optimism, but in our optimism let us not become blind to facts that have such portent for the future.

We do need the kind of watchdog economic committee of this house which I have proposed to be constantly on guard for the Canadian people. I suggest that it be set up immediately to begin its studies. In the meantime the government should meet the present unemployment problem by doing these five particular things, amongst others:

1. They should increase unemployment insurance benefits and provide for some sort of temporary stay of execution of mortgage foreclosures until economic activity again absorbs the unemployed.

2. They should press forward with housing plans, with emphasis on low income and low rental schemes. If this is to be effective the interest rates must be brought down, because high interest rates today are the great stumbling block in our housing program.

3. They should adopt realistic trade policies and conclude trade agreements with all countries willing to trade with us on a mutually satisfactory basis. In particular, Canada should cultivate greater trade with Britain and the sterling area and be prepared to settle balances by accepting some sterling.

4. We should adopt a realistic Canada first policy under which as much as possible of our raw materials will be manufactured in Canada. In particular, we should make absolutely sure that the pipe and other materials that go into the trans-Canada pipe line are as far as possible fabricated in Canada; and we say that any subsidies that are paid, either directly or by way of tax remission, must be paid to Canadian companies and not United States companies. Moreover, in my judgment we must finance development in Canada to a much greater degree than ever before with Canadian capital.

5. There should be an immediate increase in old age pensions and war veterans allowances. That would provide a greater market for the surpluses of our country and would stimulate greater employment.

I see that my time is used up, and I appreciate the indulgence of the house; but before I sit down may I once more warn all my colleagues in the house against becoming so complacent and optimistic as not to be aware of the portents and signs that face us every day if we just look around.

Mr. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to repeat the many things that have been said about unemployment already in this debate. However, the situation as it exists in my own riding does bear mentioning. It is serious, and all the fine words from the government benches about the situation improving are not relieving the actual hardship thus far. Further, it seems to me that those occupying the government benches are burying their heads in the sand like the ostrich, hoping that time will pull them out of their dilemma.

The Globe and Mail of February 22 reports the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) as having predicted in Chatham the previous Saturday that there would be a resurgence of employment in March. I am wondering which year he meant. We are into March, 1954, right now, and the only feeling prevalent in my home city of Stratford is one of fear. This feeling of fear is, I think, most pronounced amongst the men laid off at the Canadian National Railways locomotive shops, and their families. This fear also extends to those still employed. There are rumours and fears of further layoffs. The government does nothing to allay those fears.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare is further reported to have charged the Progressive Conservative opposition in parliament with sounding "the old Tory cry of blue ruin".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

Mr. Monteith: In my opinion the Conservative opposition has every faith in the future of this Canada of ours.

An hon. Member: Show it.

Mr. Monteith: We can see wonderful prospects for the future. We believe in that ultimate future. But surely we are not preaching blue ruin when we attempt to bring to the attention of the government certain critical conditions as they exist at this moment. This fear I mentioned a moment ago is having drastic results. The merchants of Stratford, while depending on trade with the surrounding rural districts, also depend on trade with people working in Stratford. The reports I receive are that not only the people already laid off are not spending but those still working, and particularly those employed at the C.N.R. shops, fear the future and as a consequence are not spending. This lack of spending naturally brings on the sequel of the merchants not buying and the manufacturers not producing, resulting in the subsequent lay-off of more workers.

I believe it is the government's duty to put these fears at rest. They should take the lead and assure their own employees in the C.N.R. that their jobs are secure. That in itself would give confidence to the country as a whole. In a question I placed on the order paper on February 3 information was sought as to any long-term plans for the full utilization of the locomotive shops in Stratford. The answer was to the effect that while these facilities were excellent for steam locomotive maintenance their use for other railway purposes is limited, but is under study.

Let me bring to the attention of the house the fact that an addition to these shops was completed in October, 1949, at an approximate cost of $500,000. Is it possible the management would be so shortsighted as to spend that kind of money in 1949 and not have some plan for the future? They surely must be able to utilize these premises for some purpose. How about building and repairing freight and passenger equipment?

I have heard it mentioned that gas turbine engines have been considered. If so, could these be developed in Stratford?

A special committee of the Stratford Canadian National Railways federated crafts, representing more than 1,000 mechanical workers, met recently in that city. The following is part of a statement issued by them as reported in the Stratford Beacon-Herald of February 19:

> The following modernization has taken place in recent years:
> 1. A new annex costing over half a million dollars.
> 2. New machinery at an average cost of $400,000 a year over a period of the past eight years.
> 3. Modern lighting system.
> 4. New boilers and compressor in the power house.
> 5. Power supply control system for hydroelectric, and
> 6. Heat-treating furnaces.
> The Stratford shops are strategically located for the handling of repairs to any type of locomotive in the central region, and the skill and ability of shop employees has long been recognized as being of the highest calibre.

It just does not make sense to me to spend millions of dollars on construction and equipment and have no ultimate utilization in mind as dieselization takes place.

The government seem to be most unconcerned about getting rid of the wheat in western Canada. May I say that if they were more concerned about this problem, and also about the export of other agricultural products, we would not be too apprehensive about the immediate future. I can mention cheese factories in my riding that have been closed because of lack of markets. I can tell the house of manufacturing concerns in Perth county that have been accustomed to selling a large percentage of their output in western Canada. Their sales and eventually their employment have dropped precipitously because money is not available in western Canada to purchase these goods. Why does that condition exist? It is because the farmers have wheat instead of money.

I assert, Mr. Speaker, that the present government is manifestly unfair when it seeks to blame a previous Conservative administration for having brought on the depression of 1929 which extended into the thirties. Further, it occurs to me that the government is acting today exactly as it did in 1929, when it ignored obvious signals of economic distress. In that year the late Prime Minister Mackenzie King was in office, and in the house he denied that there was serious unemployment. He later visited Winnipeg and was shocked to be met by a throng of men demanding that he find jobs for them. Surely in 1954 the government might take the lead in alleviating fear, as I think they could well do by establishing a committee to study the situation as it exists today.

Surely such important matters as the loss of stable export markets for the primary products of our farms, our forest, our fisheries and our mines, and the ever-increasing competition both at home and abroad for our secondary industries, warrant the attention of the members of this parliament. It is upon these factors in our economy that a high level of economic activity depends. These problems determine the amount of gainful employment available to our people, because lost markets mean closed factories, lay-offs on our railway systems, and eventually depressed prices for our farmers because the unemployed worker is unable to buy the things he wants and needs.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): The debate which is now in progress began on February 15, so we are now in the third week of the debate. During that time we have had admissions from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) to the effect that there is an increase in seasonal unemployment, and furthermore that seasonal factors are not the only ones which enter into the present unemployment situation. Among other factors the minister admitted to the house that keener import competition, increasing competition in world markets, improved technology and accumulation of inventories were all contributing to the situation.

Notwithstanding all that has been said by opposition members, notwithstanding all that has been said by labour delegations which have appeared before parliament during the past three weeks, the government still refuse to admit that the unemployment situation is a serious one. Instead of offering the house and the country some concrete proposals or statement of government policy regarding the unemployment situation, ministers and Liberal members generally are quite content to tell opposition members to keep quiet and wait for the spring.

This seems the only solution the government has offered to the approximately half a million unemployed in this country. Opposition members who attempt to point out the seriousness of the present situation are criticized by government speakers as being propagators of an attitude of gloom. We are assured by the government that once the warm weather arrives the unemployment situation will be alleviated and all will be well. I have on my desk here two memoranda submitted to the cabinet two years ago, one by the city council of Toronto and the other by the municipal council of the township of York. Two years ago both these municipal councils were calling upon the government to take immediate action to relieve them of the burden of caring for unemployed employables. At that time the government said, wait for spring; it is only seasonal. A year ago it was the same story.

Now for the third time we are hearing that same spring song of the Liberal party. I suggest that instead of criticizing opposition members for calling the government's attention to the realities of this situation, the government might well counteract any gloom or tendency toward panic that may exist in this country by making some forthright statement concerning the policy to be adopted in the immediate future. It is not good enough to just criticize opposition members for calling attention to these conditions and ask half a million unemployed people to tighten their belts until spring comes. The truth is that for the past number of years the so-called seasonal unemployment has been increasing each winter. The number of unemployed has been increasing winter by winter, and the number of unemployed during the summer months has been increasing. The Minister of Labour admitted that the unemployment situation today is more than seasonal in nature, and certainly is one that deserves some consideration by the government.

I am rather surprised that Liberal members coming from constituencies where thousands of people are being forced to exhaust their personal savings and fall back upon municipal relief are not having more to say in this chamber concerning that condition. It seems to me that Liberal members, even from those constituencies in which unemployment is quite serious today, are following the example of the cabinet ministers and simply trying to bury their heads still deeper in the sand, in order that they may not see the situation as it really is. I am sure it must be a great consolation to a man who has no job and nothing with which to buy food for his children to know that the Minister of Labour understands just why he is without a job! I am sure it must be quite a consolation to him to know that his lack of a job is not just seasonal, but that it is due to accumulated inventories or to international competition for trade, and that the Minister of Labour is quite conversant with all this! And I suppose the government considers it is quite all right to ask these people to live on faith until such time as something turns up.

I suggest that the people who are unemployed want something more than faith—yes, even faith in the Liberal government. It takes more than faith to feed hungry children, and that is the situation which exists in this country today. When the press begins to carry accounts of breadlines and soup-kitchens, accounts of evictions and of foreclosures and of angry unemployed, it is high time the government offered those unemployed something more than liberal doses of faith. It is high time the Liberal government made some statement and gave those people some encouragement, some hope, so they may know the government is actually doing something to counteract the rising flood of unemployment. It is the present situation in respect of the unemployed, as such, and not speeches by members in the opposition that is spreading gloom throughout the country.

At the end of the war, back in 1945, the Canadian people were led to believe that government economists had learned something from the thirties and the war years that followed. The predecessor of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the predecessor of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) all assured us at that time that unemployment could be prevented. They went into considerable detail to show us exactly how it could be done.

I have here on my desk what is known as the green books of government proposals, and I believe these are well known to all. We might almost call it the Liberal gospel for unemployment. It was presented with a great deal of fanfare back in August of 1945. It covers the question of trade, and sets out what the government would do in matters of trade in the event of unemployment. It discusses the matter of unemployment insurance and what would be done in that regard. It goes into the field of social security and points out how the government would increase purchasing power by increasing social services in order to offset rising unemployment. It gives well over a page of public works for which the dominion is fully responsible, and others which it is prepared to consider after assuming full responsibility. These were undertakings designed to meet the rising tide of unemployment. Housing was to be one of those projects which was to help take up the slack of unemployment. A national health program was another. This was going to help bolster the purchasing power of the Canadian people.

Mr. Martin: And has it not done so?

Mr. Noseworthy: There are even financial arrangements discussed. I find this very interesting at page 48:

> In carrying out its employment policy it will at times be necessary for large deficits to be incurred while at the same time expenditures are being increased or taxation reduced in order to aid employment. If it is to carry deficits at times when they are necessary for the maintenance of employment and income, the dominion should be in a position to recapture in periods of high employment and vigorous business activity revenue from rising incomes and profits.

The government has been in that position during the last few years. They have been in a position to build up large surpluses in periods of high employment and rising profits. It seems to me the time has now arrived where the present unemployment situation warrants the government taking a look at the financial arrangements it proposed back in 1945.

What has happened to the cabinet since 1945? Why is it that today's cabinet shows so little interest in or sympathy for the proposals which were put forth in such detail at that time as measures for curbing rising unemployment? Is it that the majority of the cabinet ministers are too young and inexperienced to realize just how serious the situation is? Is it that the older members of the cabinet who were a party to this policy in 1945 have lost their influence? Is it just because the cabinet is now under the direction of a new prime minister, one who may not have the same faith in these policies that his predecessor had?

Certainly we are entitled to ask why this different attitude is being taken by the cabinet today with respect to the serious unemployment situation, and why they do not follow the policies proposed in 1945 to meet just such a situation. If those leaders were sincere in 1945—and I do not for a moment question their sincerity; if they knew then what they were talking about, and I am taking it for granted that they did—then it is difficult to understand why the present cabinet will permit unemployment to increase year by year without doing something about it except asking the country to wait for spring and telling the opposition to shut up.

Mr. Martin: No.

Mr. Noseworthy: The present Prime Minister says the government is creating an atmosphere within which full employment can become possible. The unemployed in Canada want something more than atmosphere to meet their situation, something more than even Liberal government atmosphere. Atmosphere is no substitute for bread, no matter how liberal that atmosphere may be. If gloom spreads throughout this country; if fear, which is already rising in this country, becomes panic, the blame must be placed not on opposition members for calling the attention of the government to this situation, but upon the government itself for failing to give the country any assurance, any hope that they are going to be rescued from this situation.

It is now quite evident from all authentic reports, and from the statement made to the house by the Minister of Labour, that it will require more than spring to provide anything like full employment for all employable Canadians. It is quite evident also to all who choose to face realities that employment this coming summer will not reach last summer's level. It is also evident that many of those formerly employed in shipping, in textiles, in farm implement industries, in electrical equipment industries, and so on, will have to find jobs elsewhere, even after the spring has come and gone; and not even the optimistic Acting Prime Minister was able to tell some of those delegations, when asked, just where they would be able to find other jobs.

To avoid the propagation of gloom, fear and panic, in my opinion the government should make some forthright statement of just what measures it is taking or contemplates taking in the immediate future to take up the slack of unemployment. The only hope held out is that if the unemployed will tighten their belts and keep them tightened until we reach an international agreement with the United States, then we may get the St. Lawrence seaway. My good friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) reminds me that the development of the St. Lawrence seaway—

Mr. Martin: He did not say a word.

Mr. Noseworthy: —might well create a permanent unemployment situation in the maritimes.

Mr. Martin: He did not say anything about that at all; he has been looking at me for the last few minutes.

Mr. Noseworthy: I suggest that if we develop the St. Lawrence seaway, and I hope we shall, some measures must be taken or some consideration given to finding suitable employment for the maritimes to replace the employment they will be deprived of by the development of the seaway.

While I am speaking on the seaway let me say this. Not so very long ago the people of Canada were interested in the government's statement to the effect that they were now prepared to go it alone to build that seaway. Today they are asking, was the Canadian government only bluffing; were these bold government statements made simply for the consumption of the United States congress? Had the government really any intention of going it alone in the building of the St. Lawrence seaway? The government might well answer some of these questions that are being asked today.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Noseworthy: Wait until I finish.

Mr. Martin: It is a very important question.

Mr. Noseworthy: Is there a possibility that we may get ourselves into the position where for the sake of some United States support we shall find that waterway when finished under complete or fairly complete control of the United States? Are we taking safeguards to see that, providing it is a joint enterprise, the equipment used in the project will be Canadian-made? Or are we going to permit United States companies to provide us with most of the equipment and much of the machinery, particularly electrical equipment, that will be required in the building and development of that seaway and power project? If Canada is not to build it alone, if we are to enter into partnership in the building of it, then certainly safeguards must be taken to see that the project brings employment to Canadians as well as to citizens of the United States.

If, as we are told by the government, and by all the supporters of the free enterprise system, our standard of living depends upon our production, and the more we produce the more we can have to spend, then I ask you to consider for the moment the harm that we are doing to our economy and to our production by having either 300,000 or 500,000 skilled or semi-skilled workers unemployed at any time in this country.

If you take a look at the brief presented by the united automobile workers to the cabinet on February 24 you will find there a list of unfilled needs of the Canadian people. If we think today of the houses that are needed, of the educational facilities that are needed, of the hospitals that are needed, or the highways; if we think of the number of Canadian homes without telephones, without bathtubs, without showers or flush toilets, without running water or electric light, without electric or gas stoves or refrigerators; if we think for a moment of the tens of thousands of children in Canada who have no playground in summer except the streets; if we think for a moment of the need for reforestation and conservation of our soil; if we think of all these things that Canadians need, then we should ask, why should we have half a million unemployed in this country at any time? I think that is the question that should confront us.

The minister tells us, of course, that we have to divert too much money to national defence to make provision for any of these unfilled needs. Let me say that if war were declared this afternoon it is quite conceivable that before ten o'clock tonight we in this parliament would find enough money to put our unemployed to work in war plants or in the services. We are told that people will submit to taxation and regulations in wartime which they will not accept in peacetime.

Is it not true that all our national defences today are being built up for one purpose, to protect us against communist aggression? Is it not true that half a million unemployed workers will do more to undermine our defence against communism than all our expenditure on war material will be able to offset? Communism feeds on unemployment and distress. Half a million unemployed in Canada provide a fertile field for the communists.

Let us not forget that the provision of tanks and guns and jets and radar fences is only a part of our defence program. It just does not make sense to spend billions on these things and leave half a million Canadians unemployed when there are so many things that Canadians and our allies in other countries need, and need desperately. The maintenance of our people's morale and their standard of living is as much a part of our defence against communism as is the provision of military equipment. I suggest that it is nothing short of suicide for this government to condone in this country at this time or at any other time the amount of unemployment that exists today.

In the interests of our survival as a free people I want to urge the government in all sincerity to grapple with this problem now before it mushrooms into a full-fledged depression. That has happened before. It can happen again, but it need not happen again. The Minister of Finance, the Acting Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour all know that such a calamity can be avoided. They know how it can be done. What this country needs today is a good shot in the arm, a shot that could be given by this government in the form of assurance that direct action will be taken now to meet this situation. Let us have some declaration by the government of some policy other than just to wait until spring comes. Let us have a declaration of some policy other than war which can put Canadians back to work.

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that by this time the government must realize there are half a million people unemployed in Canada. That has been repeated so often that there is no excuse for ignorance of the matter any longer. It is just a question of the seriousness of the problem that we ought to consider.

Some would go so far as to tell us that this is just a seasonal state of affairs. We even have the British Columbia Times which is printed on the west coast saying that the unemployment situation is strictly seasonal. If our unemployment were found only in lumbering or other industries that might be held up by the weather, then I might be inclined to agree with that statement; but when we read that farm implement workers, electrical workers, workers in the car and truck industries and textile workers are unemployed, then we know that the statement is incorrect. We know also that those industries should be at the peak of production right now, so there must be something wrong, something that goes much deeper than a seasonal state of affairs.

There have been many suggestions made as to how this problem can be handled. Of course in parliament such as this we retain our own individual opinions, and it is only right that such should be the case. However, as the amendment is worded, there must be two ways in which this problem could be attacked. We must have a long-range plan and we must have immediate assistance.

Whether we have 500,000 unemployed or whether we have 5,000 unemployed, the situation in so far as the person unemployed is concerned is the same. I tell you it is desperate. When a person is unemployed and he knows that his wife and family are depending on him for food, clothing and shelter it becomes pretty serious. The number of people unemployed is not so serious as the fact that we have people unemployed in a country with the wealth and resources about which we boast so loudly; yet nothing is being done.

It will be said that the unemployed can get $24 a week, but how can we expect a man and his family to even exist on that amount? We know there are many workers in cities across this country who could not even pay their rent with $24 a week. You may say that if a person is paying more than that and is unemployed he should cut down on the scale of living to which he has become accustomed. Well, if the condition is seasonal, why should he? Why should that man have to leave his home or the way of life to which he has become used and to which his ordinary employment entitles him? I do not think it is a fair state of affairs. I am going to suggest that that pitiable sum of $24 a week should be increased, and increased right now, to take care of the added cost of living with which our unemployed are faced.

So far as the seasonal end of the matter is concerned, the only way to solve the problem is to see that none of our unemployed go hungry or without the necessities of life, that is without food, clothing and shelter, during the period they are unemployed. At the present time we have over $900 million in the fund, but it is true that even at $24 a week that will not last very long. Regardless of that fact, I think it is up to the government of Canada to see that sufficient money is paid out to our unemployed so they can at least feel secure that they will be able to supply the bare necessities of life during the period of unemployment.

What is the remedy? I do not think anything would reach into every part of our industrial life quite as much as a speed-up in housing and house construction. Such a course will, I know, affect every industry that is threatening to lay off workmen at the present time, such as the electrical industry, the hardware industry, the lumbering industry, and many of our tradesmen who are out of work. But these things are all going to take time. On all sides of the house we have heard it suggested that we must spend money. Of course this money must come through public spending.

I am now going to refer for a few moments to my own riding of Okanagan-Revelstoke. There are a few things we need there. There are some things that have been hanging fire for some little time. I am going to refer to the public building for the city of Vernon. That building was promised two years ago. Last year $100,000 was voted in order that the construction could be proceeded with, and there is on file with the boards of trade and various interested parties in the city of Vernon correspondence assuring them that the building would be started not this spring or next fall, but that it would be under construction last fall.

Now we note that the estimate for this year has been cut to $25,000. We are told that even yet they have not the plan ready. The building is being held up because they cannot agree on the type of plan or the type of building they are going to erect. That is just one thing that could be speeded up. I am satisfied that it would certainly meet with the approval of the people of Vernon and district, and that it would assist materially in giving employment to those who are out of work at the present time. That is something that could be started now, and during the summer months of the year it would help to remedy the situation that exists there.

Having regard to the long-range field, I could not help paying close attention to the remarks made by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Jones) when he was speaking here a few nights ago and telling of the efforts that had been put forth by the municipal councils in his district. I am well aware of what took place in the city of Kelowna and in surrounding cities. The same thing could be put into operation at the present time. But we are speaking now of the situation as it affects the federal government and federal spending.

It has been gratifying to hear a discussion of the real reasons behind the piling up of inventories, the piling up of goods, namely the lack of purchasing power. I like to hear that expression used, because I think it is proof that the term which I believe the Social Crediters instituted and brought into common use in this country is being adopted by various other members in this house. We have heard discussion of the necessity for purchasing power being kept in balance with the needs of the people so they can buy the production of industry. I am glad to hear that argument, because that is what we have been talking of for so many years. This extra money to buy the food and clothing that is necessary for the maintenance of life must, of course, come through spending rather than in production of consumer goods. There is nothing that will add so much to the economy, the wealth and the advancement of this country as will a sustained program of public works.

In British Columbia we have a province that is expanding more rapidly than any other province in Canada. To back up that statement I shall just quote a few figures. Of course where there is expansion and where there is business, there is naturally going to be money. I see the Minister of Finance is not in the house, but he might be interested in these figures although he certainly knows them.

In 1951-52 British Columbia's contribution to the national exchequer totalled $239,463,705, an amount which exceeded by $45 million the total collected in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and by more than $150 million the total collections from the four maritime provinces.

When we state that the province of British Columbia is entitled to a big part of government spending, we are only asking the government to put back into that province that which has been taken from us.

With regard to long-range spending, there are various things we should mention. At the present time we hear a little bit of talk about the development of the Columbia basin. This development would solve the power and irrigation problems of a large part of British Columbia. I understand that some work has been done on it. What you might perhaps call the preliminary surveys have been undertaken and the work is under way. But we do not just like that situation, that it is under way. We should like to see a little bit of action, and to feel that this was going to be a matter whose completion we could look forward to at least in our lifetime.

Then we speak of highways. British Columbia is an expensive place in which to construct roads. When we see that the total federal allotment for the trans-Canada highway this year is in the neighbourhood of $20 million, we realize that it will not go very far even if British Columbia gets its fair share of that amount. I do not think anybody will dispute the need for this highway in British Columbia. Just to bring the matter home a little bit more, I should like to refer to a clipping I have. I do not like to embarrass the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) in any way, but I was rather amused by a clipping which I cut from the Revelstoke Review a few days ago and which reads as follows:

> Many people, particularly in this area, must have been amused last week by the plight of the federal department which shipped a number of motor vehicles by transport to Vancouver by way of the United States from Edmonton.
> The big truck was lost for several days. It finally turned up under peculiar circumstances in Seattle.
> The point is that even military equipment has to be shipped through a foreign country because Canada doesn't possess an adequate trans-Canada highway, open twelve months of the year.
> The Big Bend highway, which has been open for a considerable distance this winter, could easily have been kept open for the whole distance.

That is not a good situation. At the present time we hardly ever refer to the United States as a foreign country. But if that line were closed to us, and the need arose to get military equipment into the north or even into British Columbia, in what way would it get there? It is high time that definite and speedy action was taken to provide a highway into the province not only by way of Big Bend but also by other routes farther north which are just as necessary and should be given consideration.

We have heard a good deal about trade and about the selling of wheat. I get quite a kick out of the campaign of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) to get rid of our wheat, but it is a really serious problem to every part of our country. Let me tell you how the trade problem affects British Columbia. Last month we still had two million boxes of apples unsold. I am satisfied that a good many hundred thousand boxes of these apples would have been unloaded in the prairie provinces if the people there had been able to sell their wheat and thus obtain the purchasing power necessary to buy them. I am also satisfied that if all these apples had been sold there would have been a little more money to buy machinery, lack of the sale of which is causing lay-offs in the eastern manufacturing plants.

Our economy is so interwoven that when any part of it is slowed up by a problem every other part of the country is affected. Hon. members will say, how are you going to sell the wheat? We know that sales have been restricted through lack of dollars in the sterling areas and the impossibility of converting their sterling into dollars so they can buy. There is a need for all our surplus production, and the suggestion that has been made that the government should take action to speed up trade with the sterling areas certainly should not go unnoticed.

I am rather disappointed that the Minister of Finance has not made a report about what transpired at the conference of commonwealth finance ministers. Possibly we will find out in due time, but I cannot see why we should be kept in ignorance with respect to this very important matter.

Our lumber industry is also affected by the same conditions. A short time ago Mr. Anthony Benn, vice-chairman and joint managing director of Price and Pierce Limited, London, large importers and dealers in lumber, made the following statement in Vancouver, as reported in the British Columbia news letter:

> There was no doubt that there was room for greater expansion in trade, but it depended on the assumption that the United Kingdom had dollars to pay for it. This was an ever-present worry, and he felt that it called for twofold action.

Of course he was pleading that we buy British products in order that they in return may be able to buy ours. But an easier solution would be to have an arrangement whereby we would accept their sterling, not necessarily with the idea that we would have to spend it in Britain but with the provision that we could spend it in any part of the commonwealth to buy the things we must import to maintain our present standard of living.

The matter of trade enters into every part of our economy. There is no part of our provinces not affected by the goods that remain unsold despite the fact that they are needed so badly elsewhere. In my own district of Okanagan-Revelstoke the mining industry is also faced with a problem. I was quite concerned a few days ago to receive a letter from the Revelstoke board of trade advising me that they are having a tough time. The letter said that during the past few months at least 300 people have been put out of work as the result of slow-downs and lay-offs in the mines. That is the way it goes. Of course we realize that the low market for base metals is a problem that is going to take a lot of study, but we believe that on the government side of the house there are men who are quite able to give the matter the study it requires. We are satisfied with their ability, but we are certainly disappointed that they have set up what might correctly be called a curtain of silence with respect to any plans for solving the dilemma with which we are faced at the present time.

I do not believe the opposition should merely sit back and criticize. I think we should be able to offer suggestions once in a while that will perhaps shed a little bit of light or help in some way. Although I should like to commend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) who brought this problem before the house, I am rather surprised that no real suggestions have been made by the official opposition. After their experience in solving the unemployment problem of the early thirties, one would think they would be able to come forward with plenty of advice.

With respect to the members to my immediate right, I do not know whether or not they have a policy. We hear one man asking that taxes be cut, and we hear another suggesting that the cost of living be reduced. As to the cost of living, I wonder if it would solve the problem if we were able to reduce the cost of living so that the unemployment insurance benefit of $24 a week would provide the necessities of life. In 1930 hamburger was a nickel a pound, but still people did not have the nickel with which to buy it. I do not think that reducing the cost of living is the solution. I do not think that the reduction of taxes is the solution. The only solution is to put into circulation sufficient buying power to maintain the standard of living to which our people have become accustomed and to which they are entitled, and in that way bring back prosperity to our country.

I was glad to hear the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) refer to the shot in the arm administered by the Liberal administration in 1939 when some $200 million was put into circulation for the purpose, as the prime minister of that day said, of solving the unemployment problem, developing our natural resources and speeding up the war effort. If that was a suitable solution for those days, why is it not a solution today? If the government in 1939 was prepared to take measures to solve unemployment and speed up the war effort, why can similar action not be taken today to solve the unemployment problem and speed up the peace effort?

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have some facts and figures about the labour situation in the Atlantic region which I wish to put on the record. I have been pleased to see so many of the maritime and Newfoundland members following this labour debate. I wonder if it is because of their usual good attendance or the fact that they are inwardly a little more worried about the situation down that way.

I do this for three reasons. I wish to show, in the first instance, that the maritimes are a soft spot in our economy in Canada, and that when these conditions come along we feel them first. Consequently, we should have aid first. Second, I do so to answer the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) who the other evening threw out half a challenge when he said, as recorded at page 2174 of Hansard for February 17, 1954:

> . . . there has been no substantiation from their own experience in their own constituencies by hon. members opposite . . .

Third, I wish to support the official opposition's amendment which indicates that a special committee should be set up to study this situation in order to ascertain the true facts and offer recommendations.

There has been a definite falling off in seasonal activities down our way. Whereas a year ago the labour force was in balance, we now have a definite out of balance condition in all the areas of the Atlantic region. The argument that weather conditions have caused part of this trouble does not hold true this year because our shipping, agriculture, manufacturing and other industries which are dependent upon favourable weather conditions have had the very best of conditions. The latest figures published show that in the four-week period ending November 21, those working full time in the Atlantic region had decreased from 428,000 to 421,000.

A statistical report on the operations of the Unemployment Insurance Act, October, 1953, indicates that in Newfoundland 1,834 persons were receiving benefits as of November, 1953, whereas on October 31, 1952, there were only 909. My mental arithmetic indicates this is an increase of 100 per cent. In Prince Edward Island there were 719 receiving benefits in November, 1953, whereas there were only 322 at the end of October, 1952. This is an increase of 125 per cent. In Nova Scotia there were 7,814 receiving benefits this past year, whereas in 1952 the figure stood at 5,100. This shows an increase of 65 per cent, a little lower but nevertheless something to worry about. In New Brunswick, my own province, there were 6,671 receiving benefits as of November, 1953, whereas a year ago there were only 3,853, an increase of 74 per cent.

I place those figures on the record, Mr. Speaker, and I also wish to quote from a government periodical entitled "Employment and Payrolls", October, 1953. The heading is "Provincial Changes in Non-Agricultural Employment", and I read:

> Industrial activity diminished in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia at October 1 as compared with a month earlier. The largest loss, of 4·7 per cent, took place in New Brunswick, where construction, transportation, storage, communications and manufacture were quieter.

