
Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister has announced that he intends to send the bill to the standing committee on industrial relations for study. I have examined the bill, and everything suggested in it is an improvement over the old act, which indicates that the department has at least been giving some study to the matter. I consider the question of vocational training to be a very important one. It has much more importance than a lot of people in the provinces attach to it. I have looked at the 1953 figures for immigration, education, employment and job vacancies. Anyone who does so will realize the need for study. I also want to emphasize that we are not living in a time when we can sit back, throw old slogans at people and say that there is a solution in those slogans. We are living in a world that is going through a revolution. We in Canada and on the whole North American continent are living in a time when we may have to start retraining many people who have been in certain industries for a long time.

In my judgment the basic job that we have to do concerns the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act. We have made a start on it but it requires further study and other mechanics must be devised. Without elaborating on this angle too much, I want to point out that the 1953 figures for education show that only 40 per cent of Canadian students got through high school and only 10 per cent of that 40 per cent to university. These are national averages. That means that 90 per cent of the children leaving school in Canada today are in need of further training. That alone indicates that there is a job to be done in this field.

I looked at the immigration figures. We are bringing a lot of people into the country. I think the average is 160,000 a year. Unemployment insurance commission figures show that as of May, 1953, there were 407,000 registered unemployed but alongside that there were 338,000 job vacancies involving the filling of jobs largely in the skilled trades. When you consider that 90 per cent of our children leaving school need further training, and couple with that the immigration figures of the number of unskilled personnel we are taking into the country and the wide open field for skilled tradesmen as indicated by the official figures, it definitely points up the need for the committee to sit down and take a look at the whole problem.

The original act, as suggested in the 1945-1946 report, was a pretty realistic approach to the problem. I have looked at it section by section, and one thing was recognized very definitely. If you look at page 16 of the vocational training report for 1945-46 it will be found that some pertinent observations are made on this subject of prematriculation schools. This is something that has not been followed up in connection with the whole program of vocational training. Then again, if you look at the report for 1948-49 it will be found the minister is correct when he points out that much of the responsibility for taking advantage of the mechanics laid down in the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act rests with the provinces. The fact is that the provinces just have not gone out and made use of this type of training, as they could have.

In discussing this subject hon. members will, of course, express pride in their native provinces; and if a province is doing a reasonably good job it is understandable to hear an hon. member pointing out what his province is doing. But I do suggest to some hon. members I see across the floor of the house, who are pretty well qualified in the field through having had jurisdiction in provincial administrations, that we have to sort out what we mean when we talk about vocational training.

In my judgment vocational high schools do not fit into the picture of vocational training, except in so far as they can give the student the academic education required to enter some trade. A considerable number of vocational high schools have been established across the country; but in my view the vocational high school is a short-cut and an easier way to get money for the purpose of building schools. It presents less difficulty than facing up to the necessity for a trade school that will turn out skilled tradesmen who are able to take a job. In most vocational high schools —and they are found in every section of every province—an automobile will be placed in a classroom for the benefit of the students. By the time they spend a year in the class they may discover that the engine has six cylinders, but they do not have sufficient information to go out and take jobs as motor mechanics.

We must sort out our thinking on the subject and, in most provinces, we will have to retrain adults who may have been in industry for a long time. I think in particular of the textile industry. Mills are being closed and whole communities are faced with total unemployment. Those people cannot be expected to walk out of an industry in which they have been engaged for years and take work in another with which they are not familiar. In many communities in which there are industrial casualties, in this process of free competition, the workers will have to be retrained. That cannot be done with the sort of training offered in the vocational high school.

In my opinion this is the big problem facing us. I might also make reference to the coal industry which, because of technological advances and the introduction of oil and gas, is being scrapped. We cannot run away from this problem, and some retraining will have to be done in the coal industry. Only a few nights ago the president of Dominion Steel and Coal company said that he considered the coal, steel and textile industries in the maritime provinces to be depressed industries. A good deal of retraining may have to be done in the steel industry.

When the committee gets down to business it will have to realize that it is not possible to have equality of opportunity in any phase of our educational program, unless there is some arrangement between the federal and provincial governments whereby equality can be established. It must be kept in mind that all provinces in Canada do not have the same per capita incomes. While British Columbia and Ontario might be able to do an excellent job, there are other provinces who cannot participate in the 50-50 proposal for the setting up of trade schools or, indeed, any other kind of school.

Provincial governments in that position will have to sit down with federal government authorities and work out some arrangement whereby the problem can be met. There is not the same need in every province for retraining and vocational training generally. The problem will be much greater in those provinces least able to handle it, and we are going to have to make special arrangements in this regard.

Looking at the net revenues of the various provinces as revealed in their budgets for 1954, which appeared in the press, one is confronted with the following figures:

Province	Net Revenue
Newfoundland	$30,947,000
Prince Edward Island	7,044,000
Nova Scotia	45,942,000
New Brunswick	45,388,000
Quebec	289,275,000
Ontario	333,486,000
Manitoba	53,119,000
Saskatchewan	85,094,000
Alberta	125,483,000
British Columbia	182,061,000

This difference in provincial incomes proves definitely that there is no possibility of equality in this matter, as between province and province, without some special arrangement being made with the federal government to meet the cost.

Then, in a province such as Ontario we find organizations such as the Atkinson charitable foundation, which assists greatly in the field of education. While I am not going to discuss the figures in detail, the report for 1953 indicates that a large amount of money is being allocated to special educational projects that are of great assistance to both the provincial and the dominion governments.

However, this is not found in some of the other provinces. The Atkinson fund is limited to Ontario. For this reason Ontario is able to do more in the field of education than another province which does not have the support of organizations of this kind.

If anyone looks at the list of responsible organizations across the country that are making a particular study of the subject, he will see listed the Canadian welfare society which, in its last report, makes definite recommendations in the matter of unemployment, retraining, and youth leaving school who require more training. All these are matters our committee should study.

I hope this time we will do a real job in the field of vocational training because, in my opinion, it is basic to the future of our country, and is badly needed.

In the memorandum presented to the government recently by the Canadian Congress of Labour they ask for the calling of a meeting of representatives of provincial governments with a view to establishing some degree of uniformity in the matter of apprenticeship training, vocational training and the like.

When this committee begins its sittings I do not think it should try to do the job in a hurry. When the committee is in session those responsible for handling vocational training in the different provinces across the country should be called before it in order to determine just what are the limitations in the provinces in regard to meeting the commitments under this act, because certainly there is something wrong when a better job is not done.

There is some set-up in Nova Scotia. I went to the trouble of getting in touch with the minister's very efficient officials who handle the matter, and it did not take very much paper to give me the facts on vocational training in Nova Scotia. However, something is established there on which you can build. They have vocational high schools also, but I was not concerned with vocational high schools; I was concerned about the trade training schools.

A lot of confusion exists on this subject. Many people think if they have a number of vocational high schools it is the answer to the problem. Nobody coming out of those vocational high schools can walk down to the unemployment insurance office and say he is a mechanic, a bricklayer or a carpenter. The individual has to get into one of those trade training schools, or he has to get into some industry under the apprenticeship plan and serve his apprenticeship on the job. It is a good type of training, but it is completely within the hands of the employers of this country. It is a different proposition when you come to get boys and girls into industry for the purpose of training on the job. There are a lot of roadblocks to overcome.

In those trade training schools, such as the one in Halifax, a boy or a girl can enrol and be completely trained as an automobile mechanic, a machinist, a carpenter or a bricklayer and he or she can command the wages that are paid in that particular trade. I recall the school that was set up at North Sydney, which is now unfortunately limping along on one foot. I think one course is still given there. Most of the equipment has been shipped away.

Mr. Small: It is next to defunct?

Mr. Gillis: Just about, but during the time it did function it was set up primarily to train service personnel. They did a very good job there in turning out carpenters and bricklayers. Bricklayers have been turned out there. I have questioned some of the men at the steel plant as to whether the graduates of that school were good, bad or indifferent. They told me that they were first-class. They had one in that plant who commanded top wages. They were considered good tradesmen.

The school at Halifax is still functioning. There are classes there. I notice, as an example, that at Halifax several are studying aircraft sheet metal work. Forty-seven were learning that trade; in machine tool operations there were 46; in welding, 40; in aircraft technician work, 36; electricians and construction, 67; machinists, 70; plumbers and pipefitters, none in the class; steamfitters, none.

That centre is at least operating, but from the information I have received I am reasonably sure it is labouring under difficulties. It is the only one that is functioning now. The buildings that were used by the trade school at North Sydney are still there. Most of the equipment is still there. There is a supervisor in Nova Scotia who is looking after the whole thing as best he can. That school should be re-equipped.

The island of Cape Breton is one of the largest industrial centres east of Montreal. Many boys and girls who have gone through school need some special training. As the minister well knows, it is difficult for these boys and girls who come to this part of the country, when they get out of employment, to fit into other occupations. When they get out of employment on some labouring job they are stuck. They cannot take advantage of anything else. They come in to see you, and under those circumstances it is difficult to know what to do about them. There are hundreds drifting around the country today.

I am hoping that we shall not be in any hurry in giving final approval to this bill. I hope we will take a look at the whole vocational problem, that we shall call in representatives from the different provinces who are associated with the administration of this program and find out the difficulties they have to contend with in matching dollars in setting up the type of organization that is necessary to cope with the problem that is developing today.

This is one of the biggest jobs we shall have in the next couple of years. We shall have to see that adequate facilities are provided to take care of this problem of training boys and girls and those who may be displaced in other industries, to fit them for other vocations where they will be able to earn a living.

I would also suggest at this time that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) might have dinner with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris). With things developing as they are in the field of employment in this country, the minister should take a look at this matter of immigration. Our immigration should be on a more selected basis instead of just taking in a certain percentage of unskilled individuals. We have a large number of those now. To say that we are going to take in 185,000 next year, regardless of conditions in the country, is to be unrealistic. That problem dovetails into this whole picture.

I am a member of the committee, and as far as I am concerned I am not going to be in any hurry to get the evidence we need to make the adjustments that are necessary. We should be prepared to sit around that table for a long time and get all the information and advice we can so we may be able to get a working organization in this country, and also to clear our minds on the question of apprenticeship, trade training and vocational high schools, because they are entirely different training.

In the field of actual trade schools we could do what we were doing during the war in bringing boys and girls up to a certain standard in certain subjects that were necessary in order to get them into some particular vocation. Pre-matriculation sections in the regular vocational training school are an absolute necessity. I hope this whole question of education, with particular reference to this problem, will be handled in a different way. I suggest that the provincial governments should sit down and rearrange their prejudices. They should try to do some serious and realistic thinking on this whole question, because you cannot sit on the prejudices of the past and improve the future, and I am afraid that is what is going on in many of the provinces in the whole field of education.

Mr. F. T. Fairey (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at any great length upon this bill. Before I do address myself to this question may I say that I could not agree more with anybody than I do with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) in most of the things he suggested a few moments ago.

With respect to the bill itself, there are just two points which I would like to bring to the attention of the house. One I think will satisfy all. That is the provision which permits representation on the advisory council of all provinces in Canada.

Where we are working in co-operation with the provinces it is time, as the last speaker said, that all should be present at council meetings so we may have their views and the benefit of their advice.

The second important amendment is the one which provides for training programs for the rehabilitation of the physically handicapped. I spoke at some length on this point at the resolution stage, and pointed out that in this and every country there are thousands of young men and women who are physically handicapped, maybe from birth or because of industrial accidents, disease or some other cause. Normal occupations are denied to them, but through retraining they can be made self-supporting and therefore, as I said before, self-respecting. There is a tremendous opportunity to do a great work in this field. It is encouraging to know that the provisions of the act are to be enlarged to make this possible.

That is practically all that is in the bill. The act which it amends provides for many of the things mentioned by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. If I may I should like to comment upon some of his remarks. First, there is provision in this bill—it has been done for years—for the retraining of those whose former occupation is now denied them, and where the necessity has arisen for transfer to new occupations. That has been done and is being done.

I should like to remark upon the suggestion that vocational high schools are not the answer. That is perfectly true. Vocational high schools are supposed to provide young people an opportunity to find themselves, the 90 per cent of our school population who will have to earn their living in the workaday world, who will not go forward to the universities. These people have to be trained vocationally. By the way, may I remark that I would like to know what kind of education is not vocational. Even university education is training for some vocation, although perhaps "vocation" is not dignified enough for university people.

Nevertheless, for the 90 per cent of our young people who do not go through university, who have to go out to work, vocational high schools are intended to provide a background. It is what we sometimes call the finding process, during which young people through proper guidance can determine for themselves the employment into which they should go. When I say "should go" I mean because of their particular aptitudes or because of their particular training.

They are not intended to provide the world with mechanics. No school ever pretends to turn out mechanics. I go further and say that no school can turn out mechanics. I even doubt that that can be done by a trade school. No instructor in a trade school pretends that without the environment of the industry itself a young person can feel fully at home in any trade. That is why under this program we have followed the practice of trying to establish what we call plant schools for training on the job, and why under the present act we have provision for apprentice training. This is done in every province, in different ways it is true because the conditions are different. In every province in Canada there are courses for apprentices. I am sorry if I seem to be usurping the function of the minister, who will reply to this later on. The hon. member for Cape Breton South mentioned a course in coal mining. We tried to do the same thing in British Columbia, but I think he will agree with me that you cannot train a coal miner in a school.

One important contribution the hon. member made was to refer to the difficulty we have always experienced in the matter of equality of opportunity. Due to the inequality of financial resources the richer provinces naturally can provide better facilities than those not so well favoured. That is why the council was established to advise the minister. It is an advisory council. The council has wrestled with this problem for several years, and I think it likely that some concrete suggestions may come forward from it this year so that the participation of the federal government will not be as it was in the past but may in some measure meet the objections which my hon. friend mentioned.

I have already mentioned apprentices. There is a good field there. The council which is to be constituted under this amending bill will, as I have said before, be representative of all the provinces. Therefore we shall be able to get a broader concept of the needs of the country as a whole and each province individually will be able to place its views, and advice before the minister.

I think this is just a step. I agree wholeheartedly with my hon. friend that vocational training is a major and important undertaking in this country. We have only just begun it, and it must be developed. Perhaps I might remind you of what I said at the resolution stage. Once we get the door to federal participation open some of us are ready to give it a little push and open it a little wider.

Mr. Gillis: May I correct the record. The hon. member says you cannot train miners in a school. I agree with him. However, despite their experience in British Columbia there was a good school established underground by the coal mining industry in Nova Scotia. This did an excellent job during the war and should have been continued.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one or two observations on this matter. I feel like the hon. member for Cape Breton South and all those who are of the opinion that not sufficient attention is being given to the value of vocational training schools generally. I am pleased to see that the minister has now introduced a measure which may enable us to highlight the importance and the value of vocational training.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South referred to the fact that people coming to this country require training. Veterans returning from duty overseas, who have been away from their work, will need training if they intend to go into the trades. This country must keep abreast with mechanical progress, and that can be done only through vocational training.

We face the problem that the provinces are continually setting up by legislation joint committees or boards before which young people must appear to obtain what are called competence cards to qualify them for employment as bricklayers, machinists, electricians or carpenters. The people making up these boards which deal with competence cards are often those employed in the particular trade, and they may feel they have a certain vested interest in suppressing competition in that trade, and are apt to create difficulties for people who want to enter the trade. I feel that the creation of a system of vocational training schools would perhaps improve the present procedure under which young people must qualify for employment in various trades.

If, for example, a person graduates from a recognized trade school as an electrician or a carpenter and obtains a diploma from that school which, in effect, declares that he is now a competent carpenter, electrician, bricklayer or barber, that should be sufficient to enable that individual to qualify for a job in that particular trade. He should not again be subjected to scrutiny by a group of superexaminers within that trade who might be interested, as I pointed out, in forestalling competition and therefore might unfairly review a man's competence. To my way of thinking, the establishment of schools where people can be trained is not unlike the establishment of a system of universities. The previous speaker very properly pointed out that 90 per cent of our people do not attend universities. Yet, though I have not the figures with me, I believe we will find that a far greater proportion of money is expended in training the remaining 10 per cent of our population in the professions than is expended in training the 90 per cent in the trades in a form of skilled labour, which I believe, is the very basis of the future of this country.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the minister for introducing this amending bill at the present time, particularly with regard to that section of the bill which makes it possible for veterans to acquire training. Our men who are overseas away from their work, who in their formative years at the age of 19, 20, or 21 went into military service, have not had a proper opportunity to train themselves for the future. When they return four or five years later it is extremely helpful to them if they are able to enter a vocational school, if not a university, where they will become trained, equipped, and able to take their place in society. I consider that is a very helpful amendment to the present act.

Earlier in the session I placed a resolution on the order paper in which I asked the government to consider introducing legislation to allow as an exemption from income tax the fees which are to be paid to vocational training schools. I lay great emphasis on the fact, Mr. Speaker, that helping people to help themselves and making it possible for that 90 per cent of our population to become trained, self-respecting and self-supporting citizens, is one of the greatest duties we can possibly perform. If we shall encounter difficulties with the provinces on the constitutional aspect of this matter I am quite prepared to go along with the hon. member for Cape Breton South in suggesting that perhaps some federal system of vocational training schools should be created. Perhaps some conference can be held at which the federal authorities will be able to work out a method of closer co-operation with the provincial authorities so that the proper emphasis, the emphasis which the subject deserves, can be placed on creating adequate, competent, and satisfactory vocational training schools in Canada.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I was very glad indeed to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Cartier, who has just taken his seat, and generally I am in agreement with what he said. We know, of course, the difficulty we encounter in this country when we talk about federal participation in education, or federal grants to the provinces for the purpose of education. I am not thinking of vocational training as being education in the ordinary sense of the word, but it seems to me that no matter what branch of education we discuss, whether vocational or otherwise, we have to bear in mind that the provinces are not training or educating citizens for the province of Ontario or Saskatchewan or Quebec, but for all of Canada. In the same manner in which transportation crosses the provincial boundary lines, so also does this matter of training and education cross these provincial boundary lines.

In this regard I have in mind particularly the maritimes, from which the hon. member for Cape Breton South comes, and I am thinking of the great contribution to education which has been made by individuals from those particular provinces, those educators who went into the west when we did not have schools and universities to the extent they had them in the east. Perhaps we are catching up or even surpassing them now. Most of these men spent a greater amount of time in these other provinces than in the province where they received their own training. When our boys who were trained in vocational schools went overseas they were not considered as citizens of the province of Saskatchewan or Manitoba or Quebec or Ontario, but as citizens of Canada and they fought and worked under the proud insignia of the maple leaf of Canada.

I am glad there has been a widening in the scope of this act, particularly with regard to clause 2 (e). I know this is not the time to examine the clauses of the bill separately, but I merely wish to emphasize my agreement with the widening of the act in that respect.

Over the past few years, I believe as the result of the war, I have discovered that we have been getting some sympathy from the dominion government in such matters as this when the object is military or perhaps scientific. I have in mind such things as scientific research. The government has been not generous but perhaps ungrudging in its support of the scientific activities of schools and universities when the country is in need of men who are thus trained, and when it is obvious such training must be supported. It is a good deal more difficult to get them to move on the question of academic scholarships; but that, of course, I should not deal with here.

The clause in which there has been a widening of scope, and to which I referred, concerns not military but civilian matters. I inquired of my hon. friend, and I did not have time to receive an answer, whether this improvement was to be applied to the vocational training of nurses. I believe there is a distinct need all across this country and in every province for nurses. There was a time, of course, during the depression when nurses huddled together perhaps in a boarding house, and sometimes three or four of them had to live together. They were lucky if one or two obtained a day's work during the entire week. Like our friend in Molière's "Le médecin malgré lui":

Nous avons changé tout cela maintenant.

But we have changed all that now and it is a good thing. Nurses are at least given a training, and they are receiving decent wages and live under decent conditions. It is now five o'clock and I see Mr. Speaker is slightly uncomfortable in his chair, so perhaps I had better call it five o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

NIAGARA GAS TRANSMISSION LIMITED

The house resumed, from Friday, March 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hunter for the second reading of Bill No. 325, to authorize Niagara Gas Transmission Limited to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipe line.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, when this debate was adjourned on Friday last I had just come to the point of making certain suggestions to bring about the objective which I feel sure the great majority of the members of this house have in mind. That objective is to make it absolutely certain that the passing of this bill and the subsequent actions of those who are sponsoring the bill will not interfere with the construction of the much greater project, namely the natural gas pipe line from Alberta across Canada to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

I had pointed out that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had one suggestion to offer. I think it was a good one, though I doubt whether it meets the need. He suggested that in the standing committee there should be written into the bill an amendment to the effect that it would not come into force until an agreement had been signed between Niagara Gas Transmission Limited and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and that agreement had been filed with and approved by the board of transport commissioners.

My first suggestion is that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited build this pipe line from the centre of the Niagara river to the city of Toronto. They already have a charter which is broad enough to enable them to undertake that work. If they actually build the line and own it, there can then be no doubt that Consumers' Gas Company of Toronto would not be in a position to interfere with the larger project. If the pipe line were built by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited there would then be no need to pass this private bill because Consumers' Gas Company would then not have to build a pipe line. I place that suggestion before the government and before those members who will be on the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, as one way of making dead sure that Consumers' Gas Company cannot interfere with the construction of the Trans-Canada line.

My second suggestion is that the government give consideration to taking power to control the import of natural gas into Canada, just as they now have the power to control its export. As hon. members know, there is in existence a statute known as the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act. It is chapter 93 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, and it provides for effective control by the Department of Trade and Commerce of the export of electrical power or energy and also of petroleum, natural gas, water or other fluid, whether liquid or gaseous, capable of being exported through pipe lines or other like contrivances.

In that statute there is the clear-cut power to control exports. I think this new development is of such a nature that consideration should be given to taking similar power over imports. If that power were in existence there could then be no possibility of Consumers' Gas Company blocking the Trans-Canada project by piping in this gas from the United States.

The Americans have power to control both export and import. I have here their natural gas act. Section 3 reads as follows:

> After six months from the date on which this act takes effect no person shall export any natural gas from the United States to a foreign country or import any natural gas from a foreign country without first having secured an order of the commission authorizing it to do so.

The reference, of course, is to the federal power commission of the United States. The section of the act continues:

> The commission shall issue such order upon application, unless, after opportunity for hearing, it finds that the proposed exportation or importation will not be consistent with the public interest. The commission may by its order grant such application, in whole or in part, with such modification and upon such terms and conditions as the commission may find necessary or appropriate—

Then there is this further power which I would point out to hon. members:

> —and may from time to time, after opportunity for hearing, and for good cause shown, make such supplemental order in the premises as it may find necessary or appropriate.

It is under that last portion of the section that the federal power commission of the United States can shut off the gas which is being exported to Canada if it can be shown that in their own country there are people who need that gas. I therefore suggest that the second way of making sure that the Trans-Canada project is not interfered with by the importation of United States gas would be by amending the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act.

So much for suggestions as to what could be done. I now wish to make a suggestion concerning the manner in which this bill is dealt with in parliament. There is coming from the other place another bill which amends the charter of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. In view of the fact that both these companies are involved in this question, I think it would be wise to have those two bills considered at the same time by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. The members of that committee can see that the various witnesses are called, the two bills can be studied together, and in that way we can go much further in making sure that the smaller project is not going to kill the larger one.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there is one feature I should like to point out to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) because the Pipe Lines Act comes directly under his jurisdiction. This bill now before us is not one asking for incorporation. It is a bill merely giving to a company, which has already been incorporated under the Ontario companies act, power to construct pipe lines. All the other pipe-line bills that have been passed by parliament have been bills granting charters. They have been in complete form, so the members could amend the charter and the Companies Act of the dominion applied.

Here we have not that situation at all. These people went to the registrar of companies in Ontario and merely obtained registration there. Now they come to this parliament and ask for a bill authorizing them to construct a pipe line. The whole intention of parliament in dealing with these pipe lines was that there would have to be a charter granted by a private bill. As I say, that procedure has been followed in every other case. The minister himself made it quite clear that that was his idea as to the procedure under the Pipe Lines Act, when he put through the amendment to the Pipe Lines Act in December last. I am now quoting from page 621 of Hansard. I had asked him a question and he had this to say:

> As I understand this amendment, it is still necessary for extra-provincial or interprovincial pipe lines to seek authority from this parliament by way of a special charter in order to apply to the board of transport commissioners for its location.

That is exactly what has not been done in this case. As a matter of fact this company was incorporated on the 11th of September, 1950, over a year after the Pipe Lines Act had been passed. Therefore the Consumers' Gas people must have known of the requirements of the Pipe Lines Act, but rather than come here to get a charter they formed their company under the Ontario companies act and now they are merely coming here to seek passage of this very short bill which gives them power to go ahead and construct a pipe line. That means that if they can get away with that, anybody else can. It would mean that a company could be formed under the British Columbia companies act and take the power to construct pipe lines, and then it would only need to come to this house and get a skeleton bill passed such as we have before us today.

I am quite sure that such a procedure is against the intent and the spirit of the Pipe Lines Act. I think the minister should inform us whether he approves of a course of this kind being followed rather than having a proper charter approved by the Senate and the House of Commons in the shape of a proper bill.

I have nothing further to add. I place my two suggestions before the house. They may not be a solution. On the other hand, I think either one of them would meet what we all desire, and perhaps the government will see fit to take action along at least one of the lines suggested.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the hon. member a question? From the legal point of view what difference is there in his mind between the method of procedure by way of charter and the method of procedure in this bill?

Mr. Green: If I may answer that, Mr. Speaker, one very important difference is that when some of these other bills came before the committee we amended one of the sections to provide that the pipe line must be built in Canada. That has been done with quite a few of these bills. But it cannot be done under this particular bill, because it does not contain the powers at all. It merely provides that a company which has already obtained its powers from the Ontario legislature can go ahead and build a pipe line. I do not see why there should be that discrimination. If other people have had to come here and get a proper charter, then there is no reason why these people should not do the same thing.

Another feature is that much of the control of Niagara Gas Transmission Limited is under the Ontario companies act whereas if they had a proper charter, as others have, the control would be under the dominion Companies Act. I think that is where it should be.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to speak at any length because I feel that the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill will want to get it through. But there are two or three things which I believe should be on the record, and I should like to indicate the position taken by the group I represent with respect to the bill now before us.

First I want to comment very briefly on something said on Friday last by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). He made what I thought was a justifiable complaint when he said, as recorded at page 2948 of Hansard of March 12:

> I do not consider that a national project is in the best interests of this country if certain sections are going to be injured or thrown into complete economic chaos without consideration being given as to what compensations are going to be made in that area for the acceptance of what is loosely termed a technological advance.

What the hon. member had in his mind was doubtless the failure over the years of governments, the coal industry and others to adjust themselves to what was sure to come in the near future. I think he saw that we have never adopted a well-defined national fuel policy into which we have attempted to integrate the various factors that now affect some parts of the country adversely and some parts the other way. The part of the country my hon. friend represents will doubtless be adversely affected by the building of a trans-Canada pipe line. There is no question about the fact that some part of the coal market that has been enjoyed by Cape Breton and Nova Scotia generally will be taken away when western gas is piped into Ontario and Quebec markets.

It looks to me as though this possibility could have been foreseen years ago and some provision could have been made to compensate those parts of the country which will be adversely affected. I have in mind, for example, that while we were subsidizing the expansion of the steel industry in Canada perhaps more attention could have been paid to establishing such expanded facilities in the province represented by my hon. friend. I do not think we took too seriously the needs of Nova Scotia at the time. I have in mind that when the Trans-Canada pipe line gets under way we are going to need quantities of very large steel pipe of a type that few mills in Canada are prepared to make today. It seems to me that it could have been possible through some compensating policy for the mills of Nova Scotia to be equipped under a government-subsidized program to make this large pipe so we could have not only a Canada first policy with respect to a pipe line but also a Canada first policy with respect to providing the materials with which the pipe line is to be built.

If a subsidy is going to be paid in any way, directly or indirectly, in connection with the building of the trans-Canada pipe line, I certainly would suggest that it be paid to assist our Canadian mills to provide materials so that we may have Canadian materials going into a Canadian pipe line. I would oppose strongly any subsidy by way of taxation reduction or anything else with respect to the supply of pipe or other materials going into the pipe line if they are brought from the United States or any other country. That brings me to this point, that we have consistently followed a Canada first policy that goes beyond the mere provision of an all-Canada pipe line.

I should like to say briefly that I agree with the suggestion the hon. member for Cape Breton South has made. But I also agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) who the other night drew attention to the fact that the coal industry had failed dismally to meet the challenge of the times, in that it had not attempted to process its product so as to make it easily transportable and storable without disastrous loss. They have not done very much to help themselves; I hate to admit that. I believe there has been shortsightedness all round.

In connection with the proposal now before us I should like to place on record the attitude taken by the people in Alberta —and when I refer to the people in Alberta I am speaking about those in official positions who have to make decisions with respect to the export of natural gas from that province. It has already been pointed out that the building of the Niagara Gas Transmission Limited pipe line might seriously affect the success of the Trans-Canada pipe line. The Trans-Canada venture is a tremendous thing, one that staggers the imagination. We are told it will be capable of transporting 540 million cubic feet of gas per day, and that the cost will run to something like $300 million. The effort is perhaps the biggest of its kind in the world's history.

Niagara Gas Transmission Limited, whose application we are now discussing, will transport something like 23 million cubic feet per day, which is puny by comparison. One is inclined to ask himself how a short line of this kind, transporting only 23 million cubic feet a day, could endanger the success of the bigger enterprise. Well, it could; I do not think there is any question about that, particularly if the company that is going to take gas from Niagara Gas Transmission Limited were to take the stand that its franchise is permanent, or that it would continue for more than the period of 20 years for which the agreement is supposed to be made, or were to consider that there would be no restriction on the continuation of the franchise. I should think a situation of that kind might possibly endanger the financing and the success of the Trans-Canada venture.

To our way of thinking, however, the pipe line we are now considering is desirable, in spite of the fact that there may be some dangers involved. Niagara Gas Transmission Limited will bring Louisiana natural gas into the Toronto area two or three years ahead of the arrival of Alberta or other western Canada gas, making it possible for Consumers' Gas Company, the distributing company, to build up a market for natural gas in readiness for the western product when it does arrive. For that reason this bill should be passed through parliament as quickly as possible, so the construction of the line can proceed and perhaps be completed this year. I understand there is a possibility that it can be, if orders for steel can be given soon.

However, we agree with the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) when he says that some form of coming into force clause must be written into the bill before it is passed so as to safeguard the interests and the position of Trans-Canada, the major venture. The clause should spell out the guarantee that the import of gas by Niagara Gas Transmission Limited will be tapered off as soon as western gas is made available, and that the flow will be reversed, if it is found to be desirable and economically and otherwise feasible.

At this moment, however, let me say emphatically that the eastern United States would provide the poorest possible overflow market for western gas; I do not think there is any doubt about that. It simply is stating what must be self-evident to say that the eastern United States is the most highly competitive market possible for our western gas. The middle west is a far more valuable market for Alberta producers than the market in the eastern United States would be. So when we talk about reversing the flow through the Niagara Gas Transmission Limited line I am of the opinion that we would be trying to get into a market so highly competitive we might find ourselves in difficulty. And so I am not at all enthusiastic about the reverse flow idea through this proposed pipe line. I am much more concerned about the provision of middle and far western United States markets for overflow Canadian gas. And I hope that point will be kept in mind, because we simply must take into consideration the economics of this whole enterprise, something which I fear is sometimes forgotten or overlooked.

Economics must be kept in mind because Alberta producers must never find themselves put in a squeeze so that the wellhead price would interfere seriously with exploration and development. We need that development constantly; otherwise we are not going to find the reserves of gas that will be required to keep a transmission line, like the Trans-Canada line, in operation for the years it will be required.

In closing I would say we hope the bill will be passed as quickly as possible, because the season is advancing and the company needs to know whether it can make application for the steel and get into the field in order to complete the building of the pipe line this year.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate. However, as the department with which I am associated is very closely connected with the development of the natural resources of the country I think it is in order for me to state briefly what we think would be an orderly development of the natural gas resources in Canada.

As we all know, the natural resources belong to the provinces. Until Alberta declared it had a surplus of gas for export, this government had no gas to deal with. However, as soon as Alberta declared it had a surplus of gas for export, or that it would have a surplus at an early date, it became the responsibility of the federal government. My department has for years advocated that an orderly pattern of development of natural gas in Canada would involve the development of Peace river gas for the Pacific coast, and central and southern Alberta gas for Alberta; and, if and when there was a surplus, that it should come to eastern Canada.

We are very pleased that this pattern is taking shape now. Alberta has declared a surplus. In my opinion, they have been perhaps a little too conservative up until the present moment with respect to their reserves of gas. As a matter of fact, right now in the production of oil about 25 billion cubic feet of gas is being flared every year. This does not mean all that gas would be available for pipe lines. Some of it would originate in isolated places and it would not be economical to gather it, but a large portion of that gas now going to waste could be used by Canadians. The quantity now being flared in the production of oil just about equals the peak of the Turner valley waste, which Albertans especially and Canadians generally are not very happy to recall.

Several proposals have been before parliament and before the public as to how Alberta's surplus gas should be disposed of. Many rival companies, most of them United States companies, have proposed to take gas to different regions of the United States. Recently at the request of the Alberta government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) assisted in bringing two of the major companies together for the purpose of building a trans-Canada line. The federal policy in respect to export of gas from Alberta was clearly stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this house on March 13, 1953, as reported at page 2929 of Hansard, when he said:

> Therefore the policy of the government of Canada is to refuse permits for moving natural gas by pipe line across an international boundary until such time as we are convinced that there can be no economic use, present or future, for that natural gas, within Canada.

That is still the policy of this government, in spite of what many promoters and others seem to believe. Many of them still think permission will be given to send gas to Minneapolis and the inland empire south of Alberta, as they call the central western states, but the policy is as stated by the minister, and it still stands.

The Trans-Canada Pipe Line company has been incorporated. I believe an amendment to their charter is before the other house at the present time and will be coming here shortly. The amalgamation was brought about for the purpose of piping gas to eastern Canada. The Minister of Trade and Commerce went on to say, and I quote his words:

As I have said, the proposal is to follow this policy, within reason. To date one exception has been made. It was made in response to a request from the director of defence mobilization of the United States that Canada supply a defence production requirement for gas in order to maintain the production of copper at Anaconda's smelter in Montana. The requirement was small.

It was made originally to aid our common defence effort. The other exception was when we gave permission to export gas to the northwestern states through Vancouver. That was necessary in order to assure that British Columbia and the Vancouver area would get gas; otherwise the pipe line through that area would not have been economically possible.

As far as the bill before the house is concerned, I am not sure that it is at all necessary to bring gas in via the Niagara peninsula as the bill proposes. In the western part of Ontario we fortunately have quite a large reserve of natural gas. I am not exactly sure of the reserve, but I think it is in the order of 168 billion cubic feet. We are indeed fortunate that we have that gas storage basin at this end of the line. That gas is available for the early build-up of the market in Ontario.

In conversations we have had with the Ontario government we have been informed that they are quite willing to help facilitate the release of all that gas for the build-up period, but the latest information our department has is that there will not be quite enough gas in reserve in that storage basin in Ontario to meet the peak loads of the build-up period. In other words, they need a comparatively small quantity of gas at times. If they use that gas for the build-up they will need a small additional quantity at times of peak loads that will develop.

It may be that this proposed gas line will serve that purpose. There is, however, an alternate proposal that the additional requirements of gas be brought in via the present international pipe line at Windsor. I do not know which proposal has more merit, but I presume the board of transport commissioners will weigh those factors very carefully, and when this bill goes to the committee and subsequently to the board of transport commissioners for study, we shall have all the facts.

That storage basin in Ontario will be vital. It will be important to the efficient operation of the Trans-Canada line and the operation of the gas line through the periods when there is a high peak of demand; and then probably during the night or hot weather there will be periods when the demand is low. If that storage basin in western Ontario is depleted in the building up of the initial market, in preparation for the flow that will come through the Trans-Canada line when it is built, the cushion will be there to absorb the off-peak loads and that will contribute to the efficient operation of the Trans-Canada line.

I do not know that I should like to say anything more at this time. I believe that the complete output of the Trans-Canada line can be used in central Canada, and I believe it will be needed there. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) mentioned that the building of this pipe line will probably interfere with the markets for coal from the maritimes. In my department I am between two fires, between coal and gas. I try to assess the merits of each and see how they both fit into the national energy picture.

There is a need now, and I believe there will be a continuing need, for coal in our energy picture in Canada. But I do know, and I think we all realize, that there will have to be adjustments. The coal industry is facing a crisis now. It seems that they have been in a crisis ever since I took over the responsibility of the coal board two years ago, and I cannot see anything but continuing —I was going to say "trouble", but at least continuing concern about the future of the industry for some years to come.

Maritime coal has never been a very big factor in the Ontario market. I believe it enjoys quite a large share of the Montreal and Quebec markets. If and when gas reaches Montreal it will probably mean that some of the maritime coal will be replaced. However, this country is not standing still. The population of the province of Ontario is increasing at the rate of 270,000 people a year, which is the population of a good-sized city. I think the gas will compete more with electricity and oil than it will with coal.

With our expanding economy we are going to need all forms of energy that may be available. During the adjustment period the coal industry is going to have to change its methods. There will have to be more research done by the industry as well as by governments. But I do believe that within a few years after natural gas reaches this market and the coal industry has had a chance to readjust itself to changing conditions there will be a place for both.

Probably I am getting a little away from the bill before us, and I do not think I shall digress any further. I wish to restate what I said before, that I think perhaps this proposed pipe line will fit into the picture. I am not sure that it will be absolutely essential, but I see no harm in passing it on to a committee and to the board of transport commissioners for study.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the views of this group have been expressed already by those who spoke on our behalf when the bill was before the house on previous occasions, so I shall not take more than a few minutes now. As a matter of fact it is because of the reservations already indicated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that we see no objections to this bill going to the committee for study.

I found it most interesting to listen to those reservations made by the minister when he spoke on March 9. I think he made one or two very important and significant points. As others have pointed out during the course of this debate, he more or less indicated that he would not be prepared to let the bill go through its final stage unless an amendment was made to it in committee. The amendment the minister felt to be necessary would add a clause to provide that the bill would not come into force until a mutually satisfactory agreement between Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and Consumers' Gas Company had been deposited with the board of transport commissioners.

I think that is a good idea. I suggest that when the committee is considering such a coming into force clause it should go a step further than was suggested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In my view the minister got down to the nub of this matter when he said, as reported at page 2818 of Hansard for March 9:

> Obviously, bringing gas in from Buffalo through a pipe line involves considerable investment,—

I ask that these words of the minister be noted.

> —and one wonders what is to become of that investment if the line goes out of use in a matter of three years.

Indeed that is a question that concerns a good many of us. If it is to be understood that gas is to be brought in from the United States through this pipe line only until such time as gas is available to the Toronto area from western Canada, then the question arises as to the economics of the building of an expensive pipe line to be used for a very short period. The minister went on to say:

> I believe ways can be worked out so that investment can be assumed by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited; and I believe we should know, before this bill becomes law, that such an arrangement is being worked out to the mutual satisfaction of the Consumers' Gas Company and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

The minister repeated his reference to a mutually satisfactory arrangement between those two entities, Consumers' Gas Company and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, but I suggest that in a matter like this there is a third party whose interests should also be satisfied in any such agreement. I refer to the people of Canada, perhaps in this instance more particularly the consumers at the receiving end. It may be all right for these two companies, so far as they are concerned, to work out a mutually satisfactory arrangement whereby the one buys out the other at an exorbitant price which is made the basis for extra cost to the consumer. That is a matter we should be concerned about. In my view that point, along with the others which have been discussed while we have had the second reading of the bill before us, should be considered carefully by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

I am glad to note the reservations which were made just a few moments ago by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) when he spoke with respect to this bill. It is because of those reservations, and because of the assurance we have been given that this bill will be studied very carefully in committee that we see no reason to object to it being given second reading at this time.

However, and with this I close, I stress the point that the interests to be protected are not just the interests of the two companies referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The interests to be protected include those of the people of Canada as a whole, particularly the interests of the consumers who will be using this gas, or the gas that will come later from western Canada.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, following up the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in regard to the interests involved, he touched on one which should really be given the most consideration; that is, the consumer. It is about the consumer that I intend to make a few remarks, particularly the consumer in the Toronto area which they seem to value so highly. The hon. member pointed out the fact that assurances have been given by the minister in charge of the bill that necessary guarantees will be forthcoming to protect the trans-Canada line.

The power situation, not only in Ontario but throughout the country generally, is very serious. By bringing gas from Alberta we are using one way of solving the problem of providing extra power. The economic problem will solve itself through increased demands and potential future markets. When electrical power was first made available to Ontario there was so much of it they did not know what to do with it. They were concerned with having it consumed. Then over a period of probably 50 years the situation changed and today we cannot get enough power to meet the demands.

The picture of gas being transported from the west is something that taxes the imagination again. I visualize the future of this country being such that we will be able to take all the gas that comes from Alberta and probably all we can get from the United States. But in the meantime it is essential that we have gas which is available at our door from the Louisiana source. This is where the consumers come into the picture, since they will get gas much cheaper because it has a higher heating content. I think the province of Ontario is vitally interested in having this source of supply at its door and it should be made available for use as soon as they can get it, which will be in perhaps one year's time.

There is only one means by which it can be used, through the Consumers' Gas Company. They have the facilities by which they can dispose of this gas, and they have storage for it in southwestern Ontario. I do not think there need be any worry about the future of Alberta gas. Once that line is put through to supply our markets—and according to those who have spoken on this bill that supply is expanding every day—there will be so much of it that we will have a problem in taking care of it. In fact much of it is going into the air and being entirely wasted, and the sooner we put it to some use the better. In the meantime, while building this line to bring Canadian gas here we should have the use of this other gas for the purposes suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The sooner Consumers' Gas can get it, then the sooner the market can be provided, for in all probability it will overcome the power shortage at present existing in Ontario, and assist the other eastern provinces in obtaining much-needed industrial power.

I mention this because I recall what took place earlier in the development of electrical power in Ontario, and I can see the very same development for natural gas in this country. Having seen what happened before we should take care it does not happen again. Once the line is built there will be no end to the demand. I believe they will probably be able to supply the western states as well, and even supply the northern part of Canada which has not yet been brought into the picture. The gas can probably reach as far as the maritime provinces even if they have to move it through the eastern part of the United States.

If you consider the development of this project over the next half century then perhaps you can visualize that project reaching the point where we can take gas from coal in the ground. If you wish to give full rein to your imagination there are many developments which can be visualized in relation to this project for the future. But at the present time the essential need is to get that gas to Consumers' Gas Company and thence to the consumers who want to use it. You need not worry about the integrity of the Consumers' Gas or whether they will observe their covenant. We are dealing with a reputable organization and we can accept their guarantees; and once the Minister of Trade and Commerce is satisfied, the company's conduct will be governed in the best interests of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Holowach: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to direct one question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham). How does the minister reconcile the policy as to the export of natural gas out of this country as enunciated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) last March with recent statements that he approves and is in agreement with the "amalgamation principle" of the two pipe lines outlined by the government of Alberta? I ask that question because one of the companies concerned in this amalgamation has had the intention of securing markets in the middle states in order to ensure the pipe line in Canada being economically feasible.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will, of course, realize that the minister cannot answer that question now, and the matter may be dealt with in committee. The bill, once it is reported by the standing committee, will be considered in committee of the whole, at which time the hon. member may ask his question. In any event the hon. member's question is now in Hansard, and I imagine that at some future time there will be an opportunity for the minister to reply.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: There are several bills on the order paper on which it is intended to move second reading at this time. Is it agreed that Bills Nos. 355 to 372 inclusive, being divorce bills, be considered in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 355, for the relief of Marie Jeannette Lucille Catherine Clement Cantin.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 356, for the relief of Pauline Prussick Astrof.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 357, for the relief of Martha Betty Schenck Clarke.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 358, for the relief of Felice D'Abate.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 359, for the relief of Olga Korim Falardeau.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 360, for the relief of Harold Robertson Mann.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 361, for the relief of Sophie Rosenberg Rosenberg.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 364, for the relief of Roger Tremblay.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 365, for the relief of Adelaide Nina Hall Lanktree.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 366, for the relief of Fernande Gilberte Andrea Leclair Daoust.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 369, for the relief of Maria Assunta Pilozzi Raspa.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 370, for the relief of Robert James Cooper.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 371, for the relief of Diana Frances Nash Milmine.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 372, for the relief of Ross Willis Garrow.—Mr. Hunter.

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING CO-ORDINATION ACT

AUTHORITY TO ENTER INTO AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES, CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gregg for the second reading of Bill No. 326, to amend the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I had said that I supported this bill with a good deal of pleasure. It will involve some expenditure on the part of the nation and some on the part of the individual provinces. They are, however, expenditures that I think will be well justified. They are really an investment in the future of the nation, and also in the future of the individual for whose benefit the bill is introduced.

I think we derive the greatest satisfaction in life from the things we can do well. As I envisage this bill it will result in training people to do things well, and will turn into skilled workers much of the unskilled human material that goes to the vocational or trade schools which this bill should help to support. We are told that Canada is becoming more and more an industrial nation, and this fact is well known. But if we are to improve our position—nay, if we are to retain it—in the competitive industrial world, we shall have to have skilled workers who can produce and run the machines which can take the drudgery out of human labour. I think Britain is one nation to which we can look as an example of a country that realizes the importance of such schools in the training of its labour force. Britain is a country whose very life depends upon its export goods which are produced by its own skilled labour. Hence I say that we have great need for an expansion of our vocational training and for the creation of more and more trade schools.

Through the courtesy of one of the hon. members I was speaking the other day to a group of high school students. As I have spoken to other high school students on other occasions, I was talking to them about what they might do later in life. If you take a poll of the average high school, in its upper grades, you will find that the students have great ambitions, and that is as it should be. You will find that 90 per cent of them will tell you that they wish some day to go on to what they call the higher professions. But statistics prove that they do not eventually reach those higher professions. The Minister of Labour would know more about this matter than I do, but I imagine the figure for those who do is about 10 per cent.

A great many of those students will graduate into equally honourable and useful work. Many of them will become nurses or stenographers or skilled workers of various kinds. They will be working in industry. They can be fitted for that work by the improvements in vocational training that are envisaged in this particular bill. Therefore it has my wholehearted support. Many of the high school or public school students are just not fitted for higher academic learning. Some of them have no particular taste for it. Again there are many who, through force of circumstances, are obliged to go to work early in order that they may assist with the bringing up of the other children by a contribution to the weekly wage. Then again there are many of those who find satisfaction in some creative work with their hands, and I say all honour to them.

For the reasons I have stated, I think this bill is a good idea indeed and will be well worth the money expended under it. Of course a pessimist might say that owing to the vast technological advancement we already have experienced, and owing to our reliance upon machines to produce our goods, more and more people will be unemployed. But even if I knew that not all those people would be employed, at least in the immediate future, I would still advocate their training particularly for the personal satisfaction that it brings to them to be capable people, to know that they have a stake in the nation and in society, and that they are contributing to its good as well as to their own.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, we in this group agree that this is a good bill. However, as with so many things, we find that it does not go quite as far as we would wish it to go. I am happy to see that the government is going to set up a committee to study the bill further, because I feel quite sure that it can stand some additional study. I think we are extremely fortunate in this parliament to have among the members one who has spent so much time as a prominent educator—I speak of the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Fairey)—who has contributed such valuable information at this stage of the bill and who possibly will have more to say on it at another time.

In his explanation of the bill I found the address of the Minister of Labour extremely illuminating. I was particularly pleased to note that provision was made for the rehabilitation and training of disabled civilians. The continuation of training, wherever and whenever an extension is possible, should certainly not be frowned upon but rather should be greatly encouraged. I believe that the service clubs who have helped in any way to assist these poor unfortunates should be congratulated for their efforts.

In a subsequent explanation of the bill the Minister of Labour explained to us the reason for raising the number on the advisory council from 16 to 20 members. I would say this is a good move at this time. The bill, if anything, has suffered from the fact that we have had trade, labour and industry represented, and then they have had to go to the provincial governments and ask for financial assistance. This is rather like putting the cart before the horse. Sometimes it has been a little bit difficult to get the help that should have been forthcoming.

We found today that the hon. member for Cape Breton South had added substantially to the debate on the bill. I noted one remark he made respecting the provinces and the fact that they would not be capable of participating on a 50-50 basis in equalizing the cost factor as between them and the federal authorities. I think he was specifically pointing his finger at the province of which I am a representative.

I should like to draw his attention to one of the factors that I think is important in British Columbia. While we may have a higher per capita revenue than any other province in the dominion, we also have a higher per capita expenditure for social services than any other province in the dominion. Just by way of comparison I might say that 6·3 per cent of our population is made up of persons over 70 years of age as compared with 3·7 per cent in New Brunswick. The fact that we happen to give a cost of living bonus of $15 per month to those same aged people naturally adds to our cost of social services. Those dollars are therefore not available for purposes of education, much as we would desire to give them.

I also feel that we do not contribute enough in proportion to the cost of university education. However, we must remember in this regard that universities play a different part from that of vocational training in the world of education. Upon our university educators will depend what place Canada will occupy among the nations in the future. The matter of research is very important, and while the comparison is not odious at the same time I do not think it is entirely warranted to say that we should spend as much in proportion on vocational guidance as we do upon university education.

The bill has other shortcomings. First there is the question of educational qualifications. The minister dealt with that in part when he suggested that the provincial governments have the authority to accept those pupils who do not have the necessary educational standing. I am quite willing to agree with that. However, I believe that in the final analysis the provincial authorities in making their choice of trainees will naturally select those who are more capable, those who have reached the secondary level of education as is required by the bill. If there is any room left they will probably then give consideration to those who have only obtained grade 4, 5 or 6 standing, or whatever it may be.

I am not suggesting that there is a large group of people in Canada whose educational standing is only of grade 6 level. However, throughout this large dominion there are probably several hundreds or thousands who for various reasons, possibly because they were living in rural areas where no institution of learning was available, did not have the opportunity to acquire the educational standing required by the bill in order to qualify them for vocational training. Many of our unemployed today fall into this category and are ineligible. Therefore I suggest the bill should be modified in such a way as to permit all those who aspire and who indicate an aptitude for training to become eligible. For example, if a young lady has learned the art of the seamstress at home and indicates to the authorities in charge of the educational scheme that she has a certain aptitude, she should be made eligible for such a course. Similarly this is true in the case of machinists and others. I would not decrease the educational standards, but rather would suggest increasing the scope for admittance to vocational training courses.

I would say that the second factor requiring serious consideration is cost. The cost of education today is possibly the greatest headache of municipal districts. I do not believe there is a municipality in Canada where the school board and municipal authorities are not at loggerheads over the price that must be paid for education. I realize that under the vocational training scheme the federal government is willing to pay its 50 per cent. I believe one hon. member indicated earlier that he felt, and I do too, that we are concerned with adult education in this case, and that the classroom education of these people should have been taken care of at the primary level. However, that is not available today; therefore vocational institutions are placed in such a position that adult education is not on a comparable basis with secondary or primary education, and probably should receive more assistance from the federal government.

I am quite aware that the federal authorities say that education is a provincial job. No doubt the provinces are jealous of their rights and want to look after their educational problems. However, the municipalities are very much in need of assistance, and since their only source of revenue is the direct taxation dollar they should be given more consideration. That might be given some thought.

I was interested in studying the report of the first national conference on apprenticeship in trades and industries, held at Ottawa on May 19, 20 and 21, 1952. The report deals in part with penitentiaries, and the interesting feature so far as I am concerned has to do with a suggestion made by an hon. member yesterday that possibly we would not have quite so much crime or so many criminals if we had more vocational training. In studying the report I found the following of interest. The total male population of the penitentiaries of Canada at that time was approximately 4,500. Those under 30 years of age numbered about 3,000 and those under 21 about 500. The report stated that 98 per cent of those people would be leaving these institutions as free men and returning to society.

I know the penitentiaries have a vocational training scheme. Apparently it is an excellent one, because the results would indicate that they are paying attention to vocational training. The penitentiaries have within them nothing but the worst criminals in the country, and this is what we find. Of 465 discharged, who had received vocational training, 86 per cent have not become repeaters in crime. That is a very notable factor. Apparently the reason they have not become repeaters is that they have taken vocational training courses. On the other hand, in the case of those individuals who did not take vocational training courses we find that only 40 per cent have not committed further crimes.

I would say it is better to stop a potential criminal by training him in a vocation than to imprison him following an offence. Eliminate the cause of his going to prison.

I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) would be very happy if he found that the number of criminals had decreased because we decided to spend more money and make vocational training courses so interesting that more people would take them. These young criminals have indicated that they have the ability to think, the ability to plan and the ability to observe. In my opinion these three fundamentals are most important in teaching an individual art, and I believe the minister will agree that those factors are certainly present in the minds of these individuals. They should be encouraged along the right line of thinking. Make them eligible for jobs, and thus do away with the problem of criminal repeaters. It might be that a certain course would not be available at a particular institution, and it might be necessary to transfer a prisoner from one institution to another so he could take the course he wished. However, remember that education is cheaper than incarceration.

Another factor is the apprenticeship system. The industries taking part in this program are to be commended. I know that a good number of them have spent several thousands of dollars, and they are certainly doing an excellent job. The federal government, with the co-operation of the provincial governments and the industries themselves, has an excellent opportunity to bring about far-reaching results. I would say that we should have a rigorous apprenticeship system which would remove some of the unskilled labour from the ranks of the unemployed. I am in agreement with the hon. member for Cape Breton South that when in previous times the unemployed population stood at approximately 400,000, there were jobs available for about 370,000.

The apprenticeship system will re-establish the higher quality of workmanship. We often hear it said that we are losing our markets. Perhaps one of the reasons is that our products are deficient in quality. That may be possible, and is something that should be investigated. The apprenticeship system will result in a reduction in crime and immorality among our youth, and stop overcrowding in our penal institutions. I have already dealt with this matter to some extent.

Can it be that we have reached that point in our industrial revolution where the apprenticeship system is a necessary part of our guilds and unions system? I believe the industrial revolution we have today is probably as great as the one we had some centuries ago. Any apprenticeship system that is advocated must of necessity become an integral part of our method of solving our problems in industry. Certainly the matter of guilds and unions should be investigated by provincial departments of education and by our federal government.

Perhaps hon. members would be interested in some of the factors set out in the book to which I referred earlier in these remarks. I shall not enumerate all of them, because the information is available to hon. members who are interested. However, there are two or three which I believe might be drawn to our attention. The first of these is a shortage of learners. There is a definite shortage of apprentices, as prescribed under provincial apprenticeship legislation, in those industries requiring skilled help, to which I referred earlier in my address.

There are three main reasons for the shortage of apprentices. First, there is a lack of interest on the part of employers, many of whom feel it is not their duty to try to find jobs for unskilled labour. They are not a bit interested in training people to work in their factories. I believe employers should be taught to revise their ideas, so they would become a valuable part of our apprenticeship system.

The second reason for the shortage is the fear by the unions of a condition of overcrowding. This is very common today, and I would offer as examples bricklayers and stonemasons, who are working only at half speed. A bricklayer will not lay more than a certain number of bricks each day, not because he is incapable of doing more but because he believes that if he did he would work himself out of a job and would have nothing to do next day. The apprenticeship system, they believe, would crowd them out of their trade. That is, in my opinion, one of the reasons for a shortage of skilled labour.

The third reason is the lack of information with respect to opportunities and benefits flowing from the apprenticeship system.

There are three suggested remedies, the first of which is continued support by provincial and federal governments of the apprenticeship idea. This would require the support of institutions of learning. Then, second, organized labour must be encouraged to consider the apprenticeship problem with a view to bringing about the best results from the use of our manpower. Third, we must induce employers to expand their training programs, so they will attract the most efficient help and turn out the best possible product at a given price.

I would suggest to employers' organizations and to groups of employees that they set aside a fund to promote an apprenticeship system. So far as the employer is concerned, one of the most irreconcilable situations is that in which, after spending a certain amount of money to educate an apprentice, he finds that employee moving to another industry. The employee is a loss, so far as the employer is concerned; and I suggest the employer should have some protection.

In my view the apprenticeship age should begin in each province at the age at which compulsory education is completed, and there should be no maximum age limit. The purpose behind this would be to make eligible that group of individuals who, under the act as it now reads, are not eligible. Wage rates, of course, present a problem as between apprentices and skilled labour. These have to be solved through agreement between unions and management, and it should be possible to arrive at some satisfactory formula.

A decision must be made concerning a standard definition for a qualified apprentice, so that on this score there would be no difficulty between skilled labour and apprentices. There was some argument earlier about the type of vocational training taught in schools today. I would say that training must be supplemented by work in industry. One final factor is that the responsibility for this program must rest with the federal, provincial and municipal governments, as well as with management and labour.

In conclusion I recommend that the following suggestions be given consideration. First, there should be federal financial assistance in education, at the municipal level. Second, the vocational training course should be made more effective by making it available at a grade lower than the level of secondary education. Third, in specific industries we must begin to make the apprenticeship system compulsory, by statute. This, I believe, would help relieve our unemployment situation, if we still have it with us. And, fourth, there should be a strenuous program of public education through all national outlets such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the national film board, with a view to teaching the people to make proper use of their leisure time through courses in vocational training.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Labour introduced the resolution preceding the bill hon. members must have noted that the opening words of that resolution were as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act to meet present-day requirements for defence—

—and so on. Then he went on to deal with other purposes. It is quite obvious that in the minister's opinion the present-day requirements of defence were the primary reason for introducing the amendments set out in this bill.

I have been surprised that during the discussion that has taken place the minister has not explained to the house how this bill is to be applied to modern requirements in so far as defence is concerned. We have heard a great deal about the advantages which will accrue to the ordinary civilian population, and the extent to which the increase in opportunities for vocational training foreshadowed in this bill will help them. We have also heard how vocational training will help the veterans, the men who may now be coming back from Korea or who may be taking their discharges from the armed services. But as yet we have not heard how this bill is to be applied at the present time for the purposes of defence.

I wish to make just a few observations regarding that aspect of the bill, to ask the minister to fill in the gap when he replies and tell the house definitely how the amendments he is now proposing in this bill will further the purpose of defence. Of course you may say lightheartedly that you can never have too many tradesmen in the armed services. No doubt everybody will admit that; and you can point out the tremendous increase in the number of trades in the fighting services and the need that exists for skilled men, artisans, artificers and so forth in the navy, the army and the air force. Perhaps you might claim that it is impossible to train too many tradesmen. At the same time we do have to avoid the danger of duplication in the training of tradesmen for the armed services, because the public are now being asked to pay for the training of these people who will be taking advantage of the vocational training opportunities which are to be set up.

When world war II started of course there was a very great shortage of tradesmen in all three services. As soon as the original formations could be trained they were sent overseas, and the majority of the tradesmen then in the services went overseas with those early formations. Consequently there was the necessity for building up some form of tradesman training here at home.

The hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Fairey) explained a few days ago the growth of vocational training during the war and the assistance which was given to the armed services in all provinces by those vocational training schools. Those were days of great expansion of all the armed services, and at that time there was a great shortage of tradesmen. That shortage remained until almost the end of the war.

From my own personal experience I can speak of the excellent work done at the dominion-provincial vocational training school at Nanaimo, where hundreds of servicemen were sent while they were still in the services and trained so they could fill a tradesman's position in the navy, army or air force. Exactly the same thing applied to the technical training school in Vancouver. I speak from personal experience, and I know that these vocational training schools all across the country were doing very useful work.

But I do suggest that the situation at the moment is different. We are not in the days of great expansion of any of our services. We have been working for an increase in the strength of our three fighting forces on the three or four-year program which was announced by the government in 1949-50, and all three services are now within striking distance of the manpower objective that was set at that time. An extremely creditable effort has been made; the response of the young men of Canada is most praiseworthy in that they have come forward in such great numbers, and what seemed to be quite an ambitious objective in 1950 has now been practically reached.

As far as one can see at the present time—while I would certainly not be advocating any reduction in the armed services—there is no likelihood in the foreseeable future of any further expansion. In fact we hope we have now built up our forces so they will be able to resist aggression no matter where it breaks out, if it should break out, and we hope they are strong enough now to deter any aggressor. Therefore the policy, as far as one can see, will be to maintain the active forces that we have in the navy, army and air force at somewhere about their present strength.

In all three services a very well thought out scheme of tradesman training has been built up at the various corps schools in the army and the various training establishments of the air force. As far as the navy is concerned there are big training establishments for the ratings, men who are enlisted in the navy, both on the east and the west coasts. And the cruisers that we now have are literally classrooms afloat, where sailors of all different ranks are taking classes in tradesman work in order that they may fill the many positions which are open to them. In addition there are means of enlisting apprentice soldiers, young men who are still in their teens, and training them for the technical branches of these services, in other words giving them a very complete vocational training in the services today.

Are we going to duplicate that? Is there a fixed plan under which the services are going to co-operate in the scheme which is envisaged by the amendments we are now considering? Are the personnel of the active forces, the navy, the army and the air force, going to have the opportunity of taking classes in addition to the facilities offered in the services themselves, or is this to be merely a general scheme we are going to use to build up a large reserve of trained tradesmen, or a large reserve of tradesmen who, if there is a general mobilization, would then be available? Is there to be any particular application of this bill to the services, or is there just wishful thinking that there will be a larger number of tradesmen available for the services should another occasion arise? Will facilities be available not only for the personnel of the active forces but for the personnel of the reserve army, the auxiliary air squadrons, the naval reserve and so forth? Just where will this fit in?

If we are going to send service personnel, both active and reserve, to these schools, what financial arrangements will be made? Will active personnel receive the pay of their rank while attending these schools? Will the Department of National Defence pay all the educational expenses in connection with the attendance of service personnel, either active or reserve, at these schools? Then we are faced with the difficulty of perhaps having service personnel attending one of these schools and drawing service pay while working alongside some lad who wishes to go into industry but who is not receiving any pay from the government, or who perhaps has to pay some tuition in order to be there. No doubt these are administrative problems to which the minister has given consideration, but the house has not been informed what is to happen. I hope the minister will inform us regarding these things.

Will there be opportunities for on-the-job training, improver training? I realize that this is a form of apprentice training, but it is a step further than that. This concerns a man who has perhaps finished his apprentice training, who knows something about the work he is to do, but who wishes to improve himself. I am not going to detain the house any longer, but I hope the minister will tell us how the services are going to be fitted into the improvements which this bill is trying to bring about.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, there are some things which I find it difficult to understand. The minister has moved that this bill be sent to a committee of which the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and many other intelligent hon. members are members. I am just wondering if the next speaker can give a good reason why we should continue this debate. Let this committee pull this bill to pieces, put it back together again, and send it back in a form that will be intelligible to us, and then let us settle the matter here.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I do not plan to spend any time trying to justify a member speaking in support of this motion. Having heard from representatives of a number of urban ridings, I feel that I should be permitted to make some comments without any hon. member suggesting that we cut off the discussion at this time.

Hon. members in all sections of the house have expressed their appreciation of this legislation, and I want to endorse the opinion which has been expressed that the position of ex-service personnel should have continued consideration. Many of the men who joined the services in the period 1939 to 1945 had the misfortune to go through school when there were not as many advantages as there are now. Many of those boys had a pretty rough time during the thirties, and I think they should be able to take advantage of the facilities which have been provided during the past ten or twelve years if they so desire.

Reference has been made to training for the purpose of rehabilitating disabled persons and fitting them for gainful employment. I suppose it may be argued that it is the responsibility of the municipality or the province to provide employment for the disabled, but when polio strikes the country it does not select any particular municipality or province, and victims in all parts of the country are often handicapped for life. Those of us who have enjoyed good health find it most difficult to place ourselves in the position of one who must spend his life in a wheel chair. I think it is quite obvious that it is in the nation's interest that those who are disabled should be given the opportunity to make a useful contribution to society. I feel that the federal government would be only fulfilling its duty in co-operating with the provinces and the municipalities with a view to establishing training projects for the purpose of rehabilitating disabled persons.

I know of one little girl who had the misfortune of being run over by a freight train on her way to school in Yorkton some years ago. She lost both feet, one hand and the fingers of the other hand. Partly as a result of assistance from the Canadian National Railways she was able to complete her public and high school work and became a school teacher. She did an outstanding job in the classroom. I have often felt that having mastered her great misfortune this woman could make an outstanding contribution in helping to train disabled persons. I feel sure that with the co-operation of the minister the program for the future will be improved a good deal.

Reference has been made to training projects to increase the skill or efficiency of persons engaged in agriculture, forestry, mining, fishing, the primary industries in Canada, and in home-making. This brings me to my main reason for rising to speak. I live in a rural community near a town with a population of about 600 at the last census. Under the legislation passed in 1942 the local authorities in co-operation with the province and the federal government provided technical education. For the first time in the history of that rural community boys were permitted to work in the shops. They received expert training in woodworking and shopwork, and it has given the boys a new interest in education. This town of 600 has a school attendance of nearly 300. A dormitory has been built where some 80 boys and girls are able to live while away from home. Three buses bring students to the school every morning and take them home at night. Certainly I believe it increases the effectiveness of the nation as a whole when you have available in rural communities the kind of services I have been describing, and which exist at Sturgis where I live. I am sure if more rural communities could have the assistance of the local, provincial and federal authorities in participating in projects of this kind there would be a much keener interest in providing greater security for all our people.

I am not overlooking the reference to home-making. In this connection it may be argued that the task of providing girls with training in home-making should be left to mothers, but each year in our school we have an achievement day when the teachers demonstrate what has been accomplished in the school, and when the young lads demonstrate the type of work they have been doing. The girls taking home economics show what can be produced in the kitchen and in the dressmaking shops, and rather than resent the fact that training is given in home-making the parents appreciate that in the middle of this century our young people in rural communities are given access to facilities which have been taken for granted for so many years in the large cities.

Representing a rural community as I do I am very glad that this legislation was passed in 1942, and that the minister is piloting this bill through the house so that we may have a continuation and extension of this outstanding work.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have examined this bill and certainly I cannot see anything in it to which one could take objection. Indeed there are quite a number of features which are quite commendable. I am certain the minister and his department are to be commended on the insertion of a provision which will provide training and rehabilitation of the disabled. That is a measure to which we have been looking forward for a long time. While on this question of the rehabilitation of the disabled I would like to suggest to the minister that some consideration be given to the older people, such as old age pensioners and those receiving old age assistance. There are thousands of older people who have many years of usefulness ahead of them and who are finding life very boring.

The administrators of the various hospitals under the Department of Veterans Affairs carry out a considerable amount of adult education among the older veterans by training in craft work and in developing hobbies. Many of them are able to eke out a little additional money through the medium of the things they make in these hospitals. I have often wondered whether through some department of the federal government, possibly in co-operation with the provinces or local authorities, some means could not be found whereby some of these older people could be induced to participate in craft work, and some provisions could also be made for the disposal of the things they might thereby produce in such a way that these old people would be able to obtain some remuneration for their work.

In this connection we must realize that within a few years probably one-third of our population will have to support the remaining two-thirds, the younger people at one end of the scale and people over 50 or 55 years of age at the other. If industry continues the present practice of letting employees out at the age of 50, 55 or even 60, we are going to have a great many people in that age group quite capable of working but without any opportunity to do so.

I believe England has tackled that problem through what is known as sheltered workshops, where older people are given an opportunity to work during hours which are suitable to them, and where they are encouraged and assisted to undertake craft work through which they produce certain articles. Under that scheme some provision is made for the sale of these articles. That is one phase of adult education to which we have given very little consideration in this country, and it is one which I believe should be given some consideration at the present time.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South brought up the question of trade schools as contrasted with our secondary vocational schools. On the basis of my own experience with vocational guidance officers and teachers I am inclined to believe that employers in this country do not favour the employment of youths who have had no training other than the training for the job. My experience has been that employers approve of youths having a fairly high academic standard. They feel that if a youth is given a fairly good academic grounding he is a much more valuable employee in a shop or a factory, and I would be loath to see our youth encouraged to specialize in any particular field at a very early age without having a good academic training.

There can be no question but that we need more trade schools for our youth. The regular secondary vocational schools do not attempt to turn out skilled mechanics. That is not their purpose. They try to give the youth a certain amount of academic training, and the fundamentals of the particular trade or trades in which he is interested. Unquestionably there is a need for what may be considered finishing trade schools where those who have received a foundation training in our secondary vocational schools, or even in our secondary academic schools, can obtain a much more specialized trade training than is available in our regular schools at the present time.

One question raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South is certainly worthy of consideration by the committee to which this bill will be referred, and worthy of consideration by the Department of Labour. I notice that all the assistance to the provinces in connection with vocational training is offered on a 50-50 basis, and that the federal government's contribution must not exceed that made by the province. I think that time has come when we must face up to the fact that the 50-50 rule no longer meets the needs of Canada today. With the difference in wealth that exists as between provinces the time has come when we should consider doing, in the case of these federal grants, what practically every provincial government in the country has had to do in relation to the municipalities, namely to place these grants on the basis of need. Some formula is required whereby those provinces that are in the greatest need will receive a larger share of the cost of educational activities than will the wealthier provinces.

I realize as much as anyone the difficulties that will confront any minister who puts that kind of proposition to some of the provinces of Canada. However, I think a basic fact that must be remembered is that Nova Scotia is not training young people for Nova Scotia; Nova Scotia is training young people for Canada. Today a high percentage of the youth who are trained in any one province are likely to spend the greater part of their lifetime in a province other than that in which they were born. I think we must be able to look at this question of federal grants to vocational education from the broad national point of view. We are trying to train Canadian citizens, and these grants should be administered in such a way that Canadians whether born in Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia or British Columbia will be given some reasonable equality of educational opportunity in so far as these federal grants are concerned.

That may be a step worth discussing at some federal-provincial conference. It is certainly one that we should be ready to face by this time. Every provincial government has had to face up to that problem in its relations with the municipalities. There was a time when provincial governments paid their educational grants on a per capita basis but, so far as I know, that is no longer the case in any of our provinces. Today the provincial governments try to adjust their educational grants on the basis of need. The poorer communities in the province may receive, as they do in Ontario, close to 100 per cent of their educational costs, whereas other wealthier municipalities receive as little as 30 per cent.

I think that is a question which should be faced on the federal-provincial level, and that instead of going on indefinitely apportioning all these grants on a 50-50 basis a beginning should be made in doing it in terms of Canadians as Canadians and not as citizens of any particular province.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, once again I should like to express sincere appreciation for the manner in which all members received the amendments which are incorporated in this bill. To a minister who is attempting to administer the federal end of this business I am sure it is helpful and encouraging to listen to the kind of discussion that has taken place today and that took place on March 3.

I would refer to the further remarks made today by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. He welcomed the committee. Although I think he will agree with me that in these three or four pages of the bill there is not a great deal, when he says he hopes the study will be wide open I can tell him that I also have that hope. As far as I am concerned, in referring it to the committee I will not suggest at all that in that study there be a rigid and strict adherence to the clauses of this bill.

The hon. member makes the suggestion that at least the younger people in, for example, the coal mines which are levelling off at a lower level and in the textile business, which is levelling off at a much lower level, and who are now unemployed might be trained for some other activity. I agree with that suggestion most heartily. I can tell him that in these days we in the department, in conjunction with the unemployment insurance offices, are making a study of the matter. I am getting tired of using that word "study", and I am going to use a little stronger term. We have reached the point during these past weeks of having qualified officials go to several places where these things are happening and, without making any promises, I hope that we may be able to do this in the coal industry in Nova Scotia before too many weeks elapse, in order to see how far we can go in this retraining in conjunction with the provinces.

I can assure my hon. friend that there is not much use of our doing that unless we can go in under the banner of the provinces and have their full co-operation. As a matter of fact I expressed this thought in a broadcast which I made in my own constituency last Saturday night. I stated that I felt we should give encouragement in retraining and finding new employment opportunities for those who are out of employment and will never again be employed in the textile industry, and that we should also encourage in every way the young people who would normally go into such industries to be trained, in other activities in their own areas and in their own provinces, if possible.

The hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Fairey) needed to make no apology whatsoever for clearing up some of the points that have been discussed. He did so very well indeed, and I thank him for it.

The hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) spoke of the fear that vocational graduates might be checked too hard by examining boards in any given province before being permitted to practise their new skills in that province. That matter again is of course within the scope of the provinces. From observation I would say that I do not think any of them are erecting too difficult barriers. In view of the profession of my hon. friend I must admit that I do not think these examining boards are any tougher on the young bricklayers, for example, than are the provincial bar associations on the young lawyers who want to practise in those provinces.

I do not think the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) posed any special problem on vocational training. He gave us suggestions on the improvement of training in general and on the importance of co-operating to a greater extent with the provinces. We all know well his views on that matter. Perhaps some of us cannot express agreement to go quite as far as he suggests in the direction of entering into the educational field; nevertheless we are glad to have his views again.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) brought up a point which rather suggested that I did not clarify the first part of the resolution when it was under discussion. The resolution reads in part as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act to meet present-day requirements for defence and other purposes, including authority . . .

I would refer him to page 2623 of Hansard of March 3 where I said very modestly:

> . . . I should like to state that I do not want for a moment to overestimate the importance of the total number of amendments that are forthcoming here.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer briefly to the bill for this particular purpose The act contains such expressions as "to fit persons for employment for any purpose contributing to the efficient prosecution of the war". Of course at that time the war was paramount. Perhaps the intention was that this kind of training would be aimed very directly at the war in so far as it was possible to do so. In the new act, after amendment takes place, the expression will be "to fit persons for employment for any purpose contributing to the defence of Canada whether in industry or in the armed forces".

I think I might sum it up in this way. Now that hopes are rising that we will be free from war as we knew it at that time, we hope that instead of the pressure being to train people for the immediate and efficient prosecution of war we may under vocational training do a useful job in helping to provide a solid body of trained young men and women who will be valuable in the activities of peace as well as in war. However, there was then and there will continue to be the two categories of training the cost of which is borne 100 per cent by the federal treasury, namely the training of personnel for defence works and the training of personnel for the armed forces. But I can tell the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich that there is no intention of taking in people holus-bolus for such new defence training. I would hope that the training of civilians would add to the number of skilled tradesmen who would be available to the reserve forces, but no drastic new policy is contemplated here.

The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) expressed satisfaction that we are reiterating here the intention of assisting the provinces in equalizing opportunities for the young people of rural communities. That is exactly what is intended, to help the provinces on a 50-50 basis with respect to training for young people in rural areas. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) referred again to the rehabilitation of the disabled, and to older workers. The rehabilitation or even the training of older workers does not come directly within the terms of the bill, but I should like to say that we are doing a good deal not exactly in the way of vocational training but rather in the way of attempting to encourage employers to retain their older workers for a longer period if they are able to do so and the opportunity is there; and also, in spite of the fact that it may disrupt their pension plans, to accept older workers who do not have jobs and for whom jobs have to be found.

We have had some interesting experiments. I shall be glad to go into them in the standing committee or in committee of the whole if the subject is sufficiently related. We have had a very interesting experiment in the city of Toronto. I know my hon. friend will be glad to learn that recently we have had the pleasure of co-operating with the Canadian Manufacturers Association in carrying out, through their own channels, a survey of this matter, and the reports on that will be available later.

The hon. member also stated that in his opinion employers looked for academic standing and other qualities perhaps as much as for the bare skills. I think that is in line with what was said the other night by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). I believe there is a good deal to be said for not trying to train young people in technical skills before they gain maturity and some understanding of life and knowledge of other things, as well as the skill of the particular employment.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) referred to a committee to be set up. I think it was probably a slip of the tongue, but I should like to refer him to Votes and Proceedings, No. 25. He will see there that the standing committee on industrial relations is set up, and he will also see a list of the members. I believe the committee can be convened at any time.

Mr. McIvor: It is a good committee.

Mr. Gregg: It is a good committee. I am glad to say that a good deal of interest has been shown in the advisory council and the step that has been taken in increasing the membership from 16 to 20. At this time I should like to put on the record the personnel of the council as it stands at the present time. The chairman is Dr. G. Fred McNally of Edmonton. Dr. McNally is well known as chancellor of the University of Alberta. Of course he was born in New Brunswick, so that makes him all right. The members of the committee are, in alphabetical order: T. D. Anderson, general secretary of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, Ottawa, representing war veterans; L. S. Beattie, superintendent of secondary education, department of education, parliament buildings, Toronto, representing the government of Ontario; Mrs. Allan Turner Bone, president of the national council of women, Montreal, representing women; Gordon Burnett, manager of Bedard-Girard Limited, 230 Nepean street, Ottawa, representing employers; H. L. Campbell, deputy minister, department of education, Victoria, representing the province of British Columbia. He is the successor of the new member for Victoria, B.C., who occupied that post on the council before Mr. Campbell.

Then there are G. G. Cushing, general secretary-treasurer, Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, Ottawa, representing employees; Norman S. Dowd, executive secretary, Canadian Congress of Labour, representing employees; E. K. Ford, director of vocational education, department of education, Halifax, representing the province of Nova Scotia; Dr. G. A. Frecker, deputy minister, department of education, St. John's, Newfoundland, representing the province of Newfoundland; J. W. McNutt, director of vocational education and regional director of vocational training, Fredericton, representing the province of New Brunswick; Gustave Poisson, deputy minister, department of youth and social welfare, Quebec city, representing the province of Quebec; T. A. Robinson, Canadian International Paper Company, Sun Life building, Montreal, representing employers; W. A. Ross, regional director, Canadian vocational training, department of education, Regina, representing the province of Saskatchewan; W. H. C. Seeley, Toronto transportation commission, 35 Yonge street, Toronto, representing the employers; Miss Yolande Valois, vice-president of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, Sorel, representing employees and, of course, women as well; and W. Elliott Wilson, department of labour, Winnipeg, representing the province of Manitoba.

If hon. members have kept tab they will have noted that, outside of the chairman, only eight provinces out of the ten are now represented. It was our desire to have one or two other national groups represented in forming the larger council.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on industrial relations.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE FUND

ESTABLISHMENT OF ACCOUNT FOR REPLACEMENT OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish in the consolidated revenue fund an account for the replacement of government property lost, destroyed or damaged through fire and for the said purposes to authorize advances from the account, with the approval of the treasury board, up to a maximum of five million dollars.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Green: Will the parliamentary assistant give an explanation?

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, the purpose to be served by this measure can be stated very briefly. It is to ensure, when fire loss occurs and replacement or repair of property destroyed or damaged is urgently and immediately required, and there is not sufficient money available in the parliamentary vote, that authority and funds will be available, subject to the approval of treasury board, to proceed with repairs and replacements without delay.

Mr. Green: May I ask the parliamentary assistant how these losses have been made good in the past?

Mr. Benidickson: In the past they have been made good either by postponement of the replacement or by postponement of the erection of another structure that was contemplated in a parliamentary vote, or they have been provided in some cases by contingency vote of rather a slender amount, in the Department of Finance, and I think there is one additional vote. I would draw the attention of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra to the fact that it is possible there might be a delay of some twelve months in the replacement of a building of importance, or personal property of importance, because we would have to wait for parliament to vote a replacement, although parliament had voted the original allotment for the building destroyed by fire.

Mr. Green: Will the same procedure of tenders be followed in purchasing goods with this money set aside as an insurance fund? I presume it also covers buildings?

Mr. Benidickson: I think the bill will include both movable and immovable property. The intention will be that parliament will be given an opportunity to revote the money, if it happens that it cannot be covered by one of the votes of the department in the year in which a fire loss occurs.

Mr. Green: Yes, but the parliamentary assistant has not answered part of my question. In spending this money will there be the same precautions exercised in calling for tenders, and the like, as applies in the case of the ordinary purchase at the present time; or will there be some short-cut?

Mr. Benidickson: I think my hon. friend can be assured that the same precautions will prevail as have prevailed in all expenditures of the government which, as the hon. member knows, are under a very strict system.

Mr. Knowles: I take it from what the parliamentary assistant has said that this is not in the nature of a fire insurance fund. I see that he agrees. This is simply the provision of money for an interim period in case a fire destroys a building or some other government property. Did I understand from what the parliamentary assistant said that it is the intention to ask parliament every time to replace money spent out of this fund by a specific vote for that purpose?

Mr. Benidickson: I would say it would not be the intention to do that on every occasion. It may be that the matter in question could be provided for through an item parliament had already voted, in other words a general item. But sometimes there fall short in the case of a rather extraordinary disaster. It is drawn to our attention that this might be very deleterious to the government service if it was necessary to wait for twelve months for parliamentary approval, and the contingency votes or some other allowances in the normal votes of the department did not provide an opportunity to replace the property that had been destroyed by fire.

Mr. Knowles: But in all cases, at one stage or another, it will be provided that parliament will have a chance to approve of the item in question?

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member will know that parliament voted for the expenditure for the property in the first instance. Parliament annually would have voted a certain grant to a department for certain general purposes. If that sum was inadequate to take care of a replacement as the result of destruction of property, then this fund could be utilized if there was an urgency for replacement of the property within a period of, we will say, twelve months as a maximum, when parliament would not be available. But certainly if those resources were not available, then in the next session of parliament there would be a new vote which would be charged to the department concerned. Then the fund would have credited back the equivalent in money, as voted by parliament.

Mr. Knowles: I take it that it will not be necessary for the fund to have further moneys voted to it, apart from these moneys that replace the amounts spent? In other words, $5 million is the ceiling on this fund?

Mr. Benidickson: That is the maximum.

Mr. Hansell: We in this group have talked over the resolution. As we know, very often there are more details than meet the eye. It would seem from the resolution that the government is setting up a fund of $5 million to replace losses by fire of any government property, such losses to be returned to the fund at a later time through a vote by parliament, so the government would not be delayed in the replacement of the damage. That is what I understand about it. When the bill is introduced there may be other details that we do not know about.

Since we are at the resolution stage may I ask the parliamentary assistant this question, because a principle is involved here. Is it expected that the government may have to do more than meet the fire loss, we will say, in a certain project? Let me put before the parliamentary assistant a specific but hypothetical case. Suppose a building worth $100,000 is completely destroyed by fire. Would the government assume the authority under this legislation to erect another building worth $2 million or $3 million, and instead of erecting it at the same location on Wellington street decide to put the building in some other place, even in Montreal?

That is an extreme case, and the parliamentary assistant will rise and say it is not probable that it could happen. I fancy that what we are really doing—and I am not saying we are not in favour of the resolution—is giving the government authority to replace losses even to the extent of rebuilding a project without our knowing what the project may be, or seeing the plans, or even being able to ask questions about the contract. Really that is what I envisage in this as a danger. I am not saying the government would do it. Perhaps they would bring about a serious filibuster at the next session of parliament if they did it; nevertheless I am under the impression that it could be done. Can the parliamentary assistant throw any light on that?

Mr. Benidickson: I appreciate the implication in the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod. He will also appreciate, of course, that legislation has to be reasonably elastic; and when we speak in terms of replacement of property I think he will understand that draftsmen for this type of legislation would likely provide that we would not be restricted by a limitation that would mean we would have only an expenditure equivalent to the original cost.

Hon. members will very quickly understand that if it were applicable to a building erected some 25 or 50 years ago the replacement value today would be very much greater than the cost of construction 25 years ago. My feeling is that in drafting a bill one would have to allow a certain amount of freedom in this respect. On the other hand, I would imagine that in examining the use of legislation of this type the official who is responsible to this house, the Auditor General, would doubtless draw to the attention of the house any very great departure from the intent as laid down by the particular act.

Mr. Knowles: Any departure at all.

Mr. Benidickson: Any departure at all, probably, even without taking into calculation the inflated costs of replacement, of something that was constructed 25 years ago and had to be replaced as the result of a fire, let us say, in the current year.

Mr. Knowles: One other question. There are three significant words here: "lost, destroyed or damaged". Do the words "through fire" qualify all three of those words?

Mr. Benidickson: I had not particularly studied that phrasing, Mr. Chairman, but having regard to the title of the bill, the introduction of the bill and the general phrasing I would think that "fire" is the governing word.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier (for Mr. Abbott) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 377, to establish an account for the replacement of government property lost, destroyed or damaged through fire.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

EXTENSION OF CONTROL OF STRATEGIC MATERIALS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 374, to control export and import of strategic materials.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, it had been hoped that the house might have been able to deal with the second reading of this bill today, but I understand that it better meets the convenience of hon. members if second reading is simply called now and a statement is made with respect to the provisions of the bill which will amend and re-enact the Export and Import Permits Act.

The position is that the present Export and Import Permits Act will expire on the 31st day of July of this year. The bill now before the house will provide continuing authority for control over exports and imports for certain purposes. As regards exports, the purposes of control will be found set out in clause 3 of the bill; and as regards imports, in clause 5.

The scope of this bill is very similar to that of the present act, but there has been a marked change in the emphasis to be attached to some of its purposes. In the exercise of export control supply reasons or purposes have become relatively less important, and strategic purposes relatively more so.

The main changes sought under this bill as compared with the present act are intended to improve our system of control over the export of strategic materials. Control over the movement of strategic materials is an international problem requiring a great deal of international co-operation. By a United Nations resolution Canada is committed to the embargo of the shipment of arms, ammunition and military material to communist China. Again we have an understanding with the United States by which we enjoy freedom on our own behalf from the operation of their export control, but we in turn undertake to control the re-export of United States goods from Canada to overseas destinations.

Along with the United States, the United Kingdom and most of our NATO allies, Canada seeks to promote uniformity in the list of commodities that are kept under control by each participating country. I mention these instances particularly because they serve to illustrate the ramifications of effective control in this field which bear directly on some of the provisions of this bill. Our chief problem is not in controlling the initial export of strategic materials from Canada but rather in following our control through to ensure that the goods are not diverted in transit to destinations that we have not approved.

There is no simple answer to the question, "What are strategic materials?" Obviously these include arms, ammunition and implements of war. They include also raw materials such as non-ferrous metals, minerals and chemicals in primary or manufactured forms; in fact, any product which has a significant usage in defence industries might be classed as strategic. Examples among the raw materials would be nickel, copper, lead, aluminum, asbestos—at least the spinning grades—and high-grade abrasives. In equipment, the list would include automatic machine tools, large generators and turbines, chemical plant and aircraft. With the powers provided under this bill we will make some changes in the present pattern of our export controls, and it is the intention to publish at an early date a schedule of what we generally regard as strategic materials so there need be no uncertainty in traders' minds.

Decisions to include or exclude items in the list of controlled commodities are made in consultation with other governments. These lists are under continual review by an international co-ordinating committee. There would be no point in our denying ourselves a market for machinery, for instance, which another country stood ready to exploit. There is no purpose either in our denying direct shipments of commodities such as nickel or aluminum if other countries are unwilling or unable to safeguard their re-exports of such materials received from Canada.

[Mr. Dickey.]

I believe that the basic machinery of our export control is well known to hon. members. Anyone seeing the permit application form would immediately grasp the essential facts. The exporter or his agent must be the applicant; the goods must be precisely described; quantity and value must be shown; any substantial United States content must be disclosed; the port of exit must be given; the country of ultimate destination must be named. The permit itself has to be surrendered to the customs officer clearing the export of any shipment, who holds a duplicate copy for checking purposes which is supplied directly to him by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

This procedure was adequate by itself when control of exports was intended solely to conserve supplies. Later it became necessary to institute import certification and delivery verification as we became more concerned with ensuring delivery to the specified destinations of our strategic materials. This procedure has been of special benefit in establishing the bona fides of the foreign importer where he is otherwise known to us only as a casual customer. Further steps may still be necessary to make it more difficult for unreliable operators to arrange diversion of goods in major transfer ports.

This is a more serious problem for European countries with a large entrepot trade, but we ourselves have to be equally careful of the business conducted through Canada, particularly that from United States sources. Moreover, we have always the responsibility that Canada shall not be used as a base for the type of trader in small arms and ammunition whose activities need to be closely watched.

Normally, diversion of a shipment is only possible after it has passed through customs in the export country and before it has reached the hands of the importer at its proper destination. Diversion occurs by cargo being rerouted on land or remanifested aboard ship, by transshipment in part, by reshipment from bonded warehouse, and in extreme cases by re-export from the importing country. At some point, therefore, new or altered instructions have to be given to the carrier or the holder of the goods. That act must be made illegal if it is committed knowingly and with illegal purpose or effect.

It is our purpose to work toward a minimum list of commodities under control but a maximum effectiveness of the machinery of control itself. In the past we have lifted export control from commodities as soon as conditions permitted. We have reduced the list of commodities controlled from 407 in 1948 to 184 in 1953. The number of licences issued has fallen from 113,094 in 1948 to 26,635 in 1953, although the volume and value of our external trade in that period has expanded immensely. This shows how greatly the incidence of the controls has been reduced as regards what may be called normal trade.

We intend immediately to reduce the list of countries covered by our area control list. This means that, with the improved provisions of this bill relating to the control of in-transit diversions, we shall be able to relax the licensing requirements on shipments to almost all countries outside the Soviet bloc. With more effective means enabling us to better control back-door exports of United States goods via Canada we shall be able to de-list some commodities which we do not produce or which we do not classify as strategic in the forms in which they are available in Canada and from Canadian sources. Our over-all objective is the same as it always has been, to limit the control of exports to the essential minimum.

Apart from strategic controls, we still have export controls for supply reasons on a very short list of products and, of course, atomic materials remain under strict export control.

The provisions of this bill, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the control of imports, differ from those in the existing act only in that the purposes for which import control may be exercised, as set out in section 5, include specific authority "to implement an inter-governmental arrangement or commitment." This change is being made to define more clearly the power that is required from time to time to carry out arrangements with other countries, particularly with the United States. It is preferable on occasion that we control our imports at the request of the United States, rather than leave it to the United States to impose export controls on shipments to Canada. The wisdom of this course has, I believe, been well proven over a period of years.

On motion of Mr. Bell the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall take second reading of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act; second reading of the Export and Import Permits Act; and if there is any time left we shall consider once again the Criminal Code.

On motion of Mr. Chevrier the house adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 17, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

MR. MCIVOR—GREETINGS TO MR. SPEAKER AND MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, on behalf of the Irishmen in this house and in other places I should like to extend to you, and to all those over whom you preside, greetings on this great day; and my wish for you is that you may have success and happiness so that at the end of your day it can be said, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for his good wishes, not only for myself but for all members of the house. I think we will take his advice and ever pray to St. Patrick for his blessings.

QUESTIONS

WHEAT PURCHASES BY MILLING COMPANIES

Mr. Zaplitny:

1. What quantities of wheat were purchased from the Canadian wheat board by Canadian and/or American milling companies, based in store Fort William-Port Arthur, on each of the following dates: February 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 1954 and March 8, 1954?

2. What was the average price per bushel paid for such purchases on each of the above dates?

Mr. Dickey:

1. It is not the policy of the Canadian wheat board to disclose its position with respect to sales during a current crop year.

2. See answer to No. 1.

FEED WHEAT PURCHASES

Mr. Zaplitny:

1. What quantities of wheat were purchased from the Canadian wheat board, for the purposes of feed, based in store Fort William-Port Arthur, on each of the following dates: February 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 1954 and March 8, 1954?

2. What was the average price per bushel received for such wheat on each of the above dates?

Mr. Dickey:

1. It is not the policy of the Canadian wheat board to disclose its position with respect to sales during a current crop year.

2. See answer to No. 1.

MARRIED WOMEN EMPLOYED

Mr. Purdy:

1. What is the approximate number of married women whose husbands are employable, included in the civilian working force of Canada?

2. What is the approximate number of married women whose husbands are employed, included in the total of those applying for jobs through the unemployment insurance commission?

3. What is the approximate number of husbands whose wives are employed, included in the total of those applying for jobs through the unemployment insurance commission?

Mr. Gregg:

1. The estimated number of married women in the civilian labour force in Canada was 387,000 in January, 1954. The number of these whose husbands were employable is not known.

Source: Dominion bureau of statistics' labour force survey.

2 and 3. Information not available.

TRANSPORTATION FATALITIES

Mr. Knowles:

What is the rate of fatalities (a) for Canada; (b) for North America, or for whatever portion thereof for which figures are available, per one hundred million passenger miles travelled (or other available base) for each of the following modes of transportation: (i) by train; (ii) by commercial regularly scheduled air services; (iii) by commercial bus routes; (iv) by automobile?

Mr. Dickey: Rate of passenger fatalities per 100 million passenger miles:

(a) for Canada, 1952; (1) By train, 0·06; (2) By commercial regularly scheduled air services—domestic, nil; international, nil; (3) By commercial bus routes, not available; (4) By automobile, not available.

(b) for United States of America, 1952*; (1) By railroad passenger train, 0·04; (2) By scheduled air transport planes, 0·35; (3) By commercial bus routes, 0·16; (4) By passenger automobiles[1] and taxis, 2·8.

[1] Drivers of automobiles are considered as passengers.

ARTHRITIC AID

Mr. Gillis:

1. How many hospitals in Canada offer arthritic aid as a specialty?

2. What are the names of such hospitals and where are they located?

Questions

Mr. Dickey: I should like to answer this question orally. The information requested by the hon. gentleman as to hospitals in Canada which offer arthritic aid is not available. However, the dominion bureau of statistics in their 1953 hospital schedule have asked each hospital to report if an arthritic clinic is (a) operated by the hospital or (b) operated by other agencies. The tabulation of the answers to the 1953 schedules will not be available for about three months, but at the end of that time the information should be available to the hon. gentleman and the house.

MARITIME NATIONAL PARKS—ROADS

Mr. MacLean:

What is (a) the date of founding; (b) the area; (c) the total amount spent since founding; (d) the amount spent each year since 1945; (e) the amount of hard-surfaced road built to date and the cost in each of the three national parks in the maritime provinces?

Mr. Winters:

1. Cape Breton Highlands National Park

(a) Established—National Parks Act, chapter 43, 1936.

(b) Area—390 square miles.

(c) Total expenditures—$5,449,993 to December 31, 1953.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—BASIC PENSION

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has any provision yet been made for any increase in the pensions of retired employees of the Canadian National Railways who are in receipt of only the basic pension of $25 per month?

2. Has any reconsideration been given by the government at any time since the matter was last discussed in the House of Commons on May 12, 1953, to increasing the amount of the said basic pension? If so, what is the result of such consideration?

3. Has the management of the Canadian National Railways, at any time since May 12, 1953, discussed with the government the possibility of the amount of the said basic pension being increased? If so, are there any records of such discussions?