From the same publication, I quote the following:

> Four of the provinces, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Manitoba and Alberta, showed smaller payroll disbursements than in the week of September 1. The increases in that comparison in the remaining provinces were moderate. In the last year, the weekly wages and salaries have risen in all areas except Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

I should like to take a minute to briefly run through the maritimes from a local standpoint. I believe we received the first indication of trouble with the lay-off of 1,200 men in Sydney last June. A similar reduction took place in New Glasgow a little later, and that situation has been commented upon. The Canadian National lay-offs then hit Moncton and out of the 1,492 who were released across Canada, the Atlantic region lost 312 employees. The Moncton shops were affected to the extent of 240 men. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that is a tremendous loss to one community, and amounts to nearly 20 per cent of the total men the Canadian National laid off in Canada.

I should like to mention also the situation in St. John's, Newfoundland, which has not been mentioned of late. I quote from the Labour Gazette for November, 1953, page 1588:

> Virtually no change occurred in St. John's, Newfoundland, where demand and supply remained in balance. Skilled tradesmen such as engineers, plumbers, electricians, sheet metal workers and cement finishers were still in short supply and slight surpluses of semi-skilled and unskilled workers existed.

That was the situation in November, but I pick up the same magazine a month later, and from page 1724 I read:

> The labour situation in St. John's, Newfoundland, changed abruptly during November from one of balance to one of substantial surplus. The principal reasons for the change were seasonal slackening in local construction, a sharp reduction in defence construction in the outlying areas and the early closure of a number of logging camps.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I submit that these figures I have just given on the St. John's, Newfoundland, unemployment situation show one of the sharpest increases in Canada. I would be interested to hear whether in any other area there is a greater increase. The figures show that from December 11, 1952, to December 10, 1953, there was an increase of 3,347 applicants for employment.

I do not think we should pass over the situation in the constituency represented by the Minister of Labour. Mention has been made of the situation in the textile industry in Marysville, and I do not intend to review it in detail. However, I would be remiss in my duty if I did not mention it. This is a beautiful little mill town with which everyone in New Brunswick is acquainted, and it has been virtually wiped out. This town that was established by one of our fabulous figures of a hundred years ago, "Boss" Gibson, as he was known, has been relegated to the position of a derelict city.

This was called directly to my attention when, shortly after the mill was rumoured to be closed down, there appeared in the Fredericton Gleaner pictures of the textile workers bearing the caption "Textile workers still cannot quite believe that the Mill will close". There was quite a bit of naiveté in that, to my mind. The thing that surprised a lot of us at the time was the fact that evidently it had been planned for some time, yet nobody in the Marysville area seemed to be aware of it.

Also in the Fredericton area we learned of trouble in the shoe manufacturing industry. This industry has been able to survive for many years in Canada, and we all have been very proud of the fine workmanship in the shoes produced in Fredericton. In recent days we have learned of a lay-off, but I understand that perhaps these men will be taken back on. However, surely it is a warning to us that something will have to be done for that industry down our way.

Then in Saint John, in my area, the people are taking this unemployment situation stoically. They are used to ups and downs in a Liberal-managed economy. But, Mr. Speaker, let there be no mistake about it; we have had a tough winter, so far as the port of Saint John is concerned. I have some more figures I want to place on the record regarding the Saint John situation. The latest unemployment insurance commission figures on the number of unplaced applicants show 3,091 for December, 1953, as compared with 2,611 for December of 1952. The November figures were 2,731 as against 2,500 of a year ago. Unofficial figures at Christmas time had showed an increase from 2,500 to 3,400 in the twelve-month period; and while there might be some comfort in the fact that construction work could be stepped up again, this is a loss of revenue to the worker and the community that cannot be recovered.

My final figures I shall quote from the Montreal Gazette of February 17, 1954. This purports to be a report of the national harbours board which, I presume, will be available to us eventually in book form. The report is headed "Quebec Ports All Enjoyed Boosts in '53". I go down the column, and I see that in the figures for arrivals, net registered tonnage, and cargo tonnage, those of the eastern Quebec ports of Montreal, Chicoutimi, Quebec city and Three Rivers show substantial increases in 1953. I also note that Churchill, Manitoba, and Vancouver show increases. But I see, Mr. Speaker, that both Halifax and Saint John show decreases for 1953 in respect of these three categories, with the one exception that the net tonnage in Saint John was up substantially. However, as everyone knows these net registered tonnage figures do not mean very much. So we can take from these figures the fact that, of all the ports in Canada, Halifax and Saint John were the only ones which had decreases last year in tonnage figures.

I would ask consideration for the setting up of the committee recommended in the amendment offered by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I feel that the committee might look into this situation and find out as to the truth of these figures. If the figures I have placed on record are not true, I would be pleased to hear it. But there must be some investigation of these facts and figures. In addition the committee could also consider recommendations in respect of and remedies for the situation.

Along that line I should like to offer two constructive ideas for the consideration of the committee, if and when it is set up. I think the ills of the maritime provinces and Newfoundland can definitely be cured by a realistic approach to the trade situation. In that connection I should like to quote what was said by the president of the Bank of Montreal when he spoke at its annual meeting recently. It may be that most hon. members are partial to the Royal Bank or the Canadian Bank of Commerce, but I lean toward the Bank of Montreal, with its conservative estimate of the picture as it affects Canada. The president of the Bank of Montreal had this to say:

> But we must do more. We must see to it that the words "Made in Canada" continue to be, as they have become, a hallmark of good value. This is much more than a matter of government trade policy. It is a charge on Canadians in general, and on labour and management alike, to improve efficiency and to exercise moderation and restraint in wage and price demands. It is clear that in the endeavour to maintain and expand markets, both abroad and at home the test will be the price tag.

I hope hon. members will notice that I have been fairly generous in using this quotation, because it does not pin the entire blame on the government. Nevertheless we do feel that they should be taking a forward approach in this matter. We are looking to them for leadership. There are many constructive ideas which could be considered by the committee. I am thinking of one to which reference was made in Life magazine a few months ago. I shall not go into detail, because the article is lengthy, but at least it is a new idea, a new approach, that might help us in dealing with the sterling bloc that seems to be affecting us so much in our European and commonwealth trade. This article is entitled "New Daring Plan to Unshackle Trade and Enrich the Free World". There is a lot of meat in this, and I would like to see the committee consider a proposal of this kind.

I have one other suggestion to pass on to the committee in connection with the matter of government help in local projects. I do not particularly like the idea of such plans, but we do feel down our way that some help must be given for these seasonal periods that are getting worse every year. We have a plan along the bay of Fundy which commends itself to me, and there has been considerable lobbying locally in the matter.

In this connection I should like to quote the words of a person who is vitally concerned with and knows the situation down there. This gentleman was recently appointed chairman of a committee to build a new road that would link our major city of Saint John with the Fundy national park. These are his words:

> This would be a very appropriate time, as I understand the federal government is spending $300 million to build the St. Lawrence seaway project and at the time when they have joined with the province of Nova Scotia to create Bar Harbor to Yarmouth ferry service. The federal government are paying 50 per cent of the cost of construction and the C.N.R. are going to operate the service. Now is the time for the federal authorities to construct the road which I feel is an essential part of the Fundy national park, which is owned by all the the people of Canada.

I would like to review the points I have made. I started out by saying that I had three reasons for entering the debate at this late stage. I offered these, and added figures which I found in government publications. If they are not true, then I would be pleased to hear it. I have offered one or two simple suggestions which I believe the committee could consider.

Perhaps I have used a few more quotations than would be desirable, but my main purpose in doing so was that I did not wish to be accused of sensationalism, or of painting a gloomy picture, or viewing with alarm. I have tried to pick out facts and figures in the words of competent leaders throughout the country. I leave this with you.

In closing I should like to quote some words that appeared in the Globe and Mail of February 15, 1954. These are the words of Mr. H. A. Chappell of Ottawa, president of the Canadian brotherhood of railway employees:

> However, the preliminaries are just the same as in 1929.

I should like to interject here, Mr. Speaker, to say that there definitely was not a Conservative government in power in 1929. I continue:

> He said Trade Minister Howe and Finance Minister Abbott "both admitted there is a bit of a problem but it is not big enough for the government to take any strong action."
> "These autocratic and bureaucratic individuals tell us there is nothing to worry about and 1954 is going to be a nice year. I just wish I had the confidence in the immediate future they have."

This just about expresses my sentiments too, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Everything seems to have been said that could possibly have been said in this debate, yet no subject, I imagine, let alone a subject as important as the unemployment question in Canada today, can be completely covered to the point where nothing remains to be said.

There is one factor, though, that I believe has been overlooked by other speakers who have taken part in this debate, and I should like to take a few minutes to deal with that factor. I believe it has a great bearing on the question of unemployment, and I believe it will continue to aggravate the situation for some time to come.

I am sure all of us in Canada are aware of the fact that a basic cause of unemployment is the position in which agriculture finds itself at the present time. Whenever our agricultural economy is threatened or becomes depressed the inevitable result is that we have a great increase in the number of unemployed in this country. That is especially true in those industries that are dependent on agriculture.

At the moment I should like to quote some facts and figures that would seem to bear out my contention that this is important. One is the fact that over the past few years a great many farms in this country have disappeared. The people who formerly occupied that land have drifted into industries in Canada. As a matter of fact, in 1947 the University of Saskatchewan carried out a survey in that province to ascertain how many people had left the business of farming and gone into other industries. They came up with some very astonishing figures, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Bell.]

In the province of Saskatchewan alone some 43,000 farms had completely disappeared. I do not mean that the land had disappeared, but those farms had been absorbed into other pieces of land to make what are commonly termed economic units. Nevertheless, the fact remains that those 43,000 families left the farms and went into jobs in other industries.

I should like to speak for a moment on some of the reasons for that exodus from the farms to other industries in Canada, and I am sure that what happened in Saskatchewan has happened in a smaller way in a great many other provinces in the Dominion of Canada. Changing economic conditions of course forced these people off the land. Some people would contend that this was a good thing. These people were farming uneconomic units and therefore were not providing food at the least cost to the consumer. Whether that is true or not, the fact remains that this has happened.

The bulk of these 43,000 farms were composed of quarter sections or less. During the war very little farm machinery was available, with the result that because of the tremendous speeding up of production farmers found at the end of the war that their tools of production were completely worn out. After the war came to an end—I will agree farmers had made considerable money—they were accused of buying machinery and spending a great deal of money unnecessarily. They had to spend this money in order to replace the tools of production that had been completely worn out during the war.

The price of farm machinery rose very rapidly at the close of the war. I am sure a great many hon. members will recall that when the steel companies asked for a 25 per cent rise in the price of steel a great deal of opposition came from this corner of the house, because we realized at that time that if steel were given this increase it would be reflected immediately in the cost of farm machinery. Because of the opposition from this corner of the house the steel companies did not get the 25 per cent increase in the price of steel, but they did manage to get a 12½ per cent increase.

The immediate result was that the cost of farm machinery increased markedly. As the farmers found themselves in the position of having machinery to pay for, the only way in which they could do it was to buy more land and produce more to pay for the machinery. So they went out and bought land, and as a result were able to make their farming operations more economical, were able to raise more produce at a smaller cost. However, they found that they were not able to sell their production. They were not able to buy more farm machinery because they could not sell the grain they had grown. That was reflected in an unemployment situation in the farm machinery industry, the automotive industry and many other industries related to agriculture in this country. The result is that we have some half million unemployed, a great many of them having been employed in the industries I have mentioned.

This will probably get worse because 50 per cent of the farms remaining in Saskatchewan—and I said a moment ago that you will find this situation existing in other provinces—are still uneconomical. We are going to see another shift from the farms to industry because of that fact. We are going to have another fifty or sixty thousand people displaced from the land who are going to compete with employees in these other industries so far as work is concerned.

A great many things have been said during the course of this debate as to what can be done about a situation such as this. I am sure that an increase in unemployment insurance benefits would greatly help the situation. I think we all realize that is just a stopgap, and that is about all unemployment insurance was intended to be. It was intended to alleviate distress to the point where it would not be too great for the time being.

Mention has been made time and time again during this debate of the fact that we must dispose of our farm surpluses. We must introduce some forward planning into the agriculture industry to allow for the setting of some orderly production goals for farmers. Certainly I do not think the expense of such a plan should fall on the shoulders of the consumer; it should not be set up to do that. We must make a thorough examination of those industries upon which agriculture is dependent for machinery and so on, with a view to eliminating any trace or danger of monopoly or combine operations.

I think without exception every speaker has advocated the making of food available to hungry people. We are sometimes asked who is going to pay for these gifts of food to people in the underdeveloped countries of the world, because there is no doubt they would have to be heavily subsidized by the government. I would say that the people who pay for it should be the same people who are going to be asked to pay for the 50 Bristol Britannia transport aircraft which are to be built by Canadair at a cost of some $185 million to the taxpayers of this country. I say that those people should be the people to pay for any subsidization that may be necessary to get food into the hands of people in the underdeveloped areas of the world. It is time we had a closer look at this problem of world hunger and despair.

I am sure that we cannot delay much longer with these issues. We have to make up our minds whether we are going to be part of the cause or part of the cure of world conditions. As Canadians we must accept our responsibility. If we adopt the plan I have mentioned, of getting food into the hands of hungry people throughout the world, certainly it will be said that we were part of the cure rather than part of the cause for the conditions we see in the world today.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the issue before us is to my mind one of very great national importance, one that involves the lives and hopes of practically everybody in this dominion, I am somewhat amazed at the spectacle of the disinterest of the government in an issue which is of such paramount importance to the people of Canada. In a growing country like ours there is indeed nothing more important than the employment of our people. I know that no one can be pessimistic and view the greatness of our resources, our technical skill, the know-how of our people, their energy and all that is involved in this virile nation of ours. The progress that has been made in the last number of years gives hope and inspiration to our people.

I do not for a moment misunderstand the attitude of the government. Sometimes the seats are almost empty during this debate, and at other times cabinet ministers are showing very little concern about the issue. They are the greatest optimists in Canada. They make me think of the old saying—

Mr. McIvor: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member for Fort William says, "Hear, hear." He is the same. They do not care as long as it does not happen to them. I think the greatest illustration of a real, extreme optimist is the fellow who does not care what happens as long as it does not happen to him.

There are many people in this country who look upon this issue as an economic problem, and they do not expect a political brush-off. It is true that we have had great growth in this country, we have had swift and spectacular development, we have seen a country formerly agricultural in character change in a few years into a vast industrial country.

An hon. Member: By a Liberal government.

Proposed Committee on Unemployment

Mr. Rowe: Only about 13 per cent of our total national revenue is received from agriculture. We have a tremendous revenue from our industrial production. Someone says, "by Liberal policies." No Liberal policy of this country has ever—

Mr. Cardiff: In spite of them.

Mr. Rowe: It has developed in spite of them, as the hon. member for Huron says. They have been the greatest fair-weather politicians since confederation. They have been riding the gravy train for the last ten years. If it had not been for the cold or hot wars, this country would have had difficulties because of the weaknesses of Liberal administrations.

I have been here a number of years and I have known the policies of the Liberal party down through the years. Never since confederation has the Liberal party done very much to develop industry in this country. Indeed, in 1887 they fought an election over commercial union with the United States of America, and now they pack all their eggs in one United States basket. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) laughs, but it is not a laughing matter. Canada is more dependent upon the United States of America than any country in the world is dependent on any other country. No wonder congress may often consider us an adjunct during their prosperity and a victim of their recessions.

This is an important matter for a young, growing country like Canada. I know the Minister of Finance laughs, but there are a lot of people in this country—

Mr. Abbott: Laughing with admiration.

Mr. Rowe: I thank the minister for his compliment. I return the compliment more for his geniality than for any other reasons. I know these hon. gentlemen to your right, Mr. Speaker. I have been here for many years. I remember the same sayings that are being said now, the old hackneyed phrases about Tory blue ruin.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, "hear, hear"; and you were a Tory at that time yourself.

Mr. Knowles: Most of them over there still are.

Mr. Rowe: These hon. gentlemen who were talking about Tory blue ruin at that time were the very same hon. gentlemen who were printing whispers of death in their Grit newspapers in the days of Arthur Meighen. These were the same gentlemen who in 1928 and 1929 would not listen to the young workers. Oh, no; there were no hard times when hon. members to your left and others said there was unemployment. Oh, no; they were the whispers of death, not Tory blue ruin.

Mr. Speaker, there is no one in this house —and I will even give credit for this to those to your right, Mr. Speaker, as well as those to your left; and I know something of the political intrigues of both—or within sound of my voice tonight who wants a depression in this country. There is no hon. member here who wants that. Some of my hon. friends here, and a couple who are not here, have told us of their experiences in the thirties. There are many who can recall the 1930's; and there is not an hon. member in this house who is worthy of being a member of this greatest club in Canada who wishes a recurrence, even for his political satisfaction, of any depression such as that which we had in 1930.

An hon. Member: How about 1929?

Mr. Rowe: I am not concerned about the gibes and the heckling of these members who are just cutting their eyeteeth in politics. They do not disturb me for a moment, these men who show so much ability in their seats and so little on their feet. I have listened to them scores of times and I can spot them out all over this house. I notice that the members who throw gibes at my hon. friends to my left, and who make cracks here, are the ones who make the fewest speeches in this house. They are the men who stand on their feet the least but who talk so much when they are on their seats.

This is an economic problem, Mr. Speaker. It cannot be brushed off by a political brush-off. We are not preaching blue ruin. Surely there is no hon. member within sound of my voice who does not know that there is no well-run business which does not take warning for the future. As to these hecklers who started gibing, I would make this suggestion. If you are going to speak, get to your feet and say something rather than quack as you have been doing over the last number of years, adding nothing to the policy of your party, which has no policy in this regard.

Mr. Speaker, there are important issues in this country that should be faced. There is an important problem of unemployment at the present time. No one can watch the growth of this country and the great developments that have taken place, such as the discovery of iron ore and oil, and the great industrial expansion which has been brought about by other countries requiring our production in time of war, whether cold or hot, without being impressed. This government has brought about prosperity through requirements for war—cold and hot—which are instruments of destruction and need no market. On the other hand, they have been packing all their eggs in one United States basket, building their prosperity chiefly on instruments of destruction that you do not need to sell, and encouraging people in construction expansion. The products that you are importing come from countries that produce more cheaply.

I say this to you. Just pause as businessmen and think, because I have noticed there are quite a large number of hon. members today in business. While the government is in business so much, I have not observed very much business in politics during the last few years around here. Surely it is not damaging to the strong economy of a young country like Canada to point to the dangers that exist. Surely it is a contribution rather than damage. By the government's attitude you would imagine that you should shout about prosperity but whisper about the dangers; do not mention those for fear you are going to cause a depression. Oh, yes, they say; if we have a depression it will be because the Tories talked blue ruin.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: My hon. friend from Toronto says "hear, hear". He has not been here very long. May I point out to my hon. friend that you do not bluff yourself into prosperity or scare yourself into depression in a strong young country like Canada. Mr. Speaker, there is a fundamental principle at stake here. There is an issue at stake that should be looked into. We are not suggesting for a moment that we are facing any economic graveyard but I urge this upon the members of the cabinet, and there are so few of them in the house; in fact, the most important of them are all out. As I was saying, we are not suggesting that we are facing any economic graveyard. I wonder why these gentlemen want to whistle so much when there are so many people who are worried.

Mr. Weir: Who is whistling?

Mr. Rowe: You have been whistling for the last 20 years. You have been whistling a tune that you did not write yourself. You have been whistling about prosperity which came to you in spite of yourselves. Some people are born great, some achieve greatness and others have greatness thrust upon them. You have had greatness thrust upon you by world requirements. Mr. Speaker, there is no business or enterprise in Canada that is worth while which has not as its senior and most hungry partner the government of Canada, taking more out of the industries and corporations than all the shareholders combined, and hungrily trying to get more. Never before in the history of this country have we had a government in peacetime or in war taking so much from the people of Canada, the labour men and the farmers, hounding them up and down the sidelines and the concession lines for more taxes; taking more this year than they ever took before; and spending $184 million more on civilian expenditures than were spent in any year during the war or since. Yet this government goes merrily on spending more and telling the people to spend less. When I say that the government is the senior and hungriest partner of every enterprise in Canada, I do not think I am exaggerating that point.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is time we faced economic realities and forgot political expediencies. We have half a million people unemployed. The labour unions who have been here within the last week or so say there are 584,000 unemployed. The government say, "Oh, no; it is not very bad; there are only 524,000 unemployed". It is like the fellow coming home after a big night and telling his wife that he did not spend $584 but spent only $524. There may be half a million more who are on short time. There may be another half a million who are worried about what is going to happen to them. But "Oh, no", the government say, "we do not believe it; it is only seasonal".

Let no one tell you that to point to imminent danger is to do more than point to weakness in our economy. When the government is in business more than any government since confederation, then they should look at the situation. This is the only forum that we especially in the opposition can use. As to hon. members behind this row of cabinet giants and empty seats, the only speeches they make are wisecracks in approval of government policies they do not understand. While the opposition is small, Mr. Speaker, we are about the only group—we here and those to our left—who can express the views of the people. After all, parliament is the forum to which we should bring the grievances of our people.

I am satisfied that there are plenty of grievances, Mr. Speaker. The farmers of Canada are not too well satisfied when they find that over the last two or three years their profits have been falling at least 12 to 15 per cent every year, and that in many lines of products they are now getting half the price they got before. They worry because they see the great unsold surplus of wheat, greater than in any year since confederation. This is the first year in the last 25 that none of the previous year's crop has been sold. They are beginning to get a little concerned. They are worried because they see that our trade balance is half a billion dollars worse than it was in 1952.

These things concern the labouring men. They concern the people who are undertaking these expensive, extravagant and luxurious construction programs, encouraged by government whispers for fear they will call a halt to their construction. Does that help employment? Does it help employment for the government to tell us to spend less, while at the same time we know they are spending more? It does not help us. Producers are growing nervous because their prices are falling and their taxes are rising. Their costs are higher and their sales are lower. Surely it is not a crime, Mr. Speaker, to bring these facts before parliament even if we have this smug complacency of the government and its supporters, three-quarters of whom are not in the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Look behind you. Less than one-quarter of your members are sitting there.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, but look at the quality of what we have here and the quality of what you have there. Seldom in the history of the country, Mr. Speaker, have we had more people worrying about a problem outside the house and so few in the government even recognizing it at all. Seldom before have we had the people concerned about a situation and the government refusing to look. For years I listened to Mackenzie King, the great champion of Liberalism in this country, and I remember his slogan: wait and see, wait and see.

Mr. Knowles: Send it to a committee.

Mr. Rowe: Even the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) laughs at that.

Mr. Pearson: You have the wrong statesman.

Mr. Pickersgill: You have the wrong man.

Mr. Rowe: Maybe it was Mr. King's secretary. He was inspired so much by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) that he was apt to say anything. But, Mr. Speaker, we remember that statement. I was here, too, when the new Secretary of State probably inspired him to say that he would not give a Tory province a five cent piece for unemployment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was still in school then.

Mr. Rowe: The old policy of wait and see has now been changed to one of go on but don't look. Now they even refuse to look, let alone wait and see. I would urge the government to at least take one look. I do not think it would do our economy any harm. I do not think it would irritate our people. I do not think it would increase the discontent, dissatisfaction and worry of the hundreds of thousands of housewives who wonder where their husbands are going to get other jobs.

I know that deputations have come to Ottawa and presented their cases to deaf ears. I know that when the farm implement people came here the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) told them that if they could not manufacture farm implements they should go into something else. Even though these people had been working for 25 or 30 years at these jobs the government said, "Boys, it is simple enough; if you cannot make manure spreaders go back home and make baby shoes. It is all very simple. We can fix that up for you any time."

We have had this nonchalant, smug complacency on the part of the government. They think that any worrying is dangerous, that any suggestion of trouble is blue ruin, that any doubts about a prosperity which they think will never halt are whispers of economic death. No one can be pessimistic about the long-range pull, but surely no one is foolish enough to believe that the economic prosperity we have had and which has been based on such doubtful grounds, may I say, will not halt. We have shared in a general prosperity, not a prosperity based on any fiscal policy of the government.

It was only a short time ago that the government suggested in their trade and commerce magazines that no country in the world has lowered tariffs more than Canada. Yet we find that last year, with our small population, extensive construction programs and facilities to produce, half of the refrigerators sold in Canada—and there were 500,000 fewer sold because we had reached the saturation point—were imported from the United States of America.

Mr. Pickersgill: What would the hon. gentleman do about it?

Mr. Rowe: I know what you have done about it, and the responsibility is yours. I am like an outside doctor. It is time enough to prescribe when you are called in.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Rowe: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member says that a doctor does not prescribe until he is called in. I call him in, sir. Let him prescribe; let him tell us what he would do.

An hon. Member: He has no prescription pad.

Mr. Sinclair: He is a horse doctor.

Mr. Rowe: One of the ministers suggests a horse doctor. I do not want to cast the reflection that the minister who asked the question needs a horse doctor. The new Secretary of State has invited me to come in. I am not quite sure what portfolio he would give me. He was lucky to get one himself, but may I say that before he left the Conservative party we had a policy for the development of our own resources in our own country and for the industrial development of this country such as the Liberal party has never had. The initiation of industrial development in Canada came about as a result of the fiscal policies of the Conservative party which my hon. friend left a few years ago in his days of young and immature judgment.

An hon. Member: He got on the gravy train.

Mr. Knowles: Now his judgment is old and immature.

Mr. Rowe: It is a dangerous type of optimism to worry only about what might happen to yourself. It is a dangerous type of optimism when a government that has so much to do with business refuses to look at the problems of business today. Do you mean to tell me there is an hon. member here who does not know what is happening to the textile industry of Canada? Do you mean to tell me there is an hon. member here who does not know what is happening to the automobile industry in this country? Do you mean to tell me there is an hon. member who does not know what is happening to the farm implement industry in this country?

I am not saying, Mr. Speaker, that the country is going to the bow-wows. I am only saying that it is time for us to stop, look and listen. The government refuse to stop. They heckle so much that they refuse to listen, and when you show them they refuse to look. Oh, yes; never was a more smug group in power since confederation. They have ridden the gravy train so long they say, "We do not care what happens as long as it does not happen to us". Hon. G. Howard Ferguson said that was the most extreme optimism the world has ever known, that of the man who did not give a d— what happened as long as it did not happen to him.

The government of Canada could be described in these apt terms, because even though able labour representatives have come here in the last week or two at great expense they have been brushed aside as though they were just political tramps. Their recommendations were not even considered. No; they were told to go and get other jobs.

I realize it is difficult to find a solution for all these problems. I realize the burdens of government today. They are heavy. They were heavy in time of war, they were heavy during the cold war, and they are heavy in the transition period between war and peace. But, Mr. Speaker, what have this government done to prevent dumping? They rescinded the dumping regulations in 1948, and we are now experiencing dumping in many lines of industry. What have they done to enable the farmers to sell their wheat? A few years ago they had a wheat policy, but it was the most mottled socialistic type of policy anyone ever saw.

I recall pointing out to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and I regret he is not here tonight, that no one had made more economic mistakes in a shorter time than he had. I said that a day would come when the price of wheat would be less, and he would have difficulty selling it. I am not like the old woman who says "I told you so", but I leave it to you to say whether or not he listened to me. Never since confederation have we had so much unsold wheat; yet this government sits complacently by and says that all is well. The Minister of Trade and Commerce seems to think that as long as he tells the public that next year is going to be better than last year, and 1956 may be better than that, and 1957 may be better again, all will be well.

The government encourages the building of more plants, yet we are importing the same products the plants are intended to produce. Hon. members from Quebec well know what is happening in the textile industry. The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Cloutier) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) should go back to their constituencies and tell their friends there is nothing wrong.

Mr. Chevrier: Why did you sabotage our textile legislation when we brought it down?

Mr. Rowe: Since confederation you have never had a sound textile or fiscal policy. In fact you never had a fiscal policy that you did not get from the Conservative party, but you put it into force so clumsily it never worked.

Mr. Chevrier: Is that why you sabotaged the anti-dumping legislation?

Mr. Rowe: There are those who are now crawling for cover and wondering who sabotaged what, because they know that something has been sabotaged. The economy of this country has been sabotaged by a lack of policy. The industry of this country has been cramped and restricted by a government that has given no lead except to simply accept what has happened.

Down through the years our policy has been to develop our own resources within our own country to give employment to our own people. When a war or other emergency is upon us, Mr. Speaker, any policy will do. This country is powerful. No other country in the world even approaches Canada in vital natural resources, in technical skill and know-how. But, Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that today in the very lines in which we thought we were going to have great prosperity we see things slipping as they are.

I suggest that we have very little in the way of an immigration policy in Canada today. I am sorry the minister is not here tonight. Just as soon as there is a scare thrown up, then we stop bringing people into Canada. Have we established a standard of living that is too high? The Minister of Agriculture said in Rome that Canadian farmers could not afford to sell their products in the open markets of the world because they could not get enough for them. If we have set up short hours and high pay—and high taxes are as important as high pay—

Mr. Dupuis: Should they work longer hours for no pay? You spoke of short hours and large pay.

Mr. Rowe: I do not follow you.

Mr. Dupuis: I am following you all right.

Mr. Rowe: I hope you are, because then I shall not say what I was going to say. I know that some people are overpaid. If we are going to price ourselves out of the world market, as some hon. members on the other side have been bold enough to suggest, and if we are going to let products come into this country from countries that produce them for so much less, then does it not mean that we must bring more people over here to buy in our home market? This would enable them to build homes here and help develop the country. If our standard of living is so much higher than theirs and we cannot sell in some of these countries, then if we are going to function and produce immigration might be the answer.

I realize that the Geneva agreement, wisely or unwisely entered into, will be binding on this country for another year or two. But, Mr. Speaker, the day is rapidly approaching when Canada will have to look after her own economic affairs if she is going to maintain this standard of living about which we have been boasting and promising for the future. I believe it is just as simple as that. The government has new peacetime controls and is now in business more than it has ever been before. Yet the government refuses to face the problem we have.

I regret that the government will not accept our amendment. I do not think it would do any harm. Why do hon. members to your right, Mr. Speaker, refuse to look if everything is all right? Why are they afraid to examine conditions if there is no doubt about them? Why do they hesitate? Again I say that we may not be passing an economic graveyard, but why whistle so much? Why boast so much about the prosperity we have had and which some members think will never halt? While the government refuse to look at the situation today, we have some hon. members who look back for 25 years.

I regret that the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is not in his seat tonight. Perhaps I may be pardoned if I say that I am probably one of the few who have sat in this parliament as long as the hon. member. I think he entered the house by means of a by-election six months before I did. I realize that over these years we have developed warm friendships. I realize that there is no name that has been more closely connected with the parliament of Canada than the name the hon. member for Temiscouata bears. His father and grandfather sat in this house for many years. But I do say his statements the other day with reference to my old chieftain, the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, were damaging to the dignity of this house, just as they were to the member himself. I regret very much that he has besmirched the pages of Hansard with such fantastic recklessness. Since the hon. member is learned in the law and has written books about parliamentary and legal procedure, no member has less excuse for violating the traditional dignity of this house and the chivalry that has existed down through the years.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that independent of any personal friendship and in fairness to my former leader, his charges that the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett sold short before 1930 to cause a depression and bring him into power are as untrue as they are unfair, uncalled for, undignified and unworthy of the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order; the last qualification "unworthy of the hon. member" should be modified.

Mr. Rowe: Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall withdraw that. If they are worthy of him, I am sorry for him.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will realize that the hon. member for Temiscouata is not in his seat at the moment. Expressions of that kind have been withdrawn before, and I would ask the hon. member to modify it on this occasion. I do not think he needs to have that on the record to make his statement absolutely complete. It is much preferable to withdraw it than to leave it on the record.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, I certainly will bow to your ruling, because you are usually fair. I regret having used the term "unworthy". I realize, on second thought, that you are correct, and that "unworthy" is not parliamentary. I shall not substitute any other word, because parliamentary privilege does not permit the words I might use, despite my friendship toward the hon. member. I would hope that—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member leaves on the record the statement that he would use words that would not be parliamentary. I do not think he can leave that statement on the record either. The hon. member has said that the statement was untrue, uncalled for, undignified, and then he added that it was "unworthy" of the hon. member. I would ask him to delete the expression "unworthy of the hon. member". That is all.

Mr. Claxton: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. Rowe: I will—

Mr. Claxton: I would like to raise a point of order. The hon. member is referring to Your Honour—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member has suggested that you are "usually fair".

Mr. Speaker: There cannot be a point of order. I am asking the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) to withdraw. The point to be discussed now is one between the hon. member and myself. If, after that, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) wishes to rise I shall listen to him. But at this moment the point is one between the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe and myself, and I think we understand the situation very well.

Mr. Claxton: But, Mr. Speaker, if I might make plain my position, and the point of order I have raised, it arises from what the hon. member said. In referring to you he said that Your Honour was "usually fair". I suggest that that is not proper.

Mr. Speaker: It all depends upon how one looks at it. I should think that if the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe thinks I am usually fair, he is using an ordinary expression which is often used, and perhaps uses it because he does not wish to amplify any complimentary remarks he may wish to address to me. However, I have taken what he said in the spirit in which I think it was offered. I have taken it as a compliment.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, first of all I bow to Your Honour's ruling. I withdraw unconditionally my reference to the effect that any hon. member has made a statement in the house that is unworthy. I do not think even the Minister of National Defence would say that you are unfair.

Mr. Claxton: That is quite right.

Mr. Rowe: I think we are probably agreed on that.

Mr. Claxton: We are in accord then.

Mr. Rowe: However, I do just wish to remind Your Honour and the Minister of National Defence—the fragment of the entire government that is in the house tonight—that Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was not in the house, either, when the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) made his statement. So I have no apology for making my statement when the hon. member is not here, and I regret his absence very much.

But in his absence, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of National Defence, who seems now to be assuming the role of spokesman for the great party to which he belongs, if the hon. member for Temiscouata refuses to have expunged from Hansard these statements that shock all sense of chivalry in this House of Commons—statements that even Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Sir Robert Borden, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, as well as Right Hon. R. B. Bennett himself, would have forced any member of any party to have expunged from Hansard. And if he refuses to expunge them from Hansard I would ask the Minister of National Defence—

Mr. Claxton: May I answer?

Mr. Rowe: I will ask you to answer in a minute. Is there a single member in the historic Liberal party, that his stalwart supporters support so hilariously, who would not have asked that they be withdrawn? I ask the minister to answer.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member has asked me to answer. I shall be glad to do so. I would say that the hon. member for Temiscouata is always ready and able to speak for himself when he is here.

Mr. Rowe: Then, Mr. Speaker, I understand the minister speaks for the party and speaks for himself. And evidently—

Mr. Speaker: May I be allowed to speak at this moment. I know the subject matter of the amendment is one which has to do with unemployment, and I know that hon. members usually make their speeches as relevant as possible.

Mr. Knowles: "Usually".

Mr. Speaker: I use that expression in the same vein as the one that was used a moment ago. But, notwithstanding the fact that it might be highly desirable to listen much longer to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, I see that his time has expired. Indeed, it expired at 9.07. While I would be inclined to be lenient in certain cases with an hon. member who has been interrupted, I think he will allow me to say that in certain other cases one might not be so lenient, when perhaps interruptions are somewhat provoked. So I imagine the hon. member will now resume his seat because, as I say, his time has expired.

Mr. Dupuis: May I ask the hon. member a question. Is the Mr. Bennett to whom he refers the same Mr. Bennett who was supposed to blast his way into external markets?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would imagine that question should not have been asked, because the debate is one that has to do with unemployment. It is true that quite some time ago the hon. member for Temiscouata made a speech when I was not in the chair—and I am not offering this as an excuse, because if I had been in the chair perhaps I would have let him make the speech he did referring to the depression of the thirties, but the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has given a rebuttal to that speech. I was hoping that perhaps we would not go too far back on that subject. It is not one that has so much to do with the unemployment situation at the moment.

Let us get back to a discussion of the formula proposed in the amendment, that of setting up a committee to go into the matter of unemployment as it exists today. Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, it is always with some trepidation that one follows in a debate the hon. member who has just taken his seat. My reason for doing so, however, is that I do not believe one or two facts in regard to the unemployment situation have even yet been stated in their entirety. Since I last had the pleasure of speaking on the subamendment the number of unemployed in my own home town of Woodstock, Ontario, has risen from approximately 1,000 to 1,250, and 950 of these are at present drawing unemployment insurance. This, of course, does not include the large proportion of the 2,000 textile workers in the community who are on short time.

The committee suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) should be set up to examine the various factors causing unemployment at the present time. We hope that this committee, if it is set up, will look into the possibility of curing the unemployment situation. I feel there is a very definite necessity for such a committee, and this has been shown increasingly in the speeches delivered in the last day or so of this debate. The principal matter I should like to deal with in the few minutes I shall take is that which was in part referred to by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart). On February 16 last, at page 2140 of Hansard, the hon. member had this to say:

> If wages continue to increase—and apparently every union is asking for increases—we shall find that we have not only priced ourselves completely out of foreign markets but that we have come to the place where people at home will refuse to buy in the domestic market.

A little further on on the same page he said:

> Is it because there is overproduction of radios that they have not radios in those homes? No. The only reason that they have no radios is that they cannot afford to pay the price on the price tag that is hung on the radios.

Still further on the hon. member continued:

> Since the question has been asked by the hon. member to my left, I shall do so. I am sorry I did not bring the documents down to my desk. Just a few weeks ago advertisements were sent to me from two papers. One is printed in Windsor, Ontario and the other is printed just across that little bridge in Detroit, Michigan. On the same day two advertisements appeared in the two papers. They are advertisements by the Westinghouse people. They have to do with an automatic washer and dryer. In the United States on that particular day the price was $369.90 and in Windsor it was $689.

The hon. member continued his remarks, but I do not need to read any more. I think they illustrate the point I wish to deal with, namely the high prices of various products in Canada such as appliances, automobiles and automobile accessories. They have become so high in price that people cannot afford to buy them, and since people cannot afford to buy them production of these things has fallen off in Canada and accordingly people are being put out of work.

In this regard, sir, some very interesting remarks were made by one Ira G. Needles, president of B. F. Goodrich Company of Canada. Mr. Needles is a very prominent Canadian industrialist and he made these remarks in Preston, Ontario on February 17 last. I should like to read a brief report of Mr. Needles' remarks which are taken from the Kitchener-Waterloo Record of February 18, 1954, as follows:

"Canadian manufacturers are being unjustly criticized for the wide price variance between identical Canadian and United States manufactured goods. The fault rests with the federal government's 10 per cent sales and 15 per cent excise taxes, and the unrealistic practice of applying these taxes at the manufacturing level rather than the retail level."

The article goes on:

He explained that Canadian suggested selling prices must include all taxes, hidden and direct, while most United States prices were tax excluded. The government policy of collecting sales and excise taxes at the manufacturing level results in a retail mark-up being taken on the tax.

"On the popular 6:00-16 tire the tax effect is more than four times the net tax amount in the United States," the speaker said.

Mr. Needles supported his argument with examples of tire prices in both countries. "A 6:00-16 four-ply top quality tire which fits popular car models to 1934 to 1947 sells in Canada at the suggested price of $26.50 including tax. In the United States the same tire is advertised at $20.60, or 22·3 per cent lower.

However, if the sales and excise taxes totalling 25 per cent of the net selling price and the tax effect of the retail mark-up were removed the Canadian tire would sell for $22 as compared to the United States price of $20.60, a difference of only 6·4 per cent," explained Mr. Needles.

That illustrates roughly the effect of excise and sales taxes on products such as appliances, automobile parts and supplies. These taxes have another effect in a purely uneconomic way. They cause a great deal of mistrust and dissension among people in Canada. You hear statements by persons, such as the hon. member for Charlotte, who apparently have not complete knowledge of the situation and who believe that manufacturers are being protected by high tariffs and are taking an unnecessarily high mark-up. You hear questions such as why are prices so much higher in Canada than in the United States; that labour is getting too much and manufacturers are getting too much. This tax, applied at the factory level rather than at the sales level, accounts for much of the difference. The ordinary person is mistaken in his view of the matter, and the result is that labour unions and manufacturers come in for a great deal of unfair criticism. This kind of tax has stirred up a lot of mistrust in the country.

I should like to deal with another matter before I resume my seat. If a committee is set up to look into the causes of unemployment and to make suggestions for short-term and long-term remedies, there is one other thing I should like it to consider as well as the sales and excise taxes, namely the question which many of us have heard around the corridors during the last few days. I refer to the question of Canadian companies which are wholly or substantially owned by parent companies in foreign countries, and some of the foreign countries are close at hand. It is said that because of unemployment at home some of the parent companies have been in the habit of taking orders away from Canadian companies.

We have no figures available on this at the moment, but it is a matter that should be studied by the committee if it is set up. If parent companies which have subsidiaries in Canada are taking orders away from Canadian companies, then something should certainly be done about it.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker. In resuming my seat I should like to support the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that a committee be set up to look into the causes of unemployment and try to find a cure for the present situation.

Mr. H. P. Mang (Qu'Appelle): I do not want to prolong this debate any longer than necessary. Because of the few times I have been on my feet I have not burdened the house for very long, and I do not intend to do so now; but there are a few factors that enter into the employment situation in Canada which have not been emphasized, and I want to mention them, if for no one else's satisfaction at least for my own.

Employment in Canada is dependent upon certain basic realities which we are concerned with. We are employed in Canada because of the kind of country in which we live. I submit that there are four main factors which we should take into consideration as a basis for considering remedies for our unemployment situation. Unless we have a basic approach to the problem we shall neither get a long-term solution nor be able to provide an immediate solution that will stick for any length of time.

Basically we are in this position in Canada. There are four factors that enter into the picture. First of all, the basis of our prosperity is our natural resources. Our standard of living has been built up and our secondary industries have been built upon the exploitation of those natural resources, which in the main are five in number. First is the land; then the fisheries; then the millions of acres of timber area, our trees and our forests; and then the rocks which yield the minerals.

Under the rocks in Alberta we have found oil, and we are going to find oil on the prairies. That is the basis of our economy; that is the basis of all employment in Canada.

I am trying to place our employment picture in its proper perspective. I know we can sit down and do homework for five or six or ten hours, or even three or four days, and we can get statistics and gather all the figures. I have statistics piled four feet high up in my office, and if I went through them and had the ability as a parliamentarian I could make a five-hour speech on all the different factors that enter into the economy of Canada.

But that is not the important thing. Sitting down for three or four hours and getting a whole lot of figures and statistics and that sort of thing is not going to lead us to a solution. It is being able to get down to basic facts and using those basic facts as a foundation to do something, to do some high-class figuring and gather the economic factors that enter into prosperity, standards of living, markets, employment and so forth. Then and then only are we going to get anywhere.

We can get all these figures; we have had them for weeks, but they do not mean anything until we get down to the basis upon which our economy depends, upon which our employment depends, upon which our standard of living depends, upon which our exports and markets depend. Natural resources and their exploitation are the basic foundation of the economic development of this country, and provide the basis for all employment. I do not like to talk about unemployment; I like to talk about employment. Let us approach this problem of unemployment from that perspective.

The second factor which enters into this problem in Canada is the climate. We are situated on the northern part of North America. This is the second factor we have to take into consideration. We have rigorous winters. We have spring, then summer, then autumn and then our winter. Some obtuse remarks were made this afternoon about this government or hon. members on this side waiting for the balmy breezes of spring to waft us out of this unemployment era.

An hon. Member: Some hope.

Mr. Mang: Climate is a very important factor. I put it as the second factor in our employment situation. We have employment in Canada at the times we have because of our climate.

Mr. Winch: The workers have to eat in the winter, too.

[Mr. Mang.]

Mr. Mang: That is right. If my hon. friend has patience I shall come to that. I do want to be brief. The third factor is geography. We talk about trading, the necessity for trade and the influence of world trade upon our employment situation. As I say, geographically Canada is situated on the northern half of the North American continent. On the east we have the Atlantic ocean; on the west we have the Pacific ocean, and to the south of us we have the United States. I have heard a few obtuse remarks pointed at the United States, but after all they are geographically our southern neighbours. Whether we like it or not, they are there. Whether they like it or not, we are here. Our geographical position does affect the flow of our trade—if the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough) can restrain his levity—and that has a definite effect upon our markets and our employment situation in Canada.

The fourth and most important of all factors is the brain, brawn and calibre of our people working in harmony with the geographical, climatic and natural endowments which we have in this particular part of the world. If we are to get a long-term solution to our employment problem we must consider these basic factors. Until we appreciate them there is no use talking about palliatives such as increasing unemployment insurance or having the government ask the taxpayers to build dams and public services of one kind and another.

We must realize what constitutes the basis of all employment in Canada, the basis of our prosperity, our standard of living. Our natural resources are the basic reason for having people employed in this country. They have enabled us to create a certain standard of living. We contend as farmers, as workers or as citizens of Canada that we cannot reduce that standard of living. We have got up to a certain level and we want to stay there.

This standard of living has been built up on the factors I have mentioned. In order to preserve that standard of living we must trade with other countries; we just must. There are many things which we cannot produce in this country, which come only from other countries. We talk about the large project at Kitimat, but while we supply the power in order to produce the aluminum we must get the bauxite from somewhere else in the southern hemisphere, and another mineral from somewhere else. They are required in order to produce the aluminum, and thus we enter the international trading phase of the employment situation in Canada.

It is upon that basis only that we can find a permanent solution. It has been pointed out here over and over again that the responsibility rests entirely upon the government and the people who support the government on this side, the ordinary Joes like myself, who have been made to appear as though we do not realize the problem. I do not think there is any group in Canada or anywhere in the world today which recognizes the problem more definitely and more sincerely than we who sit on this side.

Since 1935, because of the policies which have been enunciated from this side of the house, we have been able to widen our markets. As one example, we have sold our wheat in 67 different countries. Within the last few days I had people in my office who came to tell me what the government should do in order to expand markets and international trade. I think this government has been remiss in not telling the people of Canada in a dramatic way that at the present time we have trade representatives who are trying to sell the goods which the people of Canada produce. We have trade representatives in practically every free country of the world. They are knocking at every door.

Just last week I was down to visit this exhibit that is being sent over to Holland. Arrangements are being made for a big trade fair at which Canada will be represented, to show the things the people of Canada make and which we want to sell. That has been going on all the time. The trouble with this government is that it is too modest in publishing its accomplishments. These things are being done all the time.

The people of western Canada were surprised to find that we were selling wheat in 67 different countries of the world. It is true perhaps not so much was sold here as there or some other place, but as the Scots say, many a mickle make a muckle; and if we sell 5 million bushels here and 10 million bushels there, the first thing we know we have got rid of some of our wheat. The same thing holds true all along the line.

I do not care what government you had sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker, they could not do more than is being done today. The whole matter of employment is tied up with the international situation. If we look at our papers today, what are the two things that we find emphasized most? We find that those two things are world peace and trade. Those two questions cover the front pages of every newspaper in Canada today. Those are the things upon which the government is working. What do you think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is doing this very night while we are sitting here listening to gibes from the opposition? He is on a good-will mission trying to establish human relationships so we can work towards peace which, in its wake, will bring confidence between nations and between peoples. Especially is he trying to establish those human relationships by which the goods that we make in this country can be exchanged for the goods made by people in other countries and which we want, thereby enriching us both.

I am getting just a bit tired, Mr. Speaker—and I know I am not the last to speak—of listening to what we have been hearing. Sometimes it gets a little bit too much under my skin and I speak in spite of myself. As a matter of fact I do not like making speeches, but on the other hand I do not like to have anyone say that we are lacking in appreciation of the difficulties presented by the international and the national situation at the present time. I do not think there is anyone in this house who can take first place in that regard over the people on this side of the house.

If we are going to get anywhere I think we must have—on the part of labour and management, in all sectors and sections of our economic life—discussions between one another. By these discussions we shall be able to arrive at a solution to the employment problem. It will not be easy. You cannot do this overnight. You cannot solve the unemployment problem by having the government act as agent for the taxpayers and hiring all those people who are unemployed.

There is one thing we must remember. I tried to mention it before. The government can spend only what the people whom they govern or for whom they do public business are ready to contribute. If they want to put a great deal more into, shall I say, the kitty, then we can spend a great deal more. There is in existence a public works program running into hundreds of millions of dollars. It will be used only when, in the judgment of the people who are in control of our government, the time is right. That time may come soon.

I just want to come back to this dramatic picture of a lackadaisical government whistling and waiting for the sap to run in the trees when these unemployed people will be back at work. I know that we in western Canada are going to be able to use all the people we can get in the development of the building programs that we have, and so forth. I know these things are not popular to say. It is always difficult to make the ordinary facts of life dramatic. The people in the opposition are very happy, I might even say, with present conditions. It is—I do not know whether I should say it or not; it is nothing personal—the answer to a political prayer, not a personal prayer. No one in the opposition wants to see unemployment. No one wants to see distress; but politically they do.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mang: I might mention something I read in the paper not so long ago. Perhaps I should not say it, but at least I saw it in the paper; I do not know whether or not it is true. One of the members in this house was in Toronto and was advising a certain political organization to see to it that handbills were handed out explaining how this terrible situation in which the people found themselves could be rectified according to the program they had outlined. I have no objection to that procedure. That is all in the deal, but that will not provide a solution.

Without holding up this house for any great length of time, what I am trying to do is emphasize that we in Canada must appreciate the basic facts with regard to our natural resources, our climate, our geography, the quality of brain and brawn of our people and their character, and the financial institutions that we have. We must harness all these, and base our thinking upon these fundamentals. Then we shall come to a long-term solution of unemployment and also be able to decide what immediate steps should be taken.

We are often told that we need a war. I am one of those, Mr. Speaker—and I think I am one of a million—who conscientiously believe that there will not be another war, for the very reason that we are today living in a different age from that in which we used to live. We are living in the Christian era of 1954, but actually we are living in the year 9 of the atomic era. The other era was ushered out with the first atomic bomb that was dropped on Japan. The new era was ushered in with the second atomic bomb that was dropped on Japan. We must now reorientate all our thinking upon the basis of this new era. I hope there will be enough brains, enough sense and enough humanitarianism among the people who are at the head of our affairs in the world—and I see plenty of signs of it—that we are not going to have another war. This cure that is being brought forward for unemployment, with respect to getting into armaments and so forth, will not, I think, persist. But we are going to bring about a solution to our employment problem, our prosperity problem and our standard of living problem only if we assess all the basic facts and base our thinking upon them and not so much upon these multitudinous bushels and barrels of figures that are thrown on to the floor of the House of Commons. A solution will be found only if we will get down to brass tacks, assess the world situation, see where we as Canadian people fit into it and then have some high-pressure thinking not only on the part of the government and private members but on the part of trade union leaders, trade union economists, farm organizations, business organizations, and the bankers of Canada; if we get together and discuss it.

This is the era of negotiation. As Dag Hammarskjold said the other day, this is the age of responsibility. Let each sector of the economic life of Canada shoulder its fair share of responsibility. We on this side of the house will take our share. Then we will go forward together to build a greater Canada.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to belabour the house with a discussion on unemployment, but I want to congratulate the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Mang) on taking such a short time and not reading four pages of print.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Green) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Fulton: It being nearly ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, may I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Fulton the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue this debate.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, March 2, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CRIMINAL LAW

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West) presented the second report of the joint committee on capital and corporal punishment and lotteries, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Fulton: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

PRIVATE BILLS

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN PETITIONS TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved:

That the petitions for private bills presented on February 26, 1954, together with the reports made thereon by the clerk of petitions on March 1, 1954, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable, namely:

1. Of Claire Labelle Cousineau, divorce;
2. Of Isabel Mary Peebles Brown Macartney-Filgate, divorce;
3. Of Margaret Pearl McNamara Rowlatt, divorce;
4. Of Eastern Telephone and Telegraph Company for an act amending its act of incorporation.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 314, for the relief of John Wright Sinclair.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 315, for the relief of Florence Jean Moffatt Tucker Johnston.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 316, for the relief of Margaret Hilda Popper Parker.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 317, for the relief of Cecil Alfred Ellis.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 324, for the relief of Domina Emerius Lefebvre.—Mr. Hunter.

INCOME TAX

ALLEGED INSTRUCTIONS TO DEPARTMENTAL STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is it a fact that orders have been issued to the staff of his department to file an affidavit, in addition to producing official receipts for charitable donations, when submitting their income tax returns, which procedure is illegal?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The answer is that instructions to members of the staff are matters of internal operation and are confidential. It is not considered to be illegal to give instructions to members of the staff with reference to their own personal income tax returns.

ATOMIC ENERGY

USE IN PRODUCTION OF ELECTRIC POWER—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. With reference to the Reuters news dispatch appearing in a morning paper headed "Atom Generator for Electricity Planned for the United Kingdom", could the minister advise the house what steps are being taken towards producing electric power from atomic energy in Canada?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Several weeks ago a group was established to make an evaluation study of atomic energy for power purposes. The members of the group are representatives of the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission and of several private power companies. The study is well advanced, and it is hoped that actual plans for the installation can be undertaken shortly.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CORNWALL—CONTEMPT OF COURT PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It has to do with the order for imprisonment made by Chief Justice McRuer against Edward Bryan of Cornwall the other day for contempt of court. Without in any way implying that this was an improper course, I would ask the minister upon what authority Chief Justice McRuer could, in fact, substitute the sentence of a fine for imprisonment after the sentence had been commenced, and whether or not the governor in council issued an order in council in order to permit him to exercise, on the Queen's behalf, mercy, clemency or pardon.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I gather from my hon. friend's question, Mr. Speaker, that what he wants to know is whether the governor general in council passed an order in council which was the basis for the order made by Chief Justice McRuer. The answer to that question is, no.

With regard to the rest of his question, may I say that it has to do with the administration of justice which, as I think he knows, comes within the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial authorities, and his question might more properly be asked of the attorney general of Ontario.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I direct to the Minister of Justice a supplementary question arising out of the answer he has just given to the hon. member for Prince Albert. I wonder if the minister would care to make some amplification or modification of his answer, because if he does not care to do so—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should put his question.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister whether, in the absence of such further modification, we are to take it that the exercise of the prerogative of clemency lies within provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend should not take that; he knows quite well that is not so, and he does not need me to instruct him on that point.

Mr. Fulton: Your answer means that.

Mr. Garson: My answer means no such thing. My answer was to the effect that if there were any defect in the procedure adopted or in the order made by the chief justice, it has to do with the administration of justice in Ontario which, under the British North America Act, comes squarely within the responsibility of the provincial authorities.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

UNITED NATIONS

SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS TO CHARTER—SUBMISSION TO EXTERNAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the government considering any amendments to the United Nations charter, in view of its revision next year? If so, is the government prepared to submit its suggestions to the committee on external affairs with a view to stimulating interest in Canada in the forthcoming revision?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question. The answer to the first part of the question is yes. Consideration is being given to this matter. With respect to the second part, as he probably knows, the 1955 assembly of the United Nations may decide to establish a charter revision conference. Pending that decision, a resolution was passed at the last assembly asking the secretariat to do certain preparatory work in this regard and make certain documentary studies. The government appreciates the interest shown previously in this matter by the committee on external affairs, and I would hope that at an appropriate time the committee might be used to give consideration to it; especially when we have received the preparatory documentary work which is now being undertaken by the United Nations secretariat.

FAO COMMITTEE MEETING—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is Canada represented at the meeting of the FAO committee on commodity problems dealing with the problem of agricultural surpluses, which is currently being held at Washington?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My colleague the Minister of Agriculture is more familiar than I am with FAO problems, so I shall ask him to answer the question.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The Acting Prime Minister has shown me a copy of the question, and the answer is that, when the committee was set up during the FAO conference at Rome to meet in Washington to consider commodity problems, Canada was not placed upon it. We have not a representative there, but it was understood that if it was necessary to have an observer they could call upon Mr. Hopper, who is at the embassy in Washington representing Canadian agriculture, and if they were considering questions which might concern Canada it was hoped he would be called in for discussion. Up until now he has not been called upon.

POSTAL SERVICE

ALLEGED DELAY IN MAIL DELIVERIES TO SERVICE PERSONNEL IN KOREA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): On Friday last, the hon. member for Prince Albert asked me a question seeking information about the delivery of mail in Korea. Today the hon. member for Greenwood called my office seeking similar information. Since speaking on Friday last to the hon. member for Prince Albert, I have had inquiries made in regard to mail service to the troops in Korea and am advised that there has been no justifiable cause for complaints. I have also had inquiries made at the Department of National Defence and have received a similar reply.

I thought that hon. members would like to know also that up to the present it has been possible to forward all letter mail by air, whether prepaid for air or surface transmission. It so happens that the necessary extra space has been available on the aircraft, and advantage has been taken of it to transport surface letters as well by that means. Records show that it generally takes from three to six days for this mail, which is dispatched three times per week from Vancouver, to reach the troops. It naturally takes longer for parcels. They are dispatched on an average once a week, with a transmission time of about one month. The elapsed time will vary, depending on whether or not the parcel makes a good connection with the transport.

We are confident that the mail service to the troops in Korea is operating on a sound basis, but I would like to assure the hon. members that if they know of any specific instances where mail has been unreasonably delayed, and will give me the facts, I shall be glad to have a detailed inquiry made and take any corrective measures that may be possible.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask a supplementary question? Will the Postmaster General ascertain if there is any means of increasing the frequency of mails, perhaps by co-operation with the United States authorities, because at the present time there seeems to be dissatisfaction amongst the troops?

Mr. Cote: I shall be glad to look into the matter.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MCCULLOUGH—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF HON. MEMBER FOR QU'APPELLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. On page 2562 of Hansard for March 1, 1954, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Mang) interjected the following remark into his speech:

> . . . if the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough) can restrain his levity . . .

I take exception to that, Mr. Speaker. There was no levity on my part and no interjection. However, I may have had a pained expression due to the apparent lack of understanding of the serious ramifications of unemployment indicated by the words of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

JOHNSTON-WESTERN CANADA PROJECT —ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the Secretary of State if he would please make inquiries to see whether he can expedite an order of the house passed in my name on February 8, 1954, for a copy of letters and other correspondence in connection with a V.L.A. project in the vicinity of Kamloops. I point out that it is nearly a month now since the order was issued.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Certainly, sir.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN WEDGE CAP INSIGNIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he has a reply to my question of February 15.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have a reply to the question put by the hon. member, but it does give rise to some other matters which should be dealt with at the same time and they are still receiving consideration.

Deportation of Polish Seaman

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. When will he reply to the question which I asked him, and which is of the utmost importance in the dominion, concerning the replacement of the crown in the insignia of the Royal Canadian Air Force? I do not want any other answers, but I want the one answer.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, apparently the hon. member did not hear or understand the question put by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, which preceded his question by about a week, and to which I have just given an interim reply. The urgency of this matter may be judged from the fact that the order, not taking away the crown but introducing a new badge, was passed just over two years ago. The badge came into use about a year ago.

Mr. Ferguson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, this government does many things about which very few people hear until years later.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Ferguson: On a question of privilege, this is an urgent matter for all Canadians, and I want a reply.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, March 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply.

DEPORTATION OF RICHARD NOWALINSKI

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, by ancient usage and time-honoured custom an opportunity is granted any private member who has a grievance, or who feels that an injustice has been done to any private citizen, to bring this to the attention of the government and the house before supply is passed. I have such a grievance which I wish to place before the house at this time.

On July 7 of last year the Seaboard Shipping Company of British Columbia notified the immigration officers in Vancouver that a certain Polish seaman had deserted from a vessel of theirs, which was known as the Nordpol. At the same time the captain of the Nordpol notified the immigration authorities at Chemainus, British Columbia, that this seaman had deserted. The seaman's name was Richard Nowalinski.

Richard Nowalinski on the following day reported to the immigration officer in Victoria. There he explained the situation to the officer. He was granted a conditional release on a bond of $1,000 being placed on his behalf by the president of the Catholic Women's League of Victoria, and other people who are interested in looking after the welfare of new Canadians arriving in this country. As a result of this bond being deposited, Richard Nowalinski was able to obtain employment as chief engineer on one of the vessels of the Victoria Tug Company Limited, he having become an experienced engineer and one familiar with diesel engines in Poland before arriving in this country.