4. Has the management of the Canadian National Railways, at any time since May 12, 1953, asked the government to approve of the Canadian National Railways increasing the amount of the said basic pension? If so, what was the government's answer?

5. Has the management of the Canadian National Railways, at any time since May 12, 1953, asked the government to take the responsibility for providing an increase in the amount of the said basic pension? If so, what reply has the government made to any such request?

6. If no decision has yet been taken on this matter by the government, is the matter now under consideration?

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to deal with this question orally. There has been no change in the position in regard to an increase in the basic pension granted to retired employees of the Canadian National Railways since it was fully discussed in the house and in the railways and shipping committee in 1952, nor have representations been received from the management of the railway on this question. The answer to each of the six parts of this question would be no.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION —RECEIPTS AND PAYMENTS

Mr. Regier:

1. What were the receipts of the unemployment insurance commission for the month of December 1953?
2. How much money was distributed during December 1953, to the unemployed under the terms of the act?
3. What were the receipts for the year 1953 of the unemployment insurance commission?
4. What were the benefits paid to the unemployed under the terms of the act during 1953?

Mr. Gregg:

1 and 3. The amounts credited to the unemployment insurance fund are as follows:

ANNUAL LEAVE—LETTER CARRIERS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Have any circular orders been issued by the Post Office Department, dated since February 18, 1954, advising letter carriers as to arrangements for annual leaves following the institution of the five-day 40-hour week?
2. If so, how many of such circular orders have been issued, what are their numbers, and what were their dates of issue?
3. What are the terms of such orders in relation to the arrangements for annual leaves for letter carriers?
4. Did a subsequent order alter the terms of an earlier order? If so, in what respect?
5. Do the terms of the latest order alter the established practice of annual leaves for letter carriers being arranged on the basis of seniority?
6. If so, have protests been received against any such change?
7. From whom?
8. Has consideration been given to such protests? If so, what is the result of such consideration?
9. Will the practice of annual leaves for letter carriers being arranged on the basis of seniority be reinstated?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare):

1 to 9.

To ensure the successful application of the five-day 40-hour week certain modifications of previous practices are essential. These changes are not derogatory to the general principle of the selection of annual leave by seniority in length of service.

The adoption of the rotation scheme whereby supervisory carriers relieve men on each of several walks in turn, from a standpoint of practical application, necessitates annual leave being taken within groups of 12 or 13 employees.

Two circular orders were issued; the first OBPS 299 of the 19th February outlining the application of annual leave on a basis of seniority within the group without regard to rank; the second OBPS 299D of the 26th February modifies the first and recognizes the supervisory rank of the supervisory letter carriers, indicating that seniority would be arranged first on a basis of rank and then the remainder of the employees on the basis of length of service.

Protests have been received from the national office of the federated association of letter carriers and also from several individual branches protesting against the supervisory class being given a choice of annual leave ahead of those letter carriers who wish to deliver on a single walk only and who do not wish to apply for or accept supervisory responsibilities.

Consideration is being given to this protest, and if it is possible to adopt the absolute rule of seniority within the groups that will be done. However, the basic requirement is that the interests of the public service must predominate.

Information so far received indicates that to give effect to the five-day week on April 1, 1954, it may be necessary to grant the holiday choice privilege to supervisory letter carriers at least at certain offices.

MICHEL SISCO

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. Is Michel Sisco alias Antonine D'Agostine a Canadian citizen?
2. If not, has he applied for citizenship?

Questions

3. Has he been given any permit to stay in Canada?
4. If so, on whose recommendation?
5. When did he enter the country?
6. Did he have a passport in his possession?
7. If so, authorized by what government?
8. If not, how did he enter the country?

Mr. Harris:

1. No.
2. No.
3. No.
4. Not applicable.
5. No record of entry.
6. No information.
7. Not applicable.
8. Not known.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PENSIONS

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many retired employees of the Canadian National Railways are in receipt of pensions of less than $25 per month?
2. How many are in receipt of only the basic pension of $25 per month?
3. How many are in receipt of non-contributory service pensions, (a) $25.01 to $29.99 per month; (b) $30.00 to $39.99 per month; (c) $40.00 to $49.99 per month; (d) $50.00 to $59.99 per month; (e) $60.00 to $69.99 per month; (f) $70.00 to $79.99 per month; (g) $80.00 to $89.99 per month; (h) $90.00 to $99.99 per month; (i) $100.00 to $124.99 per month; (j) $125.00 to $149.99 per month; (k) $150 or over per month?
4. How many are in receipt of pensions in part basic and in part contributory, (a) $25.01 to $29.99 per month; (b) $30.00 to $39.99 per month; (c) $40.00 to $49.99 per month; (d) $50.00 to $59.99 per month; (e) $60.00 to $69.99 per month; (f) $70.00 to $79.99 per month; (g) $80.00 to $89.99 per month; (h) $90.00 to $99.99 per month; (i) $100.00 to $124.99 per month; (j) $125.00 to $149.99 per month; (k) $150 or over per month?

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

HALIFAX AIRPORT—EXPENDITURES

Mr. Balcom:

What was the total expenditure made on the Halifax airport at Eastern Passage during each of the last five years on (a) maintenance; (b) extension and improvements?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have spoken to the hon. gentleman about this question and he has agreed to have it amended so that the phrase beginning with the word "during" would read:

during the fiscal years from April 1, 1950, to December 31, 1953.

With that amendment I should like to ask that it stand as an order for return.

NEWSPAPER AND MAGAZINE SUBSCRIPTIONS

Mr. Gagnon:

1. With the exception of the publications intended for the reading rooms of the Senate and the House of Commons, how many subscriptions to newspapers, reviews, magazines or other publications are paid by the government for the benefit of the employees or other persons interested in the administration?
2. How many in each department?
3. What total amount was paid for that purpose during the last fiscal year?

Mr. Pickersgill: I spoke to the hon. member for Chicoutimi about this question and pointed out to him that the government did not pay for subscriptions to newspapers, etc., "for the benefit of employees or other persons interested in the administration", but only for the public service. If those words could be dropped and "in 1952-53" inserted in their place, this question could stand as an order for return. I understand the hon. gentleman is agreeable.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member accept the correction suggested by the minister?

Mr. Gagnon: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

(Text):

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence that passed between any department of the government of the United States and any department of the government of Canada, and a copy of all agreements entered into, since the 1st day of January, 1952, in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway and power project.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is now en route from Washington and will arrive in Ottawa this evening. I would therefore ask the hon. gentleman to allow this motion to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

HAROLD C. BANKS

Mr. Hamilton:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, recorded telephone conversations or any other communications or documents, from January 1, 1947 to date, relating to the case of Harold C. Banks: (a) between the Minister or Department of Labour, the Minister or Department of Citizenship and Immigration, the Minister or Department of Justice, and/or any other person or persons, corporation or government; (b) between any two or more of the above mentioned ministers or departments.

Mr. Harris: Subject to the usual reservations, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, subject to the statement by the minister.

SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all letters, communications, briefs or memoranda received by the Minister of Finance, or received by any other minister and referred to the Minister of Finance, dated at any time since January 1, 1952, from associations or organizations representing superannuated federal civil servants, or from any officers thereof, together with a copy of the replies of the Minister of Finance thereto.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that this motion be allowed to stand in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott).

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

VANCOUVER POST OFFICE—FINISHING MARBLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether there is any possibility of the finishing marble for the Vancouver post office being obtained in Italy. I ask that because there is grave concern over this matter.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have had no prior notice of this question, except that the hon. member was kind enough a moment ago to show me a telegram he received relating to this matter. I will be very glad to look into it and bear in mind the point he has raised.

POST OFFICE

INQUIRY AS TO SUPERSEDING OF ORDER NO. 299

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Will the minister explain why circular order 299D superseded order No. 299 and deprived regular letter carriers of their seniority in the matter of annual leave in favour of the supervising staff?

Hon. Alcide Coté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I did not receive prior notice of this question, but I believe it is similar to the question asked a few days ago. This question is now under consideration by my officers in the department and I shall be glad to report on the matter as soon as possible.

Mr. Knowles: That is what the minister has told me twice already.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

HAROLD C. BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Can the minister say when I may expect the return which was ordered on February 25 and which it was intimated might be available this week?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): It is available, though it has not come to my desk as yet.

Mrs. Fairclough: Can I expect it tomorrow?

Mr. Harris: I hope so.

IMMIGRATION

PRESS REPORT CONCERNING ADVERTISING FOR WORKERS IN HOLLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration?

Will the minister comment on the published statement in yesterday's Globe and Mail, a copy of which I sent him, to the effect that the Canadian government, through radio, press and employment offices in Holland, is advertising for workers in the metal industry in Canada, and will the minister tell us where this employment is available?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to send me a copy of the announcement in the Globe which contains the statement he describes. The actual situation is that this is a letter to the editor from a person in Welland and we are attempting to obtain information from him about that letter. The short answer at the moment, however, is that the Canadian government does not advertise in any form in Holland and I do not believe this is occurring as indicated in the letter.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

ADVERTISING OF CIGARETTES AS LOSS LEADERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has any investigation been launched by the combines investigation branch into the question of the advertising of cigarettes as loss leaders? When will that investigation be launched, and is it the intention of that branch to have sittings across the country in reference to this matter before a report is brought in?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has asked this question without giving prior notice, and his words are rather peculiar. He asks, "Has there been launched an investigation into the advertising of cigarettes as loss leaders?" There has been an investigation going on for some time into the general subject of loss leaders, as has been announced in this house; and that includes cigarettes as well as other matters. It probably will include advertising of cigarettes as well, although I would not like to say without notice that it does. However, I shall be glad to look into the matter and if it is necessary to amend the answer I have given today I shall be glad to do so.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO 1954

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the second reading of Bill No. 376, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Mr. Fleming: Does the minister intend to make a statement on second reading?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Speaker, I have nothing further to add to the statement I made on the resolution.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the minister be kind enough to wait until hon. members who have duties to perform outside the house leave their seats?

Mr. Prudham: The bill before us proposes to extend emergency gold mining assistance for the year 1954. Several hon. members asked questions during the debate on the resolution and I would prefer to wait until we reach the committee stage before answering those questions. However, there was one question in particular which perhaps I should answer at this time. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) asked if a mine benefited under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act during a strike. In calculating emergency gold mining assistance payments to a mine, two factors have to be considered: first, the rate of assistance, and secondly, the number of ounces produced which made that mine eligible for assistance. It is obvious that if there is no production there can be no gold eligible for assistance and therefore no payments during that period. Administrative or overhead costs, or anything which is normally considered an overhead cost, are not eligible for gold mining assistance payments during the period of a strike. In other words, a mine cannot benefit in any way whatsoever from the gold mining assistance during the period of a strike. The rate of assistance is calculated on the cost of production, assuming that there was a full year's operation. That rate is applied only to the assistance ounces eligible. When there is no production, there is no gold eligible for assistance.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why this bill should be unduly held up at this moment. However, I just wanted to answer certain statements which were put on the record by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) with regard to the earnings of gold mining companies. Of the 53 straight gold mines which are at present in production, the average yield is rather less than 2½ per cent on the present price of the stock. May I say that that yield is considerably under the yield of any group of manufacturing stocks or that on stocks of any other producers of primary products. As to dividends paid, for the straight gold mines in 1953—that is the 53 straight gold mines which were producing—the average dividend was 15 cents. If one excluded the McIntyre mine which is now more of an investment trust than a gold producer, the average dividend would fall to 9 cents. I merely wanted to put these facts on the record in order to show that today the gold mining industry is not making profits and is virtually scraping the bottom of the barrel.

As to wages, while the wages paid in the straight gold mining industry are less than those paid in the base metal mines, nevertheless they compare favourably with and are very much higher than the average of industrial wages across Canada. I have the statistics in front of me but I will not burden the house by putting them on the record. However, they are here in the dominion bureau of statistics' statistical review and in the Labour Review.

There is one other comment I should like to make with regard to wages in the gold camps and it is this. The cost of living in the settled camps is considerably lower than that in places such as Sudbury or the industrial centres of southern Ontario and industrial Quebec. Rents are lower. The cost of living generally is lower. Hence, after the cost of living has been taken out, the balance position of the gold miner at the end of the month is, I submit, little if at all inferior to that of the worker in any other industry in Canada.

I think that is all I wish to say on the bill now, Mr. Speaker. As I said yesterday, we support it. I will not repeat anything I said yesterday on the matter. I merely wanted to correct a statement which I believe can be shown to be untrue.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the passage of this bill. When speaking earlier on this subject I made it clear that we would support this bill. There are, however, certain things that we think should be taken into consideration at this time.

When speaking on the resolution yesterday I emphasized the fact that among those interested in the gold mines in the north there was a growing demand for the setting up of a commission or a special committee to consider the present status of the gold mining industry. As I indicated then, there is a great deal of confusion with regard to that status. The mine owners have certainly succeeded in selling to the government, to the press and to the Conservative party the idea that gold mining is a depressed industry at the present time. The mine owners succeeded in persuading the public, through the press, that last winter they could not afford to pay the increased wages asked for by the miners nor to introduce shorter hours for the work-week which is now a 48-hour week, notwithstanding the fact that six conciliation boards under the chairmanship of Mr. Eric Taylor, Judge Lane, Judge Fuller and Professor Curtis, after examining the financial statements of these mines, had all found that, in their opinion, the mines could afford to grant the increase in wages asked for and a shorter work-week, and so recommended in their report.

There is also some confusion as to whether or not this act is fulfilling the purpose for which it was intended. In the report on the administration of the act, we are told this:

> The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act of 1948 was primarily designed to assist the high cost or marginal gold mines to continue operations throughout the difficult post-war period.

There is a question whether the act as it stands at present, and with the present regulations, meets that need. There is some doubt as to the extent to which the public funds paid to the gold mines does that. This year these funds will probably amount to about $13 million. From a return handed down, I gather there is another cost of approximately $65,000, that being the cost of administering the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the Department of Finance. As handed down in the return in my name, the total cost of administering this act in 1953 would be approximately $65,000.

With so much public money going into the industry, it is certainly relevant to ask whether the miners and the communities affected are receiving the benefits from this act or whether the benefits of this public money are being siphoned off in profits to directors, shareholders and mining stock speculators. Charges have been made and evidence has been given before conciliation boards to the effect that neither the miners nor the communities have benefited from the funds which the federal government has provided. That is one reason why I think there should be a more thorough investigation of the whole situation.

The act purports to exist for the purpose of assisting high-cost or marginal gold mines to continue operation. Actually, in 1952, of the $10,359,000 paid in gold subsidies $1,390,000 went to two mines, Hollinger and McIntyre. In that year sixty-one mines applied for subsidies. Approximately $9 million was divided among the remaining fifty-nine, whereas the lion's share of the subsidies certainly went to the two largest gold mines.

The question arises whether or not these mines were deliberately budgeting for a deficit on their operations in order to take the fullest possible advantage of the subsidies paid by the federal government. There is some evidence from their reports that unusual quantities of low grade ore were used with the higher grades in order to maintain minimum production from the ores mined so that the greatest possible benefits could be derived from the subsidies. There are other equally important questions which I think can only be solved by a thorough-going investigation of the whole gold mining industry in relation to the general economy of the country. I would urge the minister to take that into consideration.

I was very happy to hear from the minister that no subsidy could possibly be paid for gold that was not produced and that the mines could not benefit from the subsidy while they were on strike. I want to point out to the minister my reason for believing that such was possible by referring to section 6(1)(d) of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act which provides as follows:

> . . . where the operation of a mine is suspended during part of a designated year for a reason specified in the regulations . . . payments may be made . . . in such amount as would have been payable . . . if the mine had been in normal operation throughout the designated year . . .

Then I turn to regulation 15 of order in council P.C. 2664 of June 11, 1948. This regulation includes suspension of operation by strike and provides in part as follows:

> . . . assistance payments may be made for the gold actually produced during the year in such amount as would have been payable in respect of that gold if the operation of the mine had not been suspended . . .

Those who have given considerable study to that regulation, including some auditors, have reached the conclusion that it would appear that if operations were suspended for thirty days only the period of thirty days would be treated as if there had been no suspension, but where suspension of operations is more than thirty days then it would seem that at least part of the cost to the company of suspension of operations is included in the costs for the purpose of determining the assistance payable under the act.

I have before me sessional paper 78-B which purports to be a copy of the report made by the cost inspection and audit division of the office of the comptroller of the treasury with respect to Hollinger for the year 1951 during which year the mine was on strike for fifty-eight days. I find that the production for the designated year 1951 was 241,429.898 fine ounces. I also find that the production for the designated year 1951, if the mine had not suspended operations, works out by the application of the formula to 287,004.167 fine ounces, which is about 46,000 more than the number of ounces actually produced. Then I find that in working out the assistance ounces, if the mine had not suspended operations, the figure 287,004.167 is used instead of the figure of 241,000, which was the actual production for that year.

From that return it would appear that in that particular case some advantage accrued to the mine for the period of fifty-eight days during which it was closed down. I am quite sure that everyone interested will be very happy to have the public assurance of the minister that mines cannot profit from this act when they are on strike. I would point out to the minister that that is fair. Under the Unemployment Insurance Act no employee may collect unemployment insurance while his firm is on strike, and it is only fair that the same rule should apply to employers and that they should not be able to benefit in any way from federal revenues by reason of the fact that they are on strike.

I would ask the minister to have his department look over that return, sessional paper No. 78-B, entitled "Cost Inspection and Audit Division, Office of the Comptroller of the Treasury," dated August 14, 1952, in which the number of assistance ounces was calculated as I have indicated. It may be that the minister can show me from that calculation that Hollinger did not benefit in any way from those fifty-eight days. I will admit that the formula is a very complicated one, and it would take someone as conversant with it as the minister himself to be able to tell us whether or not that is true.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I only want to speak for a few minutes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) yesterday and today put very well the point of view of this group, and the questions in which we are particularly interested. I do not see, therefore, any particular reason for repeating his explanation and his arguments.

There are many miners in British Columbia interested in this legislation. As a consequence representatives of the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers came to Ottawa and made representations on behalf of their members in Canada to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair). I may say that union has represented the hard-rock miners in British Columbia since 1896, so it has had considerable experience with the problem of miners and particularly with those of the gold mining industry.

When in Ottawa the union representatives presented a brief to the ministers in question, and I understand they received a courteous and careful hearing. As a result of their experience they made certain representations. I am not going to deal with the brief at length but I should like to read the final recommendation from the statement and proposals adopted by the sixth Canadian convention of the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers, for submission to the government of Canada. The proposal reads, and I support it:

> Finally, we urge that a federal inquiry be undertaken into the gold mining industry in Canada, with the right of all interested parties to appear before the inquiry board, to give evidence and make proposals to assist the industry and for the advantage of the workers employed in it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to make this point. It is obvious from the situation that has developed in the gold mining industry in recent years, and it is obvious from the minister's remarks that the industry is not in the condition today that the government expected it to be in when this measure of assistance was first introduced. There is a great deal of uncertainty. The workers in the industry are not satisfied with their conditions. They have no sense of security. I should like the minister, when he concludes this debate, to give consideration to this recommendation, which I believe was previously mentioned by the hon. member for York South. It seems to me to be a sound recommendation. I should like the minister to inform the house if he would recommend to his colleagues that an inquiry into the gold industry in Canada be undertaken by the federal government, in view of the situation illustrated by recent events, this debate, and by the remarks of the minister upon introducing the bill from year to year when renewal of the measure was under consideration by the house.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): The gold mining industry would be in a very different position today were the price of its product in relation to the prices of other commodities comparable to the prices which prevailed before the second world war. Unfortunately, it is the other way around. The price of gold was kept down to the 1934 basis of $35 in United States currency and the cost of production has gone up.

In view of this, it must be realized that the industry has no other alternative but to accept government assistance, even if this assistance is short of compensating for the rise in production costs. An advance in the price of gold is the only permanent solution to the problem of the gold mines, but as Canada is not the largest producer or seller of the precious metal we cannot dictate the price or influence the buyers by refusing to sell. We are faced with this problem, that the price of gold can only be raised by joint international action for which the initiative rests with the United States.

Canada would certainly stand to gain from an increase in the official price of gold. Not only would a higher price be of direct benefit to the Canadian gold producers and those dependent upon them, but by increasing the United States dollar value of gold the official reserve held outside the United States would ease some of the exchange difficulties and lead to an increase in Canadian export. However, the price of gold is not something that our government alone has the power to determine. The predominant position of the United States, as the world's largest holder and buyer of gold, means that the value the United States government places on gold in terms of its own currency is the official world price. Only lately our influential friends to the south have again stated that the price should stay at $35 in United States currency, and that is all there is to it.

We are all aware that the production and sale of gold is of great importance to the Canadian economy. Until there is an increase in the price, we must agree that the government will have to continue to assist the industry. Let us review what has happened to the gold mining industry in Canada during the past years, and more particularly since 1948 when the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act came into force. Let us see if the government has so badly invested the Canadian taxpayers' money, if the gold producers have abused the assistance received, and if the miners and other people dependent on the industry have not benefited by it.

It is not my intention to take the time of the house to review the causes for the seriously handicapped operations of the gold mining industry in Canada since the early years of world war II. However, let me say that during those years the gold producers were sharply restricted in supplies, equipment and manpower. The volume and dollar value of production were reduced to practically one-half by the end of the war. During the years immediately following the end of the war rapidly mounting costs pressing against the ceiling of a fixed price for gold brought the industry to a precarious position. The figures published by the dominion bureau of statistics show that the operating costs of Canadian gold mines have risen by 35 per cent during the period between the year 1941, when the price of gold was $38.50 an ounce, and the year 1948 when the price of gold was $35 an ounce. Since 1948, when cost aid was instituted, the upward trend of costs has been particularly marked. During the period between 1948 and 1951 wages rose 32·3 per cent, costs of supplies 34·7 per cent and freight costs close to 50 per cent. Those three items of cost together constitute 84 per cent of the total cost of operation of the average gold mine.

After 1951 the upward trend has continued, and we can say that during the past eight years the gold mines have been waging a hard battle. They have tried to maintain production in the face of rising costs, with no offsetting increase in the price of gold. The most recent report published by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys shows that for the year 1952, of the 56 lode gold mines which were in receipt of cost aid, thirty-five are reported as having costs in excess of $35 an ounce, sixteen are reported as having costs in excess of $30 an ounce, and only five are reported as having costs between $25 and $30 an ounce.

From this it will be realized that the majority of the gold mines would be unable to maintain production at the current price of gold, without assistance; and that sixteen other mines are in a precarious position, where costs and revenue are about in balance. In that same report which I have just mentioned we find that from 1948 to 1951 inclusive at least 50 per cent of the gold mines in receipt of cost aid have been reported as having costs in excess of $35 an ounce.

To alleviate the disastrous effect which the Canadian gold mining industry and the communities dependent upon it were suffering, as a result of the closing vise of mounting costs against a fixed price, the government introduced in 1948 this legislation, which we now hope will be extended to the end of 1954.

As previously mentioned, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was sanctioned in 1948, and it was to stay in force for three years. In 1951, 1952 and 1953 it was extended and amended and each time a bill was introduced in the house to this effect there was very little or no opposition. This time it looks to be the same thing; but there are insinuations that there has been abuse of this assistance, that it did not benefit the miners and communities dependent upon the industry.

Before I present some facts which will prove that the assistance provided by the government did benefit the miners and mining communities, I wish to go back to the debate which took place in 1948 during the second reading of the bill respecting emergency payments to assist in meeting increased costs of production of gold. I wish to refer to some of the remarks made at that time by the leader of the C.C.F. party. This is very important, Mr. Speaker, because at that time the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) did not oppose the measure which was then before the house; but he made certain observations and did insist that the said measure was acceptable only under certain conditions.

As reported at page 2675 of Hansard for April 6, 1948, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had this to say:

> I think this can be justified only if we accept certain considerations which should be fundamental to the granting of any subsidy of this kind, namely that the subsidy should not be used for the profit of the owners of the mines but should be granted only if we have not merely an understanding but a definite undertaking that the men engaged in the mining industry are paid decent and sufficient wages and work and live under decent and proper conditions.

And later the hon. member had this to say:

> May I say to the minister I have been told that when the representatives of the unions discussed this matter on one occasion with one of the ministers, I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), he was willing to accept the suggestion that some sixty per cent of the grants made by the government under a measure such as this should be used for the improvement of conditions of labour and of health, and the rates of pay of the men engaged in the industry.

And again:

> In any event, whatever we do in matters of this kind should be done with the distinct understanding, and, as I said, on the distinct undertaking, that a proper proportion of whatever aid is given shall be used for the improvement of conditions among those who risk life and limb and health in the mining of gold.

From what I have just cited, I suppose I am right in saying that the leader of the C.C.F. party gave his approval of the measure then before the house subject to certain conditions: First, that the men engaged in the mining industry were to be paid decent and sufficient wages; and second, that they were to work and live under decent and proper conditions. And I presume that I am right also in saying that it was proposed to accept the suggestion that some sixty per cent of the assistance to be granted by the government was to be used to this effect.

Well, Mr. Speaker, after what was said in 1948, it is appropriate that the house be informed for what purpose the assistance provided to the Canadian gold mines by the government under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was used.

First of all, what portion of the assistance went to pay increases in wages and salaries? In 1947, the average annual wage of a miner in a Canadian gold mine was $2,277. The corresponding figure for 1948 was $2,537, an increase of 11·4 per cent. For 1949, the average wage was $2,650, an increase of 16·4 per cent over 1947. In 1950, the average wage of a miner was $2,765, an increase of 21·3 per cent over 1947. And in 1951, the average wage was $3,013, an increase of 32·3 per cent over 1947.

During the period for which figures are available from the dominion bureau of statistics, that is from 1948 to 1951 inclusive, we find that the total increase in wages and salaries paid by the gold producers is equivalent to 99·7 per cent of the total assistance paid by the government.

That is substantially more than 60 per cent. The total assistance paid to the industry during that period amounted to $41,404,000, while the increase in wages and salaries totalled $41,281,302. During the same period the industry paid $26,666,000 in federal, provincial and municipal taxes, which alone represents 64·4 per cent of the total assistance received by the gold mines.

During that same period of four years between 1948 and 1951 the total amount of wages and salaries paid by the lode gold mining industry amounted to $254,082,000. The aggregate cost of supplies, plant, equipment, buildings and machinery amounted to $220 million. Those figures are interesting and it is most important that we take them into consideration.

While wages and supplies and freight are the principal items of costs in operating gold mines, they are by no means the only factors which contribute to increase costs of operation.

In addition account has to be taken of improved health and welfare services, increased rates of workmen's compensation, and many other items which in total amount to substantial sums.

And we must be reminded of this. The gold mining industry is the only industry which has to absorb these increases into the costs of operation without being able to pass on to consumers any portion of such increased costs.

Now as to the working and living conditions in the gold mines and in the communities. Are they as bad as some people try to make us believe they are? Are the gold producers so uninterested in the welfare of their employees as to do nothing about it? Are they trying to evade municipal and school taxes as we are being told?

The answers to those questions can be found in safety records and annual municipal reports which are available to whoever wants to look at them. If one looks at these reports he will find that the industry has done everything possible to improve health and welfare services in its operation and that it has co-operated in the best possible manner with municipal authorities to improve living conditions in the mining communities.

The mining producers across Canada are fully conscious of the importance of safe workings in the mines. They know very well that safe mines enjoy better labour relations with their employees. And in this respect the Canadian gold mines are not lagging behind, as you will be able to note from the following.

The Canada-wide contest sponsored by the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, under which the John T. Ryan trophies are awarded annually to the mine in Canada with the lowest compensable accident record, resulted in a most creditable way for the Ontario and Quebec gold mines during the last five years.

In 1948 the winner of the trophy with the best safety record of all the metal mines in Canada was the Toburn Gold Mines of the Kirkland Lake district. In 1949 the trophy was awarded to Matachewan Consolidated, another mine in Ontario. In 1950, the John T. Ryan trophy travelled across the interprovincial boundary to be awarded to Sigma Mines Limited in Val d'Or, Quebec. And in 1951 and 1952, Canadian Malartic Gold Mines Limited won the John T. Ryan award for safety. This gold mine, which is located in my home town, had not one single compensable accident during 1952. This record is probably the best in Canadian mining history. What an extraordinary record for an industry where, according to some people, working conditions are supposed to be so bad.

Mr. Speaker, our gold miners do their jobs with care and ability; they are safety conscious, and in this respect they are encouraged and seconded by those in charge of management. What I have just said should be sufficient to show that, as far as good working conditions are concerned, the gold mines and the miners are, if anything, showing the way to many other industries.

Now as regards this question of dividends which are paid quarterly, semi-annually or annually by the gold mines. What about this famous question? Is it a crime for an industry to pay a dividend? What about the shareholders? Are they to forgo the revenues which are rightly due to them? The answers to these questions are as follows.

First of all the net revenues of all the gold mines are at a very low ebb. The gold mines which did not alter their dividend rates are those which are not in receipt of cost aid. Or whatever dividends are being paid these days by most of the gold mines are taken from surplus earned from other sources than their actual operations. Others are squeezing their dividends from accumulated surplus earned during the good years before the second world war. And many other gold mines are not paying any dividends at all. How long they will be able to continue to do that, we do not know. And for how long will they be able to ask their shareholders to be patient? They certainly cannot tell them that this is the new way of operating a business.

From 1948 to 1952 inclusive, out of 27 Quebec gold mines which received assistance from the government 15 never paid any dividends. Five others paid less than $230,000 each during those five years. The six remaining gold mines paid dividends on a reduced rate and it is important to note that during that same period those six gold mines paid more than $27,000 in increased wages alone, over and above what they received in assistance from the government.

The shareholders in the Canadian gold mining industry are many thousands and the great majority of them are small shareholders. We must keep that in mind, and I will go as far as to say that the government, both in its role of tax collector and in its role of representative of the broader interests of all Canadians, has the responsibility to hang on to the gold mining industry; and hanging on means helping the shareholders, the employees, the small property owners, the farmers and the business people dependent on gold mining to hang on.

I also wish to remind hon. members that the gold mining industry, important as it is, is only one branch of the metal mining industry of this country which gives employment to some 130,000 men who in turn are the supporters of more than 500,000 people. So in trying to establish some comparison between the assistance allocated to the gold mines and that which is granted to other key industries, it would only be fair to keep those figures in mind.

The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act is plain evidence of the government's recognition of the importance of the gold mining industry in the national economy. It is the intention of the government to ensure, so far as lies in its power, the condition under which the industry may have not only continuity of operation but the possibility and hope of extensive development.

The welfare of the gold mining communities has always been regarded by the government as of very great importance. For this I wish to express my thanks. The fact that this government has definitely come forward with the present legislation is encouraging to the industry and to the residents of the gold mining communities. We are all very thankful.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say this. Let us consider this question calmly, and let us not forget that the closing down of the industry would mean the uprooting of families, the abandonment of towns which have been built at the cost of many millions of dollars and which are complete with all the facilities of modern living. There are 30 such mining communities across the country and they are providing ready and important markets for farm and lumber products, manufactured commodities and many other kinds of supplies.

This great wealth and economic activity would be jeopardized by the closing down of the gold mines, and it is up to this parliament to safeguard them. In discussing this bill we have to keep these facts in mind, and if we do I believe this legislation will meet with the approval of all hon. members.

Mrs. Ann Shipley (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in supporting this bill I believe I should first correct some of the statements made and impressions left by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) when he spoke in this house on November 20, yesterday, and again today. You will recall that he stated at that time that he was qualified to speak on this subject as he had worked at every process in gold mines from mucking to milling. It must have been a long, long time ago. It is very evident to me that he has no appreciation whatever of the seriousness of the problem facing the gold mining industry in Canada today.

The hon. member professes to be gravely concerned with the plight of the workers and the communities, but he proceeds to do as much harm as possible to the industry on which they are all, almost solely, dependent. Many of his remarks were completely unwarranted, and many were divorced from fact, as will be shown by the information I propose to place before hon. members today, and information which has already been placed on record by other speakers.

I believe it might be well if I dealt with the hon. member's statement as reported at page 485 of Hansard in which he said:

> What precautions are taken by the government to ensure that these mines are not deliberately keeping their mill heads low in order to mill their low-grade ore while the government subsidy is available, and sealing off their higher grade ore until such time as they can get a higher price for gold or a higher subsidy from this government? I have met miners in northern Ontario who told me their job has been to seal off high-grade ore whenever it was discovered and to keep it for future development, while the low-grade ore was fed to the mill and emergency gold mining assistance used in order to pay for part of the cost of that milling.

It will be noted that this hon. member and certain other people quoted in the press to the same effect have not named one single mine. However, I would ignore that statement because to those of us who are really familiar with gold mining it is a ridiculous statement, though just a little complicated to answer because the act itself is not readily understandable unless you sit down and study it.

When this statement was made I was a little amused because I immediately had a vision of men running around underground with a bucketful of cement and a trowel and covering up high-grade gold nuggets. Then I realized it is possible that people might believe such a statement. I am therefore going to answer it in such a way that I hope no one could possibly believe it again.

One of the saddest things about the gold mining industry is the fact that once you have mined in a specific area and abandon it you cannot ever go back and mine in that same area again. It is much too dangerous and in a period such as this when costs are so high, and the price of gold is so low, every day in every gold mine in Canada it is necessary to by-pass ore, or what is known as waste rock, because you cannot economically mine it, though there is a substantial amount of gold in it. If the price of gold were commensurate with our dollar today it would be good ore rather than waste rock, and since there is not too much gold in the world, it is a pity we have to lose it. However, that cannot be helped.

Mining is a very difficult engineering problem. It takes long-term planning and it is essential that a mine management arrange the digging out of the proven ore bodies underground in such a manner that they maintain a constant millhead. In other words, they endeavour to send up from underground each day the kind of ore which will have approximately, when it is all mixed together, the same amount of gold; otherwise they would have to change their solutions, and do all kinds of complicated things that would run up costs. It is not a question of grabbing it from here today and from there tomorrow. Furthermore, the act is drawn in such a manner that it would not be advantageous to leave high-grade ore and mill low-grade ore. Under the act assistance is based on two factors, the cost of production and the number of ounces produced. The cost of production for the purpose of the act is defined as "the cost incurred by the operator properly attributable to the gold produced from a mine during that particular year". The number of ounces on which the subsidy is paid is defined as the number of ounces by which the number produced from the mine and sold in the designated year exceeded one-half of the number of the ounces produced from the mine in the base year, or to one-half of the number of ounces produced and sold in the designated year, whichever is the greater.

Suppose we assume that any mine management would deliberately leave high-grade ore in the ground and mine only low-grade ore in order to run up costs and thereby receive a larger subsidy, as suggested by the hon. member. Just what would be the net result to the shareholders of the mine? The higher subsidy is based on the actual proven costs of production of an ounce of gold. It must be obvious to anyone that if you bring up two tons of rock out of the ground and treat it to obtain one ounce of gold, where formerly you brought up one ton to get one ounce of gold, then your expenses will be doubled. How could you have any net gain by receiving a slightly larger subsidy per ounce, especially when the subsidy does not begin to compensate for all of the increased costs, and is only paid on a part of the total ounces produced in any specific mine?

Let me give hon. members a concrete example of what would actually happen to a specific mine if it did what is suggested by the hon. member for York South, or if their present grade of ore petered out. I take for this example the Kirkland Lake Gold Mining Company Limited—that is one in my own community—and I use their actual experience in 1952. During this year they produced 44,828 ounces of gold. Their costs of production were $36.02 per ounce. They received approximately $177,000 in assistance. Their profit, before taxes, was approximately $125,800. What would happen if they deliberately or otherwise reduced their grade of ore by as little as 5 per cent? Their costs would be greater per ounce recovered so their assistance would increase slightly. If this had actually been the case, they would have received $6,061 more in subsidy. But do not forget the fact that the grade is decreased by 5 per cent, so they would have 2,240 fewer ounces to sell. Therefore on their total income for the year they would actually lose $70,817 by reducing the grade just by 5 per cent. In other words, their profit for the year, before taxes, would become $54,987 instead of approximately $125,000 as it actually was. This with only a 5 per cent reduction in the grade of ore.

I want to carry this idea just one step further. If the grade were reduced by 10 per cent, the cost of producing an ounce of gold would have been increased by $4 an ounce and the subsidy would have been increased by $10,000; but the company would have had a net loss of income for the year of $143,767 by reason of the 10 per cent lower grade. So instead of making approximately $125,000 profit before taxes, as they did, they would have actually been in the red by $17,963 on the year's operation.

The only object in mining is to obtain a profit from a given body of ore, and the main problem in achieving this purpose are keeping costs down and the grade up. The government officials responsible for the drafting of this act should be complimented. At first glance it appears to be complicated, but in operation it has proved to be most adequate to assure sound administration and fair distribution of the subsidy.

One of the major problems facing all but a few of the gold mines is to find enough high-grade ore in order to continue operations at all under existing circumstances.

On the same subject of subsidy paid to the industry the hon. member inferred, at page 487 of Hansard, that the mines could receive the maximum cost aid on all of the gold produced, which for 1953 was $13.50 per ounce, making a total per ounce that the mines would receive of $48.50. He cites the case of one mine—listed in this blue report from the department—which received the maximum for 1952. But he failed to mention that that was a new mine and had operated for only a portion of the year. This is provided for in the act. But all other mines receive the subsidy on only a portion of their production, as I have just explained. In other words, a mine in its first year of operation receives subsidy on its entire production for that year only; thereafter it receives subsidy on 50 per cent of its next year's production or 50 per cent of the previous year's production, whichever is the greater. This should have been known to the hon. member as he was at the time quoting from the report of the administration of the act.

One who is really interested in the subsidy paid to Canadian lode gold mines on the total ounces produced has but to read the averages published in the same report at pages 10 to 12. They are as follows:

That figure of $3.91, however, may be greater when the full returns are in. This is the average subsidy to the industry when the total gold produced by the lode mines receiving subsidy is taken into consideration. This is a completely different picture from that inferred by the hon. member for York South.

During this five-year period the gold mines suffered a loss of approximately $4.23 per ounce of gold produced, by reason of the appreciation in the Canadian dollar over the United States dollar. The costs of production still kept mounting during this period but the average subsidy paid per ounce did not even offset the drop in the price of the finished product.

It is of interest to note that there were only two new mines in all Canada in 1952 in receipt of subsidy, as shown in the report of the administration of the act. There were none in 1953. If the mines were "making a killing" as a union officer was quoted in the press as saying the other day, or if the statements made by the hon. member for York South have any logic, how do they account for the many mines that have been forced to close, or for the fact that there are no new gold mines being opened for the first time in many years?

In an effort to prove that this is not a depressed industry, as reported at page 487 of Hansard, the hon. member for York South refers to the profits paid by two mines out of all those in Canada, one of them being McIntyre, when it is well known that only a portion of their profits is earned from the current gold mining operation. As to the other one, Broulan Reef, he states specifically that this is one of the mines which received cost aid in 1952—and if I am not mistaken he stated that twice—and yet made a large profit. This is just not so. They did not receive one cent of cost aid in 1952. They are one of the lucky mines that ran into extremely high-grade ore and they were selling on the premium market, so-called, in 1952.

Citing the number of dollars profit made by any particular mine means little unless accompanied by the number of tons mined daily, the number of men employed, the number of shareholders and the amount of stock issued and, finally, the number of years that the mine had to operate before it showed any profit at all. As an example, one of the mines in my community operated for many years—I think it was almost 20—before it was in a position to make any profit whatever.

The other day I quoted some figures that bear repeating. An analysis of the gold mining industry in Ontario from 1941 to 1951 shows that 35 per cent have discontinued operations; 74 per cent of the profits of the industry have been wiped out; 40 per cent fewer men are employed. The picture would be worse today. In the face of these facts, how can anyone say that this is not a depressed industry?

Again, the decline of the industry, in spite of cost aid, is shown very clearly in the report of the administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. In 1948 there were 87 lode gold mines in receipt of cost aid; in 1952 there were only 56. There were 13 selling on the "premium market" in 1952 and one that had not filed a statement at the time the report was published, making 17 lode gold mines closed during this five-year period.

As a further item bearing on this point, I quote from a statistical summary of the Bank of Canada showing the net operating profits of a representative group of Canadian gold mines. They picked out the group; I did not. In 1940 the profits were $58·4 million. In 1950, ten years later, the profits were $18·5 million. Of course, in 1950 they were in receipt of cost aid.

From the Canadian Metal Mining Association I also have some figures showing the estimated handicap per ounce incurred by Ontario lode gold mines during the periods shown, and this excludes any increase in tax rates which have doubled since 1939. From 1939 to September 1952, increase in operating costs per ounce, $11.93; reduction in price received for gold, $4.90; estimated total handicap without increase in taxes, $16.83.

These are but some of the actual facts that prompted the government to introduce the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. The hon. member also made statements with respect to wages and the use of the subsidy. I must read hon. members what he said, as found at page 485 of Hansard of November 30. He said:

> I am merely pointing out that if the government finds it necessary to subsidize the gold mines, then some measure must be taken to see that this benefit from the public treasury goes to the miners and the community, and is not all siphoned off in profits for shareholders and speculative stock buyers.

Again, he said, as found at page 487:

> There has been no increase in wages in gold mining in Ontario and Quebec since 1951.

He also said:

> Are we as custodians of the taxpayers' interests to stand idly by, or to sit idly by, while gold mine operators pass on all the cost aid they can possibly extract from this government to profits, with cold-blooded, calculated indifference alike to miners and mining communities? I suggest that the basis on which cost aid is given be reviewed in order to make certain that miners as well as mine owners benefit from these federal subsidies.

The Labour Gazette shows that the annual average wages in Canadian gold mines were as follows: 1950, $2,765; 1951, $2,992 and 1952, $3,107. Ontario and Quebec between them produced 89 per cent of the total gold produced in Canada. Therefore I think it is conclusive from the figures that some increases must have been paid since 1951. But the following figures apply to Ontario alone and show that the statement with respect to no increase in Ontario is absolutely wrong. Furthermore, they prove conclusively that the statements made by hon. member for York South with respect to the subsidy being used to increase profits and none of it being used to increase the wages of the workers are entirely without foundation in fact—quite the contrary.

I should like to refer first to the Northern Miner and figures covering eleven mines in the Porcupine area. They show that during the period January 1, 1948, when the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act came into being, to the end of December, 1952, these eleven mines in the Porcupine area received almost $11½ million in subsidy. But note this. For a slightly longer period, from January 1, 1948, into 1953 the amount paid out by these mines in increased wages was $16,365,000. Almost $5 million more was paid out in increased wages by these eleven mines in the Porcupine area. It is true that the $5 million does include the increase paid in 1953, but that did not amount to $5 million.

I have other figures that are better in that they cover the exact period. I have figures covering three mines in the Porcupine area, Dome, Delnite and Preston East Dome, for the identical period from January 1, 1948, to December 31, 1952. They received $3,425,205 in cost aid and paid out in wage increases during the same period $4,514,085. In other words, they paid out $1,088,000 more than the total subsidy they received. For my own camp, the Kirkland camp, I have figures for every single one of the mines still operating. Unfortunately several of them have had to close down. I have figures for Macassa, Kirkland Lake Gold, Sylvanite, Lake Shore, Wright-Hargreaves and Teck-Hughes. I can give individual figures if desired but otherwise I will give totals.

They received $3,471,759 in subsidies during those five years and paid out in wage increases during the same period $5,370,876, $1,899,000 more than they received in total subsidies. Of course where there were profits—and there is no point in a mine staying in business if there are no profits—they would not even receive the total subsidy because they have to pay taxes on it. I have given total figures and not what individual miners received. It cannot be said there were more men employed and therefore these millions I have told you about that were paid out in excess of the subsidies are accounted for because there were more men. The reverse is true. There were fewer men. The Ontario department of mines shows in a report that in 1941 there were 19,500 men employed in the gold mines of Ontario and that in 1952 there were 11,800 men employed. In other words, there were 7,700 fewer men in Ontario alone. Yet the hon. member says there is no depression in the industry.

Let me say one more word about wages. At the time the price of $35 per ounce was established it was adequate for the sound development of the mines and to pay top wages. The following figures are taken from the annual review of employment and payrolls, dominion bureau of statistics. Just yesterday the same hon. member said, as recorded at page 3033 of Hansard:

> But never at any time in the history of gold mining in this country have those who actually mine and mill the gold received their fair share of the wealth produced from the mines.

Mr. Noseworthy: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Shipley: These figures show the average weekly earnings in gold mining and certain heavy manufacturing industries in 1939 and 1952. The other industries are iron and steel products, transportation equipment, non-ferrous metal products and electrical apparatus and supplies. In 1939 the gold mines of Canada paid $34.10 per week on the average. That is $6.86 a week more than the highest paid in any of the other four heavy industries referred to in the bureau of statistics report. That is why I say that when we did receive an adequate price top wages were paid. In 1952—I think this is very significant—we find that the gold mines of Canada paid an average wage per week of $63.21, but we find that only one other heavy industry in the list paid any more. The non-ferrous metal products industry paid an average of $63.88 but the others paid less. Electrical apparatus and supplies paid $60.86. They have no difficulty with respect to the price of their finished products, nor do any of the others.

On the one hand the hon. member for York South claims that the gold mining industry is making enormous profits by reason of the subsidy, and on the other hand that they are leaving their high-grade ore in the ground. This just does not make sense, particularly when the increased wages alone since the act came into being have cost most of the mines more than the total subsidy each mine received. Such statements as those made by the hon. member for York South create a false impression and do not contribute to a full and sympathetic understanding of the problems of the gold mining industry and the thousands of Canadian pioneers and the communities almost solely dependent thereon, for whom he expresses such concern.

It is not generally understood that almost all gold mining municipalities would not exist if it were not for the mines. We cannot attract secondary industries for a variety of reasons, leaving us almost solely dependent on the one industry. These mining communities were literally hewn from the forest and rock. Our mortgages on our homes, if we can get them, and our municipal debentures are all for a shorter period because of the nature of our industry, and in the early days rates were very much higher than elsewhere in the country.

In a gold mining community the costs of sanitary facilities are excessive because we live in a cold climate. My own community, for instance, is built on solid rock, and you all know the cost of excavating rock as compared with soil. The cost of our fuel is greater up there. We are a very young part of the country, and in 1939 the birth rate at Kirkland Lake was the highest in Canada. This made it necessary for us to build schools every year, and you all know the cost of that. We were paying for everything at once. Our communities are very young, and we have to pay for schools, churches, sanitary facilities and so on, all at once and in a shorter period of time.

These things we accept as part of our way of life. You never hear us complain about them. We built these communities, and almost everything most of us own is invested there, our homes and our businesses. The owners of the mines are not a handful of wealthy men as some would lead us to believe. They comprise thousands of small investors, the miner himself, the butcher, the baker, the housewife and no doubt even some members of parliament. During the war our experienced gold miners enlisted in great numbers. Some were required in the base metal mines to increase the production of strategic metals. Our women continually produced more materials for the Red Cross than any other group in Canada.

Those things we did gladly, but what of today? What does the future hold? There is no simple answer to our problem except a much higher world price for our gold. This solution is beyond the control of any one country or government. If it is feasible, and in the national interest, I know this government will press strongly for such a solution. Canada has done much to keep the gold mining industry alive through the establishment of emergency gold mining assistance. By the terms of the bill now before us, the government proposes to continue that assistance for another year. If disaster is not to overtake our gold mining communities from one side of Canada to the other, adequate assistance must be given. What "adequate assistance" means can only be determined by a factual analysis of the operating costs. In the meantime, the passing of this bill will tide us over.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have listened with considerable interest, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) in her attempt, shall I say, to steal the halo from the head of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) and put it on the head of the mining operators of this country. I was not able to follow the bewildering array of statistics that she paraded before this corner of the house, but I should like to point out one fact in defence of the hon. member for York South. I am quite sure he is able to take care of himself, but she mentioned a statement he made that the workers in the gold mining industry had never, at any time, received a fair share of the wealth they produce. She made certain comparisons with certain other industries. All I would say is that, so far as I can recall, the hon. member for York South did not say he considered the workers in these other industries had received their fair share of the wealth they had produced, either. Perhaps in inferring that he was suggesting the operators of gold mines were, to a greater degree, more greedy than the operators of some of our other industries, she was creating a slightly erroneous impression.

I was somewhat interested in her earlier remarks when she spoke of someone going around with a trowel and sealing off certain sections of the mine. Speaking as one old miner to another, I would suggest that there were one or two things she may have overlooked in her consideration of this particular aspect of the matter. Apparently she has never heard of the idea of blocking off reserves of ore or of a diamond drilling program which may serve to indicate where certain sources of rich ores may lie.

Mrs. Shipley: I am sorry, I did not say that.

Mr. Barnett: That is just the point, Mr. Speaker, I said that was what she did not say. Perhaps the miners in Ontario are not as wise as the miners of British Columbia in certain mining techniques. To illustrate what I mean, I recall that back in the 1930's a certain large mine in British Columbia, which is known primarily as a producer of copper, found itself in a position where for a period of two years they were not able to sell a pound of copper. I am speaking only from memory now. This mine continued to operate on a somewhat reduced scale all during that period. They managed to do that because of the superior mining technique that we have in British Columbia.

They knew that in certain areas of that mine there were ores that had a considerable gold content. They concentrated their mining in those particular areas, and paid their operating costs out of the gold that was normally a minor incidental to their production. However, I am not going to attempt to go into a detailed analysis, as I said, of that array of statistics that was given to us.

I was quite interested in the remarks that were made by the member who spoke before the hon. member for Timiskaming. He gave us an interesting outline of some of the economic factors that exist today in the gold mining industry. As I sat listening to these two speakers, the main point that struck me was that they were on the horns of a dilemma. Since coming to this house I have all too often seen the members on that side in a similar dilemma. They are the victims of the sort of patchwork policy the present administration seems to be content to pursue in dealing with the various economic problems that arise in this country.

In referring to that, I would suggest that there is a limit to the number of patches you can put on anything. When you start putting patches on the patches, and then patches on the patches on the patches, you begin to get a sort of Joseph's coat of government policy such as we see developing now. This bill, like some of the other bills that have come before us in the short time I have been here, illustrates to me the dilemma in which the government is. Incidentally, of course, the members in the small opposition groups are in a dilemma also. If we do not support this measure, it is said, the gold miners are going to go hungry, and that is quite true. For that reason, we cannot do anything else but go along with this idea that assistance to the gold mines, under existing circumstances, is necessary. Sometimes when you listen to the array of statistics showing the moneys granted over a period of years you begin to ask yourself, how long is this going to continue? Are we going to extend this thing next year and the following year—for the next fifty years—or are we not? Why do we keep the gold mining industry operating in Canada, if it has to be subsidized? Those are questions that any thoughtful member must ask himself when a bill of this kind comes before the house.

I have to admit that some of my interest in and knowledge of the gold mining industry dates from the period referred to as the great depression; and I have wondered if possibly the government is continuing this measure, for the support of the gold mines, as a form of depression insurance. Because many of us can recall that in the days of the great depression there was one small sector of our economy in which there was no depression; and that was the gold mining industry: there was a boom there. Everyone connected with gold mining was prosperous, relatively speaking. The only difficulty was that perhaps only one in a hundred of the people who would have liked to get in on the gold mining industry were able to do so.

I have come to this point because, as I say, this is another example of the dilemma we find ourselves in. We had one not so long ago when we were discussing a measure concerning anti-dumping provisions for the protection of certain other industries in Canada. Then, reference was made recently to the dilemma in which the coal mining areas of the maritime provinces find themselves today. I felt that in view of all these facts it would be worth while for me to rise in the debate and once again draw attention to the point I brought out during the debate on unemployment.

As reported at page 2386 of Hansard for February 23, I said:

> I suggest it is time to do something more than review our unemployment insurance plan. It is time for the government . . . to launch a new insurance plan, one which I would call re-establishment insurance. This plan would cover those people the Acting Prime Minister has advised to go elsewhere to seek work. It would insure them against the loss of their homes, and against having to walk away and simply leave behind everything they have accumulated over a period of years. It would be a plan which would cover retraining these people in another industry.

I mention this because, if such a comprehensive plan were in existence, we might be able to view the present measure in an altogether different light. Under those circumstances we could proceed intelligently with an inquiry into the gold mining industry, as was suggested yesterday by the hon. member for York South. We could analyse the situation impartially, to ascertain whether the continuance of this industry for the next fifty years, under the present uneconomic conditions, would be warranted and in the national interest. We could decide whether we really need gold in our modern economy.

But because I know, as every other member knows, that if this measure is not passed the lives of thousands of people—I believe the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) gave the figure of 500,000 people—will be disrupted, and that many would suffer complete economic disaster, we have to continue to go along with this kind of patchwork measure.

When we think of this industry, and then think of the textile industry, and the possibility of the same sort of thing developing in other industries, the necessity for some well-thought-out plan to take care of this situation becomes more and more apparent. That, Mr. Speaker, is my primary reason for taking part in this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the minister speaks he will close the debate.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I rise now especially to thank those who have indicated their support of the bill, and would refer particularly to the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) for the wealth of information they have given the house this afternoon. I should like also to deal with a few statements made and questions asked by various members.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and others have suggested that a commission should be appointed to make an inquiry into the gold mining industry. I would remind hon. members that this parliament has no direct jurisdiction over the development of our natural resources. That comes within the constitutional rights of the provinces. They have the control of the administration and the development of resources within their own boundaries, and also labour regulations and the conditions obtaining within their jurisdictions.

I believe in all of the provinces facilities are available for collective bargaining. Any group of employees or any union has the privilege of entering into collective bargaining arrangements with management, and thus reach mutually satisfactory agreements. The suggestion has been made that we should look ahead as far as fifty years. I do not think that is a reasonable suggestion. Indeed, I am sure it is not, when one considers that the actual development of our resources does not date back much more than fifty years. I believe any policy adopted by the government and parliament has to be flexible enough to meet changing conditions.

We think we have seen development in Canada in the last few years; in my opinion we have not seen anything yet. This country is just starting to move. Conditions as we know them today will be entirely different next year or the year after. I know my friends of the C.C.F. are dedicated to the socialization of our resources. But the people of Canada are not; otherwise we would have more C.C.F.'ers here.

Mr. Fleming: Heaven forbid.

Mr. Prudham: The suggestion has been made that some mining companies are blocking off large sections of high-grade ore in order to cash in on gold mining assistance. The hon. member for Timiskaming answered that quite effectively; but I have some figures that I think answer conclusively. I have before me the average grade of ore milled by gold mines in Canada since 1942. The average grade of ore mined by all gold mines in Canada was as follows:

1943	·240
1944	·230
1945	·230
1946	·230
1947	·240
1948	·230
1949	·230

The figure for 1951 is the latest we have. There is clearly only slight variation in the grade of ore milled by gold mines in Canada in those years. My hon. friend mentioned Hollinger gold mines, and in that case the average grade of ore mined by Hollinger in 1942 contained .252 ounces of gold per ton, while the figure for 1952 was .282 ounces. The average for the period was ·249 ounces. The average production of gold per ton has increased at that mine. I have the figures for other mines which I can give during the committee stage.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) referred to the number of people who would be disrupted if the gold mines were to go out of business. The hon. member for York South suggested that there would be hundreds of thousands and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni mentioned 500,000. Actually there are between 21,000 and 22,000—

Mr. Barnett: I was quoting a figure suggested by another hon. member.

Mr. Prudham: The actual number of people working in the mines is somewhere between 21,000 and 22,000, but of course there would be their families and their communities dependent upon them. I admit that it would be a disaster if the gold mines had to close, but I question whether there would be actually hundreds of thousands of people directly involved in any such disaster.

The hon. member for York South suggested that two mines received a large proportion of the gold mining assistance paid. Two mines received approximately $1,300,000 of the $10,359,053.90, or about 12.5 per cent of the total amount paid. However, they produced 511,670 ounces out of a total of 2,638,032 ounces, or about 19 per cent of the gold produced during that period.

As I said in my remarks the other day, the gold mining industry as a whole, including labour and management, has responded to the challenge. Their costs of production have been reduced progressively since the war and in my opinion they have done a good job in helping themselves. As I have said before in this house, when an industry shows that it is doing everything to help itself, that is a good reason why the government should consider extending aid over a difficult period. I have told the coal miners that and I believe the same rule applies to the gold mines. When they show that they have gone all-out to help themselves, I think there is justification for government aid in an emergency.

This is not a patchwork policy, as the last speaker has suggested. As the title of the act implies, this aid is to meet an emergency which we hope will be of short duration. The chief reason for extending emergency gold mining assistance last year and this year was and is to compensate to some extent for the loss to the mine because of the appreciation of the value of the Canadian dollar in terms of United States funds. That situation fluctuates from time to time and we do not know how long our dollar will remain in that favourable position. If it should change there would be less need for aid to the gold mines.

The hon. member for York South asked whether the mines are making excessive profits. I think the fact that 40 mines have closed since the beginning of emergency gold mining assistance with only 27 new mines being opened—some 13 of those new mines have since closed—is pretty good evidence that no excessive profits are being made.

I believe that many people overlook the fact that the development of our mining resources is a co-operative effort. It requires the co-operation of a number of groups of people. One group that is often overlooked is the investors. The mining industry at best is a depleting industry. When you remove ore from the ground it will never be replaced. If we are to develop our mining industry we must attract risk capital by showing a reasonable chance to make a profit. When the flow of risk capital dries up, your industry dies just as surely as if the men stopped working. With all the mines closing last year—there were 6 gold mines closed with no new ones being opened—I think that is the best evidence that excessive profits are not being made.

I should like to answer a query by the hon. member for York South about the formula used as reported in a sessional paper in regard to the Hollinger mine. Even for the experts this gold mining assistance formula is not simple in operation and I do not wonder that my hon. friend is confused. I have had difficulty in following it in particular instances. The explanation I have for the point which he mentioned is that to get the calculation for the assistance payable per ounce of gold produced a mine is considered as being in operation during the whole year. The same result would be obtained by prorating the base year for a similar period for which operations were not suspended and using the actual production. The method of calculation is set out in the regulations and I want to assure my hon. friend once again that it gives no advantage to a mine during a period of a strike.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Application of act to 1951, 1952, 1953 and 1954.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, before we pass clause 1 I would like to say a few words. I regret very much the minister has taken the position that because the federal government has no jurisdiction over natural resources he does not choose to consider the setting up of a committee or commission to study the gold mining industry. I had hoped that, in view of the fact that the government of Canada was involved to the extent of well over $10 million per year in the form of subsidies, that would give the government an interest in such an inquiry. In fact, I believe such an inquiry would be beneficial both to the industry and to the miners and the mine owners.

That is evidenced by the honest difference of opinion regarding the status of the gold mining industry at the present time. I am quite sure that the hon. member for Timiskaming is just as honest and serious in her views regarding the status of the gold mines as I am in mine. The difference of opinion which exists between us is not only reflected in this house but is to be found between employees and employers and their respective organizations. It is to be found as between the chairmen of conciliation boards and representatives of the miners and mine owners.

But I am confident that if the premier of Ontario carries out, as I hope he will, his agreement with the steel workers union to establish a provincial committee on a very high level for the purpose of undertaking a thorough factual investigation of the gold mining industry, and if he will invite federal representation on that committee, and the federal government agrees to be represented there, nothing but good can result from such an investigation.

I was, of course, very interested in some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Timiskaming and I would like to congratulate her on the fighting attitude which she has adopted in the interests of those who sent her to parliament. I am quite sure her efforts will be appreciated by her supporters. I would simply say to her that I would be very happy at any time to set forth my point of view compared with hers at a public meeting in her own home town of Kirkland Lake any time she chooses to arrange such a meeting. I will be quite happy to allow the miners of that town to decide which point of view is correct.

Mr. Fleming: It sounds like suicide.

Mr. Noseworthy: I was, of course, amused by her statement that miners did not go around with trowels covering up gold nuggets here and there. I had hoped that the hon. member for Timiskaming was much more conversant with mining operations, and knew that gold from northern Ontario is not dug out in nuggets, but is saturated through tons of ore brought into the mill. Permit me to inform her that I doubt if there is very much about gold mining she can teach me. There is no process in gold mining operations, from mucking underground to refining, in which I have not participated at some time, so that I know something of what can be done by way of sealing off high-grade ore bodies when that becomes advantageous.

Mrs. Shipley: Would the hon. member permit a question? I wonder if he would mind stating when he last worked in a gold mine?

Mr. Noseworthy: Quite frankly, Mr. Chairman, miners who are engaged in this kind of work and doing diamond drilling in the mines informed me no later than a few months ago that some mines at least are sealing off high-grade ore.

Mrs. Shipley: That does not answer my question.

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Noseworthy: I am not saying—

Mrs. Shipley: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but the hon. member is not answering my question.

Mr. Noseworthy: I am not going to give the hon. member the names of the individual miners—

Mrs. Shipley: My question was, how long ago did you work in a mine?

Mr. Noseworthy: It was some time ago, Mr. Chairman.

Mrs. Shipley: But how long ago?

Mr. Noseworthy: I have visited these mines regularly—

Mrs. Shipley: How long ago did you work in a mine?

Mr. Prudham: The hon. member has the protection of the House of Commons and I would ask him to name one mine which does as he suggests. I do not suppose he would dare to do so outside the house.

Mr. Noseworthy: I do not care to give the names of the individual miners who gave me that information. The minister, for example, must know that McIntyre has reserves today which are probably of a higher grade and more extensive than this mine has ever had over the years.

Mr. Prudham: Would the hon. member like to have the assay figures of the ore they have milled over the years?

Mr. Noseworthy: I am simply asking the minister to make certain that mines are not running undue quantities of low-grade ore through their mills—

Mr. Prudham: You said they were.

Mr. Noseworthy: —and salting it down with a small percentage of high-grade ore in order to mill much of their ore, which would otherwise be uneconomic, because of this subsidy. I am simply asking the minister and his department to make quite certain that is not being done. I realize there is always a question of just what policy will be in the best interests of the future life of the mine, and the future interests of the country, and just to what extent mines should be encouraged to continue uneconomic production. However, these are matters which, I suggest, a commission of investigation should be able to determine.

I am not surprised that mines pay more out in wages than they receive in subsidy, but I do not think it was ever the intention of the government that the subsidies they pay should cover the whole cost of wages. Nor am I surprised that there has been an increase in wages since 1947. Miners' wages were pretty low at the end of the war. Gold mining wages were fairly low at the end of the war. The fact still remains that, according to the dominion bureau of statistics, the average annual wage of gold miners in Canada was $1,343 as of June 1, 1953. The average annual wage of base metal miners across Canada on that same date, according to the dominion bureau of statistics, was $1,701. Therefore, notwithstanding any increases and notwithstanding subsidies, up until last June the gold miners were still far behind base metal miners in the matter of wages received. If gold mining is not profitable and if the mines cannot afford to pay to miners wages that are equivalent to those paid in, let us say, base metal mining or comparable industry, then the responsibility for making up that deficit must of necessity, I think, fall upon the country at large and not upon a particular group of employees.

If what the mine owners say is true and if the present subsidies are not large enough to enable them to pay to gold miners wages equivalent to those paid in base metal mining, it is possible that the subsidy should be increased. I do not know. But certainly if the mine owners' claims are true and if they cannot afford to pay the people in the gold mining industry as well as miners in the base metal industry are paid, then something should be done to make that possible. It is not fair to ask these miners to bear the loss incurred by the fact that the mine operators are operating an industry where the costs continue to rise and where the price of their product is fixed by governments. I am not quarrelling with the act or with the necessity for it. What I am asking is that there should be a thorough investigation of this industry. If these subsidies are not large enough, they should be increased. Certainly the miners should not be left in the position they are in today.

I am happy to hear the hon. member for Timiskaming defending the mine owners for their communities' support. I have heard municipal authorities complain that these gold mines were not bearing their share of municipal taxation. I am quite sure that it will be encouraging to know that the hon. member for Timiskaming, who has a great wealth of experience in municipal affairs, views their support with such a high degree of admiration.

In view of the very fact that under this act, the minister tells us, forty mines have been forced to close and so few mines have come into operation, and the fact that, of necessity, under the present act the larger producers of gold are getting the larger share of the subsidy, is it not worth considering whether or not this act is doing the job that it was intended to do, namely, that of helping some of the smaller mines? Is it rendering to the smaller mines—those that are operating at high cost—the assistance that it was originally intended it should render? Those are questions that I think we should consider. I greatly regret that the minister undertakes to shelve the whole matter by accepting the excuse that the federal government has no jurisdiction over natural resources.

Mr. Fulton: I just wanted to ask the minister a couple of questions. I do not want to interrupt the train of argument. If the minister wants to reply now, I can wait.

Mr. Prudham: I should like to finish the matter and to answer now.

Mr. Fulton: Go ahead.

Mr. Prudham: The hon. member for York South still seems to insist that some of the mines are probably withholding high-grade ores, hoping to cash in on the emergency gold mining assistance. He suggested that perhaps we should look at McIntyre. I happen to have here the figures showing the average grade of ore milled at McIntyre mine from 1935 to 1953. The figures are as follows:

Year	Ounces of Gold per ton
1936	·280
1937	·286
1939	·287

These grades were during the years when the price of gold was quite favourable.

Year	Ounces of Gold per ton
1941	·291
1942	·289
1943	·294
1944	·302
1945	·305
1946	·292
1947	·297
1948	·314
1949	·297
1950	·289

And for the first nine months of last year the same recovery per ton was shown, namely ·280. The average for the whole period was ·290. If the grade had been increased last year to ·290, McIntyre mines would receive $12,079.02 less in emergency gold mining assistance. An increase in production of 5,588 ounces of gold would have been valued at $195,582.83; that is at $35 an ounce. If, on the other hand, the grade had been lowered by ·01 ounce per ton, McIntyre mines would receive $9,634.06 more in assistance. The decrease, however, would represent a decrease from sales of gold of $206,280.16.

This shows very clearly that it would be unprofitable to lower the grade of ore unless it was necessary to do so on account of conditions in the mine. You just cannot win by low grading or hoping to collect on the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. As the grade of ore decreases the number of ounces decreases. You have the two factors, the rate of assistance applied to the number of eligible ounces. It is not possible to beat this provision. I hope the figures I have taken the time to put on the record will prove conclusively to my hon. friend that this is so. In so far as we can tell—and we are very confident—no one could beat the act, even if they wanted to, and we are confident on the basis of our inspection services that nobody is trying to.

Mr. Noseworthy: I want to thank the minister for putting these figures on the record. I am quite sure they will help to clarify a situation about which there is a great deal of dispute.

Mr. Adamson: I want to say something in answer to the same argument because I think it must be dealt with now. First of all may I say, in the somewhat more robust language of the north, that the hon. member for Timiskaming made a damn fine speech this afternoon. McIntyre mine has been referred to. I have been underground in McIntyre many times. Some years ago McIntyre discovered what is known as the twenty-five vein system. It is to the north of the property. It is a nearly vertical vein structure of quite high grade. It runs about an ounce per ton which is about four times the average grade at the mine.

As the hon. member for Timiskaming said, the ideal is to have a mill feed of constant grade running to the mill. The situation at McIntyre is that in the old Pearl lake porphyry area and the other older parts of the mine the grade may run from ·15 to ·2, perhaps even less than ·15. This ore is mixed with a proportion from the twenty-five vein system area to bring the average grade up to what the minister said, about ·29 ounces per ton.

So far as increased costs are concerned, let me take the case of Kerr-Addison. At the present time Kerr-Addison is probably the greatest gold mine in Canada and North America. Quite conceivably it may become the greatest gold mine in the world. It has a wonderful deposit of ore. Years ago before the war they cut off mining or hoisting or breaking ore when they got below ·06 ounces per ton. As costs rose they stopped breaking at ·07 and as they rose further at ·08, ·09 until now I believe any rock containing less than one-tenth of an ounce is considered waste rock.

The quantity of ore between ·06 ounces per ton and ·1 ounces per ton runs to many hundreds of thousands of tons, and many thousands of dollars' worth of gold is lost to Canada and to the national wealth of the country for all time. That is an example of what increased costs are doing so far as the destruction of our national wealth is concerned.

With regard to the question of sealing off, in one, maybe two, and possibly three cases that I know of an extremely high grade section was discovered and sealed off. I think the highest grade section was discovered some years ago at the O'Brien mine in the Cadillac area. I have forgotten what it ran, but it was 20, 30 or perhaps even 50 ounces per ton over a very short distance and a very small ore chute. I am not sure how big it was but I saw the ore in place and it was just like looking at the national mint. It was a very beautiful sight. But it was a very small occurrence and to safeguard that very high grade deposit the stope was barred and locked to prevent high grading. That was some years ago.

There may have been one or two other cases. Siscoe had some high grade and there may have been other cases where, a small chute of tremendously high grade ore having been discovered, it was wired off for a temporary period simply and solely to prevent high grading until such time as the ore could be mined. Incidentally, that was a long time before the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act came into force and had nothing to do with sealing off high grade ore in order to mine low grade ore. What the hon. member for Timiskaming has said is absolutely correct. It is nothing short of ridiculous to think that any mine would seal off high grade today.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister a couple of questions. Before doing so, I should like to say that along with my colleagues I support entirely the continuation of this act for another year. However, in view of comments which I read in the press this morning I should like to ask the minister to clear up one matter. As I understood those comments, they certainly gave rise to the suggestion at any rate that the minister had said that the government would only continue this assistance for one year, and it was represented that it was almost their intention to discontinue it after a further year. On referring to page 3030 of Hansard of March 16 I find the minister said:

> In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say that in presenting this resolution for an extension of assistance for the year 1954 it is the government's hope that this extension will enable the gold mines to continue their operations so that eventually they may be able to carry on without this emergency assistance. It has always been the government's intention that this assistance should be only of a temporary nature.

As I read that statement, it is quite different from the conclusion I formed after reading the press comment this morning, and I should like the minister to clear up the matter for me. While appreciating the desire, which I think we all share, that as soon as possible the gold mining industry may be restored to a healthy state so that this assistance will not be necessary, is it a fact that the government has not placed any time limit on the period for which they are prepared to continue the assistance but are merely hoping they will be able to discontinue it as soon as possible?

Mr. Prudham: I stated the government's case quite clearly yesterday, as my hon. friend indicated when he read from Hansard. We are asking for an extension of this act to the end of this year only. We hope it is the last time it will be necessary to extend it. However, as has been the case ever since 1948, we expect to review the situation at the end of the year. I am not holding out any hope it will be extended another year. I certainly hope it will not be necessary.

Mr. Fulton: No more significance should be attached to the fact that it is only continued for one year on this occasion than to the fact that previous extensions have also been one-year extensions. Would that be a correct statement?

Mr. Prudham: It is up to my hon. friend as to what he infers from what I have said. When the original bill and the extensions have been before the house, we have always said that the measure was designed to meet an emergency. When that emergency is over, there will be no more need for this assistance.

Mr. Fulton: There is another point about which I should like to ask the minister. Is it a fact that under this legislation there is no compensation to the mines for the fact that the price of their product has decreased?

Mr. Prudham: Well, Mr. Chairman, that is the purpose of this bill, to compensate the mines for the fixed price which they receive for their products.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry I did not make my question clear. There is no additional compensation under the legislation now being continued to take care of the fact that the price of gold has decreased within the last year. The hon. member for York West and the minister both placed on Hansard last night the price of gold during the current year, which appears to be $33.79 per ounce as of March 6. This represents a decline over the last year or two as a result of the increase in the value of the Canadian dollar in terms of the United States dollar. I am asking for confirmation of the fact that there is no increased measure of assistance now being offered to make up for the fact that within the last twelve months there has been a further decline in the price of gold.

Mr. Prudham: Two years ago there was an amendment to the act to provide additional assistance. The need for the additional assistance at that time was brought about by a decline in the price of gold. It depends upon how a mine owner likes to assess his problem, whether he thinks the price of gold is too low or his costs are too high. This assistance is designed to assist the mines.

Mr. Fulton: I think we are getting at the point now. The minister says the amendment was introduced two years ago. Is it not a fact that the price of the Canadian dollar, in terms of the United States dollar, has increased further since that amendment was made two years ago?

Mr. Prudham: The average mint price in terms of Canadian dollars was, in 1942 to 1945, $38.50; in 1946, $36.75; in 1947-48, $35; in 1949, $36; in 1950, $38.05; 1951, $36.85. On February 20 of this year it was $33.81 and on March 6 last it was $33.79. The price has been fluctuating. It is down from 1951, but we have increased the assistance since that time.

Mr. Fulton: The assistance was increased in 1952, and the figures the minister has placed on the record indicate there has been a further decline from 1952 to the present time. He did not put on the record the figures for 1952. In 1951, the price was $36.85. I think it is fair to point out that there has been an increase in the price of the Canadian dollar since that amendment two years ago, which would produce a corresponding decrease in the price of gold to the Canadian producer.

The reason I wanted to make that point was that it seemed to me the government should perhaps contemplate some further measure of assistance to take care of the continuing decrease in the price of Canadian gold. Two years ago I did not hear anyone seriously suggest that the measure of assistance being provided, even under the amendment, was overly generous. I think the government's attitude has been to provide sufficient assistance to enable the mines to continue in operation. If two years ago the assistance then provided was no more than enough to enable them to continue in operation, and the price of gold to the Canadian producer has declined since, does it not follow the government should be revising the scale of assistance? I think it does. I should like to know from the minister what representations have been made on that point, and what consideration, if any, has been given to it?

Mr. Prudham: We do not propose any increase for this year.

Mr. Fulton: In conclusion, I should like to lay before the minister the suggestion that if the gold mines and those engaged in the gold mining industry are to be enabled to carry on on a comparable standard with the rest of the people, and particularly with those engaged in other forms of mining activity, then it seems to me we should be making some adjustment in the scale of assistance to compensate for the further decline in the price of gold since the last adjustment was made. I strongly urge the minister and his department to undertake a review in that connection, to see if they would not agree with me as to the necessity for an adjustment.

I have in mind the two quite large gold mines in my own constituency, the Pioneer and Bralorne mines. They are, as most mines are, in remote areas. There is no other town except the mine, and there are no other facilities there. They are purely mining towns. The cost of everything the people living there have to buy is high because it is a small community and supplies must be trucked in over some 47 miles of extremely mountainous road. These men are faced with the impossibility of any adjustment in their wage rates as a result of the limits on the assistance provided, and yet they are faced with a cost of living much higher than in most other communities in the country.

If two years ago the assistance was no more than enough to enable the mines to continue in operation, and the price of gold has declined since but the assistance has not increased, then it seems to me that forms a strong argument in favour of a review so that those engaged in the gold mining industry can maintain a standard comparable with those in other forms of activity.

Mr. Fleming: I heard with considerable interest the minister's statement a moment ago, that he looked forward to the possibility that it might not be necessary a year hence to continue this form of assistance to the gold mining industry. On what grounds does he base that hope?

Mr. Prudham: Well, Mr. Chairman, as I said in my opening remarks on the resolution, the industry has responded to the challenge, it has decreased its cost of producing an ounce of gold, and has produced more per man-day. To a large extent that has been brought about by improved methods and increased mechanization. I do not think even the mines themselves would suggest that they have done everything or that there is no room for improvement, as new techniques develop. I think that is the way the problem should be solved, rather than by increasing the government subsidy every time there is increased disparity between costs and sale price.

Mr. Fleming: I was hoping the minister would say something about the other factor which, I suggest, is much more important than either of the factors he mentioned. I refer to the price of gold. Has the minister any grounds for hoping that within the next year we may look for an increase in the price of gold?

Mr. Prudham: I have no grounds for that hope. I am satisfied this government is doing everything possible to influence an increase in the price of gold. The hon. member for York West suggested that we should lead the world by increasing the price. Well, I do not believe anyone who gives the matter serious consideration would advocate that we increase the price of gold to, let us say, $50, and be prepared to accept all the gold that would flow into this country from all parts of the world. Fifteen million people certainly cannot become the bankers for the world. We hope that the United States some day will see fit to raise the price of gold, but we do not know when that might be; and there presently is no indication of it.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

EXTENSION OF CONTROL OF STRATEGIC MATERIALS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 374, to control export and import of strategic materials.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the matter of governmental control over exports and imports is no stranger to the house. Export control over materials was established in 1941 under the War Measures Act, and we have had it in one form or another ever since.

The Export and Import Permits Act was first enacted by parliament in 1947. It has since come before the house, through amending measures, in 1948, in the second session of 1949 and in 1951. When the measure was first introduced it was placed in the category of measures to carry forward controls that had existed during the war. Indeed, sir, clause 14 of the bill then introduced, as it appears in chapter 17 of the statutes of 1947, contained this provision:

> This act shall come into force upon the expiration of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, and shall expire sixty days from the commencement of the first session of parliament commencing in the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-eight.

It was put before the house at that time as legislation to deal with a type of emergency which was thought still to exist in 1947 and which, in the period when the War Measures Act had ceased to be in effect, had been carried forward under the authority of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945.

In the various extensions of this measure, it has always been put before the house as a measure of limited duration. I have indicated that when it was introduced in 1947 it was to expire in 1948. In 1948 an amendment was introduced which extended the period of life of the measure to March 31, 1950. In the second session of 1949 the life of the measure was extended to July 31, 1951. Then at the 1951 session the life of the measure was extended to July 31, 1954. And, unless extended in some form at this present session, it will expire on that date.

I have mentioned that the measure was introduced as one designed to cope with an emergency. The emergency, as described by the minister who introduced the measure on February 18, 1947, is of a nature comparable in no way, I suggest, with the conditions of today. The Hon. Mr. MacKinnon, at page 568 of Hansard for that date, referred to the main purpose of export control in these words:

> While the main purpose of the export control is to ensure adequate supply in Canada, the export controls are also necessary to enable us to carry out Canada's commitments in connection with those foodstuffs which are in world short supply and which, by common agreement of the united nations, must be formally allocated to ensure an equitable distribution.

And then he made mention of a third form of control, or a third purpose of control, and said this:

> A third type of control which is envisaged by this measure is that relating to the movement of arms, munitions and war materials and supplies.

I am sure I do not need to dwell at length upon the radical change in the situation as between February 18, 1947, and today, March 17, 1954—the 17th of Ireland.

Mr. McIvor: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: There is no longer any scarcity of goods in Canada which must be assisted by control over exports, nor is Canada lacking the foodstuffs or other materials necessary to fulfil international agreements at this time. The third type of control mentioned by the Hon. Mr. MacKinnon in the extract from which I have just read is one that is much more in our minds today.

When the measure came before the house in 1947 it was proposed on behalf of the official opposition by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) that the whole subject should be carefully reviewed in the banking and commerce committee. His suggestion was accepted on behalf of the government by the Hon. Mr. MacKinnon, then minister of trade and commerce. It will be remembered that a very useful review of the whole structure of export and import control was carried out in the banking and commerce committee.

When the measure was reported back to the house I think there was general recognition of the fact that the reference to the banking and commerce committee had been a highly useful procedure. Mr. Speaker, I am again suggesting to the house that an equally useful purpose would now be served by the reference of this measure to the banking and commerce committee. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is not present with us today, being absent in Washington on official duties attending an important international conference, but I am laying that suggestion before the government and before the house as one which I think will facilitate the business of the house and also contribute considerably to an adequate review of this control structure.

When the measure was under debate at that time the hon. member for Greenwood, speaking for the official opposition, drew attention to three fundamental considerations that should weigh with the house in reference to a measure of this kind. I suggest that those observations are equally valid today. First of all, he expressed a dislike of controls as the kind of interference which in ordinary circumstances tampers with the free flow of sound economic forces. In the second place, he expressed a dislike of government by order in council. Every measure of this kind inevitably involves the conferring of power upon the governor in council virtually to legislate by that means. That objection is as strong today as it was in 1947, or stronger. The third consideration which he drew to the attention of the house at that time was the danger of placing in the hands of the government a weapon or power which could be used to create monopoly or to impose a discrimination between different Canadian exporters or different Canadian importers. When the measure was brought back to the house after review in the banking and commerce committee an attempt was made to control the date of expiration of the measure more effectively, but that amendment of the hon. member for Greenwood was defeated.

Those who sat in the last parliament will recall that when this measure came before the house in 1951 there were two forms of extension involved. One was the extension in point of time; the other was an extension in the type of control contemplated by it.

So far as the extension in point of time is concerned, it was the proposal of the government at that time that the extension should be for a period of five years to July 31, 1956. I will say this for the work done on the measure in the other place that that extension was reduced to three years. A somewhat similar reduction in the length of the extension had been proposed in this house, but it was rejected by the government. Mr. Speaker, I should have thought it necessary with respect to a measure of this kind, which can only justify its existence on the basis of the existence of an emergency, that the house should insist that an opportunity would be afforded to it for a periodical review and that there should be nothing in the nature of a long or indefinite extension of time. The three-year extension did carry and we are now faced with the conclusion of that three-year period.

The other form of extension made by the 1951 amendment was in the nature of the control. Up until that time the control had been upon a commodity basis. In 1951 control on a country basis was added. That was a very important extension. The reason was quite obvious. It was in the period following the outbreak of communist aggression in Korea and no objection was taken to that particular type of extension under the emergent conditions which were then described as existing.

In this 1954 session we are invited to consider the replacement of the Export and Import Permits Act. The measure now under debate contemplates the repeal of the existing legislation and its replacement by a new Export and Import Permits Act, which presumably in some respects will carry further the broad structure of controls existing under the present legislation.

I think that this is a measure of high importance. It brings us face to face with many far-reaching questions in relation to trade policy, particularly in the type of world we are living in where a cold war still is being waged and where a hot war is being fought in certain unhappy parts of Asia. It is with that background that we approach this measure.

It is fair to ask at once: What is the extent of the use made by the government of the powers conferred upon it under the existing legislation? It is proper to answer that the use of the power has been quite extensive with respect to export but very limited with respect to import. May I give the house the details of the permits issued in the past four years:

	Export	Import
1951	32,026	109
1952	33,422	1,568

The export permits outnumber the import permits by fifty times. The question then naturally arises: What is the necessity for import control? I submit that that is a matter which should have serious consideration, which should have a more serious and extended study than is possible in the house or in the committee of the whole. It is a subject that ought to engage the attention of a committee like the banking and commerce committee.

One example of the use of this power of limiting exports comes to mind at once, and I refer to the limitation announced in the house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on December 14, 1953, with respect to the export to the United States of Canadian oats. This is in truth an example of the control of exports which has no relation to strategic materials, which has no relation to arms, which has no relation to war materials or munitions, but which is used as an instrument of trade policy.

I ask the house to consider whether this is the type of use of a controlling power which the house approves. At that time it was announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as a government decision that effective at midnight December 10, 1953, and continuing until midnight September 30, 1954, the Canadian government had undertaken to limit the shipment of Canadian oats to the United States to 23 million bushels. The reason given was that the United States executive had asked that this measure be taken by the Canadian government in order that the United States government might not be faced with what was then an imminent breach of the general agreement on tariffs and trade by the United States congress.

It may have been very accommodating to the government of the United States that the government of Canada should come to its rescue in this situation and impose this limitation on the export of Canadian oats to the United States. But what are the hard realities of the situation? The fact is that the United States congress deliberately violated the general agreement on tariffs and trade in 1952 with respect to the importation into that country of certain dairy products. In 1953 they again violated the general agreement on tariffs and trade, and again with reference to certain dairy products, by the extension of the products to which certain prohibitory legislation applied, and now congress, at the end of 1953, apparently is on the point of again violating the general agreement on tariffs and trade by applying restrictions on the importation of Canadian oats into that country. The Canadian government rises to the occasion and accommodates the executive of the United States by imposing these restrictions upon the export of Canadian oats to the United States so that, apparently, the United States congress will not be put in the position of violating, as it has in fact and in spirit, the general agreement on tariffs and trade. I for one, Mr. Speaker, fail to understand why it became the duty of the Canadian government, the considered responsibility of the Canadian government, to take that action at that time.

If the United States congress at the expense of the Canadian farmer is determined to violate the spirit and the letter of the general agreement on tariffs and trade—a shocking violation of good faith in a world in which violations of good faith on the part of nations in the west are critically examined by those in the world who are not our friends—then I believe that that responsibility should be allowed to rest squarely where it belongs, namely on the United States congress as the violator of the agreement. The Canadian government should not step forward and impose limitations upon the export of Canadian grain to accommodate the United States congress.

I now pass on, Mr. Speaker, to a consideration of the effect of this measure in relation to a subject of even wider significance. This measure before us is described as "an act respecting the export and import of strategic and other goods". Let us dwell for a moment on the importance of that word "strategic". The word itself, of course, is not defined in the bill. Its exact import may be a matter of debate in certain particulars, but its significance is, I believe, beyond question. We are thinking here in terms of ensuring that materials which would be of assistance to aggressors in the world today are not permitted to fall into the hands of those aggressors, either by direct export of such goods to those aggressors, or by export elsewhere under such circumstances that they will by indirect methods eventually fall into the hands of those would-be aggressors.

This, Mr. Speaker, raises some very far-reaching and searching questions as to trade policy, and as to the relationship of trade considerations to the whole broad question of the peace of the world. In examining the figures on trade with nations which lie behind the iron curtain one finds some rather interesting facts. First of all, let us look at our export trade with Russia. In 1952 we exported to Russia a total of $421 worth of goods, in 1953 a total of $478 worth of goods. The records indicate that these goods exported were: settlers' effects, books, liquor, and donations. Our trade with China shows some rather interesting figures also. In 1952 we exported to China goods to the value of $1,155,524, and in 1953 the total was nil. If one looks at trade with Hong Kong as reflecting something of the trade we formerly did with China it will be seen that in 1952 our export trade to Hong Kong amounted to a total of $9,581,937, and in 1953 $8,999,606. I am not going to deal with the other countries which lie behind the iron curtain but I will mention one with which we used to do a rather important trade, namely Czechoslovakia. Our exports to Czechoslovakia in 1952 were only $366,229. In 1953 they have fallen further to a total of only $122,691.

It is worth noting, Mr. Speaker, that since 1951, under the powers conferred by the existing legislation, the government has enlarged the number of countries with which trade is proscribed except on an export permit basis. The 1953 report of the Department of Trade and Commerce in relation to this measure shows that since January 13, 1953, the number of proscribed countries, to which goods are not permitted to move except under permit, are the following: North Korea, Hong Kong, China, Macao, Manchuria, Mongolia, Sinkiang, Tibet, Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, the Russian occupied zone of Germany, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Danzig, Roumania, the Ukraine, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. That represents a very much enlarged list of countries as compared with the previous list of proscribed countries since the power to control export by countries was conferred upon the governor in council in 1951. I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that no one in this house questions the wisdom of extending the prohibition to all these countries, except on the permit basis.

Let us then examine the question of trade with those countries behind the iron curtain. It is timely, I believe, that this question should occupy the attention of the house. Let us consider the question of trade with Russia. We are doing virtually no trade whatever with that country. The Russian ambassador in this city made headlines on February 6 when he announced that Russia was ready to do business with Canada, and in an interview with the local press intimated that the U.S.S.R. was ready to open negotiations for purchases of Canadian goods. When questioned further on the subject he intimated that a trade delegation would be sent by Moscow to Ottawa for this purpose. He was asked some interesting questions by the press as to the type of goods that Canada might hope to sell to Russia. I think it is not unfair to say that the answers he gave to these questions were not altogether illuminating. Various commodities were mentioned such as wheat and ships, but the ambassador's answers were not very informative.

However, with a view to ascertaining, if possible, the position of the Canadian government with reference to the question of trade with Russia, I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), on February 17, for some information on this subject. He was about as illuminating as was the Russian ambassador in reply to questions put to him on the occasion to which I have referred. As reported at page 2170 of Hansard the minister's answer was as follows:

> Trade between Canada and any country behind the iron curtain is carried on subject to permit. In other words, a permit must be issued by my department for any transaction concerning exports to those countries. There has never been any prohibition against trade in certain commodities, while there is a definite prohibition against trade in commodities that are on the restricted list. I refer to strategic materials. Subject to that reservation, if any Canadian merchant can arrange trade with Soviet Russia, his application will be considered by the department.

I sought a little more information from the minister as to whether, in the view of the Canadian government, this is simply a matter for a sales effort on the part of Canadian merchants and businessmen or whether the Canadian government itself had some interest in the question of enlarging trade with Russia. Again the minister's answer was anything but illuminating. He said:

> The government is interested in the expansion of any trade provided it does not conflict with government policy, but the government does not enter into trade directly. As I say, if there are facilities for carrying on the trade and if private Canadians wish to develop trade with Russia, the government will be glad to consider the nature of the transaction and either to issue a permit or not do so, as the circumstances warrant.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that the minister in effect in saying that the government encourages trade provided it does not run against government policy, but he has not told us what government policy is with reference to trade with Russia. I am asking for a statement in the course of this debate. The minister, it is expected, will be back in his place in the house tomorrow. I am asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce to tell the house and the country what the policy of this government is with reference to trade with Russia.

I draw attention to the fact that this is a subject that is occupying the attention of governments of other countries. It has indeed become a subject of not a little interest in the United Kingdom. Emanating from Westminster of late there have been many reports of debates on the subject of enlarging trade with Russia as a means of building wider mutual trade relations, and in that way it is hoped to remove further from us the ugly spectre of war. For instance, in a dispatch from London of March 2, we read this:

> The British government is planning to seek a substantial relaxation of embargo restrictions on the sale of manufactured goods, raw materials and shipping to Russia.

The President of the Board of Trade, Mr. Peter Thorneycroft, is quoted as having said that day in the British House of Commons:

> The Prime Minister said a substantial relaxation of regulations affecting manufactured goods, raw materials and shipping will be sought . . . That is what is in view.

Then again, in a dispatch from London of January 29 last, we read this:

> Britain disclosed today she will open trade and financial talks soon with three Soviet satellites—Hungary, Poland and Czechoslovakia.
> A board of trade spokesman said Britain will not alter her embargo against the export of strategic or war potential goods to any iron curtain country.
> "It is, however, a firm government policy to encourage any possible increase in the trade of non-strategic goods," he said.

Then reference is also made to another statement by Mr. Peter Thorneycroft in the British House of Commons:

> . . . Britain wants to extend trade with communist countries in Europe "to the maximum, consistent with security needs."

From Moscow there have been intimations of a desire to expand trade with western countries. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I take it that we are all realists here; we approach with serious reservations any intimations from Moscow as to desires of this kind. Nevertheless, it is worth our taking note at least of what is being said from that source. I have here an Associated Press dispatch from Moscow dated February 4 in which the following appears:

> The Soviet union today offered more than $1 billion worth of contracts to British industries for delivery from 1955 to 1957. It was the biggest gesture thus far in Russia's widely publicized campaign to revive east-west trade.
> The offer was followed several hours later by the announcement of a British shipbuilder here that he had signed a separate contract to build twenty fishing trawlers for the Russians for almost $17 million.
> (First comment from the British board of trade in London said, "We welcome any increase in trade with Russia, provided it is within the non-strategic field.")
> The cash-for-goods Soviet offer of £400 million ($1,120 million) involves varied equipment including tankers, industrial plant equipment and railroad equipment.

Mr. Speaker, the dispatch proceeds to indicate what are described as the highlights of the Russian memorandum of the goods required. I shall not labour the matter by giving statistics, but the list includes cargo ships, whalers, power equipment, forging and pressing equipment, machine tools, textile and food processing machinery, floating docks, railway equipment, steam boilers, rolling mill equipment and hydraulic presses for the motor vehicle industry.

At about the same time comes a dispatch from London of February 16 as follows:

> British manufacturers will be permitted to export up to £200 million worth of goods to Russia provided they get the orders, a government spokesman said in the House of Commons today.
> He said this represented approximately half the value of commodities listed by Russia on a schedule presented recently to a group of British manufacturers and business men visiting Moscow.
> The remaining £400 million worth of commodities sought by Russia comes on the list of strategic goods, banned from export to communist countries.

If any further clarification were needed of the view of the British government in this matter, it was supplied by Prime Minister Churchill himself in the British House of Commons on February 25. His statement there is quoted in a press dispatch as follows:

> A policy combining military strength with expanding Anglo-Russian trade and patient diplomatic negotiations with the communist powers was outlined to the Commons today by Sir Winston Churchill.
> The Prime Minister called for more trade with the Soviet union and eventual relaxation of cold war embargoes as a means of reaching a workaday understanding with Russia.

And then further:

> Shortly after the Prime Minister's speech, the major one for the government side in a two-day debate, it was stated authoritatively that Britain will submit new proposals for a revision of the embargo list to the United States and France through British embassies in the two capitals.

Mr. Speaker, I leave for the moment the subject of trade with Russia by directly asking the government what is its policy with reference to this subject. It is a subject that now engages the attention of the United Kingdom government and it can no longer escape the attention of the Canadian government or the Canadian House of Commons. Furthermore, has the Canadian government been consulted in the manner in which it was indicated by Sir Winston Churchill in this last extract it was his intention to consult the United States and France in this regard?

On motion of Mr. Fleming the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take the motion to appoint the committee on railways and shipping, then continue this debate, and then take second reading of the bill with respect to losses to government property. Then we shall go into supply and take the departments of mines and technical surveys, fisheries and transport.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister in a position to tell us now what might be the program for Friday?

Mr. Harris: I think it will be largely what I have already indicated for tomorrow, or what part of it may not be disposed of. We may possibly also call the bill having to do with diplomatic immunity but I am not sure yet.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, March 18, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, March 18, 1954

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, Thursday, the 18th March, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,

sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. F. Delaute,
Secretary to the Governor General.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SALE OF FRENCH LANGUAGE NEWSPAPERS IN CAFETERIA

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, may I ask you to look into the advisability of putting on sale a morning and an evening French language newspaper in the parliamentary cafeteria? I believe I am speaking on behalf of a large number of my colleagues in making this request.

Mr. Speaker: I shall be pleased to give consideration to the hon. member's request.

THE PRIME MINISTER

WELCOME ON RETURN TO HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Speaker: If Hansard could have registered the genuine sentiments of admiration and affection felt in all parts of the house for the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), sentiments which prompted the enthusiastic applause we have heard in the last few seconds, no words of mine would require to be spoken. I know that all hon. members, however, want me to tell the Prime Minister that we are very pleased to see him back in his seat in the house from his good-will tour around the globe and looking so well.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I might have the consent of the house for a few moments I would like to take this opportunity to thank you, sir, and all my colleagues for the generosity and cordiality of the reception they have accorded me this afternoon.

I would also like to make a very short report of this trip which has been so happily concluded.

I want to assure hon. members that everywhere I went as a representative of Canada I was received with enthusiasm and every evidence of friendliness and good will. But nowhere was that more touching to me than it was last evening at the airport and here this afternoon in the House of Commons.