The order for deportation was eventually passed and was subsequently appealed by Richard Nowalinski, the Roman Catholic bishop of Victoria and other people supporting that appeal. Mr. W. McGregor, managing director of the Victoria Tug Company, reported that this man's work had been eminently satisfactory, and offered him a permanent position with that company.

However, on the request from the Seaboard Shipping Company in a letter signed by Mr. E. J. Moller of that company to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in Vancouver, Nowalinski was tranferred to Vancouver. The request was made in these words:

> Please arrange to have him—
> That is Richard Nowalinski.
> —transferred to your Vancouver jail at your earliest convenience.

That was dated July 22, 1953. That Polish seaman remained in the Vancouver jail of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, in spite of numerous protests by various people, until the 31st day of December, 1953, when, at almost a moment's notice, he was hurried away from Vancouver under police escort, was sent across to Vancouver island, and on to Port Alberni, where he was placed on board another vessel and was shipped out of the country.

The unusual circumstances of a man who apparently had only two crimes against him, one that of leaving a ship, and the other of hatred of communism and a determination to get away from behind the iron curtain, were brought to my attention at the end of last year and caused a great deal of interest on the Pacific coast. When it was found that an order had been issued for his deportation and that an appeal was made, a form known as immigration form 55 was signed as an application by two people, Mrs. W. Rogers, who is head of the Catholic women's group looking after immigrants coming to this country, and Mr. William McGregor, managing director of the Victoria Tug Company, asking that Richard Nowalinski be granted permission to come to this country and reside here.

After giving a brief description of his illegal entry into Canada and explaining that he worked as chief engineer on board a tug owned by the applicant's company, before being sent over to Vancouver, the application then went on to say:

The applicant therefore knows—

That is, the managing director of Victoria Tug Company.

—the proposed immigrant personally and knows his qualifications, and is most anxious to obtain his services, as it is impossible to find replacement for this man in this area.

The report goes on to say:

Representations have apparently been made to the minister by the local Roman Catholic bishop and Mr. McGregor.

And then, in the words of the immigration official who took this submission:

This application is submitted at this time as the applicant feels that since the proposed immigrant is a refugee and cannot obtain a valid passport from any country, he will be unable to land at any port to make application on his own behalf for admission to Canada.

Then the application goes on to say that the settlement arrangements are satisfactory, and this is signed by the immigration officer and approved by Mr. J. McDonald, acting immigration officer in charge at Victoria.

However, at the request of the shipping company, this man was taken from the employment where he was earning money and his own keep, and carrying out a useful job, and was placed in jail in Vancouver. That was in July of last year. From his cell in the immigration jail he wrote to various people soliciting their help. Amongst those to whom he wrote was the president of the United Nations. He set out his case, and that appeal was eventually sent to the immigration branch here in Ottawa. The appeal is given in the letter which Nowalinski wrote to the United Nations' office. The office of the high commissioner for refugees outlines the experiences which this unfortunate man had after he escaped from Poland in order to avoid the penalties which an anti-communist might expect in a country behind the iron curtain. He wrote not only on behalf of himself, but on behalf of two other immigrants, one a Yugoslav and the other another Pole who were then also in the immigration office jail at Vancouver.

This is his letter to the president of the United Nations:

We are respectfully approaching you with a request for the help of the United Nations, as we do not know to whom or to where we should properly apply. We are political refugees from Poland and Yugoslavia, and would like to know whether the so-called right of asylum actually exists, and if so, where we have to apply for it.

I have so far sought it many times, in Sweden, Norway, Belgium, Egypt, England and now Canada, but all those countries categorically turned me down.

I fled from Poland on a Swedish ship in 1949, and am to this very day without the right to stay in any country at all. From the Swedish boat I took refuge in Egypt, where I asked for asylum. This was refused, and I spent three months in prison there, after which I was put on a Finnish boat. When I arrived in the United Kingdom, the local immigration authorities put me in prison, where I spent fourteen days before being returned to the boat I had arrived on. On reaching Belgium, I discovered that the boat was bound for Poland, so I naturally ran away, and reported to the police in Antwerp, asking whether I could stay in Belgium. They arrested me and I spent another two months in prison, after which they put me on a Norwegian boat. Arriving in Norway several months later, I applied to the local authorities for the right to stay in that country, but, of course, met with refusal. After six weeks in prison, they packed me off on another Norwegian boat, on which I spent two years.

In the meantime, I wrote on several occasions to the immigration authorities in Norway and to IRO in Paris, likewise receiving negative replies. At the moment, we are being detained by the immigration authorities in Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada, for being in Canada illegally.

As we have never been punished for criminal offences, we cannot understand why, or for how long, we must continue to wander like vagabonds over the face of the earth and lodge in prisons all over the world.

At the time of the German invasion, we fought in defence of our country's freedom, and I personally served for three years in the Polish army.

The current political situation is such that it is absolutely impossible for us to return to our homeland. Yet no one else will take us in.

Accordingly, we respectfully ask the United Nations to examine our difficult position, as there is no other authority which is willing to take an interest in us or to look into our circumstances.

As none of us have a valid passport, it is impossible for us to seek legal entry or immigration into any country whatsoever. All we want is to be able to find a permanent home and work, no matter where. We would like to mention that our ages range from 25 to 32, and that we are skilled workers, and do not wish to spend our lives wandering all over the place in ships.

We are human beings, and as such are surely entitled to settle down in a free country, and to stay and work there. We earnestly beg the United Nations once again to consider our difficult plight, and await your favourable reply very anxiously, but also very hopefully.

That letter was sent on with the request that this man's condition be inquired into. It was pointed out that the purpose of writing was to urge that the case be given every consideration and to state that if an investigation disclosed that these persons were worthy of help the international rescue committee would be willing to provide them with some financial assistance. It would also be glad to contact some voluntary or ethnic societies in Vancouver to solicit their assistance in finding jobs. The letter goes on to state:

We have already contacted the Polish Canadian congress with this object in view.

Nowalinski was retained, as I have already pointed out, for this incredibly long time in the jail in Vancouver. The reason given for his retention all that time was that the ship which had brought him to Canada was expected at almost any date. Then there was another ship of the same company that was going to come, and it would take him away. In spite of the representations which were made, in spite of the fact that it was pointed out time and time again that this man had no opportunity of making a proper application to come to Canada, that wherever his ship landed he would not be allowed to set foot on land legally, and therefore would be denied the facilities of making proper application, this man was eventually deported. The application to which I have already referred was submitted in Canada on August 26 by the managing director of the Victoria Tug Company. Shortly after that Nowalinski became quite seriously ill and despondent. He appeared before a medical officer, and that medical officer reported that his condition was quite serious; that he was in a very depressed state of mind and the doctor was fearful that if he was placed on board a ship and sent away he might commit suicide.

This man had a family, with one child, who were in Poland. He had never heard of them since 1949 when he left that country. He did not know whether they were alive or not. I said they were in Poland; they were in Poland if alive, but he had had no communication with them at all.

When this matter was brought to my attention, I asked the minister's department whether it would be possible to allow this man out of jail again, as his health was suffering; whether it would be possible for him to go to his friends in Victoria just for Christmas. The minister's department concurred in that suggestion. They felt it would be perfectly reasonable to allow him out of jail provided that adequate bonds were put up, and he could go to his friends to have a rest and get a decent meal at the Christmas holiday season. In fact, the department here wired their branch office in Vancouver instructing that this man should be released, but apparently that did not meet with the approval of the shipping company, which seems to have had some concern in this matter. I have a letter which was sent by Mr. E. Just Moller, operating department of the Seaboard Shipping Company Limited, to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, Vancouver, dated on Christmas eve, December 24, 1953, which reads:

> Referring to your telephonic suggestion that Nowalinski should be set free because of the Christmas holidays, and considering the six-month stay in your custody, we regret that we cannot agree. The owners have instructed us to sign him on board the M.S. Nordpol, due in Seattle about January 1, 1954.

Despite the instructions sent out from the office of the minister here in Ottawa to the officials in Vancouver the shipping company overrode those instructions. They said, this man may not go out to his friends for Christmas. It must be remembered that the only crime was of trying to escape from behind the iron curtain. However, there were people on the Pacific coast who were interested in this man's welfare and they besought the office of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in Vancouver to do something rather than to wait for the Nordpol to arrive in Vancouver.

Then an incident occurred, which was perhaps happy for the department and the shipping company. Another vessel arrived on the Pacific coast. There had been strikes and men had left the vessel because of poor conditions. This vessel has not a very savoury reputation on the Pacific coast. There was thus an opportunity for the local officials of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration to shanghai or press-gang this unfortunate man and send him under police escort on board this vessel, the S.S. Calygera, just an hour or an hour and a half before the vessel sailed. There was no opportunity for him to get in touch with his friends to say goodbye or anything like that.

The vessel left Port Alberni and has made its way to Capetown, South Africa. This man wired from Capetown indicating that he was anxious to know whether it would be possible for him to submit an application form from Capetown for re-entry into Canada. He was told that there were no immigration facilities in Capetown and he must wait until such time as he reached some port in Europe where he would be allowed to disembark and go before the proper medical authorities and make a new and proper application for entry into Canada. Under date of February 22 the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) wrote to one of the parties who were interested in Nowalinski's welfare and he concluded with this remark:

> However, as the offence against Mr. Nowalinski is solely desertion, this will not be held against him if he applies for permission to return to Canada through the proper authorities and is found able to comply with all the requirements.

If this unfortunate man is not able to get off his vessel or if his vessel does not go to a port where there are the proper facilities of the immigration department, how will it be possible for him to submit a proper application? Already an application has been made by a man who is prepared to give him employment with the Victoria Tug Company. He has been tested there and found to be a hard worker and a suitable man.

I am the last person in the world to condone any form of desertion. I realize how essential it is for the government and the immigration authorities to clamp down on seamen deserting ships and trying to make illegal entry into Canada. But surely there is a difference between a Lascar seaman trying to desert from an ordinary freighter and a refugee who is trying to find asylum after having escaped from behind the iron curtain. Surely when any responsible person in Canada, such as a director of a company, is prepared to put up bond—I have it in writing—of $50,000 for this man, or who has already put up a bond of $1,000 and guarantees him a job; surely when this man has made a proper application on the form supplied by the department endorsed by a responsible lady who is president of the Catholic Women's League of Victoria and who has a working organization behind her guaranteeing this man employment, guaranteeing him a home, prepared to take him into her own home; surely when she is supported by the clergy of his church, one of whom is an escaped Pole, I cannot help thinking that a distinction should be made between a refugee of that nature and an ordinary seaman coming to this country.

I feel that I have been justified in raising this issue at this time. I appeal to the minister to take some action in connection with this case and not to have this poor unfortunate man being shipped from vessel to vessel and hounded all over the world without any place to go, without any opportunity of filling in the proper papers, when an application for his admission into Canada has been signed already.

I know that Mrs. Rogers is not a close relative, but this man has proved his worth. I appeal to the minister to take some action in connection with this case and see if something cannot be done, and also to give consideration to similar cases where refugees from behind the iron curtain are seeking asylum in this country.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief and indicate almost immediately something which probably will meet with the approval of my hon. friend. May I say without any criticism whatever that had the hon. member spoken to me before this debate commenced, or had he notified me any time in the last 24 hours that it was his intention to raise this point, we probably could have avoided this debate. I shall conclude what I have to say by reading a departmental memo which came to my hand just now after the hon. member began speaking and for which I sent, not having had any notice up to that time that the hon. member intended to raise this point. The memo reads:

> General Pearkes now inquires as to whether this man may be examined and what travel document we will accept as it is indicated this man has not been allowed to remain or land in any country. He understands—

I presume that is the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

> —that the vessel on which he is now employed will be proceeding to the United Kingdom from South Africa.

I paraphrase the next sentence for obvious reasons, that certain inquiries are now satisfied.

> When examined at Victoria, Nowalinski was in possession of a Free Poland passport issued at Dublin, Eire, on May 17, 1950, revalidated to September 4, 1951.
> In order that the case may be concluded, I would recommend that the application of Mr. McGregor be accepted as meeting the requirements under section 18 (2) of the regulations and that our London office be instructed that they may grant visa on his meeting health requirements.

There follow the initials of the recording officer and a stamp on the corner "approved". I take it that that would not have to come to my attention since the department would have taken the appropriate action.

I hope that this satisfies my hon. friend. I agree he has every reason to raise this question because we are regularly confronted with the problem he has put so clearly, namely, how to distinguish between an ordinary stowaway and one who is conceivably a refugee who happens to have taken up seafaring as the only means of getting away from circumstances of which he disapproves.

Mr. Pearkes: I endeavoured to get in touch with the minister's office at noon and I spoke to his officials this morning, and I might mention that the papers which I asked for last January 25 were only tabled yesterday.

SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS— C.N.R. PENSIONERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will be equally prompt in endeavouring to deal with a grievance which I wish to bring to his attention and to the attention of the house. I shall try to make my statement of the matter as brief as I can, but I should point out that many of us have a real grievance in that the Minister of Finance has not yet dealt with the matter about which I wish to say a word at this time.

I refer to the continuing plight of superannuated civil servants, particularly those in the lower brackets, and also to the plight of the retired employees of the Canadian National Railways, especially those who are on the basic pension of only $25 a month, or little more.

It may be asked why I direct both of these matters to the attention of the Minister of Finance. I do so because it has been made clear that from the government's point of view the only way in which the government could deal with these matters is by way of putting an item in the estimates. When I have raised this matter previously during discussions on bills relating to civil service pension matters, the Minister of Finance has said that the only way to provide for an increase for superannuated civil servants in the lower brackets would be by way of an item in the estimates.

When I have raised the question of low pensions received by many C.N.R. employees it has been suggested to me that this was a matter for the C.N.R. to deal with, but as yet the C.N.R. has not taken any action, in reply to which I have pointed out that there is one small group of railway pensioners who are given some advantage by an item in the estimates. Hence both of these matters call for items to be placed in the estimates.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows, before the end of this month the Minister of Finance, if he follows the annual practice, will be tabling supplementary estimates. We usually get that document towards the end of this month, and incidentally we are usually told that it has to be put through by the end of March.

I imagine the Minister of Finance is working on these supplementary estimates at the present time. That is the reason why I feel the matter is of sufficient urgency for me to raise it today in the hope that I can yet persuade the Minister of Finance to put two items in the supplementary estimates to cover the two groups of people to whom I have referred.

I do not wish to indulge in any form of witchcraft or fortune telling. I would not want to come under the ban of the Criminal Code in that respect. But I will go so far as to make the prediction that the Minister of Finance will not be bringing down supplementary estimates on many more occasions. In fact, since June 22 is not so far away I would not be surprised if on or about that date there might be quite a change in the life and affairs of the Minister of Finance. Perhaps it is surprising that I should pick on that particular date but it happens to be the date when the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada becomes 75 years of age and I wonder whether there might not be a change involving the present Minister of Finance.

At any rate, I am sure the Minister of Finance, who has done a job which hon. members on his side of the house commend so highly, would like to tidy up some of these loose ends before he lays down this job, and I appeal to him strongly not to go out of his department leaving unfinished the problem of doing something about the pensions of these two groups of people.

With respect to the case of the superannuated civil servants, the minister knows that the figures as to their situation have been placed on the record and before the public on many occasions. I have in my hand at this moment a copy of Hansard for December 2, 1953, and I am looking at page 538 where answers are reported to questions which I asked at that time. I find that there are 325 retired civil servants drawing pensions of less than $20 a month; I find there are a total of 1,549 drawing pensions of less than $40 a month, or a total of 2,395 drawing pensions of less than $50 a month. Likewise there are 1,025 widows of retired civil servants whose pensions are less than $20 a month. There are 2,962 widows whose pensions are less than $40 a month, and there are 3,736 widows whose pensions are less than $50 a month.

As the minister knows, other jurisdictions have dealt with this problem. The government of the United Kingdom has passed bills on a number of occasions adding supplementary amounts to the pensions being received by civil servants already retired.

The United States government has done likewise. There have been at least two or three times when the position of those already retired has been improved, and when that government has recognized its responsibility to help people in view of the increase in the cost of living since they went on pension.

In this country at least two provinces, the province of Newfoundland and the province of Saskatchewan, have done something for their retired civil servants, whose pensions were in the low brackets. There are a few instances of private employers doing something along these lines. The Canadian Pacific Railway, which is not noted for its generosity in these matters, has done at least something with regard to the pensions of those in the lower brackets, between retirement and the age of 70.

As the minister knows, I believe the government should take the lead in these matters instead of always holding back and following only what everybody else has done. However, the minister tells us, with respect to matters like this, that in his view the government should follow rather than lead. I suggest a lead has been given and that the minister should not delay any longer in dealing with this very important question.

It has been somewhat annoying to me, I may say, to have the minister tell me time and time again when I raise this question that those I am interested in have his sympathy too, that he appreciates the figures I have put forward, and so on, and that he is always prepared to give the matter consideration. But in spite of that nothing has yet been done. In the meantime, as I believe he knows, a great many representations have been made by organizations representing these people. They have been made to the minister, to other members of the government and to members in all parties and in all parts of the house.

Naturally I am in touch with a good many of these organizations, and I think it is only fair to say they have indicated to me that there have been many favourable responses from hon. members in all parts of the house. I believe that would indicate that there is wide support among the private members of this house for something being done in respect of these groups of people.

I have already given figures respecting superannuated civil servants. Similarly, Mr. Speaker, the retired employees of the Canadian National Railways include a great number whose pensions are ridiculously low. Something was done a couple of years ago by way of improving the pension plan of the Canadian National Railways. There is no doubt but that the new plan improved the position of quite a few of those who were already retired. In fact, as of March 16, 1953, according to Hansard for that date, at pages 2953 and 2954, answers to certain questions of mine showed there were 2,728 former employees who had had their pensions increased by an average amount of $17.13 a month. However, even in respect of the improvement that took place in the case of C.N.R. employees already retired, I have to point out that with regard to those whose pensions were less than $50 a month there were only 375 who got an increase, and their average increase was only $5.76 a month. On the other hand, if you go to the upper brackets you will find that those whose pensions were $150 a month or over before the change was made had an average increase of $61.23 per month. There were only 119 of those.

Similarly, it is true that those still in the service of the Canadian National Railways have had their pension plan improved even as the civil servants of Canada have had their pension position improved so far as those still in the service are concerned. But there are these two groups, the superannuated civil servants on the one hand and the retired employees of the C.N.R. on the other, who were retired some time ago when their pension benefits were much lower and for whom nothing has been done.

May I say briefly with respect to retired Canadian National employees that, according to the figures on the pages of Hansard for March 16, 1953, to which I have already referred, there are still seventeen whose pensions are less than $25 a month. There are 3,206 whose only pension from the Canadian National Railways is the basic pension of $25 a month. There is another group of 5,832 whose pensions by various combinations range between $25 and $50 a month. I might say that the cut-off point in these figures is $49.99 a month, so when you add them all together there are 9,055 retired employees of the C.N.R. whose pensions from the railway are less than $50 a month.

It is those two groups in the main, the superannuated civil servants numbering 2,395 and 3,736 widows, together with the 9,055 retired employees of the C.N.R., all of whom are receiving less than $50 a month, about whom I feel very strongly that something should be done at this time. I am not going to spend time using the kind of argument that could very well be used, the kind of argument that the man in the street is using very forcefully these days, namely that there seems to be money available for increases of other kinds and there seem to be more increases coming in addition to the ones that have already been put through at this session of parliament. There is a motion on the order paper involving a change with respect to certain other salaries from a statutory basis to a basis whereby they will be decided by the governor in council. If I know how these things work, that means an increase is coming there. I suppose the clamour in some newspaper columns for increases in the salaries of judges will probably be looked upon favourably by the government.

The man in the street sees that money seems to be available for people in much better economic circumstances than the retired pensioners to whom I have referred. Why is it that year after year goes by with nothing being done by the government to meet the plight of these people, as well as other groups in whom I am keenly interested? As the minister and the house know, my information and my files on these two questions are voluminous, and I could go on but I will not. The case is on the record over a number of years and I am sure, as I have already said, that there is wide support amongst private members in all sections of the house for something being done for these people. I ask the minister not to treat this just as the same old debate that the member for Winnipeg North Centre raises every once in a while, not just as something he has got to get rid of somehow, but rather as the serious question that it is.

If I am right, the minister is now in the midst of preparing the supplementary estimates which will be brought down for the end of this fiscal year, which is at the end of this month. I plead with him in the name of these two groups of people to include in the supplementary estimates the necessary items to increase these pensions, particularly for those in the lower brackets. Let there be no further delay.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend will allow me, I have a budget meeting at four o'clock and I think perhaps I should make my views clear on this question in case we are delayed. I shall try to follow the example set by my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris), and be brief in dealing with this very important matter.

Mr. Knowles: And as generous?

Mr. Abbott: I think I can do so because I have had to deal with this question on a number of other occasions. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is of course not the only member of the house who is interested in the matter. A great many members are interested in it. I have received representations from many on both sides of the house. He has cited before the figures he cited this year as to the number of pensioners under the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Canadian National pension plan who are in receipt of relatively small pensions.

I am not too familiar with the Canadian National pension plan because of course that is primarily the responsibility of the management of the Canadian National Railways. But I am familiar with the civil service superannuation plan because I am responsible for introducing such amendments to that plan as are made from time to time. It means very little for my hon. friend to quote figures as to the size of these pensions without indicating the length of service of the pensioner.

[Mr. Knowles.]

In point of fact, the civil service superannuation plan is probably the most generous pension plan in Canada. It is certainly one of the most generous and one of the most favourable for the pensioner. It is quite a bit more favourable than the pension plan of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to which the hon. member alluded, and in which I understand some adjustments were made.

It means very little to cite figures of pensioners who are in receipt of pensions of $15 to $20 a month. They may only have been, and probably were, in the government service a comparatively short time. One must assume that while they were employed in other walks of life they were or should have been, in common with hundreds of thousands of other Canadian citizens, making some provision for their own pension needs. I have always felt that the position of the civil service pensioner was no different from that of any other Canadian citizen who may not be eligible for a pension plan, who may not be working for a company which has a pension plan in force or is self-employed and is required to furnish his own pension either by buying annuity policies, by buying a government annuity, by investing in bonds, or by any other form of investment which he believes will make the best provision for his later years.

Since the recipients under pension provisions of that kind have no means of getting an automatic increase in their pensions because of the effect of inflation or any other cause, I have never felt that those who are in receipt of pensions provided by taxpayers who are putting up the money for them should be in a better position than those taxpayers themselves. It is for that reason I have consistently said in the house I felt there was not a case for treating civil service pensioners in any different way than the holder of any other contractual obligation. I still hold that view. Under those circumstances, I think my hon. friend will appreciate that I have no intention of recommending the inclusion in the supplementary estimates of an item to provide for an increase in those pensions.

Mr. Knowles: And the Liberals applaud that statement.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Notwithstanding the reasons which the minister has given, I feel that the members of this house and the government ought to give most serious consideration to the plight of all those who now find themselves unable to live upon the incomes which they are receiving, and who are unable to increase those incomes by any means available to them. I feel that we cannot possibly escape that responsibility. In a country that is producing $24 billion worth of goods a year, there can be no conceivable excuse for permitting anyone to suffer from the lack of the necessities of life.

While I am dealing with that question, in respect of which I support the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I wish to direct attention once more to the intolerable plight of our senior citizens. The cost of living has so increased that our senior citizens are again the victims of slow starvation. This is a matter not to be tolerated at all by the people of Canada, and particularly by the members of parliament in this dominion.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion to go into committee of supply?

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf) in the chair.

Mr. Harris: Perhaps I might say just one word to repeat the understanding which I think we reached about the manner in which this particular item would be dealt with. I think it was understood that the item being called covered the construction of the national film board building in Montreal. Of course, it covers as well all the other matters in the province of Quebec, but it was agreed that we would confine discussion at first to the business of the national film board building and when that was completed we would carry the item after other discussion that there might be on that particular item. We would then revert to the item covering general administration of public works.

The national film board, as hon. members know, Mr. Chairman, has been confined to nine or ten buildings in the city of Ottawa since its inception, and under those conditions have done what I consider an excellent job on behalf of the public of Canada in the production and distribution of film. The film board has twice been reconstituted, so to speak, that is, a revision of its statute and its activities, the last one being in 1950, and there was a parliamentary committee of this house in 1952.

The decision which has been made to build the buildings to house the activities of the board in the city of Montreal or Ville St. Laurent, as it is more properly known, dates back at least two years and was communicated both to the committee, as I recall it, and to the house. The references were set out in certain remarks made by the Prime Minister, and referred to by the Leader of the Opposition earlier in this session, and will be given in more detail as the debate proceeds, if there is a debate. The real purpose, however, of building at this moment is to house in one building the activities of the board because of the manifest inefficiency which now exists through having to conduct their operations in nine or ten places. It is accompanied as well by a policy decision that the national film board, generally speaking, with its present activities, is a continuing need in this country, and one which this government should maintain.

I quite realize that there has been at various times criticism of the film board and its activities. But, as happens in so many cases, that criticism is in our opinion more than offset by the support given to the board by the many public bodies, and by the obvious demand for the product they turn out.

The board therefore presented to us over the past three or four years urgent requests for the construction of a suitable building. Now, before it was decided to accede to these requests it was passed upon, first by the Massey commission, and secondly by J. D. Woods and Gordon Limited. And I might interject here that I did not suggest in the statement I made earlier in this session that the J. D. Woods and Gordon report recommended a site in the city of Montreal. If any such impression was gained from what I said it was unintentional on my part. It was merely that they recommended a building, and the government accepted that decision.

I have noticed in the press that the building itself has been described in various terms, very few of which have any semblance of reality. It is quite true that the contract price was $5,250,000, and that is a considerable sum of money to spend at any time. But the building now contains only those items which in the opinion of the board are essential for the proper functioning of their activities.

There may be marble walls, as I have heard it reported. If so, then they are very limited, in the entrance hall itself. No luxury of that type is being indulged in, in any way. However, the equipment of the building, the essential equipment, which now is not owned by the board, and which they feel is necessary for a proper carrying out of their duties, as laid down by them, is the establishing of a stage from which they can take acting films for use in their work. They now have to rent similar facilities, and in fact do from time to time rent those facilities from others.

It is true that there is in the building a small auditorium, one which is to be used of course for the viewing of films as they are being produced, as they are being cut, and so on. The committee will understand that the production of films is an expensive process. One does not do this without the expenditure of some money. Indeed, I believe the estimates contain an item in the order of $3,200,000 this year for the national film board. This sum is expended in the production of approximately four hundred films of one kind or another, including newsreels, feature length films, so called, dub-ins, and other types of films.

For that reason, and after careful consideration of the facilities available in private industry, and recognizing that the government's position in respect of the board has always been that it is providing certain results which could not be provided otherwise, and after a review to see if that is still the case, the government concluded that it was, and thought we should vote this sum of money for the purpose of providing a building for the film board.

I do not propose to develop anything further at the moment by way of justification for the expenditure. The details of the building are of course more properly within the knowledge and competence of description of the Minister of Public Works. To some extent my remarks may have been out of order, except for the belief on our part, when we discussed this matter the other day, that it would not be possible, Mr. Chairman, to confine the debate wholly to the actual building itself, since no doubt hon. members would like to discuss whether or not any building is needed.

However, the details of that building, its probable cost and the information as to its value, can be discussed by the Minister of Public Works, who is not only now in the position of having the terms of the contract before him but as well in my opinion, as I said before, is responsible for the present efficient management of the national film board and has brought it to the point where I think it is discharging in excellent fashion the duties laid upon it by parliament.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take the time of the committee to say something about this item. May I preface my remarks with the statement that in a general way I approve of the work of the national film board. I think it is very good, and has been well conducted. As a matter of fact I have wondered at times how they have been able to carry on as well as they have in the quarters in which they were housed.

My concern with the matter arises from the one point of moving the site of the film board from Ottawa to another city, another part of the country. Unfortunately, perhaps I am guilty, along with other hon. members, of not realizing earlier that this move was imminent. As a matter of fact, it may not be possible to excuse oneself on that score; but whether we can or cannot, we are confronted now with a situation in which a contract has been let for the construction of a building in Montreal for the film board.

My request today is for a withholding of the actual work under that contract until some matters of policy are discussed and settled, and the announcement concerning them is made.

I think perhaps it would be of interest when discussing this matter to look at the National Film Act, itself. If one reads the headnotes in the act he will find that the purposes of the board are set out in section 9. Perhaps it would be helpful if I were to place it on record. Section 9 is as follows:

> The board is established to initiate and promote the production and distribution of films in the national interest and in particular
> (a) to produce and distribute and to promote the production and distribution of films designed to interpret Canada to Canadians and to other nations;
> (b) to represent the government of Canada in its relations with persons engaged in commercial motion picture film activity in connection with motion picture films for the government or any department thereof;
> (c) to engage in research in film activity and to make available the results thereof to persons engaged in the production of films;

(d) to advise the governor in council in connection with film activities; and

(e) to discharge such other duties relating to film activities as the governor in council may direct it to undertake.

In addition to these purposes of the film board, subsection 1 of section 11 has a direct bearing, and it reads:

(1) Except with the approval of the governor in council, no department shall initiate the production or processing of a motion picture film without the authority of the board, and the production and processing of all motion picture films by or for departments shall be undertaken by the board unless the board is of opinion that it is in the public interest that it be otherwise undertaken and authorizes it to be so undertaken.

In other words, if the two sections are read together, it becomes clear that the function of the board is primarily directed to advising the government on the production of films for government use, and it is contemplated of course that such films will not be produced otherwise than by the film board, without their concurrence.

The situation as I see it is this. The work of the film board has increased from year to year, and in the main it has been very good work, until last year when the number of films produced was of the order of 400. This is certainly an increase in work and involves some new departures. Of that number of 400 films, I have not the precise details as to how many were made for government departments or directly in connection with the work of government and how many originated with the film board itself. That raises two or three new questions, questions that never existed in the early work of the film board because of the nature of its work.