Everywhere I went I heard "O Canada" sung, and I was always moved and touched at the feeling of pride it gave one to be there as a representative of that country for which the hymn was being sung or played. But when I heard it on opening the doors of the airplane last evening I do confess that a lump rose in my throat, because it was a great pleasure and a great satisfaction to be back in this land, and because the sight of my friends on the field made me prouder than ever that I could as a Canadian come back to my homeland.

I will not attempt to make a narrative of my trip. I have not seen all the newspapers. But I have seen some clippings and I have been told that there was quite a large volume of publicity given to the happenings of each day while I was away. I do wish to express gratitude to the Canadian press, as I have in other countries expressed gratitude to the press of each of those countries, for the help they gave me in spreading this message of good will and friendship which I had been authorized by my colleagues in the house, and I believe by the public generally, to carry to those various nations.

This afternoon I feel I should discharge the responsibility placed upon me virtually everywhere I went to assure you, sir, and all my colleagues in the house, and through them the Canadian people, of the very cordial greetings, friendliness, and good wishes of the people of those several countries.

From London I bring you the greetings of Sir William Churchill, Lord Alexander, Lord

Athlone, Lord Swinton, Minister of Commonwealth Relations, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Minister of Labour, and several others. I can assure hon. members that it gave me great satisfaction after leaving Canadian soil to make my first stop on the soil of the United Kingdom.

I might say, incidentally, that I received from Sir Winston Churchill a bit of advice which stood me in good stead during the whole of my trip. He told me he expected my trip would be a bit strenuous, but that he had always found it was wise never to stand too long when there was an opportunity to sit down, and not to be content to sit down when there was an opportunity to lie down.

From London we flew over to Paris, and although we were somewhat concerned when we left London by the news that we might not be able to put down on the continent, the fog lifted just about 20 minutes before we arrived at Orly and we were able to disembark and be greeted by our French friends before the fog closed in again a few minutes afterwards.

In France I was most cordially welcomed by the new president of France, Mr. Rene Coty, and his charming lady, Normans like many of the Normans who were here in the early days, and some of whose descendants are here in this house at the present time; and also by the prime minister, the president of the council of ministers, Mr. Laniel, also a Norman. There was some suggestion in France at this time that the country was being run by the Normans. When I heard that suggestion I told them that from my experience with Normans, and perhaps from that of the people of the United Kingdom with Normans, we would not find that that was anything to worry about. I also had the privilege of meeting the president of the national assembly who occupies a post similar to yours, Mr. Speaker, and the president of the council of the republic. Though that is its official name, it is still commonly called the senate. To them and through them to the elected representatives of the republic I conveyed our greetings and was charged by them to bring back to you and to all our colleagues their best wishes and most cordial regards. I also met several others, among whom was our friend Mr. Robert Schuman who, though he has reverted to the role of an ordinary member of the assembly, is still taking a great interest in the international problems that are of such great concern to us all.

I had the privilege of dining with the members of the NATO council and then, the next morning, of a visit to the headquarters of SHAPE where I heard a concise but very instructive report from General Gruenther. I was also shown some interesting old Canadian archives that are still in Paris, although I think we have photostats of them in our own archives here. But there is something in just feeling these things that have come down from two or three centuries, though perhaps after my visiting the Orient two or three centuries would not have appeared to me to be so impressive as they were when I was examining these old documents relating to Canada's early history.

From there we went to Germany and I was delighted when I met for the first time Dr. Heuss, the president of the German republic. He is a man with a long university career, and with the appearance and the charm of a man of great culture. He confirmed the impression we had all formed of Chancellor Adenauer when he was here and which was also confirmed by the impression made upon me by the chancellor's colleagues in the ministry, namely that the leaders in these days in Germany are looking to a future where gains will not be dependent upon war but where they will be the result of good international relations between that country and all its neighbours. I think that the chancellor and his colleagues are most anxious to provide for a future where they will be allowed to live and where it will be their pleasure and satisfaction to let others live alongside of them.

I then had the privilege of visiting the troops at Soest under Brigadier Anderson. The barracks that are being provided there are magnificent. Everything has not yet been done but I should just like to give one little illustration that impressed me. When I asked the brigadier about the school facilities, he said they were coming along but that his own young son who is 7½ years old was attending the German public school. When I reported that fact to the chancellor, who I found had already heard of it, he said that our men were all behaving in the manner best calculated to make them accepted as true and sincere friends and as people for whom his German population would always have respect and admiration.

The next day we flew to Grostenquin. There I found the morale of our men to be very high, in spite of the fact that all the difficulties have not yet been overcome for them. The commander of the squadrons there, with his wife and their three children, are still living in a trailer but for that I had admiration. The officers are giving the men the impression that whatever are the difficulties, they are no greater for the men than they are for the officers themselves. I think that is one of the explanations of this high morale I found everywhere among our troops. They all felt that they were human units in a joint endeavour being made by themselves and by those who were commanding them. It was at Grostenquin that we had our first disappointment. We had expected to go the same afternoon to Zweibrucken but the weather was still bad; we were experiencing the seasonal continental weather at that time. The plane that had gone from Grostenquin to Paris to bring the ambassador up to take part in our visit had not been able to put down at Paris and had come back without him and we were not able to get into Zweibrucken. I am sorry because I greatly appreciated the privilege of saying to these men, on your behalf, Mr. Speaker, and on behalf of my colleagues, that we realize that they are doing a large portion of our share in this general undertaking to maintain peace in the world. The time that we would have taken to visit Zweibrucken was taken up by visiting Guesslin, one of these farming villages in Lorraine. I must confess that I was somewhat depressed at the feeling that there might be still quite a large number of these villages or farming communities in France—the like of which we have not in this country—which do not appear to have changed greatly through many of the past decades. But every person we saw seemed to be good-humoured and seemed to feel that they were living quite comfortably but it was obviously under conditions with which our people in Canada would not be perfectly satisfied.

From there we flew to Rome. We got there late in the evening and came down from considerable heights to ground level rather quickly. I therefore found, when I stepped off the plane, that there was not much that I could hear. Then there was such an array of klieg lights that I found that within a few seconds there was not much that I could see. Hence for a moment or two I was, more than usual, in strange surroundings. But that condition disappeared and the warmth of the welcome that was accorded to us there was really quite moving.

We were invited to meet President Einaudi, another university man whose whole career until recently has been in the field of study and teaching, and who certainly has no other desire than to see the whole world at peace and to see all the people of the world have the opportunity to pursue the kind of careers of which his own is one of the examples of what an intelligent man would prefer to do rather than engage in the horrible business of destroying each other. I met the new prime minister, Mr. Scelba, and several of his colleagues who are quite firm in their resistance to communistic influence in their country and quite confident that that resistance is and will continue to be successful.

Personally I had another disappointment in Rome, one that was shared by several of those who were accompanying me. We had hoped to be received in audience by His Holiness the Pope but the condition of His Holiness' health was such that he was not able to receive anyone at all. I went and paid my respects to Monsignor Montini who, as hon. members know, was here a little over a year ago. I also wished to see Monsignor Tardini but was told I might not be able to see him because he was at that moment closeted with the Pope. We went around to his office just the same to leave cards and just as we got there Monsignor Tardini was coming out and was able at that time to give us very encouraging news of the state of health of the Holy Father. Unfortunately there have been relapses, and the state of his health is still giving grave concern.

The next day was quite a memorable one. I was received by the mayor of Rome, mayor Salvatore Rebecchini at the capitol. They put on a great municipal demonstration at the capitol and pointed out to me where Tarpeian rock was and warned me it was not very far from the seat of the mighty to this Tarpeian rock. They seemed quite conscious that under the democratic institutions as they existed 2,000 years ago and as they still exist the difference is perhaps no more than our colleague, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), mentioned some time ago when he said that the transition from a private car to an upper berth was always something that could happen in politics. I was presented with a silver replica of the famous wolf with Romulus and Remus getting what would look from the replica to be a very welcome meal provided by the wolf.

Then we flew to Bahrein. As hon. members know, that is an island under a British protectorate. We were greeted there by what I suppose would be the crown prince, the eldest son of the reigning sheik himself, Sheik Ibn Salman Heklealifa, who extended cordial greetings, much to my surprise, because I had not been informed we were going to be received there. We were just stopping there as a matter of convenience to avoid travelling further by night. We stopped with the Hon. Mr. Burrows, the British political resident in that island. We were told that it was a place where it never rained, but we were also told that for three days preceding our arrival it had rained quite steadily, and that was quite evident from the state of the airfield because it was rather splashy when we put down in spite of the great skill of the pilots of our plane.

The next morning we went on to Karachi. There we were received by our old friend, Prime Minister Mohammed Ali, with the cordiality those who know him can well imagine for themselves. We were put up at government house with the governor general, Ghulam Mohammed, who wanted to be especially remembered to our Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). It appears that for quite a long period he had some of the cares our Minister of Finance still has, and he always has retained an affectionate regard for a fellow sufferer as a result of their meetings at several international conferences.

An hon. Member: The extortioners must stick together.

Mr. St. Laurent: I also had an interesting conversation with Sir Mohammed Zafrulla Khan and met for the first time there, although I did meet his opposite number in other countries as well, a minister of parliamentary affairs. We do not call our Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) a minister of parliamentary affairs, but it was explained to me that his functions were very much like those of our good friend, although he combines them with being minister of law. Here we prefer to call our minister the Minister of Justice, but there they are content with the feeling that their law may mean the same thing as justice.

We went up to Peshawar and stayed there with the governor, Mr. Shahbuddin, a brother of the former prime minister of Pakistan, Mr. Nazimuddin, so that evidently political changes do not always have all the repercussions that they might be expected to have. These governors are appointed by the central government, and the brother of the former prime minister is still the governor and is a very cordial and very likable gentleman. We went up the Khyber pass right up to the Afghanistan border. A barbed wire fence marked the border and there was a guard just on the other side. We were warned we must not step over the line marked by the barbed wire, but I did go right up to the fence and extend my hand which was taken very cordially by the captain of the guard. I expressed feelings of good will and he said he was sorry that I was not going to visit his country. We warned the photographers that perhaps it would be just as well not to make any pictures of that incident because we did not want to get the captain of the guard into any embarrassing situation.

But when I got to Delhi I met the ambassador of Afghanistan to India. He had heard of the incident and thanked me for expressing good will to the guard and also expressed his regrets that I was not visiting his country. He did that in the most perfect French, which I am sure the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) would admire as much as I did. The drive up the Khyber pass is most interesting because it reminds one of the centuries that the pass has been the gateway for invasion into southeastern Asia from the time of Alexander the Great right on down. We were very cordially received by the Khyber Rifles, whose mess is at the head of the pass. On the way up we met many of the tribesmen who were also most cordial, almost embarrassingly so. They presented me with two sheep. I was told that we did not have to go through the whole of the ancient ceremony. The ancient ceremony implied that the recipient of the sheep was to turn them back to be sacrificed and roasted immediately for a feast that was to be shared. However, Mrs. Roosevelt has established the precedent that it is quite sufficient to put your hand on their heads as a token of ownership, and then ask the donors if they will not excuse you from remaining for the other festivities because of your other engagements.

At Peshawar I met a friend of our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), a Mr. A. E. Palmer, who has been there for a couple of years as an agricultural expert. He knew all about what had taken place in the Lethbridge area, and is quite encouraging. He says that though they have good irrigated wheat lands, they have only been getting an average of ten to twelve bushels per acre, while in the Lethbridge irrigated areas the least they get is thirty-five bushels and it goes up to sixty. By selecting seeds he had been getting forty or more from demonstration plots. He is quite firmly convinced they are going to be able to bring in and demonstrate the adaptability of the kind of seed that will enable these people to double or perhaps treble the amount of wheat they get from the same land.

I think that is the kind of thing that is being done under the Colombo plan and the technical aid plan, which is most practical and appropriate. It is not possible for the production of this continent, even if half of it were turned over annually to the hundreds of millions in those countries, to make very much difference in their standard of living.

Whatever is done under these plans can be added to the result of their own productive effort and the improvement of that effort, but it can be only the kind of addition that the oil fields are making to the economy of Alberta, which still has as its sound foundation the agricultural production of that great province.

Mr. Palmer is also firmly convinced that they can make sugar out of beets better and more profitably in the northwestern frontier province of Pakistan than they can make it out of sugar cane. He has convinced Mr. Sardar Rashid Khan, who is the chief minister of that province, that is probably so, and it is going to be tried out. Of course, they realize that growing beets is quite a lot of work. The work has to be done right down close to the ground, but these people do all their work sitting on their haunches so it is not going to be anything backbreaking to them to thin and weed rows of sugar beets.

Then we went to Lahore, that great old city, not the largest but perhaps one of the most interesting we did visit. Unfortunately the governor, His Excellency Mian Aminuddin, was indisposed but his Begum and members of the government met us at the airport and took us to government house where we were magnificently entertained and made most comfortable. There was a large dinner party given that evening, perhaps not only on our account, but it was the next to the closing day of the annual horse fair and agricultural show at Lahore. There were many people who had come, not because there was going to be a visitor from Canada, but to see the very interesting show that was being provided. Among others at this dinner there was the Prince Ali Khan, His Highness the Maharaja of Jaipur, the Maharani of Jaipur, Prime Minister Malik Khan Noon and other members of the government. It was a very impressive oriental dinner party in magnificent surroundings. We have not the like of these palaces that are being used by the native governors and were formerly occupied by the representatives of the controlling powers.

I went for about half an hour to this horse show the next day, really more to see what a holiday oriental gathering was like than to follow the incidents on the program. I found there is not very much difference between the appearance of a holiday crowd in the east and the appearance of a holiday crowd in our own country. I saw there another confirmation of the fact that men, women and children are much the same all over the world. I saw something also that made me still think of home. It was a musical ride by the governor general's guard. It was very well done, but I remembered the musical ride I had seen performed by the R.C.M.P. at the time of the coronation in London. I think I would be very hard put if I had to decide which was the more impressive of the two. In both cases the performance seemed to me to be perfection. There was exactly the same rhythm in the bearing of the men and the action of the horses. They were beating the time much better than I was doing when I was reviewing those guards of honour that were lined up at most of the places where I stopped.

Then, of course, we saw some of the beauties of that spot, the Shalimar gardens. These gardens were laid out certainly more than a century before those of Louis XIV at Versailles, which might seem to have been the pattern. Then when we got to India we saw the gardens that had been laid out around the palace at New Delhi, which was built only a quarter of a century ago. They are perhaps more like the Versailles gardens than the Versailles gardens are like the Shalimar gardens, so it would seem these things can move from east to west and back to the east. Everything that is done by man not to mar the beauties of nature but to make the beauties of nature more apparent and striking is much the same all over the world.

I also had an opportunity to see for the first times these great red forts that were erected in the sixteenth century and afterwards by the Moghul emperors. This country must have been extremely prosperous at one time because these red forts, the temples they contain, the palaces and different apartments that are provided are of a splendor that cannot be other than the reflection of a state of considerable prosperity at the time they were provided.

At New Delhi we were also received in the governor general's palace, that is the one that was erected when New Delhi was being provided as the new capital. I got the impression, and told Prime Minister Nehru, that it was a good thing it had been done before the minister of public works had to get an appropriation from parliament to provide it, because it was done on a scale for which it might be difficult to get appropriations in a democratic assembly. Perhaps it is a good thing. There are already 360 million people in India and the population is increasing all the time. It may be a good thing the palace was provided on that scale, with seventy-odd acres of gardens around it, for that set the scale for all the establishments of this new capital.

There is a lot of land there that does not look very attractive for agricultural purposes, so they are going to have plenty of space to develop their new capital to meet the requirements of these hundreds of millions of population. There is a possibility, perhaps even a probability, that they will get back to a state of prosperity which enabled the red forts to be built in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

The Prime Minister, Pandit Nehru, devoted a lot of time to me, for which I am very grateful. Our conversations, were, of course, very frank and very intimate. I am not going to be guilty of any breaches of confidence, but he was at great pains to explain to me his views of the historical development of the political regimes and economies and the cultural developments of the successive civilizations of these old countries, and the results of the ferments that are now taking hold among those hundreds of millions of people.

I should like to mention one or two things I saw. I saw the Qutab Minar, a great tower almost 300 feet high, I think, of huge blocks of cut rock and marble. One wonders how that was done thousands of years ago. We have no record of the cranes or other equipment they used to do those things in those days. But the blocks were raised to great heights and put together with some kind of cement or mortar that our contractors do not use in these days.

Alongside of the Qutab Minar there is the "iron tower", the "iron pillar". It is two hundred feet high. I am told it has been there for hundreds of years, and that it is practically pure iron—over 99 per cent pure iron. It is not oxidized; it has not suffered at all through all those years, and I am told that we just cannot do those things today. We cannot produce iron of that purity. And that is just one of the other things that lead me to believe that human nature has not changed through all these long centuries, and that we should not be over-proud of our achievements at the present time. I say that because there have been achievements in the past that we cannot equal today. We have much that we can pass on in industrial know-how to those great nations of the East, but there has been developed there long before our era much that could be used by us in our own lives.

We went to Agra and saw the Taj Mahal. Well, that is something which is a marvel to behold, and just makes one wonder how it was done. Perhaps it may have been a part of welfare state legislation. There are records showing that it was seventeen years in the building, and that 20,000 people were employed in constructing it. It is quite evident that neither time nor money were factors, and it is obvious that the aim was perfection, and I think that perfection was achieved.

At Fatehpur Sikri we saw another of these red forts that Shah Jahan had erected, within which was a little temple enclosing the shrine of the saint who had promised him a male heir—and more than carried out the promise when, within the normal period of time, there were two male heirs born to the same favoured queen. This prompted Shah Jahan to erect a fort there—in which he did not reside very long because, I am told, the climatic conditions and the conditions of the water were not conducive to long life.

From there we returned to Delhi. I had been honoured at Peshawar with an honorary degree, and again received a similar honorary degree at Delhi. I found there was a generosity in the East in respect of this function that I had not experienced in the West. I brought back with me two gorgeous red robes that were presented to me as the accompaniment of the degree of doctor of laws that was awarded to me by these ancient seats of learning.

At Bombay we stayed with Governor Sir Girja Bajpai who is well known to many of us who have attended meetings of the international assemblies, and was also greeted by the chief ministers and charged by them, as I had been on other occasions, with the best wishes and greetings to our houses of parliament. I was privileged to attend a meeting of the assembly of the people in the parliament at New Delhi and to hear Mr. Nehru make a speech, of the tour d'horizon type, on external affairs. And it was quite impressive to me to find there in the East exactly the same atmosphere we have here in our House of Commons accompanying their introduction of the democratic processes which have been found so advantageous in the conduct of public affairs of free men and women.

From India we went to Ceylon, and were the guests of the government of Ceylon at Temple Trees in Colombo and of the Governor General, Lord Soulbury, at the King's Pavilion in Kandy. We were also entertained by Sir John Kotalawala, Prime Minister. We met Sir Oliver Goonetilleke, the Minister of Finance, who, as happens in many countries has, apparently, the right of veto on any proposals that come from any of his other colleagues and who, I am told, is keeping the finances of his country on the kind of footing that had been agreed in London a year ago, and that was confirmed at the recent meeting in Sydney.

I will not mention the monuments that have come down from ancient history connected with Ceylon. But we were taken to the Temple of the Tooth at Kandy. We did not see the tooth but we saw all kinds of treasures that have been placed there by kings and grandees as their tribute to this shrine, which is of such importance to those of the Buddhist faith in the whole of the East.

I went to the home of the late prime minister, D. S. Senanayake and deposited a wreath on his tomb there. We were received for tea in their home—and that is something that is not generally accorded to visitors. I think it was a tribute to the genuine and sincere friendship for and confidence in Canadian visitors. What struck me at Kandy was the tremendous progress that is being made under Sir Ivor Jennings, Vice Chancellor of the University of Ceylon, in transferring the campus from Colombo to Kandy. They have a beautiful setting there. Hon. members will know that Sir Ivor Jennings was for a year or two connected with the University of British Columbia; and I am not sure that in selecting this site for the new campus he had not remembered the physical situation of the University of British Columbia.

He is one who does not seem to be too fearful of the restrictions of the minister of finance because, just the day after we were there, I saw a report that the university council wanted some 20 million rupees more than had already been provided for the work that was going on. Many resident quarters have already been provided. Their main administration building is there. I was told that about one-third of the faculties had already moved up to Kandy from Colombo. They do not feel that it will be very long before they will have the whole university provided for up there. It will be a university to take care normally of some 2,000 students. Alongside of it is Trinity College, which is attended by five hundred or six hundred bright young men, teenagers, whom it was my privilege to see and to whom it was my privilege to say that we looked upon them and their generation for the implementation of this universal desire for peace and good will throughout the world.

From Colombo we went to Indonesia and were greeted by President Soekarno and were received at his home. That is another of those magnificent palaces provided under the former regime and now being used under the independent government of the people themselves. Prime Minister Sastroamidjojo was also very kind to us. Hon. members will recall that he was the first ambassador of Indonesia accredited to Canada while he was still ambassador at Washington and was here not long ago in his capacity as accredited ambassador of his country to Canada. The president has never visited this hemisphere. I think he is looking forward to doing so, and from my conversations with him I know he is keenly interested in what goes on here. He had heard about the oil fields in Alberta; he had heard about the work of the Aluminum Company at Kitimat; he had heard about the iron ore in northeastern Quebec and Labrador and also of the St. Lawrence seaway project, and inquired about the details of those projects, as did others in several other countries. I was quite surprised at the fact that there was quite a lot of accurate information about the development that is going on here, and which they found so astounding and so encouraging. I got the impression that these people welcomed the development of this new Canadian nation as an element that was going to be of benefit to the whole world in its intercourse in the family of nations.

I got the impression that they felt that this is a new country that is developing and one that requires good relations with the whole world, and that its growth and strength will be an element of stability that will be helpful to us all. It was heart-warming to find these ancient civilizations of the East did feel that this country in its development was taking on increasing importance in world affairs, and that its influence was always apt to be helpful for stability and peace.

In Manila the president, Magsaysay, was also very cordial, as one would expect, and there one did get the feeling that the influence of North American ways had produced greater effects than it had in any of the countries we had previously visited. The president was most cordial. A couple of days before he had a bout of toothache and had two teeth removed. He seemed to be most cheerful and relaxed. Some of his friends told me they had hardly ever heard him make so delightful a speech in such a light and friendly tone. I was quite surprised next morning when they told me that he was rushed back to the hospital as soon as we left to have some more teeth extracted. He certainly had been able to conceal his physical suffering, if there had been physical suffering, and there must have been, because one does not go back to a dentist in the middle of the night to get some teeth extracted unless there is something pretty painful about it.

We went from there to Korea, and I shall have another opportunity of expressing views about the situation in that country. The morale of all our men is splendid. I was very happy to find that since the actual fighting has ceased they have been able to overcome by their own efforts many of the inconvenient features that interfered with their physical comfort in the surroundings in which they find themselves. But there again, one has the vivid impression that it is the human touch of the officers that contributes largely to this family spirit that you feel between the men and the officers, and this conviction of each and every one of them that he is a Canadian doing a Canadian job for himself and for his fellow Canadians in this participation in the joint effort to prove aggression to be unprofitable.

I accepted there the hospitality of General Taylor, the commander of the Eighth Army, for whom our men have, I think, quite as high a regard as they have for their own officers. They told me that he treats all under his command on exactly the same footing, and that there is no difference whatsoever in his regard for those who belong to the Eighth United States army and those who belong to the other units of the United Nations who are co-operating with that army. I went up to see the demilitarized zone, and saw on our side an impregnable defence line, and I was told that what was being done on the other side was just about the same. Their intelligence is that on neither side are there any evidences of preparations for offensives being made, but that on both sides they are very strongly entrenching their existing lines. I hope there may not be any resumption of offensive on either side, because that would appear to be something that would necessarily prove to be very costly because of the condition in which those defensive lines have been put during the armistice period.

From there I flew back to Seoul in a helicopter with an open door and perhaps about a hundred feet from the various levels of the surface. It is a terrible country in so far as terrain is concerned, and one cannot see why any one of those hills that were the scene of such bloody battles was of sufficient importance to justify the kind of fights that were made for their possession. They are all the same, but the line has to be held somewhere. This one has no particular strategic importance, but the one behind it has no greater strategic importance. They are all like that, back to the capital city of Seoul. Therefore one appreciates that if there was to be a demonstration of the futility of aggression it had to be made with firmness and it had to be made in that very difficult terrain.

We had dinner with President Rhee, who is not too firmly convinced that the state department is always right; but I did not get the impression that he was going to do very much about it.

In Japan we got the same friendly greeting and the same friendly care. I was really touched. I have no doubt, of course, it had been organized, but there were thousands of youngsters from perhaps five to 15 years of age lining the streets with Canadian and Japanese paper flags, waving them and grinning all over their features, showing every demonstration that it was for them a joyful occasion. Perhaps that was because of the fact that it was during school hours. Nevertheless I had the impression that these thousands of youngsters were being made aware that there was a country called Canada, and that they were there to see the representative of that country. I believe it will help in their geography lessons, and it will probably keep them conscious of the fact that there is such a country and that that country wants to be their friend, and wants them to be our friends.

The same cordiality was manifested by His Majesty the Emperor and by the Empress. I had been brought up to believe that they were of another species than just ordinary mankind, but there could not have been a more intimate family atmosphere than that provided at this informal luncheon. I say the luncheon was informal, but the preparation were quite formal. I had the Emperor's carriage provided for me. It was the second time it had been used since the war. The first time was for the vice-president of the United States, though probably it had been used on some other occasions. I understand the carriage is provided for an ambassador when he goes to present his credentials. But the imperial carriage and the whole cavalcade passed through the streets in weather conditions reminiscent of the coronation parade in London last June. But it was a very intimate, human reception we were given by Their Majesties in the palace. Prime Minister Yoshida and members of his cabinet, with whom I chatted, said in so many words that their military men had entered upon a terrible undertaking in 1941 with the expectation of making gains, but that the Japanese people had realized that no gains had been made, and that it was not likely in this age, and with the present methods of warfare, that war could mean any gains for anyone in the future. I got the impression that they were sincere in their views and that they did not want or expect to see their country at war again.

I had the privilege there of meeting the men on our destroyers Haida, Cayuga and Crusader, and there again I found the same high morale, and the same feeling among those to whom I spoke, that they were Canadians carrying out Canada's share and doing their part in a job which Canada and many other nations feel should be done in the interests of stability and peace in the world, and that they were proud of the fact that they were doing it well. This high morale of our men in Korea is due in large measure to the success which has attended the operations of our rotation scheme. They know they are there for a set period and so far there has been no breakdown in the rotating of these men, and they do not expect that there will be any breakdown. They know what they are up against, for what period they are up against it, and when they may expect to come home. When they do they can, if they so wish, re-enlist for another tour of duty. The fact that there is this precision, and that it is not only paper precision, but actual working precision in the terms of their duty there, has much to do with the spirit in which they accept the discomforts. It is not all the pleasant feature which I witnessed in the sounding of the retreat by one of these battalions when they were going through their ceremonies of lowering the flag at eventide. They know what they have to do and they are satisfied they are doing a good job, and doing it well.

At Honolulu we were also very graciously received and I was taken around by Admiral Stump on his boat to tour Pearl Harbor and have pointed out to me what happened on the morning of December 7, 1941, how it happened, and why it is that there are still the remains of no less than 1,000 American seamen in the Arizona on whose deck we were and where it was my privilege on behalf of all of us to deposit a wreath.

We then visited the aircraft carrier Boxer and were shown what a modern aircraft is and what it can do if ever it requires to be done. I believe all those men are prepared, and feel as we do that that state of preparedness and readiness may be sufficient to avoid the necessity of ever having to bring these planes into action.

It was with perhaps some increased confidence, that that state of preparedness and the high morale of our friends all over the world will bring about that happy condition, that I come back to my duties in this house and invite you, Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues not to complacency, but to a feeling that what is being done at the present time is of sufficient value to make it worth while to continue doing it.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with all other hon. members of the house today I join in welcoming the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) back in such obvious good health after his extended and very important trip.

I had the privilege of meeting him at the airport last evening on his return, and I must say that his colour and appearance of constant sunshine seemed even more in contrast with the cold breezes at the Rockcliffe airport last night than it does here in the chamber this afternoon.

The Prime Minister left with the assurance that he represented all Canadians in conveying a message of good will to the people of those countries he was about to visit. It was in that spirit that he left, and it is in that spirit that we welcome him back here today.

All of us were interested that he perhaps paid great attention to the advice which Sir Winston Churchill gave him in the early stages of his trip. In fact, the Prime Minister looks so well that some of us might reasonably wonder if the senior prime minister of the commonwealth might not have imparted to him some further advice on how to keep the kind of health that we would all like to enjoy.

The Prime Minister has expressed his belief that some useful purpose would be served by the presence amongst the people, and particularly the children of other lands, of one whom they recognized as a Canadian. I think every one of us will heartily agree with what he has said in that respect. Undoubtedly at this time expressions of good will, manifestations of friendship, and the indication of a real and continuing interest in the welfare of other nations within the free world and beyond, are things that form an important part in the building of that better understanding which is the very cement of the structure of a strong, united and free society throughout the world.

I have no doubt whatever that the very fact that the Japanese school children and other school children were doubtless given a holiday or a half holiday on that occasion will remind them for many long years that, on a particular day in their youth, they had the opportunity to see and to pay their respects to a representative from Canada.

It was in the belief that Canada would be represented in that way that we all extended our good will at the time of the departure of the Prime Minister. The advantage of these contacts cannot be overestimated. Certainly to deal with human beings as individuals with whom some intimacy has already been established greatly facilitates those formal exchanges that are such an essential part of the business of every country today. We have heard a review of an extended trip such as no predecessor of the Prime Minister has had the opportunity to take and in a time which, only a few years ago, would have seemed utterly impossible. I think many of us—perhaps not the younger members of parliament—will recall the excitement with which in our youth we read Jules Verne's "Around the World in Ninety Days". That was a fantastic dream in those days.

An hon. Member: "Around the World in Eighty Days".

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am corrected. I am told that it was eighty days. We will reduce it by ten to be conservative. In those days that was a fantastic picture of speedy travel. Nowadays, with modern aircraft, these contacts can be made so much more quickly. We all know that the speed of aircraft is constantly increasing. As that speed increases, undoubtedly useful purposes will be served by extending even more contacts of a similar nature in the years ahead. We have heard the Prime Minister review the scenes which have passed before his eyes. I have no doubt he might echo the words of Tennyson that we all remember:

I am a part of all that I have met;
Yet all experience is an arch wherethro'
Gleams that untravell'd world whose margin fades
For ever and for ever when I move.

This world indeed is becoming a better-known world. Trips like this help to make that fact a reality. As the Prime Minister has indicated, a later occasion will be accorded to deal with certain details of the trip and to discuss certain political aspects —and I use the term in the broadest sense— of the visit he has made. Today our purpose is simply to welcome him home; and we do that with a whole heart.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, there is little that I can do but echo the words so well spoken by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). When the Prime Minister left we all realized that we were sending abroad one who, in himself, represented to a remarkable degree the culture of the two major nations which have built up this country that we call Canada. That he has done that ably and well, we know. We felt before he left that he would do so.

This afternoon we enjoyed a travel with him around the world. He has come back to us with a knowledge of people of different countries, of different climates and of different cultures which is not accorded to any of the rest of us. In his leadership of Canada in the next few years I am quite sure that he will be able to make a still greater contribution to bringing about a better understanding between ourselves and other people like us and those great peoples of the Orient with their ancient ways and cultures.

I was happy to know that a holiday was given to the school children in Tokyo. I was interested to know that they had waved the Japanese flag and the Canadian flag. I wondered just what Canadian flag they were waving as he passed through the streets of Tokyo. However, we will let that matter pass. Perhaps we shall be able to inquire into it on an occasion when we discuss some other features of the trip that one does not intend to refer to this afternoon.

I want to join with everyone else in the house in welcoming the Prime Minister back. I know I speak for all my colleagues. In fact, I know I speak for everyone in the house because already the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has spoken in the same strain. We welcome the Prime Minister back. We are glad that he looks so fit. We know that he has played an important part in bringing about a better understanding not only between Canada and the peoples of the Far East but between occidentals and orientals wherever they may be.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I hasten to say at the outset that I join with the other members of the house in extending to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) a very hearty welcome on his return to this house and to say how pleased we are that he comes back looking so well. I know something of the rigours of the kind of travel he has been doing during these past several weeks. It was a difficult regimen under which he had to operate. I am sure we are glad to see him back in as good a state of health as he is now.

We followed each day the reports that were carried by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of the journey which the Prime Minister took. During the first week or ten days after he left we found that the C.B.C. shared the spotlight between the Prime Minister's journey and that of the Queen and her royal consort down in New Zealand and Australia. But during the past two or three weeks I think that the Prime Minister and his progress pushed Her Majesty somewhat into the background so far as the reports of the C.B.C. were concerned.

Japanese friends in Tokyo sent me a sheaf of clippings telling of the Prime Minister's visit to Japan. I was very glad to see the enthusiasm with which his visit was received. On an occasion of this kind one is tempted to speak too long, but there were some heartening things in what the Prime Minister said this afternoon that I just cannot resist commenting on briefly. One of them was the assurance that today it is felt that France is being run by Normans. Let me hasten to say that I too would think that country is in no serious danger as long as it is run by Normans. They tell me that there is only one thing harder than the head of a Norman and that is stone, so we have some hard-headed men in control of things in that country. That is what they need. I am told that these people trace their lineage back to the light-bearers of the tribe of Benjamin. I was glad to hear what the Prime Minister had to say about that country.

I was also very happy with his reference to the influence of the mother of parliaments in the countries of the East. I could not help thinking, while he was mentioning his visit to the people's parliament in New Delhi, what a wonderful contribution Great Britain has made in the matter of parliamentary government and how she has sown the seeds of that great institution over much of the world. That is a heartening thing.

It was heartening to me also that the Prime Minister should give us the assurance both in press interviews and here today that he feels there is a good chance that this old world can escape a global war for at least, as I think he said in one press interview, the length of his lifetime. I am of the opinion that the journey he has taken must have contributed somewhat to that understanding which will make it possible for us to enjoy a period of peace. I was glad to hear him finish his remarks today with the statement that he came back convinced that the state of preparedness in which we and our friends have got ourselves is of sufficient value to keep on doing it. I think that is right. I do not wish to take any more time now except to say once more that while some people may refer to the journey that the Prime Minister took as a pleasure-seeking junket I do not think that is right at all. I am convinced that he has been able to do immeasurable good as a consequence of the arduous journey which he took around the world.

Mr. McIvor: On a question of privilege—

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak as a Canadian. I think the Prime Minister's (Mr. St. Laurent) tour around the world was a most historic event.

Mr. Speaker: Although I hesitate very much to do so on this occasion, may I tell the hon. member that there is a ruling to the effect that on motions following a statement by a minister only one representative of each of the three opposition parties shall speak. I understand that this is a different occasion but I should like to say that if I allow the hon. member to speak I will have to allow all hon. members. I should like hon. members to be reasonable because we must carry on with our business.

Mr. Ferguson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I believe the Prime Minister's tour has been one of the most historic events that we in Canada have ever seen. It is one of the finest things in which we have ever participated. We Canadians are at times too prone to believe that there are very few countries the equal of Canada. Quite possibly that is because of the great country in which we live and the tremendous opportunities all Canadians have. But irrespective of who the man may be and the position he may occupy in the dominion, he cannot really visualize the things he needs to know about countries with which we are now coming in contact almost daily unless he takes a trip similar to that of the Prime Minister.

I am sure that the government will agree with me when I say that in order for both sides of the House of Commons to get a true picture—and I suggest this without introducing any political feeling—the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) should be afforded the same opportunity so that he could see with his own eyes the things he should see to be able to be the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition with full knowledge and so that he might be able to speak intelligently on matters pertaining to the welfare of Canada and the world. I say that with all sincerity, and I believe if the question were put to a vote the house would agree that it is a sensible and sane suggestion from the point of view of better government and the general betterment of Canada and the countries with which we associate.

THE BUDGET

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PRESENTATION ON TUESDAY, APRIL 6

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce that it is my present intention to bring down my budget on Tuesday, April 6, at the usual hour of eight o'clock.

QUESTIONS

HEALTH PROGRAM—PSYCHIATRIC PATIENTS

Mr. Boisvert:

1. How many beds have been provided for the care of psychiatric patients since the national health program started?
2. For what types of institutions were these beds provided?

Mr. Robertson:

1. 11,909.

2. Mental hospitals, 5,210; Mental defective institutions, 6,226; General hospitals, 473.

COLWOOD NAVAL MAGAZINE, B.C.

Mr. Pearkes:

1. How many civilians were employed at the Colwood naval magazine, British Columbia, during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1953?
2. What is the total amount in salaries paid to the civil servants employed at this magazine during the above period?
3. What was the total sum paid in wages for prevailing rate employees, during the year ending March 31, 1953?
4. What were the total expenses incurred in operating this magazine, during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1953?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. 123, not including corps of commissionaires.

2. $159,887.69.

3. $230,810.56.

4. $470,460.51, which includes salaries and wages and payments for services of corps of commissionaires.

INDIANS AND ESKIMOS—MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS

Mr. Mang:

What proportion of Indians and Eskimos receive a medical examination and X-ray each year?

Mr. Robertson:

Case finding is an unremitting activity which takes place every time an Indian or an Eskimo requires medical attention. Each time a patient is admitted to a departmental establishment he is given a medical and X-ray examination. This applies as well to most non-departmental hospitals in which Indians or Eskimos are cared for.

In addition to this routine procedure 15 or 16 survey parties annually survey areas which are not sufficiently close to departmental hospitals to have constant adequate medical coverage. These surveys are arranged so that they take place at a time when they will be most effective and will reach the greatest number, e.g.—in conjunction with annual official treaty visits or with the annual eastern Arctic patrol.

As a result between 50 per cent and 60 per cent of all eligible Indians and Eskimos are seen each year. The coverage would be greater if it were not for the nomadic nature and unavoidable absence of some natives from any type of survey.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—SUSPENSIONS

Mr. Brown (Brantford):

1. Since April 1, 1953 to date, in how many cases were family allowances payments suspended because of improper absence from school on the part of the children?
2. Since April 1, 1953 to date, in how many cases were family allowances payments reinstated on account of the children involved having resumed attendance at school?

Mr. Robertson:

1. From April 1, 1953 to January 31, 1954, family allowances payments were suspended for one or more months in respect of 7,066 children because they did not attend school as required by law.

2. From April 1, 1953 to January 31, 1954, payment of family allowances was reinstated on behalf of 4,538 children who resumed attendance at school.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Mr. Brown (Brantford):

Is there any loss of family allowances when a beneficiary fails to report a change of address within a prescribed period of time?

Mr. Robertson:

Under the family allowances regulations, a beneficiary is required to report a change of address to the regional director within 90 days from the date on which the child moved to a new address. If she fails to report the change of address within this time, payment of family allowances ceases the month following that in which the move took place and may only be resumed the month following that in which the new address is reported.

EX-MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT HOLDING POSITIONS UNDER FEDERAL JURISDICTION

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many ex-members of parliament are now in federal government positions, or in positions in connection with any courts, diplomatic missions, boards, commissions or agencies, the appointments to which come under the jurisdiction of the federal government or under the crown in right of Canada?
2. Who are such persons, what position does each one hold, what is his salary, and on what date was he appointed?
3. How many former members of the House of Commons have been summoned to the Senate since October 14, 1935?
4. What are the names of all such?
5. How many of these are still members of the Senate?
6. What are their names and on what date was each summoned?

Mr. Pickersgill:

1. The government keeps no record of whether persons appointed to the positions outlined in this question are ex-members of parliament and therefore there is no practicable method of preparing a list from official records unless every individual position was scrutinized.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3, 4, 5 and 6. No official list is kept which would indicate whether persons appointed to the Senate were former members of the House of Commons but a full list of senators appointed since October 14, 1935 could be supplied and it would no doubt be a relatively simple matter to ascertain from unofficial records open to all members of parliament which of these persons had been members of the House of Commons.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE, DAUPHIN—EMPLOYEES

Mr. Zaplitny:

1. Did the work of inspecting farms and obtaining information for the purposes of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in the federal constituency of Dauphin require the services of temporary or part-time employees in 1953?

2. If so, what is the name and address of each such person?

3. What remuneration has been paid, or is payable to each?

4. By whom were these employees appointed?

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—SALES

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

What quantities of wheat were sold by each signatory nation of the international wheat agreement, during the years 1950 to 1954, and who were the purchasers in each case?

Mr. Dickey: Return tabled.

TORONTO MEAT PACKERS

Mr. Hodgson:

1. Have any Toronto meat packing firms had their branding privileges suspended by the federal Department of Agriculture? If so, what are their names?

2. What are the names of the inspectors who inspect such firms' beef?

3. Are they employed by the federal Department of Agriculture?

4. What is the section of the act providing for such breach of the act?

5. What penalty was imposed?

6. Have their licences been cancelled?

7. Have these firms been allowed to resume their operations?

8. If so, for what reason?

9. What was the price of beef at the time of the suspension of the said Toronto firms (a) for red brand beef; (b) for blue brand beef; (c) for cows' hinds?

COMMUNICATIONS

SALE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH SYSTEM—PROVISION FOR EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the Minister of Transport whether any arrangements are being made by the government with Canadian National Telegraphs to absorb the employees of the government telegraph and telephone service in British Columbia, on terms which will have definite regard to their seniority and superannuation rights in their present service?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have not received notice of this question. I can say, as I have already indicated, that when the facilities of the government were sold to the British Columbia Telephone Company and the Canadian National Telegraphs, there was an understanding that, subject to the employment requirements of the two private companies, it was the intention of both companies to go as far as they could in retaining the employees of the government telegraph and telephone service.

While I know that does not answer fully the question my hon. friend asked, that is as far as I can go at this time. If I can get on with my estimates I shall be able to discuss the whole matter prior to April 1.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EASTER RECESS—PROVISION FOR TRANSPORTATION OF MEMBERS BY AIR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with the Easter holiday. It is my understanding, either rightly or wrongly, that the appropriation available for members to travel by air will expire as of March 31. Is there or is there not to be provision, when Easter falls in the month of April, to rectify that situation?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall have to have the matter looked into. It would not be the intention of the government to impose any hardship on members as a result of this Easter adjournment. I shall have to have the matter looked into carefully to see if anything special has to be done in that regard.

DUMPING

ONIONS—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION OF MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): In view of the very great danger to the vegetable growers market from the large surplus of onions this year, will the Minister of National Revenue say what action the government will take to protect that market? I believe that a tariff of one cent per pound will be removed following March 31, and in view of the fact we have about 60 per cent more onions still unsold or enough to take care of the Canadian market well into May, has the government given any consideration to a measure that might prevent dumping of the large United States surplus?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): That is a question of which I have not received any notice. I shall have to look into the matter. I think the hon. member knows that there is a seasonal tariff that comes into effect about the time our own produce comes on the market. However, I think his question has to do more with the selling, or what he calls dumping, of what might be a surplus supply in the United States. I shall look into the matter.

Mr. Rowe: Supplementary to that, probably it is unfair to expect the minister to answer today, and I appreciate his saying he will give the matter consideration, but in view of the extraordinarily large amount of onions still unsold, will the minister give consideration to some measures to protect the vegetable growers? I think we have over 60 per cent more than we had this time last year.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): When the minister is investigating that, will he also investigate celery, because the same situation holds true in connection with that item.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

HAROLD C. BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if he can now tell me anything further as to the date on which I might expect the answer to my question about Mr. Banks?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): I hope that return will be ready for the hon. member tomorrow.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SENATOR MCCARTHY—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT ON PROPOSED VISIT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I had proposed to direct this question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who was here earlier this afternoon, but since he is not here now I shall direct it to the Prime Minister in a slightly different form. Will the Prime Minister consider the advisability of indicating to the appropriate representatives of the government of the United States how unfortunate it would be if a man holding an official appointment under the congress of the United States came here to discuss United States political affairs, as it is proposed Senator McCarthy will on April 20?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall bring the question to the attention of my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and have the matter looked into.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

LOSS LEADERS—INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether he will table in the house the report on loss leader practices which we are informed Mr. T. D. MacDonald has lately made?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): As that report has already gone to the restrictive trade practices commission, I believe a much preferable course would be to have it disposed of there on its merits with an opportunity to those affected by it to make representations. Then the final report of the restricted trade practices commission could be tabled here.

VANCOUVER—INQUIRY AS TO PROSECUTION OF ALLEGED COMBINE IN GASOLINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): May I ask the Minister of Justice if the government has made any decision yet in regard to the prosecution of the gas and oil companies in Vancouver arising out of the commissioner's report?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): In reply to my hon. friend's question, Mr. Speaker, may I say that we have not reached an opinion on that. We have not any advice from counsel as yet.

NATURAL GAS AND PETROLEUM

INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENT OF MARKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Inasmuch as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has now returned from Washington, is he in a position today to answer more specifically the question I raised in this house on Monday, March 15, relative to joint Canadian-United States co-operation in regard to the development of markets for Canadian petroleum, natural gas and by-products?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There has always been a desire between the two countries mentioned to co-operate. I visited Washington and called on Mr. Kuykendall, the chairman of the federal power commission. At his invitation I also met his colleagues. We talked over mutual problems, and I think it would be his feeling, as it is mine, that we do co-operate on matters affecting our two countries.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING OWNED, OPERATED AND CONTROLLED BY THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved:

That a sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, be appointed to consider the accounts and estimates and bills relating thereto of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys; and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers, and records and to report from time to time and that notwithstanding standing order 65, in relation to the limitation of the number of members, the said committee consists of Messrs: Benidickson, Carter, Cavers, Churchill, Conacher, Dumas, Fairey, Follwell, Fraser (Peterborough), Fulton, Gillis, Hahn, Hanna, Harrison, Healy, James, Knight, Langlois (Gaspe), Macdonnell (Greenwood), MacLean, McCulloch (Pictou), Murphy (Westmorland), Pouliot, Shaw, Villeneuve, Weaver.

He said: It has been my practice in connection with the establishment of this committee to make a very short statement, and then if there is any purpose or opportunity, to leave further remarks until a later stage in the debate. All I wish to say now is that this is the usual annual motion that is placed on the order paper for the purpose of establishing a committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government. To this committee are submitted the annual reports of Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines, and any other matters in connection therewith, upon which the committee seeks to obtain information.

While I am on that point, I should like to say it is this committee that discusses many of the questions which arise from time to time during debates in this house, and particularly it is where the position of the Canadian National Railways may be explained in regard to making public certain information which for competitive reasons it is not advisable to give. It is to the witnesses of this committee who will be here that inquiries could be addressed. I am sure that the same kind of answers will be given by the witnesses there, with the reasons therefor, as are given in the house. I want to add this, too, that the annual report of the Canadian National Railways was just handed to me before I came down to the house. I am hopeful of being able to table it on Monday, so that members may have copies of it in their boxes. There is a small profit again this year of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $250,000 —I believe it is $244,000. This is the second year since the recapitalization of the Canadian National Railways in which there has been a small profit. And it is, too, a fact that the budget which the officers of the railways will bring down for discussion will be, at least in my estimation, an optimistic one for the year 1954.

The officers of the Canadian National Railways will hold themselves in readiness to submit to questioning before the committee, and it is my hope that it will be possible to bring the officers here during the last week of the month of March. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that is all I have to say at this stage.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in one way it may seem that, really, there is nothing to be said at all, except to follow along with the minister in agreeing with this resolution which sets up a committee to consider the report. In one way it may seem that it is not worth adding anything to at this time.

But there are a few things I would like to bring to the attention of the house, because of what I think is the very great importance of this committee, and, I will add, the very great difficulty of feeling at the end of this work that one has really done all that the House of Commons expects one to do.

The president of the railways, at the hearing last year, referred at one point to railway accounts being a "statistician's dream"—by which I took him to mean that they were accounts so complicated that only a statistician could really feel that he had got to the bottom of them. In any event I invite the house to consider the great importance of the work done by the committee, by reason of the great magnitude of the operations carried on by the Canadian National Railways, and now to an increasing extent by Trans-Canada Air Lines.

The gross earnings of the Canadian National Railways, according to the last report I read, were well over $600 million and the earnings of Trans-Canada Air Lines not very far below $100 million. So that we have very great enterprises to consider. And when we bear in mind further that in the committee we are always asked—and I think rightly so—to recommend further heavy capital expenditures, it almost makes one dizzy at times to think of the amounts which have been recommended by the committee from time to time—recommended on the basis of careful reports given to us, and questions freely answered. Nothing could be said by way of criticism of that.

There was only one place last year where I was disappointed we did not get figures asked for and that was when we asked for comparative figures in respect of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I mention this because I hope the minister will make a special effort to see that we are given those figures this year.

There also occurs to my mind a question which I believe is often in the minds of members in the opposition. We work, doing our best, without any research staff—or virtually no research staff. It so happens that some of us who will serve on this committee are also serving on the banking and commerce committee, as well as on one or two others and, without the services of a research staff, it is difficult for one to feel that he is making the contribution he would like to make. One does his best, but he inevitably goes into a committee feeling that he is not prepared as he should be.

I want to stress again the responsibility this committee assumes; because at the end of our two days—usually it is only two days—we are asked to assume the responsibility for recommending large sums by way of further expenditures, further investments of the public money, on behalf of the Canadian National Railways—which already has a very large investment.

As I have already implied, I do not think those of us in the committee should represent to the House of Commons that in those two days we can do what we would like to do. If it were possible in some way to provide us with something in the nature of a staff to explore the figures and to answer some of the technical questions we would like to have answered, I believe a better job could be done.

I was interested to hear what the minister said about the likelihood of better figures for the year 1953, because until he had said that I had felt that the railways, like many people, were perhaps having a rather difficult time. Carloadings do not show a very glowing picture at the moment. I have the figures for the last six months of 1952 and the last six months of 1953. The figure for the six months in 1952 is 1,407,000 cars while in 1953 it was 1,329,000.

Perhaps even more significant are the figures for the first two months of this year as compared with the first two months of 1953. The carloadings for January 1953 were 209,891, while in 1954 they were only 179,290. For February 1953 the figure was 190,719 and for 1954 it was 185,000.

In answering a question concerning the unfortunate shrinkage in staff, when we were discussing unemployment, the minister on February 11 had this to say:

> I can say at this time that these lay-offs have been necessitated because of a decline in traffic—I speak now of course only for the Canadian National Railways—due to a number of factors, one of them being the decline in the traffic in the United States. There are a number of connections made by the Canadian National Railways at border points with United States railways, and the traffic coming in from there has declined substantially. There is also a substantial decline in other commodities in several parts of Canada having to do with coal and grain; and there is also the factor, I am sorry to say, of dieselization, which has added to the difficulties.

I should like to quote a word or two from Mr. Donald Gordon before the committee which met a year ago, when he was speaking to us about the earnings in 1952. He referred to the surplus of $142,000 and pointed out that if it had not been for the decreased interest charges there would have been a substantial deficit. He also referred to the divergent trend of costs and rate levels, and had this to say at page 15 of the report for last year:

> It is not surprising to find that the system ratio of operating expenses to operating revenue has worsened from 81·99 per cent in 1928 to 94·02 per cent in 1952. Indeed, were it not for a remarkable increase in efficiency of the railway machine, having regard to the higher traffic levels the financial results for 1952 would have been vastly different. The benefit of this over-all improvement in productivity amounts to many millions of dollars; all of this and more has been passed on to employees and the users of railway services. It is represented on the one hand by increased compensation, and on the other by the lowest average level of freight rates to be found in any country in the western world.

May I read at length what Mr. Gordon had to say about freight rates, at page 50. It was pointed out to him that freight rates had increased 98 per cent since 1928. But Mr. Gordon said:

> We are permitted to raise our rates to that extent of freight traffic. But the practical thing is this: There is a great deal of traffic on which we cannot raise the rates. We cannot raise them on the Crowsnest pass, and in connection with competitive traffic, and in regard to agreed charges, and things of that kind. So, if you try to explain just what has come about, you get into what is called the effective increase, and the effective increase in Canada turned out to be about 68 per cent.

We can all sympathize with Mr. Gordon's difficulties and I shall have a word to say about that later, but when we are considering the scrutiny which is given to the railway operations, and when we consider—and certainly if you accept—what I said a little while ago about the difficulty of a committee stepping in and in two days feeling that it had mastered this thing, then you will agree with me when I say it is desirable from time to time that there should be an outside scrutiny such as we had some years ago in the Turgeon report. I want to read briefly from that because recommendations are made there which I think are very important and which should be brought to the attention of the house. First of all, I wish to bring to the attention of the house a recommendation made by the Turgeon commission in the following terms, as found at page 280 of their report:

All this leads to the question whether the policy of close co-ordination and central control to which parliament seemed inclined to commit itself in the Transport Act of 1938, should not be invoked once again with the view to its extension rather than to its restriction which has been the trend of more recent enactments. If this policy of 1938 can be revised and made effective it should properly have its beginning in the establishment of a strong control organism capable of taking the task in hand. Today there are three separate bodies, each charged with the control (a more or less extensive control in each case) of a part of Canada's transportation system. They are the board of transport commissioners, the air transport board and the Canadian maritime commission. It must be difficult, with this dispersion of control, to apply to all of Canada's transportation agencies like principles of regulation for the accomplishment of a common purpose, viz., that of enabling each agency to perform its service advantageously and properly as part of a national transportation structure. The tendency of a separate independent body is to formulate policy affecting transportation without regard to the relationship of the various agencies to each other. This anomaly should give way to the constitution of a central authority which will be able to take in hand the major task of co-ordinated control, having at its disposal all the benefits acquired from the experience of the separate bodies in recent years.

Another recommendation of the Turgeon commission which should be mentioned is found on page 218, where they speak about the simplification of accounting. They recommend—and I shall read very briefly here—

Mr. Chevrier: Uniformity.

Mr. Macdonnell: Uniformity. They recommend:

That the railway act be amended so that the board of transport commissioners shall:

(a) be empowered and directed to prescribe as soon as practicable a uniform classification and system of accounts and reports for rail items for the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways. Such classification and system of accounts and reports to distinguish clearly between rail and non-rail items.

I shall not read the rest of it; the reference is there. My understanding with regard to that is that it has been relegated to an accountant in Montreal for report and the report has been made. One would hope that action can speedily be taken. It is now three and one-half years since the Turgeon report. Perhaps one cannot use Churchill's phrase, his routine phrase: "Action this day." We cannot expect that from the minister, but I would suggest that he might speed it up as far as he can.

Another recommendation of the Turgeon commission had to do with equalization of freight rates; and even those of us who do not know as much about the railway business as we should like to, realize what a terribly difficult, complicated and perplexing task that is. The Turgeon commission has a good deal to say about that, and, as I say, that has at least begun. I understand that the equalization rates have already been applied to first-class freight but only a beginning has been made on commodity rates. I can understand a good deal of difficulty in it in the midst of frequent applications for further rate increases, but three and one-half years is a long time. I hope that it can come along before too long.

Then, I want to say a little about the importance of the Canadian Pacific Railway as a yardstick. We talk about that a great deal and I do very sincerely say that even those of us who prefer that as much as possible in our country shall be done by private enterprise realize the background which brought about the formation of the Canadian National Railways. We have understood the difficulties that surrounded it in its discharge of its task, but we have always taken the position that it was a very fortunate matter that it had a competitor. We never would have been reconciled to its being a monopoly. Personally, I would be prepared to pay a substantial amount of taxes every year even if I felt a monopoly could save money, to avoid having a monopoly. I do not believe that but I would be prepared to pay a substantial amount of extra taxes every year if it were necessary to prevent such huge power getting into the hands of any body of men as to run all the railways of this country.

But I come back now to the usefulness of this yardstick. I feel that in the C.P.R. you have an organization which is acclaimed the world over as efficient, which has grown, developed and expanded in an orderly manner. It has had a much more fortunate progress to its present high position than the C.N.R. has, because after all the C.N.R. was originally a conglomeration of a good many railways, and I suppose the day has not yet dawned when the president of the Canadian National Railways may not find some fine morning another railway is dumped in his lap.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the hon. member permit an observation? While he has been very fair so far in the remarks that he has made, may I remind him the matter which he is discussing now is before the Supreme Court of Canada. The judgment of the board of transport commissioners having to do with the rate fixed and the rate of return to the C.P.R., and therefore the Canadian Pacific Railway as a yardstick for freight rates, has been appealed by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The decision for leave to appeal is now before the Supreme Court of Canada. In view of that, I had hoped that the hon. member might have attained his point in discussing it so far as he has.

Mr. Macdonnell: I thank the minister for bringing that to my attention, but I think I have an answer, which is this. I was using the word "yardstick" in the broadest way merely as a means of comparison. I was not for the moment thinking of it as having a technical application. If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to use the illustration by saying very definitely that I am not using it in any narrow, technical or arithmetical sense, but I need not emphasize it very much further anyway. I would like to say that if we are going to take advantage of the comparison—perhaps that word will get away from the difficulty—we shall need to have full figures available, and I hope that Mr. Gordon and his very able assistants who come before the committee will see that this information is fully available this year.

There is another matter I wish to bring to the attention of the house. Once or twice in the committee I have raised the question of the composition of the directorate of the Canadian National Railways. Let me say quickly that it is not with the intention of speaking critically of any member of the board that I raise this issue. They are all men of high reputation and good standing in their communities, and the last thing in the world I would wish to do would be to raise any question about any of them. My point is that I think there ought to be a larger and more representative board. Having been a director myself in a small way I do not take directors too seriously and I know managements do not spend their time thinking about what the directors are going to say. Indeed, I have remembered for many years a story I heard about the general manager of a company who was asked what the shareholders and directors would think about something he was doing. He said, "Shareholders! Directors! Who do you think is running this company?"

But to speak seriously again, I do feel that in this case a larger and more representative board, more representative in the sense that it contains representation from more elements within the community, would be more suitable.

This is particularly important in view of the fact that the railways, I believe, may be facing problems of special difficulty, in spite of what the minister said this afternoon about a relatively favourable 1953 report. I shall suggest when the committee meets that the question of a larger board of directors whose experience can be made available could be a great asset. I would like to develop that for a moment. After all, the railways deal with every business in Canada, in every area of Canada, and I would suggest that the executive officers would welcome the widest and best informed advice they can get. I suggest again, Mr. Speaker, as I have done in the past, that the question of the extension of the board, so as to make it more widely representative, might again be considered.

There is little more I wish to say, Mr. Speaker. I repeat, as I did at the outset, that this committee has a most important task to perform. The amounts involved are very large, the service that the railways render is very important, the difficulties the railways are facing are not lessening, but increasing in many ways, and for that reason I am glad the committee is being appointed, and I hope we will be able to do useful work.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we welcome this motion to set up once again this special committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government. We believe it is a good idea that our Canadian National Railways, our Trans-Canada Air Lines, and our West Indies Steamship Lines, should have the opportunity to appear before a committee representing the members of this house so that these members can ask questions and the officials of these companies can discuss what is our business with the representatives of the people of Canada.

I was glad the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) was able to give us some advance information with respect to the annual report of the Canadian National Railways, which he expects to table in a few days. I was particularly glad of the statement that again this year that report will show a slight margin of profit. This gives one the opportunity to say once again that we are pleased that parliament was given the opportunity a year or two ago to deal with a bill regarding the capitalization of the Canadian National Railways so that that capitalization might be put on a more realistic basis than was the case for a good many years.

However, Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Transport well knows, there is another aspect concerning the affairs of the Canadian National Railways with which I am not so well pleased. I refer to the fact that nothing has yet been done regarding the position of a great number of retired employees of the Canadian National Railways.

Let me say before I go any further that I am fully aware of the change that was made in respect to the C.N.R. pension plan effective January 1, 1952. I am aware of the fact that the results of that change were in the main twofold. The potential pension position of employees still in the service was improved by the change in the plan. It is also true that quite a large number of retired employees of the Canadian National Railways, men who were already on pension prior to January 1, 1952, had their pension position improved. That is fine as far as it goes, but it still remains true that a very large number of retired employees of our own Canadian National Railways are being asked to get by on pensions which are ridiculously low.

The Minister of Transport yesterday answered some questions of mine which are hardy annuals. I wish the day would come when it would not be necessary for me to put these questions on the order paper, but it appears that that day has not yet arrived. Yesterday the minister gave me in detail, by placing them on Hansard at page 3072, figures showing the pension position of retired employees in the various brackets set out in my questions. On that score his answer, of course, was satisfactory as he gave me the information which I had requested. But in relation to another set of questions of mine which appeared on yesterday's order paper, numbering six in all, the minister chose to give his answer orally. It took him about 10 or 12 lines in Hansard to give that answer, but it amounted to one word. That word was "No", and it applied to all six questions.

I will not take up the time of the house in reading these questions. They can be found at pages 3070 and 3071 of Hansard for March 17, 1954. But I may say briefly that they were questions asking whether any further consideration had been given to the pension position of retired employees of the Canadian National Railways since the matter was last debated in the House of Commons on May 12, 1953. Specifically I asked whether consideration had been given to the plight of those people by the Canadian National Railways. I asked also whether the Canadian National Railways had made representations to the government on the point. Further, I asked whether the government had on its own initiative considered the matter. To all these questions the answer was "No".

As I look at the figures that were given to me yesterday and the figures that have been given to me in response to questions in previous years, I begin to wonder whether the government is sitting back hoping that the grim reaper will solve this problem so far as the government is concerned. One of the groups of people about whom I have been asking questions from year to year is that group of employees who are on pensions of less than $25 a month. There are not very many of them. I desire to make it clear that it is because of a plan that was in effect many years ago that there are some pensions that low. Nevertheless, there still are some of these retired employees of our government-owned Canadian National Railways whose pensions are less than $25 a month. In 1949 the Minister of Transport reported that number to me as 55. Two years later that number was reduced to 24. Two years later still, in 1953, it was reduced to 17. Yesterday the minister announced that the number had been reduced to 14. Unless some of those 14 are fairly hardy specimens, judging by the rate of decease over the last five years, it will be only a matter of another two or three years until that group will no longer be with us.

In addition to that group whose pensions are less than $25 a month, there are still a great many whose pension is only the basic $25 a month. In 1949 their number was 2,743; in 1951 their number had grown to 3,256. Since that time that number too has been dropping. It dropped to 3,206 in 1953, and yesterday the figure given in Hansard was 3,200. I think the reason that number is dropping may be, in part, because of the decease of persons on those pensions and in part because of the improvement made in the pension plan with respect to the change that came into effect on January 1, 1952. The fact that that plan improved the position means that in the course of time this problem will not be as great as it is now. But I suggest that it is most unfair and most inhuman for the government just to sit back and let time and the grim reaper take care of this problem. I suggest that it is the responsibility of the government to provide some supplemental allowance for these people.

Committee on Railways and Shipping

I am going to say something more about that matter. I think I have an additional argument this year, one which I have not had in former years and which I welcome strongly. Before I advance that argument, I should like to summarize these figures that I have been throwing out, by putting them on Hansard in tabular form. I am not asking for the consent of the house to put any figures on Hansard without reading them. I am going to read them, but I will read them in such a way that I think Hansard can record them in tabular form. The figures are as follows:

	Number of Persons on Pension
Amount of pension	1949	1951	1953	1954
Less than $25 per month ..	55	24	17	14
$25 per month	2,743	3,256	3,206	3,200
$25.01 to $49.99 per month	5,870	6,008	5,832	5,087
Total number of persons on pensions of less than $50 per month	8,668	9,288	9,055	8,301

I am well aware that the reading of figures or the reading of a table does not, through the process of reading it to the house, convey anything very significant. But I hope the minister and hon. members who are interested in the plight of these retired C.N.R. employees will look at this table when it appears in Hansard tomorrow. In the first instance, hon. members will note what I have already pointed out in so far as that group who are getting less than $25 a month is concerned. Time, I regret to say, is taking care of that problem. Unless the government acts soon, there will not be much the government can do for these people. They are dying off at the rate of 3 or 4 a year, and there are only 14 of them left.

As to the others, those on pension of $25 per month or between that and $50 a month, the figures are interesting in this respect. I might say that I have studied the whole set of figures and the picture is what I shall now indicate. They are interesting in that they show that up until the time the new pension plan came into effect the number of people on inadequate pensions was increasing every year. It is shown in this table that the number in 1951 was greater than the number in 1949. With the coming into effect of the new plan —and it came into effect on January 1, 1952— the numbers in these brackets who were on these lower pensions started to decline. Time may solve that problem too, only it will take much more time because there are many more of these people, and there are still people coming on these inadequate pensions, some even coming on only the basic pension of $25 a month.

The table shows that in 1953 the total number on pensions of less than $50 a month had dropped from 9,288 to 9,055; and the figures the minister gave in answer to my questions yesterday show that the total number of persons on pensions of less than $50 a month had dropped to 8,301. In other words, there is a drop of something like over 700 in the last year. I think it would be a mistake to assume that it will continue at that rate and that one could count on this problem being solved in the next 12 or 13 years. I think it is fair to say, however, that that number will go down a bit from year to year. I suggest two things. The fact that it will go down is no reason that these people should just be allowed to die off by a process of slow starvation on these inadequate pensions. The other point I suggest is this. The fact that it would require a less and less amount of money each year to supplement these pensions to some proper level takes away any excuse the government might have for not putting an item in the estimates to cover the plight of these people. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, that is my request to the government, that they put an item in the estimates to provide a supplemental allowance to Canadian National Railways pensioners whose pensions are less than $50 a month. I submit they should at least be brought up to $50 a month, and I think a more reasonable figure, one I would be quite justified in requesting at the present time, would be $60 a month.

I said a moment ago that there was one additional argument in my quiver this year that I did not have last year, and I think I see by the twinkle in the minister's eye that he knows what it is. It is probably something he will boast about. I notice in the estimates that have been tabled for the fiscal year 1954-55 that we now have two items providing for the supplementing of the pensions of retired railway workers. One of them is an item we have had there for over thirty years, an item to supplement the pensions of people who worked for the old Intercolonial Railway. That item was first put in the estimates shortly after world war I to increase the amount of the pension retired employees of that railway were receiving. The pension they were receiving was a pittance. Even with the supplement added the amount they get is still but a pittance, but at least the principle is there. That need was met by an item in the estimates. It was put there in the early 1920's and has been there every year since. The amount keeps declining. It is down this year to $12,250.

Following item 478, to which I have just referred, is item 479 which reads as follows:

Supplemental pension allowances to former employees of Newfoundland railways, steamships and telecommunication services transferred to Canadian National Railways.

It is a new item. The amount is $17,000. We will get further details about it later in the session. Perchance members of the committee may obtain some information about it in the committee. At any rate, I welcome it. Is it not clear that if that can be done, not only for retired employees of the old Intercolonial Railway, as we have done for over thirty years, but also done now to supplement the pension allowances of former employees of the Newfoundland railways who were transferred to the Canadian National Railways, no one can gainsay the fact that the same thing could be done for the 8,301 retired employees of the Canadian National Railways whose pensions are still less than $50 a month?

Mr. Chevrier: The argument has no application to the point my hon. friend is making.

Mr. Knowles: I shall be interested in hearing the minister try to develop that assertion. To me it is merely an assertion. If it is possible to supplement the pensions of one group of railway workers in this country, bearing in mind particularly that all of them are government railway workers, surely it is possible to supplement the pensions of other groups of retired railway workers. I know that the minister is more or less resigned to hearing me make this speech two or three times a year. He knows it is coming whenever this motion is put on the order paper. He knows it is coming when we reach the particular items in the estimates. But I submit that it is time this question was taken, not just as one about which to debate, one to deal with in terms of the minister's arguments versus mine, but as one that should be dealt with on humanitarian terms, on a basis of justice and in fairness to these retired employees.

I hope that either here and now, or in the special committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, or when we are considering the estimates later, other members will indicate that they feel as I do about this matter. Communications have certainly been sent to a great many members of the House of Commons by organizations representing retired Canadian National employees. Those communications have come from organizations in the maritimes, from Toronto, from Winnipeg, from Edmonton, from Vancouver, and from other places as well. I do not think it is out of place for me to say that secretaries and other officials of some of these organizations have informed me of the favourable replies they have had from other members of the house. Of course the favourable replies are all from private members but they are from private members in all parties. These organizations have been assured that they have the support of quite a number of private members of the house. I hope they will indicate that support either now or privately to the minister if that is the way Liberal members prefer to operate.

But in any case I submit that these veterans of service with the Canadian National Railways deserve more than merely speeches and debates in the House of Commons. They deserve a supplement to their pensions, and I submit that the figures I have placed on the record, and which I have been able to put together from information the minister has been kind enough to give me, demonstrate the seriousness of the situation and the need for action. There was a time when the men themselves and some of us dared to hope that the Canadian National Railways might deal with this matter itself. That day seems to be gone. The pension plan has been revamped and put on an actuarial basis that does not provide for any supplement to these people.

I think it is pretty clear now that the only body that can do anything for these people is the federal government, and I suggest that the government, having put two items in the estimates covering retired employees of the Intercolonial Railway and former employees of the Newfoundland railways, should complete the picture and put an item in the estimates to provide supplemental allowances to retired employees of the Canadian National Railways whose pensions are in these lower brackets and whose pensions, in my view, should be brought up to a reasonable figure.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a couple of minutes. I had not intended to speak on this motion because it is one that is brought forward every year for the purpose of setting up a committee to look into the annual report of Canadian National Railways, its steamship lines and so forth. Usually the committee is composed of very competent members of parliament, and I think they usually do a good job. However, the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to which we have just listened is one that we have heard on other occasions, and I am sure that this group, as well as others, will support him in his plea for consideration for these particular pensioners.

But I am led to another thought. While his plea may be for these particular pensioners, there is a principle involved, one that applies pretty well to all industrial pensions. The fact is, whether it is the Canadian National Railways or any other company, that usually industrial pensions are paid for jointly by the workers and the company. A fund is established and the pensioner, of course, is putting by during his years of labour a certain portion of his salary, which is tantamount to saving for his old age or when he is retired.

Now, at the time that pension fund is set up and the amount of the contribution is struck, the amount of this pension looks fairly good and most of the employees are rather happy that they will have something on which to retire. When the day comes for their retirement and they receive that amount that the pension calls for, they find themselves in rather straitened circumstances by reason of the inflation that has taken place. Their pensions are worth only about half of what they expected they would be worth. In my view, this is a serious situation. Perhaps this condition will apply to all industrial pensions, and particularly those that were established some ten, fifteen or twenty years ago.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this condition cannot be corrected by the companies themselves. While the situation of those special individuals to whom the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is referring might be corrected by the Canadian National Railways, generally speaking where the value of the pension has been reduced by reason of inflation, that situation cannot be remedied by the industry itself. It can only be remedied by government financial policy. Until the government adopts a financial policy that will remedy it, then in my opinion the situation will not be remedied.

I have a friend who is a retired banker. I know, of course, that I cannot speak about that particular subject because we are talking now about Canadian National Railways. I bring it up only to indicate that the banking profession has usually been considered an admirable profession. Some of these retired bankers are today poor men, and can hardly exist on the pensions they get. Those pensions looked good when the scheme was set up, but by reason of the government's financial policy the value of the dollar has been reduced. I just want to make these observations. I am sure that the committee will be in competent hands, and that once again good work will be done.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I am always very pleased to see this committee set up, Mr. Speaker. I have had the pleasure of serving on it for a number of years, and it is always an education to sit down with the officials of the Canadian National Railways, the Trans-Canada Air Lines, and the minister who heads up that aggregation. There is a lot to learn if one pays attention to what is taking place.

In my opinion the good feature of this committee is that you have organizations like Canadian National Railways, Trans-Canada Air Lines and the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships who come to the House of Commons once a year and meet the representatives of the people. They give a detailed report on their business for the information of this house, showing how they functioned during the past year. I believe that is an example of something, particularly at this time. It would be impossible for organizations like Canadian National Railways or Trans-Canada Air Lines to get into difficulty that would cause them to go into liquidation. The members of this house and the leaders in government would have an opportunity of looking at the programs and policy with a view to keeping the organization functioning, if that were in the best interests of the economy of the country.

Now, that is something my hon. friends to the right should bear in mind once in a while when they decry the idea of public supervision or ownership of any organization. For example, the textile industry is a very important industry in the economy of Canada. During the past few months we have seen mills close their door with very little warning, and as a result the future of whole communities has been jeopardized. This all adds up to bad planning, bad supervision and no contact with the general public or those responsible for the economy of the country. The same thing is true in many other organizations. There is no need for me to enumerate them. When an industrialist can pick up the phone, call in a message to a radio station and have an announcement made over the air that will close out an industry in a section that may affect two or three towns and may mean that the livelihood of the people is destroyed, I think that clearly indicates the complicated economic picture that has developed in the world.

From time to time on this North American continent it is necessary for the representatives of the people to take a look at any given industry in any section of the country. In this way many of the things that are happening in the basic industries could be prevented. By means of this committee a huge organization like Canadian National Railways that means so much to the country, or Trans-Canada Air Lines, that means so much now and is going to mean more in the future, can come once a year to put their problems before the members who are elected from the various communities and thus keep the people informed as to what is going on in these organizations. Such industries as coal, textiles, steel and packinghouses have a great influence on the economy of Canada. I believe the time is coming when we are going to have to have a look at the management of these organizations to prevent what is happening in some of them today.

I am glad that the minister was in a position at this time to announce that at least the Canadian National had no deficit. For many years we sat in this house and listened to the huge deficits of the Canadian National. It just took a little common sense and judgment on the part of Canadian National officials and government representatives to realize that a revision of the capital structure was necessary. This was done, and the picture is brighter today. I am always glad to see the committee set up because I learn a lot in that committee. I have no hesitation in saying that I get more information and more education from that committee than through any other function I perform in the House of Commons. I look forward to the committee every year, with a great deal of interest.

There are many things I could say, but I am sure full discussion will take place before the committee, and I shall not speak at greater length now. I would rather talk face to face with Mr. Gordon and his officials about some of the problems I think it is within their province to correct—if we can get them in the right mood.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have been very much interested in what has been said by some hon. members who have spoken on this motion. I appreciate the fact that I shall have another opportunity to meet with my colleagues to discuss the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. I was sorry that I was attending the meeting of a committee when the minister made his cheerful statement concerning the past and the coming year in relation to the operations of the Canadian National Railways.

The committee we are now asked to set up is a very useful one. It is only fair that members of parliament who vote moneys by way of subsidies for the support of the Canadian National Railways should be entitled to some information concerning the expenditures of that organization. At times there are some complications. We are told that the company should follow the usual rule in business, that of rendering an account to members of parliament.

The case of the railways is a peculiar one. In the first place I wish to tell the genial Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) that, as always, he can rely upon my support. But it would be well for the officials of the railways to realize that members of parliament are in duty bound to exercise certain controls in respect of the way the railways are administered. That is only fair. We are asked questions by our constituents, and when we are not in a position to answer they are stunned; they cannot understand it. Therefore I hope the officials of the railways will realize that instead of having any bad feeling toward them, each time members of parliament attend sittings of the committee on railways and shipping and ask questions it is for the purpose of helping those officials in the administration of the railways. We do not ask those questions to cause trouble. Some officials seem to be under the false impression that when members of parliament ask questions they are opposing the railways. This is not so; we are trying to help them, and it is unfortunate that sometimes the officials do not seem to understand this.

Sometimes decisions made should be more carefully considered beforehand—and I am thinking of the closing of some shops. The railways should consider the effect of this action on the communities concerned. As the Canadian National Railways are supported by the people of Canada, the officials of that system must give consideration to our people in all their dealings. I am not going to insist upon this at great length, because I am sure the Minister of Transport does not miss any opportunities to remind the railway officials of their duty. And so much the better for them. The officials may not like it, as sometimes they do not seem to like the questions asked in committee by members of parliament, but some good comes from that questioning. Fortunately members of parliament realize that decisions have been taken at times too quickly, and that something must be done by way of compensation. This is particularly true of my own county, and I am thanking the government for what was done.

The Canadian National Railways has a long history. At first it was a government railway. The Intercolonial was operated under the direction of the minister of railways; and older employees and members of their families are still under the impression that the government is in control. That is not the case, but it is in their minds.

I know the purpose of the minister is to leave the railway board free to administer the railways to the best of their ability. This has been government policy for a long time. On the other hand members of parliament are responsible for what is done by the Canadian National Railways, and because of that we are entitled to make observations for their benefit. I am not going to complain about what has been done in the past; I am concerned with the present and the future of the railways and their employees.

Very often we see officers of the railways, now grown in importance, who asked us when they were in smaller jobs for our support to gain promotions. But as soon as they get their promotions they say, "No politics with the railways; we are above politicians; we do not want politicians to interfere". To get their promotions they held us by the sleeve. That is the story of human nature. They were not independent when they wanted something. They got it, under false pretences; and now they seem to be very independent and give us the cold shoulder. They will not listen to what we say, not on their behalf but on behalf of the railways.

Human nature is weak. Some errors may be committed by humble employees of the railway as well as by those in high office. I am not going to insist upon this point, but I am sure all hon. members know what I mean. Why be so hard on a man with a family who may have made a mistake but who, in doing so, caused no damage to the railways, and who would like to be reinstated? Those questions should be reconsidered, because the ones who have suffered an injustice have the sympathy of the community.

With reference to the pension paid to old employees of the Intercolonial, it will be recalled that some time ago engineers, conductors, brakemen and firemen were paid only $1.25. They were paid a very small salary. The pensions of some of the employees of the Canadian National Railways are based on that salary. The government has contributed an amount to the provident fund of the railway and I hope it will be increased as a matter of justice to help those employees who were good servants of the railway at a time when the railway was administered by the minister of railways and canals. It is with the best disposition and the friendliest spirit that I am conveying these remarks through you, sir, to the Minister of Transport.

If the officials of the railways read Hansard, they will realize that all that has been said here has been said for their own good and that of the railways.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I do not propose to speak at any length on this occasion, but I wanted to say, as others before me have said, how much interested those of us are who are members of this particular committee. We do gain from that experience a great deal of useful information by firsthand reports from the gentlemen who are the heads respectively of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National Steamships and Trans-Canada Air Lines. I recall that from the work of the committee last year and the year before I myself gained quite a bit of important information from hearing these firsthand reports.

There is no doubt that western Canada has as great an interest in railway problems as has any part of this country, and more than most parts because we are so dependent upon the railway. We have not the shipping facilities that are enjoyed by the east and the west coasts and by central Canada with its great lakes system. To us then in western Canada the railway system ranks as the most important link for us with the rest of the world. The importance of the railway system in western Canada is easily observed from a map showing the extent of the railway system stretching for so many hundreds of miles and criss-crossing the great western prairie country where such abundant crops are grown. Now we find the development of the railway system stretching farther and farther northward, notably recently into the northern parts of the province of Manitoba in connection with the mineral developments at Lynn Lake. Therefore, so far as western Canada is concerned, the problem of the railways ranks of the highest importance. And throughout the years people from western Canada have very naturally taken an interest in the railways and their problems.

We are very much concerned with the question of freight rates and watch that problem with a great deal of interest. We naturally hope that when the C.N.R. makes its annual report it will indicate a profit and not a loss, because if a series of losses occur annually then the freight rate question comes to the fore, and in the last few years we have seen the circumstances surrounding that problem and the great increase in freight rates since the war, imposing an additional burden on the producers in western Canada and the consumers in that area.

From our point of view since we grow huge crops of wheat and other grains which must be disposed of in large part on the world markets, freight rates rank as a matter of major importance. Those of us who come from western Canada view with a measure of alarm, certainly with regret, the fact that the issue of the Crowsnest pass rates on grain is raised from time to time and not discussed in its fullest implications. The impression is erroneously conveyed to the public that that rate that was set a great many years ago is not now applicable under modern conditions. The erroneous aspect of the argument is that attention is not paid to the enormous increase in volume of traffic to which those Crowsnest pass rates apply, and the railways are benefiting from the development of the west and of the crop areas and from the tremendous development in the volume of grain shipped over our railways. Consequently, those of us from western Canada have to keep a wary eye on all matters in connection with freight rates.

We shall be interested in hearing the report of the president of the Canadian National Railways with regard to the effect of the changes in freight rates on the business of the railways, the effect in so far as the subsidy is concerned that was provided last year for the so-called bridge between the east and the west north of the great lakes. These and other problems will likely be brought to the attention of the president of the Canadian National Railways, and I hope we will get complete answers, as we have in other years got complete answers, on virtually all the problems raised.

I am sure there will be an interesting discussion with regard to the passenger traffic on the railway and its comparison in the subsequent report that we shall receive from the Trans-Canada Air Lines with the increase in passenger traffic of the air lines. I think I recall last year the prediction on the part of the air lines that the great majority of passenger traffic would soon be via air, and its effect therefore on the railways is a matter of considerable importance.

We got from the T.C.A. an equally able report on the development of that method of transportation, and that adds to the interest of the committee. I have just one final word to say. I note that the minister himself is not on the committee this year. I was wondering whether he was going to come on. Last year he was not placed on the committee at first, but later he was put on. It is of interest to me because of the fact that in the house, when questions are asked concerning these institutions, we are referred to the Canadian National Railways itself and to the Trans-Canada Air Lines. It is not easy to see the division of responsibility as far as the government is concerned. As I say, I notice this year the minister is not going to sit on the committee. Therefore I presume he is leaving it wide open to us then to direct our questions to those who are at the head of those three bodies that will be under consideration and he himself is to play no part in our deliberations.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind hon. members that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief, because judging from the contributions in the debate thus far it would appear to me that the affairs of the Canadian National Railways are in good hands and are operated satisfactorily, since on the whole there has been little or no criticism in the course of the discussion this afternoon. There are a number of things which have been brought to the attention of the government during the course of this debate, but it is not possible for me to deal with them all. However, I feel I must at least give some attention to one or two of the matters that have come under discussion. It is impossible, of course, to deal with all the suggestions or points made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), but there are one or two matters with which he dealt which I would like to take a few moments to discuss.

One had to do with freight rates and that was also discussed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) who has just resumed his seat. The position with reference to freight rates as regards western Canada and even the country as a whole is far better now than it has been for some time. I do not mean, of course, with reference to the general impact upon the cost of transportation, but with regard to the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation.

The recommendations of the royal commission on transportation have been implemented almost in their entirety, save for one or two exceptions. Dealing generally with freight rates, following the recommendations of the commission parliament enacted changes and introduced amendments to the Railway Act. One of them was to ask the board of transport commissioners to make an investigation with reference to the equalization of rates. That has been done in part, and a recent order has been issued by the board of transport commissioners equalizing the rates whereby the amount of differential was reduced or made to disappear making freight rates in the whole of western Canada from the Pacific coast to the Ontario boundary almost equal. Class rates in the east and west were brought closer together by an earlier order of the board which had the effect of reducing them in western Canada by 5 per cent, and increasing them in eastern Canada by about 10 per cent.

The bridge subsidy brought in two years ago, following the recommendations of the royal commission, covered a subsidy of $7 million concerning the bridge from Capreol through Sudbury, and on through to the head of the lakes to the west. The effect of that subsidy of $7 million, payable to the railways for the maintenance of their trackage, has been to reduce east-west rates by about 8 per cent.

Then the one and one-third rule was brought into effect by virtue of an amendment to the Railway Act which had an effect on all the western provinces, particularly Saskatchewan, Alberta, and a large part of British Columbia, and they received the benefit of the transcontinental rate plus one-third. Most of the recommendations of the royal commission in that respect have been implemented.

The other two matters to which I wish to direct my attention are the conditions of employment on the Canadian National Railways, and the question of pensions. Unemployment on the Canadian National Railways and the so-called lay-offs have not been nearly as serious as the house was perhaps led to believe during the earlier part of the session. I would like to place on record some of the figures which are pertinent to this issue. For example, in 1939 the average number of employees in the Canadian National Railways was 78,129. In 1951 that had climbed to 121,191, and in 1952, the last year for which figures are available, the total was 127,930.

The total payroll for 1939 was $122 million. For 1951 it was $381,654,000 and in 1952 it was $405,541,000. The average earnings per employee in 1939 was $1,500, roughly speaking. In 1951 that had almost doubled to $3,149, and in 1952 the average earnings per employee in the Canadian National Railways was $3,170.

With reference to lay-offs I have figures covering the period up to January 31, 1954. The total of 1,492 covers the reduction in the mechanical department staff at the main shops throughout Canada. The breakdown is as follows: In the Montreal shops 427; in the Atlantic region 248; in the central region 268; and in the western region 549. The reason why the western region total is larger than the others is because it concerns four provinces, and has to do with the shops at Transcona, Fort Rouge, Calder and Port Mann. Therefore, the total lay-off in the mechanical staff department was 1,492.

Generally speaking the total lay-offs in the Canadian National Railways in all spheres of activity amounted to 6,400 employees. These can be broken down into 2,200 maintenance of way men, 2,300 mechanical staff, and 1,900 others. While I include maintenance of way men who had been laid off at the end of January 1954, I should add that I know that since then many of them have been taken on again because these men are laid off and taken on dependent on the work that is being contemplated, so that whether we include the total number, or whether we only give the number in the mechanical shops, it is a very small proportion of the employment figure for 1952 which I gave a moment ago, namely 127,930 employees. What were the reasons for this? I would just like to take a few moments to give some of the reasons, and some of the hopes for the future.

The railway business is dependent upon the general activity in transportation services in the country as a whole. I said on an earlier occasion and I repeat now that the operations of the Canadian National Railways compare favourably with those of any other on the North American continent, and with those of the sister railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway. The decline in traffic is because of a drop in international traffic, that is traffic which is connected with Canadian National Railways at the boundary line, and also in the United States branch of the Canadian National Railways operated south of the border.

There has also been a reduction in the level of activity because of the extended use of diesel locomotives. These locomotives have been put into operation substantially in western Canada. Steam locomotives are being supplanted by oil burning equipment. The position in the maritimes I know is a serious one and causes much concern to all hon. members from that part of the country. However, due to certain conditions, which the president of the Canadian National Railways mentioned during the sittings of the committee last year, the program in that part of the country is on a longer term basis than that in western Canada.

Those features, namely the current level of traffic, particularly in the last four or five months, from September last year to the end of December of this year, are fully responsible for these lay-offs or reductions in employment. However, I am happy to say that for the present year, namely the early months of 1954, the figures indicate a slight improvement in the activities of the Canadian National Railways. I am informed that it is anticipated the physical volume of business in 1954 will not be too far removed from what it was in 1953. In fact, I do not think it will be much more than 1 per cent less than it was last year. That would indicate the soundness of the economy of the country as well as the stability of the operations of the Canadian National Railways.

I turn to this much discussed question of pensions. I would not want the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to think that he is alone in the advocacy of increased pensions for retired employees or present employees of the Canadian National Railways. If I have ever given the impression in this house that such was the case, I want to correct it immediately because there are coming into my office letters from members of parliament from all sides of the house, and more particularly from this side of it, making themselves advocates of the pensioners, retired or otherwise, of the Canadian National Railways. However, I think that the house is not fully conversant with this position. Perhaps the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) is the one who, in his discussion of it, put his finger on the circumstances as I understand them.

In order fully to understand the pension position of the employees of the Canadian National Railways, I think it is important that we go back somewhat to ascertain and to see what happened in past years. In order fully to appreciate the implications of the railway's basic pension plan of $25 per month, it is essential to go back to before 1935. Prior to that time, that is January 1, 1935, the Canadian National pension plan was based upon the former Grand Trunk Railway pension plan which provided generally a pension to employees on the attainment of age 65, equivalent to one per cent of the employee's highest ten-year average salary, multiplied by the number of years of service. A careful study born of the depression in the years immediately preceding 1935 demonstrated to management that the Canadian National system should no longer sustain the financial burden of this "free" pension plan.

However, since employees then on the Canadian National payroll were considered to have some moral right to protection against a revision in the plan under which they had previously been working, the 1935 amendments undertook, among other things, to provide a service pension calculated on the basis of the former Grand Trunk plan up to January 1, 1935, with a guaranteed contractual basic pension of $25 per month in any event. Thus the 1935 rules, as regards service prior to that date, preserved the former scale of free pension benefits to all employees and, through the medium of the guaranteed minimum, improved the position of many.

The next point I wish to make is that subsequent to 1935 those who were willing to pay approximately one-half of the cost of pensions arising from service after that date were afforded an opportunity to increase their pension benefits. Thus, an employee is permitted under the 1935 rules to supplement his free pension by contributions up to 10 per cent of his compensation, such contribution, with interest, being matched by the company to a maximum of 5 per cent of that compensation, with the company further guaranteeing that if the employee makes a 5 per cent contribution his pension will not be less than that payable to him under the former rules.

As regards employees who joined the service subsequent to January 1, 1935, the company provided a free pension of $25 a month which the employee was privileged to improve by contributions as aforesaid. The revised 1935 plan thus consisted of a small free pension plus a supplemental annuity on a money purchase basis within the aforesaid limits. It is therefore apparent that the Canadian National employee had only to contribute his share to the fund to obtain a pension considerably higher than $25 per month. It should be remembered also that he would have made no contribution in respect of the $25, and that the company would make a substantial contribution to the supplemental annuity if he took advantage of that offer.

Despite the provisions made for increased pension benefits, based on voluntary contributions, many employees obviously preferred the non-contributory guaranteed basic pension only. I am informed by the Canadian National management that in spite of periodic campaigns by management and labour representatives who supported the revised provisions the number of actual contributors has been disappointing. Out of 114,028 Canadian employees eligible to contribute only 41,828 had elected to do so as of December 31, 1953.

At January 1, 1952, some 3,200 retired Canadian National Railways employees, as has been said here, were receiving the basic pension of $25 per month. At July 1, 1952, there were, over and above that number, 190 former Canadian government railway employees, retired under the provident fund act, who were receiving the minimum pension of $30 a month. The position of these men was this, and here I stop to deal with those who are retired and those who are still working.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister were able to conclude within a minute or so, we might be able to pass the motion. The Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod has not yet arrived.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to conclude if I could do so, but I am afraid that I cannot. I could do so in three or four minutes.

Mr. Green: Go ahead.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to conclude this part of my observations, if possible. There are two parts to this question. First, there are those who are retired—and I think my hon. friend and other members are particularly interested in them—those who are retired and entitled, in addition to the $25, to receive the universal old age pension, or to receive old age assistance between ages 65 and 70, with a means test. In some cases that will mean a pension of $80 and in other cases a pension of $100 per month, if husband and wife are both over the age of 70 or between the ages of 65 and 70.

Mr. Knowles: Retired judges can get the old age pension too.

Mr. Chevrier: Retired judges are on a different plan altogether.

Mr. Knowles: They certainly are.

Mr. Chevrier: The plan here is that an employee was entitled to contribute. I wish I had time to put on Hansard the circular that the president of the Canadian National Railways had sent to the employees of the railways with reference to part 1 and part 2 of the revised pension rules effective January 1, 1952, wherein it is said to be possible for those who were in receipt of the basic pension to make a contribution and those who were in receipt of an already increased pension to receive a greater pension provided they made a further contribution. Unfortunately I have not the time to put on Hansard what I would like to put there at this particular moment, namely what was set out in that circular.

Mr. Fleming: Why not put it on Hansard? Put it on by consent.

Mr. Chevrier: If I can put it on by consent, I now table the circular that the chairman of the Canadian National Railways sent to all officers and employees from his office in Montreal on March 7, 1952.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister unanimous consent to put this circular on Hansard?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: The circular reads as follows:

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Office of the Chairman and President

Effective 1 Jan. 1952

Montreal, March 7, 1952

To all Officers and Employees:

The employees will have seen from my "23" message, dated March 5th, and references in the press, that the directors have made some revisions to the existing Canadian National Railways pension plan. As advance information for the employees there is given below a short description of the plan as revised. The detailed rules and regulations will be completed in due course, printed in booklet form, and a copy furnished to every employee.

The description given below will give the employees a fairly good idea regarding the provisions of the revised plan but employees approaching retirement age, particularly if they are contributing to the pension fund, are advised to communicate with the superintendent of pensions who will furnish to them such additional information they may need to exercise the options which are available to them. It will be appreciated that it is not possible in such a brief description to set out every detail of so comprehensive a pension plan, and it must be understood that the actual rules will be the governing factor in determining eligibility for and the amount of pensions.

D. Gordon
Chairman and President.

Short description of a revised pension plan for Canadian National Railways

The revised plan is in two parts.

Part 1 is the existing plan with some amendments designed to make better provision for present and future employees who become disabled, and also for early retirement. It provides a basic pension of $25 per month at the expense of the company, and also for a supplemental pension at the joint expense of the company and the employee. It is optional with the employee whether he contributes or not. He may contribute an even percentage of his compensation from 1 per cent to 10 per cent and the company will match his contributions after 10 years service but not in excess of 5 per cent. The amount of the supplemental pension is that which the joint contributions with compound interest will buy. The plan makes provision for benefits for service prior to 1935 when the present contributory plan was established.

The employee may select the type of pension he wishes, that is to say he may elect to take it in the form of an annuity payable during his life time, or payable during his life time but guaranteed in any event for either 5, 10, or 15 years, or in the form of a joint life and last survivor annuity. The amount of a guaranteed or survivor type annuity is of course less than the single life annuity but is the actuarial equivalent of the single life annuity.

As amended the plan provides pensions for disabled employees provided they have attained age 50 with not less than 20 years service. If the portion of the pension payable at the expense of the company is less than $40 per month (on a single life basis) the company will grant a special disability allowance so as to increase its portion of the pension to $40 until the employee reaches age 65. If an employee with these age and service requirements should die in service the pension board may grant a survivor benefit equal to one half the amount of such employee's pension, on a single life basis, but excluding the allowance referred to. Such benefit will be payable during the life time of a surviving spouse, or for 10 years from the date of the employee's retirement, whichever period is longer.

Normal retirement is at age 65 with 20 years service, but provision is made for early retirement with reduced pensions. For each year below age 65, one additional year's service will be required, so that an employee may retire at age 64 with 21 years service or age 55 with 30 years service, or anywhere in between where the age and years of service add to 85.

The optional and flexible provisions of part 1 are considered by many employees to be preferable to a more rigid compulsory contributory plan. It allows employees considerable freedom to shape their railway pension to their needs as they see them.