The first question is that of censorship. It is, I would think, obvious that in the field of film production, other than films produced for government departments in connection with work that comes within the orbit of federal authority under the British North America Act, the films are subject to provincial censorship. Before we embark on the erection of this building I should like to see some clarification of whether or not the government is going to be able to continue in that new field of production of films. If it is, what is the relationship with the provincial authorities in the field of censorship? That is a new problem or matter of policy that has to be settled with respect to the film board, and that did not arise or exist to any appreciable extent four years ago when the first preliminary steps were taken to acquire a site in Montreal for a new plant. That problem of course exists whether the film board is located in Ontario, Quebec or anywhere else. It is a problem that is going to affect the size of operation, and therefore in my view is a problem that will have to be dealt with as a preliminary to the construction of any building wherever located.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the hon. member permit a question? What does he as a lawyer think of the authority or jurisdiction of a provincial government with respect to censorship of films of an organization of the federal government?

Mr. McIlraith: I would think they have no right at all of censorship of those films that have to do with other government activities that clearly are within the federal jurisdiction. Let me answer the hon. member for Prince Albert by taking an example. Assume that we are dealing with a film having to do with the work of the Department of Agriculture, or that part of it that is clearly within federal jurisdiction. I would think that such films would not be subject to censorship by the provinces. It is when you get into this other class of film that is not directly related to federal government activity that the difficulty arises. There is a whole field there that requires clarification, and I think that clarification should come before a building is constructed. Anyway, it is going to make a big difference whether the film board is operating on the scale of production of 400, 500 or 600 films a year or is back to the scale of 100 or 200 films a year, and that also applies to the type of building required.

As far as the building itself is concerned, judging from any information I have about the particular building, it is perfectly satisfactory to me. I have no objections to the type of building or anything related to it; but there is another matter that arises. It is claimed by some persons and by some national organizations that the government should go out of the film production business altogether, and that it should be returned to private enterprise. I for one do not subscribe to that view. To begin with, I do not think it would be possible to do so, even if the government so desired, because the private film industry in Canada could not undertake that work. Even if it were desirable, the private film industry is not sufficiently developed to undertake it.

There should be some determination as to what pattern is going to be followed with respect to the use of the private film industry in the production of film board films for the federal government. As far as I am aware, we have been given no statement of policy in that connection, and I would suggest that matter must be settled here by the government before we can determine whether or not we should proceed with this building.

As I say, I do not subscribe to the view that the film production for the government should be returned to private industry; but certainly I do subscribe to the view that that whole question is of such a nature that it must be examined, and the question of policy determined as to what type of production should go to private industry and to what extent it is possible for private industry to handle it.

There is another matter that bothers me about this move. The work of the film board is such that it is not easy for this house to examine its expenditures. This type of work is such that there is no easy formula that one can apply to determine whether they are using their money expenditures efficiently or not. No one can give me any formula that would be of much use in that connection. I raise that for this reason. It is going to be a continuing government expenditure on a larger scale, I would think, as the years go by. My view is that it is desirable that such an activity of government should be under the control of government where it can be very easily watched, not only by hon. members, but by the ministers concerned.

In that connection it is rather interesting to notice the activities of government that have been started in other cities and brought back to Ottawa in the last few years. I can refer to two of them. One was Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited. This corporation by its nature carried on operations very much like a commercial business and it was decided to bring the administrative head office to Ottawa from Toronto. Then there was another activity of the government which was purely commercial. I refer to the disposal of surplus war materials by War Assets Corporation. This corporation was moved to Ottawa from Montreal.

If it was thought necessary or desirable in controlling these types of commercial activity to bring these companies back to Ottawa, I suggest respectfully that it is just that much more desirable that the activities of the film board be kept here. But there is another thing. The nature of the work of the film board is such that I do not think it is proper to describe it as a commercial activity. As a matter of fact I have not found any adequate way to describe it.

The work of the film board has to do with the interpreting of Canada to Canadians and to other nations. That is found in the first subsection of the act defining the purposes of the board. It has to do with the expression of the cultural aspirations of the Canadian people in a collective way. When you get to a matter of that sort it becomes a question of some delicacy. You are dealing with the medium of expression of the culture of the Canadian people, one part of the country to another and the whole of the country to other parts of the world.

Perhaps it would be well for us in committee today to recall the struggle in the development of the nationhood of this country. At the time of the Act of Union, and after, there was a struggle to find some common ground where there could be a meeting together of the people in the capital of their country. We recall the long history of the period when the capital was in Toronto, in Kingston, in Montreal, in Quebec and in Hamilton at one point. There was constant trouble, a constant feeling of division, constant dissatisfaction.

Ottawa was later chosen as the capital of the country. I am not one who asserts that that is wholly satisfactory to all Canadians, but I do suggest respectfully that that choice has made possible the development of a feeling of Canadianism to a very great degree. Canadian citizens generally have come to look on this choice of the site of their capital, on the river at the boundaries of the two older provinces, as being a satisfactory one, as being one which they felt they could accept fully.

I venture the opinion now that if you were to go among those little groups—I believe they are called film societies—throughout the rural sections of this country and ask them about this move and discuss it, you would find they all felt that Ottawa was and should be the location of any centre that was to express their national culture, any centre that was to typify the expression of their national culture and they would want a medium such as this film board kept in their capital city and not sent to any other part of the country. It is here that they feel they can unite in that feeling and not elsewhere in the country, however attractive and desirable other parts of the country would be to any one of them.

I am one who has a rather strong feeling, which I think is shared by other hon. members in this house, about the rapid development of the sense of Canadian citizenship. This has gone on at a tremendously accelerated pace during the last fifteen years. I would hate to see anything done that would tend to separate any of us from that feeling and from the feeling that in our capital we have achieved a centre where that feeling can find its expression.

There is a danger in an activity like this, where you are dealing with the creative arts and the cultural feelings of the people, in moving it away, that you will lose something of value in the expressing and fostering and developing of a feeling of Canadian citizenship.

There are perhaps other things that could be said. It may be unfortunate that this move became a reality when parliament was not sitting. That cannot be helped, as it was in the ordinary course of events; but it is unfortunate in that much misinformation was spread about. Many things were said which in my view ought not to have been said. They were not accurate and did not deal with the merits of the suggested change of site.

By the way as far as the actual site chosen in Montreal is concerned, I have no quarrel with it. I think probably the Department of Public Works showed shrewd judgment of land values when they acquired the site they did. I am told that the site is quite a valuable piece of property. As far as I am concerned, I have no criticism to offer in that regard.

My criticism centres on the one point. I do not think sufficient preliminary matters were decided to warrant any decision as to whether or not the film board should be moved. It may well be that after these other matters are considered and decided the film board ought to be moved out of Ottawa; but I for one cannot see the possibility of that, although, as I say, it may well be so.

My view is that even at this late date the government should consider these other matters of policy in relation to the whole operation of the board and have those matters of policy announced and dealt with before this building is proceeded with. I know it is possible to say with correctness that an item covering the acquisition of the land appeared in the estimates some years ago. I know we can all be criticized somewhat for not sharply taking issue at that point. My own view was that I did not think the move was imminent, and I think if I checked Hansard I could show justification for taking that view. In any event, whether or not that is the case, I suggest it is irrelevant.

The contractor dealing with this particular contract is perfectly reputable, and I would respectfully ask the government to withhold the work, at the risk of having to pay some damages to the contractor until these other matters affecting the wisdom of moving the national film board away from the capital city are determined and settled.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I deferred my remarks in regard to this subject, which I have raised on a number of occasions, because I thought the Minister of Public Works might be supplementing the remarks already made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

However, I assume from the fact that he has not done so that he leaves the matter where it rests with the statement given to us by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

A great deal more is involved in the discussion of this item than the authority of the film board, the policies to be followed in the production of future films, the type of building to be erected, the location or any of the other subjects which have been raised. The most important issue before this house at the moment is the responsibility of parliament itself.

It has been said that one of the unfortunate facts was that this decision had not been reached when parliament was sitting. But it was. A decision was reached while we were sitting here. A decision was reached within the past few weeks, after we had been assured by the Prime Minister that a decision would not be reached until the house had had an opportunity to consider this item. For that reason there should be no hesitation on the part of the government in announcing without any reservation that this contract will stand, and will not be proceeded with until the house has the information which has never been presented to it, and until members of parliament have an opportunity to express some opinion in regard to the information which is not yet available.

The wisdom of erecting a building in Ottawa, in Ville St. Laurent or at any other point in Canada, is not the primary issue under discussion. The fact is that no member of this parliament, except perhaps the Minister of Public Works, has yet before him or her any information upon which to pass judgment. If the Minister of Public Works has such information, then it is a well guarded secret.

This is not parliamentary procedure. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has reviewed certain features of this subject with which I would like to deal briefly. I wish to refer to them because I do want to dispose of some of the suggestions which have been made as to the point of view from which this subject is being approached.

The minister has said that the film board has been doing an excellent job. I have heard no suggestion to the contrary. It happens that I am one of the many enthusiasts who have for some time followed the hobby of both taking and showing moving picture films. I have shown many films produced by the national film board on a projector which has given me a great deal of pleasure in my own house. I can speak with some measure of personal experience about the films produced by the film board, and I am in a position to compare them because the projector I own happens to be able to handle either sound or stills, and I have shown films produced in different parts of the world as well as in different parts of this continent.

The films which I have shown, and which others have seen with pleasure, are excellent productions. I mention that only to remove right away from consideration in this discussion any suggestion that the views I may put forward relate to the quality of the production.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration also referred to the suggestion that the board should discontinue the production of films. Let me dispose of that at the outset. I have never made that suggestion. I am convinced that there are many fields of specialized production in which it is essential that we have films produced under the supervision of a government agency. I am not sure that remark applies to many of the films that are being produced, in spite of the generally excellent quality of most of the films.

There are two fields where it is of special service to the country and to our people to have productions of this kind available, namely, in the field of education and in the field of national defence. There is an old Chinese maxim that one picture tells more than ten thousand words. I am convinced that we have not yet even touched the possibility of the moving picture with sound for educational purposes.

I have seen films used for educational purposes in a way which convinces me that we could extend their use far beyond anything that has yet been attempted. For example, take the teaching of a subject such as physics. It would be possible to show the operations of an internal combustion engine, a jet engine, or anything of that kind in a cut model where the operation could be simplified by slow motion photography in a way that would not have been possible with any model which could readily become available in any physics classroom in this country.

It is possible to teach history by means of the moving picture film in a way that cannot easily be approached in the junior classes by any textbook, no matter how readable or how well illustrated it may be. It is possible to use film for teaching languages in a way that we have not employed it, to show not only the way in which the sounds are formed but certain well-recognized principles with regard to the projection of the human voice and the actual use of words themselves in a manner that is more interesting to the pupil when those words come from someone whose name is well known to him. When the living history of this time can be portrayed in the classroom in the words of men like Churchill, Roosevelt and others of the present and recent generation, we can see the possibilities of attracting our young people to the use of language in a way that has not yet been possible.

In the teaching of language in this country film would be of immense value. We still have a long way to go in teaching French in the English-speaking parts of Canada and in teaching English in the French-speaking parts of Canada. This is one of the aids that can come to the help of teachers and which can be of great value in that field. I can see there a great public service in the production of films of a type that possibly could not be produced satisfactorily on a strictly commercial basis.

Then there is the question of national defence. We learned how much importance the government attaches to films produced for national defence purposes when we were informed within the last two years of the suspension of the activities of the national film board in producing films for national defence purposes because of the uncertainty of the government about some security risks within the board. Whether that was a wise or unwise decision is still unknown to members on this side of the house because we only have the statement of the government as to the course it followed. Nevertheless this did place dramatic emphasis upon the importance the government attaches to films produced for national defence purposes.

There again we have not even started to explore the possibilities of instruction by films of this kind. We have produced a number of films. We could go far beyond anything that has yet been attempted, with great economy in the money devoted to teaching because of the amount that would be saved through placing this medium of instruction in the hands of members of the units themselves who could give instruction with films of this kind.

In the Royal Canadian Air Force, the artillery, the infantry, the tank corps, the armoured forces, the medical services, the engineers, in the navy with all its new ramifications of defensive as well as offensive equipment, in every branch of the services, there is a tremendous field scarcely yet explored. All this imposes certain conditions before a decision can be reached as to what should be done.

When we come to the matter of censorship, which was mentioned, surely there can be no question but that censorship would apply with equal force to films produced by the dominion government as to those produced by any other agency. I cannot believe for a moment that the suggestion would be made that censorship could be circumvented in the showing of films in any theatre simply by virtue of the fact that they were produced by an agency of the dominion government.

Mr. McIlraith: That was not my suggestion.

Mr. Drew: I was about to say that I felt sure that was not the suggestion. Nevertheless that could become a very real question if the activities were extended to a point where a considerable number of films produced by the national film board were being shown in those places where provincial censorship would ordinarily apply. This makes it obvious that here is another consideration which needs to be resolved before a final decision can be made as to what should be done with regard to this subject.

I have put these matters forward merely to indicate how many things there are that we should know before any single member of the house is in a position to say that $1 million, $5 million, $10 million or $1 should be expended. Surely if we are to justify the high estimate of the responsibility of members which has been asserted on a number of occasions within the past few weeks we should exhibit it on this occasion, when this matter comes before us for the very first time. When it comes before us, may I repeat, for the very first time, when this is the first opportunity that has been presented to discuss the question with knowledge of the facts, every one of us should insist that we know what are the facts upon which this decision has been made, that we know what is the authority of the film board, and that we know what is now the stated policy of the government with respect to the production of films in this building when it is constructed.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said the real purpose in constructing this new building at the moment is so the activities of the national film board can be housed in one building. He then went on to say that a decision of policy was involved, in that there was to be a continued operation of this board. Mr. Chairman, it involves a great deal more than that. It involves a decision of policy by the government not only that there is to be continued operation of the film board but also involves, surely, a decision of policy as to what the scope of the activities of the film board will be and the nature of the production, with respect to which the government made a decision without consulting parliament as to the location of the building.

It may well be that there are many good and sound reasons for selecting the site that has been chosen. If there are, then let us have them. If there are, then let us all agree that if we are to accept our responsibilities as members of parliament in deciding on this item we must know these reasons before we approve an item that carries with it this major decision.

It involves also some understanding of the balance of consideration, remembering that neither the Massey commission, the group of experts known as J. D. Woods and Gordon, nor the national film board committee of this house that reported in 1952 made any suggestion that there should be a change in the location of the building. Therefore we must go entirely outside of the evidence before the Massey commission and the decisions of the Massey commission; we must go entirely beyond the report of J. D. Woods and Gordon; we must go beyond the report of the national film board committee of this house in 1952, to find the reason for this decision.

Mr. Winters: It was stated in the proceedings of that committee.

Mr. Drew: But not in the report, because the report quite clearly relates to the construction of a building which, so far as there is any evidence, was regarded as one that would likely be constructed in Ottawa.

Mr. Winters: It is clear in the proceedings.

Mr. Drew: Oh, Mr. Chairman, there are many things in the proceedings, but what I am dealing with are the matters that were presented to this house for consideration. The matters that were presented to this house for consideration make no suggestion of that kind. We must have some other evidence if we are to reach a decision which even remotely suggests that we are accepting our responsibilities as members of this house.

Nor is it alone the location of this building which is of great importance. Exactly what type of building is required? In order to form any judgment on that part we must know what the policy is concerning the scope of activities, the expected production and the expected employment level of the national film board. There are some other considerations about which we should know. Today, as anyone with the slightest knowledge of film production is well aware, there is no operation more sensitive to sound. Even the technical handling of television is not so dependent upon the elimination of extraneous sound, because any sound reaching the recording equipment during film production will be permanently recorded.

Let no one suggest that we are in a position to pass judgment as to whether or not that has been dealt with. We have not had a word on this subject from the government as yet. In deciding where a national film board building is to be established we certainly should be told what consideration has been given to the sound factors, particularly having regard to the well known impact on film of the highly reproductive, high-pitched screech of a jet motor. This is another question about which we should have some information, and the government has not told us anything about it.

At this time it must be quite clear that we should have a statement of the terms of reference under which the film board is to operate, and the instructions the film board has received as to the scope of its activities. A question has been raised already as to the need for a statement of policy as to whether production is to be in the nature of 100, 400 or 500 films. This would be determined by the field of activity contemplated by the government. What we need, and need greatly, if there is to be an understanding of this problem is a clarification of the government's decision concerning the real function of the national film board.

The truth is, and I do not think for one moment any member of the government would deny it, that this board has grown up like Topsy. Probably in many cases the person who was most surprised by the nature of the activities of the film board was the minister who was responsible for that board. Every now and then the minister would see a film and say, "Well, this is better than I thought." On another occasion the minister might say, with some measure of surprise, he had not known the field was covered to that extent.

Mr. Winters: To which minister are you referring?

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Drew: I hope it would include most of the ministers, but I am certain it applies to the present Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Winters: I just wanted to know which ones.

Mr. Drew: I shall be quite prepared to let my remarks apply to the minister now responsible.

Mr. Harris: You would not want me to make the obvious retort?

Mr. Drew: If my hon. friend means that the minister who spoke on behalf of the Minister of Public Works is in the same position, I certainly would think that is the obvious retort, because I am quite sure the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was greatly surprised at some of the films that he found had actually been produced. Perhaps he shared with some of the rest of us a great measure of satisfaction, surprised satisfaction on some occasions, as to the nature of the films that were produced. None of us received any information in this house to give us the slightest idea of what films were being produced, beyond the general statements that were made.

When I say that, I recognize that there is an excellent index of the films produced by the film board. I do not expect I will hear from either the Minister of Public Works or the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration or any other minister that they have seen all these films. I have not, and I do not think any of the other hon. members have. It would take a very long time to see them all. I am not suggesting the ministers have a duty to do that. I do suggest, however, there should be some procedure by which there would be supervision of the films produced within such terms of reference and such declarations of policy as may be announced to this house for the first time by this government. I say "for the first time", because any declaration of policy in the past has been in such general terms that it never defined the real scope of the activities of this board.

Now I want to point out why it is so necessary that we get complete information in this occasion. The subject matter was discussed earlier this year, and is recorded in Hansard of January 19. I shall again place on the record what was said on that occasion, so that it may be contained in the context of the remarks I make at this time. I asked the Prime Minister this question:

I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether press reports appearing during the last twenty-four hours respecting the national film board are correct and if the government does intend to reconsider its decision to move the national film board from Ottawa? At the same time I would ask whether there will be an opportunity to discuss the matter if this is so.

To this the Prime Minister replied:

There has been no decision reached in that matter.

That was on January 19.

Mr. Winters: Of this year?

Mr. Drew: Yes, January 19, 1954. The Prime Minister said:

There has been no decision reached in that matter. What is under consideration at the present time is the tenders that were submitted for the construction of a building in Montreal. They are all of a very substantial amount, and the matter that is now under consideration is as to whether or not the government will recommend the appropriations required for that large expenditure at this time.

Then I said:

Do I understand from what the Prime Minister has said that, having regard to the amount involved, the government may actually be reconsidering whether it will or will not move the national film board from Ottawa?

To that the Prime Minister replied:

No decision has been reached in that regard, but until the government comes to parliament with a definite recommendation for a definite amount to be expended for a building at a definite place there is always a possibility that changes in the recommendation may be made.

Now, it is upon that completely unqualified assurance by the Prime Minister that I base my request—I shall go further; that I base my demand, and a justified demand—that the Minister of Public Works state unequivocally that everything will be suspended in relation to this contract until parliament has heard the reasons, and until there has been an opportunity to consider those reasons.

Mr. Harris: Would the hon. member permit an interruption? I do not want to interrupt the hon. member's speech at any length, but I understand that while I was out of the house he made mention of what he has now read as being an assurance by the Prime Minister that no decision about this whole matter would be made until the house had had an opportunity to pass upon it. I am sure if he will reread what he has just read—

Mr. Drew: I can answer that right now. I made no reference to it either directly or indirectly until this present reference. Therefore I propose to proceed with these remarks.

Mr. Harris: Very well. But I hope my hon. friend is not reading what he has now read as a statement by the Prime Minister that there had not been at one time a recommendation to the house for the construction of this building in Montreal.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am going to deal with that, because it is the most preposterous suggestion I have heard yet—that is, the suggestion that this house had any information will be answered by a reference to what came before the house on the earlier occasion which the hon. member mentions. And it is really the gem of gems to indicate the complete irresponsibility of the government in relation to parliament. I intend to refer to it. But at this time I wish to go one stage further to emphasize that there is no doubt about the Prime Minister's words, and that there was going to be a chance to reconsider this. Let me read what happened.

Mr. Harris: Well—

Mr. Drew: The minister will have plenty of chance to deal with this matter. Let me read what happened on the following day, as recorded in Hansard for January 20, upon which occasion I raised a question of privilege:

Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in relation to a statement made to the house yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). Yesterday afternoon, in response to a question, the Prime Minister made the statement that the question of the removal of the national film board remained an open one until some definite item would be brought before the house.

And may I interject here that if the Prime Minister had any question about the accuracy of the statement I have just referred to, that was the time for him to state it. Then I continued:

Then in the late afternoon edition of the Ottawa Journal I read that the definite recommendation in regard to the adoption of a tender for the construction of the national film board building was definitely going to the treasury board. It seems to me that these statements are inconsistent. Having regard to the general principle involved and the assurance by the Prime Minister that we would have something before us before this move was definite, it seems to me that we should know what the situation is.

To that the Prime Minister replied, not that there had been no assurance, but rather that he hoped the house would rely upon his statement instead of a press statement. This is what he said:

Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the house would take the statements made by the government in the house in preference to speculative reports by newspapers.

The fact is that those words are clear and unequivocal; they are clear and understandable; they are clear and definite. It was quite certain from those words that every member in the house who heard them had a right to expect that we would have this item before us before any decision was made in regard to those tenders.

Nevertheless it turned out that, contrary to the information received from the Prime Minister, the subject was under consideration and a decision was made by the government to proceed with tenders. The tender was awarded to a company in Toronto. This company has been given the contract to go to Montreal and construct this building there.

That also is something about which I would like to have information before this item is disposed of. I want to know who the contractors were who bid, the amount of the tenders, the bond that has been called for, and the previous experience in a specialized line of construction of this type that was insisted upon in calling for tenders. After all, these buildings are very intricate. They are buildings of a highly technical type, and I want to know the extent to which assurance was secured that the tenders were upon a basis that left no doubt that the tenderer was highly qualified in this particular and unusual field of construction.

The Chairman: Order; it being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

THIRD READING

Bill No. 296, respecting Brazilian Telephone Company.—Mr. Hunter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are several divorce bills on the order paper. Is it agreed that these be entertained in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: You do not need a motion to go into committee of the whole.

DOROTHY ANN STUART STORY MCKENNA

The house in committee on Bill No. 178, for the relief of Dorothy Ann Stuart Story McKenna—Mr. Hunter—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, since you have just said that the house is in committee on certain divorce bills I gather that you are calling clause 1 of all 113 bills that are now before us. I shall not take the time of the committee to give too much in the way of statistics, but if we pass these 113 bills, along with the 140 that we passed some time ago, it will make a total of 253 divorce bills which we shall have passed in this house so far this session. My records indicate that we shall have spent about six minutes on the 253 divorces. That is at the rate of 1½ seconds a divorce.

At the same time, Mr. Chairman, there is a point that interests me and concerns me a bit. I note that standing order 112—it is a lengthy one, and I shall not read it all—reads in part as follows:

> The chairman of the committee—

That, I take it, is yourself in this instance.

> —shall sign with his name at length a printed copy of the bill, and shall also sign with the initials of his name, the preamble and the various sections of the bill as they are agreed to.

It seems to me that the language of that standing order is pretty clear. You have called clause 1 of 113 bills. It looks to me as though we are going to have to wait until you have signed with your initials clause 1 of all 113 bills before we can go on to clause 2, because that is what the standing order says:

> The chairman . . . shall sign with the initials of his name, the preamble and the various sections of the bill as they are agreed to.

I should like to know how it is possible for you, sir, to sign your initials to clause 1 of 113 bills in the instant it takes for the committee to say "carried".

The Chairman: Order. If the hon. member will look at standing order 110 he will see:

> All private bills reported to the house by any committee may, on one motion, be referred together to a committee of the whole house and such committee may consider and report one or more such bills at the same sitting.

I have called a number of divorce bills, Nos. 178 to 197, inclusive, and Nos. 199 to 249, inclusive, and Nos. 253 to 294, inclusive. I have before me the first one, namely No. 178, and if we are to give any effect to the expeditious procedure opened up by standing order 110 it seems to me that it would be only practical for me to sign, as I have done in the past, the first clause of the first bill.

Mr. Knowles: But may I point out, Mr. Chairman, that standing order 110 does not set aside standing order 112. I have no quarrel with the committee having taken all of the bills at once in pursuance of a right that is provided by standing order 110. It seems to me that standing order 112 raises a different question, namely that the chairman shall sign with the initials of his name the various sections of the bill as they are agreed to. At least, Mr. Chairman, you have my sympathy if you are going to sign your initials 113 times before we get to clause 2 of these bills.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Knowles: Have you got them all signed, sir?

Mr. Stick: He has a rubber stamp.

Title agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bills?

Mr. Knowles: Are they all signed?

The Chairman: I assure the hon. member that Bill No. 178 is duly signed, and all the others will be signed before they are remitted to the Clerk, in accordance with past practice.

Bill reported, read the third time on division and passed.

DOMINION FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 313, respecting the Dominion Fire Insurance Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill provides for changing the name of the Dominion Fire Insurance Company. This company was incorporated in 1904 and carried on its business as a fire insurance company. It has enlarged that business from time to time until now the insurance business carried on by it includes fire insurance, bonds, burglary, liability, plate glass insurance, automobile insurance, and automobile accident insurance. It was desired to delete the word "fire" from the name of the company.

When the bill in that form came before the other place some objection was taken to the similarity of the name, with that deletion, to the name of the Dominion Life Insurance Company. The objection was overcome by making a further change in the name, by substituting the word "corporation" for the word "company", so that the bill now before this house, and the bill as passed by the other place, is to change the name to the Dominion Insurance Corporation.

The only other company having a similar name, and which might object to the duplication of names, is the Dominion Life Insurance Company, and that company now agrees. There is no objection to the name being submitted to this house in its present form.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question at this time?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: He said this company has been doing many other lines of business apart from fire insurance. Are we to take it that the right to deal in these other lines was contained in the original charter?

Mr. McIlraith: They are contained in other legislation which was passed long since. The bill now before the house has nothing to do with the rights of the company to do business, it merely has to do with the name the company shall use. As I say, the rights were granted by earlier legislation.

Mr. Adamson: No objection will be taken to the term "dominion", I take it?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

INDUSTRIAL STATUS OF WOMEN

MEASURE TO REQUIRE EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to provide equal pay for equal work for women.

She said: Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to have the opportunity of presenting this legislation for the consideration of parliament. This is a measure to prevent discrimination against women in respect of their employment by reason of their sex and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, to ensure that women will be paid at the same rates as men for similar or comparable work.

There are many points which might be enumerated as one studies more and more the ramifications of this type of legislation. Since world war I the use of women in industry and commerce, in many instances in so-called men's jobs, has become more and more commonplace. In the factory, in the office, in the school and in the home women are performing work of a comparable character to that performed by men. Where it was thought at one time that the utilization of women in the labour force was a matter of passing interest it has now become apparent that they are needed in a rapidly expanding economy. As working conditions have improved for all workers the classifications which were regarded as strictly male have gradually diminished in number. This is true in industry, and I suppose it is far truer in clerical, executive and professional jobs.

The principle of equal pay for equal work is one which has been espoused by trade unions, industrial organizations and the like for many years, but there are a great many workers in all lines of activity who do not enjoy the protection or bargaining advantages of union membership. It is partly because of these workers that it is advisable to have legislation enacted by the government under whose jurisdiction they come.

Three years ago such legislation was enacted in Ontario. Last year Saskatchewan brought a similar law into effect. British Columbia adopted equal pay legislation last year, which came into force on January 1 of this year. Provincial laws cover most of the workers of this country, but there are still a number of employees who because of the nature of their employment or the districts in which they reside come under federal jurisdiction. It is to cover those workers that I have introduced this bill.

I might say that a great deal of the opposition which formerly greeted such legislation has disappeared in the light of increasing knowledge that such legislation benefits men as well as women. Some of the main points which must be considered are that women represent the nation's greatest labour reserve. It is from their ranks that additional workers must be drawn in the event of the need for the rapid acceleration of defence production, for instance. This type of legislation would facilitate their recruitment.

From the standpoint of the women themselves, it is a matter of simple justice. It ensures that women workers will receive what they are entitled to receive for the work they do. Those women who are housewives and mothers also have an interest in this type of legislation because it protects them and their children in that it protects the wages of their husbands.

Equal pay affords to men greater wage and job security. It protects them from the exploitation of employers who would hire women for less money or who would replace men workers with women workers at lower rates.

Equal pay legislation is also a protection to the employers, who are thus protected from the unfair competition of those who would attempt to use women to undercut men's wages. Studies which have been made on this subject are great in number and voluminous in character. I have here a publication of the department of labour in the United States which came out recently. The introduction states in part:

> Women's present status provides freedom to participate in a broad range of activities almost unknown to the woman of fifty years ago. The import of this freedom can be fully understood only by realizing that its foundations rest not alone in the vast achievements of the movement for women's rights, but in the complexities of a changing social and economic order with its revolutionizing effects upon home and work life.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

It is true that the last 50 years have seen many changes. There has been a decided trend toward what you might call urbanization. As the urban sections of our land have grown in size, living accommodation has become more and more restricted. Several families now occupy the space formerly occupied by one family. This has had its effect on domestic staffs. It is very hard to say which came first, the chicken or the egg, whether the lack of domestic help during the period of the first world war forced people with large homes to cut down the space they occupied and thus make it easier for the woman of the house to handle her own housework, or whether the women themselves, wishing to be free of the extra responsibility of large homes and the management of domestic staffs, purposely cut down on those staffs which then were left free to find their way into other than domestic work. Whatever the cause, certainly a great change has taken place in the last 50 years.

Women were released more and more from the domestic responsibilities which were at one time accepted as their main work, and found their way into many types of activity. They went into organizational work, into church work, into club work, into patriotic, religious and social work. As they became more and more interested in these organizations they also became more and more interested in the world which lay outside their own homes. I think the great interest which is taken today by parents generally in associations connected with education is proof of the extent to which women have found that a participation in community affairs has a direct effect upon their own manner of living and upon the advantages which are made available not only to them but to their children.

Be that as it may, it is true that as time went on women who had more freedom, who had more time on their hands, gradually found their way into both industrial and commercial work. There is no doubt at all that this situation came about largely due to the demands which were made upon them in the two world wars through which we have come in the last 50 years; but having once taken their place in the industrial, commercial, and professional life of this country they were loath to relinquish that place, and indeed industry, commerce, and the professions were loath to see them go back to their homes and leave the positions which they had filled with such efficiency and poise all those years.

I recall young women whom I knew during the last world war who were doing jobs which formerly would have been completely foreign to a woman. For example, I remember a couple of young women I knew who were operating huge cranes in the steel plant in Hamilton, and certainly that is the type of work which at one time would have been thought to be entirely within the field of male employment. Nevertheless they did that job and did it well. It is true, as this book states:

> They have indeed been both "pushed" and "pulled" out of an area of activity once circumscribed by the household—"pushed" by the lesser requirements upon their time and interest by the withdrawal from the home of many productive activities, and "pulled" by expanding opportunities and the demands for income in an economy of ever-increasing living standards.

I believe it is true to say, Mr. Speaker, that as living standards have progressed the desire of all homemakers has been for an even higher standard of living which could not be attained on the wages of one single worker in the home. It is true, as this book goes on to say, that both men and women are victims of tradition and prejudice, and both are affected by what Mildred Thompson, until recently dean of Vassar College, describes as a "mode of thinking which has not caught up with the actual conditions of our times."

The basic reason for this legislation, Mr. Speaker, is not to protect the woman who is a rare case. It is not to make sure that some individual or group of individuals shall benefit under this legislation. Rather it is simply to protect the great rank and file of women workers, many of whom have no bargaining agents, who have no one to speak for them and to produce and maintain a bargaining procedure through which they can obtain the advantages they desire, and also abolish the discrimination under which they work at the present time.

Recent years have witnessed a rapid growth in employment. The latest census figures show that as of October 24, 1953, the labour force numbered 5,357,000 of which 4,166,000 or 77·8 per cent were men and 1,185,000 or 22·2 per cent were women. The figure has been running at around 23 per cent of the labour force for a number of years. As a matter of fact in 1949 it was 23·5 per cent, and according to the monthly bulletin of employment and payrolls the latest figures for December, 1953, show an increase from November to December of from 222 per thousand to 227 per thousand, which brings it back to about the 23 per cent figure.

Of those women who were thus gainfully employed well over half have made their income tax returns for the year 1950 and, according to the taxation statistics for 1952, practically half a million of them were single with no dependents, about 24,000 were married with no dependents, and about 27,500 both single and married had to support dependents ranging from one to five. It is interesting to note that some of these women have been supporting more than five dependents. This substantial number of people represents quite a considerable portion of the labour force of this country, many of whom have been suffering discrimination by reason of a wage differential from the beginning of time.

I think at this stage we might well have a look at the history of equal remuneration legislation in many other parts of the world. As long ago as 1919 the constitution of the international labour organization proclaimed the "special and urgent importance" of "the principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value." That principle was enunciated in article 41. Then in 1948 when the constitution of ILO was amended the preamble proclaimed that "improvement (of conditions of labour) is urgently required by recognition of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value."

The first country to establish the principle of equal pay by constitutional provisions was Mexico in 1917; and since that time, according to the report of the committee of the thirty-third session of the international labour conference—which was the last report containing this information—16 other countries have adopted equal pay legislation. In addition, two states in Germany have also adopted it.

In the United States of America 13 states and the territory of Alaska have enacted equal pay laws. In Canada, as I previously mentioned, three provinces have adopted equal pay legislation. It was adopted in Ontario in March, 1951, and it came into force on January 1, 1952. In Saskatchewan legislation was enacted on April 4, 1952, and it came into force on January 1, 1953. In British Columbia it was enacted in 1953 and came into force on January 1, 1954. This would indicate, Mr. Speaker, that there has been a growing recognition of the justice of such legislation and an increasing willingness to accept the principle and give it legal status in many countries in the world. It has already been recognized and accepted right here on the North American continent both in the United States and in Canada.

Industrial Status of Women

At the thirty-third session of the ILO in 1950 the Canadian delegate, during a conference on equal pay remuneration, stated that the Canadian government was in favour of the principle and of its application to government employees, but would not be prepared to introduce legislation, giving as an excuse the difficulty of reconciling the two methods of application, that is, legal enactment and collective agreement.

As nearly as I can tell, for this reason the Canadian delegation supported the recommendation but not the convention. Throughout the consideration of the various points Canada sought to have the provisions watered down to a point where they would not necessarily be binding on the participating states. For instance, I find that in the consideration of point 4 Canada was successful in having the original wording changed so that instead of reading "each member to undertake to ensure application of the principle" it read "each member to take all practicable measures to encourage the application of the principle", and finally it was changed to read "to further, and in so far as this is in conformity with the above methods, to ensure application of the principle".

Considering that Canada wanted to take all practicable measures to encourage application of the principle, it would be interesting to know just what steps have been taken by the Canadian government in that direction since that time. I notice that at page 40 of the seventh report of the international labour conference on this subject Mr. Kaiser, who was the United States government delegate, said:

> The experience of the United States showed that the principle could be accepted alike by workers and employers; that it could be translated into practice; and that its application protected established wage rates against undercutting.

Mr. Gregg: May I ask the year of that report?

Mrs. Fairclough: The one from which I have just quoted?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: 1951. The convention subsequently adopted has been ratified to date by eight member states of the international labour organization.

There is some difficulty, Mr. Speaker, in trying to present any measure in the short space of one hour, particularly when the sponsor desires to hear the opinions of other members and would like very much to hear a debate upon a subject in which she has a very real interest. In order to do that it is necessary to cut one's remarks to a minimum, and to depend upon being able to supplement them at some future date to the extent one would wish to do in the first instance.

Therefore I am not going to prolong my remarks, because I want to hear what the minister and other members of the house have to say upon this subject. But I should like to say that I notice that in the second portion of the fifth report of the international labour conference on this subject in 1950 the reply of the government of Canada was put in this way:

> . . . it is recognized that for persons coming directly under government supervision there would be no difficulty in the application of the principle . . .

This bill covers only workers under federal jurisdiction. As I have sought to point out, the principle is accepted in practically every part of the world, although not necessarily in force in every part of the world. But even now it is the law in many lands, in numerous states of the United States of America and three provinces of Canada.

With these few remarks I recommend the measure to the house, and I urge its support.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have followed the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) with great care. Like her, I am very anxious to hear the opinions that may be expressed by other members of the house as the debate proceeds. This year the hon. member has introduced exactly the same bill providing for equal pay for equal work for women which she proposed last year. It was placed on the order paper very early, and one day before Christmas, when I was trying to do my homework in my office on a quiet Saturday afternoon, I read her bill just after I had read an editorial in that great paper, the Ottawa Journal. The heading of the editorial was "Not to Start Something, But—" The first paragraph reads as follows:

> We have it on the authority of a Toronto columnist, who says he gets it from "the latest scientific statistics" that "more and more males are being driven out of their minds as a direct result of attempting to argue with females".

Of course the reason more and more males are being driven out of their minds is the difficulty they have in finding answers to the good arguments of the ladies. That is the position in which I find myself this afternoon.

Mrs. Fairclough: If the minister will permit me, that statement has been made ever since Adam made his famous remark about the woman tempting him.

Mr. Gregg: Be that as it may, I am sure there is greater force in that statement just made by my hon. friend than in the one which I wrote down as she was speaking a while ago, namely "that discrimination on account of wage differential has been in existence since the beginning of time". That is quite a long spell. Anyway, I recognize fully that this is one of those many occasions in life when a mere man can talk himself into quite a lot of trouble, but I should like to take advantage of the opportunity to comment on what the hon. member said in introducing the bill.

She stated that women are needed in Canada in our rapidly expanding economy, and that is certainly perfectly true. During the last 25 years Canada, as well as the rest of the western world, has seen how women can occupy practically every occupational role that in former times was considered to be the prerogative of man. What I have said also applies to this house. It is a great satisfaction to me that an increasing number of women are taking their places in the houses of parliament.

I do not want to dwell on this matter long because, as my hon. friend has said, I think the bill will provide an opportunity for a free expression of opinion on all sides of the house. However, I should like to point out in the beginning that the government of Canada, and I am very glad to say so, has followed the equal pay principle for many years in respect of its employees. That applies to governments under both parties. Rates of pay in positions under our Canadian civil service are fixed in accordance with the content of the job and are the same whether the holder of the job is a man or a woman. After a fairly long period of experience, I believe it is looked upon as an efficient method, and of course the same principle holds true as far as the rewards of members of parliament are concerned.

The equal pay laws have been outlined quite fully by the sponsor of the bill. In the United States, as she has said, there is no federal legislation although bills have been introduced on quite a number of occasions during the past eight or ten years. The basic provision of Bill No. 2 now before us is the same as that contained in the bill which was introduced, but not passed, in the United States last year. I understand from press reports that Representative Bolton of Ohio intends to sponsor such a bill in the House of Representatives this spring.

In its provisions for enforcement Bill No. 2 follows the pattern of the three provincial laws in Canada, namely Ontario, Saskatchewan, and now British Columbia since December 31. These acts provide that a woman employee who claims she is not getting equal pay for equal work may file a complaint with an administrative authority. This authority has the responsibility of conferring with the employer and employee, and seeking to effect a settlement. In other words I think the key idea there is the complaint, and action normally is not expected unless a complaint is lodged. I am told that the experience so far has been that very few complaints have been filed.

In the United States where some state legislation seems to place a responsibility on an administrative authority to secure compliance with the law through inspection—the key idea there seems to be inspection rather than complaints—the authorities indicate that so far there has been very little activity. It can be readily seen, I think, that no government inspector can tell whether an equal pay law is being violated simply by examining the payrolls. It means going into the job content as well, and this is particularly true where the statute requires that there shall be equal pay for comparable work. Who is to say what is comparable work, even as between two men employees? Wherever collective bargaining is feasible, and I am going to admit right away that in collective bargaining as in other spheres, though woman is a potent force which we must never underestimate, nevertheless women do not appear to be numerous in the membership of our national labour organizations, particularly those coming under federal jurisdiction.

There has been some experience in Canada in approaching the problem from the point of view of collective bargaining. Some agreements contain equal pay clauses, and others simply carry out the principle of equal pay by establishing a rate for the job which is the same whether the job is done by a man or a woman. This is the practice followed by the federal civil service commission.

My department carried out a study not merely of those people coming under federal jurisdiction but of a sample group of 1,952 collective bargaining agreements covering 343,100 workers in manufacturing. About 20 per cent of the workers were found to be covered by agreements containing equal pay clauses. Only about 3 per cent were covered by agreement which provided for lower rates for women and boys in the same job classifications as men. Most agreements had no provisions either for wage differences based on sex or for equal pay.

Very little manufacturing is subject to federal jurisdiction, of course, but I mention this study simply to indicate that there is a practical way of getting at the problem through that channel. Collective bargaining is feasible, and is the accepted method of determining wages and working conditions in a large part of the industries subject to federal jurisdiction. In Canada we have proceeded on the assumption that there should be labour legislation when it can help to create a favourable atmosphere for collective bargaining, and that then the parties concerned should work out an agreement which sets out the terms of employment. This is certainly one of the terms of employment.

The bill we have before us is designed to make it the duty of the federal government to instruct management to do certain things relating to job classifications and pay which have been hitherto regarded as factors in collective bargaining or which have not been considered at all. As a consequence, one could conceive of a demand for legislation that would make it the duty of the federal government to instruct labour unions to do certain things relating to job classification and pay, which hitherto have been regarded as factors in the collective bargaining field.

Having said that, I do not want to give the impression that no problem exists. It has been recognized as a problem by trade unions in this country, in that the major congresses have all adopted equal pay for equal work as part of their platform of principles and at their annual conventions have discussed ways of putting it into effect. I feel it is perhaps significant that this consideration is not complete, and as an indication of that fact I point out that the four great national labour organizations have now made their annual presentations to the government and, although they have many women in their membership, have not recommended that such a bill be passed within the federal jurisdiction. I feel it is probably equally significant that the national council of women, in making their recommendations to the government, did not mention this matter. The provincial federations of trade unions have, of course, on occasion asked the provincial governments to introduce equal pay legislation.

Before advocating federal legislation in this field I think I should like to know that a specific problem existed in the industries coming within federal jurisdiction, and that it was serious enough to warrant intervention. I would want to feel that the problem appeared capable of being remedied by law. So far I do not think there has been enough evidence of such a specific problem or of the fact that this is the remedy for it.

I must say that I noted the extracts which the hon. member quoted from the statements of the Canadian representative at ILO, which intimated no difficulty was seen in applying the principle within federal jurisdiction. I think it should be added that I am not sure there would not be certain difficulties involved if this bill became law in the federal jurisdiction, and an aggressive effort were made to enforce it. However, I can assure the hon. member that we shall keep this matter under careful study within the department and the national employment service. It might very well be, and we are looking at that, that an improvement in the provisions for women in our vocational training, counselling and placement services might gain the desired objectives more effectively than by passing a law. I cannot see my way clear to supporting this bill or recommending that a similar bill be introduced by the government at this session. This is not because I am against equal pay for women who do the same work as men. I am sure no member in this house would deny that, and it is not necessary for me to stress it.

Again I say there is a difference between attempting to bring about a remedy by law and having it carried out by collective bargaining on the one hand, and probably the more potent weapon of education on the other. It is because I am not convinced of the necessity or the desirability of trying to enforce such a law within those industries which are subject to federal labour jurisdiction that I reluctantly find I shall have to vote against my hon. friend's bill.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, may I make a correction, which I drew to the minister's attention during the course of his remarks. The passage he mentioned in connection with there being no difficulty in the way of implementation is in the government's own report, not in the words of the delegate.

Mr. Gregg: Thank you.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the principle of this bill and to commend the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) for having introduced it. I share the satisfaction expressed by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) that there has been some progress toward the achievement of the principle which underlies the bill, even without this kind of legislation. But I suggest the principle itself is of sufficient importance that we should have it on our statute books.

I am glad to know that a law similar to this is on the statute books of three of our provinces. It seems to me that an additional advantage of having this federal legislation passed would be that it would give a lead to other provinces to go along in this way.

It does seem incredible, when one casts his mind back to conditions as we read they were at the beginning of this century, that women did not then enjoy some of the rights and privileges that are now theirs. At the beginning of this country the women of this country did not have the right to vote. I believe, in fact, it was the early twenties before women's suffrage was generally established; and it was some years after that before women had the right to vote in every province in Canada. In the early years of this century women had not yet been recognized as persons, so far as appointment to the other house was concerned. So we have made a good deal of progress; and I am glad to see this proposal that we go further in the recognition of the equality of women.

Similarly, during this same half century to which I have made this passing reference there has been a good deal of progress in the recognition of the rights of labour, and the rights of workers generally. I am glad to see this bill catching up both strains of progress, as it were, and suggesting that women as workers should have the same rights that have been won by or accorded to men as workers.

I did think when the hon. member for Hamilton West was presenting the case for her bill, and pointed out that it is a protection for men as well as for women, that her argument was well put and that, as a matter of fact, instead of being called an act to provide equal pay for equal work for women it might well be called an act to provide equal pay for equal work for men and women. The day may come when an act like this will be needed to protect us mere men, as well as to protect the rights of women.

However, as I have already said, we welcome the progress that has been made across the years and, despite the minister's argument which, I take it, was mainly that we have got along without this kind of legislation, I think this principle should be on our statute books. After all, in this present session parliament passed Bill No. 171, which recognized the principle of equal pay for equal work for women. We did not make any differentiation between women members and men members in the House of Commons or between women members and men members in the other place. As we have already passed one bill along this line, if we are to be consistent I do not see how the Minister of Labour can suggest to hon. members on his side of the house that they should vote against this bill.

I started out by offering a word of commendation to the hon. member for Hamilton West for introducing this bill. I want to commend her in one other respect. While I do not have before me the provincial acts to which she referred, if my recollection of them is correct there is a slight difference between the Ontario and British Columbia acts on the one hand and the Saskatchewan act on the other. If my memory serves me correctly the Ontario and British Columbia acts refer to equal pay for equal work, or equal pay for the same work. And, as anyone who has followed this question knows, that language has already turned out to provide a loophole, at least in Ontario, and it will no doubt follow in British Columbia. An employer can say to a woman who is claiming the same pay, "Ah, but this work you are doing is not precisely the same as the work a man is doing". On the other hand the Saskatchewan legislation uses the phrase "equal pay for similar or comparable work". I am glad to note that the hon. member for Hamilton West when drafting her bill adopted the Saskatchewan language.

I realize it is almost six o'clock, and I do not want to be in the position of talking the bill out. Perhaps it is so close to six o'clock that this may seem to be what I have done. However, I am sure the hon. member for Hamilton West will understand that such is not the case, but that we wanted to indicate support for her bill. Indeed, when it comes up again at a later time we shall continue to indicate our support for this commendable piece of legislation.

On motion of Mr. Green the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

368. Quebec, $10,890,000.

Mr. Drew: At five o'clock when the house took up private bills I was dealing with some of the details that it seemed should be before hon. members of this committee and the house in reaching any conclusion. Without in any way suggesting that those who have been awarded the contract are not capable of carrying it out, I pointed out that there are a number of requirements which obviously should be met and which I hoped we would have fully explained to us, having regard to the highly specialized nature of the construction of this building that is under consideration.

When I quoted the words of the Prime Minister in response to questions which I had asked on January 19 and January 20, the point was raised that this subject had been dealt with on an earlier occasion in this house, and that the item had already been before us. I recall very well that it was before us, and having regard to the whole sequence of events in this extraordinary item now under consideration I should like to recall exactly what was before us, since this has been raised by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

The item came before us on April 9 of last year, which is less than a year ago. Reference has been made to the fact that this item was brought forward, as though it is suggested that hon. members were informed and therefore had every reason to accept the decision which had been made. Therefore once again I should like to recall exactly the amount of information that was before hon. members when, under the heavy pressure of both time and numbers, this item was carried. The hon. member for Peterborough did make a determined attempt to find out at least a little about what had taken place and was taking place.

I do not mean by that to suggest that the hon. member for Peterborough was satisfied with a little. He was making an effort to get the information; but I do think that any hon. member who is prepared to deal with this item now upon the basis that hon. members ever had any chance to give it consideration should remember just how much information was elicited at that time. I refer to page 3645 of Hansard for April 9 of last year, and I find this question by the hon. member for Peterborough:

> Is it the intention of the government to proceed with that building this year?

Will hon. members please listen to the clear and definite answer that was given on that occasion by the then minister of public works. This was the answer:

> I am not too sure that we have completed purchase of the site. I think somebody raised that question earlier in the session, and I answered that we were negotiating with two or three parties who are the owners of the site.

That was the first piece of definite information that was obtained on that occasion. Then later, after a number of similarly broad generalities by the minister of public works at that time, the hon. member for Peterborough asked this question:

> Has the minister any idea of the total cost of the building?
> [Mr. Drew.]

Listen to this as a beautiful example of the kind of accurate information that is given hon. members so they may form their well-considered judgment in passing on public business. These were the words of the then minister of public works:

> I am told that right now they think that the building will cost $5 million, but we have not got the plans and it is quite difficult for me to make any estimate.

This is not out of "Alice in Wonderland"; this is out of Hansard. "We have not got the plans, and it is difficult for us to give any answer." That was the last occasion this item was up, and we were told the members had an opportunity to inform themselves.

The hon. member for Peterborough, with commendable pertinacity, then asked this question:

> What will the site cost on top of that?

Here again we have one of those perfect examples of clarity of expression which will help hon. members form a well-considered judgment:

> I cannot give an estimate for the building before the plans and specifications are prepared, and I cannot say whether the site will be comprised in that amount. We have not completed the purchase of the land and I would not like to give the figures I have here at this time.

There, Mr. Chairman, you have all the information that anyone can desire, I am sure—that is, anyone who was not at all interested in getting the facts. I have read only a few of the questions and answers. With all the patience hon. members would be likely to show this evening, I would not wish to read all the questions and answers which will explain still further the amount of detail that was before hon. members. Finally, after an exhausting evening the chairman asked:

> And what about items 247 and 248?
> Some hon. Members: Carried.

To suggest that this was information upon which any hon. member could pass judgment is surely to reflect upon the dignity of this august body which has had the matter explained to it in such clear and explicit terms within these past few weeks. After all, these are hon. members who must be sure of the facts and sure of the information before they pass on any detail of public business; yet this is a perfect interpretation of the amount of information before us at the time this was dealt with on that occasion.

There was one minor reference later when a supplementary estimate was under consideration, on the very last night the house sat. Some considerable time after midnight, and again under the pressure of time and sheer exhaustion, the supplementary estimate was passed with even less information than that now before us.

I have referred to this once again only because the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration pointed out that in reading the words of the Prime Minister the fact must be borne in mind that this subject was brought up on an earlier occasion.

We are here now with the first opportunity that has yet been presented to hon. members to get any real information as to the facts and figures upon which the government reached its decision. I am not going to repeat the clear undertaking of the Prime Minister; it is on record. The words are not susceptible of any misinterpretation. They were clear, explicit and understandable; it was left without any reservation that before an official decision was made there would be an opportunity to discuss this subject on the item now before us. Therefore it is upon that basis that this matter comes before us at this time.

May I repeat, the questions to whether this building should be put up in Ottawa, in Montreal, in Vancouver, in Halifax or in St. John's, Newfoundland—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I think perhaps I should receive some support for the pronouncement of Newfoundland.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): It should be in Ottawa.

Mr. Drew: That is not the primary consideration before us now. But, oh, Mr. Chairman, it is a wonderful thing to hear at this time how interested the hon. member for Ottawa East is in the subject now before us for consideration.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): The Leader of the Opposition knows that when the matter was brought up he was the only one who could reply to the minister because under the rules of the house another member is not allowed to do so.

Mr. Drew: I have no desire to cause any disturbance to the hon. member, but I do not know what he is speaking about. We are on estimates now and the occasion to which I referred, when this matter was up before, was also on estimates. As the hon. member knows, that is the occasion when there is the freest debate, as I have no doubt we shall have clearly demonstrated here this evening.

Nevertheless, I do point out that this subject is one in which naturally we might have an interest. Since the hon. member for Ottawa East, the hon. member for Ottawa West and I as the member for Carleton, which embraces part of Ottawa, have certain responsibilities in relation to our own constituents, I recognize that we might very reasonably be interested in the immediate concern of those constituents.

I have carefully placed before this house a broad proposition, and pointed out that before any one of us can argue for or against Ottawa as the site, for or against Montreal or for or against any other site in Canada, it is essential that we have information which is not yet available to us.

I have reviewed this subject. I have referred to what was said on April 9 of last year as well as on a later occasion, because the suggestion was made that we had had an opportunity to consider it before. That is not so. The record is clear that we never had an opportunity. While it is perfectly true that the suggestion was made that Montreal might be considered, the last we were told when this subject was openly before us for debate in this house was that they did not even have the plans, let alone the property, and for that reason no accurate information could be given. Certainly no accurate information was given.

The subject is now before us. We have the clear undertaking by the Prime Minister that the matter would be open for consideration at any time up to the time this item was called. I trust that that undertaking stands, that the matter is open for consideration and that a decision upon this item will be made only upon the basis of the facts presented to this house.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take part in this debate to protest against the removal of the film board from Ottawa to Montreal. I think the method the government has adopted to bring about the move should cause resentment, even among Liberal backbench members. I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me that our constitution is being violated, morally if not actually, when the government lets a contract of this nature without even coming before parliament to discuss it. Even if the government has not violated the constitution, it has shown once again the utter contempt which it seems to have for backbench private members.

I say that the government, in letting this contract before the matter was discussed in parliament, is acting in a very arbitrary and high-handed way. This afternoon the minister presented us with a fait accompli. We can debate the matter for a week but it will not make a particle of difference, because the contract has been let already. As I said a moment ago, once again the government has ridden roughshod over the rights of members of this house.

I was interested in the remarks this afternoon of the hon. member for Ottawa West. He said that the move rather caught him by surprise. I want to tell him that these moves which are unwarranted and unnecessary on the part of the government are frequently catching opposition members in the same way. I think the time has come for all private members, whether on the government side or on the opposition side, to get together on this particular estimate and refuse to be rubber stamps. Before I sit down in two or three moments I hope to present a motion which will give an opportunity to the hon. member for Ottawa West, the hon. member for Ottawa East and other Liberal members to do something about the issue.

Why is the government proposing to move this board to Montreal? In my opinion parliament still has not been given a logical answer. After listening to the minister this afternoon it seemed to me that he was still evasive, and still did not give tangible reasons. Aside from the arbitrary way in which parliament has been treated, I think there are other reasons why this particular move should not be made at the present time.

On the surface, at least, it looks as though the proposal is loosely extravagant. It seems to me that once again it emphasizes the amazing disregard which the government has for the taxpayer's dollar. We in this group believe that the work of the national film board is most important to the development of Canada. We believe that the deficit which the national film board has had from year to year can be justified on cultural and educational grounds. But we have grave doubts as to the wisdom of the government expending $7 million or $8 million to move the film board lock, stock and barrel down to Montreal.

What are some of the facts pertaining to the cost? In the first place, the move is going to entail the transfer of a staff of about 475 persons and their families. A short time ago the minister estimated that the cost of that transfer would be about $500,000. It should be remembered that about 99 per cent, or at least a large majority, of the employees object to being uprooted with their families and forced to move out of Ottawa. Apparently their views have not been taken into consideration. The minister should realize that some of them may sever their connection with the film board before leaving their homes and friends.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

In the second place I think this move is extravagant, because of the nature of the building which is being erected. According to the Montreal Gazette it required 18 months to prepare the 150 blueprint sheets which were used. The plans provide, among other things, for marble mosaic hallways, eight auditoriums, two garages, a viewing room with chairs with pushbutton ashtrays, decorative ceilings and concealed lighting. According to the plans which have been laid down, the following is to be provided:

> An inner courtyard with a pool roughly fifteen feet long and three feet deep, with a fountain sculptured on the themes of sight, motion and sound; light would illuminate the fountain at night.

In other words, when you look at the plans you begin to wonder if the government is proposing to put up some kind of luxury studio, something that will make some of the Hollywood studios look a little bit dull or drab. Small wonder that our budget is hitting the $5 billion mark when we see needless expenditures of this kind being made.

In the third place, I think the location which is proposed is unfortunate. Real estate values, I understand, in Ville St. Laurent are very high. In addition, the site is so close to Dorval airport that costly soundproofing arrangements have to be made. The sound stage, for example, has to be encased in a double-walled shell to keep out the noises of jet aircraft at the Canadair plant nearby.

I believe if the building were constructed in Ottawa that kind of expenditure would not be necessary. May I also remind hon. members that fully one-third of the film board's work is done for various government departments. This requires very close consultation between those departments and the personnel of the film board. Thus if the board is removed to Montreal, heavy travelling expenses will be involved in view of the necessity for inter-city travel.

I believe the heavy cost involved should be sufficient reason to prevent the government from proceeding with this decision. But aside from the cost there are other factors also. This is the third major government agency which has been moved since I took my place in parliament. First of all we saw the most important offices of the C.B.C. moved to Montreal some time ago. Then the printing bureau was moved to Hull. Now we have the removal of the film board to Montreal. I personally doubt the wisdom of this trend. I believe the national capital should be a national capital, and I believe the headquarters of the film board should be in Ottawa, our country's capital.

Finally, there is the matter of provincial censoring. This was mentioned this afternoon, and I believe it is a very important question which should be considered at this time. May I remind hon. members that a short time ago Mr. Duplessis, premier of Quebec, suggested that he was going to introduce the censoring of C.B.C. television programs. Now, what assurance has the government, if the national film board does move to Montreal, that Premier Duplessis will not decide to censor their work also? I can tell the minister and the cabinet that the people of Saskatchewan will not look kindly upon Premier Duplessis, or any other provincial premier, censoring the kind of film fare they may see; yet if the board does go down to Montreal can the government say this will not take place?

Under these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I wish to move that item 368 of the estimates be reduced by $1,500,000, from $10,890,000 to $9,390,000. That, of course, is the amount which the government proposes to spend this year on the actual construction of the new building at Montreal. May I emphasize in conclusion that I am in no way querying the regular expenses of the national film board, but I do query the removal of the board to Montreal.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, hon. members will know that up until September 18 I was responsible to parliament for the policy of the film board. Since that time, as Minister of Public Works, I have been responsible for building any new accommodation the film board may require.

Since September 18 responsibility to parliament has rested with my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who has already demonstrated his thorough competence to deal with matters respecting the policy of the board.

I believe it might be helpful, however, if I did review some of the developments leading up to the decision to move the operating sections of the national film board to Montreal, and also indicate the great many instances on which the government did inform parliament of its specific intentions in that regard.

Recommendations that the government should provide suitable and efficient quarters for the national film board have been made for some years now. Hon. members will recall that since 1950 three independent studies have been made of the board's operations. One was by J. D. Woods and Gordon, management consultants; another was by the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, and the third was by a special committee of the house which sat in 1952.

After a firsthand examination of the conditions under which the board now functions, all those bodies recommended that better operating facilities should be provided. A specific and unanimous recommendation of the parliamentary committee was that the board's headquarters operations should be centralized in one building specially designed and constructed to meet its production, technical and distribution needs.

The headquarters staff of the board at the present time operates in nine widely scattered Ottawa buildings, and in two storage buildings near the city. I am sure hon. members who have visited the John street production building, the chief centre of the board's Ottawa operations, will agree that the facilities and working conditions in this one-time lumber mill are far from ideal. Moreover it is a fire hazard, which is an important consideration in view of the type of operations in which the film board is engaged.

Apart from the inconvenience and inefficiency of its present quarters, the board operates under another and very considerable handicap. It has no film studio where indoor shooting can take place. When studio work is required the board has to rent studios in other cities, necessitating considerable travelling expenses, or is compelled to use armouries, private homes, halls and other buildings unsuited to film production work. While the major part of the board's film work will always be carried out on location in various parts of Canada, a studio is essential to effective documentary production of the type now required by the board's outlets.

In order to plan suitable quarters, the Department of Public Works retained as a consultant one of the world's most experienced engineering architects in this field, the New York firm of John and Drew Eberson. This consultant worked very closely with Canadian architects who were responsible for producing the working drawings, and who will supervise the construction. This architect and engineering team was instructed to study the board's operations and its needs, and then to design a building of the minimum size and cost which would meet these needs.