Part 2 is designed to meet the requirements of those who wish to obtain larger pensions and who are willing to join a plan under which contributions are compulsory. Employees will be covered by part 1 unless they elect to transfer to part 2, which election will be irrevocable. They will be given ample time to make their election.

Under this part the employee must contribute 5 per cent of his compensation and the company will pay the balance of the cost. The pension will be a percentage, based on length of allowable service, of the employee's average compensation during the last 5 or 10 years of service whichever is more favorable to the employee. The percentage will be 1 per cent for each year of service up to 20 years, 1¼ per cent for each year during the next 10 years, and 1½ per cent for each year over 30 years service. Fractions of a year will be computed proportionately. This pension will be payable during the life time of the employee. On the decease of the employee one half the pension will be payable during the life time of a surviving spouse, or for 10 years from the date of the employee's retirement, whichever period is the longer.

A provision is also made for pensions to disabled employees. These benefits are available to employees who have attained age 50, who have at least 20 years allowable service, and who are certified by the company's chief medical offcer to be unfitted for further service by reason of permanent physical or mental disability. If an employee with these age and service requirements should die in service the pension board may grant a survivor benefit similar in terms to the one referred to in the preceding paragraph.

The normal retirement date is age 65 but a provision is made for early retirement with reduced pensions, the age and service requirements being similar to those referred to under part 1.

The pension benefits are conditional on the employee having paid 5 per cent of his compensation throughout the period of his service from January 1st, 1935 or from the date he last entered the service if entry was later than January 1st, 1935, until the date of his retirement. An employee whose total contributions prior to date of transfer are less than the required amount will be permitted to make good the arrears during his remaining service by additional contributions, or lump sum payments, but if arrears are not made good the pension will be reduced proportionately.

An employee who transfers from part 1 to part 2 and who had contributed under the existing plan in excess of 5 per cent of his compensation, will receive repayment for the amount of the excess.

That position was recognized by the general chairman of the association of the men when he wrote to Mr. Cooper, the chairman of the pension fund of the Canadian National Railways, thanking him for the benefit of the assistance that was given by the officers of the Canadian National Railways in connection with this plan. I should like to put that on Hansard but I do not have the time. I refer to it and it can be found at page 112 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the sessional committee on railways and shipping of Tuesday, April 29, 1952. But I commend that letter to the consideration of the house. It indicates surely that the railways have given this matter careful consideration.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to conclude.

Mr. Knowles: Since you have asked unanimous consent to put documents on the record, surely one should be permitted to ask a question about them.

Mr. Chevrier: If I am allowed to conclude my remarks in time of course I will be glad to reply, but I should like to conclude because time is of the essence at this moment. In the light of the foregoing circumstances Canadian National Railways considers that it cannot now be reasonably contended that the employer should further augment the free pension. The Canadian National employee is better off than his counterpart on other railways and in many industries in that he has a pension for which he has paid nothing and he has or has had the money he otherwise would have been required to contribute if the plan had been compulsory.

For the aforesaid reasons Canadian National Railways has informed the government that it cannot in equity make any increase in the so-called basic, but more accurately termed, free pension of $25 per month. The government's position in that respect is that notwithstanding what has been said, but having regard to the legislation that has been placed on the statute books, such as universal old age pensions, and having regard to the possibility of old age assistance with a means test, it feels that under the circumstances it should not take any action at this time to increase the basic pension.

Mr. Knowles: A very unsatisfactory reply.

Motion agreed to.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

An act to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of housing and living conditions.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ADAMSON—REFERENCE TO CANADIAN PRESS DISPATCH

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. In tonight's press I see a report by the Canadian Press to the effect that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) had stated that I wished Canada unilaterally to raise the price of gold in Canada. This so shocked me, as it is the very antithesis of everything I have said on the subject for many years, that I ask the right for complete and absolute denial at the earliest possible occasion—which is now.

What I advocate now, as in the past, is not that Canada set a price for gold, but that she, as the world's third trading nation, establish a free market for gold in Canada, so that an acceptable price may be arrived at, based on the open market decision within a country not employing exchange or currency control. This is the whole basis of my argument about gold as a monetary unit, and as an agent of convertibility. I introduced a bill this session on this very point.

I regret I had to be out of the house in the dying minutes of the debate on gold, and I regret that my point was not understood about the free market. I hope the minister will understand this—and I see he is in the house. I know he did not misstate the point deliberately, but I wish to correct it now. What I said in the debate on the bill was that Canada should take the lead and establish a free market for gold, so that a price could be arrived at within a free economy—not that we could artificially peg the price at $50, or any other amount, which would be quite impossible.

I agree with the minister in what he said. I wish merely to correct any misunderstanding, because his suggestion is the very antithesis of everything I have said in the house for years.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I regret very much if I misconstrued the meaning of my hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. Adamson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker; and I also thank the minister.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

EXTENSION OF CONTROL OF STRATEGIC MATERIALS

The house resumed, from Wednesday, March 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 374, to control export and import of strategic materials.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I had not quite concluded my remarks yesterday afternoon at the dinner adjournment. It is always a temptation, when one's remarks in any debate are divided into two instalments, to repeat on the second occasion much of what was said on the first. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I intend as best I can to resist that temptation.

However, there is one observation I must make in regard to one point I was seeking to emphasize yesterday. I referred to a form of export control which the government had made use of when, on December 14, 1953, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) announced that the Canadian government had undertaken to limit the shipment of Canadian oats to the United States to 23 million bushels during the period from midnight December 10, 1953, to midnight September 30, 1954.

I said that that action was taken by the Canadian government in view of an imminent breach by the United States congress of the principles of GATT. I see that in the Canadian Press despatch reporting my remarks yesterday the comment follows that I did not say what that breach would be. Let me take that up and make quite clear what that breach of the principles of GATT on the part of the United States congress would be.

The explanation is to be found at page 861 of Hansard in the statement made to the house on December 14 last by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. His statement proceeds:

We have now been advised that the tariff commission—

That is, the tariff commission of the United States.

—has made its report to the President and that this report recommends restrictions on imports of oats into the United States. It was, of course, hoped that the President would not find it necessary to act upon this report. It can be taken for granted that both governments wish, if possible, to avoid getting into restrictions and counter-restrictions.

The imminent breach of the principles of GATT to which I referred was the threat that the United States congress would act at that moment to impose restrictions upon the importation of Canadian oats into the United States. Canada has supplied practically all the oats imported into the United States market. This is a matter of high importance to the Canadian producers of oats. What I complained of then, and most emphatically complain of today, is that the Canadian government should apply restrictions upon the export of Canadian oats to the United States with a view to forfending, apparently, the imposition of restrictions by the United States congress on the importation of Canadian oats into that country.

If the United States congress is determined again to commit a breach of the spirit and letter of the general agreement on tariffs and trade then the responsibility for that breach should be left precisely where it belongs—on the shoulders of the United States congress. And it is highly improper for the Canadian government, in the exercise of the power it possesses under the Export and Import Permits Act, or any other statute, to come to the rescue of the United States congress in that situation and impose export restrictions upon Canadian producers of oats.

We were not told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he made this statement in the house on December 14, what was the statutory authority under which the government was proceeding. One can only infer that it must have been the Export and Import Permits Act, which is being replaced by the measure now under debate. But whatever the authority was, I say that it was an improper exercise of that authority on the part of the Canadian government.

I had also dealt yesterday with a question which is coming to the fore in the capitals of not a few countries in the west, that of trade with Russia—trade, not simply in strategic materials, but the whole question of trading relationships with Russia. I reviewed what had been said in the United Kingdom recently in that regard. May I refer to a dispatch emanating from one other European capital on the same subject. It is a dispatch from Brussels under date of January 31, and contains this announcement:

Belgium and Russia today signed a new trade agreement worth 5,000,000,000 Belgian francs ($100,000,000) in trade to each country.

Russia will export to Belgium and Luxembourg cereals, small cars, celluloses, manganese, chromium, coal, tar, asbestos, cast iron, furs, tobacco, canned goods and other products.

Belgium will supply Russia with textiles, fish, vegetable oils, hides and skins, lead and chemicals as well as other products. In addition Belgium is to construct 10 cargo vessels, 10 cold storage ships, floating cranes and other marine equipment to be delivered to Russia over the coming three years.

The volume of trade under the new agreement is double that of last year.

In view of what is being said from London and from Moscow these days on this subject, and in view also of reports such as the one I have just read, I ask again in this house: what is the position of the Canadian government with reference to this subject of trade with Russia? It is one thing to restrict export of strategic materials, anything that by any stretch of the imagination could be of assistance to a nation that may be bent on aggression. There is no one in this house who would give anything to any aggressor nation that would be of the slightest assistance in furthering the aggressive intent of any such nation. But I think we should know what is the policy of the Canadian government on the subject of trade with Russia.

Now, sir, I wish to speak on another aspect of trade in relation to a bill that deals with attempts to control the export of what are called strategic materials. This is a rather different subject because, although it relates principally to any nation behind the iron curtain, it is a nation, in view of the United Nations' action, which is in a different category. I refer to China.

Trade with China is restricted, as the house will recall, under a resolution passed by the security council of the United Nations back in June, 1950, immediately following the violation of the border of South Korea when the communist aggressors burst over it and sought to overrun the southern part of the peninsula. That resolution of the United Nations has been binding upon Canada as a loyal member of the United Nations. Under that resolution Canada as a member is bound to prevent shipments of munitions and arms to China or to any intermediate country through which such shipments might eventually reach China.

As long as our relations with the United Nations are such as they are, and as long as relations of the United Nations are such as they are with Red China, I urge, Mr. Speaker, that it should be made quite clear that Canada will stand firmly behind her obligations as a member of the United Nations and behind that resolution. We do not wish to contemplate that the present situation may last forever. It is only a cease-fire that exists in Korea today. No one who hopes seriously for better days can contemplate that this situation can continue indefinitely in Korea. But, Mr. Speaker, as long as Red China stands in the category of an aggressor, branded as such by a finding of the United Nations, then I submit that it is the duty of Canada as a loyal member of the United Nations to stand firmly behind the present resolution which prohibits the sending of arms, munitions and implements of war either to Red China or to any nation through which such material may reach Red China. And similarly, I think that through the United Nations Canada must keep a very close examination upon trade that other nations are carrying on or proposing to carry on with Red China.

I have before me a dispatch coming from the United Nations, New York, dated February 7. It is a little lengthy, Mr. Speaker, but I think that every bit of it is of striking interest in relation to this subject. It reads:

Red China's trade with the non-communist world rose sharply during the first half of 1953, a United Nations survey showed Saturday.

The U.N. figures, published in the monthly bulletin of statistics, showed:

1. Communist China's exports to the free world increased from $151,100,000 in the first six months of 1952 to $205,100,000 for the corresponding period last year.

2. Her imports from non-communist countries rose from $112,200,000 in the first half of 1952 to $163,300,000 for the first half of 1953.

3. Countries increasing their trade with red China included Britain, France, Belgium, West Germany, The Netherlands, the Scandinavian countries, Italy, Austria and Japan.

4. While communist China's trade with the free world was increasing, the trend of Russia's trade and that of her eastern European satellites was just the opposite. There was a drop in the total trade between communist and non-communist countries of Europe.

Although the total dollar increase in red China's trade with the free world was not substantial when compared with the total volume of world trade, there was a percentage increase of approximately a third in both imports and exports.

The United States and India were the only major countries to have reduced their trade with the Chinese communists.

The table listed red China's exports to the United States for the first half of 1952 at $22,500,000 and those for the first half of 1953 at $4 million. Exports from the United States to communist China were listed at zero for both periods.

Britain's imports from red China rose from $4,500,000 to $10,900,000 and those of British overseas territories increased from $89,700,000 to $120,300,000. Western Europe's total imports from communist China increased from $26,400,000 to $55,400,000.

Britain's exports to red China increased from $1,800,000 to $8,700,000.

May I just observe before leaving that subject, Mr. Speaker, that it is clear that a large number of countries of free western Europe have been increasing their trade with Red China. These are countries that are members of the United Nations. It is quite clear that this trade therefore is not in so-called strategic materials. Nevertheless, I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter that must have close attention on the part of the Canadian government. There have been suggestions emanating from Europe that there should be a re-examination of the category of strategic materials with a view to narrowing the list of goods whose export to countries behind the iron curtain is prohibited. This is a matter that should be engaging close attention on the part of a government like our own which has a considerable interest in external trade. Even though we are doing no trade with China ourselves now, Mr. Speaker, we still have the liveliest interest in the matter of the trade of other free nations with China.

It will I am sure be the unanimous view of this house that it is imperative that every reasonable step be taken to prevent strategic materials that could be of any use in the aggressive plans of any nation behind the iron curtain falling into the hands of such a country. But we must have a statement of policy on the part of this government. When this house is asked to vest in the Canadian government very wide powers with reference to the export of Canadian goods as well as to the import of foreign goods into this country, it is imperative that there be a statement from the government and from the minister as to the policy of the government.

I asked, as I mentioned yesterday, on a previous occasion, now six weeks ago, for a statement on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to the position of the government with reference to trade with Russia. The minister's answers were evasions; but the time for evasion has passed, the time for a statement of policy from the government has come, and this bill should not be allowed to pass through until there has been an adequate and comprehensive statement by this government on its policy with respect to trade with these countries.

It will be recognized, of course, Mr. Speaker, that trade has an important part to play in improving relations between the countries of the world, not only between the western nations but between countries that have been behind the iron curtain and the west. That is the view that is coming to the fore, and more prominently in Europe today. It is most opportune that the Minister of Trade and Commerce returned last night from two days spent in Washington as a member of the Canadian delegation which went there for the purpose of discussing mutual questions in relation to trade. It is therefore appropriate that the house should hear tonight from the Minister of Trade and Commerce in relation to the subject of trade between Canada and the United States, in relation to these questions which are under discussion between the free countries as to their plans in regard to trade with nations behind the iron curtain, and with respect also to the matter of strategic materials.

Let the house realize that this bill purports to confer very wide powers upon the government. It is an enabling bill. It is a bill which vests very sweeping powers in this government. Many of its provisions are of the kind with which many of us in this house do not agree. They give such wide powers to the government that it would allow this government, if it chose, to use these powers so as to create discrimination between Canadian importers, and also discrimination as between exporters. It puts power into the hands of the Canadian government over wide sections of the whole Canadian economy. Powers of this kind should not be vested in government except under the compulsion of strictly emergent conditions.

That brings me, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, to the matter I raised yesterday. I urged upon the government a course which I believe is highly necessary and opportune. I recalled that when this measure came before the house in 1947, on the suggestion of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) it was referred to the banking and commerce committee. This subject of export and import control has not been before any parliamentary committee since 1947, seven years ago. There has been no detailed review of the operation of export and import controls by a parliamentary committee in seven years. It is a matter of high importance. The whole structure of our controls is before us again in this bill by which the government seeks not only an extension of those powers in point of time, but an extension of those powers in terms of their nature. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary at this time that the whole structure of the operation of our export and import controls should be submitted to careful study by the banking and commerce committee.

I am well aware as a member of that committee, Mr. Speaker, that the committee has a substantial volume of work before it during this session. It is studying, under reference from this house, amendments to the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act, but the indications are that the time these two measures will absorb this year in the committee is not at all comparable with the time that the study of two similar measures occupied in the banking and commerce committee ten years ago, at the time of the last decennial revision of the Bank Act. Therefore, I believe it is quite clear that the banking and commerce committee has time to give this measure, covering the whole of our export and import controls structure, the kind of careful review and study it ought to have now.

Let the house remember that there is a provision in this bill which contemplates that the control powers shall be in effect for three years until July 31, 1957. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the house ought not to part with wide powers such as this, to vest special powers of this kind in the executive branch of government for a period of three years, powers which can only be justified on the basis of an existing and present emergency necessitating the taking of energetic measures with respect to what we call strategic materials, without very careful scrutiny. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge that this measure should be sent to that committee for adequate study and for limitation of the period during which this measure is to have effect without further extension.

This is the kind of emergency legislation, and the powers it confers on the government are of a kind, which the house should not confer in any event for more than a year at a time, so that it retains control itself over the executive branch of government and guarantees in that way that it will have returned to it each session for review the measure itself and the actions of the government in pursuance thereof.

There are continuing dangers in a measure of this kind. Let us, in recognizing the fact that great dangers exist, realize that there is a need for effective control over strategic materials, and let us see to it that parliament retains a close check-rein before parting with powers as broad as these.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the C.C.F. group believes that a bill such as the one under debate is necessary in these troubled times. We believe it is necessary not only to control the shipment of strategic materials to certain countries in the world, but we believe also that it is necessary to use these powers to a greater extent to handle the export and control of certain peacetime products such as exist in surplus in this country today.

I listened both the other day and this evening with a great deal of interest to the speech made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). I believe the speech he delivered is probably as far removed from the attitude the C.C.F. group takes on this measure as it is possible to be.

The hon. member stated that on December 14 last the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) announced that restrictions on the sale of Canadian oats to the United States would be imposed. No one in this country likes to see restrictions being placed on the sale of Canadian oats to the United States. The hon. member for Eglinton said that such restrictions should not have been placed on the export of our oats to the United States by the Canadian government. He said, in effect, "Let the United States defy GATT, and let them if they want defy GATT and place an embargo on shipments of oats to the United States". I would far rather see producers in this country being able to ship 23 million bushels of oats to the United States than leave it up to the United States to break GATT, as I am certain they would and thus possibly keep Canadian oats out of the United States altogether. Certainly it is better to have some plan—

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I believe the hon. member is stretching the words I used. I did not say the United States should or would place an embargo on Canadian oats. What I said was that if there were to be restrictions imposed the responsibility should be put exactly where it belongs. In this case the responsibility was that of the United States congress and that is where the responsibility should be allowed to rest. The Canadian government should not be expected to snatch United States' chestnuts out of the fire.

Mr. Argue: That is exactly what I thought the hon. member had said. But even with this further clarification I believe the Canadian government placing partial restrictions on shipments of Canadian oats to the United States is far better than leaving it up to the United States, with the possibility that the United States might keep all Canadian oats out of that country.

We would like to see those controls in this measure having to do with peacetime goods used to a greater extent. We hope the day is not far distant when the restriction on strategic materials will no longer be necessary. We hope that a day of real peace is not too far distant when the sections of this act relating to strategic materials might be dropped, and the safety of our nation secured even though these controls have been dropped.

The hon. member for Eglinton made a big point of asking the government what its policy was in relation to trade with Russia. He said it is time that the government made a clear statement on its policy in relation to trade with Russia in ordinary peacetime goods. I could agree with that statement too, but I failed to hear the hon. member for Eglinton, in a speech that lasted more than an hour and a quarter, say what the policy of the Conservative party was with regard to trade with Russia.

Mr. Fleming: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I must say that the speech did not last for an hour and a quarter.

An hon. Member: It just felt like that.

Mr. Fleming: It may have seemed like that to the hon. member but may I say that, counting yesterday's instalment and today's, I think the length of it was forty-nine minutes. However, I did not expect my hon. friend to come any closer to accuracy than he has.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member was going to argue with the statement I made that he failed to enunciate the policy of the Conservative party with regard to trade with Russia. Instead, he rises to quarrel as to whether he spoke for an hour and a quarter, an hour and ten minutes or an hour and twelve and a half minutes. In any event, it was a long statement from the hon. member and as far as that long statement was concerned, there was no reference whatever to the trade policy of the Conservative party. Perhaps the speech was made too near their recent convention for the Conservative party to have a policy on trade with Russia. Of course, I think the Liberal party is in the same position when it comes to trade with Russia. When you ask them what their policy is, the Minister of Trade and Commerce who ordinarily does not do much skating, skates around the question and from his reply we really do not know what the government's policy is with regard to trade with Russia.

I should like to see all possible steps taken by the Canadian government to promote an increase in trade in ordinary peacetime goods and goods that have no strategic value. I think that the more trade nations in the west have with nations behind the iron curtain, the less danger there is of a global war. Any action with regard to trade that will raise the living standards of the people in western nations and that would, of course, help to raise the living standards of people in the iron curtain countries is something that I believe is in the interests of all the people of the world and of peace.

I therefore say that the C.C.F. believe that our government should take all possible steps to promote ordinary peacetime trade with the Soviet union. In that respect I might say that we are travelling in very good company. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, Right Hon. Winston Churchill, in a speech delivered on February 25, emphasized the importance of increasing trade with Russia as a means, not only of raising the living standards of the people in the nations involved but also as a means of reducing international tension and of promoting peace in the world.

When the hon. member for Eglinton came to discuss trade with China he did not take a neutral, non-committal position as he did in discussing trade with Russia. Instead, he said that a resolution had been passed by the United Nations banning trade with Red China and that he felt that no such trade should be undertaken. I can agree with that statement as far as it goes. But I believe the time is coming when steps must be taken to open peacetime trade with China.

The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) has returned from a tour around the world. I am sure that he himself has learned a great deal from that tour. Even though his reference to recognition of China has been modified at various times, I believe that at some time in the not distant future Canada must recognize the government that is in fact the government of China today. With that recognition by Canada and other nations in the western world I trust will go an opening of trade and a reduction of trade barriers, because I believe that trade in peacetime goods with China, as with Russia, is in the best interests of the peoples of the world and of peace. As we all know, a conference is to take place at Geneva in April for the purpose of discussing Far Eastern matters. As a result of that discussion I hope China may be recognized and that peacetime trade with China may be resumed once again.

I believe there are other sections of this bill that could and should be of real importance to the people of Canada but those sections today are not being used. I refer to clause 3, subclause (b), which says that this bill provides laws to implement an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment in reference to the export of commodities. I take it that it is under that very section that there is now a restriction on the sale or export of Canadian oats to the United States.

I believe that under that section there should be co-operation between Canada and the United States in distributing and selling surplus commodities in various countries of the world. We have in Canada many surplus commodities that are held in surplus supply in the United States. There should be active co-operation between Canada and the United States to share the market that is available and to undertake measures to increase the market for foodstuffs and other commodities that are in surplus supply. But as I see it, there is no real co-operation between the two governments. There is no agreement as to sharing of markets. Instead, Canada operates on its own and the United States operates on its own. In such a competitive atmosphere, Canada is likely to lose.

Before this debate is concluded I should like the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make a statement as to the results of the recent conference between four members of the Canadian cabinet and representatives of the United States government. Of course I do not know all of the decisions that might have been taken. I can only refer to the Canadian Press report that appeared in today's Montreal Gazette. In it there are quotations from the joint communique that was issued after the conference took place. We have seen other such conferences in the past.

I suggest to the government that unless some concrete agreement was made as to sharing of markets the result of this conference is likely to be as barren as other conferences on the same subject. I remember that on May 6 of last year, for instance, a resolution was passed unanimously by the house before the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made his trip to Washington. That resolution read as follows:

> In view of the impending departure of the Prime Minister for Washington this house desires to record its opinion that further and more vigorous efforts should be made by the government to bring about the removal of the restrictions imposed by the United States on the importation of Canadian agricultural products, in violation of the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

That resolution was passed unanimously by the Canadian House of Commons. The Prime Minister of Canada and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), armed with this resolution passed unanimously by parliament, went to the United States, met officials of the United States government, yes, met President Eisenhower, and asked that the United States lift the restrictions then in effect on Canadian agricultural products. As far as I know, that conference resulted in the lifting of no restrictions.

But since that time there has been further restriction, this time imposed by Canada, it is true, on the exportation of oats to the United States market. We know that restriction came about only because we feared that if we did not restrict the export of Canadian oats we might end up by losing the United States market completely. In other words, the delegation headed by the Prime Minister of Canada which interviewed President Eisenhower last May on this subject came back with no results.

It is true that a very long communique was issued following that conference. It can be found at page 5055 of Hansard of May 9, 1953. But even though it was a fine-sounding communique, even though both countries affixed their signatures to it, little or nothing came of the statement. The statement issued following the conference just concluded does not give me any more hope than the one issued following the conference a year ago. A Canadian Press dispatch in the Montreal Gazette of March 18 contains the following with respect to the recent conference:

"The ministers of both countries recognized that if surpluses were to be disposed of without regard to the impact on normal trade, great damage might be done, not only to the commerce of Canada and the United States, but also to the world economy", the communique said. "The ministers reaffirmed that it is the continuing policy"—

—"of their respective governments in disposing of agricultural surpluses abroad to consult with interested countries and not to interfere with normal commercial marketing."

It was precisely because the United States had, by action taken in the United States, been grabbing one market after another that Canadian cabinet ministers went to Washington, and apparently the best they could get from the conference was the statement containing the words that the ministers reaffirm that it is the continuing policy of their respective governments. Apparently the United States is going to keep on doing in the future what it has done in the past. There is an appropriation of $1 billion in the United States that may be used to dispose of their surplus products.

I am in favour of plans for the disposition of agricultural surpluses when that disposition results in feeding hungry human beings, but I do not like to see Canada let the United States do all the disposing of surplus commodities in that way. I think there should be some joint plan between Canada and the United States so that a program to dispose of surplus products may be undertaken with some agreement in order that Canada too may be able to dispose of some of her own agricultural surpluses.

I should like to see the parliamentary assistant, if the minister is unable to take part in this debate, tell us what real hope there is that Canada may have a substantial market for wheat and barley in Japan, Spain and other countries where reports of late have indicated the United States is moving in with gifts of food attached to the supplying of armaments. If these reports are correct, we are not going to be selling to these countries even as much grain in the future as we have in the recent past. Apparently the Americans are getting rid of their wheat in the following way. They say to Japan: Buy a dollar's worth of bullets and we will package a dollar's worth of wheat with the bullets and send the dollar's worth of wheat free.

Mr. Dickey: On a point of order, I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but this bill has nothing to do with the disposal of surpluses or anything of that kind. It is a bill dealing with export and import permits on strategic goods, and I do not think we can get into a debate on this bill on the broad subject that the hon. member has been discussing for the last ten minutes or so.

Mr. Argue: On the point raised by the parliamentary assistant, I hope—I am sure that he has—that he has looked at the bill rather closely and has observed that in the first place it is entitled "an act respecting the export and import of strategic and other goods". Then, under the section dealing with exports he will see that it says that the governor in council has power to implement an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment dealing with the export of strategic and other goods. It is because of that power that is in the bill, the same type of power that is now apparently being used under another part of the legislation to restrict the export of Canadian oats, that I am bringing this problem to the attention of the parliamentary assistant and the government.

Mr. Dickey: The hon. member is not even correct in that, but certainly there is no section in the bill that has anything to do with the disposal by the United States government of their surpluses.

Mr. Argue: There is nothing in the bill that has anything to do with the disposal of United States strategic materials, but it is possible under the legislation, and in fact I believe it is being done, for Canada and the United States to agree mutually to control the export of strategic materials.

Mr. Dickey: My point of order was that discussion on the bill should be with respect to its principle and not the subject that the hon. member has been discussing for some time.

Mr. Argue: I am perfectly agreeable to that. Discussion should be in accordance with the bill, and that is what my speech has been directed to. Perhaps I should refer the parliamentary assistant to clause 5 which reads as follows—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I did not want to comment on the point of order raised by the parliamentary assistant because I thought that he and the hon. member for Assiniboia were trying to compromise as to the value of their respective points. But when the hon. member begins to direct his attention to specific sections of the bill he knows that at that particular moment I am entitled to intervene and call him to order. He referred to section 3 (b) a moment ago, and I thought that was perhaps the end of his references to sections. But if he continues it is my duty to tell him it is not in order, when discussing the principle of a bill on second reading, to refer to particular sections of the bill.

While I am on my feet may I say that I take into consideration the remarks which were made by the parliamentary assistant, and we are largely guided by the knowledge he has in connection with the interpretation placed upon this bill by hon. members who intervened in the discussion. Personally, I confess that I was somewhat puzzled in listening today to the hon. member for Eglinton, and to the speech that is now being made by the hon. member for Assiniboia, because of the broad title of this bill and the fact that the words "other goods" were included in the title. I am hopeful that hon. members who have studied the bill will keep in mind that we must not go beyond the scope of the bill, and I shall rely on them to be reasonable about that.

Mr. Argue: I appreciate your comments, Mr. Speaker. You are correct, as you almost always are, that a member should not refer to specific clauses in a bill during discussion of the principle of the bill. Certainly, the assertion of the parliamentary assistant that this bill deals with strategic materials is correct, because those are the materials that the government has dealt with under this measure.

Mr. Dickey: My assertion was not that this bill deals only with strategic materials. It was simply that it had nothing to do with the disposal policy in relation to surplus materials.

Mr. Argue: This proves exactly what I was saying, that the government has decided to use this legislation in a certain way, but because the legislation gives the government power to do certain other things, I believe some of those other things should be done. If the parliamentary assistant will pursue the bill somewhat farther he will find there is an additional principle in the bill, and that is that action may be taken by the government to see that those things done under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, the Fisheries Prices Support Act, the Agricultural Products Act, the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act may be fulfilled. While the parliamentary assistant and the government are emphasizing one principle of the bill, I am emphasizing the other principle of the bill.

I believe that a measure such as this should be used in co-operation with friendly countries to control the export of commodities now in surplus supply in this country. I am hopeful, as I have said, that in so far as this measure relates to strategic materials, it can be dropped even before 1957 because of the lessening of world tension and because of the increasing belief that peace is assured. But so long as we are in the kind of world we are in today, the C.C.F. believes that a measure such as this is necessary. Even though this measure is adopted we trust that the government will take steps to expand trade with the iron curtain countries in peacetime because we believe that by expanding trade you will lessen international tension. As time goes on that will make this bill, in relation to strategic materials, no longer necessary.

Mr. Speaker: If the parliamentary assistant speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): I believe, Mr. Speaker, the majority of the points that have been raised in the debate on second reading could perhaps best be dealt with at the committee stage. However, there are one or two points to which I should address some brief remarks.

The first is with reference to the remark made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) in relation to the extension in time of this bill. The extension proposed is of the same length as the extension that was agreed to by parliament the last time the present legislation was before parliament. This period was selected because of the views that had been expressed at that time. The hon. member said in his remarks this evening that in his view the period of the bill should be for one year only. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we could discuss that more fully at a later stage, but the fact is that this is a period that should be convenient. The actual working of the legislation is under the review of parliament, not simply at the end of that period but at each session. During the discussion of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce any matters which hon. members feel are of importance in connection with the operation of this act can be brought forward and completely considered by the house.

There is one other matter I feel I should mention. It is the suggestion made by the hon. member for Eglinton that this bill should be submitted to the banking and commerce committee. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members, that that suggestion, which was made in the debate yesterday, was given careful consideration. I regret to say it was felt that suggestion could not be met, and that at this time this bill would be submitted for consideration of the committee of the whole house.

One of the major reasons for that was alluded to by the hon. member himself. The banking and commerce committee has before it very important legislation referred to it by this house, and legislation that will occupy the committee for some time. I was glad to hear the hon. member give an optimistic estimate of the manner in which the committee could deal with the legislation that is now before it. I hope that his prognostication is correct. I am sure his colleagues on the committee agree with me in that.

However, I do believe that the serious and important legislation the committee has at the present time will take some weeks, and there would be a considerable delay involved if this bill had to await the completion of the work now before that committee. I do not wish to suggest for a moment that this is a bill in connection with which there is any great haste. But its provisions are important and we are anxious to have the house consider fully the proposals contained in the bill and to explain, not only to the house but through parliament to the country, exactly what the proposals are; then to have them enacted into law. In this way the present legislation could be replaced by legislation which we believe is better designed to meet the requirements of Canadian business and Canadian trade under present circumstances.

One other matter is in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) in regard to the embargo on the export of oats from Canada to the United States. The fact is that that is not really relevant to the present discussion, because that action was taken under powers contained in the Canadian Wheat Board Act and is related only to that act, and not either to the Export and Import Permits Act, that is now the law of this country, or to the present proposed bill.

The hon. member for Eglinton asked very particularly that there be a statement with respect to the policy of the government in connection with trade with Russia and other iron curtain countries. The hon. member for Assiniboia also laid some stress on that point, but from a quite different point of view. The hon. member for Eglinton quoted a number of press dispatches relating to statements made respecting government policy in the United Kingdom. And as I understood the hon. member, he intimated his belief that the government of the United Kingdom had made satisfactory disclosure of government policy, and he wished that the Canadian government would do likewise.

Mr. Speaker, I think if I read first some of the quotations used by the hon. member from press dispatches from England, and then read the statements by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in this House of Commons, that he also read, it will be clear—and I believe the hon. member will agree with me—that the statement of policy of the Canadian government made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce is on all fours with the stated policy of the government of the United Kingdom, and is as complete and as clear as the statements to which he referred.

As reported at page 3097 of Hansard the hon. member for Eglinton quoted from a dispatch from London dated January 29, in which he referred to statements by a board of trade spokesman. The final paragraph of that quotation setting out the policy of the British government is as follows:

> It is, however, a firm government policy to encourage any possible increase in the trade of non-strategic goods.

And, farther down on the page:

> Britain wants to extend trade with communist countries in Europe "to the maximum, consistent with security needs".

And then, in the second column, referring to further comment from the British board of trade:

> "We welcome any increase in trade with Russia, provided it is within the non-strategic field."

In the light of those three quotations I should like to read the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce which were quoted by the hon. member and to which I have referred.

Mr. Fleming: Would the hon. member permit a question? Perhaps he could save the trouble of reading the minister's statement on the point if he would tell us whether he is authorized to say on behalf of the government that the statements which have just been read do represent the policy of the Canadian government with reference to the same matter.

Mr. Dickey: I think I can deal with that by reading what is already on the record. The words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce are quoted by the hon. member at page 3096 of Hansard, as follows:

> Trade between Canada and any country behind the iron curtain is carried on subject to permit.

That means a permit under the present act.

> In other words a permit must be issued by my department for any transaction concerning exports to those countries. There has never been any prohibition against trade in certain commodities, while there is a definite prohibition against trade in commodities that are on the restricted list.

That, as I understand it, is the policy of the Canadian government on trade with iron curtain countries—

Mr. Fleming: That is very different from the British statement.

Mr. Dickey: —that there is no prohibition on certain commodities, while there is definite prohibition against trade in commodities which are on the restricted list. Then the minister goes on:

> I refer to strategic materials. Subject to that reservation, if any Canadian merchant can arrange trade with Soviet Russia, his application will be considered by the department.

I believe that this is on all fours with the statements made with respect to government policy in the United Kingdom on the same subject.

Mr. Fleming: No resemblance.

Mr. Dickey: The hon. member also asked a question as to whether or not Canada is consulted in connection with representations regarding the number and kind of items on the so-called strategic list. The answer to that question is yes. As I pointed out in my statement on second reading of the bill, at the opening of the debate, this list is under continuous review by an international co-ordinating committee. Canada is represented on that committee. All these matters are discussed in the committee, and we are fully consulted and advised about them.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take up the theme that the parliamentary assistant has just mentioned. As I understood him, he has sought to convey the impression that the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the house on February 17, as recorded at page 2170 of Hansard, puts the Canadian government policy on all fours with the policy of the government of the United Kingdom, as declared by Prime Minister Churchill in the passages I quoted in my speech yesterday, reported at page 3097 of Hansard.

I submit to the committee that they are two different things. What the Minister of Trade and Commerce was doing, in reply to a question on February 17, was simply stating the present practice. He simply says that—

> Trade between Canada and any country behind the iron curtain is carried on subject to permit . . . There has never been any prohibition against trade in certain commodities, while there is a definite prohibition against trade in commodities that are on the restricted list . . . Subject to that reservation, if any Canadian merchant can arrange trade with Soviet Russia, his application will be considered by the department.

That is simply a statement of the present position under the act; but it is not a statement of policy at all.

What Sir Winston Churchill was saying, in clear terms, was that Great Britain wishes to extend trade with communist countries in Europe to a maximum consistent with security needs; and, further, that it was firm government policy to encourage any possible increase in the trade of non-strategic goods. And, again, the Prime Minister of Great Britain called for more trade with the Soviet union and eventually a relaxation of cold war embargoes as a means to reaching a workaday understanding with Russia.

Surely there is no need for any secrecy in the matter. We have legislation before the house dealing directly with this question of control of the export of strategic materials so-called and other goods. It should not be difficult for the government to put before the house a statement of policy. If the parliamentary assistant concedes the statement of the Canadian government to be on all fours with the statement made on behalf of the British government by Prime Minister Churchill in the passages I have just quoted, it should not be very difficult for him to rise in his place and say so, and at the same time say that he is authorized to say so on behalf of the government, in view of the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, although he is back in Ottawa today, has not seen fit to be present in the house during the discussion of this bill.

If the parliamentary assistant, I repeat, will say simply that the policy of the Canadian government is the same as the policy of the British government as indicated in the passages I have just read, then I need ask no further questions. It will be then quite clear, but until he does I think we do not wish to be told that some of these evasive statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on February 17 are somehow or other to be pictured as being the same as the statements made on behalf of the British government by Prime Minister Churchill.

Therefore if the Canadian government's policy is the same as the policy of the British government as it was described, then perhaps the parliamentary assistant can say so very simply now.

Mr. Dickey: I do not think I can do any better than repeat what has already been said. I presumed that the hon. member for Eglinton had quoted with approval the statements that he used in the debate yesterday afternoon, and on reading those carefully I came to the conclusion that they expressed exactly the same principle that had been expressed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this house. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said very distinctly and in clear words that so far as non-strategic goods are concerned there is not, and there never has been any prohibition against trade with Soviet Russia or with any iron curtain country. With respect to strategic goods there are those prohibitions. They exist and we recognize and abide by them.

As I understand it, from the quotations which the hon. member put on Hansard as representing the position and the policy of the United Kingdom government, that too is their policy; that they are prepared to trade with the iron curtain countries provided that it is within the non-strategic field. That is the position in Canada, and as I understand it, from the quotations put on record by the hon. member, that is the position in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Argue: I would like—

Mr. Fleming: I had not finished my point, Mr. Chairman. There is no sense in my hon. friend standing in his place and quoting again the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, what he said on February 17, because it does not touch on the matter of future policy. It is simply a statement of the present practice; it is not a statement of policy. It does not say at all that it is the policy of the Canadian government to seek more trade with the Soviet union or with other communist satellite countries. Surely, without my hon. friend referring to the remarks of the minister again, he ought to be able to say very simply, in the light of the statements made by Prime Minister Churchill as to the policy of the British government, whether the policy of the Canadian government is the same. Then all he needs to do is to say that it is the same and to say that he is authorized to say so on behalf of the government. But let us not have those references back again to the Minister of Trade and Commerce which do not bear on this question and are not an answer to the question.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Crestohl: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: I shall be glad to answer questions as soon as I get an answer to mine. I have asked a question of the parliamentary assistant—

Mr. Crestohl: Seeing that the hon. member is having some difficulty and doubt as to just what our policy is, I wonder whether he can tell the committee, or suggest to it, what the policy should be as suggested by his party.

Mr. Hodgson: We are not the government; you are the government.

Mr. Fleming: I do not propose to be diverted from my question by the very interesting interjection of the hon. member. It may well be—

Mr. Lesage: That is why you will never be over here.

Mr. Fleming: If the hon. member feels it necessary to run interference on behalf of the parliamentary assistant I can assure my hon. friend that I intend to stay with this question until we get a clear answer. It is a simple question. I thought at one stage that the parliamentary assistant was going to say so and clear it up in that way, but instead of that he keeps coming back and reading the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, which does not touch on the point at all. Therefore I renew, Mr. Chairman, respectfully, the same question that I have asked, which admits itself of a simple answer. Then we shall have an answer and we can leave the matter there.

Mr. Dickey: If the hon. member does not regard the very clear words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as being an answer I am afraid that I will not be able to be any more clear than was the minister; but I can tell him this. This is a free enterprise economy, and the government does not do business with Russia or with any other government in the normal course of events. But the policy of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the government is to give every assistance to Canadian businessmen in seeking business that may be available in Russia or behind the iron curtain and in dealing with any serious inquiry that they receive from such countries for non-strategic materials.

Mr. Argue: Is a review being made of the list of various materials now considered strategic in the hope that the list may be relaxed?

Mr. Dickey: There is a continuous review. There is the continuing committee to which I referred in my statement a few moments ago which has this list under careful scrutiny, and changes are made according to agreements reached in the light of the circumstances at any given period.

Mr. Argue: May I take it from the reply of the parliamentary assistant that at this time Canada is promoting a relaxation in the list of strategic goods? Before the parliamentary assistant replies to that I might tell him that according to the statements of Sir Winston Churchill the United Kingdom is reviewing the strategic list and is hoping that there may be—to use the Prime Minister's words—a substantial relaxation. Can the parliamentary assistant say whether Canada is supporting Prime Minister Churchill in the United Kingdom stand, namely, that there should be a substantial relaxation in the list of strategic goods?

Mr. Dickey: This review is carried on co-operatively. We are continually questioning whether or not any particular item is strategic, whether it has strategic implications, and the purpose of that review is to keep the list within the bounds of the national security of this country and of the other countries involved, but to keep it also from being unnecessarily broad in any of its classifications.

Mr. Argue: Can the parliamentary assistant say whether there has been any relaxation in the list during the last three years or whether it has been building up and has become more comprehensive? I take it from the statement made by Prime Minister Churchill that little if anything has been done in the way of relaxing the list of strategic materials over the last three or four years. Has this review within the last few years resulted in any relaxation?

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, there has been progressive relaxation over the last two or three years. I do not think it could be taken from the statement the hon. member attributes to Mr. Churchill that there has been no change. There have been changes, and I believe they have been in the direction of limiting the number of strategic items.

Mr. Argue: I appreciate what the parliamentary assistant has said, and I hope that further action will be taken towards an increasing relaxation of the list of so-called strategic materials, naturally keeping in mind all the time the safety of Canada. In order to acquaint the parliamentary assistant with exactly what Prime Minister Churchill said, I would like to quote part of the statement he made on February 25, as reported at column 592 of the British Hansard for that date:

> But a substantial relaxation of the regulations affecting manufactured goods, raw materials and shipping, which, it must be remembered, were made three or four years ago in circumstances which we can all feel were different from those which now prevail—a substantial relaxation would undoubtedly be beneficial, and beneficial in its proper setting bearing in mind the military and other arguments adduced. We are examining these lists and will discuss them with our American friends.

I take it, Mr. Chairman, from the remarks of the parliamentary assistant, that the Canadian position is substantially the same as that in the United Kingdom, and that Canada, in any review of the list, will be on the side of a further relaxation.

Mr. Dickey: I might just tell the hon. member and the house that our objectives are the same.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether we are on the clause I think we are, but it seems to me we are discussing things which are relevant to clause 2. Are we on clause 2?

Some hon. Members: No, clause 1.

Mr. Hansell: I would like to ask some questions on clause 2, but perhaps I had better wait.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I realize clause 2 deals with definitions, but in paragraph (a) it states:

> (a) "Area control list" means a list of countries established under section 4;

I am somewhat mixed up and perhaps you will call me to order as my remarks might be attributable to section 4, but I would like to ask the parliamentary assistant whether it is anticipated that countries in the area control list will be countries outside of the iron curtain. It seems to me that the countries which might be regarded as potential enemies of Canada would be those which we term iron curtain countries. However, I would like the parliamentary assistant to clarify that if he can.

I do not believe we should have any dilly-dallying around in respect to this matter. The bill is an important one in that it controls the export and import of strategic materials which it is anticipated may or may not go to our potential enemies. If it were not for that latter provision there would be no particular reason for this bill.

Paragraph (b) sets out the list of goods which have been established as being strategic, but as far as I can see all goods which might be sent to a potential enemy country must be considered strategic goods. I am not saying that we should break off any particular type of trade with our potential enemies. I believe we have got to be humanitarian in our outlook toward these things. Canada is a country which produces vast supplies of agricultural products which in the main are food products, and I believe we should attempt to dispose of our food products, if we can, to people who need them. If the people behind the iron curtain need food the humanitarian thing to do is to let them have it. But as far as I am personally concerned anything apart from food, and perhaps clothing, is a strategic material.

There is another point I would like to make while I am on my feet, and it is simply this. Once again I see no reason for dilly-dallying around. If we want to feed the people behind the iron curtain who may be hungry, then I believe we should do so even though, if we believe the propaganda, the iron curtain countries are the only ones with a high standard of living. We know, of course, that is not true. But if we do ship foodstuffs to iron curtain countries, as the hon. member for Assiniboia has suggested, then I believe it would be one of the best deterrents to possible war. However, that will not work if the people behind the iron curtain do not know that that food comes from Canada. What assurance have we that they would know? Is this food going to be labelled "Made in Canada"? I rather doubt it. I do not believe communist strategy would permit their people to learn that they are living on foodstuff which comes from what they would call a capitalist country.

All these things are part of the picture and I would like the parliamentary assistant to reply if he can. Perhaps my remarks have been somewhat general but I will repeat my first question: Are any other countries, apart from iron curtain countries, likely to come within this control area? The parliamentary assistant may not know, as a country which may be regarded as suitable for this list one day may not be suitable the next.

Mr. Dickey: In answer to the hon. member's first question with respect to countries within the area control list I would say that under the bill now before us, if and when it becomes law, it is not anticipated that there will be any countries on the area control list outside the iron curtain. The situation at the present time is that the area control list, under the present legislation which is now in effect, does include a number of countries bordering on the countries behind the iron curtain and which now have to be included. But with the powers that are provided for in this bill we anticipate that we shall be able to eliminate all those countries from the area control list and limit it simply to the iron curtain countries.

On the second question with respect to the nature of strategic goods, of course that is a difficult question and one that is continually under review by the committee to which I have already referred. However, I can tell the hon. gentleman that no food or foodstuff that is produced in Canada and is in surplus supply in this country is on the strategic list as a commodity that cannot be exported to any part of the world.

Mr. Green: Clause (d) of section 2 defines "minister" as meaning the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and including any person authorized by him to perform his functions. The powers of the minister under the act are very wide. For example, permits can not only be issued but can be cancelled, amended, suspended or reinstated. There are also other very wide powers. In actual practice what persons are authorized by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to exercise these functions?

Mr. Dickey: That is a power that is in the present act. The official who is authorized is the chief of the export permits branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Green: Only the one official in the department is authorized to act as the minister or for the minister?

Mr. Dickey: That is correct.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Export list of goods.

Mr. Fleming: In subclause (b) of clause 3 we find the words "to implement an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment". Will the parliamentary assistant tell the committee what governmental arrangements and/or commitments are now in existence?

Mr. Dickey: The only one, as I am informed at the moment, is the United Nations resolution relating to the shipment of arms and materials of war to Red China.

Mr. Fleming: Do we not have under this category the understandings entered into between certain of the western nations apart from the United Nations resolution? I understood that the western nations had certain understandings with reference, for instance, to the definition of strategic materials. Have no agreements or arrangements been arrived at, for instance, among the NATO countries?

Mr. Dickey: I am advised no. The situation referred to by the hon. member comes under section (a) which is regarded as related to the security of Canada and there is no firm intergovernmental arrangement or commitment that deals definitively with that particular situation. The only arrangements that can be properly described under the wording in section (b) is the United Nations resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. Fleming: Then will the hon. gentleman tell us more about the existing arrangement that is based upon subclause (a) which he has just mentioned?

Mr. Dickey: The NATO countries and some other friendly nations which are not members of NATO have a committee that meets in Paris where there are discussions of the list of strategic goods; where the interests of all these countries, including Canada, are represented; and where decisions are taken in common with respect to that list. Those decisions are observed by the member governments represented on that committee.

Mr. Fleming: I presume that is a committee meeting from time to time in Paris?

Mr. Dickey: I think it is in almost continual session. It is a continuing committee.

Mr. Fleming: In Paris?

Mr. Dickey: In Paris.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. gentleman will recall that in the passages I quoted last night from reports that came from London, there was one that I quoted from, as reported at page 3097 of Hansard, in which appeared these words:

> . . . it was stated authoritatively that Britain will submit new proposals for a revision of the embargo list to the United States and France through British embassies in the two capitals.

I presume that those proposals will be submitted to all the nations which are parties to the present arrangement. Last night I asked whether the Canadian government had been consulted in this respect. Can the hon. gentleman answer that question now?

Mr. Dickey: Yes. That is correct. These proposals would be discussed in that committee. I am not advised as to whether or not any definite action has been taken by the British government as indicated in the quotation put on Hansard by the hon. member; but I can assure him that if those proposals have been made or if they are made in the future, they will be referred to the committee to which I have made reference.

Mr. Fleming: Can the hon. gentleman tell us what is the position of the Canadian government with reference to proposals for a revision of the embargo list?

Mr. Dickey: We have not seen any proposals, so far as I am aware, arising out of the statement put on Hansard by the hon. member.

Mr. Fleming: That is the statement under date of February 25.

Mr. Dickey: But in answer to the hon. member for Assiniboia I made it clear that our objectives were similar to those in Great Britain and that our representatives would be authorized to discuss their proposals in the light of those objectives.

Mr. Green: What is the situation with regard to scrap metal? I realize that it would not be permissible to export that material to countries behind the iron curtain but at one time at least there were restrictions on the export of scrap metal to the United States and possibly to other countries which are not countries behind the iron curtain. What is the position today?

Mr. Dickey: I am advised that the export of scrap is under permit. Permits are freely issued for export from eastern Canada. There are some restrictions in western Canada because of local conditions and local demands which have to be provided for.

Mr. Green: That hardly seems fair to western Canada. They cannot export their scrap to the United States. They cannot send it back east without paying an extremely high freight rate. Yet the scrap metal from eastern Canada can be exported to the United States. How is that discrimination justified?

Mr. Dickey: I am informed that the western dealers have no complaint. They are currently getting $23 a ton for scrap whereas the eastern price is $21 a ton. I understand that they are quite satisfied with the position at the moment.

Mr. Green: I am not so sure of that. I think perhaps it is a case of being satisfied because they cannot be anything else, for the government has them by the neck. But what about the export of scrap metal to Japan? Is that permitted?

Mr. Dickey: Yes, I am advised that exports are permitted to Japan and that a substantial quantity has moved from Canada to Japan.

Mr. Green: Section 3 (c) reads as follows:

> To ensure that there is an adequate supply and distribution of such article in Canada for defence or other needs.

I presume these permits are required for scrap metal on the basis of "other needs".

Mr. Dickey: Yes, I am advised that is correct.

Mr. Green: Would there be the same power to control the export of iron ore to Japan?

Mr. Dickey: Yes. I am advised there would be if it were in short supply, but I understand there is no supply problem in that connection.

Mr. Green: I am very glad that the parliamentary assistant has made that statement because the Minister of Trade and Commerce has told me on other occasions that he has no power whatever to control the exportation of iron ore from British Columbia to Japan. The parliamentary assistant has now admitted that there is that power under this legislation. I would point out that iron ore is not in plentiful supply in British Columbia. We have very limited reserves and we are extremely anxious to have a smelter established on the west coast and are very much afraid that if the export of iron ore to Japan in large quantities is permitted the result may be that it will never be possible to establish a steel industry on the west coast.

I have here a return made on March 9 giving the amount of iron ore exported from the west coast to Japan in 1953. The amount was 958,046 tons, nearly a million tons which, for our deposits, is a very large amount. The year before the amount was 794,311 tons. I suggest that the government look into the possibility of expanding the permit system to cover the export of iron ore so that if it is a fact that there is a shortage of iron ore on the west coast exports to Japan can then be controlled. We are in the position now that our iron ore is being exported to Japan largely in Japanese bottoms and we are buying finished steel from Japan at a price perhaps ten times or more the amount we get for the iron ore. As I understand it, at the moment the government has no permit system so far as iron ore is concerned. Is that correct?

Mr. Dickey: It is not under export control now.

Mr. Green: Then I would ask that the matter be looked into and that some sort of export control be set up so that the department can at least prevent the export of iron ore to an extent that will be detrimental to the development of a steel industry on the west coast.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question with respect to subsection (a) which reads:

> To ensure that arms, ammunition . . . will not be made available to any destination wherein their use might be detrimental to the security of Canada.

Are we to assume that once any such material leaves Canada for the designated country we have no further control over it? What I have in mind is this. Suppose, for instance, that we shipped some material to Czechoslovakia. Have we any control at all over what that country will do with it? Is there anything to prevent Czechoslovakia from sending it to some other iron curtain country, to Hungary, let us say, or some other country—even to Russia, if you like? Are we to assume that once it gets to the country of destination we have no more control at all with respect to it?

Mr. Dickey: No, Mr. Chairman. Czechoslovakia is behind the iron curtain and we would not send arms, ammunition or anything of that kind there. There is export control on movements to that country.

Mr. Hansell: That is not a perfect illustration. Let us say we send it to some other country that is not behind the iron curtain and they do not have any such restrictive measure. It may be a good bargaining point for them to get some of our material and then trade it to some iron curtain country at a price for something they need. Is there anything to prevent that?

Mr. Dickey: Yes. The problem to which the hon. member refers is that of transshipment, for instance, an export from Canada to country A, which is outside the iron curtain, being received in that country and then transshipped to some country behind the iron curtain. That is a matter that is under careful and continuous study by the committee in Paris to which I referred, and one of the main purposes of the bill is to enable us to deal with acts which take place in Canada which contribute to such transshipment. That is one of the important new aspects of our control mechanism that we are establishing by this bill.

Mr. Low: In other words, the effective control is to determine the reliability of the shipper to start with. If he is not reliable you will not licence him. If he proves unreliable after he has a licence then you have recourse to the penalty provided in the act and you can take away his licence for the future.

Mr. Dickey: Yes. In general terms that is correct.

Mr. Green: Has the parliamentary assistant got figures as to the scrap metal exported to Japan in 1953?

Mr. Dickey: No. I am informed we have not got those figures. We can get them for the hon. member. I am also informed that the exports of scrap to Japan have been what is known as distant scrap, scrap that cannot be moved to Vancouver economically to be sold in the market there.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Export list of countries.

Mr. Fleming: Clause 4 relates to the establishment of a list of countries to be called an area control list. I referred last night to the list of countries established under order in council of January 13, 1953, as set out in the first column on page 3096 of Hansard. Has there been any change in the list of countries since that date? In the second place, is any further change now in contemplation?

Mr. Dickey: I am advised that there has not been any change in the list since that date, but there are very extensive changes contemplated if and when the present bill comes into force. As I explained to the hon. member for Macleod, when the bill comes into force we foresee the possibility of eliminating all countries from that list except those that are actually behind the iron curtain.

Mr. Fleming: Does that mean that Hong Kong will be dropped from the list? It has a peculiar and special position as the commercial gateway to China.

Mr. Dickey: That is a special case. We do not know whether or not it can be eliminated but that matter will receive consideration.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Import list of goods.

Mr. Argue: On clause 5, I wonder whether the parliamentary assistant might inform the committee what goods are on the import control list because of the scarceness of the article in world markets? In other words, what commodities are on the import control list under (a) and then what commodities, if any, are on the import control list under (b), which is to implement any action taken under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, the Fisheries Prices Support Act, the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act or the Agricultural Products Board Act?

Mr. Dickey: In answer to the hon. member's first question there are no items on the list because of scarcity, and there is one item on the list under (b) and that is butter.

Mr. Argue: What act does that come under? Is it carrying out the Agricultural Prices Support Act?

Mr. Dickey: It is the Agricultural Prices Support Act, I understand.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Can the parliamentary assistant tell us whether this import control list is to be a list of goods for which import licences are to be granted or a list for which import licences are to be refused? If it is for those to be granted, would he tell us how it will achieve the purpose of the act?

Mr. Dickey: In actual fact, Mr. Chairman, the list includes items in both categories.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Can the parliamentary assistant tell us how an item which appears on the list as one for which import licences are going to be granted under subsection (b) will ensure the best possible supply and distribution of that article? How is the granting of a licence going to improve the situation beyond the position which would be obtained if a person were free to import it without a licence?

Mr. Dickey: I am informed in some instances it is necessary to establish a quota, that is a ceiling, on imports. For that reason an article would be included in the list.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I would point out that the purpose of paragraph (a) is to ensure the best possible supply. Presumably that would be the most plentiful supply.

Mr. Dickey: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I could explain by giving the hon. member an example. When sulphur was in short supply in the world it was placed on the list of imports and permits were granted in order to see that sulphur got to the essential users, for instance, defence industries and that sort of thing.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): So it was not to control the import; it was to control the distribution after it came into the country?

Mr. Dickey: No, it was to control imports as well because there was an international arrangement with respect to the distribution of the world supply of sulphur.

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to say a word about clause 5 dealing with imports. I think the case for exports, prima facie, seems reasonable. We all recognize the necessity of restricting the export of strategic materials. I find myself, therefore, somewhat sympathetic to the export part of this bill. However, to use a slang phrase, I am absolutely from Missouri with regard to the import part of it.

The clause, of course, begins with these words to which we have grown so accustomed that even we in the opposition do not resist them as much as we should. It reads:

> The governor in council may establish a list of goods, to be called an import control list, including therein any article the import of which he deems it necessary to control for any of the following purposes . . .

I want to recall to our minds what these very simple words mean, because we are apt to forget. What that means is that four men, because I understand that four is a quorum of the cabinet, can establish a list of goods and put on a restriction against the import of them. It means if you are in the importing business your business can be ruined by a decision of which you know nothing, and of which there is no publicity until it suddenly comes down on you. Then, you find you are the victim of it. There is no appeal from it.

We all know there have to be orders in council, but I do not think we should allow ourselves to take them as the ordinary course of business. I think we should always expect to be satisfied how far they are necessary. Let us look at this clause on that basis. I noticed that in his remarks on March 16, page 3067 of Hansard, the parliamentary assistant seemed to take for granted that he needed to say nothing about paragraphs (a) and (b) of this clause. He confined himself almost entirely to paragraph (c), which is new. I read what he said:

Mr. Knowles: It is ten o'clock; how about reading it tomorrow.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take third reading of the bill to extend the time of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act; then continue this debate and then take the bill having to do with fire losses on government property; then in committee of supply and take mines and technical surveys.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 19, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

STANDING ORDERS

Third report of standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Harrison.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1953-1954

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1954, was presented by Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT, 1954

TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL PROCLAIMING ACT AS OF MONDAY, MARCH 22, 1954

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table order in council P.C. 408 which proclaims the National Housing Act, 1954, as of Monday, March 22, 1954. I am also tabling a copy of the regulations under P.C. 409 as well as P.C. 410 setting forth the interest rates. The maximum rate of interest for insured mortgage loans has been established at 5½ per cent. In respect of rental insurance loans, the same rate applies. The interest rate for limited dividend companies remains unchanged at 3¾ per cent. The maximum level of loans for home ownership has been established at $12,800 for a single house and $15,300 for a duplex exclusive of the insurance premium. Regulations for the operation of the act have been established and the form of mortgage deeds has been determined. There is provision that prepaid monthly tax instalments in the hands of the approved lenders shall bear interest at the savings account rate of the chartered banks. Explanatory leaflets and forms are being distributed so that the new legislation may be operative next Monday morning.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister when copies of the regulations will be available for distribution?

Mr. Winters: I think they could be made available almost immediately. I will endeavour to see that they are available Monday.

INCREASE IN MAXIMUM WHERE SERVICES SUPPLIED

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works with reference to a statement he made earlier this afternoon. Will the minister say whether consideration will be given to increasing the maximum amount in cases where municipalities contract with other subdividers for the purpose of putting in services, such maximum to be increased by a relative amount for each piece of property.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): That is a matter I shall have to take into consideration.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 378, to incorporate North American Baptists Inc., (Canada).—Mr. James.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SENATOR MCCARTHY—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT ON PROPOSED VISIT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) put to me the following question:

> Will the Prime Minister consider the advisability of indicating to the appropriate representatives of the government of the United States how unfortunate it would be if a man holding an official appointment under the congress of the United States came here to discuss United States political affairs, as it is proposed Senator McCarthy will on April 20?

I stated then that I would have inquiries made about the facts, and I have done so. The answer to the question is as follows: The government of Canada has no information about any visit by Senator McCarthy to Canada except for press reports which seem to indicate that some private individual or group in Toronto have asked or are considering asking him to visit Toronto. There is nothing in our law to prevent such an invitation being extended to or accepted by any citizen of the United States who is not barred from Canada by the provisions of the Immigration Act. I feel it would be completely inappropriate for the government of Canada to make any representation about a matter of this kind to the government of the United States.

Mr. Drew: I would point out to the Prime Minister that reports indicated certain possible requests to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and other details of that kind. I recognize that there would and could be no suggestion of refusing entry to any citizen of the United States. The question was directed to the possibility that, having regard to the circumstances, some indication might be made that our relationships would be best served by discussions of this kind on the other side of the line.

Mr. St. Laurent: Frequently invitations come to Canadians to visit places in the United States and to speak there, and I think it would be quite unusual and quite unfortunate if there were any attempt by either government to censor what might be said by a person who receives and accepts such an invitation. I know that Canadians who receive and accept such invitations are conscious of the delicacy of their position, and I would hope that any citizen of the United States who received and accepted an invitation to speak in Canada would be equally conscious of the delicacy of the situation that might be created if he went beyond what would be generally looked upon as reasonable bounds.

INQUIRY AS TO ENTRY OF RUSSIAN ARTISTS INTO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, may I direct this question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration? Is the minister aware of a statement recently made in Toronto by the Russian ambassador to the effect that the soviet government has gladly accepted the invitation from the Canadian soviet friendship society to Russian singers, violinists, ballerinas and other artists? If so, is it the intention of the government to allow these people, who are so anxious to charm us with their music, entry into Canada?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The soviet government did make application, Mr. Speaker, for a temporary visa for the people mentioned by the hon. member for Vegreville. As is our custom under these circumstances, we asked for information about the artists and the purpose of their trip to Canada. That information has not yet been received, and until it has been received no decision will be made.

TRADE

REPORT ON CONFERENCE AT WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he will give the house some report on the conference held at Washington this week between representatives of the Canadian government and representatives of the United States government, and in particular tell the house what agreements or undertakings were entered into on behalf of either of the countries with respect to trade in any of its aspects?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am glad to take this opportunity to tell hon. members something about the meeting. I consider it a very important meeting indeed. I believe it is the first occasion on which four senior cabinet ministers of the United States have met with four members of the Canadian government to discuss matters of common interest in the field of economics. I think that the meetings were summed up very well by the communique issued at their conclusion, which I have not seen published in full in the Canadian press. I suggest that the reading of that communique may give my hon. friend the answers that he requires. It reads as follows:

The first meeting of the joint United States-Canadian committee on trade and economic affairs was held in Washington on the 16th of March. The United States was represented by Hon. John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State, Hon. George M. Humphrey, Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Ezra Taft Benson, Secretary of Agriculture and Hon. Sinclair Weeks, Secretary of Commerce. Canada was represented by Right Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce and Defence Production, Right Hon. James G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, Hon. Douglas Abbott, Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Did I slip?

Mr. Argue: Years ago.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I continue:

—and Hon. L. B. Pearson, Secretary of State for External Affairs. In addition to the members of the joint committee, Governor Adams, the assistant to the President, the Hon. Douglas Stuart, United States ambassador to Canada and Dr. Gabriel Hauge, economic assistant to the president, participated in the discussions.

The purpose of the meeting was to provide an opportunity for United States and Canadian ministers to examine the trade and economic problems that are common to both countries.

The ministers noted that the flow of trade between Canada and the United States is greater than that between any other two countries. They discussed various aspects of present trade relations and agreed on the desirability of avoiding any action which would interfere with this trade from which the two countries derive such great benefits.

Since the common economic problems of Canada and the United States can be solved with greatest success in a world where the volume of trade is steady and increasing and where exchange arrangements are of a kind to facilitate such growth, consideration was given through the discussions to the need for action towards freer trade and payments on a broad front. It was agreed that few things would contribute more to the well-being and stability of the free nations of the world than a forward move in this direction. The need for such progress seemed all the greater at a time when many western countries are faced with the necessity of supporting effective defence programs over a long period.

The United States and Canadian ministers found encouragement in many of the economic developments that have taken place over the past year. They noted that the gold and dollar reserves of other countries generally have been rising; that there has been a marked improvement in the internal economic stability of many countries; and that these favourable developments have made possible some relaxation of import restrictions. Nevertheless, it was agreed that the recovery to economic health has not progressed equally for all countries. What is needed, it was concluded, is the creation of a more flexible system of trade and payments throughout the world which would offer greater resilience to changing circumstances and which would contribute dynamically towards rising standards of living. It was agreed that much of the necessary preparation for such an advance has already been accomplished by the work of the commission on foreign economic policy in the United States, by the proposals of the commonwealth economic conference, and by discussions within the organization for European economic co-operation.

In the meantime, it was agreed that it is essential that pressing, but possibly temporary, economic problems should not be solved by expedients which might make more difficult the advance on a broad front that was held to be necessary. One immediate problem which received close consideration was that raised by the accumulation of large agricultural surpluses. Special incentives and favourable weather conditions have operated in varying degrees to enlarge these surpluses. The ministers of both countries recognized that if surpluses were to be disposed of without regard to the impact on normal trade great damage might be done not only to the commerce of Canada and the United States but also to the world economy. The ministers reaffirmed that it is the continuing policy of their respective governments, in disposing of agricultural surpluses abroad, to consult with interested countries and not to interfere with normal commercial marketings. They stated that it is their settled intention that any extraordinary measures that might be adopted to reduce surpluses should result in greater consumption and should augment, and not displace, normal quantities of agricultural products entering into world trade.

In advancing toward a freer system of world trade and payments, it was agreed that existing international organizations would continue to play an important role. The valuable work already done by the international monetary fund, the international bank and the contracting parties of the general agreement on tariffs and trade was recognized. Ministers noted with satisfaction the arrangements which have recently been made within the fund to enable its resources to be used more effectively. Acknowledgment was also made of the useful service that has been performed by GATT in developing a code of commercial conduct and in providing a forum where multilateral tariff agreements could be negotiated and where the problems of commercial policy could be discussed.

It was appreciated that it is for countries whose currencies are now inconvertible to decide when and under what circumstances they might wish to make them convertible. It was also realized that enlightened economic policies on the part of the United States and Canada will materially contribute to establishing and maintaining broader freedom of trade and payments throughout the world. Because of the importance of that objective, the United States and Canadian ministers warmly welcomed the evidence of a desire in many countries to take decisive steps toward the restoration of a broad area of convertibility, and expressed a willingness to do their part to help in making such a movement successful.

The discussions at this meeting of the joint committee were marked by the friendliness and candor which are characteristic of relations between the two countries. At the invitation of the Canadian ministers the second meeting of the joint committee will be held in Ottawa.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister for some more specific information following the rather general statement which he has read. What steps, if any, have been undertaken with respect to removing the effect of breaches that have occurred thus far on the part of the United States congress in the letter and spirit of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, and also specifically what measures are likely to be taken in the reasonably near future with respect to the matter of convertibility?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to many violations of the agreement on the part of the United States. I know only one that can be considered a violation, and that was not of tremendous importance to Canada. I am speaking of the dairy products quota. It is my hope that future action in that direction can be avoided by neither party taking any action that will be in violation of the GATT agreement.

Mr. Fleming: The minister did not deal with the second part of my question, nor did he get the full purport of my question. I was not speaking of future breaches of GATT. I was talking about the possibility of taking steps to correct the breach the minister referred to, the restriction on the importation of dairy products from Canada. The second matter was the matter he mentioned in his speech, namely convertibility, and I would ask him if he could tell us more specifically what steps are contemplated in that direction?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): So far as the first question is concerned, no steps were taken to deal with dairy products. This was an exploratory meeting. I know of no way in which a meeting of that kind could reverse an act of congress.

So far as the second question is concerned, the conference made known to all the world that it considered that steps to convertibility might be taken according to the timing set by other countries, and that when convertibility was undertaken by any country co-operation from the United States and Canada would be forthcoming.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO UNITED STATES GIFT TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder whether the minister could tell the house whether he learned if the United States is proceeding with the reported gift of 500,000 tons of wheat to Japan, and whether as a result of the conference there will be co-operation between Canada and the United States in sharing the Japanese market for grain?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The United States informed Canada some weeks ago that they considered the food situation in Japan would warrant a gift of wheat and barley under section 550, and asked if we had objections. We said that we were negotiating with Japan and we had objections at that time, but the objections might be removed by further negotiations. Our negotiations reached the point where a commitment by Japan for wheat from Canada in 1954 and 1955 was considered satisfactory. We then told the United States we had no objection to their proceeding with the gift.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister say what the Japanese commitment to buy Canadian wheat is?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, I could not say that.

[Later:]

APPLICATION TO DEFENCE CONTRACTS OF SALES OUTSIDE INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to ask a further question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is he in a position to say the degree to which, as a result of this meeting, it is expected markets will be found for surpluses of wheat; and, in particular, will he find out whether or not the United States is now selling wheat to countries outside the international wheat agreement below prices fixed by the international wheat agreement, and in some cases by accepting foreign currency, or applying credits for wheat sold to defence projects in some of the countries. Would he say something about the wheat situation?

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): All I can say about the wheat situation is that while the volume of wheat moving into world export channels is lower than it was a year ago, Canada seems to be holding its share proportionately of the wheat that is being exported to world markets.

The United States makes it a practice to consult us about any sale that is made at other than standard terms, either inside or outside the wheat agreement. We have found that there have been few occasions where we could have any reasonable objection to the proposal that was made to us. Where we have objected to a transaction, satisfactory arrangements have been worked out. I may say I have no knowledge of any sale, either inside or outside the agreement, made on a dollar basis, that has not reflected prices that were generally competitive.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister say the nature of the transaction to which objection was raised, and where the United States agreed, after objection was raised, to drop the sale the United States had in mind?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Sales under section 550 of the mutual security act which provides that surpluses can be given to countries in need of wheat to meet the disaster of famine needs. The argument was whether the countries were really in need of wheat for such purposes, or whether wheat should be offered to them as a standard commercial transaction.

FARM STORAGE—INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce with regard to the prairie farmer who finds himself unable to deliver any of his grain. Is consideration being given to making advances through the wheat board to the farmer on properly stored farm grain, in order to relieve the critical financial situation now developing in the prairie provinces?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer is no.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

RESALE PRICE MAINTENANCE—EDITORIAL IN FINANCIAL TIMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister seen an editorial in the Financial Times of today's date dealing with recent price fixing legislation passed by this house, and stating that in the case of the vast majority of nationally advertised goods price fixing is still continuing?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of this question, and also for having sent to me a clipping of this editorial upon which in his notice he had asked me to comment. My first reaction after reading the editorial as a whole was that it did not deserve or require comment. But I think perhaps, out of courtesy to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, that I might offer this comment.

One of the functions of the present inquiry into loss leader selling is to consider the large number of complaints that have been received about price reductions in the sales of many nationally advertised goods. These price reductions are attributed, by the merchants who have made these complaints, to our federal legislation prohibiting resale price maintenance. I feel, therefore, that these complaints contradict rather conclusively the main contention of the Financial Times editorial.

BRIDGES

BURLINGTON CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. What progress has been made between the federal government and the Ontario government on plans for construction of the proposed new overhead highway bridge over the Burlington canal at Hamilton beach?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): The Ontario government has now submitted sketch plans of a proposed high level bridge over the Burlington canal, and we are actively considering the request for the federal government's financial participation in the project.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

VANCOUVER POST OFFICE—FINISHING MARBLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Is the Minister of Public Works in a position as yet to answer a question I asked him two days ago concerning the possible use of marble from Italy in the new Vancouver post office?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Yes, marble is being used in the Vancouver post office interior to finish columns and walls. The specification is for imported marbles, in the main Italian, because of colour and patterning required. A considerable amount of the marble used will be domestic. The tenders for this building were just received last Wednesday. The information has not as yet been obtained from the lowest tenderer as to what prices or materials he has included in his bulk tender for this particular trade.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LABOUR FORCE SURVEY—FEBRUARY FIGURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, notice of which I sent him in the hope that he might be able to answer it today. Since the minister was able to give the house on February 15 the results of the labour force survey for January, could he now give us the comparable figures for February, including the total number of persons now seeking employment in Canada?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not able to do so. And I might add that, since receiving notice of my hon. friend's question at lunch time, I did get in touch with officials who are responsible for the preparation of the monthly statistics on unemployment, and I am informed by them that they will be able to have the joint March release of statistics on unemployment available at about the same time, namely the 25th of the month, as they did with the report which was issued in the month of February.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I ask a supplementary question? Is the government's inability to give a figure due to by-elections next week?

Mr. Gregg: If my hon. friend infers, as was implied in the Gazette this morning, that there has been any effort at all to delay these figures, due to any by-elections, then I deny it outright.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE—RADIO QUIZ PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce this question: Is his happier-than-usual expression due to the ending this morning of the lengthy radio contest—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Some hon. Members: Order.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes.

Mr. Nickle: I might say I was wondering about that, because the answer was the one I gave to the house on February 23.

PACIFIC GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY

FEDERAL AID FOR EXTENSION OF FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Has the government arrived at a decision in respect to aid to the British Columbia government for the extending of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway? If not, when will the minister be able to make a statement regarding the giving of such aid?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The answer to the question is that the minister is not aware of any application having been made for aid from that quarter. Until it has been made, there will be no opportunity for rendering a decision.

[Later:]

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) arising out of the answer given by the Minister of Transport to the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe). Did not the premier of British Columbia make a submission requesting financial aid, among other things for the Pacific Great Eastern Railway, when he was down here to interview the federal government before Christmas?

Mr. Chevrier: If the Prime Minister will allow me to answer, I would say that the brief that was presented by the premier of British Columbia, and those associated with him, was a very long brief—if I remember correctly it was thirty or forty pages long—having to do with proposals, not only concerning the railways but other matters. In my capacity as head of the Department of Transport, I did not consider that as an application for aid in connection with the project he has in mind to extend the Pacific Great Eastern Railway from Squamish to Vancouver. And I am sure, from conversations I had with him afterwards, neither did he consider it as such. I understood from him that if there was an application to be made it would be made in due course; and it has not yet been made.

GRAIN

INCREASE IN DELIVERY QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he can say when producers may expect an increase in grain delivery quotas, and what proportion of marketing points are still on a five bushel quota.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Some progress is being made toward larger quotas. Unfortunately, as I pointed out earlier, the movement of wheat has been concentrated toward the Pacific coast, so that the situation is easier in Alberta than in the other provinces. But we have increased the quotas to seven bushels per specified acre at seven points in Manitoba, three in Saskatchewan and twenty-four in Alberta. We have increased the quota to six bushels per specified acre at twenty-two points in Manitoba, twenty-three points in Saskatchewan and fifty-nine points in Alberta. It is anticipated that further increases in quotas will be announced as space in the elevators warrants.

Mr. Argue: Would that be within the next couple of weeks?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The increases before mentioned have been made operative.

EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO 1954

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the third reading of Bill No. 376, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, before this bill passes, and in order to make the position absolutely clear, I wish to make a brief statement.

Gold is money. Money is of value because it is freely convertible into goods and services, by direct exchange. For gold to fulfil its major function, it must be made freely exchangeable into goods or services by the same simple operation based on agreement between buyer and seller. This is the essential qualification of the free market. It is the basic law of the capitalist or free economy.

It is my contention that the problem of gold will not be solved until this is brought about.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

EXTENSION OF CONTROL OF STRATEGIC MATERIALS

The house resumed, from Thursday, March 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. 374, to control export and import of strategic materials—Mr. Howe (Port Arthur)—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 5—Import list of goods.

Mr. Macdonnell: When the committee rose last night I had made a few remarks with regard to this clause and I had drawn the attention of the committee to the fact that here again we are up against the problem to which we have grown so accustomed, namely, handing over power in large instalments to the executive. I wondered last night whether perhaps I am getting a little bit hipped on this. I am quite sure many people in the committee think I am, but I must confess that, for some reason I am not quite able to explain, it did hit me last night in a much more emphatic way than it has for some time; and I might have come today in a repentant mood, Mr. Chairman, I might have come and almost apologized for what I said last night, if it had not been that in the interval there came into my hands a book on parliament called "The Passing of Parliament", written by a man who would appear to be a responsible authority and whose words might command some attention. He is Professor G. W. Keeton, professor of English law at University College, London. As I read what he had to say about the passing of parliament, and particularly the words that I am going to ask the committee to listen to—those who are interested in this—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell: —I came across these words, and as I say they struck me, and I wish to put them before the committee. You may ask, Mr. Chairman, what I think is going to happen from this, and I would not be so sanguine as to say that it is going to have very much result; but we in the opposition have to go ahead hammering on what we consider to be important, perhaps hoping that we may attract the attention of the public. Sometimes, after perhaps a year of what seems complete frustration, we do attract interest outside this house, and it is in the hope that I may do that that I read these words. I recall to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that they seem to come from a respectable and thoughtful source. I recall they are written about the mother of parliaments, which Tennyson, I suppose, had in mind when he said about his native land:

> A land of settled government,
> A land of just and old renown,
> Where freedom slowly broadens down
> From precedent to precedent.

I am going to read from a man who is apparently afraid that freedom is not broadening down at the moment; that it is actually in danger, and it is because of that I am asking you to listen to these words. I read from "The Passing of Parliament" at page 199:

> The problem which faces all peoples which are still attached to the democratic way of life is to find some means of curbing the power of the executive, and preventing it from usurping the entire functions of government.

The Chairman: Order. I have been listening for some minutes and wondering whether the hon. gentleman heard me when I said we were discussing clause 5 of this bill.

Mr. Macdonnell: You are the chairman, sir, but I suggest that clause 5 introduces the principle that we have so often had here as to how much power is to be handed over to the executive. If I am right in that, then I suggest that comments from worth-while authorities as to the relationship between the executive and us who are in the legislature is relevant. I defer to your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Order. I should think it would be relevant to discuss the clause which reads in part:

> The governor in council may establish a list of goods—

I should think relevancy would be, for instance, in discussing the list or the advisability of establishing the list.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I submit, and I am going to suggest, that no reason has been given us for the first two subclauses of this bill, and that the reasons given seven years ago are irrelevant.

I again submit it is relevant to raise the question as to the need for the powers. This clause is really asking extraordinary powers. I hope to be able to convince the committee, or I shall try to convince the committee, that these powers are not necessary. I believe the situation has greatly changed since 1947, and we are happy that it should be so. I believe we shall find that not very much action has had to be taken under these powers in the last year or two. I come back, Mr. Chairman, and suggest that I believe it is relevant to consider the whole question of handing over to the legislative branch of government the power to act by order in council.

The Chairman: No; I am sorry, but I do not think I should allow the hon. gentleman to open up a broad subject of that kind. The discussion in committee must be relevant to the clause, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to confine himself to a discussion of the clause under consideration.

Mr. Macdonnell: I will defer to your ruling, of course, Mr. Chairman. I now want to read clause 5 and I shall then read what the parliamentary assistant gave to us in explanation of it. Clause 5 reads as follows:

> The governor in council may establish a list of goods, to be called an import control list, including therein any article the import of which he deems it necessary to control for any of the following purposes, namely,
> (a) to ensure, in accordance with the needs of Canada, the best possible supply and distribution of an article that is scarce in world markets or is subject to governmental controls in the countries of origin or to allocation by intergovernmental arrangement;
> (b) to implement any action taken under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, the Fisheries Prices Support Act, the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act or the Agricultural Products Board Act, to support the price of the article or that has the effect of supporting the price of the article; or
> (c) to implement an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment.

I now wish to draw to the attention of the committee the remarks made at page 3067 of Hansard by the parliamentary assistant, as follows:

> The provisions of this bill, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the control of imports, differ from those in the existing act only in that the purposes for which import control may be exercised, as set out in section 5, include specific authority "to implement an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment." This change is being made to define more clearly the power that is required from time to time to carry out arrangements with other countries, particularly with the United States. It is preferable on occasion that we control our imports at the request of the United States, rather than leave it to the United States to impose export controls on shipments to Canada.

With reference to paragraph (c) of the measure, to which I shall return in a moment, I would just like to point out the extraordinary, unlimited range in this paragraph. The parliamentary assistant did not make any comment on paragraphs (a) and (b). I quite understand that, because they are not new paragraphs, and he probably feels that the reasoning which was used at the time the measure was passed would still be valid.

I would earnestly suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the situation has changed vastly since then. I now wish to read what was said by the then minister of trade and commerce, and I hope the parliamentary assistant will agree that the reasons given there are largely if not utterly inapplicable now. I wish to read from page 568 of Hansard for 1947, volume I:

> The provisions in respect of import control are equally necessary, though there may not be quite as general an understanding of the reasons therefor. In some instances the major supplying countries of a given commodity have taken control of its distribution and stipulate that an importing country, in order to receive an allocation, must agree to import no more than a stated quantity. Such a situation may arise from an international allocation of goods in short supply, such as the present international authority dealing with edible oils and fats. Alternatively, it may arise from one or more countries deciding to market a commodity by making allocations to the various importing countries. Where such an allocation is made it is necessary for us to ensure that the limited quota available to Canada is not acquired by a few of the bigger users, at the expense of smaller consumers. It should be noted that the supplying country, in many of these instances, establishes a fixed quantity for Canada, but it is no concern of theirs as to how fairly the share allotted to Canada is distributed among the Canadian interests that require supplies. That is something that Canada must look after herself.

I believe the parliamentary assistant will agree that much of what is said there is quite inapplicable in regard to the present situation. Indeed, I believe he will agree it is entirely inapplicable. For, whatever reasons have been used to place articles on the list within the last few years, it has not been these reasons. I hope the parliamentary assistant will be able to explain that.

As far as I can see we have no explanation for the continuation of paragraphs (a) and (b). Indeed, it would seem from an examination of the export and import control board reports that they have no relationship whatever, particularly to paragraph (a).

I would like to read the new paragraph (c) and to ask the committee to consider very carefully the wording. If you had allowed me to read that passage I intended to read, Mr. Chairman, which is full of interest, then what I am now going to read would have been of much greater interest to the committee. However, I am sure you would not allow me to take up the time of the committee now on that point. The wording of paragraph (c) is as follows:

> to implement an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment.

That is broad enough, but it does not say how that commitment is to be made, nor does it define in that paragraph what an intergovernmental commitment is, though I notice that the definition section says the minister means "the Minister of Trade and Commerce" and:

> includes any person authorized by him to perform his functions under this act;

In other words, as far as I can see, an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment can even be made by telephone. I do not see any reason why it could not. I do not know whether it could be made by the proper official. But again I do not see any reason why it could not, particularly when you consider the power that is being sought under this act. It appears to mean that the proper officials can take actions which really mean, in effect, that in respect of the action taken the tariff arrived at by a process of careful debate in this house ceases to matter, because what is the use of having a tariff if you say this or that article may not be imported at all?

That, Mr. Chairman, seems to me an extraordinary power for the government to seek. As I said before, it nullifies the tariff laws. It is really an unlimited power, as far as I can see. The paragraph "an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment" does not even say that it is limited to the effect of this clause. Lawyers might construe it that way, but the words are wide open. The parliamentary assistant himself, whom I would now like to quote, does nothing in any way to limit it. He says, as reported on page 3067 of Hansard of March 16, 1954:

> . . . the power that is required from time to time to carry out arrangements with other countries, particularly with the United States.

I do not wish to labour the point, Mr. Chairman, but I feel the powers asked for here are unprecedented. I do not like to use the word "unprecedented" because someone may drag up a precedent which is very strong. However many precedents there may be, I do feel the clause confers extraordinary powers. It is quite unlimited and unless the parliamentary assistant can suggest how it is limited we are, in effect, being asked to hand over this power to the executive, which means that four men sitting together can exercise this power and bind the people of Canada.

I have read what was said in introducing this measure years ago. I have argued that by no stretch of the imagination have we a situation which corresponds with that, or comes anywhere near approaching it. The report of the import and export control board for 1952 states that one of the things which was done by the order in council at the request of the United States authorities was adding non-ferrous metal scrap in order to control imports from the United States.

I would ask the parliamentary assistant to tell me by what stretch of the imagination that came in under the act as it was before. I am not able to think of anything which confers the power to do that, as the act was constructed before. I am ready to be corrected, but I assume the feeling that the government did not have the power is the reason for putting this clause in the bill now.

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, we have got used to this kind of legislation. We know the Minister of Trade and Commerce does not need legislation. He simply says, "Who would stop us?" We know he said in this house not long ago as reported on page 4197 of Hansard, April 21, 1953:

> If we have overstepped our powers, I make no apology for having done so.

I must admit, however, that other ministers are more considerate. They do come here and they do allow us to pass legislation. They, at least, allow us to be present at our own funeral and they allow us to be the instrument of our own degradation. If we pass this legislation we hand over this power to a government which is supported enthusiastically on the other side of the house and by some of my hon. friends on my right.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I stress the unlimited power in paragraph (c). There is no suggestion of any limitation. With regard particularly to paragraph (a), no reason whatever has been given for passing it. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that the reason used by his predecessor in 1947 is no justification whatsoever, and in particular I would ask him to give us some account of how this section is being used at the present time, or whether in fact it has practically petered out. I would also like to know if, in fact, the reasons for which it was originally instituted have disappeared, and whether it is now being used, as I suggest, for purposes completely different from those originally put before us. I believe that is a fair statement, but I am open to correction.

As I read these reports of the committee, I ask myself where they spell out in the act the things it has done. If that is so, I suggest that this section should not be passed. I hope that the parliamentary assistant will be able to answer some of these questions.

Before I take my seat I just want to say that if in fact it turns out on this account that this section has almost passed into disuse, I hope that we shall not be asked to pass it just because it is nice to have lots of power lying around. This gentleman in England whom I was not allowed to quote has pointed out at page 200 that you could have not only departmental regulations but even departmental circulars acquiring the force of law. I suggest that we should not slip any further in that direction and that this section as it stands at present should not be passed.

Mr. Argue: Before the parliamentary assistant replies to the hon. member for Greenwood I should like to comment on the statement that has just been made. If the hon. member for Greenwood and the members of the Conservative party are so strongly opposed to clause 5, it seems to me that the thing for them to do, in order to be consistent, is to call for a vote and to record their opposition to clause 5. If such a vote were called I think I would be prepared to support clause 5, because when I asked the parliamentary assistant last evening whether subclause (a) or subclause (b) was now being used, he replied that (b) was being used in the case of import control of butter. If this section were being used only for such a purpose, I think it would be of sufficient value to be retained. Of the stability measures the government has used in recent years one of the few that have really worked has been this program in relation to stabilizing butter prices. If this section should be taken out, I ask the parliamentary assistant whether that means that the government would then have no power to control the importation of butter into Canada. If that should be the situation—

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member not agree that it is better to have butter kept out by direct, open law than by indirect use of a statute which was probably never intended for that purpose?

Mr. Argue: I am not too sure whether I know what indirect law is as opposed to direct law; but in any event, if this clause is passed, I think it will be law. As it reads, it says that the government has power under this act to set up an import control list to carry out the purposes of the Agricultural Prices Support Act. I am not a lawyer but, speaking as a producer, if this type of law achieves a useful purpose, namely to stabilize prices for the dairy industry with regard to butter, it would seem to me that we should be extremely careful in tampering with it and that we should not oppose it. If, without this section, there should be no law that would control the importation of butter into Canada, it would mean chaos to the dairy industry. Production goes up in spring and early summer; and with a surplus of butter, the price would go down at an alarming rate. Following that event, with the drop in production of butter in the wintertime, the price of butter would go up probably by a similar amount and we would have the old cyclical fluctuations in butter prices that I think have been of value neither to the producer nor to the consumer. My question to the parliamentary assistant therefore is this. Is this section necessary in order to carry out the government's program to stabilize butter prices?

Mr. Dickey: Perhaps I might first of all answer the direct question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood in connection with non-ferrous scrap. He asked under what power in the Export and Import Permits Act import permits were issued in that connection. The power is in section 4 (a) of the Export and Import Permits Act which contains the words "or governmental controls in the countries of origin". Import permits in connection with non-ferrous scrap were required because of government control in the United States which made it necessary for a Canadian importer to have a permit from Canada to import the scrap in order to effect his purchase in the United States and to get his export approved from that country.

The hon. member for Greenwood has raised a question of importance and one that the committee properly should consider carefully, namely the justification for the passage of this section which gives certain powers to be exercised by the governor in council. In particular, that power under this section will be to establish a list of goods which shall be called an import control list. The hon. member for Greenwood suggested that the arguments for the justification of similar powers which were contained in the Export and Import Permits Act—and which will be replaced by the bill now before the house if and when it receives parliamentary assent—do not now apply. He quoted some of those arguments in favour of the granting of the powers at that time and has suggested that they do not apply. As a matter of fact I think he defied me to say that conditions had not changed and that these arguments still justified the inclusion of similar powers in the present act.

I would say to the hon. gentleman—and I hope he will agree with me—that the very reasons he has quoted justify the existence of some power of this kind which can be used when required. For example, in his quotations he referred to situations of shortage of a particular import in the country of origin. Mr. Chairman, when a situation of shortage exists in the country of origin, we have found that the practice of that country usually is to make certain restrictions on the export of that commodity and to require certain assurances from any importing country that the particular material is going to be used for a proper and, in some instances, for an essential purpose. The usual means employed by importing countries to give that assurance is the issuance by themselves of an import permit to the national of their country who wishes to purchase in the foreign country and to import.

Mr. Macdonnell: I appreciate that. Will the parliamentary assistant permit a question?

Mr. Dickey: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is it true to say that the situation which has just been described is much less than it was a year or two ago, that in fact there is practically none of that at the present moment?

Mr. Dickey: Yes, Mr. Chairman. As I said in the committee last night in answer to a question, there is no item which is under import control now under this subsection. The example I gave, and one that is relevant to the particular discussion we are having now, is sulphur and brimstone which was under import control for the very reasons we have been discussing. The situation of shortage has disappeared at the present time, but it might reappear for reasons quite beyond the control of the government of Canada or anybody in Canada. A similar situation might arise with respect to any one of a number of rather essential imports this country requires, and the Department of Trade and Commerce and the government have come to the conclusion that that is one reason why the existence of a power of this kind is still justified at the present time.

The hon. member referred to the very wide powers, to the existence of the power to create monopolies and to exercise discrimination. I think we will have to admit that in dealing with matters of this kind it is impossible to exclude completely possibilities of that kind. The hon. member referred to the four men in the back room, I think he said, as being able to exercise these powers and suggested that that brought thoughts to mind of the possibility of quite serious difficulties arising. In judging that, I think parliament is justified in looking at how the power has been exercised. I think that is a fair test. I think the hon. member will agree with that. He may argue with some justification that past performance is not a complete guarantee of what will happen in the future, but in coming to a reasonable and logical conclusion on a matter of this kind I do think that parliament and this committee are justified in looking at what the experience has been.

What has been the experience? As has already been pointed out by the hon. member for Assiniboia, the only item now subject to the exercise of these wide and sweeping powers is butter which is under import control by reason of the authority established under section 4 (b) of the Export and Import Permits Act now in force and which I believe is exactly similar in its terms to clause 5 (b) of the bill. It is a control that has been put into force under legislation specifically intended to effect the results that it is thought necessary to achieve, and was not, as I understood the hon. member for Greenwood to imply in his interjection or question, done under some act which was intended for another purpose. I do not think that is correct. It was done under a power that was intended for the specific purpose and to achieve the specific end that is in fact achieved.

The list of items that have from time to time been under import control during the whole existence of the Export and Import Permits Act is as follows: Iron and steel, shearlings—that is, sheepskins—sulphur and brimstone, to which we have already referred, butter, to which reference has already been made, livestock, meat and meat products, and non-ferrous metal scrap, to which reference has also already been made. I think the committee will realize, from a brief description of the circumstances under which these various items came under import control, the basic justification for the existence of powers of this kind which can be exercised when required.

Examples of import control under section 5 (a), which was referred to by the hon. member for Greenwood, are items which are included under international allocation by the international materials conference. An example of them is sulphur and brimstone. In order to carry out our obligations to limit the import of sulphur into this country, and in order to carry out our obligations to direct sulphur into essential industries within Canada, this item was put under import control on May 30, 1951. Immediately sulphur became in easier supply the control was lifted, on October 28, 1953.

Butter and meat products are examples of control under section 5 (b). Butter continues under control as the price is being supported under the Agricultural Prices Support Act. In his remarks a few moments ago the hon. member for Assiniboia indicated the essential nature of a control of that kind in order to make price support effective. Meat and meat products were placed under control on March 3, 1952, during the epidemic of foot-and-mouth disease inasmuch as we were supporting the prices of these products at that time under the Agricultural Prices Support Act as one of the essential means of dealing with the very difficult situation that had arisen as a result of the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease. This control was lifted on February 26, 1953, immediately the foreign markets we had previously enjoyed were again open to our products as a result of the elimination of the danger of contamination or infection of livestock in the United States by foot-and-mouth disease.

Examples of control under section 5 (c) would be—and I say "would be" as that particular section has not been enacted into law before—iron and steel, shearlings and non-ferrous metal scrap. These items were put under control under the present act during a period of world shortage when our principal supplier, the United States, was allocating supplies through the use of their export control mechanism. In order to avoid the imposition of export controls on United States goods moving into Canada, we undertook to control this movement through our own regulations. These items were removed from import control on January 7, 1953, April 4, 1952, and March 19, 1953, respectively. I might point out to the committee that Canada is, I think, the one nation that has not been subject to export controls from the United States. I believe that has been a very important factor in the maintenance of a high level of trade between Canada and the United States. I feel that few things contributed to that as importantly as the power that we had to impose controls ourselves rather than have them impose export controls upon us; that was a very important contributing factor indeed.

The final point made by the hon. member for Greenwood was to ask me whether or not the need for this power has disappeared, and to what extent that meant this power was being retained and re-enacted simply because it is nice to have powers. I can tell him that that is not correct. The limited use of those powers is not properly the test of the need of the powers, but it is a test of the manner in which the powers have been used. It indicates, I think, the restraint and the care that have been brought to the exercise of these powers. It is our firm belief, Mr. Chairman, that these powers should exist. I feel that the point the hon. member made is more an indication of the reason the committee should re-enact these powers that are necessary with some confidence that the same kind of restraint and care will be taken in their exercise in the future.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am grateful for the explanation given by the parliamentary assistant. I am glad to know, in particular, the restricted application he gives to paragraph (c). I understand him to have said that he regards paragraph (b) as necessary for the control of the import of butter. If that is the case, then I agree with him that paragraph is needed. I propose to move an amendment which I hope may be accepted. It is not of a controversial nature. We could vote on that, and when that is over, in view of what the minister has said about his belief that paragraph (b) is needed for the control of butter, we shall vote for it. This is my amendment, Mr. Chairman, and you will see it is designed to make sure that parliament is as fully informed as possible of the action taken.

The amendment reads:

That clause 5 of Bill No. 374 be amended by adding to both subclauses (a) and (c) at the end thereof the following words: "which shall be tabled in parliament within fifteen days of it being entered into if parliament is then in session or within fifteen days of the next following session of parliament if parliament is not then in session."

The Chairman: At this time I wish to thank the hon. member for Greenwood for sending up his amendment in typewritten form. It is of considerable assistance to the chair. Might I also make this suggestion, that hon. members might be kind enough to send to the Chair two copies of amendments because I am advised by the law clerk it assists him if he also has a copy.

Mr. Dickey: From the wording of the suggested amendment, I presume the hon. member for Greenwood intends to require the tabling of any intergovernmental arrangement or commitment within the time specified in the wording of the amendment. If that is correct, I am afraid I am advised the amendment could not be accepted.

The only intergovernmental arrangement or commitment that is in force so far as clause 3 of this bill is concerned is, I am advised, the United Nations resolution to which reference was made in the debate in committee last evening. In so far as paragraph (c) of clause 5 is concerned, there is no formal intergovernmental arrangement or commitment at present in force. Under clause 5 (a) there are some informal arrangements between governments which are not reduced to the form of a treaty or protocol or anything of that nature between the governments, but which are agreed upon between the responsible ministers of the governments concerned and which have the effect indicated in my earlier remarks.

It would therefore, Mr. Chairman, be impossible for the government to undertake to table intergovernmental arrangements or commitments between governments that had not been reduced to formal documents between those governments. Information relating to those arrangements and the placing of goods on the import control lists as a result of such arrangements is given to parliament in the annual report that is tabled in parliament each year, and in the future would be included in such annual reports. In that way parliament would be fully informed of any action which it was found necessary to take under this section. I feel that perhaps would meet the wishes of the hon. member and the committee, to have the full information before parliament, as is suggested in the amendment.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would it meet the requirements the parliamentary assistant has laid down if we inserted the words "the terms of"? In other words, it would be the terms of it which would be tabled. We want to be reasonable in the matter. It is only a question of information. Would that meet the difficulty the parliamentary assistant has indicated? If not, would he suggest some other wording?

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the words "the effect of which" might be suggested.

Mr. Dickey: I am informed by the officials that these lists, and any changes made in the lists under the powers contained in the Export and Import Permits Act, and which are contained in the bill before the committee, are published in the Canada Gazette, and are therefore public and available to all hon. members as well as to the trade. Perhaps that is sufficient notice to hon. members of action taken under this power.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am aware of that; but it seems to me this is not a very onerous request, when we ask that these requirements should also be tabled in parliament.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Some of the arrangements may be confidential. It would not be possible to cover all the arrangements made. These are international arrangements, made usually in concert at least with the United States and the United Kingdom. I should think it would hardly be possible to comply with the suggestion of the hon. member.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does the minister appreciate that the wording of the proposal is that we be given "the effect of it". In other words, we are not asking for a report, word by word, but rather for the effect of such report.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Would the hon. member be satisfied with our tabling the Canada Gazette where these matters are referred to? I do not think we can say that that procedure covers all the arrangements made; but at least it is the working advice to the exporting and importing public of the regulations as they stand from day to day.

Mr. Fulton: Is not the point this, that that which is published in the Canada Gazette is the order in council made placing an article on the import permit list?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. Fulton: What we are seeking is the effect of the arrangement made under which that order in council was passed. I do not think that would appear merely from an examination of the commodities included in the list.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The point I have made is that the reasons for making the order may be confidential. I could not agree to tabling the correspondence leading up to the order, or anything of that sort.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I stress again the words we have used, because we want to be co-operative. There is no suggestion of tabling the correspondence. The words we use are "the effect of which". As my colleague has pointed out, merely a list showing the results, without an explanation, is not satisfactory. What we are asking is that we might have the effect; it is not a suggestion to table the correspondence or to give a great deal of detail. It is only a suggestion to set out the effect.

Mr. Fulton: May I just offer this brief word of explanation. I think the minister and his assistant will agree—and what I am saying is not necessarily a criticism—that the power to make intergovernmental arrangements and to carry these arrangements into effect by order in council, as set out in this bill, does give a very broad measure of control over the whole Canadian economy. I make that as a statement of fact.

Therefore what we are seeking is an assurance that, before such orders in council having that broad effect on the Canadian economy are passed, parliament will be informed of the effect of the intergovernmental arrangement which has been concluded, and that we will have in broad and general terms the reasons therefor, so that we may be satisfied that the exercise of the powers conferred under the act, and by the orders in council in question, are in fact necessary. Otherwise we would not know the background for suddenly placing a certain commodity or commodities on an import control list. All we are asking is that the effect or the general terms of an international agreement upon which such order is based may be laid before parliament within a reasonable time after it is concluded.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think we can go some considerable distance toward meeting the wishes of my hon. friends. There may be secret agreements—that is, agreements to forestall certain eventualities—that we could not table. But, generally speaking, I think we could table the information the hon. members want. Of course, every order in council implementing an agreement would be tabled in any event. But perhaps we can go farther than that. I would not like to commit myself to laying all the information before parliament; but anything that is not of a secret nature could be tabled if that would be satisfactory.

Mr. Macdonnell: The amendment could be altered by putting in the words "the effect of". In other words, it could be left in general terms, without demanding any detail, and accepted in that way.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, "consistent with secrecy provisions", or something of that sort.

Mr. Macdonnell: That would certainly be understood. May I read it again, just to see whether it would be satisfactory. It would now read:

—the effect of which shall be tabled in parliament within fifteen days.

The words "the effect of which" would seem to leave it pretty wide open for just a general summary.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That may be all right. We may be able to accept an amendment with the words "the effect of which".

The Chairman: Order, please. After congratulating the hon. member for Greenwood upon sending forward a nicely typewritten amendment, I now find myself in difficulty, as the amendment is being changed. And may I point out another difficulty, in that subclause (a) ends with a semicolon and subclause (c) ends with a period. I think that should be taken into consideration.

Mr. Fulton: Yes. Technically, to comply with Your Honour's suggestion, perhaps we could take it clause by clause. The motion of my hon. friend would then be—

That subclause (a) of clause 5 of Bill 374 be amended by deleting the semicolon where it appears in line 23, and substituting a comma therefor, and adding thereafter the following words, "the effect of"

Mr. Harris: May I suggest that this clause be permitted to stand so that it may be drafted.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Clause stands.

Clauses 6 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

[Mr. Fulton.]

On clause 15—Diversion, etc.

Mr. Green: This is a new clause. May we have an explanation of the effect of it.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, this clause is intended to make it an offence to do acts in Canada which have the effect of transshipping or diverting goods which have been exported from Canada to a particular destination under an export permit, and which do not arrive at that destination as their final destination but, because of the intervention of an act in Canada, the goods are finally delivered to a destination that would not have been approved as the final destination upon their leaving Canada. I am advised that this applies to imports which leave another country destined for Canada and which before reaching here are diverted to another destination. An example would be German ball bearings ordered in Germany for delivery in Canada which, at some intermediate point, are diverted from Canada to Poland, for example, Czechoslovakia or Hungary. It is to make illegal any act which is done in Canada to effect a purpose of that kind.

Mr. Green: It must be meant to cover the case where the goods do not actually reach Canada but by reason of action of some kind are diverted to another country before they arrive in Canada.

Mr. Dickey: That is exactly the purpose.

Mr. Green: Can the parliamentary assistant give us an example of where that has happened?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I can do so. A shipment of ball bearings was ordered in Germany for delivery in Canada. The import permit was issued. The shipment moved to Brussels in the ordinary way, and then instead of being shipped to Canada was shipped into Russia. The arrangement was made by a Canadian, and under the existing act we could not prosecute him.

Mr. Green: The Canadian arranged for the goods to be diverted to Russia?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is right.

Mr. Green: Was he actually a resident of Canada or was he in Germany?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): A resident of Canada.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 16 and 17 agreed to.

On clause 18—Aiding and abetting.

Mr. Green: This clause reads as follows:

No person shall knowingly induce, aid or abet or attempt to induce, aid or abet any person to violate a provision of this act or the regulations.

There was no such provision in the act which is being repealed by this particular bill. Here you are not only taking provision to punish a person who violates this legislation himself but you are punishing those who aid or abet, and the penalties under the legislation are very heavy. In fact, they are contained in clause 19 and they are being increased over the penalties which are now in the present act. Why is it necessary to go so far under what is in effect not criminal law, but a bill to regulate exports and imports. I doubt whether there is a similar drastic provision in any other bills of this particular kind.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I point out that these are very serious offences. They are offences designed to put military equipment in the hands of other countries. Anyone who makes it his business to go around and try to influence ordinary business deals in the way I have mentioned as affecting German ball bearings should be punished for doing so.

Mr. Green: That particular man would be punishable under the ordinary provisions of the act for breaking the act, but—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): He would, now.

Mr. Green: —this section goes farther and says that anyone who induces, aids or abets, and in addition attempts to induce, aid or abet, shall be guilty of the same crime as the person who actually breaks the law. Surely it is not necessary to go that far.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We had a case some time ago of a shipment of aluminum that was destined to a legitimate destination and was diverted to another destination. It was due to someone procuring an agent of the shipper to bring about that diversion. It was not known to the company, but some enterprising gentleman intervened with a minor official of the company and worked out the diversion. The result is a very considerable breach of security regulations. I think this provision should be included.

Mr. Green: Would it not be enough to provide for the inducing, aiding or abetting, rather than also including "attempt to induce, aid or abet"? That seems to me a very drastic provision. Surely the person should only be convicted if he did actually aid or abet and not for attempt to aid or abet.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If a man only makes that offer to bring it about and the offer is not accepted that does not constitute a crime. However, if my hon. friend is insistent I am willing to accept the suggestion. Perhaps it will work without the latter provision.

Mr. Green: In other words, the minister would be willing to leave out the words "or attempt to induce, aid or abet".

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is right.

The Chairman: Shall clause 18 carry?

Mr. Green: With that amendment. The minister has agreed to strike out the words "or attempt to induce, aid or abet", so that the section will read:

No person shall knowingly induce, aid or abet any person to violate a provision of this act or the regulations.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 19—Offence and penalty.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know whether the minister has given any information yet as to the number of prosecutions that have taken place under the act. I was not in for the entire discussion and I have been wondering whether he could give the information as to the degree to which there have been, first, offences committed by the doing of wrongful acts and, second, attempts to do those acts by aiding, abetting or otherwise.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There have been 23 prosecutions and 18 convictions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister say why the penalty has been increased? Is it because of the fact that the penalties up to the present time have been too low, having regard to the seriousness of the effects of wrongdoing under this act?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is exactly the reason. I recall one case where the person prosecuted ended up with a profit of about $23,000 and the fine imposed was $50. Such transactions may involve a great deal of money.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 20—Officers of corporations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister explain this clause and the reason for it? A reading of it would indicate that it is designed to fill a loophole that existed previously; in other words, to make assurance doubly sure that when the corporation commits this offence each and every director who knowingly contributes to the commission of the offence becomes liable. If that is the correct understanding of the clause, then I think it is a material advantage to have it in the new form; for certainly too often evasions of the law take place under the guise of a lack of knowledge on the part of the directors, and they escape their responsibility.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This clause arises from the fact that operators in this field usually have several companies with no assets, and usually it is not very effective to find a company guilty; the purpose must be to get at the principals.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has now brought up a very interesting point. To what degree is that type of evasion being practised, namely, the setting up of those companies whose only capital is of a nominal nature and whose assets are as non-existent as the capital?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is quite widespread. I could not say how many there are.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are they within Canada?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes. They may be either provincially or federally incorporated.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What provinces permit that type of incorporation?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I could not say.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am enthusiastic—

The Chairman: We are on clause 20.

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I am enthusiastic about the first part of this but I am rather bothered about lines 15 and 16.

. . . the offence took place with his knowledge or consent or that he failed to exercise due diligence to prevent the commission of such offence.

It seems to me it is going pretty far to make a man a criminal by proving he could have done some thing which he did not do.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, if a man is either an officer or a director of a company engaged in criminal activities the presumption must be, I believe, that he had some knowledge of the activities of that company.

Mr. Macdonnell: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the minister really wishes to go as far as that. I have in mind the case of a company which is not a small private company or a one-man company. If you took what the minister said you would make a man a criminal if he was a director of a large company which did these things. If I understand the minister correctly, such a person would be a criminal even though he knew nothing about it and had no chance to know. I do not believe that is what is intended.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think it is intended. I believe people should be careful of the company they join as directors.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I want to question the minister once more on this, and also to question the wording. I want to go back to what the minister said, that people ought to have enough sense not to become directors of a company that would do that kind of thing. I want to question whether it is felt necessary, with the experience which has been gained, to pass a clause which makes a man a criminal though in fact he may have had no knowledge whatever. According to the minister's language, a man who is a director is almost automatically charged with knowledge of what has been done. That is not according to the facts.

Mr. Dickey: If I may, I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman that these words are included in the clause: "failed to exercise due diligence to prevent..." I think these words protect a director in the position set out by the hon. member. I think I should also inform the hon. member and the committee that statutory provisions, relating to offences, in exactly the same form as this are to be found in section 16 (3) of the Aeronautics Act; section 163 of the Canada Grain Act; section 42 (2) of the Canadian Wheat Board Act; section 182 of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act; section 134 of the Income Tax Act; section 16 of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act; section 38 (3) of the Combines Investigation Act, and section 53 of the Immigration Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the parliamentary assistant read these, because in all of them I understand there is a provision that anyone who has failed, with knowledge of the fact, to exercise due diligence to prevent a commission of such an offence is guilty. Of course, under the clause as it now stands a director without knowledge would be said to commit an offence if these words were added:

. . . the act or omission constituting the offence took place with his knowledge or consent or that he failed to exercise due diligence to prevent the commission of such offence.

Mr. Dickey: I am informed that the words relating to "knowledge" are included in the Canada Grain Act, the Canadian Wheat Board Act, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and the Combines Investigation Act, but not in the other acts I referred to. That is the one difference between this section and the sections in these particular acts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the parliamentary assistant read these sections, because I think each one of them has the words "with knowledge" or words to that effect.

Mr. Dickey: I am advised that section 53 of the Immigration Act contains exactly the same wording and section 16 of the Proprietary—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the parliamentary assistant read these sections so that we can see how closely alike they are?

Mr. Dickey: I will have to send out for them if the hon. member wishes me to read them.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Could that section be allowed to stand meantime?

The Chairman: Shall clause 20 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

On clause 21—Responsibility of resident applicants for non-resident permittees.

Mr. Green: Clause 21 is new and it contains this same provision. I wonder if the parliamentary assistant would explain the purpose of the clause, and give us an example?

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this clause is to cover the case where a non-resident exporter operates in Canada through a Canadian agent. This clause has the effect of making the agent, who is the person who applies for the necessary permit in Canada, responsible for the proper use of that permit. I believe it will be quite obvious that there would be no purpose in making the improper use of export permits illegal for Canadians if someone resident in another country were able through a Canadian agent to make an application for an export permit and evade the act in a way which was not possible for a resident in Canada. This clause is to enable the agent to be charged with the responsibility for the proper use of the export permit he procures for his principal.

Mr. Green: If the clause as it now reads is passed the result will be that if a Canadian resident applies for a permit for the use of someone in another country, and then that person in the other country, without the knowledge of the Canadian resident, commits an offence against this act, the Canadian resident is breaking the act and can be convicted unless he shows that he exercised due diligence to prevent the commission of the offence. That seems to me even more drastic than the final two lines of the preceding section dealing with the officers of a corporation. There is some direct connection between the officers and the corporation, but in this case the department is issuing a permit apparently knowing that a Canadian will have to do business through someone outside Canada. Surely it would be sufficient to have the Canadian guilty of an offence if the offence took place with his knowledge or consent.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We would put our licences into common international use if we allowed an agent to obtain a licence, turn it over to a man in another country and have no further responsibility in the matter.

Mr. Green: Why is the licence turned over at all to a person outside of Canada? Why is it necessary to do that?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is not, perhaps.

Mr. Green: As I understand it the department can control the transfer of a permit. If the department has approved the transfer of a permit, does not that fact relieve the Canadian resident of the responsibility?

Mr. Dickey: It is not so much a matter of the transfer of a permit; it is a matter of what happens to the goods. That is the important thing. I am informed that this provision was discussed with the customs brokers and with the trade and they are quite in agreement that this is a proper provision. This is as to a Canadian agent accepting instructions from a principal outside the country, and it simply requires that he exercise due diligence to see that no offence is committed in connection with the disposal of the goods that he has undertaken to procure as an export from Canada under an export permit that he applied for.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 22 to 26 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 27—Duration.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but you are not going to be able to give me the same praise here. I have an amendment which is not typed out but it is so simple that I think there will be no difficulty about it. It is natural that, in connection with these bills which we hope are covering an emergency situation, we should like to see them have as short a duration as possible. Without saying anything more I am going to move:

That section 27 be amended by striking out the figure "1957" and substituting therefor the figure "1955".

I am not going to comment at any length except to say that we feel that legislation of this kind should be subject to review at reasonably frequent intervals. I therefore move this amendment. The minister has been so helpful, he will probably agree to it.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am sorry that we cannot accept this amendment, Mr. Chairman. Ever since this bill was first introduced, it has been the practice to establish a period of three years. We see no reason for changing that practice. We expect this period of emergency not to end within a year. We dislike to take up the time of parliament each year in extending this bill; such a procedure is expensive to the Canadian public and annoying to the members of parliament.

Mr. Macdonnell: But think how much we have enjoyed ourselves!

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I might say that a report is filed each year on the operations of the act. If it appears that the act is not operative we should be glad to consider an earlier repeal of the bill. But we must insist that this amendment stand.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Chairman: Those in favour of the amendment will kindly rise.

Mr. Fulton: Just call for the yeas and nays, Mr. Chairman; let it be defeated on division.

The Chairman: Those in favour of the amendment will kindly say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Chairman: Those who are opposed will kindly say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Chairman: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the amendment lost.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 28 and 29 inclusive agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I rise and report progress?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

Mr. Green: There is one clause yet to be dealt with.

Mr. Dickey: Two clauses were allowed to stand, Mr. Chairman. I think we can now deal with them.

The Chairman: Shall I call clause 5?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dickey: No, Mr. Chairman. I think that amendment is not yet ready. However, you could call clause 20.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that I call clause 20?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 20—Officers of corporations.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, I was requested by the hon. member for Prince Albert to read the section of the Immigration Act which I had indicated was in terms exactly similar to clause 20 in this act. I therefore do so. Section 53 of the Immigration Act, which is chapter 325 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, is as follows:

> Where an offence under this act or the regulations has been committed by a corporation and whether or not the corporation has been prosecuted or convicted, every person who at the time of the commission of the offence was a director or officer of the corporation is guilty of the like offence and is liable on conviction to the punishment provided for the offence upon proof that the act or omission constituting the offence took place with his knowledge or consent, or that he failed to exercise due diligence to prevent the commission of such offence.

I have not been able to check it myself, Mr. Chairman, but I am advised that that section is exactly similar in terms to clause 20 of this bill.

On the question of the suggestion that the word "knowingly" or similar words be inserted in the final provision of this particular clause, I think I should say to the committee that, in connection with offences under this act—as is true in connection with offences under acts such as the Immigration Act—the proof of the element of knowledge is one that can in certain instances be particularly difficult. This matter was given careful consideration, and it was felt that there would be unreasonable and unnecessary difficulty in bringing to justice persons who were in fact guilty of offences under the act if the element of proof of actual knowledge were added to the already rather reasonable requirements that the crown prove a lack of due diligence to prevent. The law officers and the crown felt that that was sufficient protection to anyone who was not guilty of an offence; that it provided a proper element of defence; that to the requirement of proof of due diligence the addition of proof of actual knowledge was an undue burden of proof to impose on the crown and that it would contribute to evasions of the act that should not be permitted to occur.

Mr. Fulton: We have not an amendment worked out, Mr. Chairman, but I wonder whether the minister and his assistant would consider the possibility of confining the effect and application of this section so far as the last two lines are concerned, starting with the words "or that he failed to exercise due diligence to prevent the commission of such offence", to a case of the export of strategic materials? I think no objection could be taken to the proposition that where a person gets a permit for the export of a strategic material which it is desired to prevent from falling into the hands of potential enemies, he there has an absolute duty thrust upon him to ensure that it does not fall into the hands of those potential enemies.

Therefore the provision of these words in imposing the duty of due diligence on him is reasonable, but in the case of a corporation engaged in ordinary commerce within Canada and, let us say, securing an import permit, it is well known that directors do not all pay close attention to the details of the business. Quite often they are there for the effect of their names and their general business knowledge but do not participate actively in the detailed running of the business and to impose that burden of diligence and supervision upon directors with respect to the detailed activities of the firm within Canada is unreasonable. Therefore I put this proposition forward. Might it not be worked out to confine the effect of these words to the case of a corporation obtaining a permit for the export of strategic materials?

Mr. Dickey: I see the difficulty of the hon. member and the point he raises, but I am informed that in our experience the only offences which have been committed against the Export and Import Permits Act have been offences in connection with the use of strategic materials, arms and munitions of war. The position seems to be that it is only in that regard that the possibilities of gain and profit are sufficient to be an incentive to firms and individuals to try to avoid the provisions of the act and to offend against it. So far we have not had a single instance of an offence being committed except in connection with the particular goods to which the hon. member refers, and we have no reason to expect that, when the new legislation becomes law, there will be any incentive for persons to commit offences other than in the same connection.

Mr. Fulton: Is that not the very strongest argument that could be advanced in support of my suggestion, that it is expected to be confined to export permits for the export of strategic materials? If that is the only case where it is expected that offences will take place, and the nature of the offence is not nearly so serious if it takes place in connection with the distribution of goods within Canada, it seems to me that is an argument in favour of the proposition. I do not want to press this unduly, but I would repeat my request that some form of words be worked out which would confine its effect to the very case which the parliamentary assistant has said is the only type of case they expect to arise.

Mr. Dickey: There are very real difficulties involved in working out a form of words of the nature that the hon. member suggests. The whole scope and wording of the section were carefully considered before the bill was brought into the house. The advice of the law officers was sought and the conclusion was arrived at that this was the proper and the best wording to recommend to the house, and that there was no reasonable expectation that it would impose any undue hardship on persons engaged in normal trade within Canada. No objection was raised by the trade to this provision. They did not foresee any particular difficulty arising, and I think I can assure the hon. member and the committee that that expectation is shared right through the trade.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Harris: There is one clause standing, and with the permission of the committee we might rise and ask leave to sit again later this day. We may possibly have clause 5 ready for discussion, particularly if the hour between five and six is not taken up fully by private and public bills.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE FUND

ESTABLISHMENT OF ACCOUNT FOR REPLACEMENT OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 377, to establish an account for the replacement of government property lost, destroyed or damaged through fire.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at the resolution stage we had a fairly pertinent discussion about this bill but probably a few additional remarks would be in order. The object of the bill is to establish a fire losses replacement account and to authorize advances from the account for the restoration, the rebuilding or repair of property under the administration or control of departments and certain agency crown corporations that has been destroyed or damaged through fire.

The purpose to be served by this measure can be stated very briefly. It is to ensure, when a fire loss occurs and the replacement or repair of property destroyed or damaged is urgently and immediately required and there is not sufficient money available in the appropriation for the service suffering loss, that authority and funds will be available, subject to the approval of the treasury board, to proceed with the repair or replacement without delay.

To illustrate, a government hospital, a customs office, a fish hatchery, a garage housing valuable automotive equipment may be destroyed by fire and must be replaced immediately if essential services are to be restored with the least interruption. The balance available in the appropriation for the particular service concerned, which would not ordinarily include provision for such a contingency, may not be sufficient for the purpose. Under the proposed bill the money required for the replacement or the restoration of the building or the replacement of the equipment or supplies might, with the approval of the treasury board, be advanced temporarily from the fire losses replacement account on the understanding that the account would be recouped subsequently by charges to the appropriation for the service concerned.

There is authority in the Financial Administration Act for the use of special governor general warrants when accidents happen to public works and buildings and expenditures for their repair or renewal are urgently required, but as hon. members are aware this authority is available only when parliament is not in session or is under adjournment sine die or for a period of two weeks or more.

It has also been the practice in recent years to include in the annual appropriations for the Department of Finance a vote for miscellaneous minor and unforeseen contingencies. However, this is limited in amount. $1,500,000 is provided in the estimates for the current year and only $1 million in the estimates for 1954-55, and the vote is intended to cover the contingency requirements of all departments. Consequently, if a major fire were to occur it might not be sufficient to provide funds for the replacement of the fire loss and to meet the other unforeseen demands that might arise during the course of the year. It is for this reason that it has seemed advisable to provide a special account to deal solely with fire losses.

It is proposed that advances from the account shall be subject to the approval of the treasury board, that they shall not exceed an aggregate of $5 million at any time, and that they shall be recovered subsequently by charges to parliamentary appropriations for the service suffering the loss.

The account is essentially an arrangement to ensure that when fires do occur essential services can be restored with a minimum of interruption by providing the means to make advances for the immediate replacement of the facilities lost or damaged.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This matter was gone into in committee at the resolution stage, Mr. Speaker, and it seems to me it has been fairly well covered. The parliamentary assistant has explained the reason for what seems to me a sensible arrangement. As I understand it, the parliamentary assistant has answered satisfactorily the questions asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and others, namely that in the expenditure of money here the same precautions will be carried out as are usual in other cases. In other words, that the money used in restoration work will be subject to all the safeguards with which work is usually done.

The question was also raised as to whether this might also be a means of perhaps greatly expanding the structure which existed before in the case of loss. I gather from the parliamentary assistant that there is no suggestion of that. The case is really simply this: Where you have a loss which good judgment says has to be restored, you shall not be held back by want of money. If it is as simple as that, it seems to me we should not have to talk very much about it.

There is just one thing I should like to ask, and perhaps if the parliamentary assistant is not fully informed on this he might inform himself before we discuss it again. It raises in my mind a question with regard to insurance. As I understand it government departments in general, perhaps all of them, carry their own insurance. In private business, this is done by insurance companies. There are, as we all know, insurance underwriters, as I think they usually call themselves, who provide what I consider to be a very valuable service. They act not merely as insurance agents to write to protect properties, but they offer expert and valuable advice, not only as to how to get your fire losses paid when you have a fire but how to avoid having a fire. In other words, they give most valuable engineering and other advice as to the best possible means of making a building fireproof, and in general doing everything possible to avert fires.

Now that, of course, in a private business is a matter of keeping down their rates, and it does in fact occupy the best attention of management. These experts render a valuable service. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant would prefer to answer this question later, but have we got services of that kind with regard to our public buildings or does the fact we are carrying our own insurance mean we have no service of that kind? We may, in fact, be penny wise and pound foolish—not that I like to suggest the expenditure of another dollar. I should like to have that question answered, perhaps when we get into committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word in connection with this bill. As the hon. member for Greenwood has pointed out, we had a discussion on Tuesday of this week with respect to this legislation when we had the resolution before us. If I may say so, it seems to me that just about all the questions we asked on Tuesday are answered in the bill; just about all the points we felt should be covered are in fact covered by the terms of the bill.

As we understand it, this is not a fire insurance policy in the normal sense of that phrase, but rather a fund so that a loss can be replaced pending the time when the appropriate estimate can be passed. I gather from reading the bill that in all cases any money that has been charged to this account must sooner or later be replaced. The money can be replaced out of money that has been appropriated in one way or another in the same year. If that is not done, I understand it must be replaced by an estimate in a subsequent year. On all counts it seems to be a desirable piece of legislation.

The only point I suggest is that it might be well to have a clause in the bill calling for an annual report to parliament. Most bills of this kind do have such a clause, so that we can be kept informed as to what is done under the legislation. I hope that suggestion might be considered.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): It being five o'clock, the house will revert to consideration of public and private bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): There are two private bills of a similar nature. Shall they both be considered in committee at once?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonnell: Could we have an explanation from the sponsor?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): The order is for the house in committee on these bills and therefore there cannot be a discussion until we are in committee.

COMMERCE MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 198, respecting Commerce Mutual Fire Insurance Company—Mr. Eudes—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Name changed.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I might mention that this bill has been considered and passed by the committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Macdonnell: Could we have a word of explanation from the sponsor of the bill as to what came before the committee?

Mr. Dickey: This is the usual form of bill relating to the Commerce Mutual Fire Insurance Company, which provides for a change in name both in English and in French. I have not the proceedings in the committee before me, Mr. Chairman. I understand it was given the usual consideration and the committee unanimously agreed to the proposal.

Mr. Macdonnell: I do not wish to oppose progress, but it does seem to me the sponsor should have been here, just to give us some information. We are having the rubber-stamp principle rubbed into us in this matter, if we cannot have any information at all.

Mr. Knowles: There probably is no report.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member suggest that we report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING FOR PAYMENT FOR FARM STORAGE

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 11, an act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act (Payment for farm storage).—Mr. Argue.

Mr. Harris: There is another private bill which should be called.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Replying to the minister, it was my understanding that the house went into committee of the whole on two private bills, and that it was discussed in committee as to whether we should rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. I understood objection was taken to proceeding with the bills when the sponsors were not present.

Mr. Harris: But that was only on the first bill.

Mr. Knowles: The sponsor of the other bill is not here either.

Mr. Harris: The sponsor of the other bill is here, if I may be permitted to say so.

Mr. Knowles: Where?

Mr. Harris: Right behind me.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith)?

Private Bills

Mr. Harris: The hon. member for Ottawa West has asked the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) to take the bill.

Mr. Macdonnell: There is no desire to hold up proceedings. Is it possible to get the other sponsor here while this measure is going forward? The last thing we would want to do would be to stand in the way of business being done. But it did seem to me that the sponsor should be here.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to the course taken in respect of the previous bill. I understand the purpose of the hon. member for Greenwood in wanting to have information about that bill. But we did not call this second bill in committee of the whole; and I suggest that is the order of business which should be followed now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. My understanding was that the chairman of the committee of the whole was of the opinion that he had asked leave to report progress on both bills. Under the circumstances, however, I think we should accept the suggestion that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole for the purpose of considering Bill No. 313.

DOMINION FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 313, an act respecting the Dominion Fire Insurance Company—Mr. Dickey (for Mr. McIlraith)—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Name changed.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, I was asked by the hon. member for Ottawa West, the sponsor of this bill, to speak for him at the committee stage. This bill, to change the name of the Dominion Fire Insurance Company, was introduced in the other place. It was passed there and was given second reading in the House of Commons on March 2. It has since been referred to and considered by the committee on banking and commerce, and has been approved by that committee.

I am informed that the only possible company which might object to this change of name, because of any possible confusion, is the Dominion Life Assurance Company. The committee considered and had before it a letter from the president of that company indicating that there was no objection to this change of name. I believe that was one of the considerations that influenced the committee on banking and commerce to report the bill.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Macdonnell: I did not catch the name of the company that wrote in.

Mr. Dickey: The Dominion Life Assurance Company.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INDUSTRIAL STATUS OF WOMEN

MEASURE TO REQUIRE EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 2, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Fairclough for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to provide equal pay for equal work for women.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this bill is described as an act to provide equal pay for equal work for women. It contains a recital which reads in this way:

> Whereas it is desirable to enact a measure to prevent discrimination against women in respect of their employment by reason of their sex and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, to ensure that women will be paid at the same rates as men for similar or comparable work.

I deem it a great privilege to second the motion of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) for the second reading of this bill. When it was last discussed on March 2, there was a speech by the hon. member, followed by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). I thought he was under some considerable difficulty and embarrassment in trying to make out a case against the bill. He was not very convincing in his arguments, and summed up his position in this way, as reported at page 2594 of Hansard:

> Again I say there is a difference between attempting to bring about a remedy by law and having it carried out by collective bargaining on the one hand, and probably the more potent weapon of education on the other. It is because I am not convinced of the necessity or the desirability of trying to enforce such a law within those industries which are subject to federal labour jurisdiction that I reluctantly find I shall have to vote against my hon. friend's bill.

Now, let us take a look at the objection that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) has to the bill. In the first place he intimates that these rates should be covered by collective bargaining. Earlier in his speech he pointed out that some agreements negotiated under collective bargaining contain equal pay clauses. He went on to say:

> Some agreements contain equal pay clauses, and others simply carry out the principle of equal pay by establishing a rate for the job which is the same whether the job is done by a man or a woman.

Therefore it is obvious that the position is not going to be greatly improved by collective bargaining and I do not believe the minister was sound in opposing the bill on that ground. In fact, he went on to point out that the federal civil service commission follows the second course, namely, that of treating all jobs as equal no matter whether they happen to be occupied by a man or a woman.

His second ground was that this problem should be met by education. That is a very indefinite way to meet this problem. There has already been sufficient education of the people of Canada for them to know whether or not they believe in equal pay for women, and I am afraid the minister's suggestion that we should turn this problem over to someone unnamed to bring about more education was just an evasion of the question posed by this bill.

I believe this legislation is very timely. It was pointed out the other day by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) that there is similar legislation in the provinces of Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. I hold in my hand a bill which was passed last fall by the British Columbia legislature. It is described as: "An act to ensure fair remuneration to female employees" and is cited as "The Equal Pay Act". The key words are to get the same pay "for the same work done in the same establishment". These key words are not exactly the same as the ones contained in the bill now before us, but I think they are of a similar nature and would be construed in the same way.

In British Columbia we have had a further move along this line recently. In February of this year the Vancouver city school board adopted the principle of equal pay for women teachers. I hold in my hand a press clipping from the Vancouver Province reporting that decision, and it says that the big factor this year in the negotiations of the pay for the year——was the principle of equal pay for equal work for the 1,100 women teachers in the city.

Therefore the principle has been accepted in our city, and I understand it has also been accepted in many other parts of this nation.

I would point out to the minister that just last year he himself sponsored a similar bill. I refer to the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act, chapter 19 of the statutes of 1952-53. It is described as "an act to prevent discrimination in regard to employment and membership in trade unions by reason of race, national origin, colour or religion." That act received the unanimous support of hon. members. It is in much the same terms as the bill brought in by the hon. member for Hamilton West. Enforcement is based on a complaint system and I suggest to the minister and to my fellow members that the two bills are very much alike.

Last year the minister was full of enthusiasm for putting on the statute books of Canada a bill preventing discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour or religion; but this year he refuses to support a bill which would wipe out discrimination by reason of sex. Frankly, there is great inconsistency in the two stands taken by him.

You see, Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of a bill such as that which was passed last year, known as the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act, is to set a standard. Its purpose is not to put people in jail or have them fined or to make trouble across this land. The main purpose is to set up a standard, and it was on that basis that hon. members approved the legislation last year.

We have had other examples. I refer the minister to the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act. He has always been very much interested in legislation for the war veterans of this country and, as he knows, this act to which I am now referring was passed to help the veterans who returned to Canada to get back their old jobs. It has been effective. I do not think there could have been a more effective piece of legislation to enable the young men and young women who were demobilized to get back their jobs or to get reasonable employment.

The act contains drastic provisions for dealing with those employers who break the law. And yet, I understand from the minister's own department that less than half a dozen prosecutions have been laid under the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act. Actually there have been so few prosecutions that his department could not tell me just how many there had been, but after scratching their heads quite a while they thought that perhaps there may have been from two to five. There has been just that little need to take punitive action under that particular legislation.

The bill brought in by the hon. member for Hamilton West is of exactly the same type. I doubt whether there would be many prosecutions under it if it were to become law. There might be one or two. Probably there would be very few, because Canadian employers have shown down through the years that all they need to know is what the legislation is that stands on the statute books and they are prepared to abide by it. That has been shown only too clearly by literally thousands of employers under this Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, and I am quite sure that the same results are going to flow from the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act which we passed last year. The Canadian people obey the law. Every hon. member who has had much experience here will agree with me when I say that once a law is placed on the statute books there are not very many Canadians who try to break it. The public reaction is: That is the law and it is reasonable, and we are going to abide by it. I feel quite sure that the result would be the same if this equal pay for equal work for women act were placed on the statute books.

This is not a bill on which the government stands or falls. The private members of the government party are in the position to vote for this bill, believing it is a proper measure, without, by that vote, endangering the government. I am quite sure the Minister of Labour will agree with me in that assertion. I see him nodding his head and therefore he does agree.

I would urge hon. members of this house to support this measure for the reason that it will set up a nation-wide standard. We believe that equal pay for women is a practice which should be followed. The government of Canada has shown approval of that principle for many years by treating its own civil servants in that manner. Now, let us complete the job by setting up, through this bill, a standard for the entire nation.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe we can add materially to the value of this measure by debating it at any great length. However, our party has not yet indicated its view, and I feel that most of us are very much in accord with the spirit and letter of this bill. I am sure the mover of the bill will be glad of that fact.

The ladies in this house happen to be badly outnumbered but I do not believe they require a male, or any group of males, to take up the torch on their behalf in this particular instance. They are quite capable of making their own speeches. However, there are a few factors which are worth considering and which should be noted at this time.

The minister mentioned that according to reports 20 per cent of the people in industry have indicated their support for equal pay. That indicates that the unions recognize the need for paying women at the same rate as men. The minister also pointed out that 3 per cent indicated that they favoured a discrepancy in pay. One question immediately enters my mind. I wonder what proportion of that 3 per cent felt that women should be paid a higher rate of pay than men. It would be worth finding that out for I am certain women would be extremely interested.

The minister also said that the major congresses had not made representations to the government in this respect. Possibly the reason for their not having made representations in this respect is that the congresses feel, as so many of us do, that this is a provincial matter. However, it has apparently entered the federal field and therefore it should be dealt with at a federal level.

I support the spirit of this measure and I would suggest its adoption, although at the same time I recognize the difficulties involved in trying to implement it. There are certain reasons why I believe this bill should be passed. The first is that many firms today pay women less than they do men for doing exactly the same type of work. For example, in our retail marketing a delivery boy gets more money than a girl at the cash register who keeps punching the keys all day long. That is rather unfortunate, in my opinion, because she probably has much more responsibility, handling thousands of dollars during a month, than the delivery boy who delivers a few dollars' worth of groceries.

In the civil service we know there is no discrimination whatsoever. We recognize that men and women are equal. As regards the teaching profession, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) indicated that women are just as capable as men in that particular profession. I would go so far as to say that in many instances they have proved far superior to men in the teaching profession.

Certain other industries have recognized that women are just as capable as men, and do just as good a job. There is no sound reason, as far as I can see, for not giving women equal pay. The minister said he had received no recommendations in favour of this legislation. I wonder if he has had representations to the effect that this legislation should not be put into effect, or if anyone has come to the government and said, "Please pass this bill but with the provision that women should be paid less than men."

Long ago Mrs. Pankhurst recognized the need to give women the vote. Long ago we recognized that they were capable of exercising that vote, and I am quite sure each of the men here feel that women were probably responsible for putting them in the position they now occupy.

Women have proved their superiority in many fields. We do not find very many men acting as telephone operators, and I do not know of a single instance where a man is employed punching a cash register in the supermarkets we have in the city, or in any other city I have been in. I know the girl at the cash register probably enhances the attractiveness of the store.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hahn: An hon. member says, "hear, hear". Possibly the reason she is employed as a cash register girl, if I may coin the phrase, is that she is most capable of punching the keys and can do it more rapidly than a man. In a case like that we should recognize that a girl should be paid the same as a man, if a man were employed to do that type of work.

The unions a long time ago advocated this sort of legislation, and have long recognized its value. It is quite obvious that if women were not as capable as men they would not be employed. Women have proved their worth and ability during the course of two world wars. During those wars thousands of women in this country were employed in industry, and I would go so far as to say that if women had not been there we probably would have lost those wars. It was only through their efforts that the boys in the front lines were given the supplies they so badly needed.

Industry should repay women for keeping the front lines supplied, and the best way of doing that is to pay them their dollar's worth if they are capable of doing the job as well as a man.

There is one other reason why I am so particularly happy to support this measure. That is because it adopts a great Social Credit principle. That principle is that the way to make the poor richer is to raise the level of their wages to that of the higher paid workers. We do not advocate taking from the rich and giving to the poor. We believe wages should be raised to the point where they are on a level with the wages received by the better paid workers. I have found, and I speak with some authority having a family of four girls, that it costs just as much to clothe and keep women as it does to keep men. It costs just as much to clothe them and to keep them as it does to clothe and to keep a man.

An hon. Member: It costs more.

Mr. Hahn: In most instances I think their headgear costs considerably more. I would therefore say that we should start a move so that they can at least find that they have sufficient remuneration to keep themselves looking proper—I would not, of course, for a moment suggest that they do not—without too great difficulty.

There is a certain value to this legislation. First, I would say that it affords protection to a man who is doing a job and doing it well. If the man is doing a job and doing it well, the moment that management finds it is having difficulty in making ends meet it would probably hire a woman who would be willing to work for less pay. The natural result of that—as I believe the lady member who introduced the bill indicated—would be that a man would lose his security of tenure in that particular position.

Then there is in this legislation a certain protection for the employer, as was earlier indicated, in so far as the employer would get his true worth out of his women employees and his labour costs would always remain more steady, especially as compared with his competitor who, if he has hired lady employees and is paying them less, would naturally enough be able to produce for less. Therefore the competition would be in a rather unequal ratio. By an equal pay act we would certainly be able to equalize our costs of labour and make our competitor become an honest competitor at least in so far as the price of labour is concerned.

The effect of this legislation, if it were to become an act, would be possibly threefold. The first effect might be illustrated in this way, if others felt as did a young lady I happened to meet in the corridor as I was coming down to the chamber. One of the young ladies asked me what I was getting prepared to speak on. I said, "The equal pay act". Her first reaction was, "Hurrah, that means the 40-hour week". Apparently the girls are not working the 40-hour week in this institution. While that feature is not embodied in the bill itself—I refer to the hours of labour—you can see that women are not opposed to it on that particular basis.

There would be a natural increase in unemployment among the women at first. The employers would naturally say this; "If I have to pay a woman the same price as I am going to pay a man, I am going to get a man for this job"; and out goes the woman. That may be the first repercussion. It would possibly be an unfortunate one. But if that male employee was not as capable of producing articles as was a woman or was not as capable of doing the job properly, he would naturally enough be replaced by a woman at a later time; and instead of our Minister of Labour having such a fine steady graph line for the employment of females over a period of years as compared with the one for men employees, he would have fluctuations in the women's line of employment comparable with that for men at the present time.

Then there is one third possible effect. It will probably mean that the male employment situation will be much improved. We have had several representations, I believe, in the corridors by the various labour groups and nearly every one of them has strongly demanded more employment, that the government find employment for them; and in nearly every instance it was a case of employment for male employees. That situation would be naturally improved if the other argument that I proposed a moment ago were followed through. It would have a far-reaching effect upon our morale, I dare say. If the housewife did not prove herself to be as efficient as the male employee, she would find herself unemployed and would be back at home doing housework. Whether or not that is a desirable thing I am not going to discuss at this time. However, I will say this. If she does prove herself to be a better worker than the male, she will become the breadwinner for the family and we shall find the husband at home doing the chores.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, it gives me much pleasure to rise to support this bill. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) for seeing to it that this was the first bill that appeared on the order paper for discussion by members when we came here for this present session of parliament. I am sorry that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) is unable or unwilling to support it. I am happy, however, that we have not had many speakers on the government side who have offered opposition.

The Financial Times is about the only publication I have run across that seems to be opposed to this sort of legislation. In the Financial Times of March 12 I find an article under the name "Tempus". It reads a good deal like the writing by Austin Cross. I think the kindest thing I can say is that the writer must have had a deadline to meet and very little to write about when he used up valuable space with this material. He said:

> . . . far too many secretaries have far too much to say and far too much to do with the administration.

He was speaking about the women private secretaries in the government administration here. The article continues:

> Yes, and put me down as saying that there are far too many women holding down jobs that should be held down by men . . .
> Once upon a time, cabinet ministers here appointed a male secretary. Now far too many females have the jobs.

[Mr. Hahn.]

Then further on:

> It is not that the women are not efficient, but they are, for the most part, of a good stenography level. This business of being a political secretary to the boss is too much for most of them. For the most part women have no political savvy.

Mr. Speaker, we have the misfortune to have in the House of Commons only four women out of a total membership of 265. I think that is a reflection on the women of Canada. I think it is unfortunate for parliament. The four women are making an outstanding contribution. In addition to the four who are here now, so far as I know we have had only five other women who have been in parliament since confederation. First, there was Miss Macphail, then Mrs. Black, Mrs. Nielsen, Mrs. Casselman and Mrs. Strum.

To come back to the comments made by the writer of this article—Tempus, whoever that is—may I say that I think the government is to be commended for choosing some women to hold down the responsible positions of private secretaries. My telephone directory informs me that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) all have women private secretaries. I notice that there are not any women holding down jobs as deputy ministers. While waiting to speak I was looking through the estimates and I am now prompted to wonder whether the reason we get some women private secretaries is partly the result of the fact that the salaries offered for private secretaries are not high enough to attract males with the qualifications for doing that type of work.

I was under the impression that a private secretary had nearly as much responsibility as a deputy minister, but in some cases the salaries offered to private secretaries are about a third of those paid to deputy ministers. I think that the business of securing executive assistants probably has given cabinet ministers a chance to get on their staff people who are earning more than private secretaries. But I am sure that members of all political parties who have done business with the offices of the ministers would agree that no one should throw bricks at private secretaries merely because they are women. I think it is childish for anyone in the middle of the twentieth century to suggest that for the most part women have no political savvy. I think you might as well say that men have no political savvy. I also think that to handicap individuals because they are women and make it impossible for them to occupy the most important positions in the country because they are women just cannot be justified in this day and age.

I am glad that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) has examined the bills that have been passed in Ontario, British Columbia and Saskatchewan and has decided that the most attractive legislation has been passed in my province where the wording is equal pay "for similar or comparable work". That is the wording we find in the present bill. I do not want to be in the position of talking out the bill, but I could not let this opportunity pass without registering my protest against the sentiments expressed by "Tempus" and objecting to the opinions expressed by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) who apparently cannot support this legislation. I would hope that before very much longer the government will be prepared to go along with the governments of Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia and make legislation such as has been proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West one of the laws of this country.

Mrs. Ann Shipley (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that we should avoid labour legislation of a compulsory nature that would interfere with the free rights of collective bargaining. However, I do not think this measure falls within that classification. Rather, this is a matter of the basic rights of human beings, be they male or female. I appreciate what the minister has said regarding the use, or perhaps I should say lack of use, that has been made of this type of legislation where it is in effect. The records show that very little use has been made of it in the two provinces where it has been in operation for any length of time. I understand that the British Columbia legislation was enacted only this year. In thirteen states of the United States there is a similar type of legislation, although it varies a little between states. Here again very little use has been made of it.

I discussed this matter with some of the people in the women's bureau in the United States and asked them what they thought the solution was. They felt that collective bargaining was the answer in those cases where women do belong to unions. But the unfortunate thing about women workers is that a great number of them—I do not know whether or not a majority—do not belong to unions. Therefore the type of legislation proposed in the bill now before us, under which the complaint is laid before the legislative body, seems to be about the only answer to the problem. But the legislation is simply not used where it is in effect.

When this bill was first mentioned in the press last December I was very much interested in reading an article in the Evening Citizen of December 4 headed "Equal Pay for Women Teachers". They were talking about Ottawa women teachers. The Ontario legislation providing equal pay for equal work for women has been in effect for something like two years and it is a very good act. It is very clear and simple. Yet Ottawa women teachers had asked the school board for equal pay and had been refused. The article goes on to point out that letters were sent to the board from the business and professional women's club and also from the university women's club begging the board to give the women teachers equal pay.

That is a very strange thing because I think I can say without fear of contradiction that school teachers in the province of Ontario at least—I am familiar with this province—have one of the strongest organizations that can be found anywhere. Just one teacher needed to bring this matter before the proper authorities of the provincial government, or a group of them, and yet they did not do so. I am not suggesting they were weak because they did not or that they should have done so. I do not know the circumstances. I can imagine many reasons why they did not.

The chairman of the school board, a lady, stated at the time that they simply could not afford it at this time. Perhaps the Ottawa lady teachers had lengthy discussions with the board and agreed with them or maybe they subsequently got what they wanted. I do not know, although I have watched the newspapers. But there was the situation. They had the law and they did not use it. I simply mention this to bear out some of the points raised by the minister.

An amusing thing happened at the time this article appeared in the paper. There was also a press report covering the presentation of the bill by the hon. member for Hamilton West. During that same week end I met several Ottawa people who said, "Won't it be nice when that bill goes through? School teachers in Ottawa will be able to get the same amount of money". It is a very strange thing, but it does not seem to matter how many times you try to tell people that the federal government cannot interfere with the rights of provincial governments with respect to labour disputes. Nor would the passing of this bill have any effect at all on the school teachers or, indeed, the majority of women workers in the province of Ontario. If the bill were passed a very limited number of women workers would benefit from it in any way. I was interested to hear what the minister said when he spoke on March 2. He said, as reported at page 2594 of Hansard:

> . . . the four great national labour organizations have now made their annual presentations to the government and, although they have many women in their membership, have not recommended that such a bill be passed within the federal jurisdiction. I feel it is probably equally significant that the national council of women, in making their recommendations to the government, did not mention this matter.

The minister went on to say:

> Before advocating federal legislation in this field I think I should like to know that a specific problem existed in the industries coming within federal jurisdiction, and that it was serious enough to warrant intervention. I would want to feel that the problem appeared capable of being remedied by law. So far I do not think there has been enough evidence of such a specific problem or of the fact that this is the remedy for it.

I am very happy to learn that we are to have a women's bureau. The minister has expressed himself as wanting to have all problems affecting women workers investigated. I am hoping that we will have a first-class women's bureau functioning very soon and that when the government does present legislation it will not only take care of this problem but will also lead the way in improving other working conditions of women.

I do not know how any legislation can take care of what I consider the most serious problem, and that is the lack of opportunity for women. There are not too many women who are suffering from a difference in pay, but there are a great many who are suffering from lack of opportunity. I feel that improvement in that direction can only be made by organized groups of employees. I do not know how any government could help to take care of that situation.

I cannot dispute the statements made by the minister that the passing of this bill would mean very little to women employees under the jurisdiction of this government, because we not only recognize the principle but we practise it. Nevertheless, I do believe that the principle involved is of such basic importance to all women it should be written into the statutes of Canada. For that reason, I must support the bill.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I know there are other hon. members who want to speak on this particular bill, but in a moment I am going to suggest that I be permitted to move the adjournment of the debate because we have come to an understanding on the bill we were discussing at five o'clock. If I could have the unanimous consent of the house to suspend this particular hour and revert to the previous proceedings, we might pass the one outstanding amendment and complete the bill before six o'clock.

[Mrs. Shipley.]

Now, I would not make this request, Mr. Speaker, unless I was aware of the fact that there are other members who desire to take part in this debate, so that we would not complete it before six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is there unanimous consent to assume that the business of public and private bills hour has been completed?

Mr. Green: I should like to have it quite clear that the minister is not, in effect, killing this debate. He has mentioned that he would adjourn the debate and that is a method used by the government to kill the debate. It would be better to have an agreement that it will be called six o'clock and then the debate is not killed.

Mr. Harris: It does not make any difference to me how it is done. My only point was that someone would adjourn the debate in about five minutes in any event.

Mr. Hodgson: Would it be all right for me to adjourn the debate?

Mr. Harris: Quite.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): If this debate is interrupted by six o'clock, there is no necessity to adjourn the debate. Is there unanimous consent that the business of public and private bills hour is to be concluded?

Mr. Hodgson: May I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is there unanimous consent that the business of public and private bills hour is to be concluded?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE FUND

ESTABLISHMENT OF ACCOUNT FOR REPLACEMENT OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 377, to establish an account for the replacement of government property lost, destroyed or damaged through fire—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that I report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

EXTENSION OF CONTROL OF STRATEGIC MATERIALS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 374, to control export and import of strategic materials—Mr. Howe (Port Arthur)—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 5—Import list of goods.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand there is an amendment to this clause.

Mr. Fulton: I have had no opportunity of consulting with the hon. member for Greenwood, Mr. Chairman, as I have been unable to locate him. I shall, therefore, assume the responsibility for stating that the hon. member will agree to withdraw the amendment he moved for the purpose of allowing another amendment to be moved which has been agreed upon between both sides.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, I am asking the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to move the following amendment:

That clause 5 of Bill No. 374 be amended by inserting a semicolon at the end of paragraph (c) and adding the following general words after paragraph (c): "and where any goods are included in the list for the purpose of ensuring supply or distribution of goods subject to allocation by intergovernmental arrangement or for the purpose of implementing an intergovernmental arrangement or commitment, a statement of the effect of or a summary of the arrangement or commitment, if it has not previously been laid before parliament shall be laid before parliament at the time the order of the governor in council including those goods in the list is laid before parliament pursuant to the Regulations Act."

Mr. Harris: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE FUND

ESTABLISHMENT OF ACCOUNT FOR REPLACEMENT OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 377, to establish an account for the replacement of government property lost, destroyed or damaged through fire—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I think this bill is unique, in terms of legislation coming before the House of Commons, in that it seems to be pretty satisfactory to all concerned. I made only one suggestion for improving it when we were at the stage of second reading, and I am wondering whether any consideration has been given to it. It is not a matter of world-shaking importance, but it did seem to me that it might be desirable to provide that a report be made to parliament on the operations under the act. I even went to the trouble to draft an amendment that would add a clause 10. However, I am merely suggesting that now so that some thought might be given to it.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think that at the second reading stage the two hon. members who spoke raised two very valuable points. The hon. member for Greenwood said: Is the government aware of the fire prevention advice that is offered by commercial insurers? On that point I would draw to his attention the fact that there is in the federal service a dominion fire commissioner, and I want to assure the hon. member that his remarks in that respect will most certainly be drawn to the attention of that official.

Then, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was concerned about the question of reporting the charges to this fund. I, too, as a member of parliament, was concerned about this and satisfied myself that, hitherto, on the contingency item in the Department of Finance—I believe it is item 114 in this year's estimates and was item 115 in last year's estimates—there is in the public accounts very explicit detail as to the use of a contingency item of this kind. I feel I can satisfy my hon. friend that this would be reported similarly in subsequent years under this enactment.

Mr. Knowles: Are those contingency items replaced by subsequent votes?

Mr. Benidickson: I think my hon. friend knows, from reading the act, that it is contemplated that a department suffering a loss such as we have in mind could, within the year in which the loss took place, replace that loss, if they did not require the funds for something else that year. On the other hand there is an obligation upon the minister of that department to put in his estimates an equivalent vote in the following year, if he has not been able to provide the funds for the fire loss in the year in which it occurred.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps I did not make my question clear. The parliamentary assistant was referring to the practice with respect to contingency items that are included in the estimates, and said that there is a full report on expenditures under those items in the annual report known as the public accounts.

Mr. Benidickson: Probably I should have said that I can assure the hon. member there will be an equivalent explanation in the public accounts for any expenditures from this fund.

Mr. Knowles: I seem to be having trouble to make my point clear. It seems to me this account is different from the contingency items, in that it has to be kept up to scratch. Whatever money is paid out of this $5 million must be replaced. And, because it is different from the contingency items, to that extent it did occur to me that there was a justification for requiring a report on the administration of the act.

I shall read what I have before me by way of a suggestion, but I will not offer it as an amendment until later. It was going to be my suggestion that the following amendment be considered by the government:

That Bill No. 377 be amended by adding thereto, immediately after clause 9, the following marginal note and clause:
"Report to parliament:
10. The Minister of Finance shall, as soon as possible after the end of each fiscal year, lay before parliament a report on the administration of this act during the preceding fiscal year".

Mr. Benidickson: I can appreciate the hon. member's point. I think in our private activities as members of parliament we have the same objective in mind. I must say however that when I looked at the explanation in the public accounts of the expenditures under, we will say, contingency vote No. 115 of last year, I felt members of parliament would be better satisfied with that type of reporting in use for that contingency item than would be possible under the suggestion of my hon. friend.

In my official duties I have had occasion to table a statement that certain amounts have been spent and certain things have been done because of some requirement that this should be tabled say fifteen days after parliament is opened, or something of that nature. But I think most members of parliament are more likely to be satisfied with an explanation for this type of expenditure in the public accounts. I can assure my hon. friend it will be explained as well in the public accounts in subsequent years just as the contingent vote has been explained in the past with respect to the fund of $1 million for contingencies in the Department of Finance.

Mr. Knowles: The only comment I would make is that I think I keep as well abreast of what is going on around here as the average member, and I have not yet run across the item to which the hon. member is referring. I would be glad if he would tell me on what page of last year's public accounts I can find it.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not have the public accounts in front of me at the moment. However, I have checked them. I believe the item last year was No. 115; and if my hon. friend will refer to the estimates for this year he will find it is item No. 114 in the estimates for the Department of Finance. But I can assure him that the net expenditure was explained in detail in the public accounts of last year.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to ask for just a little further information about this question of mine this afternoon, what I called expert advice on the matter of fire avoidance. As I understood it, the parliamentary assistant said that there was a dominion fire commissioner—is that the proper phrase? May we have a little further information as to the set-up and the scope of his department, if he has one, and of the nature of his duties?

Mr. Benidickson: It has been principally a matter of collating information in respect of crown fire losses. I told the hon. member that I felt his remarks this afternoon were pertinent to the desirability of assuring for crown purposes that all the best information available for the prevention of loss by fire would be drawn to the attention of that official, and I said that I would commend the hon. member's remarks to the commissioner.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: Before you move on, although I shall not take the time of the committee to dispute the explanations offered by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, it does seem to me the nature of this bill is such that an annual report to parliament would be desirable. It is up to the government whether or not it will be accepted, but to achieve that purpose I move:

That Bill No. 377 be amended by adding thereto, immediately after clause 9, the following marginal note and clause:
"Report to parliament.
10. The Minister of Finance shall, as soon as possible after the end of each fiscal year, lay before parliament a report on the administration of this act during the preceding fiscal year."

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Harris: No.

Amendment negatived.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting of the house.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Next sitting.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

210. Departmental administration, $470,422.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Before we deal with the items of the estimates I should like to put on record a few statistics and a general review of the mineral industry in Canada. I shall do this rather fully because our "summary of activities", the report distributed by the department to members of parliament each year, is not yet available from the printers.

This house has listened for many days this session to the disciples of blue ruin, predicting a depressing future for this country, growing unemployment and general decline. Mr. Chairman, we in Canada need never look back if we rise to the challenge of applying the great sources of energy we possess to the development of our national industrial structure. Nowhere else in the world today do 15 million people in one nation possess the heritage that is the lot of the Canadian people.

Not only does this nation have a remarkable heritage of mineral wealth but it also has proven sources of energy supply required to develop our natural resources. Our oil, natural gas, coal and electricity and in coming years perhaps atomic energy, are the keys to the unlocking of our great storehouse of minerals and our natural resources generally. One task facing us today is to develop these sources of energy and their distribution to areas of Canada where the energy can be most effectively used.

Mining in Canada in 1953 gave every evidence of a flourishing industry. Despite lower base metal prices, and labour disputes in two of the country's biggest camps, a new high of $1,331 million was recorded in the value of mineral output, an increase of $46 million over 1952 and almost three times that of a decade ago. Over 128,500 men were employed in mines and quarries in 1953 at wages and salaries totalling $435 million.

Crude petroleum with an output valued at $198 million became Canada's No. 1 mineral, replacing gold which, after 25 years as the leading mineral, dropped to fourth place with a production valued at $139 million. Nickel at $161 million was second and copper at $151 million was third.

The sharp decline in lead and zinc prices brought about the closing down of several marginal producers particularly in British Columbia, and a substantial cutback in the production of zinc by Canada's largest producer.

As Canada is the leading exporter of the principal non-ferrous base metals much depends upon the export market particularly in United States. During the past year the question of tariffs on imports of base metals into United States has been widely discussed in that country. Canada has participated in some of these discussions, and it is hoped that a decision favourable to our base metal industry will be arrived at soon.

The outstanding feature of the year in the Canadian mineral industry, however, was the intensive and widespread exploratory and development activity that was carried out in the territories and in every province except Prince Edward Island. This activity resulted in, among other things, the bringing in of such new mines as the Eldorado Mining and Refining ace-fay uranium property in the Beaverlodge area of northern Saskatchewan, the Lynn Lake nickel-copper property in northern Manitoba, the Cassiar asbestos property in northern British Columbia and a copper-gold property in the Chibougamau area of Quebec, the first producer in that area. Much progress was made in the several large-scale projects under way such as that of Quebec-Labrador iron ore field into which the 360-mile railway has been virtually completed and from which ore is expected to be shipped by late summer, and at the Gaspe copper deposits which are to be brought in late this year.

An idea of the intensity of exploration, which proved greater in 1953 than in any other year in the history of Canadian mining, may be had from the preliminary estimate of over 130,000 claims staked during the year. This is a 216 per cent increase over 1952. The outstanding example was in New Brunswick, the scene of the Bathurst find, where some 41,000 claims were staked in 1953 compared with only 1,600 in 1952.

Oil, natural gas, iron ore and uranium proved to be the major newsmakers in 1953. Oil production rose to 81 million barrels, compared with 61 million barrels in 1952. The industry spent some $365 million in the search for oil and discovered light crude oil in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and new major fields in Alberta.

The development of the petroleum and natural gas resources in western Canada in the last seven years has been so spectacular that they could not have been foreseen by even the most optimistic enthusiast. The initial stages caught the attention of the public and made headlines in the press, so that it seemed to many that suddenly, without preparation, great resources had been uncovered. This is not so. Back of these discoveries are years of patient toil on the part of many scientists and engineers. Through the years they have provided the fundamental knowledge on which the recent development is based.

The land subdivision of the early settlement years, done by the dominion land surveyors, together with the precise level and triangulation surveys of the geodetic survey, were the foundation in western Canada for the base maps formerly prepared under the department of the interior of the federal government, then under the geological survey, and now under the surveys and mapping branch of mines and technical surveys. Without adequate maps no resource development is possible in a systematic manner because each base map becomes the working tool of the geologists and geophysicists, under whose direction and guidance most exploratory programs are planned and carried out.

The foundations in the preparatory work for the successful development of petroleum and natural gas were laid by geologists of the geological survey of Canada. The names of Dawson, McConnell, Dowling and many others are famous in the interpretation of the geological features of western Canada. The reports of these men—the great geological pioneers of the plains, foothills and mountains—are still in great demand because of their clear exposition of the regional geological features based on their accurate observations.

Since about the beginning of this century the geological survey of Canada has each year had several parties in western Canada mapping geological features. The younger men of today on our staff are performing work just as important as the pioneers of yesterday, even though it is mostly of a more detailed nature. There now is an exceedingly large amount of new information made available daily from the drilling of wells. The collection of this is a tremendous task for which we have a small staff in our Calgary office who, even though they cannot hope to keep pace in the complete correlation of all the data, are assisting in the development by making it available for the use of other geologists in the employ of the various oil companies.

It would be difficult to assess the value of this work. But certainly the combined efforts, not only of those in private enterprise, but also those in the employ of the various provincial governments of western Canada, as well as the federal government, are such that in relation to oil and gas discoveries the major problems have now suddenly become those of marketing, because of the great volume of riches that has been so rapidly revealed.

To summarize briefly the more recent developments is almost impossible because of the magnitude and significance of the results. For a time in the early part of 1953, it appeared that there would be a slackening in the discovery rate, but by the end of the year some really remarkable discoveries had been made. Among these may be cited the Roselea field in Manitoba, the Smiley field in Saskatchewan, and the Pembina and Sturgeon Lake fields in Alberta. New gas developments in northeast British Columbia assure more than adequate reserves for the Westcoast Transmission line now planned to Vancouver and the Pacific northwest united states.

Of all the fields, Pembina is beyond doubt the largest, and recent estimates have placed the reserves at 800 million to 950 million barrels in this one field alone, with a possibility that the number of wells that ultimately will be drilled on 80 acre spacing will be equal in number to the 4,600 presently producing oil wells in the whole of Alberta. Recently in one week alone there were seven new discoveries of oil and gas in western Canada of which two were in Manitoba, one in Saskatchewan, three in Alberta, and one in British Columbia.

Although it is too early to assess the complete value of these, the one in Saskatchewan in the Estevan area is of very great importance in that the well yielded not only large volumes of gas but, in addition, a high volume of light crude oil. One of the Alberta discoveries in the area west and north of Didsbury also seems to be highly important, showing a thick porous section in the Mississippian from which the oil and gas in Turner valley was produced.

As far as the gas reserves are concerned, in the last year these have been increasing at an unprecedented rate and there is so much now beyond what Alberta can use in the next 30 years that there appears little doubt adequate reserves will be provided for the Trans-Canada gas line by the Alberta petroleum and natural gas conservation board.

As is well known, oil pipe lines have been built both east and west from Alberta. There is the Interprovincial pipe line, first built to Superior, Wisconsin, at the head of the great lakes, and last summer extended as a 30-inch line capable of carrying 300,000 barrels a day to Sarnia in southwestern Ontario. Then there is the Trans Mountain pipe line, built from Edmonton to Vancouver, which will be extended to supply refineries in the state of Washington. If present plans for gas pipe lines are fulfilled, as seems now probable, the next two or three years should witness a very large pipe line building program, with gas eventually moving eastward from southern Alberta to supply central Canada, and gas moving from the Peace river area to supply Vancouver and the Pacific coast area of United States.

I wish now, Mr. Chairman, to say something on the activities of the metal mining industry.

Iron ore production showed an increase of over one million short tons over 1952 to a total of 6,501,000 tons as a result of the expansion under way at properties in northwestern Ontario, Newfoundland and British Columbia. The steady growth of the industry in these provinces, and particularly in northwestern Ontario, is expected to raise production this year to well over the seven million ton mark. This is without the addition of output from the Knob Lake iron ore field in Quebec-Labrador and the Marmora property in southeastern Ontario, both of which are expected to enter production later this year.

Two areas shared the spotlight in the search for and development of uranium properties. The Beaverlodge area of northern Saskatchewan proved a hive of activity with several companies carrying out pre-production development work on their properties. Feverish staking in the district of Algoma in northern Ontario followed a uranium strike near Blind River, about halfway between Sudbury and Sault Ste. Marie, and thousands of claims were staked during the latter half of 1953, and diamond drilling and surface development work is under way.

A huge development program involving hundreds of millions of dollars is now under way to expand nickel-producing facilities in the Sudbury area from which comes 85 per cent of the world output of nickel. In addition to the expansion under way by the two major producers, three new companies entered production in the area in 1953. Output increased 6·8 million pounds over 1952 to a total of 287·9 million pounds, and this is expected to reach 320 million pounds this year. This will include production from the Lynn Lake nickel-copper mine in northern Manitoba.

These are only a few of the highlights of Canadian mining in 1953 but they are indicative of an industry that is rapidly going places. Such growth, as is to be expected, has been attended by many and varied problems in mining and metallurgy, which in turn have led to considerable increase in the demands made upon the services available in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. These services range from topographical and geological surveys to metallurgical assistance in the extraction of metals and minerals from ores, and they include research into the preparation, beneficiation and utilization of the products of the Canadian mining and metal industries.

By steadily expanding its services the department is making every effort to keep pace with the increasingly heavy demands made upon it by a rapidly growing industry. As a consequence, it has been necessary to plan for new laboratory construction; and we hope that construction will start soon. This includes a building that will provide accommodation for mines branch research work on uranium ores and minerals, for its chemical laboratories and for offices for its administrative staff. Also a new building is needed in which to house the geological survey. The construction of a geophysical laboratory will shortly be started to provide space for three divisions of the dominion observatory.

The department comprises five branches: the surveys and mapping branch, the geological survey of Canada, the mines branch, the dominion observatories and the geographical branch.

The surveys and mapping branch produces the maps, aeronautical charts and hydrographic charts necessary for the development and administration of the country and for its defence. The continuing high rate of natural resources development, with no slackening in defence requirements, caused a strong demand for new maps and charts. Including geological maps, almost one million maps and charts were distributed during 1953.

The surveys and mapping branch placed 70 parties in the field in 1953 to carry out geodetic, topographic and legal surveys work. Approximately the same number will be sent into the field in 1954. In addition to the regular parties, winter field parties are being used to excellent advantage as they can penetrate into areas which are practically inaccessible during any other season of the year.

In co-operation with the Royal Canadian Air Force, the national research council and the meteorological service of the Department of Transport, the branch continued to cover the far north with shoran trilateration, a new electronic method of measuring long distances on the earth's surface, which permits the extension of control into remote areas much more speedily than by conventional methods of triangulation. Since 1948 when this method was first put into use, the sparsely settled area south of the Arctic archipelago, with the exception of Yukon, has been fairly well covered with shoran trilateration.

It is hoped that this method can be extended, in the coming years, with the assistance of the R.C.A.F., to bridge across from the mainland to cover the southern part of the Arctic archipelago. Some triangulation and precise levelling has been and will continue to be done by the geodetic survey for the St. Lawrence seaway project, and triangulation work will include the area of the Hamilton river on the coast of Labrador.

Using helicopters the topographic survey did topographical mapping over 20,740 square miles of territory in northern Quebec-Labrador in the important mineralized region between Knob Lake and Fort Chimo, about 20 miles south of Ungava bay. Two other helicopter-supported operations are planned for next summer. One of these will operate in the Hamilton river watershed and will assist in providing control data for assessment of power development possibilities along that river and particularly at Grand falls.

A little more work by the topographic survey this coming summer in Newfoundland will complete the horizontal and vertical controls needed to map the province. It is hoped that the island portion of Newfoundland will be fully mapped at the one-mile scale within the next two or three years.

The house will be asked to vote the sum of $1,500,000 for the construction of a new hydrographic ship to ply in northern waters. A great amount of work remains to be done to chart our Arctic seas. As a matter of fact, it will go on for perhaps a hundred years. New and forthcoming mining developments in northern Canada require the charting of new sea routes and of approaches to potential harbour sites, particularly in Ungava bay, where vast reserves of iron ore have been discovered.

The geological survey of Canada investigates and studies the geology of Canada, thereby assisting in the search for and development of mineral deposits. It also studies ground water supplies, makes soil surveys and investigates bedrock conditions relative to construction project problems. In 1953 it had 79 parties in the field and it expects to send probably 87 parties into the field in 1954.

The possibility that oil may exist in commercial quantities in the northwestern Arctic islands came to light as a result of the geological survey's field work in 1953 on a prominent circular structure on Ellef Ringnes island. Air photographs have revealed several such structures on these islands. These structures appear to be similar to the salt domes in the oil fields of Texas and Louisiana, many of which have formed traps for highly productive oil pools.

In 1954, it is proposed to undertake an airborne geological reconnaissance survey in the area lying west of Hudson bay and east of Great Slave lake. This survey is identified as "Operation Baker" and is an extension of "Operation Keewatin" which was conducted in the same general area in 1952. Plans are being made for another extension—"Operation Thelon" for 1955. The survey thus hopes to map the entire area between latitudes 60 and 65 and between Hudson bay and Great Slave lake by the end of 1955.

The office maintained by the geological survey of Canada in Calgary, Alberta, gave special attention to the study of oil and gas structures in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. In its office at Sydney, Nova Scotia, the survey continued to make a microscopic study of coal particularly for correlation of coal seams. These two offices in Calgary and Sydney will continue their work throughout the coming fiscal year; also the offices in Vancouver and Yellowknife will continue to serve the public. The intensive interest in prospecting for uranium resulted in the radiometric assay of approximately 1,200 samples by the radioactivity resources division of the geological survey. The division revised and published a second edition of 5,000 copies of the handbook, "Prospecting for Uranium in Canada". It is expected that this division will be even busier in the coming year with the intensified search for and discovery of uranium deposits.

An airborne aeromagnetic survey will be conducted next summer in that region north of Beaverlodge and extending into the Northwest Territories, in the hope of delimiting the northward extent of the Beaverlodge uranium-bearing geological formations.

The activities of our mines branch are directly concerned with the technological problems of the mining and metal industry and the branch maintains well equipped laboratories for tests, investigative work and research on these problems in the buildings down on Booth street. If any hon. members have the spare time, we would be very pleased to have them go down there and see what is being done.

The following are some of the highlights of mines branch activities during 1953. Forty-four reports were made to organizations submitting bulk ore samples for testing. Those on the treatment of ores from new properties included, when requested, recommendations for the design of flow sheets for the milling plants. A number of shipments were received from operating properties, and reports on these included recommendations for improving the treatment of the ores and reducing operating costs. Work in 1954 will include studies on the treatment of the complex New Brunswick ores of the Bathurst area.

Research was continued with encouraging results on the baffling problem of producing titanium metal of high purity at costs which would permit its wider use in industry. The development of an efficient economic process would mean that the large deposits of ilmenite at Allard Lake in Quebec would become an important source of the metal. This research will be continued in 1954.

Mr. Blackmore: I wonder whether the minister would read a little more slowly. It is rather difficult for us to follow what he is saying.

Mr. Prudham: The intensive development of Canada's iron ore deposits brought many requests for assistance, including test work on sintering and other beneficiating processes to produce marketable products.

There was a heavy demand for investigations into the metallurgical treatment of radioactive ores. Assistance included laboratory work on mineral samples to provide preliminary information on the concentration and extraction of uranium, and comprehensive investigations including pilot plant operations to work out in detail the treatment suited to particular ores.

Moneys have been provided in the public works estimates for the construction of a building to house the radioactivity division of the mines branch. With a greater number of properties nearing the stage of production the load of work on this division to investigate the treatment of ores is constantly increasing.

Branch engineers have and will continue to carry out analyses, studies and tests of samples of kyanite from the Mattawa area in northern Ontario, and milling investigations on the kyanite from deposits near Sudbury, Ontario, and from the Big Bend area of the Columbia river, British Columbia. The eventual development of these deposits would make Canada independent of present foreign sources and provide the basis of new and greatly expanded refractory and ceramic industries in Canada.

Many projects are conducted by the mines branch at the request of National Defence and for the defence research board: high temperature alloys, special steels for aircraft use, welding techniques, radiographic methods for inspection of castings and many others. Initiated as defence projects, they soon become invaluable in their application to civilian use and thus two purposes are served.

As I announced earlier, commendable progress has been made in the Mordell project where, in association with McGill University, a gas turbine has been built to use low-grade coal as a fuel. This turbine would find application in locomotives and as a small stationary power plant. Test runs have proven successful to date and experimental and performance tests will continue to be made for a year or two yet, until its full characteristics have been established and every avenue explored for possible improvement to its design and functioning. A sum of $100,000 is included in the estimates this year. We expect to ask for another $100,000 next year to complete the experimental and development work.

The work of the dominion observatories is organized in two main centres, the dominion observatory at Ottawa and the dominion astrophysical observatory at Victoria, British Columbia. The centre at Ottawa does research in astronomy and geophysics, the fields covered being positional astronomy, stellar physics, terrestrial magnetism, gravity and seismology. The work at Victoria is devoted mainly to research in astrophysics and to a small but increasingly important extent in seismology.

Since the installation in 1951 of a photographic telescope for the more accurate determination of time by astronomical methods, the dominion observatory has been emphasizing the more effective distribution of time throughout the country by radio methods. A new and more powerful transmitter was installed in 1953 for the short-wave radio transmission of time signals. During the new fiscal year it is intended further to improve the radio service by the installation of so-called speaking clocks which will broadcast a voice announcement of the time each minute throughout the 24 hours of the day.

Studies of the upper atmosphere of the earth by spectroscopic methods and by the observation of meteors will be continued during the present year. The two powerful photographic telescopes at Meanook and Newbrook, Alberta, which have been established for the photographic triangulation of meteors, are expected to be in routine operation throughout the year. Their purpose is to determine the velocities of meteors entering the earth's atmosphere and the extent to which these velocities are diminished by friction with the air at heights of 60 miles above the earth.

Another project of the observatory is the study of craters found on the earth's surface of form very similar to those appearing on the moon. Two of these have recently been found in Canada, one at Brent, Ontario and one in northern Ungava in Quebec. These newly discovered craters are from two to three miles in diameter and it is generally believed that they are due to the impact of large meteorites. Since the Canadian shield is an area which has remained geologically undisturbed for a long time it may reasonably be expected that it will contain many similar formations. Several circular features from a few miles to some tens of miles in diameter have been noted on maps and aerial photographs which may be due to the same cause. One such feature located in northern Quebec will be intensively studied by gravity, seismic and magnetic methods during the coming year.

In the past the magnetic mapping of Canada for navigation purposes and the provision of magnetic maps of general character on which detailed mineral exploration surveys could be based have been handicapped by the great size of the country, the inaccessibility of the Arctic areas and the lack of any equipment capable of making observations over the ocean. Many of these difficulties have been overcome by the completion in 1953 of a gyro-stabilized magnetometer designed to give both the direction and the strength of the magnetic field from an aircraft. During the present year it is proposed to use this instrument, the first gyro-stabilized magnetometer to be built in any country, to map the ocean approaches to eastern Canada, together with portions of the eastern Arctic and possibly also to make a flight to England to study the character of the magnetic field over the North Atlantic.

In the field of seismology, the Canadian network of 10 seismic stations will be maintained. Further attention will be given to the question of earthquake hazards in the new industrial regions of the west coast. The question of the character of the earth's crust under the Canadian shield will be studied with new and more powerful equipment. In order to study rock layers of several miles in thickness by explosion methods the older procedure of having an array of seismometers connected to a common recorder by wires has proved inadequate. New equipment now under construction will make possible an array of detecting instruments 20 to 30 miles in length transmitting seismic impulses to a central recorder by shortwave radio. This instrument was developed by one of our own departmental scientists.

The geographical branch makes regional and systematic studies of Canadian geography. These studies range from physical geographic studies of far northern regions to land use surveys and to urban surveys for civil defence. The branch played a major role in a study of northeast Newfoundland small coastal settlements and the possibility of grouping these many small settlements into fewer and larger units. This study will extend into the year 1954-55.

The branch continued to map ice conditions in portions of the gulf of St. Lawrence, in Hamilton inlet on the cost of Labrador, and in Ungava bay and Hudson strait, where there is need for information on the exact geographical limits of ice-free water during the critical break-up in the gulf of St. Lawrence. A similar report, with maps, was issued to use at a special conference of the iron mining and shipping companies interested in access to the recently discovered iron ore deposits west of Ungava bay.

Urban surveys were conducted at Winnipeg, Sault Ste. Marie and Montreal at the request of the civil defence division, Department of National Health and Welfare. Similar surveys have already been made in Toronto, Hamilton, London, Windsor, Saint John, and Halifax. More of these surveys will continue next summer in Montreal, Winnipeg and Halifax. Work continues on the atlas of Canada and it is expected to be completed in 1955.

I have endeavoured, Mr. Chairman, to highlight certain projects and activities of the department. I know that the members of the house will find much of this information useful, and I am sure that they will wish further information when we get to the individual items. I know that everyone shares my satisfaction in the prosperity which the mineral industry is undergoing, and will join with me in a word of praise to the rugged individualists who are, through their initiative and skill and hard work, making these developments possible. I have not made any mention of the coal industry. I would prefer if the debate on the coal industry and the problems related to it could be delayed until the coal board estimates are before the house, which I hope will be within a few weeks.

Mr. Adamson: After listening to the detailed report by the minister, Mr. Chairman, and, unfortunately, having read only the report for the previous year, I believe one could say to one's self, "lucky, lucky Canadians." I have practised my profession practically all over the world, with the exception of east Asia. When the minister of mines in any country can bring down a report of such developments as we have seen take place in the short span of one year, that country is indeed fortunate.

I realize that possibly it is wise in a political discussion to try to prove that we are perhaps not as fortunate as we are. In so far as this department is concerned, I disagree with that philosophy. Without question, we in Canada are the luckiest people in the world so far as our natural resources are concerned. I hope that no member in this house and I hope that no Canadian, will ever forget that, because upon that depends our essential prosperity.

The next point I wish to mention with regard to this department is that I want to pay tribute to the working force of the department, the engineers, the geologists, the metallurgists and the scientists generally who have made this development possible. A lot of people seem to think that you go out and discover oil wells or ore bodies or when you have discovered the oil well or the ore body, the method of milling and refining or separating the metal from the rock is a comparatively simple matter. May I say that without the skilled help of the technical people in this department, a great deal of this amazing development would have been quite impossible.

I would say that the majority of these devoted scientists who are working for Canada are working for a monetary return well below that which they could demand in private industry. I am not going into detail or to mention any names, but on frequent occasions I have known people who have been offered by private industry a multiple of the salary they were getting with the department, but who have refused it and remained in the service of Canada. This is something for which we and the Canadian people must at all times be extremely grateful. Without these devoted servants, a great deal of this development would not be possible.

I should like now to mention the working force in the industry. While the minister was reading his report, I made a little calculation. The working force in the mineral industry in Canada amounts to 128,500. It is generally estimated that for every man working in the mineral industry there are four others dependent on that industry. The mineral industry is, therefore, responsible for no less than 514,000 other jobs, directly. I believe the department of mines in the United States has a further figure showing that those indirectly dependent upon the minerals industry are at a ratio of eleven to one. So that no less than approximately 1,400,000 of the total working force in Canada are indirectly responsible to the mineral industry. The wages paid to those men amounted to $435 million, which works out to an average annual wage of no less than $3,400—figuring to the closest hundred dollars.

I mention this because here is an industry in which those engaged in it are, in the majority of cases, receiving annual wages away above the normal in Canada. That is something I suggest we should take into consideration. Some of these people may be directors or engineers, but their number would be small compared with the remaining workers. So that the figure of $3,400 is, I think, a reasonably accurate one.

The other day, in discussing the housing legislation, we were worried because so many of the working force in Canada are receiving wages less than the minimum required to participate in the benefits of that legislation. Here we are discussing an industry the average wage in which is at least $500 above the minimum required to participate in the legislation passed last week. I mention that only to indicate what the industry means to Canada.

I come to my next point which, I suggest, is also significant. I refer to the cost of the department expressed as a percentage of the value of total mineral production. That total mineral production last year of $1,331 million was up $46 million from the previous year which, in turn, was up $40 million from the year preceding. The cost of the department, less $15 million for the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, and the coal board which cannot be charged legitimately as an expense against the department, amounted to $16·6 million. In other words, in the last year the ratio of the cost of the department to the value of total mineral production was 1·23 per cent.

I mention that figure merely to emphasize the efficient work being done by the engineers and technicians in the department. The cost of survey work, the work of the mines branch, mapping and geological work came to something less than 1¼ per cent of the value of total production last year, which I stated earlier as about one and a third billions of dollars.

At this point I would say that while I have not the figures for the United Kingdom before me the last year for which I saw those figures indicated that the expenditures by the United Kingdom on geological survey was greater than those in Canada for the same purpose. These figures are not absolutely comparable, because they include some things that our figures do not include, and there are some discrepancies. Yet, the United Kingdom which, we consider, is geologically poor, a country the geological formations of which are chiefly concerned with coal and iron, including a comparatively small amount of other minerals, considers the work of geological survey so important that their expenditures for that purpose are greater than ours in Canada.

If our production increases at the same rate in the next decade—and I think there is every reason to believe it will, unless world markets are completely destroyed—Canadian mineral production will exceed $4 billion a year, an amount considerably greater than the gross national product before the war. I mention this only to show the extraordinary growth taking place in this country. It is something that challenges the imagination of every Canadian. We have to stop and think about it to realize what it means to us in Canada, what it means in the matter of increased population, what it means in connection with finding new capital, and what it demands in the way of improving our methods of extraction and of discovery, and all those other technical procedures with which the mines branch has to deal. So much for that phase of the matter.

I should like now to deal with one or two of the individual items of expenditure by some of the companies. According to its last report, the International Nickel Company has spent over $150 million in the last two years. According to the minister's statement, expenditures running to hundreds of millions of dollars are already under way, by the nickel industry as a whole. Thus we have one metal where hundreds of millions of dollars are being expended for its future development at the present time.

I ask any hon. member this question. The minister comes tonight with estimates for the expenditure of $27 million. If there was a policy of nationalization of the mines in Canada, what would any elected assembly do if a minister of mines and technical surveys came down to the house and said: "I want hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars for the development of nickel"? Why, no government under our method of accounting would dream of accepting such a statement; and yet, if we had nationalization of the mining industry, without the expenditure of those hundreds of millions of dollars, the industry could not prosper and increase the way it has been. I mention that just as an example to show the fallacy of any program of nationalization of the mining industry.

I shall give another example. I have not the figures in front of me of the amount that was spent last year, and the minister will correct me if I am wrong, but something like $320 million was spent in the exploration and development of petroleum products.

Mr. Prudham: The amount was $1 million a day.

Mr. Adamson: Thank you very much; $365 million for exploration and discoveries. Suppose a minister came to this house and said: "I want $1 million a day to go out and do some prospecting and drilling". What would any hon. member say; what sort of reception would he get? What reaction would the treasury board have to such a statement? Yet today private industry is risking and betting a million dollars a day in this one industry.

I give the committee these two examples of the fallacy of any program of nationalization of the mineral industry in Canada. It is a risk business. Enormous sums of money have to be spent to win the minerals. To say that you could come in with any finite sum and say, "We want, shall we say, $50 million to develop the Pembina field in the next year" is far-fetched. The Pembina field may require $100 million to $200 million to develop. Is that the sort of proposition that could be brought to the house? Is that the sort of proposition that the Minister of Finance could produce estimates for? I would not think so. That is an example of the fallacy of this policy of nationalization. Nothing has shown it so clearly as the statement the minister has given the committee tonight.

I want to deal very shortly with one other question. I have not the annual report for the present year; it is not printed, but for the past year I find this statement on page 8 regarding the petroleum industry:

> Much of the gas occurs in close physical association with the oil and would be largely wasted if crude oil production were unduly increased.

What does that mean? It simply means that it is imperative to find a market as quickly as possible for natural gas. Unless we are going to waste and destroy a great national asset in the natural gas and burn it off at the wellhead in flares, which is a criminal thing to do, a start on the gas pipe lines must be made at the very earliest opportunity. That gas must be used. It must be used in the industries in Canada. It must be used not only in the industries in Canada but in the development of new industry, and it also must find a North American market where that is available after our own needs have been supplied.

Let me give you one example of what this may mean. In the last month or two a new deposit of base metals, silver, copper and possibly other metals has been discovered at Manitouwadge in northern Ontario. It is in an area where there is no fuel; it is in an area where the cost of fuel for smelting and refining purposes might be so great as to jeopardize the whole development of the project. Yet—and this is a very rough estimate—I have heard it said that if this new development fulfils promises, a market for no less than 10 billion cubic feet of gas will be established. A market for 10 billion cubic feet of gas is larger than the present consumption of the city of Toronto. This is probably not a really fair comparison because the city of Toronto is using artificial gas at the present time with a low thermal rating and very expensive, but still quite a lot of gas is used. In this one new development there is a potential market for a greater amount of gas than is being used in Toronto at the present time. I mention that not as a mine promoter, or anything of that kind, but as an example of the challenge we are facing in Canada today with development in this country. A year ago that was barren land. Today it is a potential market for 10 billion cubic feet of gas.

The next item I wish to come to is proper housing of the department in Ottawa. I sincerely hope that the geological survey will be properly housed in the near future in a building of its own. To stick it away in the museum, and house it all over the place the way it is, is nothing short of criminal.

I do not know whether the same is true today, but the mines department was at one time housed in 27 buildings in Ottawa. Indeed, the central registry was in fact the boy on a bicycle and if there was to be a file drawn he was alerted and went to the central registry where he picked up the file. Whether that is so today I do not know, but it certainly was the situation at one time.

To try and run a department under these conditions is almost impossible and I hope the department will, in the shortest possible time, get itself properly housed, not only as far as laboratories generally are concerned, but also as regards ore dressing laboratories in particular, and all the other departments dealing with the mines. I hope the same will be done for the geological survey, and that it will be properly housed in a building of its own. I have expressed this hope for many, many years, and I now sincerely hope that, with the development now taking place, this matter will be dealt with without further delay.

I would also like to say a word about the development and refining of titanium. Titanium is a metal of enormous promise but the difficulties have not as yet been completely solved as regards a method of cheap extraction from the basic ore, ilmenite. The department has worked, I believe, for four years on this one problem, but if a solution is found the whole question of producing aircraft engines which will stand the terrific heat of the new supersonic planes will very largely be solved.

Each development ties in one with another. Work for the Department of National Defence proceeds and something of great commercial value is discovered as a by-product. There again I would like to say that we on this side of the house have complained that the amount of research work being done in Canada is woefully inadequate. This one example of the refining and producing of titanium ore is an example of what I mean.

Coming now to the project regarding iron ore. In the not too distant future the deposit at Steep Rock will be producing in the nature of 15 million tons a year, which is over double the present production of iron ore in Canada. The challenge there, Mr. Chairman, is not only to the miners and the producers, but the challenge is also to find an expanded steel industry which will use a larger part of that ore than is being done at present. With this great potential of iron ore I feel that we must in every way possible encourage the steel industry to expand to meet the challenge of the natural resources of this country. I know a great expansion has taken place since the war. I know our major companies have expended many millions of dollars on new blast furnaces at Hamilton, the Soo, and elsewhere in Canada, but with the great possibilities of development now before us we must be prepared to look for a steel industry in Canada many times its present size. That is one of the subsidiary challenges arising out of the present situation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have taken rather longer than I intended on this subject, but if I have done nothing else I sincerely hope that I have shown you, sir, and to hon. members who may not be interested in mining as much as I am, that today the greatest internal challenge we have in Canada is the development of our natural resources.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I want to take the opportunity to say a few words on the work of this most important department before this particular item is approved. I was very interested in the statement the minister read which was quite comprehensive and informative. It is the type of statement that one can possibly derive more from by rereading it, but personally I appreciate that he has made that statement to the house.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for York West who has just resumed his seat. I would not for a moment profess to have his knowledge of the mining industry, but when the hon. member speaks he rather creates the atmosphere of the board room, of company directors discussing the development of the mining industry. Possibly, Mr. Chairman, you will excuse me if I create the atmosphere of the bunkhouse, the prospector's cabin, and the miner's wife who is a bit put out about unemployment and that sort of thing.

This, Mr. Chairman, is one of the most important departments of the government and I believe it is a department about which a good many hon. members in this house know very little. I always make a practice of reading the annual report of this department with great interest, because it is a department whose work is vital to the development of our natural resources. It is a department about which hon. members should be well informed so that they can in turn inform their constituents and people generally about the nature of the work being done.

That is the reason why, Mr. Chairman, I suggest again, as I did last year and the year before, that in my opinion the estimates of this department should be referred to the committee on mines, forests and waters, which has been in a sort of moribund condition for about, I believe, eight years.

I think it would be a good idea indeed to have these estimates referred to that committee, not solely for the purpose of finding out how the money is expended but in order to give to a good many of these excellent officials and people who are doing this work the opportunity to explain to a committee of this house the details of the work they are undertaking. I think that procedure would be extremely helpful indeed.

I find other members who have little idea as to the excellent work being carried on by the various branches of this department. I have some knowledge of the excellent work that is being carried on because the miners in my constituency have often told me of the excellent service the department gives to those who want advice on the treatment of ores and things of that sort. If these estimates were referred to the committee, I think there would be given to the members of that committee an opportunity to hear evidence from the officials and to gather a great deal of useful information.

I think it is about time the committee on mines, forests and waters was put to work. Here we are in a period when our natural resources are being developed at their greatest rate in Canadian history, when there is the greatest interest in their development and also possibly the greatest interest in the conservation of natural resources; yet the very committee that should be giving consideration to these important questions, to my knowledge, has not sat for seven or eight years or maybe longer. I urge the minister to give consideration to having his estimates go before that committee so that we can gather some information about the work of the department. Let us utilize this committee.

Having made those few remarks in general, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words about a matter that is of serious concern to a great number of my constituents, namely the closing of a good number of the base metal mines in the interior of British Columbia. When I was listening to the minister's statement I noticed that he made a reference to base metal mining, but it was a reference of only two or three sentences. It seemed to me that he rather skipped over that aspect of the question. While the general mining situation may be satisfactory, I am sure the minister knows, as do his officials, that for many of the small operators in certain sections of British Columbia a serious situation exists so far as base metal mining is concerned. I want to say a few words about that matter at this time.

I have lived in the interior of British Columbia for nearly fifty years and I know a great many of these people in the small mining communities. The closing down of these small mines affects the communities of Salmo, Kaslo, where the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was born—and I am sure he knows all about the shut-down in Kaslo and the surrounding district—Sandon, Silverton, New Denver, Slocan city, the Trout lake area and the Boundary country. There are large numbers of people seriously affected at this time because of the closing of most of the smaller base metal mines in this area.

As far back as I can remember, the history of base metal mining in the camps I have mentioned has been one of boom and slump. Ever since mining was commenced in the early 1890's in this area there has been a period of activity and employment, with money expended on roads by the provincial government and money expended on surveys by various corporations and individuals; a short period of activity and prosperity and then a shut-down. That has been the repeated history of these smaller base metal mines in the interior of British Columbia.

I have known a great many of these people throughout the years. I have known many of these old-time prospectors who, unfortunately, are passing out of the picture. The old-time prospector has not much opportunity as against the diamond drill and the large amounts of capital required to establish a mine nowadays.

I might tell you, Mr. Chairman, a story that comes to my mind. I know a chap named Jack Rady, an old prospector in the Lardeau country, one of those men who prospected for 50 years and made a few finds but who never became well off. I was wanting to go up the Duncan river 18 miles in order to visit six or eight chaps who were developing a small claim there. He was the only one who had an outboard motor powerful enough to go up the Duncan river at high water. As we were going up the river with some difficulty he said, "I do not know what I can do to help the C.C.F. but I certainly feel like helping them because I know the C.C.F. have always done their best for the prospectors and the small operators in the mining areas. I will tell you what I will do", he said. "There is not anybody in the Trout lake area who has an outboard motor powerful enough to go up the Duncan at this time of the year. There is not one of the other fellows in the other parties who can get through to these six chaps until the ballot is counted. That is the best that I will do." That is the spirit of these old-timers; and it is many of these people and their dependents who are suffering because of the decline in the base metal industry at this time.