A committee of the members of the board of the national film board was set up under the chairmanship of Mr. C. S. Band of Toronto, and throughout the planning they worked very closely with the Department of Public Works and the architects and examined thoroughly all the proposals. This work was then considered by all the members of the board as a whole, and I personally followed developments very closely. I might add that there were many changes and reductions before the plans were finalized.

The present plans approved by the board provide, I am convinced, that minimum of which I spoke earlier. Once it was decided to build new accommodation problems of location and acquisition of a suitable site became important.

The board of the national film board first recommended in May, 1950, that the operations of the board should be moved to Montreal. Subsequently the board was reorganized, a new act was passed by parliament, and the personnel of the old board resigned and were replaced. The new board considered the same subject and in October, 1950, unanimously recommended that the main portion of the board be moved to Montreal. The board were subsequently asked to reconsider the matter. In September, 1953, they did so and once again confirmed their earlier recommendation that the board's move to Montreal should be made.

Here, Mr. Chairman, is the independent study of the circumstances so often advocated by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, just to clarify the point, is the minister saying that the recommendation to move to Montreal was made by that firm of experts from New York?

Mr. Winters: I did not say that at all.

Mr. Drew: Of course you did not, but you left that impression.

Mr. Winters: No, I did not, Mr. Chairman. I had no intention of leaving that impression. What I said, and what I hope hon. members heard me say, was that the recommendation to move to Montreal was made by the board of the national film board on three successive occasions.

Mr. Fleming: Dates?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest, in order to avoid confusion, that the minister read to us the words of recommendation upon which the government acted as to the location of this site in Ville St. Laurent, and give us the dates of the recommendation.

Mr. Winters: I am reporting to the house that the board of the national film board, duly constituted under the National Film Act, did recommend to the government on three successive occasions that the operations of the film board be moved to Montreal, and the government accepted that recommendation.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Drew: On what dates was that recommendation made?

Mr. Winters: The first occasion was May of 1950, the second was October of 1950, and the third was September, 1953.

Mr. Thatcher: I wonder whether the minister would permit a question. Would he tell us who are the members of the board now?

Mr. Winters: Rather than interrupt my remarks at this time we will provide that information at a later date. The reasons for deciding to locate the board's operations in Montreal were fully explained to the parliamentary committee in 1952, but perhaps a brief review would be helpful. None of the three agencies that studied the operations of the film board within the past few years, that is, J. D. Woods and Gordon, the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, and the parliamentary committee, made a specific recommendation as to location. I want to make that clear. They did not recommend in favour of Ottawa, nor did they recommend in favour of Montreal.

I think perhaps I should refer to the report submitted by J. D. Woods and Gordon in that connection. On page 28 under the paragraph headed "Centralized accommodation", in which they recommended that new and adequate accommodation be provided, they ended their recommendation by stating:

> We recommend that centralized accommodation be provided as soon as it is practical to do so.

At the start of the report, where a summary of the principal recommendations is given, recommendation No. 11 reads:

> The work of the board in Ottawa should be centralized and suitable accommodation provided.

In the course of the hearings of the parliamentary committee the then commissioner, Mr. Arthur Irwin, outlined in considerable detail the reasons in favour of the move to Montreal. In reporting, the committee recommended that the operations of the board be consolidated in a new and suitable building, and since the committee was well aware of the government's intention to move the board's operations to Montreal and the reasons therefor, one can quite reasonably and naturally assume that the committee endorsed the move.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt but it might help clear up the matter.

Mr. Winters: You are, though.

Mr. Drew: The minister is well aware that with respect to the very reference he is making the chairman of the film board was asked:

What is the reason for locating in Montreal?

The minister knows that the answer given was:

That is a matter of policy, sir, and I do not know whether or not I should review it.

That was all the information given to the committee.

Mr. Winters: I shall deal with that, too, in due course. The making of motion pictures is a creative operation. The board must be staffed by people with creative minds behind whom there is a full head of creative talent. In Canada this creative talent must of necessity come from both our French and English-speaking populations. It is abundantly clear from the board's operations over the years that this pool of creative talent is more readily available in the larger centres of Montreal and Toronto than it is in Ottawa. It has been necessary to import much of it here from those centres. Of the two large cities I have mentioned, Montreal is the one with the larger pool of cultural and creative talent in both English and French.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, it is desirable that the film board should conduct its operations in the same general area with private producers in the same field so as to have the optimum interchange of talent, technicians and facilities. Montreal is the centre of quite a substantial private motion picture producing business in both English and French. Another important factor is the expanding use of films for television, and the fact that the production facilities of the C.B.C.'s developing television system are located in Montreal.

Having made the decision to move the board's operations to Montreal, existing accommodation there was considered. But in addition to the usual problems of transportation, housing, availability of services and so on which are attendant upon locating a fairly large operation in any municipality, we were faced with special problems because of the nature of the board's operations. For example, there had to be stability of soil and freedom from vibration from highway, rail and tramway traffic. There had to be an assured supply of abnormally large quantities of fresh water and relative freedom from dust and noise. These and other requirements made it necessary to examine in detail 15 different sites in the Montreal area before one was acquired in Ville St. Laurent a short distance east of Decarie boulevard and on the north side of Cote de Liesse.

I may say that because Cartierville airport is only a few miles away from the site we asked Canadair to fly low-flying jets overhead at full power to check the noise and vibration. These factors, that is noise and vibration, were among the many considered when selecting a site from the 15 examined. It is 14·714 acres in area and will cost about $280,000. Actually there is a homologated line approximately 150 feet back from the main frontage of the property because of the contemplated construction at some date of the trans-Canada highway along Cote de Liesse, and this homologated line will reduce the ultimate area of the site by 2·63 acres.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to whether or not parliament was informed of the decision to locate the board in Montreal, let me review certain of the instances when parliament was informed. First of all, to deal with the proceedings of the special committee on the national film board which sat in 1952, at pages 20 and 21 under the heading "Adequate facilities" Mr. Irwin in presenting his brief said—and I think perhaps it would be helpful if I were to read part of it—

For many years one of the board's most serious problems has been the inadequacy of the premises in which it is housed. The Woods Gordon report pointed out that it "has had to carry on its operation in ten separate buildings located in different parts of the city. This has made co-ordination difficult and has led to the duplication of certain services. Besides being scattered, the buildings available were not designed for efficient film production". The report recommended that the work of the board should be centralized and suitable accommodation provided.

The royal commission on the arts, letters and sciences noted "with anxious concern that the various premises in which the film board conducts its operation are cramped, scattered, inconvenient and hazardous. In the interests of economy and efficiency this deplorable situation should be changed". The commission recommended that safe and efficient premises be provided without delay.

Measures have been taken looking towards the implementing of these recommendations. On February 8th last, the Minister of Resources and Development, Hon. Mr. Winters, announced that after detailed study of fifteen possible sites in the Montreal area, a site in Ville St. Laurent, a suburb of Montreal, had been acquired by the Department of Public Works for a proposed new building for the national film board.

The minister added that plans for the proposed building were being prepared by the Department of Public Works and it is expected that these will be available during the current fiscal year.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a quotation from the minutes of proceedings and evidence, No. 1. I could read the list of members in attendance that day, and perhaps I should. They included Messrs. Beyerstein, Boisvert, Browne (St. John's West), Byrne, Cannon, Carroll, Carter, Coldwell, Courtemanche, Decore, Dinsdale, Ferguson, Fraser, Gauthier (Sudbury), Gauthier (Portneuf), Henry, Jutras, Knight, MacLean (Queens, P.E.I.), Macnaughton, McWilliam, Richard (Ottawa East), Smith (Moose Mountain), Whitman, Winters. That report was dated Thursday, May 8, 1952.

Then on page 33 of the committee proceedings there was a series of questions by Mr. Browne. He asked Mr. Irwin about the location of the film board, and Mr. Irwin said he thought perhaps that was a policy question. Mr. Browne asked:

How far has that project gone?

Mr. Irwin said:

The minister may wish to answer that question.

Then the minister, who at the time was myself, said:

We acquired land in Montreal, and plans are being prepared for a building to be built at some time on that site.

Then the hon. member for Peterborough asked the following question:

Would that involve the movement of the whole film board from here in Ottawa to Montreal?

This was followed by certain other questions and then the hon. member for Saskatoon, of the C.C.F. party, dealing with this proposed move to Montreal said:

The visit we had to that place certainly proved to me that the need for such a move is necessary.

Now, I think that makes it clear that hon. members of the committee were given every opportunity to debate the move to Montreal.

Mr. Drew: But remember the Minister of Public Works last year said they had not a site.

Mr. Winters: Then, Mr. Chairman, on page 88 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee for Tuesday, June 3, 1952, and Tuesday, June 24, 1952, the witness, Mr. Irwin, answered the following question put by Mr. Browne:

They are going to Montreal instead of remaining in Ontario? A. That is the policy.

He then asked about liaison and was told there would be liaison with Ottawa. Then the hon. member for Brandon-Souris asked:

What is the reason for locating in Montreal?

At that time the witness, Mr. Irwin, outlined at some length, as shown on pages 88 and 89, the reason it was deemed by the board expedient and in the interests of efficiency and economy to move the operations of the board to Montreal.

Then, Mr. Chairman, there are other instances. I find in reviewing Hansard that a question was asked on the orders of the day as far back as March 21, 1951, by Mr. A. Earl Catherwood, the former member for Haldimand. He asked me to comment on the report that the headquarters of the film board were being moved to Montreal, and in my reply at that time I stated that no final decision had been made but Montreal was among the centres being considered, and that Montreal had much to commend it.

Then, Mr. Chairman, in the estimates of the Department of Pubic Works for 1951-52 there was an amount of $300,000 to cover the acquisition of property in Montreal, and that was specifically designated as property in Montreal. It was under item 343. When this item was considered there was no criticism.

On February 8, 1952, I made a press announcement in which it was stated that a site in Ville St. Laurent, Montreal, had been acquired by the Department of Public Works for the proposed new building for the national film board, and that detailed studies of possible sites in the Montreal area had been carried out by the Department of Public Works. There is more to the announcement, but I merely point to it as another avenue to try to keep the public informed of the intention to move the film board to Montreal.

Then in the estimates for 1952-53 there was an item of $500,000 to cover the expense of moving the operations of the film board to Montreal. On February 13, 1953, the hon. member for Mount Royal asked about the move to Montreal, and I informed him at that time that the work would start late that year at Ville St. Laurent on a building to house the operations of the national film board. The site had been purchased by the government, and I thought it would be about two years before the quarters were ready.

In the estimates for 1953-54, under item 328, there is an amount of $900,000 for the construction of a national film board building in Montreal. This item was considered on April 9, 1953, at which time in reply to a question by the hon. member for Peterborough the former minister of public works informed the committee of the government's plans for going forward with the move to Montreal. In particular he stated at page 3645 of Hansard for that date:

If the hon. gentleman wants to know whether we are going to go ahead with the project, that is the intention of the government.

Then when the estimates of the film board were considered earlier this year, hon. members will recall that no one asked a question of any nature on the operations of the film board, despite the fact that the estimates specifically earmarked $900,000 for the film board move.

Mr. Drew: The minister does not mean this year.

Mr. Winters: No, it was 1953. Thank you for the correction. This indicates the extent to which the government has gone to keep hon. members and the public generally informed as to the government's intention to move the film board to Montreal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have heard it said in some quarters, although not here today, that the national film board is expanding its operations and that it intends to become a Canadian Hollywood. I must say that I thought the Leader of the Opposition took a very constructive attitude in his view toward the operations of the film board generally. Let me say just a few words about that talk of expansion. After the war there were about 750 people working for the board, which was then farming out little of its work to private producers. My colleague the Minister of National Revenue, during the period he was chairman of the board, started a program of retrenchment.

Since November, 1948, when I became responsible to parliament for the national film board, it has undergone substantial reorganization and consolidation. Among other things I directed the commissioner of the film board to reduce staff, with the result that despite a much larger and growing distribution of films, the number of personnel now employed is about 540, a reduction of over 200. There has been no expansion in that direction. The board was directed to concentrate on quality and produce the type of picture which would raise the standard of motion picture production generally in Canada, while at the same time confining itself to its job of interpreting Canada to Canadians and people abroad. I regard the production role of the board as a sort of standard setter for the Canadian industry in the field of motion pictures.

With this in mind I had hoped that it would be necessary for the board itself to produce no more pictures than were essential to maintain a high level of knowledge, technique and efficiency. As part of that policy the board was directed to assign more of its work to private producers who could meet the quality requirements. This has been done with what I consider to be good results.

It is a fact that for complete films, partial production, processing and printing purchases in Canada only the board did business with private industry to the extent of $81,000 in 1950-51. A comparable figure for the same item in 1952-53 was $260,000. There was no expansionist policy in this respect.

It has often been said that all motion pictures produced in Canada should be produced by private enterprise, just as they are in the United States, leaving the impression that no motion pictures are produced by other than private enterprise in the United States. That, Mr. Chairman, is quite in error. I find that a good many departments of government in the United States have motion picture producing facilities, and that several departments, individually, have plants which exceed the national film board's in size and expense, and which in addition include research facilities in the field of motion pictures.

As to the physical size of the building, operation for operation, the floor area of the new building will be less than the area of existing accommodation, largely by virtue of the fact that there will be a consolidation of operations under one roof. For example, the net working area in the board's present headquarters buildings totals 148,976 square feet. The net working area for the same operations in the proposed building will total 125,760 square feet.

In view of the present cramped quarters of the board, this reduction may seem surprising. It was made possible by careful allocation of space in a building specifically designed to meet the needs of film operations. However, the new building will include facilities not presently possessed by the board but nevertheless highly important. One such is a sound stage with a floor area of 9,339 square feet. I might say in this connection, Mr. Chairman, that the size of the average sound stage in Hollywood is 150 by 100 feet. We are proposing one sound stage here. As a matter of interest I might say that Warner Brothers, for example, have 25 large stages, and 80 per cent of them are bigger than the one planned by the film board. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer have 30 stages. The largest of them is 510 by 134 feet and the smallest 73 by 81 feet. The national film board sound stage is 70 by 120 feet.

There will also be a power house substation, truck storage, cafeteria, first aid quarters, film storage vaults and so on, all of which are necessary in a building housing some 415 employees engaged in this specialized operation. The total inside floor area of the building will be 280,000 square feet.

Mr. Chairman, the contract for this building, which I have mentioned, is for $5,230,760, and is based upon a cubic content of 4,980,000 cubic feet. This works out at $1.05 per cubic foot, which is not out of line when the specialized type of construction required for much of it is considered. For purposes of comparison, the cost per cubic foot of the new bureau of statistics building was $1.07, and it is considered to be a relatively inexpensive building. I might add, as a matter of interest, that construction costs are somewhat lower in Montreal than they are in Ottawa.

The Leader of the Opposition asked for the names of those who had tendered, and the amounts. I have that information here. The tenderers were as follows:

George Hardy Limited	$5,230,760
Louis Donolo Incorporated	5,277,000
The Key Construction Limited	5,297,400
Charles Duranceau Limited	5,472,000
Angus Robertson Limited	5,498,166
The Foundation Company of Canada Limited	5,522,566
B. Perini and Sons Canada Limited	5,593,061
The Tower Company Limited	5,659,800
Anglin-Norcross Quebec Limited	5,699,000
Pentagon Construction Company Limited	5,709,318
Terminal Construction Company Limited	5,777,000
A. Janin and Company Limited	5,819,300
E. G. M. Cape and Company	5,840,000
Walter G. Hunt Company Limited	6,239,000

Mr. McIvor: May I ask the minister a question? As this building will be far away from Montreal, is there any building for physical instruction, such as a gymnasium, so they can keep their figures in shape?

Mr. Fleming: Or a spring-filled dance floor?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, there are no such recreational facilities in the building. I would emphasize that this will not be primarily an office building. Although it will contain some office space, the proposed new building is essentially a production plant designed to house technical processes of a complex kind.

The studio, for instance, must be soundproofed by means of double-shell construction. This is the case whether it is near an airport or not, and whether it is in Ottawa or Montreal. The building must have facilities to provide the laboratories with large quantities of fresh water each day at constant temperatures. Many areas must be kept air-conditioned and dust-free. Complicated electric and electronic systems must be installed. This is a specialized operation; it requires custom-made facilities, and these can be obtained efficiently only by the construction of a specially designed building, as was recommended by the parliamentary committee and others.

That is what the government are proposing to do, and we are proposing to do it in the most economical way possible.

Mr. Chairman, there are always those people who are concerned about the future of the film board. When the act was changed some three years ago fear was widely expressed in Ottawa that we were ruining the film board, despite the fact that the government made it clear that its intention was to produce a better film board. I think the public generally is now satisfied that we have done that.

The government's intention in this instance is to produce a better board by providing it with facilities it needs in an area where it can obtain the required technical skill and creative talents to maintain that high quality of production which Canadians have come to expect from the film board. Any reduction in the amount of this vote now would in effect destroy the operation of the film board and, Mr. Chairman, the government has no intention of sitting by and seeing that done. For that reason we intend to oppose the amendment.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, we are still waiting for a word of explanation as to the choice of the site. Will the minister read to us the extracts from the three reports he has mentioned which recommended the choice of this site?

Mr. Winters: I think that question is unnecessary, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): So do I.

Mr. Winters: The Leader of the Opposition heard my statement in reply to a question he raised. I said specifically that none of the three agencies had recommended in favour of Ottawa, nor had they recommended in favour of Montreal or any other location. They simply recommended that better facilities be provided. The board itself, that independent body that the government looks to for recommendations as to policy and direction on the film board, recommended that the operating facilities of the board be moved to Montreal, and the government accepted that recommendation.

Mr. Drew: The minister misunderstood me. I asked him whether he would read us the extracts from the recommendations of the board which explained why this should be done.

Mr. Winters: I understood the Leader of the Opposition. I think I understood him correctly that he asked me to read from the reports.

Mr. Drew: No, I did not.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes; that is what you asked for.

Mr. Winters: In any event, reports of the film board to the government are privileged documents, and I am sure hon. members—

Mr. Drew: That is the independent body.

Mr. Winters: —will assume that I am speaking correctly when I say that was their recommendation, and that the government accepted it.

Mr. Drew: Will the minister say whether there were any recommendations from any officials, other than the board, which suggested any other site?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I think the Leader of the Opposition intends to attempt to lead me into a position where I will reveal recommendations of officials working within a government agency to the head of the agency, and I shall do no such thing.

Mr. Drew: I want the minister to disclose that there were recommendations against this.

Mr. Winters: You say so, if you know it.

Mr. Drew: We have had explained to us that this independent body made certain recommendations. Now, let us have a demonstration of the independence of this board, and let us have the recommendations that were made. I have sought to make it clear that all we are asking is to know the basis upon which this decision is made. After all, we are asked to support the recommendation for the expenditure not of the $1½ million that is before us but of $5½ million, plus all that goes into it. Presently I hope the minister will tell us what will be the total cost of the land, the buildings and all the equipment going into this, because that is something that will give us an idea of the measure of the operation. Nothing else will. I am putting forward the proposition to the minister that there was no unanimous recommendation in regard to any one site, and that other sites were considered and approved.

Mr. Winters: By whom?

Mr. Drew: Will the minister tell the committee now that this independent body, so free of government as it is described, did not forward to the government any recommendations from the officials within the board other than those to which he has referred?

Mr. Chevrier: He has told you, and he is not subject to cross-examination.

Mr. Winters: The recommendations we received from the board on three separate occasions were to the effect that the operating sections of the national film board should be set up in Montreal.

Mr. Drew: Surely the minister can answer the question. Surely the minister can answer whether or not there have been received any recommendations other than those to which he has referred, recommendations which proposed alternative sites.

Mr. Winters: It is the national film board to whom I looked for advice when responsible to parliament, and that board recommended to me that the facilities be moved to Montreal.

Mr. Drew: Will the minister tell us what will be the total cost of the land, buildings and equipment when this is completed?

Mr. Winters: The contract cost of the building is $5,230,000. The land will cost, when settlement is completed, about $280,000. The cost of the equipment I do not know. I think my colleague will be in a better position to give an up-to-date estimate of that. I do not think the cost of new equipment will be so much. At the present time the film board is fairly well equipped. There will be cost involved in the movement of equipment to Montreal; there will doubtless be some new equipment required, but I have no estimate of what that might be.

Mr. Drew: I heard the impatient comments from those who are not interested in getting any facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is all in your mind.

Mr. Drew: After all, we have had an answer now that is really merely a continuance of the answers we received on April 9 of last year: "I do not know how much it is going to be; it will not be so much." Well, how much is so much? We have just been told by the minister that one of the considerations would be the fact that there will be facilities for the production of films for television within the same area. Let us know just what it is going to cost to put in the new equipment that will be involved in bringing this operation into harmony with the other operations providing the films for television, which constitute a new operation. Can the minister not tell us that?

Mr. Winters: No, I cannot. After all, this is an estimate to cover the cost of the building in Montreal. There will be another occasion to consider the estimates of the national film board, and I suggest that would be a much more appropriate occasion on which to obtain these details.

Mr. MacDougall: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the Minister of Public Works, because I came down here from the far Pacific coast with a great deal of misgiving respecting the transfer of the national film board from the capital city of Ottawa to the city of Montreal. Out on the Pacific coast we have felt, rightly or wrongly, that in the development of the federal district in and around the city of Ottawa the taxpayers of Canada were endeavouring to build a national capital.

When I left the coast on November 7 last a great number of people were concerned. What were they concerned about? They were concerned about the fact that on the one hand we were taking the taxpayers' money to develop a national capital in Ottawa, and on the other we were removing the cornerstones of that national capital and setting up the film board headquarters in the city of Montreal. That was the impression with which I came to this session of parliament. I will have to admit that until tonight, until I heard the fine explanation of the situation by the Minister of Public Works, I was labouring under a similar delusion to that of the people in my riding.

I view this situation now as one of complexity, because as I tried to get the eye of the chairman, the Leader of the Opposition rose on six different occasions. Therefore it is six to one. He is batting six hundred and I am batting only a hundred. With respect to that question, I do not mind it particularly for the simple reason that I view this situation very much like Sherlock Holmes did when he was called in to solve a very complicated situation. He said to his good friend, "Watson, I must take charge of this situation immediately because it is so complicated; I find that the window has been broken on both sides." I think the window has been broken on both sides with respect to the film board.

An hon. Member: No windows.

Mr. MacDougall: We have statements without foundation, statements that have no basis in fact, rumours and frustration all over the land with respect to the national film board. We have heard tonight a review of the actual facts which prompted the government to make certain recommendations with respect to the removal of the film board.

An hon. Member: Dispense.

Mr. MacDougall: That to me is a factual explanation of what has transpired.

An hon. Member: Simple, Dr. Watson.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): You are biased.

Mr. MacDougall: My good friend the hon. member for Peterborough says I am biased. Possibly I am, but if I am biased I am biased on a good side. I feel that the people of Canada are vitally interested in the production of good films. I have to admit with a great deal of temerity that I am about as unarty as any unarty member in this house.

An hon. Member: That is obvious.

An hon. Member: Too modest.

Mr. MacDougall: As far as cinematography and television are concerned, I am not in the slightest concerned with them as an individual, but there are hundreds of thousands of people in my province and in the other nine provinces of Canada who look forward with a great deal of anticipation to the showing of national film board films.

In the metropolitan areas of Canada there are a thousand and one different types of amusement with which the people may amuse themselves. But let us not forget that there are many thousands of rural areas in Canada where the facilities for the handling and presenting of pictures and television are not adequate and may not be adequate for many years to come. It behooves us to do what we can, particularly for the people in those remote areas, to see to it—will this magpie chorus behind me pipe down, please?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. MacDougall: You have given me a derail cocktail, and I do not know where I stopped.

Mr. Knowles: That is where you started.

Mr. MacDougall: Don't worry, I will handle you later on. We have to consider the hundreds of thousands of people who do not enjoy the privileges enjoyed by those who live in the metropolitan areas from east to west in our fair domain. Those people look forward with a great deal of expectation to the presentation of national film board films in the remote areas of our land. I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, and hon. members of this committee that the spirit of Canada does not lie particularly in the metropolitan areas. The pioneering spirit that made Canada what it is today is to be found in the remote areas of this land.

It is all very well to sit back in complacency and say, "To heck with you, Joe; everything is all right as long as everything is all right with me". I was raised on a much simpler doctrine than that, to do unto others as I would that they should do unto me. I think that is the philosophy with which we should judge this great national problem today. We should consider the other fellow who is in less happy circumstances than we are.

In conclusion I want, on my own behalf and on behalf of a great number of people in British Columbia, to thank sincerely the Minister of Public Works for the fine, lucid and clear explanation he has given of this national film board problem. He and the other ministers, whether by a majority or unanimous decision of the cabinet, decided to make this change in the interests of the people of Canada. I want to leave this last closing word with you, Mr. Chairman. Under no circumstances whatsoever should any man or woman in this house judge this question upon racial or religious principles.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacDougall: It must be based entirely upon that which is the best for the common weal of the people of Canada.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, the last speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, started off by saying that he approached this question with some misgivings, but by the time he ended he had talked himself completely out of any misgivings whatsoever. His changed feelings may have been due in part to the speech which the minister made. I must say that what the minister said left me at the end with the same misgivings I had when he started.

I must also say that he made a very powerful case against the opposition, and legitimately so. I speak for myself when I say that we were lax and remiss, we were wrong; but I am not going to stay quiet because I am afraid to say I was wrong at some other time. I think the error which is being committed now is much worse than the errors which were committed by us some months ago and some years ago.

The minister has given us many reasons for the film board being moved. He has quoted reports. For instance, the Woods-Gordon company, if I remember rightly, suggested that the work of the board in Ottawa should be centralized and suitable accommodation be provided. If the minister agrees that better operating facilities should have been provided, that the film board should be operating in one building instead of in many buildings as it has in the past; if he agrees that that meant inefficiency, as it was bound to, then the government should have done something for the film board years ago when we were asking them to give some consideration to the problems of that board. But the government did nothing at all until it decided that the film board should be moved to Montreal.

This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition asked what were the facts upon which this decision was based. The only fact I could get out of the minister's speech concerning this decision was that in Montreal there is lots of fresh water and there is freedom from dirt and noise. I am certain that there are other areas in the country to which those facts would be equally applicable. I question profoundly the wisdom of moving the board to Montreal or any other area. When the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard expresses the hope that this matter will not be regarded in a racial or religious manner he is talking nonsense—

Mr. MacDougall: Nonsense to you.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I say you are talking nonsense. No one interjected that idea until you came along.

During the course of his remarks the minister said that any reduction in this vote would destroy the effectiveness of the national film board. That is just not so. If the film board should stay in this city that fact would not reduce its effectiveness one iota compared with its effectiveness in the past. But the government has become stubborn. It has made up its mind. It has dug in its heels and said, "We are not going to budge." Yet the government's policy is not only stubborn; it is also silly. One can forgive a silly policy. After all, it is a natural manifestation. But I find it very difficult to forgive stubbornness because that is an acquired characteristic. The wedding of this manifestation and of this characteristic is usually the basis for Liberal policy; and it is not a good way, I assure hon. members, to govern this country.

The Leader of the Opposition asked for the facts on which this decision was based, but none have been forthcoming. However, there is one fact in regard to this move, and it hinges entirely upon the decision of the last commissioner of the film board. He felt it would be a good move to make and he sold a lot of people a bill of goods. I do not question that he acted honestly, nor do I question his belief that he was right. But he did sell that bill of goods to the government, and they are now either too proud or too stubborn to retreat from the position which they have taken.

This afternoon the hon. member for Ottawa West said this move came as a surprise to him. But why? After all, last year the hon. member in his position as parliamentary assistant to the Acting Prime Minister was surely on the outskirts of the government. He was surely near to government policy. He must have had some idea of what was going on.

If this came to the hon. member as a surprise, then what sort of cabal have we existing within the government? If it came as a surprise to my hon. friend over there then it came as just as much a surprise to hon. members here. That does not mean that it becomes any more palatable.

Some arguments have been advanced for moving the film board, and the Minister of Public Works repeated some of them tonight. I simply do not agree with him any more than I suppose he agrees with me. But at least he did not use the argument I have heard so often in the past, that it is highly important from the point of view of creative capacity that the film board has to be removed from the deadening influence of the civil service atmosphere. I do not believe the atmosphere in Ottawa is as dull or as effete as many would make out.

The minister did say that it was important for the board to get into some area such as Montreal or Toronto where there was a pool of creative talent. But may I remind the minister that Montreal and Toronto are not the only areas in this country in which there is creative talent. One has only to listen to the radio to find that there is as much creative talent in Winnipeg or Vancouver or in other areas across the country. I think it is true to say that the best films produced by the film board have not used professional talent but ordinary run of the mill Canadians, ordinary men, women and children; and the film board does not depend upon a pool of creative talent such as the minister suggests in order to do its best work. I admit that in Montreal and Toronto there are professional actors, but I do not believe they are a necessity to the operations of the film board.

The minister mentioned television. Television is important, and the part which the film board can play in television is perhaps very important. But we can make no greater mistake than to assume that the primary task of the film board is to act as an adjunct to the C.B.C. in producing films for television. There is a vast difference between the sort of work we expect from the film board, which is interpreting Canada to Canadians, and the work being done on television. Television is something which is evanescent, something like the reports which are made by journalists for newspapers. They are written, printed and then disappear from the ken of man. The sort of film we expect from the film board is something which is going to be of more lasting importance, which will have some effect and which will still be worth seeing two or three years from now.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

It has been suggested that it would be advisable to have the film board administration decentralized, but this is a suggestion which I simply cannot understand. What is going to happen is this. The working section of the film board is going to be near Montreal and the administrative offices of the film board are going to be in Ottawa. How in the name of business or sanity can one expect the film board to adequately administer the corporation without being much nearer the scene of operations? That sort of arrangement does not add up to sense.

The government has loaded the incoming commissioner with a tremendous incubus which may conceivably weigh him down. I do not believe it is a fair proposition. He had no say in the policy, but he happens to have inherited the policy of his predecessor who, in turn, sold what I call a bill of goods to the government.