I think the time has passed when governments can let communities and human beings suffer periodically as they have suffered in these communities without any action and without any planning. I have heard from several groups in this connection. I have heard from the miners directly, the prospectors, and those interested in mining. I have heard from the miners' wives; and I can tell you that a miner's wife can, on occasion, become quite vocal when her husband is out of work for some extended period. I have heard from the business people in these small communities and I have heard from a good number of the small operators. In order to shorten my remarks this evening—and I do not want to extend them more than is necessary to give to the committee the picture in the base metal mining industry in the small mines in the interior of British Columbia—I am just going to quote from a brief that was sent to me by the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. It is the statement and proposals adopted by the sixth Canadian convention of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers for submission to the government of Canada. The minister was one of those who heard these representations. I just want to quote briefly from a paragraph in the brief entitled "Crisis in Base Metals" and which reads as follows:

> So far the base metals crisis has developed mainly in lead and zinc. The fall in lead and zinc prices has been very heavy. The Canadian price of lead is now 12 cents a pound, 40 per cent below the high point in 1951. The price of zinc is 9¼ cents a pound, more than 50 per cent below the price at the end of 1951. Further declines must be expected.
> The heavy fall in lead and zinc prices affected first the small and marginal mines with high production costs. Already no less than 22 mines in British Columbia alone have been forced to close down. This situation is made worse by the fact that there is only one smelter for lead and zinc in Canada, namely the smelter at Trail, B.C. on which the majority of mines depend for the smelting of their ore. Just when metal prices were falling this smelter chose to raise its smelting charges, thus tightening the squeeze on the smaller mines and helping to force some of them to close down.
> Thousands of workers in our industry have been laid off. In the communities where mining is the only industry, it means there are no other jobs available, and that the merchants and farmers suffer too. In many mining communities the situation is as bad today as it was at the depth of the depression 20 years ago. The major lead-zinc producer in Canada, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, is now also cutting down production; there have been large lay-offs at the smelter in Trail, while arrangements have been made in Kimberley between the company and the union to work short time so as to maintain maximum employment under the circumstances.
> As already noted, the crisis in non-ferrous metals has until recently been limited to lead and zinc. But now it threatens to engulf copper as well.

The report goes on and explains this in greater detail. Then the union makes certain proposals. I might say that I was visited by some small operators as well who, in general, supported these proposals. The union suggests that there should be an increase in unemployment payments and that there is a necessity for the broadening of export markets overseas, particularly in the British commonwealth and Europe. It also proposes the building of a lead-zinc custom smelter in western Canada to free the small producers from dependence on the smelter at Trail for the processing of their ore.

I am not going to take the time of the house to deal further with the brief. I mention this to bring the serious plight of the people engaged in small mine operations to the attention of the minister. In my opinion it is not good enough to go decade after decade and let this situation recur and recur without any government action to prevent it and without any attempt to plan. In my opinion the responsibility rests on the federal government and provincial government, and in our area there is a moral responsibility on the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

I know that the primary responsibility rests on the provincial government because natural resources come directly under its jurisdiction. I think it is up to the provincial government of British Columbia to give a lead in this direction and to do something to indicate to the federal government and to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company that it is interested in getting all three groups together to do some planning to prevent these recurring slumps.

The federal government has some responsibility. It is responsible for trade policies. It has a great deal of effect with its taxation policies and so on. I do not know whether the minister has had the opportunity to meet the minister of mines of British Columbia, but I do urge that every co-operation be extended to the government of that province if they wish to work with the minister and with the large mining companies to see what can be done about this very important question.

The federal government can continue to render valuable technical aid to these small industries, but I emphasize again that it is no doubt the primary responsibility of the provincial government to give some leadership in seeking protection for these communities and the workers employed there. The Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company has a definite responsibility but I think you cannot blame the company so much if the government does not take action in the matter.

As I say, the company has a moral responsibility because it has a monopoly of the power production of the interior of British Columbia, has control of the greater portion of the base metal resources of that part of the province and has a monopoly in the smelting industry. I know the company has been of great advantage to the interior of British Columbia, and I am of the opinion, if the provincial government would go ahead in this direction with the support of the federal government, that as a result of the co-operation of the two governments and the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company something could be done to improve conditions in the small base metal mines in the interior of British Columbia.

In reading this very interesting report I noticed that it says that company production was reduced because of a shortage of power. I want to read one paragraph on page 9 which is as follows:

> The substantial increases in the tonnage outputs of lead and zinc over 1951 failed by a considerable margin to offset the steady decline in the prices of the two metals. Thus the combined value of output at $184,504,306 was $9,487,483 lower than in 1951. The price of lead decreased from 18·80 cents a pound at the commencement of the fiscal year to 13·25 at the end, and that of zinc from 19·30 to 11 cents. The decline in prices led to the closing of several marginal producers, mainly in British Columbia, principal source of Canadian lead and zinc. The situation in that province was further aggravated by a power shortage which forced the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited to curtail its treatment of custom ores.

I get this information from the small operators and I presume it is correct. They tell me that the treatment charges of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company in 1939 were $2 a ton. In 1948 they were $11 a ton and I am advised that they are now $40 a ton. I take these figures as given to me, but I cannot vouch for their accuracy. I am told by a number of the small operators that the increase in smelting costs alone is a great hardship. I am firmly of the opinion that if the provincial government would take the lead in this matter, supported by the federal government and in co-operation with the company, a number of these so-called marginal mines which are so close to being profitable could be operating today with some consideration on the part of the company and the co-operation of the two governments. Instead they are closed down and the communities are suffering.

I admit that it would be uneconomical to operate at the present time some mines that were developed during the period of high price of lead and zinc. I admit that no adjustments could create a situation whereby they could all operate at a profit. But I know quite a number of these people who went into the hills with small amounts of capital and developed small base metal mines and I am informed by them that there are marginal mines that with very little assistance could continue to operate and make a small profit. They tell me they could operate if their treatment costs were cut to any extent, and ore accepted.

I know the minister is concerned about this question because I have discussed it with him. I urge the minister to extend every possible co-operation to the provincial government in an effort to do something to solve the problem of boom and bust so far as the small base metal mining communities in the interior of British Columbia are concerned. To me it is not good enough to merely let the market decide these things without any attempt to solve them as between governments and the big companies concerned. We have passed that stage. We cannot continue to let communities suffer alternate periods of prosperity and slump decade after decade and take no action.

If war were declared tomorrow the whole resources of the country would be mobilized and the government could do whatever it might put its mind to. As far as this group is concerned, we are merely asking them to use the same energy and the same resources in solving one of the many problems presented to us by peace. I am confident that effective co-operation between the federal and provincial governments and the co-operation of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, which I think would be forthcoming under the leadership of these governments, can do much to remedy the situation. All that is required is acceptance of responsibility by the governments and companies concerned.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I think my remarks might be considered as being made primarily for the purpose of seeking information. I am wondering how much research work has been done in the past with respect to the development of electrical power at coal mines throughout the country and transporting it by the use of wires to the point where energy is needed rather than moving the coal to that point.

Mr. Prudham: I really am not rising on a point of order, but I wonder whether we could save the discussion of problems related to the coal industry until the coal board estimates are before the committee.

Mr. Leboe: I think that possibly could be done. As I said, I was looking for information in that respect. There are some other aspects to the problem of hydroelectricity which have a bearing on the question I have in mind, that is a wartime emergency. The amount of money we are spending on defence would indicate we recognize the possibility of a war so I feel that possibly some thought should be given, if it has not already been given, to breaking up the sources of electric power into smaller units. It is at that point that the business of the coal mines enters the picture.

I recognize that some research has been done in that connection. The minister spoke of a turbine that is now in the process of development, but of course at this moment that is an unknown quantity. We all recognize the vulnerability of our dams and hydroelectric power plants during a war. I was considering, therefore, the possibility of dispersing these power units throughout the area, perhaps as a defence measure looking forward to the time when an emergency might arise and at the same time looking after the communities in peacetime.

Mention has been made tonight of the distress of the mines throughout the country. I should like to say that I feel very strongly that our distress in mining or any other industry, outside of acts of God such as drought and so forth, is man-made and can therefore be solved by man. If anyone were to look at the distress there is in the industry today, he would find that distress is a direct result of financial policy. I believe that when we start looking at the slumps and periods of prosperity that were mentioned, invariably we will find that the root cause is financial policy. If we are going to solve some of these problems such as distress in the mines and meet the need for further research, we shall be altogether dependent on this government's financial policy.

I do not believe we in this country can continue on the basis of subsidizing this industry and subsidizing that industry. Just before I left Prince George someone said to me, "The only industry that is not subsidized is the lumber industry and we think we ought to get subsidies there too; can you do anything about it?" I do not think that is the answer to our problem. We cannot continue to subsidize here and there out of the taxpayers' pockets in order to try to make an equal distribution of purchasing power. When we do, we have a situation that is exactly comparable to the sausage tied on the end of a stick over the dog's back. The faster the dog runs the faster the sausage goes, and he never catches up to it. He is only playing himself out. I would say, Mr. Chairman, that the alleviating of the distress in the mining industry and the welfare of the miners throughout this country depends almost entirely on this government's financial policy. I would certainly urge that the government review that policy with a view to getting purchasing power into the hands of the potential consumers, and thereby build up our industry.

As we have said before, and it is a fact, production does not release enough purchasing power to buy back that which is produced. When we are purchasing certain items that are items for destruction, the purchasing power released is available for the purchase of consumer goods and we have prosperity. Naturally, in peacetime when we are not preparing for a war, the whole system breaks down. I would urge the government to get to the bottom of the source of evil, which I believe is our financial policy.

Mr. Prudham: I would suggest that the hon. member direct those remarks to the Minister of Finance. This department could not deal with the problem as he suggests.

Mr. Leboe: I am finished with my remarks, so perhaps we could call it ten o'clock and adjourn the debate.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Nicholson: I have a few remarks, Mr. Chairman, which I should like to make at a later time. Would you call it ten o'clock?

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On Monday, Mr. Speaker, we shall take third reading of the two bills that will be available for that stage. Then, we shall move to go into supply, and when the motion is carried we shall continue with this debate, calling after that agriculture. If that is the position on Tuesday night, we shall take the Criminal Code on Wednesday. On Thursday we shall move to refer the items in the estimates relating to external affairs to the standing committee on external affairs. I presume there will be a debate on external affairs on that motion.

Mr. Knowles: With respect, I think the minister overlooked one point. Perhaps it was deliberate. He did not indicate whether any new departments would be called if we got into supply.

Mr. Harris: I was hoping, Mr. Speaker, that it would be unnecessary to make that announcement because we could call all the other departments perhaps when we passed the motion.

Mr. Knowles: Then my suspicions were well founded.

Mr. Harris: But if that is not agreeable we would call external affairs, national defence, national health and welfare, and allow them to stand.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 22, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORTS AND CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table the following reports for the year 1953, in English and in French: annual report of the Canadian National Railways; annual report of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited; annual report of the Canadian National Railways securities trust, and auditors' report to parliament in respect of the Canadian National Railways system and the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited.

By leave of the house I move:

That the annual reports for the year 1953 of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, the Canadian National Railways securities trust, and the auditors' report to parliament in respect of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, tabled this day, be referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, together with the following items of estimates for 1954-55:

Vote 465—Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals, deficit;

Vote 469—North Sydney, Nova Scotia-Port aux Basques, Newfoundland, ferry and terminals, deficit;

Vote 474—Maritime Freight Rates Act, payment of difference between tariff tolls and normal tolls to the Canadian National Railways and other railways operating in the territory designated by the act;

Vote 475—Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, deficit.

And that the resolution passed by the house on February 5, 1954, referring certain estimates to the committee of supply, be rescinded in so far as the said resolution relates to votes Nos. 465, 469, 474 and 475.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake) moved that the third report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on Friday, March 19, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

CUSTOMS REGULATIONS BREACHES, SAINT JOHN

Mr. Bell:

1. Have any investigations been conducted by the government during the months of February and March of this year into breaches of the customs regulations by incoming foreign ships to the port of Saint John?

2. If so, what ship or ships and registry were involved?

3. What were the results of the above investigations?

Mr. McCann:

1. Yes, all ships arriving from foreign waters at the port of Saint John are searched and where there is any indication of breaches of the customs regulations, these breaches are fully investigated.

2. The names of innocent owners of vehicles or vessels used by their employees or others in the breach of customs regulations are not released by the department. Following the same practice, the names of ships abroad which customs infractions are committed by passengers, crew, or persons other than responsible ships' officers are not made public.

For the period February 1 to March 8 inclusive, 12 ships arriving from foreign waters had customs seizures effected aboard. These ships were of the following registry:

Registry	No. of Seizures
British	4
Canadian	4
Foreign	4

3. Seizures made in the twelve instances reported resulted in the confiscation of 4,270 cigarettes, 373 bottles of liquor, 26 bottles of wine, ¾ lb. tobacco. Two persons were prosecuted for infractions of the Customs Act; one was fined $200 and the other $50. One vessel was seized and released on deposit of $400 pending decision as to penalty to be applied, if any, to owner.

GRAIN HANDLING CAPACITY

Mr. Argue:

1. What is the grain handling capacity of (a) Pacific coast ports; (b) Port Arthur-Fort William?

2. At what percentage of capacity were grain handling facilities being operated at the above ports since August 1, 1953?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Below are listed as at March 11, 1953, licensed storage capacity, which is the declared physical space, and the "effective capacity", which means the peak usable storage space as estimated by the Canadian wheat board on the basis of maximum stocks, taking into consideration past records, multiplicity of grades, condition of grain and vessel loadings.

	Licensed effective capacity	Estimated capacity millions of bushels
(a) Pacific ports
(i) Vancouver/New Westminster	19·5	17·5
(ii) Victoria	1·0	·9
(iii) Prince Rupert	1·2	1·1
(b) Fort William/Port Arthur	93·2	80·0

2. Grain handling as percentage of capacity since August 1, 1953 was constantly in flux. Stocks in store as percentage of "Estimated effective capacity" varied between August 1, 1953 and March 3, 1954, as follows: Vancouver/New Westminster, from 46 to 80 per cent; Victoria, from 11 to 78 per cent; Prince Rupert, from 9 to 82 per cent; Fort William/Port Arthur, from 49 to 100 per cent.

INCOME TAX OFFICES, SALARIES AND COLLECTIONS

Mr. Hansell:

1. How many income tax offices are there in Canada?
2. How many are there in the four western provinces, and where is each located?
3. What was the total of income tax office salaries in Canada in 1952?
4. What was the total income tax collected in Canada in 1952?

Mr. McCann:

1. The Department of National Revenue, taxation division, has 27 district taxation offices in addition to head office.

2. There are seven district taxation offices located in the four western provinces, as follows: Winnipeg, Manitoba; Regina and Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; Calgary and Edmonton, Alberta; Vancouver and Victoria, British Columbia.

3 and 4. Fiscal year ended 31st March, 1953: Total salaries $18,859,816.57; total collections—income tax and succession duties $2,593,960,618.25.

PENSION COMMISSION—MEDICAL PERSONNEL

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Who are the full time medical personnel of the pension commission?
2. Where are they located?
3. What is their salary?
4. Are any of these full time medical personnel permitted to engage in occupations supplementary to their duties on the pension commission?

[Mr. Dickey.]

Mr. Bennett:

1. J. F. Bates, M.D., C.M.; J. P. Laplante, O.B.E., E.D., M.D., C.M.; W. L. Coke, O.B.E., C.D., M.D.; L. W. Brown, M.D., C.M.

2. Ottawa.

3. $9,000 per annum.

4. Section 3(12) of the Pension Act, chapter 207, R.S., 1952, reads as follows: "Each commissioner shall devote the whole of his time to the performance of his duties under this act, and shall not accept or hold any office or employment that the governor in council may declare to be inconsistent with the performance of his duties under this act."

MIDDLE CARAQUET, N.B.—OWNERSHIP OF LAND

Mr. Robichaud:

1. Does the dominion government own a certain piece, parcel or tract of land at the approach of the public wharf at Middle Caraquet, Gloucester county, New Brunswick?
2. If so, when was this lot of land purchased and at what price?
3. What is the total area of this parcel or tract of land?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. Two parcels of land were purchased on August 16, 1929, one parcel containing 0·2 acre for $100, and the other parcel containing 0·1 acre for $30.

WOOL—SUBSIDY PAID PRODUCERS

Mr. Hansell:

1. Is there a subsidy paid to the producers of wool at the present time?
2. If so, how is this subsidy paid?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

NATO—REPORT FOR FIRST FIVE YEARS

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. Has the Canadian government been asked to publish the report of the work of NATO in its first five years?
2. If so, will the Canadian government publish this report?

Mr. Claxton:

1. No.

2. The secretary general's report on "Five Years of NATO" is still in the course of preparation. When complete, it will be printed by NATO and copies sent to the Department of External Affairs for distribution in Canada. Accordingly, it will not be necessary for the department to print copies of this document.

Questions

GRAIN SHIPMENT COSTS

Mr. Argue:

1. What is the amount of each of the various freight and other costs, both rail and water, going into the shipment of wheat via (a) Port Arthur; (b) Fort William; (c) Churchill, that were taken into consideration in the change in the price of wheat at Port Arthur-Fort William and Churchill, as compared to the Pacific coast ports?

2. What are the corresponding costs for (a) oats; (b) barley?

3. What is the present difference in selling price for (a) No. 1 feed oats; (b) No. 1 feed barley, at Port Arthur-Fort William, Churchill and Pacific coast ports?

Mr. Dickey:

1. The following costs of moving wheat via different outlets were taken into consideration prior to the board announcing price changes for wheat in store Fort William/Port Arthur as compared to prices in store Pacific coast ports:

(a) Cost of moving wheat from in store Fort William/Port Arthur to f.o.b. St. Lawrence ports:

(i) Via all water, 20·279 cents per bushel;

(ii) Via lake and rail, 22·198 cents per bushel.

(b) Cost of fobbing wheat at Pacific coast ports, 2·625 cents per bushel;

(c) Cost of fobbing wheat at Port Churchill, 2·920 cents per bushel.

2. (a) The board does not move oats and barley from Fort William/Port Arthur to St. Lawrence ports. This movement is handled by the trade from whom the following estimates have been obtained:

Oats

(i) Via all water, 15·486 cents per bushel;

(ii) Via lake and rail, 15·986 cents per bushel.

Barley

(i) Via all water, 18·853 cents per bushel;

(ii) Via lake and rail, 20·523 cents per bushel.

(b) Cost of fobbing oats at Pacific coast pts., 2·541 cents per bushel;

Cost of fobbing barley, Pacific coast pts., 2·587 cents per bushel.

(c) Cost of fobbing oats at Port Churchill, 2·751 cents per bushel;

Cost of fobbing barley at Port Churchill, 2·809 cents per bushel.

3. The present difference in the Canadian wheat board's asking price for No. 1 feed oats and No. 1 feed barley between Pacific coast ports and Fort William/Port Arthur is as follows: Oats, no difference; barley, 10 cents per bushel higher at Vancouver.

The Canadian wheat board does not have any oats or barley at Port Churchill.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—MAGAZINES

Mr. Fulton:

1. Has the attention of the government been directed to the evidence given in the recent contempt case in Cornwall, Ontario, to the effect that a magazine distributor was required by the terms of his contract to take all magazines supplied by a certain company and in turn offer them all to vendors for sale, on penalty of forfeiting his contract of distributorship?

2. Has the government referred this matter to the unfair trade practices commission for investigation under the Combines Investigation Act?

3. If so, with what result to date?

Mr. Garson:

1. The attention of the government has not been drawn to the evidence in question, but the director under the Combines Investigation Act noted it at the time.

2. The government has not referred the matter to the director or the restrictive trade practices commission, which it is presumed is the body referred to in the question as the "unfair trade practices commission".

3. See above. It will be remembered that the anti-combines legislation relates, generally speaking, to combines and monopolies in restraint of trade; to resale price maintenance; and to price discrimination. The director has in the past, as commissioner, given some attention to the magazine field and some years ago made preliminary inquiries into a similar complaint originating in a western city. He found that although the practice existed of requiring dealers to accept a complete "package" of magazines, they were entitled to return those that were unsold; and that opinion among dealers varied between those who favoured the system because it relieved them of the necessity of placing individual orders and those who objected to it because it required them to receive in the first instance and then take the trouble of returning unwanted lines. The commissioner came to the conclusion that, whatever the merits or demerits of the system, its nature was not such as to warrant formal investigation under the Combines Investigation Act and the matter is dealt with at some length in the commissioner's annual reports for 1951 and 1952 at pages 24 and 26, respectively. The director informs me that the newspaper report of Mr. Bryan's evidence indicated that the conditions he referred to arose out of a contract into which he had himself entered with the magazine distributor and that the incident did not, in the judgment of the director, in itself raise a case for investigation under the act.

Questions

GREATER VANCOUVER—NORTH SHORE BASIN

Mr. Green:

1. Has the government purchased property in greater Vancouver known as the north shore basin?
2. If so, what was the extent thereof, when and from whom was it purchased and at what price?
3. What use is to be made of this property?
4. How much has been expended in the development thereof to date?
5. Has a manager of north shore basin been appointed and if so, who is this person and what is his salary?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Yes.

2. On September 5, 1953, 4.44 acres of land was purchased from the North Shore Marine Basin Ltd., for $46,063.

3. It is to be used as a fishing harbour.

4. $27,822.85.

5. No.

RESEARCH—BORACIC ACID IN TREATMENT OF INFANTS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the attention of the government been drawn to reports concerning possible ill effects from the use of boric acid (or boracic acid) in the treatment of infants?
2. Has any research into this matter been conducted under the auspices of the Department of National Health and Welfare?
3. If so, what are the results of such research?
4. If not, will such research be undertaken?
5. Has the Department of National Health and Welfare taken any other steps in connection with this matter?

Mr. Roberison:

1. Yes.

2. Yes, an investigation of powders sold in Canada and recommended for use on infants was carried out. The literature on the subject was also studied.

3 and 4. Of the six baby powders investigated, three did not contain boric acid. The other three contained approximately 5 per cent of boric acid and its presence was indicated on these labels. Reports showed that unfavourable reactions in children resulted when pure boric acid or highly concentrated boric acid preparations, those containing 25 per cent or more of boric acid, were used repeatedly over large areas of abraded or damaged skin.

5. Yes, pediatricians are being consulted on this matter.

COLOMBO PLAN—REQUESTS FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. What is the total amount required to cover the requests for assistance from countries being helped under the Colombo plan for this year?
2. What is the total amount of money available to meet these requests and what are the amounts of money being subscribed by each country?

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Claxton:

1. It is not possible to answer this question because under the Colombo plan requests for assistance are directed to individual governments and aid is worked out bilaterally on a continuing basis.

2. It is not possible to say at any one time or for any annual period how much money is available to meet requests for assistance under the Colombo plan. The latest information on the amounts pledged by the various participating countries is contained in chapter XI of the Colombo plan progress report prepared by the consultative committee at its meeting in New Delhi in October, 1953. Copies of this report have been tabled.

TRADE—AGREEMENTS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Mr. Leboe:

1. Have any trade agreements between United States and Canada been signed outside continental United States and Canada?
2. If so, what was the purpose or reason for doing so?
3. What would be the ratio to those signed on the continent?

Mr. Claxton:

1. The only bilateral trade agreement between Canada and the United States, signed outside continental North America, was one supplementary to the general agreement on tariffs and trade signed at Geneva on October 30, 1947. The general agreement on tariffs and trade, which is a multilateral trade agreement to which both Canada and the United States have adhered, is in force between Canada and the United States.

2. Since this bilateral agreement was part of the multilateral arrangements under GATT it was signed at the same time in Geneva.

3. There have been three other trade agreements with United States, from time to time in force. These agreements, dated 1935, 1938 and 1939, were all signed on this continent.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WHEAT AND MEAT PRODUCTS

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. What subsidies have been paid to millers on wheat milled in Canada each year since 1939?
2. How much did this subsidy amount to per bushel?
3. How much did the farmers receive per bushel on wheat consumed in Canada during the period since 1939?
4. How much wheat has Britain bought from Canada each year since 1939?
5. How much beef and other meat products has Britain bought from Canada each year since 1939?

Mr. Dickey: Return tabled.

TERMINAL ELEVATOR WEIGH-OVERS

Mr. Argue:

1. At what terminal elevators have weigh-overs been made during the past 12 months?
2. On what date were such weigh-overs made and what was the date of the previous weigh-over in each case?
3. What overages or shortages were shown for wheat, barley, oats, rye and flax as a result of the weigh-over at each terminal?
4. What disposal was made of the overages in each case?
5. At what terminals has no weigh-over taken place during the past 12 months?

Mr. Dickey: Return tabled.

CARROLL COAL COMMISSION

Mr. Hansell:

1. What was the total cost of the Carroll coal commission of 1946?
2. What recommendations contained in the commission's report have been put into effect, and to what extent?

GENERAL STORES—OPERATION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Cardiff:

1. Does the government operate any general stores in Canada?
2. If so, where are they located?
3. Do these stores sell at cost to customers?
4. If not, what is the rate of mark-up?
5. Do these stores extend credit or do a cash business?
6. If the government does not operate any general stores, are there any such stores located on government property?
7. If so, where are they located and under what arrangements do they operate?
8. Has the government received any complaints from businessmen or dealers in the localities where these stores operate?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all letters, communications, briefs or memoranda received by the Minister of Finance, or received by any other minister and referred to the Minister of Finance, dated at any time since January 1, 1952, from associations or organizations representing superannuated federal civil servants, or from any officers thereof, together with a copy of the replies of the Minister of Finance thereto.

Mr. Benidickson: Return tabled herewith to this motion.

JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES—CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. Gagnon:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged since January 1, 1948, between the international bible students, the watchtower and tract society, the Jehovah's witnesses and the national defence, justice and post office departments and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. member would consent to allowing this motion to stand today?

Mr. Gagnon: Agreed.

CUSTOMS ACT, SECTION 35—INTERPRETATION

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of a typical letter (or typical letters, if there are any significant variations in different letters written on the subject), dated since December 8, 1953, written by the Department of National Revenue, or any official, or division, or branch thereof, to any prospective importer, without necessarily giving the name of such prospective importer, with reference to the interpretation, implementation or enforcement of section 35 of the Customs Act, as amended by Bill 29 of this session.

LAST MOUNTAIN LAKE INDIAN RESERVE NO. 80A

Mr. Castleden:

For a copy of all correspondence, agreements, and other documents, since January 1, 1917, in connection with the surrender and subsequent disposal of the Last Mountain lake Indian reserve No. 80A.

Mr. Harris: I have spoken to the hon. member for Yorkton, Mr. Speaker, and I understand that what he would like to have on this motion is the original surrender, plus any correspondence there may be about it, as well as the list of those who have subsequently purchased some of the lands, the amount paid and the distribution of the moneys collected.

Mr. Castleden: That was the understanding.

Mr. Speaker: Am I to understand that the motion stands?

Mr. Harris: No, carried.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, subject to the statement made by the minister.

Motion agreed to.

MUNICIPAL GRANTS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to extend the benefits of the Municipal Grants Act and to provide for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CROWN CORPORATIONS

AMENDMENTS TO CERTAIN ACTS TO PRESCRIBE PENSION PROVISIONS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend certain acts relating to several crown corporations in order to prescribe the pension provisions and the manner in which such pension provisions are to apply to persons transferring from the public service to the corporations concerned.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RECOGNITION OF RED CHINA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I had intended to address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence I should like to direct the question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister make any comment to the house about the report appearing in today's press, and given wide circulation that the government, in addition to considering the recognition of communist China, is also considering supporting the application of the Mao Tse-tung regime for entry into the United Nations?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any justification whatsoever for the suggestion implied in the hon. member's question. I know of no consideration being given to either of these questions at this time.

GOLD

TRADING ON LONDON MARKET—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? In view of the resumption of trading in gold on the London market this morning, will the Canadian government initiate a similar market or, better still, a completely free market in Canada? If not, is the reason based on government policy or is the move proscribed by international agreement? Will Canadians holding sterling be allowed to buy gold on this market, and if so, will such gold be deemed to be "freely exportable gold" under the terms of the Bank of Canada Act, which is currently being amended?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I am obliged to my hon. friend for giving me notice of this question. I received it a short time before I came into the house. I shall try to give him an answer tomorrow.

DISABLED PERSONS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT IN WINNIPEG "FREE PRESS"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, has the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare been drawn to a report in the Winnipeg Free Press of Friday which suggests that the new pension for disabled persons will not come into effect until January 1, 1955? Is it not possible to bring in this legislation at an early date, so that it might come into effect as soon as possible?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that at long last the hon. member has evidenced some interest in this problem.

Mr. Coldwell: That is grossly unfair.

Mr. Martin: This is the first time he has shown—

Mr. Knowles: That is not correct. Let the minister answer the question.

Mr. Martin: I am dealing with his leader's interjection, and I think my statement will be found to be accurate. The hon. gentleman knows the government will not delay in introducing this measure as quickly as possible. We have to deal with all the provinces and the matter largely depends on them. The hon. gentleman may be assured that we will proceed with the matter with characteristic haste.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? How does the minister justify his statement that there will be no delay in view of the fact the proposed legislation was first announced to the house last November 12 and this is now March 22? Is that the characteristic speed of the Liberal party?

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

SUGGESTED REAPPOINTMENT OF ECONOMIC COMMITTEE ESTABLISHED IN 1945-46

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister or possibly the Minister of Finance? Has the government made any decision as a result of the suggestion put forward recently by the premier of Ontario, that the dominion-provincial economic committee established by the 1945-46 conference should be reappointed?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Speaking for myself, I have not been able as yet to give any consideration to that suggestion.

GRAIN

REPORTED LACK OF SPACE IN MONTREAL ELEVATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): Has the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce been drawn to this morning's Canadian Press dispatch stating that the grain movement will remain almost at a standstill because there will be no space in Montreal elevators? What steps will be taken to improve this situation?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The situation in the grain elevators at Montreal is normal. At the close of the shipping season all the elevator space is filled. It is not customary to draw grain from these elevators during the winter period. The economics of the situation require that grain moving to Halifax be moved from the Georgian bay area rather than from Montreal. There is the usual accumulation of orders for export grain which will be filled at the opening of navigation. I suggest there is no cause for undue apprehension about any situation in that area.

DUMPING

FRUITS AND VEGETABLES—PROTECTION OF MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): In replying, Mr. Speaker, to questions asked by the hon. members for Dufferin-Simcoe, York West and Kent (Ont.) on March 18, I referred to a seasonal tariff which is applied when our own produce comes on the market. This tariff takes the form of specific rates of duty to replace the ad valorem rate ordinarily applicable on fresh fruits and vegetables.

Under the provisions of section 13 of the Customs Tariff, the Minister of National Revenue is authorized to order the application of these specific rates on importations from countries other than those entitled to the benefits of the British preferential tariff and for periods not to exceed those specified in the tariff items covering the products involved.

In ordering the application of these specific rates of duty, I am guided by recommendations made by the growers, through their organizations, and approval of such recommendations by officials of the Department of Agriculture who, through their inspectors in the field, have access to information regarding crop conditions and the availability to the trade of the Canadian grown product.

In the case of celery and onions, n.o.p., the specific rate of duty provided for in the tariff is one cent per pound and the maximum periods during which this rate may be applied in any fiscal year are 24 weeks and 40 weeks, respectively. During the remainder of the year the rate of duty on both of these products is ten per cent ad valorem.

During the present fiscal year, the specific rate was applied on celery imported into Ontario and Quebec for two periods totalling the full 24 weeks, that is to say June 5 to July 16, and September 24 to January 27, inclusive. The specific rate was applied on onions imported into these provinces on June 23 and will be cancelled effective the 30th of this month, when the 40 weeks' period will expire.

There is no information before us which would indicate the dumping of United States celery or onions on the Canadian market. However, if such were the case, the ordinary provisions of the dumping clause of the tariff would apply.

PIPE LINES

WESTCOAST TRANSMISSION COMPANY—DECISION BY FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Has the government information relative to the date that a decision may be reached by the federal power commission of the United States on the application of the Westcoast Transmission Company to bring gas from northern British Columbia to the inland empire of the United States? If so, when is a decision expected?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member sent me notice of that question some time ago. When I inquired—Friday of last week—no decision had been handed down, and there was no information as to when it was likely to be handed down.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

EXTENSION OF CONTROL OF STRATEGIC MATERIALS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 374, respecting export and import of strategic and other goods.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE FUND

ESTABLISHMENT OF ACCOUNT FOR REPLACEMENT OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 377, to establish an account for the replacement of government property lost, destroyed or damaged through fire.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on different occasions during the present session questions have been asked of the government as to whether it was intended to continue the legislation now standing on the statute books under the name of the Emergency Powers Act. No answer has yet been given as to the intention of the government. Therefore it is appropriate, until we have information to the contrary, to assume that the government is contemplating the revival of legislation which has been discussed on a number of other occasions in the house. I submit it will be both helpful and appropriate if we consider the subject at this time, because if hon. members are prepared to indicate their opinion, that we should get back to government of the people, for the people, through their elected representatives in parliament, then subsequent time may be saved through the action of the government in acting in accordance with that expressed opinion.

There are added reasons why the attention of the house should be drawn to the need for considering the grounds upon which sweeping powers of this kind have been taken by the government, with the support of a majority in parliament, and it is appropriate that everyone consider the tendencies indicated by some statements made within the last few weeks.

I know there are many hon. members who do not show any great interest when we discuss this subject, one which may be regarded as academic, but which in fact is anything but academic in its effect upon our parliamentary system and upon the future of government in Canada. There are those of us who believe that the supremacy of parliament and the rule of law mean more to us at this time than perhaps ever before in our history, since these principles were firmly established some three hundred years ago. We believe they are of vital and fundamental importance, because the supremacy of parliament and the rule of law more than anything else distinguish our parliamentary system from that authoritarian system against which the free peoples of the world are joining their strength at this time.

There is one principle of supreme importance if we are going to have government of the people, for the people, through their elected representatives in parliament; and that is the right of members and of the public to know the essential facts upon which decisions affecting the general welfare of our people or the economy of our country are made.

There is another principle of supreme importance which is at the root of the rule of law. That is the right of all people affected by any law to know in advance what the law is. We cannot expect everyone will know what every law is, in this period when there are so many laws. The principle however is at the very root of our freedom—the principle that the people shall have the right to know the law and, in turn, shall have the right to have an impartial and open trial, if it is alleged that they have broken any law. I know full well, without being reminded by any hon. member opposite, that this subject has been discussed in other sessions; it has not previously been discussed in this parliament. That is the reason I am bringing it forward today, so that not only in relation to the Emergency Powers Act, but in relation to other emergency measures, an opportunity may be afforded to hon. members to indicate their opinion in regard to the authority of parliament and the rule of law.

If I repeat today things that have been said before, I do so only because it is necessary to repeat them through the failure of the government to act upon the arguments that have been presented to this house on earlier occasions. Added reason was given recently for considering very carefully what the attitude of the government is in regard to the rights of parliament and the people in connection with facts upon which public issues may be decided. I refer to a speech of the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) made on February 22 of this year. I intend to quote from that speech in view of the position under our constitution occupied by the Secretary of State. In quoting I am not relying merely upon newspaper reports but upon the text of the speech issued from his own office. Some of these statements bear careful examination in so far as they indicate the growing belief of this government that it governs by its own authority, very largely, subject only to the subsequent approval of its actions by a majority of the members of this house. I now quote from the text of the speech by the Secretary of State:

> It has frequently been stated that all documents in the possession of government departments deal with the public business, and that the public is entitled to know how its own business is conducted.
> This is a very plausible doctrine, and one that is, superficially, quite attractive to most Canadians who believe in the democratic principle of government by the people. What is more natural than to say that if the people really control the government, the people are entitled to know about everything that goes on.

The Secretary of State regards this as a plausible doctrine and one with a natural appeal; but then he goes on to dispose of any thought that the government accepts that plausible doctrine, and he deals further with a motion before parliament in regard to papers and documents in the possession of the government, and he has this to say:

> . . . this notion that parliament and the public are entitled to see every document in the possession of a government department is wrong, that it is contrary to the constitution; indeed it is subversive in the proper meaning of that word, by which I mean if it were accepted and applied it would upset the whole British concept of responsible parliamentary government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we see the Secretary of State, the custodian of government documents, telling us that this plausible doctrine is not only not acceptable, but subversive. Those who might conceivably think that it was subversive of the parliamentary system to withhold facts are told on the contrary that it would be subversive if the principle were accepted that essential facts must be available.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, if the hon. gentleman would not mind, would he use the word I used? I used the word "documents" not "facts".

Mr. Drew: This statement says quite clearly that it would be subversive if the essential facts were presented to the house which are contained in documents in the possession of the government and for which the Secretary of State is peculiarly responsible, in view of the statutory position he holds.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman read the phrase where it says "essential facts".

Mr. Drew: I read it; it is correct. What I have read is the correct statement from the speech.

Mr. Pickersgill: Read it, sir.

Mr. Drew: I have read it, Mr. Speaker. Hansard reports excellently and I am sure they have it correct. I shall go on with another quotation:

> I suppose there is always some tendency for parliamentary oppositions to try to give the impression that under our system parliament is the government.

That is the end of the quotation, in case the Secretary of State gets in any way disturbed by any subsequent statement. Apparently in the mind of the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker, there is the really very subversive thought that some of us might believe that government of the people for the people through their elected representatives should be a reality. Not at all; the government must be the sole authority, the sole custodian and the sole deciding body in this case, subject of course to the subsequent approval or otherwise, and, Mr. Speaker, there is a surprising consistency in the measure of approval given by the acknowledged majority of the supporters of this government.

Then I go on with a further quotation from the statement of the Secretary of State:

> Parliament is not the government and the government is not even a committee of the whole of parliament, though there is a certain sense in which the government can be regarded as a committee of its own supporters in parliament.
> But I think it is much better to use the old-fashioned description of the relationship between government and parliament which was invented right here in Canada, and that is that the government is responsible to parliament.

Yes, in our belief the government is responsible to parliament, and we believe that parliament has the right to examine the manner in which the government is acting upon the basis of facts available to parliament, available to the elected representatives of the people who sit here in the House of Commons.

I quote again from this very interesting speech:

> And once that decision is made, it is the duty of those who were entrusted by the voters with the responsibility for government to carry on the government; and they should not share that responsibility with those who were not entrusted by the electors with the responsibility.

That is the end of the quotation, but it should have been the end of the speech. It should have been the end of any idea of this kind:

. . . they should not share that responsibility with those who were not entrusted by the electors with the responsibility.

There is a clear declaration of belief in the one party state.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: There is a clear declaration of belief in the idea that this is not a chamber where responsibility is jointly accepted throughout the whole house. Oh, I see some hon. members grimacing and shrugging their shoulders in surprise that this proposition should even be put forward.

This proposition is at the very root of our system. The government has the responsibility for initiating and presenting legislation to this house; and everyone in this house, under the basic principles of our parliamentary system, shares responsibility for what follows. May I add, Mr. Speaker, that those supporting the government are intended to inform themselves so that they may share that responsibility with some knowledge of the facts, as members of the opposition—or certainly some of them—seek to inform themselves.

Mr. Habel: Why do you not inform yourself first?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to pay any attention to all the remarks I hear, but I intend to pay attention to the remark I just heard because it is illustrative of the attitude of those on the other side of the house. "Why do you not inform yourself first?" was the question that was just shouted to me from a point in the house where apparently the loud speakers do not work so well.

Mr. Habel: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I think I should tell the house that I was misinformed many times by the Leader of the Opposition while I was in the house in Ontario and I would not follow him for all the money in the world.

Mr. Speaker: I think that hon. members should not rise on questions of privilege which, of course, are not questions of privilege. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) now has the floor and should be allowed to make his remarks without interruption. If he is misquoting anyone or if he is making statements which, in the opinion of certain members, are not in accordance with the facts, and if they are directly concerned with them, when the Leader of the Opposition is through they can rise and make the necessary corrections. But they should not do so in such a way as to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of asking, as I am sure I have the right to do, for the withdrawal of the remarks that were just made. I am placing before the house an argument and the interjection which was just made is one that should be withdrawn if that request were made. But after all, I shall not make the request for withdrawal unless I think that the hon. member who has made the interjection is of sufficient importance in this house for me to make such a request.

Mr. Habel: Big man.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I quite agree that this is not the first time I have heard the hon. member, and I know exactly the value to attach to his remarks now or on any other occasion.

Mr. Speaker, I referred to the statement made by the hon. member because it so aptly illustrated exactly the point I am seeking to make. He said "Why do you not inform yourself?". Mr. Speaker, that is what the opposition has been trying to do in many ways. I am pointing out that, in a speech made outside of the House of Commons but nevertheless one which expresses his opinion, the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) has clearly put before the people of this country his attitude toward parliament and the amount of information that should be available to members of parliament.

Mr. Speaker, this subject is one which does not arise here in Canada alone, and it is one for which this government alone need not accept responsibility. There has been a general tendency to move away from long-established principles of the supremacy of parliament and the rule of law, as a result of the effect of two world wars upon the administration of governments and parliaments similar to our own. This problem has been discussed in other parliaments similar to ours. This subject has been examined by great jurists as well as by members of this and other parliaments, and it has been examined by those with long experience in constitutional law. Mr. Speaker, the time has come—indeed it is long overdue—for the members of this house to assert a basic proposition which will change the trend and will start the members of parliament here in Canada seeking some way, consistent with our increasingly complex society and economic system, that will nevertheless make it possible for parliament to have the essential facts in a way which will permit informed judgment by the members of parliament as well as by the people themselves with regard to subjects that are of public concern.

For that reason I hope that hon. members will not take to themselves the remarks that are made. In referring to any remarks that have already been made this afternoon, may I suggest to other members that they realize that this is a subject which is attracting great attention in every parliament within the commonwealth and that those in parliament and outside of it who have been studying this subject are seeking ways and means by which our complex economy and society may be efficiently informed while at the same time preserving those fundamental democratic principles of the supremacy of parliament and the rule of law.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, this subject has been discussed before. It was discussed in this house by the former minister of justice and I should like to read words spoken by him in this house on November 12, 1945, because they indicate a steady trend by this same government. They indicate that this is no suddenly developed attitude which we find expressed in the words of the Secretary of State. These are the words of the then minister of justice, the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, as reported at page 2020 of Hansard of November 12, 1945:

> I should like to quote what the leader of the opposition said in this house on October 31, 1945, at page 1681 of Hansard:
> ". . . this House of Commons has the full and inalienable right to a disclosure of all actions of the executive. It has the right and the duty to review and pass upon all such actions. Except in some minor matters where the king's prerogative has not been abridged, the executive or cabinet acts properly only under authority delegated by this parliament. Thus, in order that we may be aware of the actions of the executive, I have placed this motion on the order paper."
> Later in the same statement the hon. gentleman said this:
> "I am determined to ensure, in so far as lies within my power, that Canada is governed by this House of Commons . . ."

Then the minister of justice had this to say about the words of the leader of the opposition at that time, to which he had referred and which he had quoted:

> That statement is not historically or constitutionally correct. The house has not an inalienable right to the disclosure of all actions of the executive. Ministers may refuse to disclose matters if refusal to disclose is in the public interest and is so stated by the ministers.
> Authority has been cited in support of that proposition. The house must accept the decision of a minister or withdraw confidence from the government, which it can do at any time. The authority of the government is not delegated by the House of Commons; the authority of the government is received from the crown. The membership of the government is not limited to members of the house. The true relationship of the House of Commons and the cabinet is a relationship of confidence. The essence of confidence is trust, not minute and detailed supervision of every act and every motive. Government cannot be carried on efficiently if every detail is subject to constant scrutiny.

There, Mr. Speaker, was a statement by the minister of justice at that time which did cause considerable surprise, as will be remembered by those who were interested in public affairs at that time, and who remember the comments which were made in the press and elsewhere about this. It is not easy to understand now how that statement was made without more serious challenge than was offered at that time. I want to read these words because I want to be sure they are correctly on record. I quote:

> . . . the first step towards permanent recovery or reform in Canada must be the decisive repudiation by the Canadian electorate of the tendencies towards dictatorship manifested during the last five years, and an equally decisive repudiation of measures, by whatever party they may be advocated, which tend in the direction of Hitlerism, fascism or communism.

These words, Mr. Speaker, are clear. These words set forth in very definite and emphatic terms the attitude of those who do not believe that it is enough for the government to decide, and then at some subsequent time come back to the House of Commons and say, "Will you trust me? We have done this. The action has been taken and will you now vote in favour of what has been done?" These words, as I know members of the government are perfectly well aware, are the words of the man with whom the Secretary of State was so closely associated. I cannot help wondering at what point his thinking departed from the attitude of the man who spoke these words, because these strong words were the words of the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King dealing with the suggestion that the government had the right to withhold from parliament the facts upon which decisions should be made to resort to emergency measures. I would also like to quote something else said by the then prime minister at that time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. gentleman would permit a question? Would he give the date, place and circumstance in which these words were uttered, because their relevance to the situation is rather important?

Mr. Drew: Yes, of course. The relevance was very important. Mr. King, at that time, was leader of the opposition and he was expressing his views in regard to legislation which was only a pale shadow of the kind of legislation that this government has put on the statute books.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was in what year?

Mr. Drew: 1935.

Mr. Pickersgill: In relation to what, sir?

Mr. Drew: In relation to parliament and the rights of parliament.

Mr. Pickersgill: But in relation to what particular measure?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I shall give the references. I am placing various statements on record. The statement I have just referred to was a statement by a man who was later prime minister of Canada, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, who, during a period of opposition, supported certain principles in regard to the rights of parliament and supported them in words which will bear rereading by members of the Liberal party in this house today.

Mr. St. Laurent: Perhaps the hon. member, in order to make the rereading easier, would not mind giving the references. I suppose these remarks can be found in Hansard. Perhaps the hon. member would give the exact reference.

Mr. Drew: Certainly. But I am going to carry that statement further:

. . . there has been a further tendency of the gradual shifting over to irresponsible commissions, boards and delegates . . . of a great deal of the business that should be carried on by the government itself . . . The country is being committed, directly and indirectly, to policies of which it has no knowledge, by persons who in no way owe responsibility to the people through their representatives in this house.

That last statement will be found in Hansard of March 1, 1920. The other one may be found in Hansard of 1935. I will give the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the page number when I sit down.

Then on another occasion, to show the consistency of the views of the man who has put forward such a definite statement on this subject in years gone by, I would like to quote from another of the speeches by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King:

The business of the country should be carried on in the open on the floor of this parliament in such a manner that the government will be obliged to take into their confidence not only members of parliament but the people of the country whose money they are voting to expend.

That statement may be found at page 4540 of Hansard dated June 30, 1920.

This is another quotation I would like to place on record:

It is impossible to imagine that the people of Canada will consent to pay the enormous sums which they are being called upon to provide by way of taxation, . . . or that they will sit silent under the government's refusal to give them any information as to how their money has been spent.

That statement will be found at pages 1292-93 of Hansard dated March 29, 1921.

And then, to bring us up to later years, I would also like to quote from another speech by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King which will be found in Hansard of January 29, 1934:

The government has proceeded, in practically everything it has done, as if it were an executive wholly independent of the House of Commons rather than an executive which derives its powers from and is responsible to the House of Commons.

Compare that statement, Mr. Speaker, with the statement made by Mr. J. L. Ilsley. Here is a proposition that is consistent with the long tradition of parliament, stated by a man who has generally been accorded respect for his knowledge of parliament by members of the Liberal party. I would like to repeat these words because they are words which emphasize how far this government has departed from the proposition it has put forward itself on many occasions. I repeat these words:

The government has proceeded, in practically everything it has done, as if it were an executive wholly independent of the House of Commons rather than an executive which derives its powers from and is responsible to the House of Commons.

Then, on January 21, 1935, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King had this to say, as found at page 32 of Hansard:

The whole spirit of the British system of government is that government is carried on, not by arbitrary powers secured by a mechanical majority, but by the consent of the governed as known . . .

You will notice in that quotation that the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King used a term which perhaps overcame some of the objection that has been registered with relation to other words used to describe a majority which votes with fascinating regularity in one particular way. He spoke of a mechanical majority. There is no record of objection having been taken to that word at that time by anyone in the house. I should like to quote further words of the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King from the same speech. He said:

I have said that one of the supreme efforts of this administration—

That of course was not a Liberal administration because it was not a Liberal administration at that time.

—has been stealthily to alienate the authority and control of parliament, to take power into its own hands and away from parliament with respect to many important affairs of the nation.

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Drew: Certainly.

Mr. Garson: Does my hon. friend agree that the words he has been quoting were fitting words for the right hon. gentleman to have applied?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the type of comment that I have come to expect from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). I was quoting the words of a man who has been recognized and acclaimed on other occasions by the minister who has just interrupted me as an authority on parliamentary procedure. I have pointed out on other occasions that, no matter what disagreement there may have been with regard to the many details of the things that were done, I did believe that the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King understood the principles of parliament, and it would be a very good thing for the present Minister of Justice to remember them when the time comes for him to draft any further legislation bearing on subjects of this kind.

Mr. Abbott: Now try answering the question.

Mr. Drew: I was just about to point out, when I was interrupted by the Minister of Justice, that the quotations I have placed on record are quotations which indicate that this is not a subject with regard to which members of only one party have been expressing concern. This is a subject about which members of all parties in this house and members of the different parties in the House of Commons at Westminster, in Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and elsewhere throughout the commonwealth, have been expressing great concern in recent years.

I wish it were possible to examine this question as one of common concern. I wish it were possible to examine it with the idea that we might now start back toward some system that would have full regard for the vast and infinite variety of detailed subjects that must be dealt with but would at the same time make it possible to give hon. members of this house, as the representatives of the people, an opportunity to obtain essential information which would qualify them to pass judgment with knowledge of the facts. That, after all, was what the Right Hon. Mackenzie King was emphasizing. He wanted the facts to be known. He wanted the important details put before the house. He recognized that every single piece of information could not be brought before the house but he did want the business of the country carried on in parliament and not behind closed doors. That is the view we have been expressing. That is the hope with which we place this subject once again before members of the house.

I referred to the speech made outside the house by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill). An interpretation of his opinions certainly shows that he has gone several steps beyond the position taken by the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley and that the position he takes is one which would never have been tolerated in silence by the man who was prime minister of Canada for so long and with whom he was closely associated. We have asked for assurance that under these changed conditions the government would reverse its course. A clear indication of that would be a statement by the government that it definitely will not seek the support of the majority in the house to continue the Emergency Powers Act on the statute books of Canada.

A consideration of this legislation is appropriate at this time in so far as the intent behind the introduction of such an act may be examined. Now is the time to avoid unnecessary subsequent debate with regard to either this or any other emergency legislation. That can be done if hon. members will only make it clear that they wish no continuance of emergency legislation of that kind in a period when we are as close to normal conditions as any of us are likely to be for many long years to come.

Last year the Emergency Powers Act was renewed. It is still on the statute books and unless renewed again will expire on May 31 of this year. The terms of that act involve an attitude consistent with the view expressed by the Secretary of State, consistent with the view expressed some years ago by the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, but not consistent with the view expressed by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King and not consistent with the view expressed by many people of different parties who today are seeking some new method to give real parliamentary responsibility to the members elected by the people and to restore the rule of law instead of the rule of dictate such as we have at this time.

It is not enough to say that no harm has been done. Great harm was done last year to the principles of parliament by something that was done under that act. Without reviewing the orders in council passed in 1951 and 1952, as well as in 1953, under the Emergency Powers Act, may I say that the most outrageous example of abuse of emergency powers occurred on Monday, April 20, last year. What happened then should be in the minds of the members of this house when we consider today the attitude of the government towards the extension of any emergency measures which give to the government the power to legislate behind closed doors.

Those who were sitting in this house at that time will recall that the house met at eleven o'clock on the morning of April 20 last year. It was dealing with amendments to the shipping act, and that was the place where anything affecting shipping, and the rights of ship owners or others, could have been discussed, with knowledge of what was being done, by members of this parliament. It was very significant that while that act was under discussion that morning the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), under whose department the administration of acts of this kind must come, absented himself from the House of Commons during that discussion. In his absence the amendments were approved, and in due course the bill was given third reading in order that it could be passed on for consideration in the other place.

After the house had spent only a few minutes in the transaction of some other business, to the very great surprise of hon. members in this house, the Minister of Transport made his appearance in the house just before the one o'clock adjournment. He proceeded to ask for consent to revert to motions, and permission was given by unanimous consent. He thereupon tabled two copies, in English and in French, of order in council P.C. 1953-604, passed three days before that, on Friday, April 17, under the provisions of the Emergency Powers Act. This order in council, which had been passed three days before and had the effect of law, was of very great interest to many ship owners in this country and was presented here in that way. Earlier the same morning we had been discussing an act to which these changes could very properly have been amendments.

There was no reason whatever for the provisions of that order in council, because they could have been enacted as part of the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act. I just heard an interjection to the effect that is not so. It is so, Mr. Speaker. It is true we were told three days later that this was part of a general agreement of some kind, but there was no general agreement. I hope the time will never come when there will be general agreement that this government has the right to enter into any understanding with any other government which will deny to this parliament information to which it is entitled. It most certainly could have been made an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act, or failing that it could have been a separate piece of legislation introduced by the minister who had been piloting the Canada Shipping Act through the house. Members who were sitting here could have passed upon those amendments in the ordinary way. Instead of that, an order in council was passed behind closed doors, given the effect of law, and in that way many people had their position substantially affected without the members of parliament having an opportunity to deal with the subject.

Let us go back to the time when this act was before the house on February 20, 1951. At that time the Emergency Powers Act was being considered, and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was explaining why this act was being presented. I quote what he said on that occasion from page 497 of Hansard for that date:

> The question may be asked, what is the nature of the emergency we are facing? In the opinion of the government, it is as defined in the following language in the speech from the throne:
> "The increased menace in the Far East reinforces the mounting evidence that communist imperialism is determined to dominate the world by force or the fear of force, and that the only hope of maintaining peace with freedom lies in the rapid increase of the combined strength of the free nations."

That was the reason we were given in 1951, Mr. Speaker. No one suggests today that we have passed the time when we need to be careful to maintain our strength against the threat of communist aggression. However, we have passed from the immediate emergency state which arose following the attack in Korea, and have entered a stage of long-term duration when we hope that, as a result of the mounting strength of the partnership of free nations, peace may in fact be preserved. There is a very real hope that the full horror of the kind of war that would result from the use of the new weapons which have been accumulated to meet the possibility of that threat may in themselves offer a hope of peace in the years ahead.

If it should happen, this will not be the first time in history, by any manner of means, that great military powers available for military action have, in fact, assured peace over a long term of years. I believe that the hope of every one of us here is that the money that is being spent for defence today will have that effect. Nevertheless, we have been told by the government here, we have been told by statesmen associated with us in this common effort, that this is going to be a long period of sustained effort. If we are to have peace, it will only be the result of carrying on for a long time under conditions which require from us very definite military preparations, and which also offer hope to us of peace through the might of the defence that is being built up.

This is a subject, Mr. Speaker, in which all have a common interest. I did not quote for the record here today the words of a former prime minister merely for the purpose of seeking to embarrass any minister of the present government or to establish the inconsistency of views that have been expressed. I did so to demonstrate to this house how far we have strayed from the position that was commonly accepted by most members of this house.

When I am asked whether I agree with words that were spoken at that time, may I say that it is most interesting to have anyone offer the suggestion today that the very limited powers in the hands of the government in the early part of 1935 bore even the slightest similarity to the immense emergency powers held by this government today. And yet, in relation even to those very limited powers, we found the then leader of the Liberal party using these strong terms:

> The first step towards permanent recovery or reform in Canada must be the decisive repudiation by the Canadian electorate of the tendencies towards dictatorship manifested during the last five years, and an equally decisive repudiation of measures, by whatever party they may be advocated which tend in the direction of Hitlerism, fascism or communism.

Mr. Speaker, there were those who laughed at Mr. King when he spoke those words.

An hon. Member: Oh no.

Mr. Drew: Oh yes, there were. When an hon. member says, "Oh no", I say there were people who laughed at Mr. King at that time. And there are people who laugh today at the suggestion that there is any danger in a trend of this kind.

No, I am not going to suggest for one moment that the words of Mr. King as to the possibility of Hitlerism, fascism, or communism are appropriate. And I do not think those words were appropriate then. But I do think the statement he was making in regard to the principles of parliament—in spite of the giggling of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) at the moment—I think those were important principles.

Mr. Garson: On a point of privilege. My hon. friend, during the course of his remarks, is frequently in the habit of attributing giggling or the making of remarks to members of the government. When statements of this kind are not correct—and this is one of them, because I was not giggling; I forbore while listening to my hon. friend—some answer should be made.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on my responsibility as a member of the house I say the Minister of Justice was laughing and was giving every appearance of his customary giggling during remarks of which he does not approve.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I believe the rules of the house require my hon. friend, as a member, to accept the word of another member as to what he was doing. And I say to my hon. friend, when he makes the suggestion that I was giggling, that he is making a statement which has not an atom of truth in it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I can only express my great regret at the pain which produced the grimace on the face of the Minister of Justice at that moment.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this is an opportunity for members in the house to express an opinion in regard to this subject, without testing the position of the government in relation to any legislation before the house. It is an opportunity for members to make their comments respecting emergency legislation of this kind. It is an opportunity for members in the house to give to the government a clear indication that the trend should be back toward greater responsibility on the part of parliament, and that there should also be a greater recognition of the principle of the rule of law.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, so that this subject may be dealt with by hon. members, through the opportunity provided in this instance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green):

> That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted, and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house desires to record its opinion that the powers granted to the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act are repugnant to responsible parliamentary government."

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I was just about to say that I think we have listened to a speech this afternoon which does serve a useful purpose, because it brings before us a problem of government and parliament.

Last year we opposed the legislation now under discussion on the ground that the government had not used it as we anticipated it would have been used. The Emergency Powers Act was first placed on the statute books in 1951. In that year we understood that the legislation would be used in the interests of the Canadian people to prevent further inflation, to protect the people from the rising costs of living, and the like. This was not done. Consequently, when the measure came before the house last year we opposed it on those grounds.

I can see some circumstances under which legislation of this description is necessary; but I do not believe that that necessity exists at the present time. I do not know—because one does not have the research facilities one would like to have—how many times this legislation has been used since last May, when the house approved its extension. I doubt very much whether it has been used to any extent. And if it has not, then that is the first argument why it should not be extended or continued at the present time.

What the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has said about the supremacy of parliament and the rule of law is certainly something of which we should take heed, wherever we may sit in the House of Commons. May I say particularly at this time that at least one public man in this country, in the person of the premier of Quebec, is challenging the supremacy of parliament; and, indeed, if reports can be believed, is challenging the rule of law, when he says that a federal act passed in relation to deduction of income tax for federal purposes will not be fulfilled by the government of the province of Quebec.

I say that every member in the house, no matter where he sits, should regard himself as a guardian of the supremacy of parliament and a defender of the rule of law, no matter whom it may affect, whether it be an individual, a corporation or a government.

As I listened to the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon, that was the thought that flashed into my mind. At the beginning of his speech he said that the supremacy of this parliament and the rule of law are of fundamental importance to this country, and, indeed, at this time, to the world. I would like to remark that we should keep that constantly in mind as we discuss measures of this description, and other problems, that face the country today.

We shall support the motion at this time because we believe that, since the Emergency Powers Act has not been used in the manner in which it should have been used, and perhaps has scarcely been used at all, its continuance is not consistent with responsible parliamentary government. I am one who believes in parliamentary institutions and the parliamentary system. I believe as a matter of fact that for the self-government of man—and I use that in the sense of including both men and women—no better plan has yet been devised by man. And I want to see the supremacy of parliament and the rule of law properly maintained. But I think the government will have to make a case for the retention of this legislation. I am not going to say very much today, but I will say, as we did last year, that we shall indicate our opposition to any proposed extension by voting for the amendment that has been introduced by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon.

During the war years perhaps this parliament did grant to the government many prerogatives and rights which ordinarily should have been exercised by this house. We were forced to do so under those circumstances. I suppose there will be times during peace and in war when governments of all stripes will ask for powers that go beyond what is normally granted in a legislative body of this description. I say, under certain emergencies powers of this sort must be granted, but I do not believe that the situation exists at this time which warrants this parliament, under the circumstances, considering, if the proposal is made—it has not been made yet—extension of the powers that we gave to the government several years ago, and the more limited powers which we extended last May.

I do not wish to speak at any further length, but merely to express the point of view that I have just expressed and to say that I hope that every hon. member, wherever he sits, will heed the plea of the Leader of the Opposition for the maintenance of the supremacy of this parliament and of the rule of law throughout the whole of this country.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it would seem unfortunate that such an important question as has been injected into parliament this afternoon should not have been known a bit in advance, because some of us would like to have made better preparation in detail so as to be able to cite specific cases to the point, and make of this debate what it really should be.

I look upon this matter as of the utmost importance, and it is because I do look at it as of the utmost importance that I said what I did, namely, it is too bad we did not have some indication that it might be raised this afternoon. However, the Leader of the Opposition has raised it, and I for one would not like to see the occasion pass without registering briefly views which I have with respect to the very important principles of the rule of law and the supremacy of parliament, which are the subjects of discussion.

For a good many years thinking men and women all over the world have been concerned about insidious attacks that have been made on these two important principles of democracy, the supremacy of parliament and the rule of law. No less a person than Lord Hewart of Bury, a member of the House of Lords, began away back in 1927 to register his fears through various publications. He wrote a book known as "The New Despotism" and he brought it up to date in 1949, when the second edition was published. I should like to indicate just briefly from Lord Hewart's book one or two of the important views which he held, and by doing so I hope to be able to show hon. members that as far back as 1927 Lord Hewart of Bury saw what was happening in parliament. He observed this gradual but steady decline in the rule of law and in the supremacy of parliament and the gradual increase in the use of executive order by order in council to govern the country, and to do it without the knowledge of the representatives of the people.

I am not going to quote at any length, Mr. Speaker, but I do want to use just a few of the statements made by Lord Hewart of Bury to illustrate the importance of this matter. He said:

> A little inquiry will serve to show that there is now, and for some years past has been, a persistent influence at work which, whatever the motives or the intentions that support it may be thought to be, undoubtedly has the effect of placing a large and increasing field of departmental authority and activity beyond the reach of the ordinary law.

This has been done very largely through two methods, as far as I can understand: First, through the manner in which our various acts of parliament or laws are drafted by draftsmen who put into them certain clauses making it possible for the minister or the government, the executive council, to make regulations and even to go so far as to change the nature of the law and its provisions by regulations. That has been known. It has been done right here in this parliament over the years, and the process has gone on almost unimpeded for a number of years.

Lord Hewart went further and said this:

> The citizens of a state may indeed believe or boast that, at a given moment, they enjoy, or at any rate possess, a system of representative institutions, and that the ordinary law of the land, interpreted and administered by the regular courts, is comprehensive enough and strong enough for all its proper purposes. But their belief will stand in need of revision if, in truth and in fact, an organized and diligent minority, equipped with convenient drafts, and employing after a fashion part of the machinery of representative institutions, is steadily increasing the range and the power of departmental authority and withdrawing its operations more and more from the jurisdiction of the courts.

In my experience in parliament we have never had a wide-open debate on this important matter. It would be very much in the interest of the country to have such a debate, where we could be better prepared for it, although the subject has been introduced here this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition and it will serve a real purpose in alerting our people, not only in this house but across the country, to what is going on. Yet the full value cannot possibly be realized unless we are more thoroughly prepared for it than we are this afternoon. Lord Hewart pointed out in his thesis that to the average lawmaker, the average proponent of democracy, the continental system of administrative law was repugnant. I believe that is right; it is to me, although I must admit right out, Mr. Speaker, that the continental system of administrative law is at least a system, and it does provide for courts and law and hearings and adjudications and all that sort of thing, with which it attempts to preserve for the people their rights and liberties. Then, Lord Hewart went on to point out that although the continental system of administrative law is repugnant to the average proponent of democracy, yet it has some superiority over the kind of rule of law into which we have declined in these days.

Mr. Fulton: The rule of lawlessness.

Mr. Low: Yes, the rule of lawlessness; it might be wise to say that, as the hon. member for Kamloops remarks. This insidious process —and I call it insidious because anything that saps the strength of the parliamentary institutions is insidious—has been going on for enough years so that the people of the country should be aware; but I say to you that the people of the country can hardly be aware of the process and its insidious nature unless they can get the facts. There is only one way in which they can get the facts and that is if the government of the day, which is supposed to be a democratic government in this country, will make those facts available to the members of parliament, the press and to the public generally. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that that procedure has not been considered by the Liberal government, as long as I have been in the House of Commons, to be a responsibility of theirs. In fact, there have been times when the members of the opposition have sought for information and have been denied it. Why, I have never yet been able to learn.

Mr. Martin: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Martin: I know very well the book to which my hon. friend refers, and I am sure that in that book there is nothing that deals with this particular aspect of the problem. Lord Hewart was referring to excessive administrative powers given to administrative tribunals, where there was no right of supervision by the courts, and so on.

I am sure that on that particular issue he did not express himself as my hon. friend implies he did.

Mr. Low: Oh, yes. I am sure the minister has not read the book recently or he would not say that.

Mr. Martin: Oh, yes; I have.

Mr. Low: The fact is that Lord Hewart dealt with the same thing we are dealing with here today. He definitely deplores the way in which parliaments have been denied their responsibility. I will see that the minister gets the book when I am finished so that he can read up on it.

Mr. Martin: I shall be grateful if my hon. friend will show us right now where Lord Hewart says that the kind of thing complained about by the Leader of the Opposition today is contrary to the well-known practice in the United Kingdom parliament, let alone in the other commonwealth parliaments.

Mr. Low: All right, Mr. Speaker. I do not mind doing so. If the minister will tolerate a few more quotations, I think I can give it to him. I am having to pick these quotations more or less at random as I have not had time to prepare for this debate as I should like to have done. At page 16 of his book he simply says:

> It is not merely that in this instance parliament is being out-manoeuvred, or that in that instance the courts have been defied. It is that the whole scheme of self-government is being undermined, and that, too, in a way which no self-respecting people, if they were aware of the facts, would for a moment tolerate.

Mr. Martin: Yes. He was talking about administrative tribunals and royal commissions.

Mr. Low: No. He was talking about exactly the same thing we are talking about, namely the rule of law and the supremacy of parliament, just exactly the same things that were introduced in the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). Lord Hewart goes on to say:

> Much toil, and not a little blood, have been spent in bringing slowly into being a polity wherein the people make their laws and independent judges administer them. If that edifice is to be overthrown, let the overthrow be accomplished openly. Never let it be said that liberty and justice, having with difficulty been won, were suffered to be abstracted or impaired in a fit of absence of mind.
> The paradox which is in course of being accomplished is, indeed, rather elaborate. Writers on the constitution have for a long time taught that its two leading features are the sovereignty of parliament and the rule of law. To tamper with either of them was, it might be thought, a sufficiently serious undertaking. But how far more attractive to the ingenious and adventurous mind to employ the one to defeat the other, and to establish a despotism on the ruins of both!

What else could he be talking about but the rule of law and the supremacy of parliament? That is quite plain to be seen.

Mr. Martin: Yes. That is what he is talking about.

Mr. Low: Speaking of some kings of old, he goes on to say this:

> In those days the method was to defy parliament—and it failed. In these days the method is to cajole, to coerce and to use parliament—and it is strangely successful.

To use parliament. What for? To set up, Mr. Speaker, a despotism or a narrow type of oligarchy for the purpose of governing a country which is supposed to be democratic. Then Lord Hewart goes on and gives a lot more things which I do not believe I need to quote. I am going to help my friend the minister by giving him some of the recommendations which Lord Hewart made and which I think he will see apply to the very case in point. At page 147, in a chapter entitled "What is to be done?" he says:

> If it be asked where the remedy is to be found for the mischief which is here deplored, the answer is not difficult. Is it too much to hope, in the first place, that the worst of the offending sections in acts of parliament—

I direct attention to the words "acts of parliament".

> —may be repealed or amended? And, in the second place, is it not comparatively easy to prevent similar sections from being enacted in future? To this end what is necessary is simply a particular state of public opinion, and in order that that state of public opinion may be brought into existence what is necessary is simply a knowledge of the facts. At present, it is tolerably safe to suppose, only a small part of the electorate knows what has been and is being done, while it is a still smaller part that has any real appreciation of the meaning and effect of the statutory provisions which offer at once the occasion and the instrument of despotic power. Two methods at least may be adopted, easily and immediately, by those who desire to discourage the new despotism. One is to form in each house of parliament a committee,—

And I put this forward as a suggestion to the Liberal side of the house particularly because they are the ones that can do something about it.

> —not too large, whose sole task it should be to examine every bill, as it is introduced, for the purpose of observing whether and in what respects its provisions may have the effect of increasing the power of bureaucracy, and whether and by what contrivance that power is to be made irresponsible.

If that is not a suggestion along the line that my hon. friend—

Mr. Prudham: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Prudham: I have here a quotation from the Edmonton Bulletin of November 16, 1950. I will read the quotation—

Mr. Low: Is the minister asking a question or making a speech?

Mr. Prudham: I should like to know whether the hon. member subscribes to what is stated in this quotation which reads as follows:

> The argument that a strong opposition improves a government is incorrect.
> If you want a man to do a job you don't hinder him. Political opposition is often a hindrance.—Premier E. C. Manning.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, I have not the slightest idea what the minister thinks that has to do with the present case.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Low: Not the slightest.

Mr. Pickersgill: Do you agree with it?

Mr. Low: As a matter of fact, I do not know what he was quoting from. I do not even know that the words were authentic. I do not know anything about the case, but I will say this—

Mr. Knowles: It shows what this government would like.

Mr. Low: Yes; it certainly does. It indicates all too well where the minister's mind is. But let me say this. I do not subscribe to that idea at all. I subscribe to the supremacy of parliament and the rule of law. I think that a strong opposition is important to any government.

Mr. Hansell: And so does Mr. Manning.

Mr. Low: So does Mr. Manning, I am quite certain.

Mr. Hansell: He has said so many times.

Mr. Low: The situation is simply this. The government has not brought forward the Emergency Powers Act for discussion today; not at all. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) injected this discussion into the proceedings of the house today.

I just wanted to make those observations because I want to use them to support the stand we have always taken in connection with these emergency powers. Let me make it abundantly clear once more. I recognize the fact that there are times when the government needs unusual powers. When the need is clearly expressed, when that need has been demonstrated, when the government comes to this parliament and asks for those powers, and when I am convinced that they need them to meet a situation which exists, I will not withhold my consent for whatever it is worth in this house. That is the position we have taken in years gone by and that is the position we take today. On the other hand, when the government year after year asks for an extension of the Emergency Powers Act and then does not use the powers that are given, thereby demonstrating that there has never been any real need for them, I for one do not intend to agree at any time to the extension of those powers unless once more it has been demonstrated, by logical argument, that the government needs them.

I do not know what the government is going to do about these emergency powers this year, but I do want to submit my view that we should have in this house a watchdog committee of the type suggested by Lord Hewart, which committee could make a very careful scrutiny of all legislation in order to see that bills are properly framed and do not contain the kind of clauses which will curtail or filch from parliament its right to control the government of the country, which is a responsibility placed upon parliament under a system of parliamentary government.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not rising to speak in reply to the motion made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). I am not competent to do so, because the question is one of government policy which, as the Leader of the Opposition, and every other hon. member of this house, is well aware, has not yet been determined. The hon. gentleman was told this only last week by the right hon. gentleman who was then acting prime minister. I imagine those of us who believe it is important to maintain parliamentary traditions wonder in passing whether this attempt to anticipate a debate which might come before the house later on is altogether in accord with the usual parliamentary traditions. I do not think it is, though I do not believe it is out of order. But I shall not argue that point.

The only reason I am taking up any of the time of the house, Mr. Speaker, is that my name has been mentioned and the remarks I made in a rather modest after-dinner speech made in another place seem to have caught the eye of the Leader of the Opposition. I confess I am rather flattered that he should have read that speech. I am even more flattered that he should have considered it sufficiently important to be made the excuse or the occasion for a debate, because I stated in that speech—though the hon. gentleman did not see fit to read it—something to the effect that all politicians live on advertising and on having their names before the public. I recognize this and I give my thanks to the Leader of the Opposition for bringing my name thus briefly before the house. But I am afraid my agreement with the Leader of the Opposition ends just there.

Mr. Drew: Well, sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I am now going on to disagree with the Leader of the Opposition, which I believe is the proper function of an hon. member in debate.

I suppose there are some hon. members opposite of the mechanical minority—if I may use the word of Mr. Mackenzie King of which I was reminded by the hon. gentleman—who think that anyone who speaks in this house should not disagree with the Leader of the Opposition. Well, I do not agree with the Leader of the Opposition. I do not agree with the fundamental statement he made. He quoted from a speech made by Mr. Ilsley some years ago in this house, and also from a speech I made some days ago in another place, and referred to certain things which had been done by this government inside and outside of this house, and before I was a member of it, which he said indicated a tendency towards a one-party state. I do not agree with that at all.

I said in the speech from which the hon. gentleman quoted that I supposed there was always some tendency for parliamentary oppositions to try to give the impression that under our system parliament is the government, and then I went on to say:

> Parliament is not the government and the government is not even a committee of the whole of parliament, though there is a certain sense in which the government can be regarded as a committee of its own supporters in parliament.

That is where the hon. gentleman said I should have stopped. But I am not going to stop there. I am going to say this to the hon. gentleman. I do not believe in, I do not want to see, and I am totally opposed to a one-party state. I believe an opposition which does not agree with the government should not support it. When the hon. gentleman says there is a joint responsibility in this parliament which should be accepted by all hon. members on both sides of the house for what the government is doing, I would then ask who is advocating the one-party state? Is it the people on the opposite side who say they want to share the responsibility for what the government is doing? Or is it those of us in this house who say that as long as the electorate and members of parliament give us their confidence it is our responsibility exclusively and we have got to take the blame? If the opposition can persuade the electorate they can do better then they will be on these treasury benches. But if I cross over to the other side of the house I shall not wish to share their responsibility.

That, I believe, is a true parliamentary system, and this notion that in some mysterious way the opposition has a share in the responsibility for carrying on government is not. The opposition has a duty and a very important duty which, it seems, they sometimes forget. They have a duty to harass the government and to point out mistakes in government policy. They have a duty to give a coherent, responsible program to the public so that the public has a chance of electing an alternative government. I question very much if they have made much effort to do that since 1935.

I am not talking about emergency powers, and I do not intend to do so except to make one observation later on. I am talking about the reference made by the Leader of the Opposition to the speech I made. I believe the difficulty is, and it is a difficulty which is inherent in Conservatism, that it is impossible for a real Conservative to believe that the public could want anyone else to carry on the government. That is why, after an election, they always want to reverse the verdict of the electorate and to crawl into office even though the public has indicated they are really not wanted.

I believe the public has indicated that fairly decisively, particularly in the last two elections. All I was talking about in this speech of mine, which has been the occasion though not the real reason for this debate, was the question of procedure in parliament in regard to motions for the production of papers, and addresses to the crown for papers. There has been considerable discussion about this on the other side of the house and statements made have been, if I may use my own words, rather plausible, and rather misleading to people outside the house. I tried to give to a number of gentlemen and a few ladies, who did me the honour of asking me to speak, an explanation of what the ancient parliamentary practice was in regard to these things. The Leader of the Opposition, if I took his words down correctly, said there was a tendency to move away from these old practices.

I said I would not agree with the Leader of the Opposition. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I have to agree with him in this instance. I believe there has been a tendency to move away from these old practices—on the part of the opposition. To illustrate my point I would like to read a passage on this question of motions for papers from Bourinot, who was a clerk of this house some time ago and who, I do not think, can be accused of any of the latter twentieth century innovations we have had here.

Mr. Fulton: What page?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have the fourth edition, published in 1916, and in this copy it is on page 249. It reads:

> Occasions may arise when the government will feel constrained to refuse certain papers on the ground that their production would be inconvenient or injurious to the public interests. A high authority writes on this point:
> "Considerations of public policy, and a due regard to the interests of the state, occasionally demand that information sought for by members of the legislature should be withheld, at the discretion and upon the general responsibility of ministers. This principle is systematically recognized in all parliamentary transactions; were it otherwise, it would be impossible to carry on the government with safety and honour."
> Consequently, there are frequent cases in which the ministers refuse information, especially at some stage of an investigation or negotiation; and in such instances the house will always acquiesce when sufficient reasons are given for the refusal.

Mr. Fulton: Exactly, when sufficient reasons are given.

Mr. Pickersgill: I continue:

> On this account, members will sometimes consent to withdraw their motions; or in case only a part of the information sought for can be brought down, they will agree to such alterations as the minister may show to be advisable . . . sometimes the government may be obliged to withhold all information at the time, or they may be able to put the house in possession of only a part of the correspondence. If the government objects to the production of documents on the ground that they are of a confidential nature, it is not usual to insist on their being furnished, except under peculiar or imperative circumstances, on the ground that it would be wholly without precedent to produce them.

I could read a lot more to the same effect. This is the ancient practice. That is all I was describing in this modest little effort of mine. I was not attempting to suggest that the executive should take the place of parliament or anything else. But I did give reasons why some of these documents should be refused, and in view of some of the other things that have been said in this chamber this afternoon, much as I dislike the practice of quoting one's self I am going to do so right now, and I will make the quotations as short as I can. In the speech referred to, I had just been quoting the privy councillor's oath with which the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition is, to my knowledge, familiar because I administered it to him myself, and it gave me great pleasure to do so. I then was in another capacity.

I had referred to the privy councillor's oath which I do not need to remind the hon. gentleman obliges ministers not to disclose what takes place in Her Majesty's council. I said:

> Now the main reason why deliberations of the council are and should be kept secret is that privy councillors, like other human beings, sometimes have minds of their own and occasionally have differences of opinion about the course of action to be taken by the government. But the government itself can only take one course of action at a time—

I think I should have said "can take only one course of action".

> —and since all ministers are responsible for every action taken by the government and are in duty bound to support the action of the government—

Or to resign.

> —our kind of government would be impossible if differences between them which have to be resolved were not kept secret.

In view of certain experiences that some other countries have had, I think the salutary nature of our system will be appreciated. But I gave another reason which perhaps some hon. members would think I might be a little more touchy about than most members in the house. I said that on many occasions documents which are asked for in these motions are documents which pass between officials and ministers. I think it is known to every hon. member that, for quite a long time before I came into the house, I was a bureaucrat, and for most of that time I was very well treated as a bureaucrat.

Mr. Blackmore: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, I agree with the hon. member.

Mr. Martin: But deservedly so.

Mr. Pickersgill: But towards the end of my career as a bureaucrat I suffered something which some other public servants in this country, perhaps for less reason, have also suffered. An attempt was made to go behind the minister who was responsible for my conduct and to bring me into a controversy when I could not reply. I am not complaining about that in my own case at all. As a matter of fact I have taken means whereby I can now defend myself to the best of my abilities against any kind of attacks. But most civil servants—and I hope this will continue to be true—do not aspire to political careers. They do not want to have political careers and they should not be put in the position where they either have to have a political career if they want to defend themselves or they have to stop giving honest, courageous and sometimes disagreeable advice.

Under our system civil servants are not entitled to explain or defend themselves, their opinions or their advice in public, and they should not be allowed to do so. Because they are divorced from politics and because it is essential to the proper working of our system that they should continue to be divorced from politics, it is absolutely essential that the documents which they prepare for the advice of their ministers, setting out the arguments pro and con, stating the advantages of one course and the advantages of another, and sometimes tendering advice that some ministers do not accept—because that does happen—should not be made public. To protect civil servants, to protect the very system under which we operate, the rule has been established that parliament is not entitled to see documents passing between public servants and ministers. Such documents are, in the language of parliament, privileged.

That is all I was talking about in this attack on parliamentary institutions that I am supposed to have made. That is absolutely the only point I was making. I think it is the duty of a government to protect these documents, to protect the people who prepare them, and to do so is not denying to parliament any essential facts whatsoever. The facts that a government is obliged to produce here, that it has a duty to produce here, and that this government in my experience has always been willing to produce, are facts, and not opinions, not arguments as to alternative possibilities and that sort of thing, on which ministers, either individually or collectively, have to make up their minds.

The facts to which parliament is entitled are the facts on which the government reaches a conclusion. It is the duty of the minister to give them. It is his duty to give them in his own words and on his own responsibility, and if he does not do a good job of it the opposition should make his life miserable until he does. But they should not sneak around by the back door, if that is not unparliamentary, sir, and try to burgle the minister's briefcase and to do it by motions for papers in parliament. That was my only point and that is my only point.

In my opinion the sooner we get back to the ancient practices and the ancient ways and the sooner hon. gentlemen opposite return to the old fashioned practice of attacking ministers and of making ministers answer for their departments, instead of trying to get behind them to attack defenceless civil servants, the sooner we will have good debates in parliament, and the sooner we will have greater respect for parliament in the country. Now I, sir, am not going to give any lecture—

Mr. Drew: Perhaps the minister would agree to tell the house at what point any hon. member this afternoon made any suggestion that could be interpreted in the words he has just used?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think I said any hon. member did, Mr. Speaker. As I recall it, I was describing what I had said at a dinner at the Chateau Laurier. I said that there were times when motions were put down here that would have that kind of effect. I did not say in the debate this afternoon any hon. member had said anything of that sort. At least, I do not think I did. If I did, I did not mean to do so. If I did, I withdraw it.

I was saying that it does not seem to me that the fact the government feels it has a duty to resist motions for the production of privileged documents is interfering with any of the rights of parliament or any of the rights of the opposition. I feel it is upholding the ancient parliamentary practices, upholding our way of doing things and making our kind of responsible government workable. That is my whole point. If any hon. member opposite wishes to read the whole of what I said, without just taking a fragment here or there—not that I object in any way to the way in which the hon. member used the quotation he made from my remarks, I only objected to the occasion when I thought he departed from my text and put in the word "facts". I have carefully gone over what I said and I found no occasion where I said anything about the denial of facts. I do not think it will be found anywhere in my remarks.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the hon. minister permit a question? We have not had that speech identified. Where was it delivered and when?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be delighted to do so. I apologize to the hon. member for not having sent him a copy.

Mr. Knowles: We thought you made it in the Senate. You kept talking about "another place".

An hon. Member: Not in the Senate yet, anyway.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member will have to pardon my inexperience in using terms of that kind. It is described here as "cabinet government and freedom of information." You know, they always ask you to give a title and I thought that one up. The title is not very bright or original. It was a speech delivered to the semi-annual meeting of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association at the Chateau Laurier hotel in Ottawa, on February 22 of this year.

In referring to the Emergency Powers Act, the Leader of the Opposition quoted from Mr. Mackenzie King. He gave one or two quotations, which he said he was not giving to embarrass anyone on this side of the house. I can assure the hon. member they did not embarrass me, and for two reasons. They did not embarrass me because they were taken from a period long before I had ever met Mr. King. They did not embarrass me because I agree fully with what was in them. I particularly noted, and took down so I would have them right, certain words he quoted from one of Mr. King's speeches. Mr. King said that the executive had derived its power from, and is responsible to, the House of Commons. That is precisely what I was saying here. It is precisely what Mr. Ilsley said. Mr. Ilsley said the power was not delegated by the House of Commons. Everybody knows it is not delegated; that is not the mechanical way it is done, if I may use the word "mechanical" here.

He said the power was derived from the House of Commons. We who sit on the treasury benches here are nothing—

Mr. Hodgson: That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: —the moment we cease to have a majority of this house to support us on any question. Therefore, we derive our power from this house, and we acknowledge that. It is true that there are certain people in this house, quite a large number, who were elected to support us and keep us here. There were a certain number of members elected not to support us. We do not derive our power from those who were elected not to support us. Surely that is a self-evident fact.

What really makes this whole question rather difficult is the fact that, when motions are moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—though the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is usually more in order—asking for papers which they know quite well no government would give and which they themselves certainly would not give if they were in office or they would not stay in office very long, the newspapers frequently say the government refused information to the house when those motions are voted down. The twenty people who sit on the treasury bench cannot vote them down. It requires the majority of the house. The government is not refusing information to the house. We would not dare.

If the house, by a majority vote, asks for information we must either give the information or we get out of office. It is just as simple as that. That is what responsible government really means. It does not mean giving some information that some hon. member opposite would like to have in order to show there was a difference of opinion between me and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). I may say that never happens, but it might happen. It might even be reflected in a document or a letter I would write to him. If it did happen, I would not blame the hon. member for trying to get that correspondence. I mean, it is part of the game.

Mr. Knowles: Who would be right then?

Mr. Pickersgill: They are not right, however, when they say that if we will not give it to them we are defying parliament or destroying the rights of parliament, because we are not. That is my whole point.

I feel I can perhaps reinforce this a little by reading one paragraph of this speech that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) did not read. When I have read that, I think that is the only other quotation I shall inflict on the house. I recognize that I was talking to newspapermen, whose business it is to get information in any honourable way they can, and what I was saying was not very palatable to them. I tried to explain the case as well as I could, and then I went on to say:

> I am sure that every true newspaperman is, by instinct, against secrecy. He makes his living by uncovering news and reporting all the facts to the public. No one would question the right of newspapers—

At least I would not, perhaps I was going too far when I said "no one". In fact, I am sure I was going too far because I seem to remember the Leader of the Opposition did question this right in the case of the radio on one occasion.

> No one would question the right of newspapers to report any differences of opinion between cabinet ministers they are able to discover for themselves, or to publish reports or even speculation about the advice ministers have received from their officials or from experts they have retained, subject always to the ordinary laws of libel.

It is one thing for the press to discover these things for themselves, by any means they have at their disposal which they can exercise without falling foul of the law, and it is quite another thing to say it is the duty of the government to provide this parliament with such information. That is the point, and the whole point. If I can sum it up, parliament has the right to know what the government's decisions are, and it has the right to have reasonable justification for those decisions and the best case the government can make for them from the government benches, but it has not the right to have all the papers which we have used in making up our minds. That is the essence of it; because those are not public documents at all.

Now, I do not think there is anything more I can usefully add to this subject. However there is one other point upon which I think, as an historian, I would like to make a slight correction. The Leader of the Opposition, in one of his quotations from Mr. Mackenzie King—and I did not take a note of it, I am sorry to say—when Mr. Bennett was in office, contrasted his statement with the situation prevailing under the Emergency Powers Act.

Now, as I recollect it, Mr. King's objection to that legislation of Mr. Bennett was that large sums of money were made available, without any specific appropriation, in a time of peace. That was the point. Appropriating money is a function of parliament. It is true that during the war there were huge general appropriations under wartime conditions; but I do not think this government has asked for any appropriation of that kind in peacetime. And under the Emergency Powers Act we have specifically excluded the power to appropriate money without a specific reference to parliament. In other words, I do not think the quotation was relevant to the kind of circumstances we are discussing in this motion.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) has spent most of his time this afternoon trying to explain and to justify the foolish speech he made outside the house some weeks ago. He has said very little about the Emergency Powers Act; and so, if one is to be in order in following him, there is very little one can say about the hon. member's speech. I would like to make one remark, however, and it is this, that I think after he has had a little more experience as a cabinet minister and has been told a few things by senior cabinet ministers, he will not be so brash about making foolish statements outside the house, and will not come to the house and try to convince the rest of us that, after all, they were not foolish.

The amendment before the house is as follows:

> this house desires to record its opinion that the powers granted to the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act are repugnant to responsible parliamentary government.

It is worth while for us first to look at the attitude of members of the government with regard to this question. I refer for example to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on March 12, just ten days ago. He was asked this question by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when the orders of the day were called:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. With the approach of the Easter recess, is he in a position to say whether or not it is the intention of the government to allow the Emergency Powers Act to lapse, or will legislation be introduced to continue it?

One would have thought that the Acting Prime Minister would have treated the subject with great seriousness, and that he and other members of the cabinet would have given a great deal of time to consideration of this question, which is so vital to the parliamentary life of Canada. But here was the minister's answer:

> Mr. Speaker, no decision on that point has been taken as yet. It will depend upon events between now and the end of the session.

That was the very offhand answer given at that time by the right hon. gentleman, showing how little weight he placed on this particular question.

And then today we have another evidence of the attitude of the government, in the very fact that instead of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) of this country, or the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) leading off for the government in answer to the amendment, we have the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill), the most junior member of the cabinet—or very close to it—getting up and leading off for the government, making a speech which ignored the Emergency Powers Act, and trying to show what a great fellow he is, himself.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will allow me to interrupt; when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) was making these references to the speech made by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of State sent me a note asking me if I would object if he answered immediately. I said that I would not. As soon as he took his seat I was proposing to rise; but the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra got in ahead of me. That is why I am waiting until he finishes in order to state my case.

Mr. Green: The Prime Minister knows very well that it is not the practice in this house for one government supporter immediately to follow another.

Mr. St. Laurent: The Secretary of State declared he was not speaking for the government, but that he was dealing with references to himself.

Mr. Green: The Prime Minister, by his own remarks, has made it perfectly clear that he considered the reputation of the Secretary of State of more importance than this question of emergency powers.

Mr. St. Laurent: Oh well—

Mr. Green: Otherwise the Secretary of State would have been told, as he should have been told, to wait his turn, and to rise later in an attempt to justify the ridiculous speech he made a few weeks ago.

May I repeat that these actions show more clearly than words could do that the present government places very little importance on this question of the Emergency Powers Act, and very little importance on parliament—because it is the strength and power of parliament that is involved in this question. They show further that the government has lost all sense of the values in the democratic system of government.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I point out that during only four years of the life of this Liberal regime have we had a free parliament in Canada; and that was from October, 1935, to September, 1939 when the War Measures Act was brought into force. Ever since the fall of 1939, for a period now of almost fifteen years, there has been no truly free parliament in this nation. Parliament has not been supreme.

A year ago we had a debate with respect to the extension for a further year of the Emergency Powers Act. It was a hard-fought debate, all the opposition parties uniting to attack the government's proposal that the act be extended. As a result of that debate a column was written in the Vancouver Sun by the present member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott). I shall read two or three paragraphs from that column, because I think it shows very clearly what a Liberal thought a year ago about the Emergency Powers Act—and goodness knows there is far less cause for continuing it this year than there was last.

This is what the hon. member for Vancouver South had to say—and I shall be very interested to see how he votes on this amendment. The column is headed "Sees Liberal Mistake". It is dated February 25, 1953, and is as follows:

> It seems to me that the Liberals at Ottawa are clearly in the wrong, and the Conservatives, C.C.F. and Social Credit clearly in the right about extension of the Emergency Powers Act. Under the regular constitution of Canada the government of Canada has all the powers that it needs to deal with any conceivable emergency. Moreover, in this age of air travel, it is possible to assemble parliament on 48 hours' notice or even less.
> Why, then, ask parliament for what amounts to a blank cheque to by-pass parliament even when parliament is sitting?
> It would be wrong at any time for a government to ask for the extension of the Emergency Powers Act, unless there was some clear and unanswerable case for such a request. But it seems doubly bad for a Liberal government to do so,—

Mr. Philpott did not know his Liberals then as well as he knows them now. I continue:

> —for the most fundamental principle upon which historic Liberalism stands is precisely the supremacy of parliament.
> When young Mackenzie King came into power in Canada after an energetic campaign in 1920 and 1921 when, day after day, he aroused the people of this land to the dangers of rule by order in council.
> The principle he championed was right then—and it is right now.

And then he goes on:

> A bad principle is a bad principle—and this is a very bad principle. A bad precedent is a bad precedent—and this is a very bad precedent.

On November 26 I asked, in my speech on the debate in reply to the speech from the throne, that this Emergency Powers Act be repealed. If I remember correctly, no attempt was made to answer that suggestion, and of course no move was taken by the government. We are now in a position where, according to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the government does not know, the cabinet does not know, what they are going to do about the question.

It is worth while today, Mr. Speaker, to go back and have a look at this Emergency Powers Act. Of course we have on the statute books the War Measures Act, which could be brought in by proclamation even though war is only apprehended and not actually a fact. The War Measures Act was used during the war years, and I have heard no one quarrel with such action. In the post-war years modified measures were brought into effect. The War Measures Act was put back in cold storage, where it remains at the present time, and different acts were enacted to replace it. There was the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, and then this Emergency Powers Act, which was passed on March 21, 1951. It is very interesting to analyse this act and see what it provides. In the first place it reads as follows:

> Whereas an international emergency exists that threatens the security of Canada;

In other words, it declares an emergency. That is the first point I wish to deal with in connection with the act. The second point is this: It is based on preparations for defence. For example, the second recital reads as follows:

> And whereas it is essential that emergency powers be conferred to enable measures to be taken as urgently required from time to time to carry out adequate defence preparations,—

There are the words I mentioned a moment ago. Then, the recital goes on:

—to regulate the economy of Canada to meet the needs of defence—

There is another reference to defence. The paragraph continues:

—and to stabilize the economy and to safeguard it from disruption that may result from defence preparations in Canada or from emergency measures taken in other countries, in order that defence preparations may not be impeded.

Therefore the second feature of the act that I wish to deal with in a minute is that it is based on defence preparations. The third feature is in the third recital which reads as follows:

And whereas it is preferable that the necessary emergency powers be exercised under special authority from parliament rather than that the War Measures Act be brought into force so long as—

And these are the words I emphasize:

—present efforts to avert war are continuing and, moreover, it is not desirable that the wide powers conferred by that act to interfere with the fundamental liberties of the individual should now be brought into operation.

The third feature I am emphasizing today is in these words:

So long as present efforts to avert war are continuing.

The fourth feature is the powers actually set out in the act.

First of all, to go back to the declaration of an emergency; as Your Honour knows, the very fact that parliament passes an act declaring an emergency widens the jurisdiction of this parliament. The result is that if a person attempts to attack an act which was passed by this parliament he may be met with the defence that parliament has declared an emergency. That is particularly true of an attempt by one of the provinces to attack the jurisdiction of this parliament to pass an act. Counsel for the defence will probably be met in court with the argument by counsel for the dominion that this Emergency Powers Act declares an emergency, and therefore the act in question is intra vires. That declaration of emergency gives the dominion power it should not have under present conditions; it is an inaccurate description of the situation at the present time, and I go further and suggest it is a deceptive description of conditions at the present time; the dominion is not entitled to have this extended jurisdiction which is gained by declaring that there is an emergency.

With respect to the second feature of the act, defence preparations, I challenge the Prime Minister or any minister of this government to indicate how this Emergency Powers Act is needed for defence preparations. For the production of defence materials we have the Defence Production Act. When it was passed in 1951 I asked the Prime Minister whether or not that act gave the government all the powers it would require if a third world war were in existence. The question and answer are to be found on page 909 of Hansard of March 5, 1951, as follows:

Mr. Green: The Prime Minister has said that this bill as presented contains all the powers that would be required in the event of a third world war.

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not want to promise the house that if we ran up against something where the courts said this was not good enough we would not come back to parliament; if we thought it should be done, we would ask parliament to authorize it; but I think the law officers have drawn this in language that should be sufficient to cover all the enabling powers apt to be required.

Therefore for the purpose of defence production, even though we were in a third world war, nothing more would be needed than what is on the statute books in the form of the Defence Production Act.

Then, a day or two ago this house passed the Export and Import Permits Act, which again I suggest is an act which would be sufficiently strong, even though we were in a war. In any event, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with this Export and Import Permits Act in his hands, has all the powers he requires. He does not need to get any further under the Emergency Powers Act.

The third feature of the act, namely, that it is passed to be effective so long as present efforts to avert war are continuing, leads me to say this. The act was passed in March, 1951. The fighting in Korea ended on July 27, 1953. The men in our forces, even though they are serving in Korea, are now being treated as though they were serving in a peacetime army. They are no longer entitled to the benefits that were available for men who served during the fighting in Korea. Our whole force now is on a peacetime basis. And, Mr. Speaker, if the emergency powers are needed now I wish the Prime Minister would explain when they would not be needed.

If this Emergency Powers Act is to be continued, then it is only too evident that emergency powers are from now on to be the regular thing in Canada, during the whole time that there continues in effect this present policy of remaining strong so that an aggressor will be dissuaded from commencing a war. That policy will probably be in effect for the lifetime of most of the members in this house today. Is parliament to be fettered with an Emergency Powers Act under present conditions? If so, it is a rather bleak outlook for parliamentary government in Canada.

To come to the powers granted by the Emergency Powers Act, we find that they are contained in section 2 thereof. They are very wide. The section reads as follows:

> The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may by reason of the existing international emergency deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it is hereby declared that the powers of the governor in council shall extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:

Then we have a list of these powers specifically covered by the act.

> (a) control and suppression of maps, plans and photographs;
> (b) control of communications and means of communication;
> (c) control of the harbours, ports and territorial waters of Canada and the movements of vessels;
> (d) transportation by land, air or water and the control of the transport of persons and things;—

In other words, all transportation across this country.

> (e) trading, exportation, importation, production and manufacture;—

I ask hon. members how you could have wider power than that.

> —and (f) imposition and recovery, in connection with any scheme of control, of fees or charges payable to the Receiver General of Canada or into any fund or account established by order or regulation for the purposes of the scheme of control.

Then the section goes on to provide as follows:

> All orders and regulations made under or pursuant to authority conferred under this act have the force of law while this act is in force.

That means, Mr. Speaker, that under this act legislation can be made by the cabinet over in the east block, behind closed doors, and can be enacted even while parliament is sitting. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) smiles; and he is the right man to smile because, just about eleven months ago he walked into this house and tabled an order in council that under this act had been passed over in the east block with the doors shut and the blinds drawn.

Mr. Chevrier: That is what I was smiling at.

Mr. Fulton: I hope they had the lights on.

Mr. Green: That order in council was passed without any opportunity for debate in this house, without any opportunity for the press of Canada to report a debate to the public and without any opportunity for the public to know anything about it. That same power could be used today. The cabinet at six o'clock could leave this house, go over to the east block and pass legislation under the Emergency Powers Act, and it would be law just as though it had been passed here after debate.

Even with respect to this order in council which was tabled by the Minister of Transport and known as the "control of trade by sea for mainland China and North Korea", P.C. 1953-604, there has been in the intervening eleven months no attempt to place that law in statute form, even though this session it could have been brought in as an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act, and something of that kind should be done. Instead, this order in council, passed under the Emergency Powers Act, remains law today without there ever having been an opportunity for debate in parliament.

When the government did that, of course they were challenged. The following day I moved an amendment to the motion to go into supply and challenged that action. Here was the reaction of one of the senior ministers of the government who was in the house at that time. I refer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. As reported at page 4197 of Hansard of April 21, 1953, he said:

> If we have overstepped our powers, I make no apology for having done so.

That was the attitude then. In effect, these powers are a club in the hands of the government held over parliament, over the Canadian people and over the provinces.

As to the question of the rights of parliament, Mr. Speaker, clearly this Emergency Powers Act forces parliament into a secondary position subservient to the cabinet. It should be fundamental in Canada that parliament is supreme. After all, parliament is the people governing through their representatives under your direction, Mr. Speaker. That should be the foundation of parliamentary government in this country. Parliament should be supreme, debating laws openly, with the right to deal with them in the various stages as they go through this house and then as they go through the Senate, so that the people are able to know the problems, the remedies that are proposed, the objections made to the legislation and, perhaps most important of all, the penalties that are imposed by those laws.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this Emergency Powers Act should be repealed. Certainly it should not be extended beyond May 31. Any orders in council that are in existence under the Emergency Powers Act could be changed into statutory form by having them passed in the ordinary way by the house. If when the members are not here any matter arises which is important enough to require legislation, this parliament can be summoned back quickly, just as was pointed out by the present hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) in the article that I read a few minutes ago. The government always has on the statute books the War Measures Act which can be used in the event of war or apprehended war. I do not believe there is one valid excuse for maintaining this act on the statute books at the present time.

The ministers will note that public opinion has been strongly expressed against the act. Last fall many papers across this country suggested in editorials—

Mr. Croll: In August public opinion was expressed on this act.

Mr. Hodgson: It was expressed on the old age pension stories you were putting out around the country.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Green: After the subject had been raised in the house during a debate last November, there appeared in not a few of the Canadian papers editorials suggesting that the time had come to repeal the Emergency Powers Act. I do not believe there was one editorial in the country in favour of having it retained.

This amendment is a challenge to the private members of this house, whether they be on the opposition side or on the government side. If the private members of this house, who, after all, are the ones who should be most concerned about the rights of parliament, see fit to say that this act must go then it will go. The government dare not retain it on the statute books if that attitude is adopted by private members of this house.

The Liberal majority in the last parliament was very docile. Naturally they will not agree, but in my judgment—and this is my fifth parliament—Liberal private members in the last house were far more docile than any other group of Liberals in the other parliaments in which I have served. I hope Liberals in the present parliament will do much better. I believe they will, for government supporters in this house seem to be more open-minded on questions than were Liberal members in the last house. In any event, here is an opportunity for them to show us where they stand. If they believe in the rights of parliament, if they believe parliament must be supreme, then let them take steps to tell their ministers that this act must go.

The Progressive Conservative party stands for the supremacy of parliament. That has been one of our fundamental beliefs down through the years. We believe in parliament being supreme rather than the cabinet, and we believe that only in that way can we have a free parliament in Canada.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard a very interesting speech on the merits of the Emergency Powers Act, which is not before the house at this time. We have before us a motion to go into committee of supply, to which there has been moved an amendment which reads as follows:

> this house desires to record its opinion that the powers granted to the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act are repugnant to responsible parliamentary government.

It occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, that that is quite an unusual amendment to make on a motion to go into supply. It is an attempt to anticipate something which may or may not happen. The Emergency Powers Act, as everyone knows, is an act of temporary duration which will expire on the 31st of May, unless there is an attempt made to have legislation passed by this parliament to extend it for a further period. If that is done it should be within the powers of parliament at that time to decide whether the act should be extended.

This is an attempt to have that decision made at the present time so that there can be no bill introduced or dealt with by the house to extend the act. That does not seem to me to be required at this time. If we intended to do as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) seemed to believe would be the right thing to do, namely, to set up the kind of committee which Lord Hewart recommended in his book, from which the hon. member read some very interesting quotations, there might be some point in dealing with it now. But this can have no other effect than to reflect upon what parliament did during another session, because it is a declaration by this house that what was done in this house by another parliament, and which received royal assent, was something that was "repugnant to responsible parliamentary government".

I do not know just exactly what is meant by the words "responsible parliamentary government". I assume the word "government" is used in its widest sense, to include everything that has to be done for the peace, order, and good government of the state through our parliamentary institutions. This amendment in effect proposes that this house declare that what was done is repugnant to responsible parliamentary government. I think that course is objectionable under standing order 41, and that which has been sanctioned by usage both in England and Canada, namely, in effect, that an hon. member while speaking must not reflect on past acts and proceedings of this house.

There is a way of dealing with legislation which has been passed and which hon. members feel should not have been passed, that is by the introduction of a bill to repeal it, but here is an indirect move designed, I imagine, to put it beyond the powers of this house to deal with that kind of legislation were it introduced during this session.

I believe we are all very happy that in the course of the last few months there has been no occasion when we required the use of these powers, and I believe we will all be very happy if they never have to be used. It may be that between now and the time when it would be necessary to introduce legislation for an extension there will be happenings that will make it quite apparent to everybody that the powers granted under this Emergency Powers Act would not be required, and that they would be merely a standby to ensure that we would be in a position to meet events unlikely to occur. But parliament in its wisdom—and that is how we must regard the result of parliamentary action—decided last session that it was going to make these powers available up to the 31st of May, 1954, and not beyond that date unless the matter were again raised in the meantime.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) seems surprised that the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) said that we had not yet decided whether we would ask parliament to extend that act. Why should there be anything surprising about that? It is something that does not have to be dealt with and does not require to be dealt with until the end of May. The world situation during these troubled years is subject to frequent changes. Why should we make any decision? No one would be happier than members of the government if the situation became such that parliament did not have to be asked to extend the Emergency Powers Act.

Mr. Green: I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Does the Prime Minister believe there is any need for the act under present conditions?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not foresee any immediate occasion or any immediate reason for having to exercise the powers under the act. But when it was passed last year, rightly or wrongly, we felt our responsibility towards the Canadian public was such that it would be desirable to have that act in force, though we expressed the hope that we would not have to use it, and we have not used it. But at that time we felt the situation was such that it was a proper discharge of our responsibility to have the act available. Now it is available and will be available up to the end of May. On more than one occasion we have discussed what should be done about it, but we have refrained from making any decision to ask parliament to extend the act because we hoped that the situation might be such that we would not have to ask parliament to extend it.

In advance of that date why should there be this debate and an attempt to divide the house upon the matter except it be to try to get the same kind of reaction that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was so happy to cite from the writings of a distinguished newspaperman who has since become a member of parliament on this side of the house? Unless this legislation is brought forward for extension it will lapse. That, I assume, would be quite satisfactory to the hon. gentlemen opposite. On the other hand, perhaps it would be a disappointment to them if they found the situation was such that we did not have to ask parliament to renew these powers and they were thus deprived of this bogey, this cry of "wolf, wolf" against the supremacy of parliament and the rule of law.

No one disputes the supremacy of parliament, no one disputes the rule of law, but oppositions always take a different view from that of those who happen to have the responsibility of government at the time as to what is impairment of the rights of parliament. Strong language has been used today. If it ever became necessary for us to sit on the other side of the house I would not be at all surprised if there might be some occasions when we would use just as strong language as is now used by the opposition about these impairments of the rights of parliament. But nevertheless it is a fact in which I think the Canadian parliament and the Canadian people can glory that others than Canadians recognize that there is no country in the world where the practices of constitutional parliamentary institutions are better than they are in Canada, and that in spite of the fact that there have been these constant charges that those who are exercising the responsibility of government are becoming dictators or are resorting to methods that connote Hitlerism or fascism or communism.

There is no Hitlerism, there is no fascism and there is no communism, thank the Lord, in this country of ours. That is one of the reasons why, as the representative of the country, I was received in such a friendly and cordial manner wherever I went. That is why I found such admiration for this growing and developing nation and for the manner in which democracy is practised in this part of the North American continent. I even heard favourable comparisons being made with respect to democratic practices in the northern half of the North American continent with some of the things which many of our friends to the south of us themselves deplore in the administration of their own system.

That being the situation, there is no application to parliament at this time to pronounce itself in favour of extension of the Emergency Powers Act. There is no necessity of making a formal decision at this time, and in spite of the charge that it may be docility on the part of members who were elected to support this government, I invite them to vote against the amendment because if they were to vote for it they would be doing something not required at this time, something which may never be required, namely, to make up their minds whether or not there are sufficient reasons to justify the extension of the life of that act.

Mr. Knowles: Would the Prime Minister permit a question before he concludes with that point? I ask him to appreciate that I am seeking information. Can he tell us whether the order in council which we sometimes refer to as the secret order in council, and which was passed under the authority of the Emergency Powers Act, is still in existence?

Mr. St. Laurent: It is.

Mr. Knowles: That being the case, what would happen to it if the Emergency Powers Act were allowed to lapse on the 31st of May?

Mr. St. Laurent: It would disappear; it would lapse. It may be that it will be possible to allow it to lapse and that there will be other provisions under which what this order in council wards against can be taken care of.

Mr. Knowles: If any such other provisions are adopted in connection with that secret order in council, would there be a report to parliament that another basis had been found for it?

Mr. St. Laurent: There would not be another order in council required. It may be that in dealing with the Criminal Code and in dealing with the Official Secrets Act there will be sufficient safeguards against that which is warded against by the secret order in council to make an order in council unnecessary. It would not be something that would have to be specially dealt with by order in council having the effect of law.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, it might die without—

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. St. Laurent: It would be a safeguard existing through the operation of the statute itself.

Mr. Knowles: In other words the order in council itself—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. St. Laurent: Will you permit me? I should like to hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Knowles: The order in council might die without our ever having known what it was about.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, and I do not think that would be an infringement upon the supremacy of parliament or upon the rule of law. It was something which we felt was a necessary precaution, and if we can find legislation adopted by parliament sufficiently specific to ward against the danger which it was attempted to ward against by the order in council, then the order in council would appear unnecessary. It would certainly expire if the Emergency Powers Act itself expired because there is no other foundation for it to rest upon but the authority given by parliament to do so. If that authority lapses, it will lapse at the same time.

The situation is changing. An international conference is to be held with respect to which some hopes are entertained that it may bring about some easing of existing tensions. I refer to the Geneva conference to commence, I think, on the 26th of April. That is well before the 31st of May. On the other hand situations might arise out of the discussions of the Geneva conference which would appear to be quite otherwise. Although the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said that the fighting ceased on the 27th of July, it must not be forgotten that that is only a cease-fire.

Mr. Green: The troops were put on a peacetime basis.

Mr. St. Laurent: They were put on a peacetime basis, and I think the hon. member hopes, as I hope, that they will never be put on any other basis. But it is only a cease-fire. That has to be followed by something. I saw the very strong lines that have been provided in Korea, and I said the other day that the best intelligence our people had was that on neither side were offensives being prepared. But it would not be reasonable to anticipate that armies are going to stand there in these impregnable lines facing each other forever. There is going to be some solution some day to the stalemate represented by these two defence lines.

These are matters which will be dealt with in due course here. There is a provision in standing orders, Mr. Speaker, which does not directly apply, but it does indicate the principle which should be applied when government business is being dealt with. It appertains to the government to decide in what order and at what time it will be dealt with.

This is an effort by the opposition to have something that is government business decided weeks and weeks in advance of the time when the government itself feels that it should be decided. If this house adopted the motion, then there is the principle that the same question cannot be again submitted at the same session. Citation 304 of Beauchesne's second edition reads:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members to prevent them from reviving a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

If a bill to extend the emergency powers were offered, either Your Honour would rule that we could not answer the arguments made against that kind of bill this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) or Your Honour would rule that the same question could be debated twice during the same session.

There is a general rule that deals with amendments that can be made to the motion to go into supply, and it says in part:

> . . . provided that the discussion and the amendment, if one is moved, shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session, nor to any item of the estimates, nor to any resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means, nor to any matter placed on or whereof notice has been given in the order paper.

There is an indication that that principle should apply to this motion. There was no notice required on the order paper to make it abundantly clear that the Emergency Powers Act could not live beyond May 31, 1954, unless legislation were introduced to carry that out. I think it would be in accord with the general principles of the rules that no decision should be taken on this matter today. Should the general rules be too general to allow Your Honour to rule on this amendment, I think that the supporters of the government should wait to express their opinion as to whether the Emergency Powers Act should be extended until the government comes to the house with the reasons why it should be extended.

The government will not come to the house unless it has reason to feel it would not be discharging its responsibilities to the Canadian public without the act. I invite our followers in the house to withhold their judgment upon the sufficiency or insufficiency of the reasons, if reasons are brought forward, until those reasons are brought forward.

Mr. Speaker: With regard to the citations the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has read to the house I wanted to say that, as I heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) speaking about existing legislation on the motion to go into supply, I thought that perhaps it was not the type of grievance that is customarily put before the house on the motion to go into supply.

Mr. Fulton: Will you hear argument?

Mr. Speaker: I am not going to make a ruling at the moment, I just want to deal with the procedure. I looked at the citations having to do with these amendments that are moved on the motion to go into supply. If hon. members look at citation 345 and then at citation 467 of Beauchesne's third edition, they will find that wide scope is given to amendments moved to the motion to go into supply.

At one point citation 467 says that amendments can be moved and it shall be permissible—I am not quoting verbatim—to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament. Then it says:

> . . . provided that the discussion and the amendment, if one is moved, shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session, nor to any item of the estimates, nor to any resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means, nor to any matter placed on or whereof notice has been given in the order paper.

I could not see how the matter being discussed at the moment was one which fell within the restrictions of citation 467 or 345. The Prime Minister has drawn my attention to a citation in Beauchesne's second edition, which in the third edition is citation 246. It says:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in standing order 41, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not:
> (k) reflect upon the past acts and proceedings of the house;

The last few words of standing order 41 read:

> No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

Now, if hon. members look at citation 246(k), they will see that this language is probably a summary of citation 244, which says:

> A member may not speak against or reflect upon any determination of the house, unless he intends to conclude with a motion for rescinding it.

In my opinion the "past acts" referred to in citation 246(k) mean past acts in the same session. I do not think we ought to rule out of order a declaration of principle embodied in an amendment to a motion to go into supply, because of the wide scope offered for such amendments; I do not think we ought to say that, because of this citation, members cannot criticize acts passed in previous sessions. The whole spirit of our rules pertaining to bills or motions which are not to be offered twice refers to the same session.

I might perhaps refer hon. members to May's Parliamentary Practice, the twelfth edition, at page 267, where it deals with the same question. It deals with this citation, which in Beauchesne's is the same in substance, and comes from May or Bourinot. It goes on to say how difficult it is for a member who wants to discuss the past action of a parliament in the same session to move a motion to rescind it because there has to be a new question put before the house. It is said that the house has even resorted to prorogation in order to rescind a decision made in the same session.

I submit that if hon. members look at the authorities they will see that a session of parliament is assembled by the summons of Her Majesty and continues until prorogation. In my opinion the limitation is to a debate taking place twice in the same session. I think that paragraph (k) of citation 246 refers to a debate in the same session.

Now, I was trying to see if there were any words in the amendment which perhaps might be offensive. I looked up the definition of the word "repugnant" and I find in the Oxford dictionary, which is on the table, that the word is defined as meaning "contradictory, incompatible with, refractory, resisting, distasteful". If we were to decide that "distasteful" is the proper definition of the word repugnant, then I should think hon. members would want to modify the expression. But if it means incompatible with responsible parliamentary government, which I think is the meaning, while in the ordinary sense it is considered a bit strong, I believe, upon looking at the definition, that we should not have such thin skins as to say that the word should be prohibited or, under our rules, eliminated.

I do not want to make a ruling at this moment. I have given my thoughts in the matter—perhaps given them too quickly—but, at first sight, looking over the authorities, that is my reaction. I promise hon. members that I will study the point further, and if I find any reason for changing my mind I shall communicate it to the house.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I understand this afternoon when I was on the front lawn of the parliament buildings trying to count how many daffodils are pushing their way up through the snow, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) referred to a newspaper article I wrote about a year ago. I do not know whether that was the first best or the second best article I wrote on that particular subject a year ago, but I am sure the hon. member would not want to leave with the house any misapprehension.

I wrote two articles about a year ago concerning the Emergency Powers Act.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) has just come into the house, and is rising on what is called a question of privilege. Hon. members generally do that either immediately after or while a speech is being made. In this instance I understand the hon. member for Vancouver South was not in the house.

He may do one of two things: If he knows what has been said he may explain the position briefly, without adding anything other than that required to make his position clear; or he may wait until he has an opportunity to take part in the debate, at which time he would be entitled to discuss fully the point brought before the house. But I do not think that at this time he can add anything that would not be considered necessary to making his position clear.

Mr. Philpott: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I shall take my two minutes now. The addendum to the article which I understand the hon. member read this afternoon was to the effect that we needed the Emergency Powers Act last year, during the period when we had no parliament to call in an emergency session. And of course I still stand by that position. So, in answer to my hon. friend's query, he does not need to be in any doubt about how I shall vote tonight. I shall vote with the government. If for any reason the emergency powers were to be prolonged beyond that period, without justification, then naturally I would vote against the government. But tonight I shall vote against the opposition because it seems to me this is a vexatious move.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad of the ruling you gave because, so far as I can make out, the real difficulty is that the opposition is coming in too close and is making suggestions which are somewhat embarrassing to the government. Perhaps unintentionally the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) gave me a good deal of hope this afternoon that actually what we are asking is going to happen. And also he gave me a certain feeling of satisfaction that although we did not succeed a year ago in having this legislation turned back, nevertheless we may have succeeded better than we knew in not having it used. Because we now find that the government saw fit not to use it at all during the year just past. To that extent I think we may be entitled to congratulate ourselves.

When we examine further into the use of this statute, and look back to the orders in council which were passed, the strange thing is that a great many of them seem to have very little to do with the actual reasons for which we understood the statute was passed. On that point I shall have something more to say after the dinner recess.

At the moment however I should like to go back to a year ago and to say a word or two about what the Prime Minister has said as to the inappropriateness of the resolution, inappropriate because the government has not yet declared its mind. I noticed carefully what he said to members of his own party.

I would ask him to go back to a year ago, and consider what happened. At that time, for the first time—I think almost for the first time—we felt that there was throughout the country some indication that people were becoming interested in this question of undue government power. The hon. member who has just spoken on a question of privilege, and who is going to vote with the government tonight, was one who did come out and express views in which he questioned seriously what was going on.

This year, with the legislation having still some months to run, we have been bold enough to seek to arouse public opinion and to influence the government, while there is still time. I suppose if we had been good little boys we would have waited, and would have done nothing until the government reached its decision. Then, in theory, we would have been able to put forward our arguments and if those arguments had been good enough, the government would have adopted them. I am a modest man, Mr. Speaker, and I, frankly, do not ever expect to be able to make arguments good enough so that, when the government has brought in legislation and has shown its hand, it will be persuaded by those arguments to change its procedure. Neither do I expect to live long enough to see members on the government side rise up and smite the government. That is something which, in the best of all possible worlds, might happen, but I do not believe it will happen in this world, or in this parliament.

Mr. Fulton: We will go on winning all the debates but losing all the votes.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. During the recess I examined the point that was brought up prior to six o'clock and I want immediately to refer hon. members again to citation 246, paragraph (k), Beauchesne's third edition, which reads:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in standing order 41, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not:
> (k) reflect upon the past acts and proceedings of the house.

I gave it as my opinion that past acts did not refer to any other act but those which had been previously passed in the same session. It appears from reading the various authorities on the subject that it may not be right that it refers only to the acts passed in the same session but also to previous acts passed in other sessions. I should like hon. members to listen to a paragraph which is found on page 194 under the chapter "Rules of Debate" in a book published by Sir Gilbert Campion in 1950. There they will find paragraph 5 which reads:

> This rule applies also to insulting language against a statute as the work of parliament.

This question and others to follow are all linked to the language contained in our standing order 41, which has to do with offensive and disrespectful language. The exact meaning of the word "act" in all these citations is somewhat difficult to establish.

In May's fifteenth edition at page 436 you find under the heading "Words against Parliament, or either House" a subparagraph entitled "Against a statute" and the following:

> Disrespectful or abusive mention of a statute would seem to be partly open to the same objections as improper language applied to parliament itself; for it imputes discredit to the legislature which passed it, and has a tendency to bring the law into contempt; though the necessity of the repeal of a law justifies, as an argument for that course, its condemnation in debate. A statement that the enactment of a law may justify an appeal to force is not within the cognizance of the chair.

I am now going back in the years because, as hon. members know, our standing order 41 dates back to 1867, and we have inherited it from similar standing orders which existed under previous parliaments in Canada and in England. In Bourinot's fourth edition, which was published in 1916, I find the following: "Rules for the preservation of order.—Parliamentary and Unparliamentary Expressions in Debate," and at page 361:

> (x) or to reflect upon, argue against or in any manner call in question, the past acts and proceedings of the house.

If "past acts" mean a statute which is in force and has been adopted by a previous parliament at a previous session, Bourinot would certainly not like to see us discuss at this moment the powers in the Emergency Powers Act because he says:

> Or to reflect upon, argue against or in any manner call in question, the past acts and proceedings of the house.

In Bourinot's third edition, which was published in 1903, I find at page 482:

> Or to reflect upon, argue against or in any manner call in question, the past acts and proceedings of the house.

Then in Cushing, which was published in 1874, I find at page 672, citation 1740, which reads as follows:

> It is irregular to reflect upon, argue against, or in any manner call in question, in debate, the past acts or proceedings of the house, on the obvious ground, that, besides tending to revive discussion upon questions which have already been once decided, such reflections are uncourteous to the house, and irregular in principle, inasmuch as the member is himself included in and bound by a vote agreed to by a majority; and it seems that reflecting upon or questioning the acts of the "majority" is equivalent to reflecting upon the house.

Hon. members would judge that in this citation he is referring to a vote previously made in the same session. I am at a loss to decide exactly what is meant by "past acts". It looks as if generally the latter part of our standing order 41 is to the effect that if one wants to criticize an existing statute he must propose a motion to rescind a decision which has been previously made. It looks as if that is the sense of it.

What I should like to submit to the attention of hon. members at this time is the following: If one wants to argue against a statute, what is the objection to his proposing a bill to repeal that statute? Why does he have to take recourse to an amendment to the motion to go into supply? I looked at precedents. By the way, it certainly does not involve any expenditure of money to propose a repeal of a statute. I find that in 1936 the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) proposed a bill to repeal an act to establish an economic council, which had been passed by a previous parliament. It appears at page 436 of Hansard, volume I. The hon. member asked for leave to introduce a bill, which was agreed to. Hon. members will find at page 578 that the motion was agreed to and the bill read a third time and passed.

The question before us at the moment is: Should we consider it a grievance and delay the examination of supply to move as an amendment to that motion what is tantamount to a repeal of an act? It seems to me that this amendment, to be scrupulously in order, should be modified to read: "That the administration of the powers granted to the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act is repugnant to responsible parliamentary government." I should like to submit this because I think we all want to respect the traditional rules of order in debate. I should like to submit to hon. members that in whatever we do we should always follow the best course, and the best course in this instance, it seems to me, is not to move an amendment to the motion that the Speaker do now leave the chair, but rather to present a bill to repeal the Emergency Powers Act, which could be done.

I do not want to add more to what I have just said. I just leave it to hon. members. The question in itself is one that is extremely difficult to deal with. I simply would not wish on this occasion to establish a precedent whereby, on a motion to go into supply, hon. members would propose an attack against a piece of legislation, something which they could do better by moving its repeal; that is, if we are to be guided by what is stated in our standing order 41, which reads in part as follows:

> No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

We have always taken this rule to mean a vote in the same session. As I have said, there are doubts as to whether it is limited to votes in the same session. Then it has been seen that one cannot argue against or in any manner call into question a statute which is law because in doing so it imputes discredit to parliament. I submit these points to hon. members. Speaking for myself, I would prefer it if this amendment were to read:

> This house desires to record its opinion that the administration of the powers granted to the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act is repugnant to responsible parliamentary government.

There I would say it is a grievance that is complained of; you are complaining about the administration of the act. But to say that the powers granted to the governor in council are repugnant to responsible parliamentary government is, I think, to attack the principle of the Emergency Powers Act. It is a matter of attacking a statute or an existing law. If hon. members want to attack that act properly, I think they should do so by means of a motion to repeal the Emergency Powers Act.

I do not at this point wish to initiate a long debate on procedure. As I have indicated, the point is a difficult and complicated one. I do not wish to rule on the matter. I am simply asking those who have moved the amendment to consider perhaps a rephrasing of their amendment. If they feel that they do not want to be as scrupulous as I would like to be at the moment, I am just going to let the matter rest and not deal with it any further.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) earlier in the day dealt with standing order 17, subparagraph 2 of which reads as follows:

> Whenever government business has precedence, government orders may be called in such sequence as the government may think fit.

I think this standing order applies to the business that is on the order paper rather than to business that has not yet been placed on it. I think that is rather the meaning of that standing order.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I did not submit rule 17 as being directly applicable. I submitted it only as an indication of a general theory that government business should be dealt with in the order in which the government saw fit to put it before the house. You will have noticed that I concluded by saying that if Your Honour felt that the rules were in too general terms to make it necessary for you to declare this motion out of order, I would ask our followers to vote it down.

Mr. Speaker: The other point about which I am concerned is this. Once debate on this amendment which relates to the Emergency Powers Act has been concluded, if later a continuation in force of the Emergency Powers Act is proposed, hon. members will then be up against a standing order which says that one should not indulge in repetition. Of course, we cannot anticipate points of order. We shall have to deal with that matter when we reach it. However, hon. members can see what my difficulty will be at that moment.

If we carry on this debate, which offers such a wide scope, and review the Emergency Powers Act in all its ramifications, then suppose, before the session ends—and I should like students of procedure to examine that point, not discuss it now; I just submit it—that legislation is submitted to the house, what will I do if someone rises on a point of order and says that the argument the hon. member is presenting is one which we heard on the motion to go into supply, on such-and-such a date, and he is therefore repeating his argument.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you would permit a question at that point? I wonder if that would not make it necessary for Your Honour to look at the records of last session when we had two debates on emergency powers, the first one on the bill to extend the Emergency Powers Act and the second one on an amendment to the motion to go into supply which was moved by the official opposition with respect to the exercise of the powers under that act. I suggest that last session we had the same two debates that Your Honour anticipates is possible this session, only they were in the reverse order.

Mr. Speaker: The fact that we had two debates last year does not necessarily mean that we must indulge in the practice of having two debates on the same question this session.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I think we can probably settle this matter quite shortly tonight in keeping with the course that you have indicated we should follow and that is not to enter into a long debate on procedure. Instead of rephrasing the amendment in exactly the terms which you have suggested, I wonder whether Your Honour would consider it would be satisfactory and would accomplish the purpose you had in mind if we rephrased it so that it would read:

> This house desires to record its opinion that the exercise of the powers granted to the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act is repugnant to responsible parliamentary government.

It is a small modification of Your Honour's suggested wording.

Mr. Speaker: Since the hon. member is in such a co-operative mood,—

Mr. Pouliot: He has no power of attorney.

Mr. Speaker: —may I suggest to him that instead of the word "repugnant" he use the words "incompatible with"?

Mr. Fulton: Quite.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member agree to that suggestion?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, indeed.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order as to the changing of an amendment once the amendment has become the property of the house. If you had not read the amendment to the house, Mr. Speaker, but had drawn to the attention of the movers of the amendment that you thought that, in its present wording, it was out of order, in my opinion that would have been your prerogative and your right and then they could amend it if they so wished. But once the amendment is read by you, Mr. Speaker, it becomes the property of the house and it cannot be amended without the consent of the house. I wish to draw to your attention that point which I think is a valid one.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is quite right.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps we could request the consent of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Once I have made my observations on the question of rules and have asked those who are responsible for the amendment to consider changing certain words and once they have agreed, I must of course ask the house if they will agree to the change. If the hon. member objects, it cannot be done. He is quite right in that regard. But when we are trying to avoid declaring amendments out of order and instead to compose the various difficulties which may surround a point, I do not see why hon. members would not agree to the minor changes which are being suggested.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, before giving my consent to the change I should like to know what was the meaning of the word "repugnant" used by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). That word has two meanings, a bad one and a philosophical one.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have made my comments and I have suggested certain changes in the amendment to make it more in accordance with the spirit of our rules. The opposition has agreed to change it so that it reads:

> this house desires to record its opinion that the exercise of the powers granted to the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act is incompatible with responsible parliamentary government.

That is the suggestion. Do hon. members agree to this amendment being changed in the manner I have indicated?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member does not agree then the amendment will remain as it is.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, if the things to which we took exception were always brought forward by unpleasant men it would be so much easier always to do the right thing and turn thumbs down on them. If the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was only an unpleasant bully, instead of a pleasant gentleman, it would be very much easier to argue against this measure. But I wish to stress the fact that we should not be led away merely because we think at the present time that the administration of this measure is in the hands of people who will treat it, as far as they can, with discretion.

I shall have occasion later on to quote from a speech by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) and I hope what I shall quote will be treated more sympathetically than the quotation made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). The quotation will be relevant and it will stress the fact that we should look at the relevant principle and not merely consider personalities.

I was very surprised at some of the words used by the Prime Minister this afternoon because it seemed to me that he was relegating the opposition to a position where we hardly counted in this house at all. One of the remarks the Prime Minister used in criticizing the resolution was that it was an attempt "to anticipate something which may or may not happen". I believe that is true. But I would suggest, with deference to the Prime Minister, that that is true of an extraordinarily large number of things we have to do in this life. In a very large number of cases we have to exercise discretion on something which may or may not happen.

Another remark by the Prime Minister which struck me very forcibly was this: "It may be that between now and the time when it would be necessary to introduce legislation there may be happenings which will make it clear to everybody that the power granted under this Emergency Powers Act would not be required." That, I believe, is very true and I think it is perhaps the greatest justification of all for the opposition to seek to intervene now, through a valid expression of grievance, to bring public opinion to the point where it will not wish to have this act on the statute books any longer. In other words, I hope that what we are doing today may be one of the happenings which will make it clear to everybody that the powers granted under this act will not be required.

The Prime Minister has suggested that the fact that the act was not used should be an endorsement of the sincerity of the government in this matter. I believe in a certain sense that that is true, but on the other hand it is an equally good argument that the act is not required at all. That is the argument I wish to put forward.

The third remark by the Prime Minister, to which I wish to refer, is this: "It appertains to the government to decide in what year and at what time it"—that is government business —"will be dealt with." That, I believe, is an unassailable proposition, but if the inference from that is that until that time the opposition must just wait and see, that we should not take the initiative, then I doubt if this proposition would be supported by the Prime Minister to the end. There was a famous British statesman who got into considerable difficulty because he practised the slogan of "wait and see". At least, he was accused of doing so. I can see no reason whatever why we should do so, nor can I see any reason why we should not press this resolution which reads:

> this house desires to record its opinion that the powers granted to the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act are repugnant to responsible parliamentary government.

That being our view, I suggest that it is not only our right but our duty to try to make that view prevail. Surely one of the chief duties of an opposition is to try to make the public stop, look and listen. We do not succeed in that as often as we would like, but we have occasional successes which help us on our way. We certainly cannot achieve any success unless we are able to try to attract public opinion to our standard.

I would like in that connection to quote from an authority for whom, in one respect, I have the highest admiration, because he is a professor at Queen's University. The only qualification I have in my respect for him is that he is a little unsound politically; I mean that he follows the Liberal standard. But I would like to read what he has to say and I hope it will commend itself to the gentlemen across the floor. I hope they will agree with me that the remarks I am about to quote fully endorse my view as to the duties of an opposition. I am quoting from page 108 of Professor J. A. Corry's "Democratic Government and Politics". He says:

> —there are always two or more sides to a story and the majority party has not heard all of the other side until the opposition has had its say. Concession to the arguments of the opposition follows oftener than is generally believed.

I would like to believe that. I think perhaps he is a little bit enthusiastic there, but at any rate I think we should always assume not only that what we say will be listened to with courtesy, but that it will be weighed; and even though we do not succeed as often as we would like, nevertheless what we do say does have an effect. The quotation continues:

> The public, despite its disillusionment, gets from the dramatic clash of parliamentary debate a grasp of the great issues of public policy which it cannot get in any other way until much larger resources are thrown into political education.

I believe the following is very important:

> Finally, the new laws made each year are only a tiny fraction of the old ones which are being administered day by day. Oppressive, wasteful, or neglectful administration will be a black mark against the party which presently controls the executive power if its behaviour can be given wide publicity.

I suggest that what Professor Corry outlines there covers fully the task we are seeking to discharge today, namely, to come to the House of Commons in the hope that public opinion is moving, in the hope that before long it will have moved to the point where, as the Prime Minister said, it may not be necessary—which in other words means the government will come to the conclusion it will not be necessary—to continue this legislation. I hope the fact that we have debated this today may have a very definite impact upon the government's attitude in this matter. If it has, then I think we shall have discharged our duty as an opposition successfully; and if it has not we shall have discharged our duty as an opposition not so successfully.

I want to read very briefly from the act itself just to remind people of the breadth of the authority. I think we all have to recognize that we have got used to the exercise of wide powers. There is a great danger that we in the opposition get far too used to it. I am quite certain that such powers must be very tempting indeed to any government because I am quite sure that busy ministers must find discussions in the House of Commons often very tiresome. They must often regard them as perilously near a waste of time. They would hardly be human if they did not feel they had an unusual allotment of wisdom, and so I think it is almost too much to expect that they will be always on the alert to cut down their own powers. I would think it would be unfair. I hope I never find myself, as a member of the opposition, suggesting that it is fair to expect members of the government to cut down their own powers. Therefore we are the only people who can bring the importance of their being cut down to their attention, always in the hope that we may have an effect, sometimes when we least expect it. But I do want to read one recital from the act which is as follows:

> And whereas it is essential that emergency powers be conferred to enable measures to be taken as urgently required from time to time to carry out adequate defence preparations, to regulate the economy of Canada to meet the needs of defence . . .

Having just read those words, I find it extremely difficult, Mr. Speaker, to understand why some of the orders in council passed since 1951 needed to be passed. They do not seem to me to be terribly emergent. I will make reference to one or two of them, and I would have thought they were passed not because there was a great emergency, other than to save the time and effort of the ministers, but because it was a very nice convenient way of dealing with the matter through this act rather than through what I suggest was the relevant act, which would have had to be brought back into the House of Commons and debated, with a resolution and three readings and all the rights of the minority, which are so precious to the minority and so important to our constitution but which I am equally sure sometimes become a little tiresome to government.

I find that an order in council was passed on December 6, 1951 exempting from customs duties personal gifts of a value not exceeding $25 from members of the Canadian forces serving abroad and addressed to relatives or friends in Canada. It does seem to me that the proper place to have done that was not under the Emergency Powers Act but under the relevant act, which I suppose is the Customs Act. I find one or two other cases. Here is one dealing with the licensing of pilots under the Aeronautics Act. I would have thought the Aeronautics Act might have been wide enough to deal with that. I find an order in council extending the provisions of the Defence Services Pension Act, and so on.

I suggest that those are instances of what happens when you get powers nicely concentrated with such broad words that, as the lawyers say, you can do almost anything except make a man a woman or a woman a man. I suggest that such powers are not desirable except in times of great emergency. Nobody denies that we are living in a world which is not free from some emergency and if there were no other way, if there were no other power available I might find it much more difficult to argue against this measure and to say what I am saying. But of course we are all aware of the War Measures Act. We are all aware that power can be invoked but that it is suggested that to do so would perhaps create a condition of alarm which would be undesirable. That, at any rate, is the argument that has been put forward.

I referred to the fact that a year ago we sought to have this act not renewed. At that time we were given various reasons, some worse than others. When the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) asked us to be content because any orders in council passed would subsequently be tabled and we would then have every chance to have them abrogated if we wished, I thought he was attributing to us powers which we really do not seem to have because, as I said before the dinner recess, I cannot remember cases where, after the government has taken action in that way, they have been prepared to recede. I should think it extremely unlikely that I or anyone else in the house will live to see that.

Of course the great objection to orders in council, as has been said so many times, is that there is no publicity. No one knows in advance what is going on. After the event we are faced with publicity, yes, so that we know what has been going on, but I think no one who looks at things in a matter of fact way will expect that it will be possible for us even to have such matters seriously debated. I think that would be far too much to expect.

We are asked to regard this power as something about which no one really needs to get very worried. The Prime Minister has told us that during his journey he found that a good many countries regarded our political enlightenment and our state of freedom with admiration. I can quite believe that. Of course one would need to know more about the state of the countries themselves. It may be it was not a very great compliment. But on the other hand no one is going to deny that we in this country do not live in a state of oppression or anything of that kind. But we come back to the fact that when legislation is left on the statute books which contains such great powers these powers may be quite innocuous in ordinary times and may be left there because nobody thinks it worth while to try to dispose of them, but we all know that in countries where freedom has been lost it was lost because people grew careless and because they did not take the trouble in more quiet times to see that such legislation was kept down to the minimum.

I want to refer briefly to a writer who has written something about the state of affairs in the United Kingdom. I always feel that the United Kingdom, with its centuries of common tradition, with its homogeneous population, with its traditions of freedom, with all the safeguards it has against loss of freedom, has an enviable position, and when I find that serious people in the United Kingdom are warning against the very same thing we are trying to warn against then I think it is well worth while to stop, look and listen. I propose to put a very short quotation on the record from a book I have in my hand entitled "The Passing of Parliament", the author being Professor Keeton, professor of English law at University College, London. I want to read briefly from page 199 of his book. In a way these are strange words coming from a serious Englishman, and I read them with surprise. I think we should take them seriously and I think they point a wise course for ourselves. He says:

> The problem which therefore faces all peoples which are still attached to the democratic way of life is to find some means of curbing the power of the executive, and preventing it from usurping the entire functions of government. The nineteenth century assumption that this would be achieved by successive extensions of the franchise has proved completely fallacious.

I do not think a single man in this house would challenge that statement, the idea that by a mere extension of the franchise we were going to increase and make more strict the public control over the executive. I do not believe anyone adheres to that idea today. I continue to quote from Keeton:

> The executive, as it has ventured to interfere increasingly with the lives of its subjects, has at the same time taken care to ensure that its servants and dependents (including the state-monopolies) are removed from the sphere of popular control. Its techniques grow ever more audacious. Today, in Britain, it is not only that wide powers of legislation, in fact if not in theory immune from parliamentary control, have been granted to the departments. In addition, these powers in turn are habitually delegated by the departments to its own agents.

As I had occasion the other afternoon to point out when we had the export-import bill before us, the definition of "minister" included, as I recall it, anyone to whom he delegated the power.

> Instances of sub-delegation to the fourth and fifth degree are not uncommon. In addition, the case of Earl Fitzwilliam's Wentworth Estates Co. v. Minister of Town and Country Planning illustrates how what has been called departmental quasi-legislation by circulars and explanatory memoranda, can acquire compulsive force.

> It is plain, therefore, that we are already approaching the dangerous half-light in which the boundaries of what is legal and what is not are barely perceptible.

I just want to go back for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to say that although we are assured there will be no trespassing on the powers given, I suggest that those orders in council to which I made specific reference were never intended to come under this act. They should have been dealt with under the relevant acts concerned. This just shows us how broad powers, which are such an easy method by which to do business, will be used more and more freely as time goes on.

As I tried to show a while ago, Mr. Speaker, I think one of the main duties of the opposition is to get the public to stop, look, and listen, and we try to make the public in this case believe that when we say this legislation is incompatible with responsible parliamentary government, we are saying what is true. We must hope that the public will come to our aid when we say there is no need for this kind of legislation. You can reach the necessary results in other ways. There is no need for leaving on the statute books legislation that it is quite clear is not necessary. I know the argument which has been used that standby legislation is good; that it is often useful to have a club behind your back. I do not think that is a sound argument for legislation. I hope that argument will not be made in this debate, although it has been made in this house. I can quite see that at times it might be convenient, but I believe it to be one of the most unsound reasons for legislation and one which we should regard with the greatest possible suspicion.

There is one other thing I want to mention, and this is where I can read from an article written by the hon. member for Vancouver South which appeared in the Vancouver Sun on February 19, 1953. I quoted from this article when I spoke on this subject a year ago, and welcomed the statement which had been made by the present member for Vancouver South. I quoted him with considerable satisfaction. I hope he is not going to let me down in what I am going to quote now. He says this, as it appeared at page 3309 of Hansard for March 26, 1953:

> It is no doubt true that there will be no serious abuse of the emergency powers, if they are granted for another year. But it is worth remembering that neither this Prime Minister nor this government will last forever.

That is quite an admission from a member sitting on the opposite benches. I suppose he would never have said that if he had been a Liberal member at the time. Then he goes on:

> Nobody knows who will head our government a year hence. A bad principle is a bad principle—and this is a very bad principle. A bad precedent is a bad precedent—and this is a very bad precedent.

Those words seemed to me to be wise a year ago, and I imagine that a year ago they seemed to be wise to him. I hope he will say nothing to undermine them in any way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for myself I am glad this subject has been brought up. I only wish we had loud speakers loud enough so we could din this into the ear of every voter. I recall that a year ago this measure produced a phenomenon which has almost never happened in this house, and that is that two members sitting on the government benches voted against the government. It reminds me of a very interesting comment on our house that was made the other day by an observer temporarily here from England. He said one thing that interested me greatly. He had this comment to make about the government party. As I am going to tell in some detail what he said about the government, I perhaps had better be frank enough to say that what he said about the opposition was not entirely to my liking, either.

About the government, he said something that goes to the very root of parliamentary government. He said that if in the British house you had a majority such as you have in your house there would be all kinds of little ginger groups, all kinds of people with views of their own that they wanted to express. You could not possibly discipline them as well as they are disciplined in your house.

I mention that just to conclude with the hope that, as a year ago when this measure was before us there were members on the government side who voted with us, possibly that phenomenon may happen again because it seems to me it would be a healthy and wholesome thing to happen in this house.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): This matter, Mr. Speaker, is very easy to understand. The Emergency Powers Act will cease to exist on May 31 next unless it is renewed in the meantime. Those are the facts. What surprised me very much was that the first motion sponsored by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) after the renewal of confidence that has been given to him by his supporters was this very motion which is untimely, in fact it is premature, uncalled for and futile.

What surprised me more than that was that it was supported by my very good friend, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), who was one of two Conservative members of parliament at the time who accompanied their former leader, Lord Bennett, to the union station. He had tears in his eyes. My hon. friend will remember that he was accompanied at the station by the late Dave Spence. They were the only two there; and poor Mr. Bennett had tears in his eyes, thinking that Dufferin-Simcoe was not there, Dufferin-Simcoe whom he had created a privy councillor.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that the fact that someone was accompanied by hon. members at the union station has much relevancy to the amendment now before the house. And, further, the hon. member should refer to another member by calling him "the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe" and not simply "Dufferin-Simcoe".

Mr. Green: On a question of privilege; I am sure my good friend, the hon. member for Temiscouata, would not wish to be in error. Actually there were three of us who saw Mr. Bennett off. It was very, very, early in the morning, and the rest of the party had said good-bye to him the night before.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank my hon. friend for his correction, but I suggest that he look at the newspaper files and he will see that he was alone, with Dave Spence.

Mr. Green: The newspapers are not always right.

Mr. Pouliot: I am through with the sad part of past recollections. Now, sir, at the present time we have legislation which may be repealed or which may be continued. To act with wisdom it is necessary for the government to take matters under advisement, just the same as judges do before rendering their judgments.

The Leader of the Opposition is far from being a mind reader. He does not know at all what happens behind the closed doors of the privy council—unless he peeks through the keyhole; I do not insinuate that he does that—although some do, some from his own party. I am not going to dot the "i's" and cross the "t's", but I refer to actual facts which are well known to all members in the house.

Now, what was in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition? What was in the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) who supported the amendment? The only ground upon which the Leader of the Opposition based his argument was the fact that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) had come with an order in council when the question of extending the Emergency Powers Act legislation was before the house.

Then, besides that, he spoke about the rule of law. What does he know about it? He spoke about the fundamentals of parliamentary practice. What does he know about them? He spoke about things which are foreign to him, and I shall prove it very clearly. The Leader of the Opposition quoted some extracts from speeches delivered in the house in 1921 by Mr. Mackenzie King when the Meighen government was in office, and in 1935 when the Bennett government was in office.

Mr. King was heaping anathema on the Meighen government and the Bennett government, which were supported by the Leader of the Opposition. Did he say then that Mr. Mackenzie King was a great man? No. He criticized Mackenzie King at the time—and I was supporting Mackenzie King. He now quotes and praises the anathema of Mackenzie King against the Meighen government and the Bennett government.

With the experience I have in parliament, an experience much longer than that of the Leader of the Opposition, may I give him a piece of advice. When I was fighting Bennett, he was an appointee of Howard Ferguson, holding the office in Ontario of commissioner of securities. I will give him this piece of advice: "Let the dead bury their dead".

Mr. Hodgson: You should have given them advice in Elgin and Peel.

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell my hon. friend that the Leader of the Opposition, who has been boasting that he would make progress, has made no progress at the by-elections today. It would be better for the hon. member not to interrupt too much, because—let me tell him that I can use a secret weapon more deadly or deadlier than the one Samson used when fighting the Tories of his time, the Philistines.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It may be that the house would prefer to listen to the remarks of the hon. member, although they are somewhat foreign to the amendment before us. However it is my duty to call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he must come back to the question under debate.

Mr. Pouliot: I said it, sir, I used the word "Tory".

Mr. Hodgson: Get off the comic page.

Mr. Pouliot: Now, sir, here is a gentleman —and I say that because, personally, as a private individual, he is a gentleman, and this gentleman—honourable gentleman—has used the denunciation of his party by the leader of the Liberal party as an argument in protest against legislation which is actually in force. He says: This debate is not academic. Well, where does his amendment lead? It leads to nowhere; it is a trip to nowhere. And if the hon. gentleman knew the rule of law, if he knew parliamentary practice, if he knew British parliamentary practice, he would have done as Your Honour suggested. Instead of sponsoring a silly amendment like this he would have sponsored a bill, and would have been on record to show his sincerity by asking for the repeal of the legislation he complains about.

Far from it. He went to great length to say that hon. members were grimacing; that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was grimacing. And he was very much high-hat with no less a gentleman than the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel). He may hear from him in due course. I am not the only one who can speak to him through the chair. Well, that was it.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra made another excellent argument. He said that the speech of the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) was foolish. He said it two or three times. What arguments! What powerful arguments to crush the Liberal party! Imagine! And they are surprised that the people do not take them seriously. They have no political acumen, not the least bit of it. It is unfortunate. I will chide the opposition to be strong; I will chide the opposition to be worthy of its functions, to establish the rule of law and to maintain the best traditions of parliamentary practice. What can we expect? We had the performance this afternoon; grimacing, foolish, that is all.

There is more to it. It is the very designation of the act, the Emergency Powers Act. It is a very important one. Is the hon. gentleman who sponsored the amendment ready to say that there is no emergency in the world at the present time? Is the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra ready to say that there is no emergency on the coast of British Columbia when he has told us so many times that he is concerned about the invasion of the Pacific? Nobody spoke about it as much as he did, and it was a long time before the Korean war. Do they know what is an emergency? Do they realize that at the present time the condition of the world is giving concern to people who have more experience than both of them put together? And here just for political purposes they make an attack on the government. They come with an olive branch saying that they are like the doves that came out of Noah's ark. They come with an olive branch of peace. They are not serious. The Canadian people do not consider them serious. They realized at the last election that the leadership of the Conservative party was not—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not the time to discuss what happened at the last election. I would again ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the amendment which is before the house and which I know affords the hon. member ample scope for him to express his views.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of Opposition (Mr. Drew) said at a meeting of eight people in Verdun-Montreal that the supporters of the government were sheep. I want to show him that there are rams among the supporters.

Mr. Fulton: Also bores.

Mr. Pouliot: We are spoken of as members who follow blindly the dictates of the government. We have confidence in the government and we have no confidence in the official opposition. That is our position; we have no confidence in them. Why? Because they are not serious. If they used their judgment for one minute they would realize that in times like these it is essential for the government to be in a position to take action if action is needed. For instance, let us visualize the attacks that could be made by air in a very short time. Would the government have the time to call parliament together to discuss all these matters? Action would have to be taken at once in case of such an emergency, and then the action of the government would be submitted to parliament which is supreme, as is acknowledged by all.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pouliot: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Does he think that the Emergency Powers Act should be continued beyond the 31st day of May?

Mr. Pouliot: Wait and see. That was the victorious answer of Herbert Asquith to the Tories of his time and I am very glad that my hon. friend is not one. I say that in all sincerity. I am for the maintenance of the privileges of parliament, and not only of parliament as an abstract body but of each member of the House of Commons. To recall old memories, I remember when old Mr. Bruce of Toronto could not speak at one time, and I took his defence—although I did not agree with him—because I wanted him to have the right to say what he thought right, probably. We are all for the defence of our institutions, of the privileges of parliament, and it is precisely on account of that that it is my duty to oppose very strongly the futile amendment of the Leader of the Opposition.

I have said enough for the time being. My concluding words will be that as a Liberal I am glad to see him as Leader of the Opposition once more, because when the Tories select a leader they always choose the wrong one.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I always appreciate listening to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) who does enliven the house with his delightful humour. When he made reference today to the jaw bone used on a previous occasion I might say that his own would give great competition in that respect.

This debate, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, has become very academic because what we have in essence is an amendment protesting a statute which apparently is not in practical operation. I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member who has just taken his seat say that the government requires this legislation in the case of an emergency such as an invasion of this country. Now of course that is stretching it to the breaking point because we all know that the War Measures Act is still in operation, or could be called into operation at any time, and that would be the statute under which the government could meet any emergency. The Emergency Powers Act, about which this amendment protests, apparently has not been used since it was last endorsed by this parliament. If I understood the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) correctly, I understood him to say it has not been used since the last time it came before the house.

That being so, it seems rather strange that there should be such a great deal of breast-beating about the whole thing. In addition to that, I think it has now been made clear that the debate is getting to the point where the members on the government side and the members of the official opposition are ready to admit that it all depends on which side of the house you happen to be sitting which attitude you are going to take. First we have the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) saying, in his delightful manner, that he is not surprised that the opposition is criticizing the government for arrogating unto itself great powers because if he were in the opposition he would be inclined to do the same thing. Then a little later the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) made the statement that he is not surprised that the government does not wish to reduce its own powers, because if he were in their position he would not want to do that either. So there we have it. It depends on whether hon. members happen to be on the government side or in the official opposition as to the attitude they take.

On the point that would really matter, namely whether either the members who support the government or the members of the official opposition are prepared to use any of these emergency powers to bring about any changes which would be to the benefit of the country as a whole in order to meet any of the existing emergencies, I think it is now becoming clear that they do not disagree; they are both for the status quo, and it appears to me that they are almost in violent agreement on that point. For example, wide powers are given to the government under the act. I admit that. Let me also say—and I am speaking for myself—that I have no objection to wide powers being given to the government by this parliament or by any parliament provided those powers are used for the purpose of meeting real emergencies and bringing about solutions to them in the interests of the general public welfare.

Referring to the act itself, we find in section 2, paragraphs (d) and (e) and further down in subsection 3, powers that would enable the government to meet almost any ordinary emergency, with perhaps the exception of war. For example, in paragraph (d) such things are covered as transportation by land, air or water and the control of the transport of persons and things. Then in paragraph (e) such things are covered as trading, exportation, importation, production and manufacture. Then in subsection 3 we find this provision:

All orders and regulations made under or pursuant to authority conferred under this act have the force of law while this act is in force.

That indicates that the powers granted there are fairly wide. But the question is this: What has the government done or what does it propose to do to make use of these powers in order to meet some of the emergencies which are before the country today? I have not heard at this point whether the government intends to use any of these powers. We have been told that in the past year they have not been used; on such issues that face this country as inflation, for example, we have been told that the government has not the ordinary powers to reimpose price control. There are such issues as unemployment. Then again we are told that owing to our constitutional position the government lacks the power effectively to do anything about it. We are faced with a great grain surplus in western Canada. Again, no action. There is a question of social security.

Only today we have an example of the blinding speed with which the government moves, when the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) tells us that, even though as far back as twelve months ago we had a forecast of certain legislation dealing with pensions for crippled persons, to date he is not able to say when it is going to come before the house; and it may not come into operation until the end of 1954. That situation indicates that the government is not using even the ordinary powers and procedures which they have at their command and that the Emergency Powers Act in itself is only an adornment. As far as I can see, the only purpose it has been serving in the past year has been to gratify the ego of the government because it certainly has not been used to meet any of the emergencies which have arisen and which are facing the country. That is why I say I believe this debate is academic in the extreme. With all due respect, I say that the official opposition are protesting against something which the government claims they are not doing.

Going back over some of the debates in the past we find, of course, that when the Liberal party was in opposition the speeches made by Liberal members on that occasion about some of the orders in council and some of the legislation passed by the then administration were almost word for word what we hear from the official opposition today. I submit that the real questions before us are being sidetracked and forgotten in the midst of this flurry of excitement about an inoperative piece of legislation. As I looked back, it just struck me that in 1951, when this act was being put through this parliament, or in the same year, there appeared in the Western Producer, which is a widely-read weekly paper in western Canada, an editorial which should almost be required reading for every member of the government. It is dated October 11, 1951. I should like to quote just one short paragraph in order to point out what should have been engaging the thinking of this parliament and of the government instead of pretending that something is going to be done under powers which they now tell us have not been used. Here is the opinion expressed by that paper:

It is only too distressingly evident that the talk of a better, a more just economic order has not gone beyond the talking stage. The present prosperity and the various large-scale government undertakings for aiding those in need are in reality a false front. They owe their existence to the huge and growing activities devoted to defence and preparation for war. We are living in a war economy. To realize this let the reader try to envisage what would happen if by some miracle sure and certain peaceful understanding between the nations of the world were suddenly established. That glorious news would be followed by so calamitous a depression that it is hard to believe that our economy would survive it. For it would mean a sudden halt to all armament production, thousands of factories would be closed, hundreds of thousands thrown out of work. We strive and pray for real and lasting peace yet ignore or are completely unprepared to meet the catastrophic shock to our whole economy which would be the inevitable result of real enduring peace.

That is a challenging editorial and I think it underlines what I have been leading up to or have been attempting to say, namely that unless the government is prepared to meet the emergencies of the day, to do some long-range planning to meet the situations which may arise, legislation of this sort serves no purpose. Those situations are already casting their shadows before them. The unemployment figures themselves indicate that what the editorial said in 1951 was only too true. We have cut back national defence spending by only a small amount, both in Canada and the United States, but its effect is already being widely felt. What has the government to put in its place?

Those are the real issues facing this country, not only today but in the years to come. Those are the things that we in this parliament should be debating and planning for, not wasting our time and energy fighting about an Emergency Powers Act which was passed in 1951, which was renewed year after year and which the Prime Minister now tells us was not even used. Why worry about something which is not even being used? So far as I am concerned, I feel that the government has not made the best possible use of the resources they have had at their command. For my part I would say that it is of no use to carry on the statute books legislation of this nature which appears to be only for the purpose of pretending that something is going to be done when there is an emergency, that the emergency is recognized, and that the government is prepared to do something about it. That is not the case.

I appeal to the government on the grounds that the issues facing the country today are small in comparison with what they will be in two years' time. I hope I may be proved wrong, but that is what I believe at the present time. Instead of cluttering up the statute books with emergency powers and acts of parliament which are never used, I say let us make use of the legislation which already exists, let us make use of the facilities we already have, and let us do some planning for the future. Let us prevent a catastrophe in which even wider powers may be sought by this government.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a principle involved in this motion now before the house which requires serious consideration. I did not follow the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) who has just spoken in many of his arguments, and particularly in regard to that in which he claimed that if the positions were reversed in this house and the opposition sat on the treasury benches the same powers now reposing in the government would be sought by the opposition. I do not believe that suggestion has been made by any hon. member of the opposition so far. Nor did I follow the hon. member in his argument that because the Emergency Powers Act has not been frequently used we should pay no attention to it.

I believe it is the duty of parliament to examine anything in the nature of extended powers asked for by the government, and to examine whether these powers are necessary. The amendment now before the house is simply the medium by which a redress of grievance is being sought, and a medium by which the opposition may draw to the attention of the people of Canada the fact that the power vested in the executive is greater than it need be, and that that power should be checked.

There has been considerable criticism in recent years of the decline in the power of parliament and the corresponding increase in the power of the cabinet. Many commentators on political affairs have written on that aspect of the matter, and it has been discussed, of course, in the House of Commons on many occasions.

Earlier this evening my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), quoted from a work by Professor Corry. I would also like to quote a passage from page 649 of the same volume. The professor was dealing with the problem of whether the democracies are travelling along the road towards dictatorship, and he was also dealing with this problem of the decline in the power of parliament and the growth in the power of the executive. The professor has this to say:

> Yet the democracies are still a long way from such a concentration of power—

That is, compared with a dictatorship.

> —and it is open to them to halt these trends before they reach the monolithic state. There is now much more concentration of power in the democratic governmental structure than there was in 1900 and this is not without its alarming aspects. But it is not necessarily beyond human ingenuity to find improved methods of control as counterpoises to the aggrandizement of the executive and the growing predominance of national over local, and state or provincial, governments.

That, the professor says, is the crux of the matter. This particular act to which we have been referring simply points up the attitude of the executive as an attempt to encroach still further upon the prerogatives of parliament. It is the function of the opposition to draw attention to that encroachment.

This afternoon the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) dealt with some of the functions of the opposition as he saw them, and I believe that in many of his remarks he was perfectly accurate. He suggested it was the function of the opposition to harass the government, attack the ministers, and to criticize and oppose. In that statement he is on very firm ground.

Sir Ivor Jennings, who has written a very useful book entitled, "Cabinet Government" based on parliamentary experience in the United Kingdom, has something to say with regard to the function of the opposition. I believe what he says is of importance because there is often a misunderstanding in the public mind and sometimes in this house as to the function of the opposition. But this is what he has to say on page 439 of his book:

> It is not untrue to say that the most important part of parliament is the opposition in the House of Commons. The function of parliament is not to govern but to criticize. Its criticism, too, is directed not so much towards a fundamental modification of the government's policy as towards the education of public opinion. The government's majority exists to support the government. The function of the opposition is to secure a majority against the government at the next general election and thus to replace the government. This does not imply that a government may not be defeated in the House of Commons. Nor does it imply that parliamentary criticism may not persuade the government to modify, or even to withdraw, its proposals. These qualifications are important; but they do not destroy the truth of the principle that the government governs and the opposition criticizes. Failure to understand this simple principle is one of the causes of the failure of so many of the progeny of the mother of parliaments and of the supersession of parliamentary government by dictatorships.

Another remark by the Secretary of State attracted my attention. He said the function of the opposition was to criticize and oppose, and he rejected any idea of joint responsibility. Yet I suggest there are occasions when there is some joint responsibility in the House of Commons. For example, we find a certain measure of that joint responsibility in the realm of external affairs, and the view has been adopted here that in order to present a united front to the rest of the world on external affairs there should be no marked difference of opinion in this house. That would be a sound approach if full information was given to the opposition.

Sir Ivor Jennings deals with that point on page 465 of his book and I would like to quote. Speaking of the opposition he said:

Sometimes, indeed, it agrees not to oppose. This is particularly true of foreign affairs. For the enmity within is as nothing compared with the enmity without. The suggestion that the nation is divided gives encouragement to enemies abroad.

He then goes on to give examples from the British House of Commons where the opposition was taken into the confidence of the government so that a united front in foreign affairs might be presented. Sir Ivor Jennings points out that the giving of information to the opposition was particularly necessary where secret agreements prevailed so that should there be a change in government the incoming government would be aware of these obligations. I therefore suggest that there are occasions on which there is a certain measure of joint responsibility. Sir Ivor also points out on page 466:

Further, agreement may be made with the opposition to secure the settlement of a question which has so long divided political parties that an agreed solution becomes necessary.

We in this country may not have had anything as critical as that, but that has been the English experience. There is another reference, and this is related to the whole question of the powers which the executive has gradually been taking to itself within the House of Commons. The Secretary of State said that the government derives its power from the House of Commons and modified it to say, from a group within the House of Commons, which is of course accurate. The government derives its power actually from the party. Parliamentary government as it existed in the nineteenth century has been modified in the twentieth century to become, as Professor Corry calls it, party government. That fact must be recognized. The cabinet is supported by the party system and is dependent upon it to maintain itself in office. For example, Jennings says on page 439:

It is said that the House of Commons controls parliament.

Theoretically that is so because measures have to be passed by parliament, but in actual fact the control rests elsewhere. He goes on to say:

But, in truth, the fundamental criticism of the proposition is that it ignores the party system and thus ignores the fact that, through the party system, it is the government that controls the House of Commons.

The Secretary of State, in dealing with the question of the government not disclosing certain information on motions for the production of papers, went on to suggest that it was not the members on the treasury benches who voted down such motions but that it was the house that did so. But surely that is ignoring the party system completely. Members who are supporting the treasury benches naturally are not going to vote against their leaders in the House of Commons unless they wish to face disaster. Our system depends on party government and the party must remain intact or the government fails to maintain its position. That, I think, is a fact which is sometimes overlooked. The power of the executive depends of course upon the solidarity that it can maintain within its party in the House of Commons. For example, consider this passage on page 441 of Mr. Jennings' book:

The member of parliament is thus returned to support a party. He recognizes his party obligations by receipt of the "whip"; if he disagrees with the party policy on a particular matter, he may abstain from voting. Occasionally, perhaps, he votes against his party. If he does so too frequently, he loses the "whip"; and this means probably, the loss of party support at the next election. Without that support, he will probably not be elected. Also, his party loyalty as well as his self-interest will induce him normally to vote with the party. . . Above all, a supporter of the government is very unlikely to take any step which will defeat the government. For, if it is defeated on a major issue, it will resign or dissolve parliament. If it resigns, he has assisted the formation of a government by the opposition, which is, ex hypothesi, worse than that which he was elected to support. If parliament is dissolved, he will have to undergo the trouble and possibly the expense of an election; and it may not be certain that he will be re-elected.

Consequently, as the Secretary of State said, the members of the treasury benches certainly do not vote down these motions themselves. They vote them down with the support of the party behind them. It is thoroughly understood here that that is what happens, and we would be the most surprised people on earth if the treasury benches rose in support of a measure and all their supporters took the opposite stand. The party system is thoroughly established as part of our system of parliamentary government, and it is on that party system that the executive is dependent for its support.

With regard to the Emergency Powers Act, I have never been able to see the necessity for such additional powers being sought by the executive. I have never been able to see any force in the argument, "Oh well, you can trust us; we will not misuse our powers." I see no force in the argument, "we have not used them very often". We had an example last year of the use of the Emergency Powers Act in the tabling of an order in council under that legislation while parliament was still sitting. We have the example of a secret order in council which apparently stands or falls with the Emergency Powers Act. It is my opinion that there should never be in Canada such a thing as a secret order in council. I do not think that under our democracy secrecy is necessary along that line.

If it is important that something should be withheld from public knowledge, then that would be one of the instances when at least the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leaders of the other opposition parties should have some information as to a matter of such importance. The government has power without passing legislation such as the Emergency Powers Act. The experience of the British house is a case in point. Jennings is very useful in directing our attention to that. At page 447 he says:

> British governments are in fact expected to govern. If necessary, they are expected to act even when they have no legal powers. They can rely on their majorities and on the common sense of the house to rectify their acts. There is and can be no limitation on retroactive legislation. A government can act first and ask for approval afterwards. It can declare war though it has not the power to place the forces on a war footing though it is the duty of the government to summon parliament at once.

May I interject there to say that in 1939 the services in Canada were placed on a war footing almost two weeks before parliament assembled and declared war against the enemy. Was there any question at that time about the government exercising power that was not inherent in its prerogative? I do not think so. That met with the good sense of the people of Canada and of members of the House of Commons. The government has these powers without passing legislation such as the particular act that has been mentioned tonight. But Professor Jennings goes on to point out that when such actions are taken by the government, the immediate summoning of parliament is necessary so that it may be informed and may give its approval of the acts of the government.

The weakness in the Emergency Powers Act, as I see it, is that the government may act without summoning parliament and therefore can keep from the people of the country information that should be available in a democracy. Surely, as we pointed out earlier this afternoon, there is no longer any difficulty about summoning parliament rather quickly. Transportation has developed to such an extent that the house can be called together with dispatch. Why, therefore, grant to the cabinet the power to act without parliament being called to pass on those decisions? It could so happen that five months might elapse after action taken by the cabinet under the Emergency Powers Act, and parliament would not receive the information until it had again been convened.

Under the practice as we have known it in the past, established over the centuries in the great tradition of British parliamentary democracy, governments are certainly expected to act and make decisions, then to have their acts ratified as quickly as possible by parliament. The information is conveyed to parliament, and through parliament to the people. It is against this seeking of power by the cabinet that we make this protest. We make this protest fulfilling the function of the opposition, and hopeful that we may influence the government to restrict its desire for power.

We are still more hopeful that we may catch the ear of the people and inform them of what is being done here; inform them that their liberties are in danger. It is essential that our parliamentary system be maintained, that our democratic institutions be maintained in their full vigour. It is the duty of the opposition to draw attention at any time that it observes the power of the House of Commons is being diminished in any way by an increase in the power of the executive.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): On the amendment that is now before the house, Mr. Speaker, I find myself in the position of being on the horns of a dilemma. I am unalterably opposed to emergency powers being in the hands of the governor general in council. I cannot see the reason for any such need. It is my honour to come from a constituency in Vancouver. From Vancouver, on the far western coast, we can come to Ottawa by aeroplane in about thirteen hours; by train, we can be here in four days and three nights. I cannot conceive of such an emergency as would require emergency powers in peacetime, or why any decision of the government could not be submitted to parliament itself.

I have an objection to special powers. I can remember back in 1934 when a Liberal premier in British Columbia introduced the special powers act, known as the S.P.A. Later it became known as the supreme provincial asininity. In that act every power of parliament was taken into the hands of a lieutenant governor in council in British Columbia. I want to admit that the powers were never once used in any way whatever, and several years later the act was repealed. But I cannot see any reason for these strict emergency powers being in the hands of the governor general in council.

Whilst I condemn very much in principle the transference of the powers of parliament on an emergency basis into the hands of the governor general in council, at the same time I condemn the method whereby the official opposition has drawn this matter to the attention of the house. It is my personal opinion that it has been done completely on the basis of political expediency. In my estimation it could have been done on the basis of principle by using other methods. This afternoon I was interested in listening closely to the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). I agree completely with the principles that he espouses, but I do not agree with all the arguments that he used. If my memory serves me correctly, when he spoke about dictatorship and bureaucracy he should have recalled that the greatest instance we ever had of dictatorship and bureaucracy was under a Conservative government under the late R. B. Bennett. During the election campaign he told us he was going to blast his way into the markets of the world, and his word was accepted by the electors of Canada. The depression continued, and the only blasting was that he blasted himself into an earldom in Great Britain.

These remarks may seem rather strange coming from a member sitting in the opposition. I am not speaking from the brief experience I have had here, but from twenty years' experience as a public servant. I will admit that for perhaps the first three or four years that I had the honour of being a public servant I went after the government from the opposition side. However, I learned a lesson and a principle. The principle was, and I still maintain it, that I will never say anything from the opposition side in parliament, denouncing the government or demanding action from the government, that I do not think I could put into effect if I were on the opposite side of the house. I do not believe the official opposition is attacking this matter from that basis.

I was most interested in the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this afternoon. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that on this matter of the amendment now before us I believe the Prime Minister made a statesmanlike reply. He stated that there is now on the statute books the Emergency Powers Act, and it will remain there until the end of May. The government has not yet made up its mind what it is going to do. I do not like to try to be a prophet, but I do not believe the government is going to ask for the continuation of that measure. As I said, that act will be in effect until the end of May. If the government in its wisdom does not introduce a bill that measure automatically dies.

So all the hours, and the thousands of dollars we have cost the taxpayers this afternoon, go out the window. If the government, in its stupidity, brings in a continuation, we will then have the opportunity, when it brings in the bill, to have a debate; when we know what they have in mind. We can debate it then, as we have been discussing the matter this afternoon.

So perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you will understand what I mean when I say that I am on the horns of a dilemma. In principle I am unalterably opposed to this transference of the powers of parliament to the executive, the cabinet. I am unalterably opposed to that. At the same time I am also unalterably opposed to the method in which this question is now raised in the House of Commons, and the hours of time it has taken up.

So, sir, I shall make my position clear: If the government does not bring in a bill for the continuation of this measure, then I say, "more power and more credit to them". I do not think it is necessary. If an emergency arises, parliament can be called inside of a week. Then if the government does bring in a bill, I intend to have something to say, and it will be at far greater length than I have spoken now.

However, an amendment is now before the house. It has not been ruled out of order. If I may say so, sir, that is the only criticism I have of the Prime Minister. I think he made an interesting, statesmanlike, practical and logical presentation this afternoon, but he did not carry it to its ultimate conclusion of asking you, sir, to decide whether or not the amendment is in order. I think he should have. However, that was his business, not mine.

I do think, sir, that we should get to a vote. Let us wait until the matter comes up, and we will speak on the government's action at that time.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member speaks, perhaps I should comment briefly on the last sentence of the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). It is the duty of the Speaker to make up his mind as to whether a motion is or is not in order. That is his duty, no matter who, from either side of the house, asks for a ruling. I do not think the hon. member's statement should remain without some comment on my part.

If I have not decided that the amendment is out of order, it is because I have not found sufficient grounds to do so. I think I quoted enough authorities to show that I was somewhat confused about what I had discovered. If I had found the amendment was out of order it would have been ruled out of order. It was not so ruled because I did not find justification for doing so.

Mr. Winch: I think you are a marvellous Speaker. I have enjoyed all your decisions. I pointed out that you were not asked to give a decision. I think you are doing an excellent job.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should know that I do not have to be asked to give a decision. When I receive an amendment it is my duty to examine it and, without a request from anyone, to make a decision; it is my duty to render one. Had the Prime Minister made no comment at all I was considering the amendment and would have made the comment I have made, in just the same way. That is what I wish to have clear.

The hon. member for Eglinton may proceed.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, it is about two minutes to ten. Perhaps we might call it ten o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Fleming the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we will continue this debate, and if the motion to go into supply is carried we will take the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, and then the Department of Transport.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.58 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, March 23, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. G. E. Nixon (Algoma West) presented the first report of the standing committee on industrial relations, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC INSTRUMENTS

TABLING OF NOTE TO WASHINGTON ON CHICAGO DIVERSION

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am tabling two copies, in English and in French, of Note 169, dated March 10, 1954, from the Canadian ambassador in Washington to the Secretary of State of the United States, concerning House of Representatives Bill H.R. 3300, relating to the diversion at Chicago of the waters of lake Michigan.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF FLOOR PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): May I be permitted to direct, to the Minister of Fisheries or his parliamentary assistant, a question which is based on a statement in the Montreal Gazette this morning captioned "Newfoundland Fisheries under Ottawa ruling." Will the minister inform the house if the new arrangement between the government and the Newfoundland fisheries industry means that floor prices may be placed under that industry?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): In the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and his parliamentary assistant, I shall take the question as notice and draw the attention of the minister to it upon his return.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

INQUIRY AS TO REPEAL OF P.C. 3486, OF JULY 4, 1951

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? In view of his statement of yesterday that it might be possible to deal with the subject matter of order in council P.C. 3486 of July 4, 1951, in some other way, has consideration been given by the government to repealing that order in council? As the Prime Minister knows, that is the secret order in council.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The matter of whether or not there is legislation sufficient to ward against the dangers that were contemplated by this order in council is still under consideration by the law officers. Until we get their report the other question will not arise for consideration.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY AS TO OPENING OFFICES SATURDAY MORNINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Has the Minister of National Revenue given consideration to a temporary rearrangement of office hours for some employees in the income tax offices across Canada, so that taxpayers might be offered an opportunity to visit such offices on Saturday mornings and certain evenings to obtain assistance at this time when they are wrestling with their income tax returns?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The matter referred to, Mr. Speaker, is one of administration and such matters are continually under review by the department. In most of our offices, but not in all, the five-day week is operative now. Our experience has shown that in former years there has been no great demand for keeping our offices open on Saturday morning. In view of the fact that in almost all districts business offices are closed on Saturday morning, we do not consider that it would be advisable to open our offices. If it were done it would involve overtime or compensatory leave for employees; and at this time of the year we are usually short-handed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GENEVA CONFERENCE—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what arrangements have been made by the Canadian government for representation at the conference to be held at Geneva next month in relation to affairs in the Far East, and what instructions, if any, are being issued to the Canadian delegates?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In answer to the first part of the question, I hope to head the Canadian delegation to this conference, myself, and will be accompanied by certain advisers. No instructions have yet been provided for the guidance of the Canadian delegation.

Mr. Fleming: In the absence of those instructions, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what position is going to be taken by the Canadian delegation?

Mr. Pearson: I understand there is to be an opportunity for discussion of external affairs on Thursday. No doubt this and other questions might be discussed at that time.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

INQUIRY AS TO PROCLAMATION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. This question is supplementary to one I asked him on December 14. I might say also that it arises out of a very interesting tour some of us—

Some hon. Members: Speech.

Mr. Knowles: —were permitted to make—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Knowles: —through the kindness—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to realize that he had better ask his question.

Mr. Knowles: Apparently the Liberals will not even permit me to—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister say whether a date has yet been fixed for the proclamation of the new Food and Drugs Act, and what progress is being made in recruiting personnel for the inspection required under that legislation?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The date has not yet been settled, but we hope to be able to do so at the earliest possible moment.

SUPPLY

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

The house resumed, from Monday, March 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on a government motion to resolve the house into committee of supply it is not only a traditional opportunity but it is, as I conceive it, the duty of the official opposition to raise questions that are matters of essential grievances on the part of parliament and the Canadian people.

Here we have before the house a matter of serious parliamentary concern. It should not have been necessary, indeed, to introduce an amendment to debate the matter in the house, but it has become necessary because of the fact that this government is so wedded to power, arbitrary power. Not only is the government reluctant to give up power, but, sir, it is reluctant even to submit such questions for discussion in the house.

It will not be forgotten that as early as November 18 of the present session, noting that the speech from the throne was silent on the important subject of the Emergency Powers Act, I made so bold as to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this question, as reported at page 122 of Hansard:

> May I ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government to ask parliament at this present session to extend the Emergency Powers Act?

To that question the Prime Minister made this not very informative reply:

> That is a matter of policy about which information will be communicated to the house in due time.

What is "due time"? Apparently "due time" has not yet arrived. Therefore those of us who are not prepared to bide the time of a tardy government consider this an eminently proper occasion to put this matter squarely before the house. And the house will have an inescapable opportunity to say whether it is proper to condone, under today's circumstances, the continuance of arbitrary powers in this government.

The government is having trouble to make up its mind on this question, as the Prime Minister conveyed to the house yesterday.

Well, let us take due account of the indecision of the government, and let the house, then, assist this indecisive government with respect to this question.

What is the background? The background is one of a succession of statutes under which this government has been seeking sweeping powers ever since the emergent days of the war. First it was the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act; then it was the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act; then it was the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act, followed by the Emergency Powers Act—and now by the various extensions of the Emergency Powers Act.

Sir, our amendment will invite the house to record its opinion on this question. The amendment is as follows:

this house desires to record its opinion that the powers granted to the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act are repugnant to responsible parliamentary government.

Sir, the Emergency Powers Act is a notorious measure; it is time it was expunged from the statute books of Canada. It is a blot on the records of the Canadian parliament. That statute is the measure of the extent to which, under today's conditions, there has been under the pressure and leadership of the present government a departure from parliamentary processes and responsible government. This statute, if it is left where it is, will continue in force until May 31. Sir, it should not be allowed to run its course; it should be removed from the statute books of Canada without further delay.

Mr. MacDougall: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: There will be an opportunity for my hon. friend, who took a very praiseworthy course on an earlier occasion, again to express that true conception of the relationship between the government and parliament which on a noteworthy occasion last year he was courageous enough to express. I am looking forward to seeing him exhibit the same courage he did on that quite unusual occasion.

Those who sat in the house last year will well recall the debate on the government measure to continue the Emergency Powers Act for another year, from May 31, 1953, to May 31, 1954. And those same members will not have forgotten that the official opposition, fought up hill and down dale against the continuation of that measure, at every opportunity and every stage. The position we took then was a position of complete, outright and irreconcilable opposition to the continuation of powers of this kind. That was our position at that time, and on August 10 last year, and it is our position today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, Oh.

Mr. Fleming: It will not be forgotten—

Mr. Speaker: Order. When there is so much turmoil in the house it should be kept in mind that a point might be brought up on which I would have to rule and, under present circumstances in the house, I would have to admit that I had not heard. I am sure hon. members would want me to hear the hon. member who has the floor. Therefore I would ask them to be silent.

Mr. Fleming: One of the features of the debate which occurred last year was the participation in it of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). He has not yet participated in the present debate. I for one look forward to hearing what he may have to contribute to this debate today.

It will also be remembered that last year some hon. Liberal members of this house did express grave concern over the continuation of these powers. Indeed, one of them had the courage to stand in this house, the then hon. member for London, Mr. Jeffery, and say that he could not support the continuation of this measure were it not for the fact that we were almost certain to have an election in the then succeeding months, and there would be no parliament to be called into session if an emergency did arise.

It will not have been forgotten, either, Mr. Speaker, that the measure to extend this statute passed on second reading only after the Prime Minister had spoken and had given certain very sweeping assurances to the house. Those assurances were to this effect, that the government would not make use of those powers except under the compulsion of grave necessity. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, he said, as you will find recorded at page 3319 of Hansard of March 26, 1953:

I hope it will not have to be used at all.

Well, with these assurances ringing in their ears, the house, on a majority vote, decided to give the government the extension of power for another year which it then so urgently sought. What became of those assurances? The record is quite clear and all too fresh.

Let me first ask the question as to the extent of those powers. The extent of those powers, Mr. Speaker, is such that to most intents and purposes the governor in council may do everything that parliament may do. The words of section 2 of the Emergency Powers Act are sweeping in their breadth. Section 2 reads:

2. (1) The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may by reason of the existing international emergency deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

Notice, if you will, the unqualified breadth of these statements, Mr. Speaker. The terms that follow are set forth only for the purpose of clarification. The section proceeds:

and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it is hereby declared that the powers of the governor in council shall extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:

And there follows an enumeration. The only limitation placed by this statute upon these powers, so sweeping and broad in their full amplitude, is to this effect, that those powers do not include the power to make orders or regulations in relation to:

(a) arrest, except as incidental to proceedings under section three, detention, exclusion or deportation of any person;

(b) censorship or the control and suppression of publications and writings; or

(c) expenditure of moneys otherwise than in accordance with an appropriation by parliament except expenditure of moneys from any fund or account established by order or regulation in connection with a scheme of control for the purposes of that scheme of control.

There you have, Mr. Speaker, powers that would make any dictator swoon with envy. And, sir, how do they compare with the powers in the statute which the government tells us they do not wish to have occasion to invoke, namely, the War Measures Act? Well, sir, the language of the War Measures Act is virtually identical with that of the section now under discussion with the exception of these excepting words which I have mentioned, and indeed not even all of them. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, with the exception of the power that I have mentioned, it is perfectly clear that under this notorious measure the governor in council possesses power to do everything that the sovereign parliament of Canada itself can do.

This is the year 1954. Why should parliament be any longer a party to abdicating power given to it by the people, given to it by the constitution, in favour of a group of men whom we call the cabinet? Sir, I submit to you that powers as sweeping as those cannot be justified in a democracy in this year of grace 1954.

How does the government justify them? They can only justify them, Mr. Speaker, on the basis of the assertion by parliament of the existence, not in 1944 or 1945, or in the years immediately following the war, but today, 1954, of such an emergency that democracy cannot be permitted to proceed in its normal constitutional and traditional manner.

[Mr. Fleming.]

The statute speaks of an existing international emergency. Well, that is what the statute spoke of in 1951 when it was placed on the statute books. I put this question to hon. members opposite: What emergency exists today that is of such a nature that it cannot permit of the continuation of normal constitutional parliamentary processes? What condition exists either in Canada or in the world today that requires that there be on the part of parliament this abdication of powers, that no self-respecting parliament can possibly justify abdicating in favour of a small group of men? What the government has had to say in past time in trying to justify continuation of these sweeping powers under the guise and pretext of emergency was indeed vague. We know the dangers that lurk in the assertion by parliament of the existence of an emergency, sir; for ever since the Nolan case it is clear, if there were any doubt before, that the courts of this land will have no power to examine into the facts to determine whether such a declaration on the part of parliament has authority or justification or not. If parliament will simply say in legislative terms that there exists in Canada today an emergency, then, under that decision, power flows to parliament to legislate even at the expense of the constitutional powers of the provinces.

Sir, we of the official opposition assert that there exists neither in Canada nor in the world today any such condition as justifies this overturn of the processes of democracy.

I next ask the question, sir, what use has been made by the government of those sweeping and arbitrary powers? First, I say, sir, that since this measure was brought into being in 1951, a total of 25 orders in council has been passed under the authority of it: in 1951, 19; in 1952, 5; in 1953, 1.

In the second place, what has been the nature of these orders in council? Well, there has been quite a variety and assortment of them, Mr. Speaker, but this characteristic is common to all of them, that parliament was competent to do everything that every one of these orders in council did.

The third feature is this, Mr. Speaker, that whether parliament was in session or not matters not a whit to this government in exercising these powers. If it happened to suit their convenience to proceed by order in council rather than submit the proposed measure to parliament for enactment here by the elected representatives of the people they went ahead and put it into effect by order in council.

In 1951 the session of parliament began on January 30 and extended to December 29. It is true that parliament was not actually sitting every day of that period; but if you will simply count the days that parliament did actually sit right here in this room and in the other place you will find, sir, that twelve of those orders in council were passed while parliament was in session.

In 1952, of the five orders in council passed under the authority of this measure three were passed while parliament was actually physically in session here. In 1953 the one order in council that was passed was passed while parliament was in session. Therefore you see, Mr. Speaker, that of the total of 25 orders in council passed under the authority of this notorious measure 16 were passed while parliament was actually sitting here, assembled here for the purpose of doing the business of the country and meeting the legislative needs of Canada.

Let us examine a little more deeply into this question of legislating while parliament is in session. March and April of last year saw events in this house that ought to be carefully observed by every student of constitutional history and by every citizen who is alive to what the rule of law has meant in buttressing the liberties of Canadians and those from whose example we have drawn these liberties. I have mentioned, sir, that the bill was given second reading following assurances given by the Prime Minister to the house on March 26, 1953, very solemn assurances, if I may say so, and it was on April 17 that the government opposite proceeded to tear to shreds and tatters these solemn assurances given to the house by the Prime Minister and accepted by the house in good faith.

What then happened? Without saying a word to parliament the government, on Friday, April 17, went to work and under the authority of the Emergency Powers Act passed order in council No. 1953/604. It was a measure relating to the control of contraband on the China seas. It was not made public on Friday. The house was in session that Friday. It was in session morning, afternoon and evening that day, but not a word was said to the house. On Monday morning, April 20, when here in session the house actually was dealing with amendments to the Canada Shipping Act, of the very same subject matter as the order in council then three days old, still preserved in official secrecy.

The house had certain amendments before it on that Monday morning, April 20, in committee of the whole. It dealt with those amendments and the measure in due course was given third reading and sped on its way to the other place. Fifteen minutes later, after that measure had safely taken its departure from this house, with a delicate sense of timing the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) came into the house and announced, in the ears of a dumbfounded House of Commons, that this order in council had been passed dealing with the very subject matter that had been before the house only minutes previously.

The official opposition on that occasion, as on this occasion, did its duty and introduced a measure of censure and invited the house to express its censure upon a government that had proven itself so callously, so deliberately forgetful of the promises and solemn assurances given to the house by the Prime Minister less than a month before. You will recall how completely, how tragically the whole attitude of this government towards the House of Commons, towards its constitutional responsibilities, was revealed in the course of that debate by the spokesman for the government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), when he uttered these memorable words recorded for all time in Hansard at page 4197:

> If we have overstepped our powers, I make no apology for having done so.

Sir, no Cromwell, no Hitler, no Mussolini, could have put in plainer terms his dictatorial concept of the function and power of government.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have been listening very intently to the remarks of the hon. member, and possibly I should have risen earlier. The hon. member, in language which was very carefully selected, did, in my view, imply that some hon. members have shown bad faith toward the house. He did not mention any one in particular. But later he went on to say, after having referred to one or two cabinet ministers, that they had deliberately forgotten the assurances they had given to the house. The hon. member's language was couched in such learned terms that I did not want to take issue with him and ask him to be careful about the language that he was using, but I am afraid that the leniency I have been showing has perhaps given him some encouragement. He has now reached the point where, I think he will agree with me, the words he has just addressed toward the Minister of Trade and Commerce are not parliamentary. To say of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he has used language which Hitler or Mussolini would have used—

Mr. Drew: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: I see that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) considers that I am not citing exactly what the hon. member said. I do not want to entertain an argument as to what was said. I remember the incident when, after prolonged debate, Mr. Speaker Macdonald could not get the transcript of the notes immediately and had to wait a few hours until he did get it. I have heard exactly the expression used by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and I think that in substance I am citing it exactly as I heard it. It may not be word for word, but I am asking the hon. member to withdraw those words unconditionally.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I shall be happy indeed to abide by any of your rulings. As you know, the words that I used—

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Fleming: Just a moment, please—with reference to the statement made in the house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce were these, that no Cromwell, and others, could have used language—

An hon. Member: Who were the others?

Mr. Fleming:—better calculated to express their conception of power than the words used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on that occasion. I am sure you will give me credit for this, Mr. Speaker. If I had had any idea there was anything unparliamentary about those words I would have refrained from using them. With the greatest respect, I did not undertake to refer to the minister. I referred to his language, and in my humble submission that unfortunate statement by the minister should be open to the strongest form of censure in this house. I am dealing with the words he used and I confined my remarks to the words he used. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I intended nothing unparliamentary. I was not speaking of the minister personally. I confined my remarks to his language.

Mr. Speaker: I know that sometimes it appears to be difficult for hon. members to withdraw words. When I was a private member I was never called upon to withdraw words, perhaps because I did not take part in debates as often as some hon. members do. To me it is a simple matter to withdraw words which are considered by the Chair to be unparliamentary. Now, the hon. member is reasonable, and I say that in my view it is offensive and unparliamentary to attribute the comments he has to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who is also the Minister of Defence Production. Indeed, had the hon. member used the same words in relation to any other hon. member of this house I would have felt exactly the same way and I would have asked the hon. member to withdraw. I am sure the hon. member would not have used that expression if this, for example, were just at the end of the war. To say of a cabinet minister that his attitude is comparable with that of Hitler or Mussolini is unparliamentary and I do not believe the hon. member would want to insist upon having these words on the record no matter how strongly he wishes to censure the government at this time. See Beauchesne, third edition, citation 260, which states that no member can be allowed to say that a minister has transferred himself from a constitutional minister into a tyrant.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Fleming: I do say again to you, sir, with the utmost respect—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am asking the hon. member to withdraw.

Mr. Fleming: I still do not know, Mr. Speaker, what you are asking me to withdraw, but such is my love for you that I will withdraw anything. I am very glad though, Mr. Speaker, that it does not lie within the power of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to withdraw what he said on that occasion. His words are there for all time and they are there for all Canadians who value their rights and privileges to look upon.

If I cannot use the language to which I am accustomed, then I will simply have to resort to Shakespeare:

> Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed,
> That he is grown so great?

There were two hon. members of the house who on that occasion showed a most commendable degree of courage. The first was the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall). I was hoping he would be in the house at this time. Perhaps he is here. I can hear his voice but I cannot see him. The other member was the then hon. member for London. Be it said to the credit of these two hon. members that for the sake of principle they courageously voted against the government on that occasion and expressed their disapproval of what the government had done.

May I also remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the use of the powers vested in this government has been accompanied by the sort of thing which goes with the exercise of powers such as these in the way in which this government has exercised them. It has bred lawlessness in this government. You will remember very well, Mr. Speaker, that one of the 25 orders in council has been kept secret. Although when parliament passed the statute it called for a tabling of these measures, nevertheless one has still been kept secret from the public by the government.

One last fact worthy of note in relation to the use of the powers under this act is that since that notorious order in council was passed on April 17, 1953, the government has not found occasion and has not even found the need for any further use of these powers by way of pretext or excuse for the continuation of this measure.

We have had given to us time and time again the threadbare argument that the government must have standby powers in case the international situation should take a turn for the worse. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am going to suggest to you that that argument has been overworked. It is a dead horse now.

In the first place, parliament should be doing the legislating. Parliament can be called to meet upon very short notice. In 1950 parliament met on three days' notice. In the second place, parliament is capable of swift action in an emergency. If we do not believe that, if we do not believe that parliament is capable of appreciating the existence of an emergency and rising to the need in meeting it, then, Mr. Speaker, we have indeed betrayed parliamentary government. Parliament is capable of meeting these situations and we were elected for all such purposes.

In the third place, there evidently will be no election this year. It need not now worry any hon. members that there may not be a parliament in existence for any period during this year.

Then, sir, if an extreme emergency should suddenly and unexpectedly arise, I say to you, sir, that in the first place parliament ought to be summoned. If it is a matter of the gravest emergency, of the kind which faced this country in 1914 or 1939, there are on the statute books statutes capable of dealing with it. There is standby legislation already there.

Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that we of the official opposition have never suggested that the War Measures Act should be invoked in reference to any of these situations to which the government has referred as a pretext for asking parliament to vest in it these emergency powers. We have said no emergency powers are needed to deal with any existing situation.

Let the house remember that there are vast powers conferred on this government by parliament in other measures. Let me remind you, sir, of the very wide powers conferred on this government by the Defence Supplies Act. Under section 3 of that act the Minister of Trade and Commerce may:

> (a) buy or otherwise acquire, exchange, process, develop, repair, maintain, store and transport defence supplies;
> (b) acquire, store and maintain stocks of strategic materials, and other materials or articles entering into the manufacture of defence supplies or the construction, development, repair or maintenance of projects, and sell or otherwise dispose of such materials or articles and use the whole or any part of the proceeds . . .

And so on. These and more extended provisions in keeping with the sweeping powers conferred upon this government are in the subsection I have just read.