Another factor which must be borne in mind is that the film board must maintain the closest liaison with government departments. What sort of bill for travelling expenses are we going to accumulate on behalf of the film board personnel when they move to Montreal if they have repeatedly to get in touch with government departments in this city? Research has to be carried out which can only be conducted in the national capital, for the facts and figures and the kind of information they require will have to be found here. That will mean they will have to commute between Montreal and Ottawa, and one can easily imagine the kind of bill we will have to meet. In addition, how can the commissioner possibly keep a finger on everything, and maintain efficiency in Montreal if he has to spend most of his time in Ottawa? However, the government feels that the commissioner ought to be here, and perhaps in Montreal we will have some other administrative group.

One of the big problems is going to be the fact that several hundred employees of the film board are going to move. It may be unpleasant, but hundreds have to do that in other employment. One can sympathize with them, but it is not an insuperable problem. A greater argument to my mind and of greater importance is that many members of the film board, rather than uproot themselves here and rather than go to another province—and I do not care which province it is—might decide to leave the film board. It is conceivable that many of the brighter people in the film board would rather stay here in the hope of getting other jobs or go into the professional production of films in this city, and they may leave the board.

As I said before, the last commissioner came to the conclusion that the move to Montreal would be a good idea. He sold this idea to a great number of people in this city. He sold the idea to the editor of the Ottawa Citizen, though let it be said for him that he came out in his own paper and admitted that he had been sold the idea, that he now realizes the idea is not as good as he first thought, and that he has changed his mind on the subject.

The government has accepted this recommendation, and this is the only fact which has been given to us. Now the government has become stubborn. It feels that its prestige is at stake, and it is now resolved not to budge. If I may put the matter colloquially I would sum it up in this way, Mr. Chairman. The last commissioner laid an egg and the administration sitting over there has hatched something pretty horrible.

Mr. Hahn: In speaking to the amendment I should like to suggest that the Minister of Public Works made an excellent case for the moving of the film board, so far as the government's view is concerned. I believe he has sold us on the idea that the film board should be moved, but I do not know that he has sold us on where it should be moved. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard suggested that there were other places, but tonight he has been so favourably impressed as to believe that Montreal must be the place and Montreal alone. The hon. member for Winnipeg North has suggested that Montreal and Toronto are not the only places of culture in Canada. I believe that truer words were never spoken. In Winnipeg and Vancouver we have two of the finest cultural centres in all Canada.

Why do we have to centralize everything in the east? If we are going to move something, let us move something westward for a change. I happen to be the member for New Westminster, but I do not necessarily suggest that New Westminster must be the place. The Minister of Public Works did say that a bilingual centre must be chosen. Very close to the city of New Westminster, in the town of Maillardville, we have one of the finest groups of French-Canadian people that one could find. They may not be as cultured as those of the far east—

An hon. Member: Far more.

Mr. Hahn: —but at least we have a bilingual situation there. If it is so simple to move the film board to the city of Montreal, would it not be just as simple to move some of our people of French culture to the far west, to the city of Vancouver, let us say? We have the trees, the mountains, the sea and everything else that could be desired for the filming of beautiful pictures. If it does become the policy of the government to start decentralizing things, then I suggest that the government should get up and say so. Let them tell the people that they are going to decentralize. Let them say that they are going to move the Department of Agriculture to the province of Alberta or to Saskatchewan. The province of British Columbia deserves more public works in proportion to the taxation it has paid in the past 20 years than any other province, so let them move the Department of Public Works to the Pacific coast. Let us decentralize these departments.

Coming back to the particular problem of the film board, it has taken the government a matter of three years, from 1950 to 1953, to sell itself the idea that it is necessary to move the board to Montreal. The Leader of the Opposition asked a most pertinent question about other recommendations, but we did not get a satisfactory answer. I think the people of Canada are entitled to know whether there are any other places in Canada that should have the privilege of at least expecting that the film board might be moved to their particular localities.

Reference was made to the matter of television, but I do not think that should be considered in the same light as the production of films for the people of Canada. As I understand it, the purpose of the film board is to sell Canada to Canadians through films produced by the board. The project is an excellent one, but if we are going to sell Canada to Canadians through the film board then the question of television is rather irrelevant, because television sells itself with the Hollywood type of picture that seems so desirable in so far as the public are concerned. Wrestling matches and things of that type are a lot more appealing to the public than the Kitimat project, for instance.

I would say that the biggest problem the film board must solve today is the matter of public relations between the government and the people of Canada. For instance, I saw a very interesting film on the Kitimat project. I think any Canadian who sees that film will understand that the government is definitely trying to assist in the building up of Canada. That happens to be a particular project. I would go so far as to suggest that if that is the problem confronting the board, then what is wrong with keeping the film board in Ottawa? Why must we go to Montreal to visit the central offices of the film board? Why must we go to Hull to see the printing bureau? When I come to the capital city of Canada I do not expect to have to run all over the rest of Canada to visit the various government offices.

If we are going to have centralization, then let it be here in our national capital. If it is necessary let us build a pentagon, or something similar to what has been constructed in the United States, to house all our important departments. So far as I am concerned I have not heard a plausible reason why the offices of the film board should be moved from Ottawa to Montreal, Vancouver or any other place in Canada. I suggest that the problem should be examined very closely and carefully. If we are going to decentralize the departments of government we should make a particular point to tell the people of Canada. The government should be honest about it and tell the people that for protective purposes, or whatever the reason may be, they are going to decentralize and place various offices right across Canada, so that if you want to see someone about a particular project you may have to travel from one end of the country to the other.

I suggest that might not be a bad idea at that. Members of parliament might become more familiar with the rest of Canada if, for example, a certain office was on the west coast and another one was in Newfoundland. We might see some members when they came to the far west, and have the privilege of explaining our problems to them. I am sure the hon. member from Newfoundland who commended this move a moment ago would be just as happy to see some of us come to Newfoundland so he could explain to us the problems with respect to fishing and other matters.

I do not wish to speak at great length on this particular problem, and I hope I have not tired you, Mr. Chairman. But the spirit of Canada must prevail, the spirit of either centralization or decentralization. In this particular instance the Canadian people have every right to know exactly what is the full truth of the story. We should have a clear explanation, but up to now I would say it is as clear as mud.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, during the discussion tonight some reference has been made to the committee on the national film board of 1952. When the minister referred to that committee, it seemed to me that he was suggesting that there was unanimous approval of the idea of shifting the national film board headquarters to Montreal. It was my privilege to sit as a member on that committee, and as I listened to the presentation of the then chairman of the board, Mr. Irwin, it was not my impression that the committee generally agreed with the idea that the location of the film board should be changed from Ottawa to Montreal. In fact my sentiments were just the opposite, and I believe that if other members of the committee take part in this discussion they will reveal similar sentiments.

I must also admit that my sentiments have not been changed by anything that has been said in the discussion thus far, either by the minister or by anyone else who has spoken in favour of the move. Rather I would agree with the hon. member for Ottawa West who put forth an excellent case here this afternoon for the retention of the film board activities in the capital city.

During the minister's remarks he made some reference to a question I asked during the deliberations of the committee. The question was something like this: Why was the film board going to be moved from Ottawa to Montreal? If the minister had continued reading the evidence he would have revealed that I expressed ideas similar to those which have just been put forward by the hon. member for New Westminster. If it was necessary to change the location of the film board, why not move it to some other part of Canada which could provide adequate facilities for carrying on the operations of the board? I shall pursue that point further toward the conclusion of my remarks.

At this stage in my discussion I want to point out that there are two phases, as I see them, of national film board operations. In the first instance we have the basic task of production. As I have listened to the discussion it has seemed to me that hon. members from all sides of the house have indicated agreement that the national film board has done an excellent job under rather difficult circumstances, in providing educational and documentary films that emphasize the Canadian viewpoint. There seems to be general agreement on that conclusion.

Just as important as the task of producing films is the job of distribution. When the Minister of Public Works indicated that there had been a decrease of some 200 employees engaged in film board operations, it occurred to me immediately that this reduction in personnel had taken place not on the production side of film-making but rather on the distribution side. Before I came to this house it was my privilege to be quite closely associated with the distribution of films through our local film council in the city of Brandon. I recall that just after the war there was a substantial national film board staff located in the Winnipeg regional office. This staff was drastically reduced in about 1948. The reduction in staff took place among the field men who were working in the rural areas carrying on the important task of bringing documentary and educational films to the people in the relatively isolated sections of Canada, those who could most benefit from them.

At that time, in 1948, when the reduction in staff occurred—which I have just learned this evening came as the result of government policy at that time—the work of film distribution was rather sadly dislocated. The problem has been overcome by voluntary action at the local level, so that today film distribution is largely out of the hands of film board agencies. We find that most of the work of distribution in the rural areas is being handled by university extension departments. Only this winter the University of Manitoba followed the general trend and assumed complete responsibility for the distribution not only of national film board pictures but also films produced by any other agency in Canada, as well as from the many other sources of supply that are available outside Canada. There is no responsibility devolving upon the national film board in that regard at all.

Then, too, I think one of the most encouraging developments in this effort to bring good films to the people is the increase in voluntary action by local councils. It became necessary to fill the gap that was left by the sudden evacuation of the national film board, and during the past five or six years almost every area in the province from which I come has succeeded in gathering together a group of public-minded citizens who are enthusiastically taking care of this problem of distribution. Not only do they provide facilities for film distribution but they carry on considerable propaganda through the local press and through the conduct of film festivals, and in addition by buying their own projection equipment. Formerly this equipment was supplied through national film board channels. Through the appeals for funds to obtain sufficient money to provide the equipment, general interest in the viewing of worth-while films is stimulated among service club groups and other groups in that particular community.

We should remember also that various organizations representing important groups in the country are solidly behind the program for bringing good films to the local communities. I need only refer to such activities as citizens' forums, the farm forum, labour organizations and farm organizations to indicate that each one of these groups has made an outstanding contribution to the success of the films for the masses program which has made such headway during postwar years. I would suggest to those responsible that if we are going to have any objectivity at all in this government-sponsored film production program, the closest liaison should be maintained with those organizations representing all cross-sections of Canadian public opinion.

The question has already been put to the minister tonight as to the membership of the advisory board that is supposed to have made the recommendation for the move to Montreal. Several times during the contribution by the Minister of Public Works he said that the final decision was based on the recommendations of the board of directors of the national film board. I would be intrigued to know whether there is a representative, for example of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the C.C.L., the T.L.C., or other organizations on that board, because I think if you are going to keep in touch with the real needs of the community in so far as film production is concerned, that can be done only through the closest possible co-operation with these groups.

Whenever a government assumes direct responsibility for mass media of communication, no matter how deeply saturated in democratic traditions that government may be there is always the danger that the mass media will be used to manipulate public opinion for political purposes. The very fact that the national film board moved forward so rapidly during the war is indicative of the success that can be achieved by the use of this media in influencing public opinion. I remember the impact that the outstanding "Canada Carries On" series made upon the people of Canada in wartime, as the national film board endeavoured to stimulate interest and enthusiasm in respect of the war effort.

The matter of distribution is largely out of the hands of national film board officials, and has moved to voluntary groups, consisting largely of film councils in co-operation with university extension departments. I think that is all to the good.

To bring my remarks to a conclusion—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: Some hon. members on the other side say "hear, hear". They do not like this. To bring my remarks to a conclusion I wish to refer again briefly to the recommendation I made during the hearings of the committee back in 1952. At that time I asked, if it was necessary to change the location of the film board, why a city like Winnipeg could not be considered. At the time I put forward this suggestion it was regarded as facetious by members of the committee. But, judging from the reasons for the move given by the minister tonight, I think the capital city of the keystone province has all the qualifications necessary to carry on an adequate film production program.

First of all the explanation was put forward that only Toronto and Montreal provide sufficient talent resources. It was my privilege to visit the present building housing the national film board—I believe it is down on John street—and, moving through the various departments, it was almost like old home week, because located there were many westerners who had been caught up in the great migration from the prairies. This is a subject often discussed in the house, the problem of rural-urban migration. As I say, it was almost like old home week.

The city of Winnipeg is unique as a cultural centre in Canada. In addition to its geographical location in the centre of Canada it is the home of the Royal Winnipeg Ballet, the outstanding activity of its kind in the dominion. It boasts the world's greatest musical festival, one that is recognized in other countries outside Canada. It has an outstanding symphony orchestra. Its theatrical productions are featured regularly on drama programs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. One could mention many individual artists—and I think particularly of Donna Grescoe, the great Canadian violinist —who had their origin in the city of Winnipeg, in the keystone province.

The argument has been offered here that the main emphasis by the national film board is to appeal to the rural audience. I understand that 20 per cent of the production budget will go into the manufacture of films for consumption by our rural audiences in isolated centres. I cannot see for the life of me how operating in Montreal is going to cater to the group who most need these additional cultural facilities, namely our rural audience.

The only talent that seems to exist in abundance in the city of Montreal is a superabundance of Liberal members. And—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: Looking at the situation logically, without emotion or bias, it seems to me that the presence of this sort of talent might have had more to do with the decision than the cultural talent to which our attention has been directed. One further word regarding the suitability of other parts of Canada as compared with Montreal.

Mr. Crestohl: Is the hon. member serious in his assertion that Winnipeg would provide as good talent of a bilingual nature as can be provided in Montreal?

Mr. Dinsdale: I was coming to that. Winnipeg is unique as a prairie city in that cultural duality is strongly represented there in the city of St. Boniface, which has all the characteristics of French-speaking Canada and, in addition, has that unique exuberance and creativity that is peculiar to the western provinces of our great dominion. And so from every aspect—

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Dinsdale: I shall be finished in two or three minutes. If we must shift, must we think only in terms of Ontario or Quebec? Let us think in terms of other parts of Canada which merit consideration. If we are really going to develop Canada as a strong nation among the family of nations in the modern world, we must think in terms broader than the city of Toronto or the city of Montreal.

Returning to the main topic for discussion, I emphasize as strongly as I can that I am vigorously opposed to any move of national film board operations from the city of Ottawa. We have established our national capital here. The recognition of Ottawa as a national capital is gradually being accepted in other parts of Canada and the world. Such a move is definitely not in the best national interests.

Mr. Winters: Apparently the hon. member has changed his mind.

Mr. Dinsdale: This is my last sentence. I also suggest that the provision of adequate facilities for the national film board could be done with a much more economical expenditure than that indicated in the estimate.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take the resolution with respect to vocational training, the resolution with respect to the Pension Act, and then the Criminal Code.

Mr. Knowles: And Thursday?

Mr. Harris: On Thursday we hope to have the resolution with respect to the Bank Act on the order paper. If so, the Minister of Finance will speak to that, and after that we shall continue with this debate.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 3, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Third report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Croll.

CRIMINAL LAW

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SETTING UP OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON DEFENCE OF INSANITY

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce that an order in council has been passed setting up a royal commission to inquire into and report upon the question whether the criminal law of Canada relating to the defence of insanity should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent.

The membership of the said commission will be Hon. James Chalmers McRuer, chief justice of the high court of justice of Ontario, chairman; Dr. Gustave Desrochers, assistant superintendent of St. Michel hospital, and a member of the faculty of medicine at Laval University, Quebec, P.Q., vice-chairman; Her Honour Judge Helen Kinnear, county court judge for the county of Haldimand, Ontario; Dr. Robert O. Jones, professor of psychiatry at Dalhousie University, Halifax, N.S.; and Joseph Harris, Esquire, of Winnipeg.

QUESTIONS

POST OFFICE—NIGHT DIFFERENTIAL

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has there been in effect in the Post Office Department a night differential in favour of employees obliged to be on duty between the hours of 5 p.m. and 7 a.m.? If so, what have been the terms of such a night differential?

2. Has any such night differential been discontinued, or is it being discontinued, in connection with the institution of the five-day 40-hour week amongst post office employees? If so, for what reason?

3. Have any protests been received against the abolition of said night differential, and is consideration being given to maintaining the said night differential?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare):

1. Yes. Seven hours night duty has been accepted in lieu of eight hours.

2. Yes. It is proposed to implement the five-day 40-hour week for all shifts.

3. No formal representations have been received, but reports of a meeting in Vancouver indicate some confusion. Night differential as previously applied disappears with the adoption of the five-day 40-hour week, but the department recognizing the inconvenience of night work has recommended a cash allowance for night duty at points where the five-day 40-hour week goes into effect.

The cash allowance for the additional one and a half hours worked and the inconvenience will be approximately $6 per worker per week for full-time night duty.

Employees will also have the benefit of one more day free from duty each week. In other words their hours of duty will be confined to five days instead of six as at present.

VESSEL "LA HAVE"

Mr. Nowlan:

1. Where is the vessel known as La Have, presently based?

2. Is the La Have now commissioned, and if so, for what purpose?

3. What was the purchase price for the La Have when originally acquired by the Canadian government?

4. What has been the total amount of money expended by the Canadian government or any department thereof in connection with the said La Have since its acquisition, and for what purpose or purposes have the said moneys been expended?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. The La Have is based at Halifax, N.S.

2. The La Have has been commissioned as a Canadian naval auxiliary vessel attached to the naval research establishment, Dartmouth, N.S., and is used for oceanographic and hydrographic research.

3. $60,000.

4. (a) $499,370.98; (b) purchase price, $60,000.00; refit 1952, $39,363.72; operating costs (1952-53), $58,410.00; operating costs (1953-54), $35,112.00; conversion costs to Dec. 31, 1953, $306,485.26.

SUCCESSION DUTY—CAPITALIZATION OF PENSION

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac):

Is a pension payable to a widow of a member of the forces under the provisions of the Pension Act capitalized for succession duty purposes?

Mr. McCann: I shall answer this question orally. The answer is yes.

Questions

WHEAT PRICE REDUCTION—CONSULTATION

Mr. Argue:

Was any consultation held between the Canadian wheat board and any farm organization or between any department or official of the government and any farm organization before the price of wheat at Fort William-Port Arthur was reduced by 7 cents per bushel?

Mr. Dickey: No.

WHITEHORSE, YUKON—TYPHOID FEVER

Mr. Simmons:

1. In view of a reported case of typhoid fever at Whitehorse, Yukon, will the Department of National Health and Welfare co-operate with local authorities in taking steps to combat any danger of an epidemic?

2. If so, what action has been and will be taken by the department in this connection?

Mr. Robertson:

1. Yes—the Department of National Health and Welfare is already co-operating with the local authorities and will continue to do so in taking steps to combat any danger of an epidemic.

2. The Indian health services directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare was notified that an Indian from Carmacks, Yukon Territory, had been admitted to the Whitehorse hospital with suspected typhoid fever. Two other suspects were also admitted.

Immediately on receipt of this information, a supply of typhoid and paratyphoid vaccine was sent to our public health nurse in that area and inoculations were started of all the contacts known in the district where the case originated. The army medical corps was asked to co-operate and they promptly arranged for investigational and laboratory work. The one case was confirmed as a positive case of typhoid fever; the other two suspects have not to date been confirmed as having typhoid fever.

Officers of the public health engineering division of the Department of National Health and Welfare are in Edmonton and should further trouble develop, they will be able to proceed to the Yukon.

CHARTERED BANKS—PROFITS, ETC.

Mr. Quelch:

1. What were the profits of the ten chartered banks for each of the years 1950 to 1953 after making appropriation to contingent reserve, and provision for depreciation of bank premises and equipment?

2. What provision was made by these banks for dominion and provincial taxation in each of these years?

3. What was the percentage of profits shown in answer to question (1) to paid up capital in each of the years mentioned?

4. What was the actual rate of dividend paid by these banks for those years?

Mr. Benidickson:

1, 2 and 3. Information requested with respect to the fiscal years 1950, 1951 and 1952 was given in Hansard of March 30, 1953. For the year 1953, with amounts expressed in thousands of dollars, it is as follows:

—	(1) Net profits	(2) Provision for income taxes	(3) Percentage of profits in column (1) to paid-up capital	(3-a) Percentage of profits in column (1) to shareholders equity
Bank of Montreal	7,043	6,650	19·56	7·28
The Bank of Nova Scotia	3,011	2,750	20·08	6·14
The Bank of Toronto	1,303	1,263	21·72	5·84
The Provincial Bank of Canada	426	354	8·52	5·21
The Canadian Bank of Commerce	5,789	5,558	19·30	8·41
The Royal Bank of Canada	8,635	8,952	24·67	8·11
The Dominion Bank	1,394	1,430	19·91	7·16
Banque Canadienne Nationale	1,365	1,220	19·50	8·85
Imperial Bank of Canada	1·402	1·786	20·03	7·17
Barclays Bank (Canada)	18	4	0·60	0·29

Note to column (1)—Net profits after appropriations to contingency reserves, provision for depreciation and for income taxes.

Note to column (2)—Includes provision for foreign income taxes in some cases.

Note to column (3-a)—As the undivided profits and rest accounts of the banks represent undistributed profits and moneys paid in by shareholders, a more accurate picture is given by showing profits as a percentage of the shareholders equity.

4. Rate of dividends on paid-up capital for fiscal years:

Bank	1950 per cent	1951 per cent	1952 per cent	1953 per cent
Montreal	10	12	12½	14
Nova Scotia	16	16	16	18

TRUCK AND EQUIPMENT LOST IN SEATTLE

Mr. McLeod:

1. Was a truck, loaded with military equipment en route from Edmonton to Vancouver, lost in Seattle, Washington?
2. If so, was the vehicle and equipment recovered in good condition?
3. What was the reason for routing this truck through Seattle?

Mr. Blanchette:

1, 2 and 3.

A contract was made with a civilian contractor to carry a shipment of army vehicles from 45 camp ordnance railhead, Wainwright, Alta., to 8 area ordnance depot, Vancouver, B.C. The truck was driven by a civilian driver employed by the civilian contractor. Routing was at the discretion of the civilian contractor and, according to information received, other routes to Vancouver being closed because of bad weather conditions, the driver took the route via Spokane, Washington, to Vancouver.

After stopping for a few days in Seattle, the driver abandoned the loaded truck. The motor vehicles belonging to the Canadian army were delivered in good condition in accordance with the contract.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS LAY-OFFS

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How many men have been laid off by the Canadian National Railways since November 1, 1953?
2. How many men have been laid off by the Canadian National Railways, since October 1, 1953, at Lindsay, Ontario?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. In motive power and car department main shops there have been 1,087 men laid off since November 1, 1953.

2. There are no main shops at Lindsay but there is a roundhouse. Since October 1, 1953, one boilermaker and two car helpers have been laid off.

Questions

CHARTERED BANKS—CONTINGENT RESERVE FUND

Mr. Quelch:

1. What was the total of the transfers made to contingent reserve fund by the ten chartered banks collectively for the period 1945 to 1954?
2. Were any of these transfers considered to be in excess of their reasonable requirements?
3. If so, how much additional taxation were they required to pay?

Mr. Benidickson:

1.

Fiscal years	Transfers to contingency reserves, net
1945	$22,244
1946	—6,902
1947	17,243
1948	15,524
1949	20,993
1950	20,600
1951	27,965

Notes

(a) Amounts are expressed in thousands of dollars.

(b) Before provision for losses on investments, loans and other assets.

(c) After deduction of retransfers to published rest accounts.

(d) No figures are available for the fiscal year 1954.

2 and 3. Information requested with respect to the fiscal year 1945 was given in Hansard of June 28, 1950. There have been no excess transfers to contingency reserves in the years 1946 to 1952 and, subject to final audit, none in the year 1953.

BELGIAN FN RIFLE

Mr. Churchill:

1. Has the Belgian FN rifle been adopted for use by the Canadian army?
2. What NATO countries have adopted the Belgian FN rifle?
3. Will production of the Belgian FN rifle be undertaken in Canada? If so, when?
4. Has the United States made a firm commitment to produce the Belgian FN rifle?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. No.

2. Belgium and the United Kingdom.

3. The Canadian army is purchasing two thousand (2,000) of these rifles to submit them for extensive user trials and if these prove successful it is probable that consideration would be given to adoption of the rifle and the immediate commencement of its production.

4. Not so far as known.

RESEARCH

Mr. Macdonnell:

1. What is the amount spent on research per capita in: (a) Canada; (b) United Kingdom; (c) United States of America; (d) U.S.S.R.?
2. What is the amount spent on research by the national research council in: (a) Ottawa; (b) elsewhere?
3. How much of the research expenditure of the council outside Ottawa is spent on grants for research in: (a) universities; (b) any other agencies?
4. How many applications for grants in aid of research from universities were refused?
5. How much was involved in the refusals?
6. To what extent has the national research council undertaken to act as co-ordinator of research throughout Canada?

[Mr. Blanchette.]

Mr. Dickey:

1. Information not available.

2. Amounts spent on research by the national research council during 1952-53 were:

(a) In Ottawa—$9,368,381

(b) Elsewhere—$2,513,120.

3. Expenditures outside of Ottawa on grants for research during 1952-53 amounted to:

(a) $812,817 in universities (in addition $359,789 was spent on scholarships)

(b) $201,121 in other agencies.

4 and 5. A parliamentary appropriation is available for grants. The allocation is based both on the amount available and on the importance of the work. Grants are, therefore, refused in some cases and requests cut down in others on the basis both of the availability of funds and the potential value of the work. In 1952-53, 455 applications were received for grants approved totalling 393 amounting to $978,678.

6. The council has taken the initiative in organizing associate and special committees to co-ordinate research in specialized fields throughout Canada. During the fiscal year 1952-53 there were about 25 such committees functioning. The council is responsible for the production of such national efforts as the national building code and a large number of Canadian government specifications. The national research council also co-operates with university, provincial and federal government research organizations, and with research groups in industrial concerns.

BRITISH EM2 RIFLE—TESTS

Mr. Churchill:

1. What tests or user trials have been carried out by the Department of National Defence with British EM2 rifle?

2. Have comparative tests been carried out by the Department of National Defence with the British EM2 and the Belgian FN rifles? If so, when?

3. Where, when and under what auspices did comparative trials of the Belgian FN and the British EM2 rifles take place?

4. Were representatives of the Department of National Defence present at these trials?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. The Canadian army participated in technical and user trials held in the United States from February, 1950, to September, 1950. In the winter 1952-1953 the EM2 rifle was tested by the Canadian army at Fort Churchill. The Canadian army also carried out a series of technical tests of the EM2 rifle during the period 1951-53. In addition the Canadian army has received from both the United Kingdom and the United States reports of the result of tests and trials carried out by both countries.

2 and 3. Representatives of the Canadian army participated in, observed and received all the reports of both technical and user tests of both rifles which were held in the United States in 1950 under the sponsorship of the United Kingdom and the United States and which were held in the United Kingdom in 1952 under the sponsorship of the United Kingdom. Representatives of the Canadian army, Canadian Arsenals Limited and the defence research board have been testing and working with both rifles continuously since 1950. Numerous officers and men of the Canadian army and others have repeatedly fired both rifles.

4. (a) During the technical tests and the user trials held in the United States in 1950, two Canadian army officers were present throughout and twelve men participated in the conduct of the trials.

(b) In the trials held in the United Kingdom in 1952 the Canadian army was represented by an officer.

GRAIN CLEANED AT TERMINAL ELEVATORS

Mr. Bryson:

1. What was the gross weight of grain cleaned in the terminal elevators at Vancouver, Port Arthur and Fort William, from August 1, 1952 to July 31, 1953?

2. What was the net weight of cleaned grain and what was the weight of screenings and dockage?

3. How much of the above screenings and dockage had commercial value?

4. What quantities were sold as (a) livestock and poultry feeds; (b) for any other purpose?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Grain is not weighed immediately before being put through the cleaners nor are the screenings removed therefrom weighed. Statistics are therefore not available to answer the above questions as asked.

Attached is a statement showing the gross receipts of grain and dockage assessed for the crop year 1952-53.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY, WINNIPEG TO WEST COAST

Mr. Holowach:

1. Has the government considered the advisability of an early start on the construction of a trans-Canada highway from Winnipeg, via Saskatoon, Edmonton, Edson, Jasper and the Yellowhead route to the west coast?

2. Has the government considered the advisability of calling a conference with the provincial governments of the four western provinces to discuss details of defence highways and other highway problems?

Mr. Bourget:

1. No. The provincial governments concerned designated the route of the trans-Canada highway as passing through Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary and Vancouver.

2. There have been three conferences assembled over the past four years by the federal government to discuss problems relative to the trans-Canada highway. No other conferences are being considered at the present time except as announced by the Minister of Transport on Tuesday, February 23, 1954; Hansard, page 2345.

FEDERAL SECURITY PANEL

Mr. Fulton:

1. Who are the members of the government's security panel?
2. When was the panel set up?
3. How many meetings has it held since it was constituted?
4. How often does it meet?
5. Is there any appeal (a) from a decision of a deputy minister to the security panel; (b) from the decision of the security panel?
6. If so, what are the procedures for such appeals?

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES—SECURITY SCREENING

Mr. Fulton:

1. Since January 1, 1947, how many dominion government employees of all categories have been screened out of their former positions for security reasons in each department, agency, or crown corporation?
2. Of these (a) how many have been dismissed from the department, agency or crown corporation in question; (b) how many have been moved to other less sensitive positions?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Perhaps I could make an oral statement on these two questions. It is not in the public interest to answer these questions. The security panel acts anonymously. It does not pass orders but rather recommendations to the deputy head. In my opinion it is not in the public interest to say why people were dismissed from the service, whether it was on security grounds or otherwise. I hope my hon. friend will be satisfied to drop these two questions.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I tried to frame these questions in such a way that the answers, if given, would be purely factual and the answers would not give a lead to the personnel of the panel or be of aid in tracing the name of a person. I would hope that the minister might reconsider the matter and, in view of the way in which the questions are phrased, might reconsider whether or not it is possible to give an answer.

[Mr. Holowach.]

The first question does not ask for the names of any people dealt with by the panel. It only requests the names of the panel and how often it meets. What is the procedure on appeal from a decision of a security officer or from the panel itself? Again it would seem to me that is the type of factual information that would not reveal any security material that it is proper not to disclose.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not wish to debate the subject. Whether answering the questions would disclose a security matter or not is a matter of opinion. I suppose if only one man has been dismissed from his department, and we say that one man was dismissed for security reasons, it is pretty obvious who the one man is. I see no good purpose to be served. As I understand the rule, the question can be asked and the government can decide whether it is to be answered or not. I think the decision of the government must be that these two questions cannot be answered.

Mr. Fulton: That they will not be answered.

Mr. Coldwell: I think some of these questions might be answered. I suggest it is not in accordance with our democratic way of doing things to have a board sitting and suggesting certain sentences without anyone knowing about them. The loss of a position is a very serious thing in these days.