Consider also the provisions of the Defence Production Act, section 15 of which provides that the same minister:

> . . . may, on behalf of Her Majesty and subject to the provisions of this act,
> (a) buy or otherwise acquire, utilize, store, transport, sell, exchange or otherwise dispose of defence supplies;
> (b) manufacture or otherwise produce, finish, assemble, process, develop, repair, maintain or service defence supplies or manage and operate facilities therefor;
> (c) construct or acquire defence projects and sell, exchange or otherwise dispose of them;

And so on. That, and another following long list of very wide powers, have been conferred upon the government through the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Let me also remind you, Mr. Speaker, that last week this house approved the extension for a further period of three years of the powers conferred upon this government in relation to the import and export of goods, and giving the governor in council power to impose limitations on the export and import of goods, particularly of strategic materials, except under government licence. Here are sweeping and ample powers adequate to meet the needs of legitimate government necessity under any situation now existing or likely to arise.

We must examine this situation in its essence. Parliament, a free and unfettered parliament, is and historically has been the champion of the rights and the freedoms of the people. Tie the hands of parliament, force on the part of parliament an abdication of its functions and its duties and you have taken the first long step towards intrusion upon and invasion of the rights and privileges of the people.

I have been speaking of the essence of the parliamentary method. The essence of the parliamentary method is just this: Parliament is elected to do all the legislating that is required in the interests of the Canadian people. It is of the essence of the parliamentary method that parliament alone legislates. It is also of the essence of our parliamentary system that the government is responsible to parliament. It is likewise of the essence of the parliamentary system that parliament functions in public, for the public to see and to judge and for the public to bring responsible public opinion to bear upon members of parliament.

We are seeing here a renewal of the historic struggle between parliament and the executive branch of government. We see here in this situation and in this parliament, sad to say, a completely inverted relationship. We see a government supreme, tyrannizing over parliament. We see it using its sweeping powers in a way that no government should use them. We also see, Mr. Speaker, existing side by side with parliament another law-making body, namely the governor in council. That is a body that does not meet in public but meets in secret, and whose processes are not open to public review and cannot be observed by the public or by parliament before decisions are taken. It is not a proper legislative body, yet it is existing side by side with parliament here as a legislative body. It is functioning in secret and it can function with a quorum of four persons. Mr. Speaker, this is a carryover from the mentality of the war. Surely the time has come for this house to emancipate itself from the mentality of the war. When, if not now, will the government give up these sweeping and arbitrary powers? We have present in this measure all the elements needed to transform the Canadian democracy into a Canadian dictatorship and to transform the Canadian confederation into a centralized form of government. I do not say that this government is going to do that, Mr. Speaker; but our concern in parliament must be not to place it within the power of any government to work that wrong upon our constitution and upon democracy.

Mr. Speaker, under this measure and measures like it there has been under this government a decline of parliament, of respect for parliament and in the position of parliament. In putting forward this amendment we on this side of the house are fighting for the restoration of the power, the prestige, the dignity and the supremacy of parliament. We are fighting for the restoration of democracy. We are fighting for the restoration of parliament to its full vigour and stature as the champion of the rights and freedoms of the people. We are fighting for the restoration of the integrity of the constitution of this country, which has been badly battered at the hands of this government. In a word, Mr. Speaker, we are fighting for the restoration of responsible government. On the vote on this amendment there is now given to every hon. member the opportunity and the challenge to show by his vote where he stands on the issue of responsible government.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) or the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe).

Mr. Knowles: Is this a speech?

Mr. McIvor: Is there any amendment asking for—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are not in committee. This is a debate in the house. If the hon. member wishes to speak, he may do so but if he wants to ask questions he may not expect an answer unless the people to whom he is directing his questions are prepared to reply at the moment and make a speech themselves.

Mr. McIvor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Then I will ask myself the question. Is there before this house any amendment asking for the repeal of this act? I ask myself another question. Is there on the order paper any request for the extension of this Emergency Powers Act? If not, what are we talking about? To me it is just like one who talks to beat the air. We are talking about something that does not exist.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the remarks made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) prompted me to rise at this time. He is incorrect when he makes the statement that the amendment now before this house gives to hon. members an opportunity of voting on the Emergency Powers Act. That statement is incorrect. Actually there is nothing before this house but a lot of noise.

For a start, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), on the motion to go into supply, moved an amendment to the effect that legislation such as the Emergency Powers Act is offensive to the parliamentary institution. There is not any argument about that fact. There are, however, some things we must remember with regard to the Emergency Powers Act. First, that act is not before the house at the present time and it may automatically cease to exist at the end of May. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made that point quite clear. We are therefore not discussing the Emergency Powers Act at all. There is no proposal to amend it. As to the hon. member who just took his seat, of course it is his job and that of the opposition to beat the government and to prove to the people of Canada that they might do a better job. But I suggest that he is wasting a lot of energy because we are four years away from the time when that would be possible. I think the official opposition are shooting off their ammunition a little bit early, and that their timing is off.

Mr. Harkness: We have lots of ammunition.

Mr. Gillis: It has not been demonstrated in this debate.

Mr. Harkness: That is a matter of opinion.

An hon. Member: Shooting off blanks.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gillis: I like to try to be fair about these things. When the Emergency Powers Act came into existence, the hon. member and all members of this house voted for it.

Mr. Fleming: That is not correct, Mr. Speaker. An examination of the record clearly shows that this measure, on third reading in 1951, passed on division. If the hon. member looks at the record he will find that in what I had to say I was extremely critical.

An hon. Member: Were you against it?

Mr. Fleming: Yes. The record clearly shows that it passed on division.

Mr. Gillis: I am not going to quibble about that matter. In 1952 it was passed unanimously. But what brought it into being? The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) made it quite clear that we should not place the government in the position of having to invoke the War Measures Act if certain things had to be done when members were not here. Mind you, I am not saying that I agree with all the things the government does by order in council, but I also want to say this. Regardless of whether the Emergency Powers Act was there on the statute books or not, orders in council would be passed. The revoking of the Emergency Powers Act does not take from the government the right to pass regulations and orders in council. That right would still be there. I call to the attention of hon. members the fact that when section 98 of the Criminal Code was enacted there was no Emergency Powers Act. Nevertheless, a highly offensive statute was placed on the statute books of Canada at that time without an Emergency Powers Act. It took us a long time to get clear of it. I do not need to remind the hon. member what party was in power at that time. All of this argument, to the effect that we are going to abolish orders in council, the right to make regulations and all that kind of stuff by getting rid of the Emergency Powers Act is not correct.

I am afraid that as I see this debate developing, and from what I have read in the press during the past few weeks on other issues, it would seem that most of the arguments I have heard in this debate are a repetition of what I have read in the press from certain sections of Canada concerning taxing powers. I feel it is well that members should understand that. So far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to stand up in my place and vote on this amendment, thereby leading the people of the country to believe that I am voting to get rid of the Emergency Powers Act; that is not correct. All there is before the house at the moment is an attempt on the part of the opposition to beat the government on this question of too much power.

Now, let us take a fair look at the proposition. All members have stated that while these emergency powers are there, the great objection to them is that they have not been used; that they were not necessary. If they have not been used, then there has not been any undue exercise of power by the government. What brought the Emergency Powers Act into being in the first place was the fact that we were living in a very insecure world. The legislation is offensive because we do not want to be living in that kind of world. When you have to have that kind of legislation it is an indication you are living in that kind of world. In my opinion it is still that kind of world. While you have an uneasy armistice in Korea, no one can say that the war could not flare up again overnight. There was no formal declaration of war when that act of aggression took place. Our allies are fighting in Indo-China, and we are part of that war because we are part of the NATO set-up.

Some members say that it is only a matter of hours to get the members into this house from across Canada. So far as Ontario and Quebec are concerned, that may be true. It certainly is not true of the other parts of Canada. We had the experience of being called here during the railway strike, for example. It was impossible to come here by train, and it was impossible to get here by aeroplane within the time prescribed. I know that I had to drive up here in an automobile. Flying weather is uncertain. It is not correct to say that members can get here within a matter of hours. I suppose the thinking behind that statement is that nothing exists east or west of Ontario and Quebec, because that is the thinking in so far as other things are concerned. It certainly is not correct to say that the members could be here in a matter of hours.

So far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to vote on this propaganda statement; that is exactly what it is. When the Emergency Powers Act is before this house, if it does not expire in May, so far as I am concerned I shall look at the bill in the light of the circumstances then existing in the world. I am not going to fool anyone now or let anyone fool me into thinking that I am voting on that act this afternoon. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) talked about legislation and the great exercise of powers. I have said a good many times in this house, and I am prepared to say again, that so far as the province from which I come is concerned, if more power were exercised by this government a lot of the chaos that exists in industry and in other fields would not exist. I am not quarrelling with that at all. We have not got the power to legislate upon a lot of the matters upon which we should be legislating. I hope the time will come when we will have that power, because without greater activity on the part of the central government it is impossible to get equality of opportunity in many fields across this country.

I am not prepared at any time to maintain Canada as ten little Canadas rather than one big Canada. There is a lot of legislation that we should be handling in this parliament that would be in the best interests of the Canadian people, but unfortunately there are constitutional bars to that consideration. They will have to be ironed out through the regular democratic processes in consultation with the provinces. I rose to speak because, when the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) was taking his seat, he stated that every member of this house now had the opportunity of showing where he stood on the Emergency Powers Act. I wanted to make it quite clear that he was not fooling me. So far as I am concerned, he is not going to fool the country into believing this vote has anything to do with the Emergency Powers Act. I will oppose the government on a lot of things they are doing, and they would be doing those things if the Emergency Powers Act were not there, such as making agreements, arrangements, and issuing statements to the press that should be issued in this house. However, that has nothing to do with this debate. So far as I am concerned, I am going to vote against this motion, and reserve my vote for the time when the matter is in issue.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I should like, if I had no other reason for rising to my feet, to offer congratulations to the two last speakers. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) by asking two questions shed more light upon this whole matter than had been shed by several preceding speeches from the opposite side of the chamber. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) continued the work of clarification that was begun by the two questions asked by the hon. member for Fort William. I wonder whether the hon. member for Cape Breton South will permit me to continue the process a little bit farther?

There is not only as he has suggested the matter of creating great sound and fury in this chamber in connection with this general subject matter. There is something even more serious than that involved, in my opinion, and that becomes quite clear when one carefully reads the resolution moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). It reads:

> this house desires to record its opinion that the powers granted to the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act are repugnant to responsible parliamentary government.

Who granted those powers to the governor in council, Mr. Speaker? This parliament did so by the Emergency Powers Act. What the hon. member is urging, instead of bringing in a bill to repeal the Emergency Powers Act, is that parliament should criticize parliament for having given those powers to the governor general in council. Now, I know that it has been customary for our hon. friends in the opposition to attribute to the government, as if it were the fault of the government, the actions of this parliament, upon the ground that members of parliament who were elected to support the government should not carry out the mandate they have received from the people, upon the rather strange ground that they should not support government legislation when they come to parliament. But I would suggest, sir, that in casting their votes in this parliament in a manner to carry out the mandate they have received from their electors, they are not acting in any capacity other than as members of parliament, and the law which they vote for and the law which is passed, in this case the Emergency Powers Act, giving these powers to the governor general in council, is a law for which none other than parliament is responsible. Therefore, it seems to me that, sir, without raising any point of order—because I understand Your Honour has said Your Honour is prepared to receive this resolution which we are now discussing—it is very regrettable indeed that a statute which has been passed by this parliament—

Mr. Knowles: By the last parliament.

Mr. Garson: Yes, by the last parliament, but by the parliament of Canada at the time—should be stated as a grievance which the opposition tries to raise against the government on a motion to go into supply. Because, Mr. Speaker, if it is possible to do that in connection with this particular statute, why is it not possible in respect of any other statute on the statute books of the country? In that way, sir, a small minority group in this parliament could postpone indefinitely parliament getting into committee of supply to consider the estimates—which, in my judgment, is one of the most important functions parliament has to perform, and one which is not always too well or too faithfully discharged because of the tendency upon the part of certain members in the house to protract debates upon other matters, so that there is not time left properly to consider the estimates.

As the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has pointed out, at least by implication, surely if there were a sincere desire here to permit the house at this time to vote upon the question of the Emergency Powers Act, the proper method to have followed would have been for the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) to bring in a bill to repeal the Emergency Powers Act.

It is quite true that if he did not bring in that bill, the present act would expire by the mere efflux of time on May 31 next—and without all this debate and sound and fury. And it is also true that if, under the world circumstances existing in, we will say, the middle of May next, the government considered that it was warranted in asking parliament to give another year's extension of the powers in the Emergency Powers Act, a debate would then ensue upon that piece of legislation, in connection with which all the oratory we have heard today, in the abstract, could be much more pertinently, more relevantly and therefore more cogently applied to the question as to whether these emergency powers should or should not be extended for another year.

But if my hon. friends of the official opposition, not being content to wait for a few weeks until they could see what precisely were the circumstances in which the question as to whether the Emergency Powers Act should be extended would be decided, desire at this present time to have the house vote upon the principle of the legislation, then surely the sensible course for them to have followed would have been to bring a bill into the house to repeal the present Emergency Powers Act forthwith.

Nothing could be more ridiculous than that they should ask parliament to censure parliament in respect of that for which only parliament is responsible, namely the passage of the Emergency Powers Act, giving certain powers to the governor general in council. Supposing this amendment were to carry: would not the Canadian parliament cut a fine figure among intelligent people throughout the world when it became known that, in 1954, it had solemnly got together and, after careful consideration, upon motion of the Leader of the Opposition, had solemnly resolved that parliament——desires to record its opinion that the powers granted to the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act are repugnant to responsible parliamentary government.

Or, in other words, my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition is asking that this parliament in 1954 move a vote of want of confidence in itself for what it did in 1953; only that and nothing more.

And it is not as if he needed to employ this particular vehicle to register the dissent of his party in this matter. For, by merely the efflux of time, perhaps the whole matter would have cleared itself without any debate at all. But if he could not wait until that time came, and wished to bring the matter before parliament in a form in which we could vote upon it with some dignity, then he should have brought in his bill forthwith to repeal the Emergency Powers Act.

For that reason, and for that reason primarily, and without going into all the arguments which the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) repeated this afternoon, I should think for perhaps the third or fourth time in the house, for my part I am quite content to vote against the amendment upon the ground that it is purely vexatious, and that it would be highly embarrassing to parliament itself for us to pass it.

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, the smokescreen of complicated verbiage which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has just tried to throw all around this question has been extremely well done. I congratulate him as a producer of smokescreens. There is nothing he can say, however, which can hide the essential fact of this case; and the essential fact of this case, as I see it, and as my colleagues see it, is that we do not like to have a government with secret controls, secret powers, and broad powers which are not subject to constant control and review by the House of Commons.

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend permit a question? If my hon. friend does not like that, why did not his party bring in a bill to repeal the act?

Mr. Hamilton: I am glad the minister has asked that question, because I am coming to it. In the course of his remarks he made the statement that it would not be right for parliament to censure parliament, and referred to the possibility of parliament in 1954 censuring parliament in 1953.

Mr. Speaker, the system of Canadian government is such that parliament is composed of certain parties. The gentlemen who now form the government belong to a certain party. Any action this amendment suggests is not censuring parliament as such; I would feel that it is more definitely censuring actions this government has taken in past years, and particularly in 1953, when, over the vocal opposition of this party, it insisted upon perpetuating this iniquitous legislation.

I was most interested yesterday and again today to hear certain references to past statements by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) and—I do not know which title to use, whether it should be the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) or the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I was just thinking how these clarified certain issues, and that at this point those gentlemen might be all right if only they could shut their mouths retroactively. Since they cannot do that, we have now set on the record for all time to come an attitude which is not good for the perpetuation of a free democratic government in this country.

It seems to me that it is wrong in this enlightened mid-twentieth century that this government, not this House of Commons but this government, should wish to deprive this house as a whole of powers which men have fought and died for almost since the dawn of history.

Three names were linked earlier today in a certain connection. Two of them were fairly recent, the third was not. The third was that of Cromwell of many hundreds of years ago. In the fight, turmoil and heat of that time we forged traditions and principles which have come down to us almost intact until the present time. During the past war the government instituted certain measures which may have been necessary at that time, but which they have perpetuated unto the present in a most unnecessary fashion.

It is almost axiomatic that once powers have been conceded to an executive committee for a special emergency—and originally that was the basis of this legislation—there is a deep-rooted resistance by that executive to the suggestion that they should be surrendered, even though the emergency is long past. It seems to me that was made crystal clear by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself yesterday in only one sentence, Mr. Speaker, when he said in the course of his remarks, as reported at page 3217 of Hansard:

> I do not foresee any immediate occasion or any immediate reason for having to exercise the powers under the act.

If there is no immediate occasion and if there is no immediate reason, why then does he remain silent in the face of the repeated suggestions that these powers should be repealed? He does not want them; the government say they do not want to use them; and yet they want to keep them for some indefinite, unknown, vague reason in the future. It is the most specious argument, Mr. Speaker, that it is possible to introduce in support of this legislation which we dislike so vehemently.

A book was published recently called "The Passing of Parliament". Were I in a position to do so I should like to make it required reading at least for the gentlemen of the treasury benches, because it might gnaw at their vitals a little bit. As was pointed out very clearly, some of the things they are doing are not perhaps in the best democratic tradition, and there is one quotation from this book that I should like to introduce at this point. It is found at page 7, and reads as follows:

> In the last half-century there has been a shift in the centre of gravity from the floor of the House of Commons to the offices of the great departments of state, where in reality policy is framed. Parliament becomes year by year less of a governing council and more of a censor of executive acts.

It is hardly in the tradition of this house, and particularly it is hardly in the tradition of this great party, that we should sit here quietly and acquiesce in that shift and in that gradual closing down and further and further delimitation of the powers, responsibilities and opportunities of this house to examine the legislation which comes before us. Because this issue is so clear, because it is so definite, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that I need to take up any more time of the house save for a moment to look once again at the wording of this amendment. It is one of the interesting aspects of this debate that the amendment has been repeated so many times. Perhaps the reason for that is that the amendment carries within itself the great weight of debate that should force people to vote in its favour, because it says:

> this house desires to record its opinion that the powers granted to the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act are repugnant to responsible parliamentary government.

The powers which are granted under that legislation are powers which should normally be exercised by this house. To the extent that they have been taken away from this house we have lost something which has been traditionally and rightly ours. To the extent that the gentlemen on the treasury benches and the others behind them, who speak so little, oppose this amendment, they are defending the type of government, or the tendency toward the type of government, which is one that we have fought against and as a nation we have opposed throughout our history.

I have one more thing to say. I am delighted to see the gentlemen over there and the gentlemen to my left working together and agreeing in their attitude on this legislation, because, Mr. Speaker, if there is one thing which the gentlemen to my left will need if—and I hope it never comes—they come into power in this country, it is some measure by which they can cloak the actions which they will want to take to turn us into a socialist state, some measure by which, without proper supervision by this house, they can proceed to do things which the people of this country would not want to approve. And I suggest that when we see these two groups linked in opposing this amendment we begin to see come out from underneath the dark clouds and from underneath the covers some of the very objectionable features of this government.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of the house a grievance having to do with a motion adopted by the committee on agriculture during the last session of parliament recommending that the government should consider the advisability of referring the Canada Grain Act to this committee on agriculture for study at a future session of parliament. Also, the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in reply to a question I asked him on this matter on December 16. My question, as reported at page 970 of Hansard, was as follows:

Can the minister say whether the committee on agriculture and colonization will be called together early in the new year in order to review the Canada Grain Act, as recommended by that committee at the last session of the house? As the minister is aware, it would be called for the purpose of discussing the question of overages and box car distribution.

To this the minister replied:

My hon. friend is aware that it is not the duty of any minister to call committees together. As a member of the committee in question, my hon. friend is in a position to do so. I have no amendments to the Canada Grain Act to recommend. There will be later in the session matters that I will wish to refer to the committee; but the subject matter of its business, I assume, will be determined by the committee.

I asked this supplementary question:

Has the minister any objection to the government's carrying out the committee's recommendation, that the Canada Grain Act be referred to the committee on agriculture for study?

To this the minister replied:

I have nothing to do with the matter. If the committee meets and desires to undertake that work, I shall endeavour to co-operate. But I have no wish either that it should be done or should not be done.

Following that statement by the minister, Mr. Speaker, I communicated with the chairman of the agriculture committee, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), and I suggested to him that the committee should be called together to consider whether at this session we should undertake a review of the Canada Grain Act.

In reply to my letter the hon. member for Provencher pointed out, I believe quite correctly, that according to the standing orders of this house a committee can only consider matters which have been referred to it by the house. Therefore, according to the chairman of the committee, the committee can undertake a review of the Canada Grain Act only when a motion is passed by the house directing that such a review be undertaken.

On Monday, March 15, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) presented a motion to refer the annual report of the Canadian wheat board, together with the annual report of the board of grain commissioners, to the committee on agriculture. My point is that in that recommendation there was no inclusion of a study of the Canada Grain Act as recommended by the committee on agriculture during the last session of parliament. On the important issue of reviewing the Canada Grain Act, which has not had a general overhaul since 1930, the minister says it is up to members of the committee. Then when a member of the committee endeavours to have the committee undertake such a review he finds that, according to the chairman, a committee can undertake the review only when matters are referred to it by the house and when those matters are included in its terms of reference.

I think that the members of the committee on agriculture last session unanimously came to the conclusion that it was time for an overhaul of the Canada Grain Act. Certainly they came to the conclusion that it was time a thorough study was made of the provisions of the Canada Grain Act.

The Canada Grain Act came into existence in 1912, being a substitute then for a previous act, namely the Manitoba grain act. There was a general overhaul in 1930. There has been no substantial review of the Canada Grain Act since 1930. By refusing to refer the Canada Grain Act to the committee on agriculture I think the government is breaking faith with and flouting the wishes of the members of that previous committee. That previous committee of this house studied the Canada Grain Act and found that a further review should take place. Last year we held quite a number of meetings. Our evidence extended to 162 pages and we discovered, with respect to the Canada Grain Act and its administration, a great many things that should be the subject of review. The whole question of grain overages was a bone of contention. I think it is fair to say that the members of the board of grain commissioners left a great many questions unanswered. There were put to the members of the board some extremely important questions that they were unable to answer.

I think our experience last year demonstrates that there needs to be an overhaul in the personnel of the board of grain commissioners. Certainly there needs to be a review of the authority contained in the Canada Grain Act. We were unable to get information as to the quantity of grain that was lost through drying. We were unable to get a breakdown of hundreds of thousands of bushels of overages and shortages in the various grades other than the straight commercial grades. We reviewed what has since come to be known as the Brancepeth case where a farmer endeavoured to demand the right to unload his grain at the elevator. To say the least, the evidence we received in that committee was highly conflicting. The authorities in charge, according to the evidence they submitted to that committee, were anything but consistent in the stand they had taken in relation to this particular case. I think it is time that that part of the Canada Grain Act was reviewed so that we may find out once and for all just what a farmer's rights are under the present act; and in the light of that information the committee can consider whether or not changes should be made in the present Canada Grain Act.

There is one further thing that came before the committee last year that should be thoroughly reviewed, in my opinion, during the present session, namely the section of the act dealing with the distribution of box cars. The distribution of box cars is a bone of contention in western Canada. I have certain ideas as to how box cars can better be distributed. The minister has said that those particular ideas would not work out satisfactorily. However, of this I am sure. If the committee on agriculture is requested to review the section of the Canada Grain Act having to do with the distribution of box cars and the car order book, and if we are given the right to call witnesses from the various farm organizations, a workable solution to this problem can be obtained.

My point in rising this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, is simply this. As reported at page 970 of Hansard of December 16, 1953, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) informed me how the committee itself might undertake a review of the Canada Grain Act. He went further. He told us he had no opinion himself as to whether the Canada Grain Act should or should not be reviewed at the present session. I now inform him that I have endeavoured to have the committee called together as he suggested in the statement to which I have referred and that as a member of the committee I am informed by the chairman that I have not the right to have the committee consider such a review. In the light of the experience we had last year in the committee, the evidence given in that committee, and the fact that a recommendation was made to this house asking that the Canada Grain Act be referred to the committee at a future session of parliament, I ask the minister now whether he will not during this session present a motion referring the Canada Grain Act to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization for review.

I want to say that, as to any questions I have placed on the order paper this session with regard to some of the matters I have raised, the answers have been much better than those I have received previously; the answers have been much more complete. However, I suggest to the minister that referring the report of the board of grain commissioners covering a period of time that is already in the past is not sufficient and that the members of the committee on agriculture should be given the right and the authority to review the act and to see whether the points in the act that apparently do not completely meet with the wishes of the western producers at this time cannot be met by suggested amendments. I can certainly see no harm in the committee's undertaking such a review. I think a great deal of benefit might result from it.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the minister in charge of the Canada Grain Act has followed the usual practice. As soon as the report of the board of grain commissioners was available it was tabled and referred to the committee. I have attended the committee in the last few years and I have never known of any reluctance on the part of the committee, in studying the report of the board, to discuss the Canada Grain Act. It always has been discussed and, I presume, not without authority. Certainly the discussion has usually hinged on the terms of the Canada Grain Act. The report of the wheat board was also tabled as soon as it was available, and with the report of the board of grain commissioners is referred to the committee. The committee is now free to proceed to study both reports, and I presume it has ample latitude to study the foundation of the report, which is the legislation that brings both of those organizations into being.

My hon. friend said, why not have the committee start at the beginning of the session and make a complete review? I do not recall any government saying to any committee of this house, take this act and tell us what is wrong with it. If the government knows of anything wrong with an act the government puts forward an amendment of its own, sends that to a committee and allows the committee to deal with the amendment and with the act as it sees fit. However, I have asked the board of grain commissioners if they know of any desirable amendment, and I am told that they have nothing to suggest. I have discussed the matter with farm organizations, and I find that they have nothing concrete to suggest.

The hon. member has referred to the matter of the distribution of box cars. My hon. friend has closed that door himself. He has advocated his ideas on the floor of the house, and his bill has been rejected by the house. Surely he does not expect to have another debate on the distribution of box cars at this session. I believe that is quite obvious. I have never tried to minimize the discussion of wheat matters. I have gone beyond the ordinary rule in answering questions in this house. I have answered questions that under the practice built up over the years perhaps should not have been answered. The practice has been that we do not discuss the marketing of wheat from the current crop. In other words, we do not answer questions bearing upon marketing in the current marketing year. However, I have stretched that rule to the limit.

Today hon. members are in a position where a committee meeting can be called and officers of the wheat board or the board of grain commissioners can be called before the committee. Witnesses from any farm organization can be called and, so far as I know, so long as the subject is one that is touched upon in either annual report any questions can be asked of those witnesses.

Now, my hon. friend asks why this is not the year to spend the whole session investigating the wheat board.

Mr. Argue: Not the wheat board, I never mentioned the wheat board.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, the board of grain commissioners. This is perhaps as difficult a year from the point of view of the board of grain commissioners as any year we have ever experienced. We have congestion from one end of the handling system to the other. I know the board of grain commissioners are being run ragged, if you will allow that unparliamentary expression, in trying to deal with the situations that arise from day to day. I doubt if any responsible member in this house would say that work should be suspended and the board of grain commissioners, instead of functioning in the usual way, must come to Ottawa and start functioning in a wholly different way. I know of no other way of overhauling the grain act except to have the experts here in Ottawa to help in the discussion.

I am willing to be reasonable about these things. I believe the thing in which the western farmer is interested is in getting his wheat to market and having it converted into cash. Every Department of Trade and Commerce official is directing his effort towards that end. I have noticed that the farm organizations are very reasonable. They seem to agree with my viewpoint. They say that when everything is abnormal in the grain situation as it is today, that is not the time to enact legislation designed for years in the future. I think that is agreed. I believe that if my hon. friend will reflect he will realize that the energies of our experts can be better devoted to present-day responsibilities than to his purposes. I have heard no great echo of his purposes from other hon. members in this chamber. I have not heard any member stand up and say, that is the thing we should do. I believe most members are responsible enough to know that we should get on with the main job, which is marketing this wheat.

Mr. Argue: They echoed it a year ago.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My hon. friend has not been able to carry his views. The reason the house has not complied with his wishes that these matters be referred to the committee is that not too many people agree with him. I have noticed the tendency lately of the opposition party to believe that parliament exists wholly in the opposition. The other side does not count if the opposition wants to do something. That is a theory that should not be adopted in this house.

Mr. Coldwell: We have learned differently from time to time.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is my view, but nevertheless I have no desire to stifle the committee on agriculture or any other committee. I ask the committee to be reasonable in the demands that they place on an organization that is busily engaged in other ways. If it is a case of getting the board of grain commissioners to come down here for a week or perhaps two weeks—any reasonable period —there is no objection to that. However, to ask them to come down here for a month or a period of months might well wreck the grain handling situation in the west. My officers are geared to that kind of operation. I am quite willing to ask the board to come here. I am quite willing to ask the wheat board to come. I shall be glad to do so whenever the committee indicates that the time is convenient to them. In this year I am not prepared to go beyond that, and make unusual demands on the time of either body.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask one question before the minister sits down. From his statement, I take it he has no objection to hearing representatives of the various farm organizations on any point whatever in the Canada Grain Act, even though it might not appear in the annual report?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Fortunately, I am not in the position of having to hear them because I am not a member of the committee. I have no objection to the committee hearing anyone it may wish to hear.

Mr. Speaker: Before another hon. member speaks, I want to make one observation. I am seriously asking myself if it is a proper grievance to submit to the house on this motion to go into supply to say that the chairman or the majority of members composing a committee refuse to call a committee meeting for certain purposes. I was listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). I assure hon. members that I shall study this point carefully, especially after the debate we have had on the amendment moved earlier in this debate.

It seems to me the remarks made by the hon. member do not constitute the proper type of grievance that could justifiably be brought before the house on a motion to go into supply. I know the hon. member will be looking at the citations that refer to any matter coming under federal authority. The citations cover a great deal of territory. According to those two citations that appear in Beauchesne, third edition, 345 and 467, it would seem that one could speak about anything under the sun. It seems to me that what is developing is that if the majority party refuses to introduce a bill or to repeal a bill or to continue an act for a further period; if a committee that is a standing committee of this house is not called, then that is a grievance.

I am reminded of what appears in the introductory remarks to Beauchesne, third edition, where it says:

> The basis of the British constitutional system is that the recognized leader of whichever political party has gained the greatest number of seats at a general election should be called to form a cabinet and that there should always be an alternative government. When the party in power has lost the confidence of the House of Commons, the Governor General should be able to entrust the administration of the nation's affairs to His Majesty's loyal opposition.

And in a later paragraph, the following:

> It is essential that the Prime Minister and his colleagues should trust their supporters to assist them in carrying the cabinet's legislative program through parliament. If the administration is to fulfil its pledges to the electors, it must be able to count upon the loyalty of its followers in the House of Commons.

It then goes on to say that each political party should be well organized, and so on.

It seems to me that the matters brought up as grievances have to do with the machinery provided by the House of Commons for the purpose of studying legislation, and that hon. members to my right, who have been directed to administer, are the ones who are to say whether or not they want to review a certain matter, or to review an act, and whether they want to use a committee for that purpose.

I believe the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) asked the minister earlier in the session if he would object to having the committee called for the purpose of reviewing the act. Indeed, I think the hon. member quoted the question and answer. Now, at a later time, because he is not satisfied with the answer received on December 16, or the letter received from the hon. member who has been appointed chairman of the committee, he says, "This is a grievance, and, on the motion to go into supply, I will bring it up as a grievance".

I assure hon. members that I shall study the point carefully, but it does not seem to me right now that this matter should be called a grievance which justifiably can be brought before the house on this kind of motion. I do not think it can.

Mr. Knowles: Would you permit, Mr. Speaker, one suggestion as to a matter which might be taken into consideration when you are studying the point, as you have promised. Would you take note of the fact that my deskmate, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), has based his claim to the fact that he has a grievance on a report from last year's standing committee on agriculture and colonization, as it appears at page 667 of Votes and Proceedings for Tuesday, May 12, 1953. That report included a recommendation approved by, if I may use Your Honour's words, members to your right, and it was precisely because of the decision taken with the approval of the majority side of the house last year that the matter is now raised.

Mr. Speaker: As my hon. friend knows, the decision of a committee in a previous session does not bind hon. members in a following session. Everything stops at prorogation. There is an interruption of proceedings. To use the words of May, proceedings are quashed by prorogation.

However, as I said, I want hon. members to consider the point I have made, because it seems to me if we are to be in a position where any refusal by the government to consider a certain matter raised by hon. members to my left is to be considered as a grievance, then we are initiating a practice which I suggest was not contemplated in the rules governing the airing of grievances.

I know all hon. members are interested in maintaining the traditions of the house and not embarking upon a practice which would not be in conformity with the rules. This is what I am concerned about, and it is only in that spirit my comments have been made. I know hon. members will want to co-operate with me in trying to clear up this matter. However I do not think this is the right type of grievance to bring in on a motion to go into committee of supply.

We have heard now from the official opposition and the C.C.F. and I would at this time invite a representative of the Social Credit group if one wishes to speak. If not, I will hear the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon).

Mr. Blackmore: I would like to speak on another matter, that of old age pensions. If it is in order I shall do it now.

Mr. Speaker: Is the debate on the Canada Grain Act concluded? If so, the hon. member may proceed or allow the hon. member for Chicoutimi to speak; he can follow him.

INCOME TAX—PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to call the attention of the government to a matter which is highly important for the citizens of this country.

The legislature of the province of Quebec has recently passed an act levying a personal income tax. The main object of this bill is to safeguard the autonomy of the province in the educational field, and to assist universities by giving them grants. It also provides for social and health improvements. In other words, the purpose of this bill is to promote the interests and the welfare of the people.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, excellent in its principle and purpose, this act has the approval of all who consider the prime interest of their country above party politics. The federal authorities are now constitutionally bound to co-operate in its operation.

Among the exclusive powers of provincial legislatures under section 92 of the British North America Act, we find "Direct Taxation within the Province". It is true, however, that section 91 recognizes the right of the federal parliament to "raise money by any mode or system of taxation". These wordings are not contradictory; rather they indicate that the provinces, with an exclusive right on direct taxation, have unquestionable priority in that field.

Until the end of the first world war, that is for nearly half a century, the central government generally refrained from resorting to this taxation. It was only in 1917, after solemn statements to the effect that this encroachment was only temporary, that it entered this field, never to leave again.

In 1942, the provinces made an agreement with the federal government, under which they yielded, for the duration of the war, their right to levy personal income tax, as well as the tax on corporation income and capital. The federal government then formally undertook to facilitate the use of these sources of revenue by the provinces at the end of the war. The agreement prescribed that:

> The federal government shall have the exclusive right to collect personal and corporation income tax for the calendar year ending on the thirty-first day of December nearest to the date of termination of the present agreement and undertakes to reduce the rates of the said personal and corporation income taxes, for the next calendar year, by an amount sufficient to allow the province to re-enter the field of personal and corporation income tax and particularly to reduce its rate of taxation on corporation revenues by at least 10 per cent of such revenues.

In 1941 the Hon. Mr. Ilsley stated: "It is proposed, therefore, as a temporary expedient for the duration of the war only, to ask the provinces to vacate these two tax fields". The minister of finance was referring to personal and corporation income taxes, recognizing at the same time that these taxes rightly belonged to the provinces.

According to official statistics the net income of the ten provinces of the Canadian confederation for the fiscal year 1952-1953 amounted to $1,220,889,000; the government's contribution to this over-all budget was $333,277,000, which represented 27·3 per cent of the grand total. From that federal source, the province of Quebec received $4,211,000, that is 1·49 per cent of its total budget for the fiscal year, of $281,735,000. The details are as follows:

Provinces	Total Revenues	Federal Contribution
Nova Scotia	$45,228,000	$20,360,000
New Brunswick	46,401,000	16,333,000
Prince Edward Island	7,133,000	3,939,000
Ontario	339,566,000	127,442,000
Manitoba	53,737,000	28,173,000
Saskatchewan	88,960,000	28,193,000
Alberta	142,467,000	35,440,000
British Columbia	184,737,000	48,579,000
Newfoundland	30,925,000	20,107,000
Quebec	281,735,000	4,211,000

Thirty-five per cent of the sum of $333,277,000, which was subsequently divided among the ten provinces by the federal government, was contributed in taxes by the citizens of the province of Quebec; thus, Ottawa's generosity has cost Quebec taxpayers over $100,000,000.

In 1952-1953, a federal contribution of $20,107,000, or 62·05 per cent of the total revenues of $30,925,000 of Newfoundland, was received by that province. Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Manitoba also benefited from federal assistance to an extent varying between 40 and 50 per cent of their fiscal needs for the year 1952-1953. The proportion decreases for the more prosperous provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

As may be seen, Quebec's refusal, in principle, to enter into tax-rental agreements which are profitable to other provinces, can be quite costly.

An editorial published in Le Soleil, a Liberal party organ, reads in part as follows:

So much the better for them, until the day when they may perhaps regret having thus forsaken part of their jurisdiction for the benefit of a centralizing government.

It continues:

It remains doubtful whether the governments of those provinces have the right to commit in such a way, for so long if not forever, assets and powers granted to them by the British North America Act. However, it is up to the legal experts to study this important point. In the meantime, without recrimination and without envy, French Canada regrets it has not their strong support in its demands for privileges, rights and powers it has particular reason to defend as a sacred heritage.

Indeed, the province of Quebec is sustaining heavy material losses in having to fight alone against the encroachments of a centralizing government. Whatever financial hardships it may endure, it considers as even more important privileges and freedoms recognized by various treaties in which British honour was involved. Those privileges and freedoms have been guaranteed by the confederative pact and without that guarantee, our religious and political leaders would have been wary to approve it. In addition to what she may derive from her inheritance, the province of Quebec is determined to keep control over her civil laws, her education and religious freedoms and her social traditions. She is counting on the fairness of her witnesses and friends in the other provinces to recognize eventually that her cause is just and honourable.

Mr. Leopold Richer, in Notre Temps of February 13 last, expressed the opinion that——a province that lives on federal grants (statutory or not) is no longer free—

The arrangements between the federal government and the other provinces are merely temporary expedients which the federal government wants to place on a permanent basis and which only tend to aggravate the present constitutional difficulties without bringing about a satisfactory solution. It is a discriminatory system. On the other hand, it is incorrect to allege that these arrangements entail a lessening of the taxation burden. The state does not create wealth; its function is merely to redistribute the revenue collected from the taxpayers.

In fact that system of agreements has made the provinces dependent upon the central power, instead of being partners as they were previously. They are now at the mercy of federal subsidies.

Ottawa thus controls the whole economy of Canada; it is pure and simple socialism. Fiscal centralization brings about political centralization. We cannot accept it, because it is incompatible with the exercise of authority and opens the door to the abuses resulting from fiscal irresponsibility.

Mr. Speaker: Since it is five o'clock the house will consider private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

NORTH AMERICAN BAPTISTS INC., (CANADA)

Mr. John M. James (Durham) moved the second reading of Bill No. 378, to incorporate North American Baptists Inc., (Canada).

Mr. Green: Will the sponsor explain this bill?

Mr. James: This bill, entitled an act to incorporate North American Baptists Inc., (Canada), is similar to several others that have passed through this house in the past three years. Its prime objective is to establish a legal entity which will have authority to hold title to property within Canada and in any of the provinces of Canada.

Perhaps some may wish to have information concerning the group known as the North American Baptists. I should tell you that it is an unincorporated association of Baptist churches spread over the United States and Canada. At the moment they have 62 churches in Canada, and a total membership of over 9,000 people. The group has been functioning on this continent for over a hundred years, and I understand is well and favourably established. In Canada their main strength is in the four western provinces.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a very brief summary of this organization. As hon. members know, the passing of this bill on second reading will automatically result in its being referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, and I would hope that it would soon reach that committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Private Bills

COMMERCE MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

On the order:

House again in the committee of the whole on Bill No. 198, an act respecting Commerce Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Eudes.

Mr. Knowles: Is the sponsor here?

Mr. Harris: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: The order is "house again in committee of the whole." If the committee of the whole does not wish to proceed with the bill they will have to report progress and ask leave to sit again, but at this moment I must leave the chair.

The house in committee on Bill No. 198, respecting Commerce Mutual Fire Insurance Company—Mr. Eudes—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Name changed.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, when the bill was in committee on Friday last the hon. member for Greenwood asked for an explanation from the sponsor. The sponsor not being here, the bill was stood over. I am afraid the sponsor is not here today, and I suggest that it be stood until he is here to explain it.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, it is obvious if one reads the bill that it deals only with the changing of names and the like, and unless there is any particular objection registered by any hon. member I would hope that we could pass it. The marginal note to clause 1 is "name changed", and certain rights are saved. Clause 2 has to do with the coming into force of the measure. Persons affected by the bill not having made any representations, it seems to me that it is perfectly sensible for us to pass it in the normal course.

Mr. Green: For the sake of the prestige of parliament I suggest that it is not very wise to pass a bill without the sponsor being here. Surely members of the house are entitled to have an explanation of the bill from the sponsor. If he cannot be here today perhaps he can be here on Friday. Just because a bill may appear simple is surely no reason why it should go through the house without hon. members being able to obtain—

Mr. Knowles: That is no reason to make parliament look simple, too.

Mr. Green: —one word of explanation about it at all. Probably there is nothing objectionable in the bill, but it is the principle that worries me, that members can put their names down as sponsors of bills, not bother coming here, and expect the rest of us to pass them without explanation. I suggest that is going very far and that it is a practice which should not be supported in the house.

Mr. Harris: Under those circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that you rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, but should the same thing occur on Friday I shall undertake to sponsor the bill myself.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 152, REVISED STATUTES OF 1952—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

The house resumed, from Friday, February 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in support of this bill. It is one that has been before the house and has received consideration on a number of occasions. As was pointed out by the sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), when the industrial relations and disputes investigation bill was being considered by the standing committee on industrial relations in 1948 the committee approved a section of this kind in the bill. When the bill came back to the house the action of the committee was rescinded. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has persisted in introducing this measure session after session, and it has received increasing support in the house.

At the last session, after some debate in the house, the bill was referred to the standing committee on industrial relations and that committee approved the principle we are now discussing. Some objection was raised to this measure by one of the speakers who has opposed it on the ground that it has some compulsion in it. May I point out that the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act is in itself an act of compulsion. Section 12 of the act reads as follows:

Where the board has under this act certified a trade union as a bargaining agent of employees in a unit and no collective agreement with their employer binding on or entered into on behalf of employees in the unit, is in force,

(a) the bargaining agent may, on behalf of the employees in the unit, by notice, require their employer to commence collective bargaining; or

(b) the employer or an employers' organization representing the employer may, by notice, require the bargaining agent to commence collective bargaining; with a view to the conclusion of a collective agreement.

There you have compulsion, and compulsion was necessary because of the resistance of employers in this country to collective bargaining on the part of their employees. Those of us who were interested and active in trade union matters during the war years and before remember that the chief cause for dispute between employers and employees in the war years was the refusal of employers to recognize trade unions.

It is because of that refusal that the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act was put on the statute books. It laid down that where there is a union and it wishes to enter into collective bargaining with an employer, that employer must enter into collective bargaining with that union. On the other hand, where the employer wishes a collective agreement with his employees through their trade union organization, they in turn must bargain collectively. Since the passage of this act there has not been the same difficulty in the matter of getting employers to recognize trade unions. The provisions of the act obviated that. But now that the labour market has become more favourable to employers, the employers are again beginning to resist trade union organization.

The measure before us proposes that where a unit having a collective agreement with an employer asks for the voluntary revocable check-off on behalf of the membership of the union, the employer shall concede that, but only when the employee in writing makes a request. The employer need continue it only until the employee in writing withdraws the request.

Some people are afraid that members of a union have no freedom of action. Such people either have very little acquaintance with trade unions by experience through being a member, or they have acquaintance with very badly run trade unions. I have been a member of a trade union, though not actively, for some years now. In fact, I have been an active member and a card-carrying member for pretty close to 45 years. For some years I have been the business representative of that union, and I have not seen exercised any compulsion such as hon. members fear.

It is a fact that in the world in which we live, due to the fact that some people refuse to carry a fair share of their social responsibilities, their trade union responsibilities, or their responsibilities as a citizen, compulsion has to be exercised. But that compulsion is exercised according to certain rules and regulations which makes it fair to everyone.

I was rather interested in some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley), when she spoke on this bill some days ago. She referred to the fact that she was particularly shocked recently to read in a newspaper some very harsh words hurled at the premier of the province of Ontario. I do not see anything wrong with anyone criticizing a premier of a province, if that person feels like it, or even criticizing the Prime Minister of Canada if a person feels like it, or the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), or anyone else, as long as that criticism is in restrained and proper language. I am sure the hon. member for Timiskaming has not been lending a close ear to some of the criticism which is made in this house, otherwise she would be shocked much more, I believe, than in reading criticism in the newspaper, because I have heard criticism in this house, not only of the living, who can defend themselves, but of the dead who cannot defend themselves. That, in my opinion, is far more shocking than criticizing a premier who can talk back.

I gather too from the remarks of the hon. member for Timiskaming that she is not in favour of applying compulsion to membership in a union. She would be quite willing that members of a trade union organization should reap the benefits without paying a share of what it costs to obtain these benefits. Unfortunately for the hon. member, in this country we have had decisions on that point, and I refer particularly to the award of Mr. Justice Rand in the dispute between the Ford Motor Company and the United Automobile Workers. I would like to quote briefly from this very important document. Mr. Justice Rand states:

It may be of some interest that the Ford Motor Company in the United States with over 100,000 employees affected, has accepted the union shop and check-off in all of its production and assembly plants and units in that country. On the other hand, the employees as a whole become the beneficiaries of union action, and I doubt if any circumstance provokes more resentment in a plant than this sharing of the fruits of unionist work and courage by the non-member.

Those of us who know something about labour organization know that, as Mr. Justice Rand points out, it not only requires work to organize some industries, but it also requires courage and, as he says correctly and truly, it creates the greatest resentment when those who benefit by the result of the organization are not willing to support it either by their work or by their money. Mr. Justice Rand did not suggest that all the employees of the Ford Motor Company should become members of the union, but he did suggest, and this is what has become known as the "Rand formula", that every employee who benefits under an agreement should pay dues equal to that paid by members of the union, whether he is a member or not.

We do not, as taxpayers, object when those who refuse to pay their taxes are compelled to pay them, which, in effect, is practising the principle involved in the Rand formula.

The hon. member for Timiskaming is also worried about the irresponsibility of trade unionists. I would like to quote her remarks as reported at page 2496 of Hansard:

> When I say that certain unions do not show responsibility and therefore should not be given this concession, that their employers should not be forced to give it to them, I do not just mean responsibility to the company; I mean responsibility to the community, responsibility to their own members, and above all a respect for law and order.

I do not believe that trade unionists as a class, section or category of the population are any more irresponsible than are employers as a class, section or category of the population. In another debate I put on the record the number of companies that were breaking the laws of this country and defying the laws of this country—and had been doing so for years—through the formation of combines in restraint of trade, raising prices and so forth. In my opinion, that is irresponsible action. But before we can demand responsible action from any section of the community we must put those people in a position where they can enjoy the democratic rights enjoyed by other members of the community.

Some years ago, in 1943, to be exact, this government appointed a board known as the national war labour board, to make an investigation into employer-employee relationships in this country. The board was under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice C. P. McTague, as he was at that time. The board made a report dated August, 1943. I should like to read briefly from that report, and I am doing this because of the opposition that is coming from employers now to legitimate trade union action. There was a majority and a minority report of this board. I am reading from the majority report which was signed by the chairman and by the employers' member on it, Mr. Leon Lalande. The report stated:

> The most serious question involved at the present time is that of the right of collective bargaining. It must be kept in mind that this is a right which in a practical way has been recognized in Canada for a period of half a century. The recognition of the right has been far from universal. By far the majority of employers have resisted it over the period. Generally speaking, the great mass of employers, until comparatively recent years, have employed all weapons in their power to resist and discourage the trade union movement. There have been exceptions of course.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

That was the attitude of employers. When you get that attitude from employers, you are bound to get some similar sort of reaction from the employees of those organizations. You get the highest degree of democracy in the older trade unions, in the trade unions that have had a longer existence, great experience, in the same way as you find the greatest amount of political democracy in governments that have exercised political democracy for us for some time. Then the majority report of the board continues:

> When it is remembered, however, that the international trade unions represent but approximately 20 per cent of Canadian labour generally it is apparent on a comparison with other countries such as England, Sweden and Australia that Canada's trade union movement has been very, very slow indeed. Until comparatively recent years we have been in the main an agricultural country. That factor, together with resistance to the movement by reactionary industrial employers, induced by the fear motive or other even more selfish motives, has served to hold in check any widespread advance in the movement of trade unionism for quite a period of years.

Those are not my words. A trade unionist is not saying that. That is the studied opinion of a board set up by the government to investigate employer-employee relationships. As I said before, when you get that condition you cannot expect people who have been denied the democratic right of trade union organization to be wise, prudent and considerate in the exercise of newly found power. That desirable result will have to come through time. I think it was Lord Macaulay who said that the only way to build freedom was to extend freedom. I could continue reading from this report but I think I have read enough to show that if there is any irresponsibility on the part of trade unions—and I am not conceding that there is—responsibility for that situation rests in other places.

I now want to take you back a little bit further, Mr. Speaker, just to show the attitude of employers to trade unions in this country; and this is not so long ago; I think the report was made in 1937. In 1936 or 1937 the federal government set up a royal commission to inquire into the textile industry. The royal commissioner was, I believe, Mr. Justice Turgeon. The present Chief Justice of Ontario, Mr. Justice McRuer, I believe was counsel or one of the counsel for the commission. The heads of the textile industry were asked as to their attitude to trade unions, and I am going to read you their replies as they were given in a brief submitted to the royal commission on February 2, 1937, by Elie Beauregard, K.C., commission counsel. The president of the Wabasso Cotton Company Limited, C. R. Whitehead, was asked in regard to the company's attitude to trade unions and he said:

The men can belong to any union if they like. We do not ask a man if he belongs to a union or what his religion may be, but the board of directors refuse to recognize the union, any union.

Remember, that was only in 1937. Then here is another quotation:

I never had to deal with a union here before, never heard of such a thing, and I am not going to be led by a lot of such folk as if I might just have a rope around my neck and be led like a lamb to the slaughter.

That is Henry Johnson, president of Courtaulds (Canada) Limited. Then here is another one:

We have no objection whatever to our employees joining any kind of organization they feel so disposed to. I don't think we would be prepared to consider dealing with any organization, because we would very much prefer to deal with them as individuals, because there are always people who get in control of these things,—

And may I say that people get in control of the textile industry.

—or it seems to be the case, who have very radical ideas, imaginary ills or problems.

I could read you some of the evidence as to the wages paid in the textile industry at that time, and I assure you that the ills were anything but imaginary. The quotation I have just read was from W. P. MacDougall, general manager of Belding-Corticelli Company Limited. Then here is another quotation:

The company will not permit any third party to interfere between the management and the employees or to take away from the employees their rights as individuals to deal with the company.

That is the Dominion Textile Company Limited.

There was one exception, and that was the president of the M. E. Binz Company, Limited. He said:

We as manufacturers. . . have got the right to organize ourselves. Is it not right that labour should have the same right?

Now, I wanted to put that on the record in order to show those who feel that labour is irresponsible that if labour is irresponsible—I say again I do not concede it—it is because they have not had the opportunity to exercise the rights and duties that build responsibility. They can never do that until the opportunity is extended to them. Over a good many years we have had considerable discussion on this matter, and since the industrial relations committee has approved the principle on two occasions I suggest there is no good reason why the proposal should not now be made the law of this country.

Mr. Gregg: May I ask the hon. member a question? In view of the fact the quotations which he read dated back about fifteen or seventeen years, would he admit that there have been a good many changes in the attitude of management towards organized labour in those intervening years.

Mr. MacInnis: I want to be quite fair. I will admit at once that there undoubtedly has been a change. The textile industry is now fairly well organized. The trade union movement has made great strides in Canada since that time. But I wish to draw to the attention of the minister the fact that the advance made by trade unions was made at a time when there was close to full employment, and when you might say the labour market was in favour of the trade unions. I am afraid that now there is a trend in the opposite direction. There is definitely a trend, and how far it will go I do not know. All over the country there are signs that employers are again resisting the organizational efforts of their employees.

Mrs. Shipley: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. MacInnis: Certainly.

Mrs. Shipley: I should like to know if the hon. member would suggest that every veteran in this country who has received benefits by reason of the representations made to the government by the Legion should be forced to join the Legion and pay his dues, or if every person who goes to church should be compelled to join that church and pay the proportionate costs of operating the church.

Mr. MacInnis: It is my understanding that such church duties are required of certain people, but I cannot talk about that from experience. The Legion and the churches are an altogether different thing from the relationship between employers and employees. Does the hon. member propose that an employee need not help pay for the benefits he receives from the union? Is he entitled to take those benefits and give nothing in return? I would prefer Mr. Justice Rand's opinion. He says, no, you are getting benefits and you should pay for those benefits. The government of this country—and the hon. member sits on the government side of the house—pass the income tax laws and say that you will pay your income tax.

Mrs. Shipley: That is a different thing.

Mr. MacInnis: It is the same thing.

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): I should like to say a few words on this bill, just as I have in the past on two different occasions when this measure was presented to the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I should like it to be clearly understood that I do not oppose the measure because I oppose the check-off. I believe it should exist and be put into operation if both the employer and the employees want it. I refuse, however, to think it should be included as an article of the labour code, and I believe that is what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants. I am not in favour of that, and I am going to try to explain as clearly as possible my attitude towards the measure now being discussed.

I certainly am not trying to bring into the debate the constitutional question. I believe the measure relates to federal jurisdiction only. I say that because it would be futile to try to impose the will of this house on the provinces. It is for that reason I do not intend to discuss the constitutional issue. My hon. friend puts it on the federal ground exclusively, if I understand him correctly.

Mr. Knowles: That is correct.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I do not want this measure to form a part of the labour code because I want to leave every individual and every industry free to accept the check-off after the two parties have come to an understanding without the slightest shadow of coercion. I have in mind the words uttered by the hon. member for Timiskaming when she spoke on February 26, 1954, as recorded at page 2496 of Hansard. She said:

> It was so outlined as to leave the impression that any workman, at his will, could simply walk into an employer's office and sign a card to the effect that he wanted union dues deducted from his pay check; and if he wanted to discontinue this process then, supposedly, it was just as simple to walk in and lift the card.
> I think it is well known to most hon. members that it is not as simple as that.

I agree with her. I shall show that is true because of two lines put in the phraseology of the bill now under discussion. We ought to concentrate our efforts on avoiding friction between employers and employees in so far as that is possible. We ought to provide all parties with every possible occasion for developing that fraternity that is so necessary today. We must never forget that those who want to profit by uncertainties, misunderstanding and unrest for the purpose of giving their destructive propaganda every possible opportunity, try to create misunderstandings and friction between the proletariat, as they call them, and the employer. The more friction there is between the two parties, the more satisfaction there will be among those who want to destroy our institutions. They never miss a detail; they never skip an opportunity to disturb the waters. We have a few of that kind in our country, unfortunately, those who would try to divide employers and employees.

I believe that if what is suggested in this bill were made compulsory under the law it would cause the same kind of friction. Because, after all, we are just human beings; employers as well as employees are also human beings. There is a science known as psychology. Some think it is only a word, but it is in fact a true science. We have to deal with it and to apply it to the actions of human beings in their relations with each other, whether they be employers or employees.

I feel sure that if an employer feels he is compelled by the law to collect union dues from employees, and give them back to the union, there will be some kind of friction. The employer will feel it is an imposition on his shoulders, or on his activities as an employer. If he is a good-natured employer and has a true understanding of the situation between his employees and himself, he does not like to be compelled to perform a duty he understands perfectly well. This is why there would be friction; and that would please the opponents of the constitutional rights and institutions. The aim should be to create as little friction as possible which might have the effect of dividing employees and employers. However, some people would take that chance; they would take any chance available to divide labour and those who head industry.

That is why I take this position, and tell the hon. member who sponsors the bill that he should look at the matter more carefully from this angle. I am sure he would see that it would be much better to have the check-off applied after good understanding, discussion and agreement between employers and employees. It would be better to abandon the project suggested here, so that employers and employees could come to agreements among themselves voluntarily, like good brothers, in an effort to develop the type of fraternity that we need so much, not only in this country but throughout the world. I believe this procedure would be much better in the world as it affects labour and industry.

I am surprised when I hear some people say or write that the check-off is no worse than the collection of income tax at the source. Everyone remembers the storm that developed when it was suggested that the collections should be made in that way. Indeed, we still hear grumbling against the imposition of that regulation. If it was a bad thing to collect income tax at the source, then I cannot see how it could be considered a good thing to collect union dues in the same way. After all, by the collection of union dues at the source part of the freedom of the workers is destroyed. I am sure of that.

Others offer the argument that collection of union dues in this way would serve to recognize in the law the important position occupied by labour throughout the country. Well, sir, labour has come very far in the plan of organization. It has made rapid headway in the last hundred years—and without the check-off. The check-off does not add to the paramount importance of labour, a position labour has held in the minds of the people of many countries throughout the world. Labour and management will gain more in grandeur, and their relations will be more friendly and numerous when they feel that they are on the same side of the fence, and are devoted to the welfare and prosperity of the groups to which they belong.

I repeat what I have said on the same subject. We hear a good deal about bureaucracy. I am almost ready to agree with Guerin, a socialist writer, whom I have already quoted in the house, that the union heads should avoid the danger of decreasing in importance in the eyes and minds of their members, or, as Guerin has written in his book, they will be "sitting in comfortable arm chairs". I believe these union heads would lose their importance, in the eyes of union members, if they permitted their duties to be performed by employers.

In my county I am very friendly with both employers and employees. Whenever I deem it my duty I give them my opinion or advice, and when I believe it is good for them I do not hesitate even for a moment. I realize that in the past the unions have had to strengthen themselves against some employers who were slow to realize the position of employees in their factories, and to treat them, not as ordinary tools but as human beings. However it may happen that if duties formerly performed by union chiefs are handed to employers, the workers will realize that after all management is not quite indispensable. After all, they are human beings; and if employees see the duty of their chief performed by management, they will say to themselves, "After all, our chief is not so important; he is handing over his work to the employer in the matter of the check-off of dues." It is only human to think that, very human.

I say that those who sponsor the bill and who are attempting to make the check-off compulsory are rendering a disservice to labour. When I make that statement I am expressing my own opinion. I have used strong words in the past, and have pointed out that if labour chiefs insist upon having this work done by employers, then the union chiefs will appear only as figureheads on a pedestal. That is what the employees will think; that will be the view of union members.

The acceptance of this legislation would render a very bad service to those devoted union chiefs who are doing their utmost to help employees and, I believe, at the same time to help employers. I believe they hold the view that if there is good understanding and a feeling of fraternity between these two large groups we will have in Canada a condition in which labour and industry will work in harmony, and we will have quietness and satisfaction, as well as a smooth-running organization. That is what we need. There are two lines in the bill to which I should like to refer. Line 15 reads:

> . . . and the employer shall furnish to such trade union the names of the employees who have given and withdrawn such authority.

I think the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) dealt with these two lines in her speech the other day. She entertained a doubt about it, which is in my mind. As I see it, these two lines would oblige the employer to furnish the names. That is not voluntary. You never can tell what will happen. They are human beings. They have their qualities and they have their trend of thought. If employers give the names of the workers who do not sign their cards after they have a month or two they will go to see these men.

Mr. Knowles: It does not ask for that.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It reads:

> . . . and the employer shall furnish to such trade union the names of the employees who have given and withdrawn such authority.

Mr. Knowles: But not the names of those who gave no such authority. That is what the hon. member said a minute ago.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): No. I said: suppose the chief of the union received the names of two or three workers who have withdrawn—

Mr. Stick: They will not be in the union very long.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): —their acquiescence in the check-off, what will happen?

Mr. Stick: They will get kicked out of the union.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): That is what I am asking. I do not know what will happen. That is why I feel that it is not that voluntary. I believe that the check-off will operate much better if it comes into operation after good understanding and friendly discussion between employees and employers, without imposing it by law.

Mr. Knowles: One horse, one rabbit.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): No, it is not that.

An hon. Member: Two horses.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): There is a difference in imposing it by law and having it come about after a good understanding between the two parties. It is not the same thing and my hon. friend knows it.

Mr. Harris: Did you say "honourable and humble"?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Honourable and humble.

Mr. Harris: I thought the hon. member said "my humble friend".

Mr. Knowles: We are all honourable here; the book says so.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Yes. Some industries have gone a long way to make their employees feel that they are part of the company. Listen to this, and this exists in some parts of our country and in other countries of the world. Industries have gone a long way to make the employees feel that to a certain extent the company belongs to everyone working for it, whether he sweeps the floor, oils the machinery, works in an office or is even in the office of the manager or the president. They do not need to have the check-off, and I am positive that some companies make the employees feel that they are working for their own industry, and that is brought about by the way they treat their employees.

If my memory serves me well, I read somewhere that a man by the name of Tony Montiero—I am not positive that that is the right name—worked for quite a number of years in industry in the United States. He was a hard worker. He looked over various industries and saw that unrest existed between management and labour. He decided that he wanted to devote his life to the betterment of relations between the two parties. This Tony Montiero is preaching in different industries. If my memory serves me well, one company manager sent a letter to the newspapers of the United States stating that he was very glad to have a man of that calibre trying to do that much good for his compatriots in his efforts to try to develop understanding and fraternity between the two parties. He said, "Since we have had that man working in our industry the relations between myself and my employees are quite different from what they were and everything is going smoothly".

Well, he knew what psychology meant and he knew that in dealing with human beings we have to look at the intellectual, moral and spiritual side of the question as well as at the material side. That man has done a lot of good in the United States. If I have not given the proper name I shall correct it in Hansard tomorrow.

I think I have said enough, Mr. Speaker, to prove that I am not altogether opposed to the check-off, but I do not want it to be imposed by law because I believe that there may be friction, and I do not want any friction between the two parties because our opponents, those who want to destroy us—and they are in this country—will take the least opportunity to get in between the two parties and do their nasty work, as they have done in the past.

I heard the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) say that some say that labour is irresponsible. I have never heard that word used against labour in my life, and I have quite a large labouring force in my county, and I have industries in my county. There everything is working very smoothly because they see each other, they speak to each other and they understand each other. That is the way to look at this situation and to deal with the problem. If labour is that responsible I do not see why by law we should take from it part of its responsibility towards its union members and towards the employers. You are taking away a part of the responsibility of labour. We do not think labour is irresponsible; we think it is responsible, and we ask you not to take away a part of its responsibility toward the nation.

Mr. Speaker: Since it is six o'clock the house will at eight o'clock revert to the business which was under consideration prior to five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

INCOME TAX—PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply.

(Translation):

Mr. Gagnon:

Centralization, according to Proudhon, claiming exorbitant rights, aspiring to maintain in joint possession groups which are sovereign, by the very nature of things, and to govern associate cities like conquered ones, violates the very principle which it claims to uphold, i.e. the principle of political unity . . . There arises therefore immediately antagonism between central direction and local autonomies . . . the consequence of which is to defeat the purpose of government which henceforth is solely employed in consolidating and furthering its own preponderance.

Is it necessary to recall these words by Sir Wilfrid Laurier:

The principle under which a government levies taxes when another government spends the product of such taxation is absolutely false. Provincial governments should surrender none of their fiscal prerogatives, for such a surrender would explicitly and necessarily imply the relinquishing of certain administrative responsibilities.

This opinion is shared by the chamber of commerce of Quebec city.

Time has shown that the Liberal party has shelved this wise piece of advice given by its former leader.

In the newspaper Notre Temps of February 27, 1954, we find this alarming item by the editor, Mr. Richer:

I have recalled the Liberals' centralizing attitude, both in the provincial and federal fields, and the continuous struggle they have waged or tolerated against provincial autonomy. This is no personal opinion on my part. It is rather an historical fact.

One has but to go back to newspaper reports of former years, or, should one have the courage to do so, to go through Hansard for the past thirty years, to find the unquestionable proof that the Liberals have never stopped condoning centralizing action, even at the price of an actual weakening of provincial independence.

Mr. Alexandre Taschereau, a man of strong character, was the only one to set himself against the federal encroachments. He did not succeed in safeguarding completely the autonomy of Quebec but he managed to save the most important. It was quite a feat, for he had to fight against the federal leaders of his party, particularly Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. Ernest Lapointe.

Nearly all the other Liberals gave up the fight. There were, of course, a few die-hards and rebels here and there, but they were not of the front ranks and their action was ineffective, and the huge steam-roller crushed everything that stood in its way.

In turning down the proposed agreements, our province only wishes to remain true to the spirit and the letter of the confederation pact.

We are not going to give up inalienable rights in exchange for subsidies subject to the whims of the bureaucrats.

Quebec has always in the past as well as today given the whole country the best example of loyalty and faithfulness to the Canadian constitution, for it is the only province which has treated the Anglo-Protestant minority in accordance with the ideals which prompted the fathers of confederation.

In a speech delivered on January 21, 1952, before the members of the Quebec Bar Association, assembled in convention at Quebec, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) congratulated the leader of the Union Nationale for the generous way in which he was treating minorities.

The provinces that have signed agreements with Ottawa will share, during the coming fiscal year, a sum of $322 million. Ontario will receive as her share $140,800,000.

Quoting those figures, the Montreal Gazette wrote as follows on February 10 last:

(Text):

When Ottawa is prepared to make payments on this scale to provinces who have agreed to continue the "temporary expedient", it should find no insuperable obstacle in conceding the additional $25 million to a province that wishes Ottawa to keep its undertaking of 1941.

If Quebec were to sign an agreement similar to other provinces, a larger sum than $25 million would have to be found. As it is Quebec is helping, in effect, to finance the federal subsidies to other provinces, and is asking for comparatively little in return.

Finally, Ottawa has made clear that it has no intention of exercising any pressure upon any province to sign an agreement. This promise was given by the prime minister of Canada in 1946. "The fact is", said Mr. King, "the dominion government is not seeking to force any agreements."

This assurance has been given repeatedly ever since.

It is hard to believe that Ottawa would have any reason, or any wish, to penalize any province because it has seen fit to re-enter a taxing field which it was asked to vacate "as a temporary expedient, for the duration of the war only", and when there was no attempt to get any province "out of these tax fields permanently."

(Translation):

In another editorial on the same subject, under the heading "Not an excessive demand", the Gazette wrote as follows on February 15 last:

(Text):

What would Ottawa have to pay Quebec if an agreement were signed on the same basis as that signed by Ontario? The payment would be about $112 million. At the present time, Ottawa allows Quebec taxpayers to make certain deductions in the field of corporation taxes, and in regard to the education tax that falls upon certain corporations. Supposing Ottawa were to go further and to make the whole of the new provincial income tax deductible from federal income taxes, what would the total be? The total that Quebec taxpayers could deduct from their various federal taxes would be about $82 million to $86 million.

Can Ottawa afford this? It would seem so. For if Quebec were to sign the same kind of agreement as Ontario, Ottawa would lose about $112 million. In other words, even with this new income tax concession, Ottawa would still, it seems, be the gainer by about $30 million.

(Translation):

On February 19, 1953, in his budget speech, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), after stating that the volume of federal taxes made tax increases by provincial governments more difficult, said:

Income Tax—Deduction of Quebec Tax

No one in Ottawa wishes to deprive provincial governments of their rights or to take over their responsibilities . . .

No one has any desire to aggravate the already difficult problems facing provincial governments.

And he added:

Our national unity must always be built on a foundation which gives practical effect to the constitutional distribution of foreign powers and administrative responsibilities between the central and the provincial authorities.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the minister now has a splendid opportunity of proving the sincerity of his statements.

If he does not want to aggravate the present position of provincial administration and if, on the other hand, national unity is not meaningless let us see to it that Quebec taxpayers will be able to deduct from their income tax the amount of the tax they will have to pay to the province, under the act recently passed by the legislative assembly. Justice and fair play make it a duty for us. This is the urgent request I am placing tonight before the government of my country.

On the other hand, by admitting that the provincial tax on corporate incomes, and the provincial tax on natural resources, which is earmarked for education, were both deductible, the federal government has already set two precedents in that respect.

What is at stake here is neither the Union Nationale nor the Liberal party, but solely the interests of the citizens of my province, who must not be placed, with respect to taxation, on a lower and less favourable level than the other taxpayers of this country.

It is the people of Quebec who, through the constitutionally established civil authority, are calling for fair treatment and asking for the recognition, in a concrete way, of a fundamental right granted them by the fathers of confederation, that is the priority right in the field of direct taxation.

We are not asking for piecemeal 5 per cent decentralization, but for 100 per cent decentralization. If the federal government has incurred financial obligations which now make it difficult to give back to the provinces taxation fields which were taken over because of an emergency of its own creation, it has but itself to blame. Let it assume the responsibility and suffer the consequences. It has been generous with other people's money and even made gifts to other countries. Well, let it fulfil its obligations through the means granted it under the compact of 1867.

"He who keeps rights which do not belong to him, commits robbery", said Senator Nicol commenting on the Ottawa government's conduct.

It would be iniquitous to continue persecuting my French-Canadian compatriots because they make use of the privileges granted to them under the constitution; because they refuse to exchange their liberties for money; because, on account of their tongue, their race and their faith, they cannot live under the guidance of a leader who is completely ignorant of their problems, their traditions, their ideals and their hopes.

In an editorial of March 8 last, Commerce-Montréal, the official publication of the chambre de commerce of the Montreal district, may be found the following:

Refusal to deduct the present provincial income tax constitutes a preference given to other provinces, pressure and coercion applied to Quebec.

In effect the province of Quebec is being told: "If you wish to exercise your prerogatives and to collect yourself those taxes which have been rented by the other provinces, you must be ready to pay the price for it by allowing your taxpayers to be more heavily taxed than others".

The noisy propaganda and publicity undertaken in certain quarters in favour of centralization would have people believe that sound legislation, security, pensions, happiness, prosperity, everything comes from Ottawa and that it is almighty Ottawa that should receive every bit of revenue and all thanks, it being the source of all good.

Let the Quebec government receive the hundreds of millions of dollars annually taken from its people. We would then see what our government leaders could do with this money.

In closing my remarks, I should like to quote a few excerpts from a study on federalism by Proudhon, a famous French socialist of the last century.

A federation agreement having for purpose, generally speaking, to guarantee to the confederate states their sovereignty, their territory, the freedom of their citizens; to settle their disputes; to provide, by means of general measures, for everything which affects common security and prosperity, such an agreement, as I say, in spite of the importance of the interests at stake, is essentially restricted. The authority invested with its implementation can never prevail over its constituent parts; I mean by this that the federal prerogatives can never exceed in number and in actual fact those vested in the communal or provincial authorities, nor can the latter prevail over the rights and prerogatives of man and the citizen. Otherwise, the commune would be a community; the federation would revert to a monarchical centralization; the federal authority, instead of being a mere mandatory and a subsidiary function as it should be, would be considered as preponderant; instead of being limited to a special service, it would tend to monopolize all activities and endeavours; the confederate states would be reduced to the rank of prefectures, intendances, branches or stewardships. Thus transformed, the body politic could be called a republic, a democracy or anything you like; it would no longer be a fully autonomous state, a confederation. The same thing would happen, and all the more so, if, through a false sense of economy, through deference, or for any other motive, the communities, districts or confederate states were to make one of them responsible for the administration and control of the others. The federal republic would become unitary and would be on the road to despotism.

Briefly, the federative system is the very opposite of the administrative and governmental hierarchy or centralization, which is a common feature of imperial democracies, constitutional monarchies and unitary republics. Its fundamental and characteristic principle is this: In a federation, there is a specialization, a restriction of the attributes of central authority; they lessen in number, in immediacy, and I daresay, in intensity, as the confederation develops by the addition of new states. In centralized governments, on the contrary, the attributes of supreme power become more numerous, more extended and more immediate, attracting into the ruler's orbit the affairs of the provinces, communities, corporations and individuals, in direct ratio to the size of territory and of the population. Whence the crushing of all freedom, not only municipal and provincial, but even individual and national.

(Text):

No doubt, Mr. Speaker, this house will wish to express its opinion on this matter and I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin), that all the words following "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

this house is of the opinion that the portion of income tax payable by the taxpayers of the province of Quebec, according to the act No. 43 passed by the legislative assembly, the 5th of March, 1954, be deductible from the income tax payable to the federal government.

Mr. Speaker: I would point out to the hon. member that citation 345 of Beauchesne's third edition states, in the middle of the citation:

Only one amendment and one sub-amendment may be made to this motion,—

That is the motion to go into supply.

—but if the amendment is negatived, a discussion on other questions may be raised but no other amendment can be proposed.

We have had one amendment which has been negatived and I submit that another amendment at this time cannot be accepted. Standing order 49 confirms this view.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, even though the amendment moved by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon), has been declared out of order, may I be allowed to deal with the matter which he has introduced in this house this afternoon.

I deem it my duty—indeed, it is also a great pleasure—to say a few words in support of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Chicoutimi.

The present debate raises the whole question of the fiscal autonomy of the provinces in general and of Quebec in particular.

Some of the opponents of the present Quebec government have upbraided its leader for having misused the topic of autonomy, for having played all the variations of that tune without ever putting autonomy into practice. Are they right or wrong? It is not up to us, as federal legislators, to settle that question. However, these same critics could surely not claim today that bill 43, adopted by the Quebec legislature, is not a clear and definite statement of policy with regard to fiscal autonomy. I hope it will not be repeated here that the government of the province of Quebec could have avoided the levying of that tax by managing in some other way the moneys entrusted to it by the provincial taxpayers.

Mr. Dupuis: The electoral fund would have suffered.

Mr. Poulin: I hope I can reply to the very intelligent remark made by the hon. member, the type we generally hear from the member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis).

Such an argument may be advanced in the provincial legislature involved, but the matter surely rests with the Quebec electorate who will be called upon to deal with it in due course. However, I do not hesitate to say this argument cannot be taken into account by federal legislators when discussing this problem.

We are here, Mr. Speaker, only to inspire legislators with new ideas. A discussion on such a basis would not solve at all the question of principle involved here.

In my humble opinion, though I am neither a lawyer nor an expert in constitutional law, this whole discussion can be summed up under two principal headings which I shall summarize in two questions:

1. Are the provinces allowed by the constitution to levy direct taxes?

2. Is it advisable, for Quebec in particular, to cover as much ground as possible in this field in order to preserve its fiscal autonomy?

My answer to the first question would be that the field of direct taxation is open to the provinces, that they have priority and that the federal government has in practice recognized that priority.

(a) The field of direct taxation belongs to the provinces. Subsection 2 of section 92 of the British North America Act is very clear on the matter and I quote:

. . . the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to . . . direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes.

There is no denying that income tax is direct taxation; there is no denying either that the bill introduced in Quebec confines the levying of this tax within the geographical limits of the province; there is no denying, finally, that the purpose of this levy falls within the jurisdiction of the province. In this connection, one has only to read section 168, subsection 12 of the bill:

> The purpose of this act is to provide for expenses necessary to meet provincial needs and developments in the fields of education, public health and social legislation. All the revenues therefrom shall be used to those ends.

It is clearly provided in the constitution, in sections 92 and 93, that all three subjects fall within the jurisdiction of the province.

(b) And now, the provinces have precedence over the federal power in the field of direct taxation.

Indeed paragraph 2 of section 92 is very explicit on the subject and grants to the provinces not only precedence but exclusivity in the field of taxation for provincial purposes. Bill 43, introduced in the Quebec legislature, stresses the point in its preamble. I quote:

> Whereas the Canadian constitution gives priority to the provinces in the field of direct taxation . . .

Moreover, such priority may be established through deductive reasoning. Since the field of direct taxation is the only one the provinces have access to, it must be open to them to such an extent as to enable them to collect enough money to achieve their own purposes. Otherwise, it would mean that the fathers of confederation, having recognized the right of the provinces to achieve their purposes, would have failed to provide them with the necessary means to do so. Finally, if the field of direct taxation is already saturated with federal taxes, that right of the provinces becomes entirely illusory; therefore we are not straining the principles of logic when we conclude that the federal government must abandon the field to the provinces whenever the latter express the wish to occupy it in order to achieve their own provincial purposes.

Mr. Dupuis: Clean or dirty?

Mr. Poulin: I wish to quote here a much more advanced opinion; it is a statement made recently before the Tremblay commission by the secretary general of the University of Montreal, Mr. Marcel Faribault, when he submitted to the commission the brief on behalf of the university. When questioned by one of the commissioners he replied, as reported in a news item published in La Presse of Montreal, on February 24, 1954:

> It should be remembered that the federal government must levy taxes since it does not have any natural resources. If it levies taxes and then applies the revenue derived from those taxes to provincial fields which do not come within its jurisdiction, that is evidently unconstitutional.

(c) Besides, the federal government has, in practice, recognized that priority on several occasions.

In 1947, it authorized, in favour of certain provinces, a 5 per cent deduction from personal income tax. It also permitted Quebec companies last year to make a deduction corresponding to the amount paid by the said companies into the education fund of the province. Another 5 per cent deduction was granted with respect to income tax on corporations, in favour of those provinces which refused to sign a tax agreement. And last year, the federal government went still further and underlined even more the importance of this principle, by raising the amount of this deduction to 7 per cent.

May I be permitted to quote from an editorial published in the Quebec L'Action Catholique, on January 15, 1954, under the signature of Mr. Charles Pelletier:

> A clause in the federal Income Tax Act allows the taxpayers to deduct 5 per cent from their contributions, if this portion is already claimed by the provincial treasury. This taxation field is certainly one in which the province should normally be absolutely free to act. It means little from the monetary point of view, but it means much from the point of view of principles. It gives recognition to the fact that, when a provincial legislature decides to levy an income tax, the central authority must, at least to a certain extent, give it priority.

I would also like to quote from an editorial published in the same newspaper, on February 20, 1954, under the signature of its editor-in-chief, Mr. L. P. Roy, and entitled: "Ottawa could not refuse this deduction." After some preliminary considerations, the editorial continues:

> Our high treasurer could hardly refuse by claiming that he needs the money. Why should Mr. Abbott refuse? To punish Quebec for having renounced a right for a period which has been far too long extended? Does Ottawa want to punish our province for reminding it, by its attitude, of the fact that his predecessor in office did not keep his word? When the Hon. Mr. Ilsley was asking the provinces to give up, for the duration of the war, their right to tax corporations and personal incomes, he insisted on the word "temporarily". That was the understanding.

The fact that it has been renewed once or twice does not change its nature in the least.

> If Quebec, as it could have done, had instituted a provincial tax upon the expiry of the agreement, nobody could have held it against that province. Now, the provincial government, needing the additional funds for educational and health purposes and fearing that some day it may be denied a right which it has not exercised for several years, is proposing taxation legislation. Its conduct is absolutely logical. What would be illogical would be a lack of co-operation on the part of Ottawa. Should the taxpayers now find themselves overburdened by this double taxation, they will know that the blame rests on those who are in undue occupation of a taxation field which they should have occupied only temporarily.

It would now be in order to quote from another article from Montreal's Le Devoir of February 26, 1954, signed by André Laurendeau. This article is entitled:

"Ottawa must rule provincial tax deductible from its own".

Part of the provincial tax—more than one-third —will be deductible from the federal tax. Will we ever bring Ottawa to accept the fact that the whole provincial tax should be deductible? This should be possible, if Ottawa does not consider centralization over and above simple justice.

The urgent task at present lies in mustering opinion and in getting Ottawa to agree that the provincial tax shall be wholly deductible from the federal tax. It is possible that we may meet opposition in some quarters. But even if the struggle appears to be a long one, it is no reason not to undertake it.

In December, 1952, the Quebec Catholic farmers' union submitted a brief to the government of that province in which I read, among other things, the following which I quote from Le Devoir of January 21, 1953, and which was written by Dominique Beaudin:

Our rural parishes feel as much as the cities the effects of the taking over of the taxation fields by the federal government at the expense of the provincial and municipal governments. That is why we are happy to approve the requests of the chambers of commerce and to assure you of our complete support for the course of action you advocate in order that Quebec may exercise its rights.

I want to repeat that I attach great importance to the opinion of the leaders of farmers organizations in the province of Quebec, even on a question as difficult and abstract as the autonomy question. Their common sense is a pretty sure guide.

It is rather interesting, Mr. Speaker, to consider what was said in the past on the autonomy problem by certain leaders of a great political party which played, and still plays, a great part in this country. On November 17, 1920, at the Reform Club of Quebec, the Hon. Alexandre Taschereau said:

There is a conspiracy against the provinces, and particularly against the province of Quebec. I ask you to ponder over all that in order that we may face united the attacks of the federal government. We belong to a great party of glorious traditions and a noble future. Be uncompromising and pure Liberals worthy of the founders of that great party. Be of those Liberals who will never go for measures which can only be detrimental to our province.

And the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, whose name, after all, will live in the history of Canada, had this to say immediately after those words had been said by the Hon. Alexandre Taschereau:

As the honourable premier has so well indicated a moment ago; what Ottawa is really seeking is to buy us and many citizens of this province do not seem to protest enough against that ambush. We of the province of Quebec should not let go any particle of our autonomy and our rights.

We see by Bill 43 that the leaders of Quebec have changed, but that, as far as autonomy is concerned, ideas have not.

In November 1952, the chamber of commerce of the province of Quebec submitted to the government of that province a brief on dominion-provincial relations in the field of taxation. On the last page but one of a summary entitled "Official views of the Chamber" I read the following:

The chamber of commerce of the province of Quebec believes: (1) that the pact made in 1867 between the two great nationalities of this country, as confirmed by the British North America Act, has to be fully complied with; (2) that, since direct taxes are the only source of provincial collections, it is important that they should have full freedom of action, and that the federal government should restrict very precisely its action in this field.

In this case, such statement is self-explanatory.

Lastly, I would like to quote a few lines from an editorial published on March 8, 1954 on the first page of Commerce-Montréal, the official organ of the Montreal district chamber of commerce:

Is Ottawa going to allow the Quebec taxpayer to deduct the whole provincial tax from the federal tax? To justify such an attitude it would seem that even good will, good faith, electoral purposes or other reasons of this kind are not required. Obvious facts and the most elementary justice call for such an attitude.

Now, is it advisable, for the province of Quebec in particular, to cover as much ground as possible in order to safeguard its fiscal autonomy and, by this very fact, its autonomy proper? Autonomy is more essential to Quebec than to any other province if she wants to maintain and develop her own life and to preserve the particular characteristics of its functions and manifestations.

The saying "he who pays eventually gains control" is quite old but time has not impaired the truth of that assertion. On the contrary, it allows the accumulation of new proofs of its veracity. It is all very well to discuss, to argue or to quibble but the fact remains that the confederation pact not only gave assent to an agreement between two provinces but was mainly the recognition and the guarantee of the rights and privileges of two great races which had decided to unite. For the benefit of those who dislike the statements of the prime minister of the province of Quebec on that point I shall quote, among hundreds of others, an opinion voiced in the brief submitted recently to the Tremblay commission by the University of Montreal:

> Some people do not like to hear it said that confederation has been a pact between two races. One has only to make an objective and impartial study of the Canadian constitution to immediately see the special position in which the province of Quebec was placed. Section 133 could not be more definite. Its provisions concerning language and the right to use it in the federal parliament together with the attendant obligation to publish the statutes in both languages that is in Ottawa as well as in Quebec (in the latter case for the benefit of the English-speaking citizens) show that in fact the confederative act has been an agreement between two racial groups of different languages, religion and traditions which they aimed to preserve.

I surely feel justified in quoting at this time an editorial which appeared recently in a Quebec newspaper, Le Soleil to mention it by name, and which was reproduced on February 22, 1954, in Le Devoir. It reads:

> Independence before dollars
> Indeed, the province of Quebec suffers heavy material losses by opposing, all by itself, the encroachments of a centralizing government. No matter how great a monetary loss she may suffer, the province still holds much dearer the privileges and liberties which were granted her by treaties involving British honour. Those privileges and liberties were formerly guaranteed under the confederation pact, which the province's religious and political leaders would not have endorsed without this guarantee. Apart from what she may derive from her inheritance, the province of Quebec wants to keep control of her civil laws, her educational and religious liberties and her social traditions. She relies on the fairmindedness of her friends and witnesses from the other provinces to ultimately acknowledge that her case is just and honourable.

Mr. Speaker, when one reads such words, inspired by the purest nationalism, it is impossible to refrain from making a travesty of a famous line of verse and ask: "How into such fine gold has that base lead been changed?" The supporters of the Liberal party who seem to oppose in this house the suggestion of my colleague from Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) will have a hard time to reconcile their views with the attitude adopted by their official organ in Quebec.

It has been said that the federal government had to get as much revenue as possible in order to redistribute that money among the poorer provinces. This argument is put forward in favour of a greater centralization of direct taxation at Ottawa. It is claimed that if the amount which the taxpayer from Quebec will have to pay is deducted from the federal income tax, the province of Quebec will no longer be helping the poorer provinces. I hate to put forward opinions of too categorical a nature—one can always err in spite of good intentions—but this time I say without hesitation that nothing could be farther from the truth. Other speakers have established—or will do so, I hope—that should such a deduction be made the province of Quebec would be far from getting as much money as it would have obtained if it had been a party to the financial agreements which the other provinces have accepted. Therefore, through that accounting operation, there is a deficit which becomes a surplus for the central government which, in turn, redistributes the money among the poorer provinces.

The province of Quebec, which is naturally rich—I admit it and I thank Providence for it—will therefore continue to help the poorer provinces, even if the central government allows the deduction of the tax that will be paid by the Quebec taxpayers to the provincial government.

One might perhaps object as follows: But tell us, what has the province of Quebec to worry about? What are the rights of which she could be deprived? What privileges could be taken away from her through more or less encroachment upon her autonomy? In replying briefly to that objection, Mr. Speaker, I shall try to put aside all question of sentiment because I am prepared to take for granted the intelligence of the hon. members of the house, to whatever party or group they may belong.

It is generally admitted today, to quote a concrete example, that the way things are going, within a few years we shall have some sort of health insurance program in which the state will have a word to say.

Let us suppose that the province of Quebec, owing to the fact that her field of taxation is practically saturated, does not have the financial means of setting up an ad hoc system, the federal government will do it. Therefore, for all practical purposes, I can see there a serious threat to the principles and morals of the French and Catholic people of Quebec.

I once mentioned here the case of Dr. Chisholm, who was deputy minister of health not so long ago, and I could mention others. Mr. Speaker, can you see what would happen if an individual of that type were to avail himself of his influence and position to have regulations drafted regarding hygiene and medicine in our Catholic hospitals? I shall not dwell on the point, because I think the house understands what I mean.

I am well aware that above those civil servants, there are always the ministers who take responsibility for their decisions. However, if I may say so with due respect, I definitely feel that the ministers do not always do what they want, even with the best intentions in the world. How else could you explain that we do not have yet bilingual cheques, for instance, to mention a concrete case which will help to understand the principle, and here I am entering deliberately another field where I can show that our excessive regimentation in the federal administration works certainly against us. I am sure that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is a well-intentioned man who is very strong on having all cheques issued by the various government departments bilingual and this on the basis of the indisputable and unrefuted facts which I stated. How is it that he has not yet succeeded in this? Undoubtedly, on account of crafty subordinates not so well disposed as he is, upon whom he does not exercise the authority necessary to implement what he wholeheartedly desires.

If we now consider education, what should we expect when the day comes when our provinces, because their taxation field has become unproductive, find themselves unable to extend to our school boards the assistance they need? I already indicated in this house why I object to federal subsidies to universities and classical colleges. I want to say again, even though this statement could be used against me, I do not fear any interference by the politicians we have today here in Ottawa in our two great political parties. I am prepared to trust them, but they will not live forever! In 25 or 50 years from now who will be leading Canada? Perhaps a socialist government the supporters of which are always asking the government today to enter into every field and especially the field of education and health.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is not exaggerated to foresee 25 or 50 years ahead for those who take it upon themselves to prepare for the future. And I am rather wary of what these socialist gentlemen, with the support of more or less well disposed civil servants, might have to suggest for the improvement of the educational system of the province of Quebec.

I will not resist the temptation to quote in this connection a few lines from an article written by Gérard Filion, in the March 6 issue of Le Devoir:

> Ottawa has its own little Marshall plan . . . Beyond legal borders it offers gifts for hospitals, vocational schools, youth training, universities. Just like the countries in receipt of the real Marshall aid, the provinces mutter under their breath, but accept, nonetheless. They know full well that in doing so they are coming under the domination of the federal government; they feel that they are gradually being deprived of their rights, but they submit, in spite of everything. And having done so, they look for arguments to justify their surrender.

I might add here, Mr. Speaker, that it is fortunate that the province of Quebec does not come under this plan.

It will thus safeguard a principle which, some day, other provinces might be glad to invoke, even though this collective revolt on the part of the provinces might bring about the collapse of the whole Rowell-Sirois structure.

Now if we take a look at social legislation, we see that the central government has made a full-fledged intrusion in this field. Now we know that this legislation directly, and sometimes intimately, affects the individual himself or his property. However, according to the spirit and letter of the constitution, this field is reserved to the provinces. Would it not be more logical that all moneys connected with this legislation be under direct and absolute control of the provinces? At the present time, we are away ahead in this direction. Although it would be most desirable, we cannot hope that the central government will retreat from its position; the most we can expect is that they do not overstep certain bounds.

Let us not believe for a moment that all possibilities have been exhausted in this connection. Popular pressure will force governments to go still further in this direction. However, in future, provinces should be allowed to cover the remaining ground; but, if that is to come about, the central power will have to give them the income sources they need in order to exercise their own rights in that particular field.

Mr. Speaker, whatever class or group we may belong to, we are all citizens of a great and rich country. It was the will of Providence, which is everywhere, that two great races should contribute chiefly to the building of the Canadian nation. For 150 years they fought each other. And when the fighting was over there remained to be found a common ground for an agreement which would permit each of those two races first to live and to develop itself according to its characteristics and its genius, and then to contribute to the development of this great country of ours, so that subsequent generations might be happy and free. In order to achieve that ideal, at a certain time in our history the leaders of those two groups got together to draw up a proper program.

That was the birth of the Canadian constitution which later on took the form of an act which was ratified by the imperial parliament, under the name of the British North America Act.

Were those leaders mistaken? Could it be that in practice the legislation they have drafted failed to achieve their purposes which were nevertheless quite clear? Not one member of this house will maintain that the fathers of confederation did not want to guarantee to the two great races who had decided to unite the full and complete exercise of their rights and privileges, with the use of the appropriate means to attain that end.

Would the statesmen now leading the nation, either in the federal or in the provincial field, not be so well-intentioned as those of the past? Would it be their purpose to melt in a single mould the wonderful qualities of each group forming the nation, at the great risk of distorting them? I refuse to believe that. That is why I trust that this house, desirous to leave each of them its full freedom, will also give them the means to preserve it by readily allowing the taxpayers of the province of Quebec to deduct from their federal income tax the total amount of the income tax payable to the province of Quebec.

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I refrained from making my speech until tonight, in order that the government may do something for the taxpayers of the province of Quebec with regard to the total deductibility of the provincial income tax. The matter of deductibility of the provincial tax is the general topic of conversation in Quebec today. As a matter of fact it is the issue of the day, and all papers have been commenting upon it ceaselessly for the last two months. It is of such importance that I am convinced it will prove to be a turning-point in the economic life of Quebec. Not a day passes but the papers mention it in their editorials.

The question of provincial rights has been considered many times in this house and the people have had the opportunity to acquaint themselves with the policy of the different parties on this matter. May I say that I scarcely hope to change the government's mind on the matter tonight. It is not my intention therefore to discuss now the question of provincial autonomy as such. I want to deal objectively with the subject of provincial income tax and try to prove to the house that, in all justice and fairness, the federal government must allow deduction of the provincial tax from the tax paid to the central government.

The federal government must recognize and admit that the province of Quebec is autonomous, that she insists that her rights be respected, fully preserved and even extended and that any move towards centralization in Ottawa, a course most obviously pursued particularly since the beginning of the war of 1939-45, must cease.

The people of the other provinces may not be as much interested in the conservation, by their governments, of the taxation rights that the central government tries to take away from them by more enticing means. For the other provinces, this is purely a financial matter devoid of all sentimentality. But for us, of the province of Quebec, provincial autonomy, provincial rights and any matter pertaining to sources of revenue are, indeed, considered as directly related to our religion, our language, our rights and our traditions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Balcer: I know members opposite do not agree with me on that score, but I wish to remind them that they must nevertheless realize that a provincial government which refuses to sign agreements proposed by the central government shows remarkable courage, when it is evident that the immediate revenues to be derived from such agreements are greater than the revenues to be yielded from the fields which the province is unwilling to give up.

The people of Quebec clearly show their autonomist feelings when they approve their government's stand in refusing such attractive federal grants.

In fact we see tangible proof of this in the brief presented by the chamber of commerce and of which previous speakers spoke at great length. Such proof is equally reflected at this time in every newspaper of the province of Quebec for, regardless of their political beliefs, they seem to support the provincial government unequivocally in this regard. I shall take the liberty of quoting a few excerpts from editorials published in the newspapers of the province of Quebec to show that, in that province, public opinion seems unanimous in recognizing the full validity of the decision arrived at by the provincial government. For example, an editorial published in the Montreal newspaper La Presse on Wednesday, February 10, 1954, stated:

> The only solution to this problem would be for the central and provincial authorities to conclude an agreement which would allow the Quebec taxpayer to deduct in full, from the amount of income tax payable under federal laws, any payments to be made to the provincial government.
> Last year already, when presenting his estimates, the Minister of Finance, the Honourable Mr. Abbott, granted a reduction of the tax levied on corporations to firms situated within the limits of a province which had no fiscal agreement with Ottawa. His obvious reason in doing so was to equalize the fiscal charges of the taxpayers throughout the country.
> Could not the reasons then put forth be invoked in the case of the new provincial income tax? That matter has already been raised, but it has not as yet been fully studied.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but if my eyes do not deceive me, he holds in his hands a pretty big bundle of sheets containing extracts from newspapers, and if, as seems to be the case, by quoting from newspaper clippings, he wishes to show that the provincial government has the support of the people from the province of Quebec in the struggle to which he referred, I am afraid he is out of order in so doing. Newspaper editorials may be quoted, provided one can do so without being out of order. (See Bourinot, page 335; citation 265, Beauchesne, third edition.) But another standing order says that members of the house must express their own ideas, without reading a text and must not therefore read into Hansard, instead of their own views, those of newspapermen or newspaper editors.

I supposed the hon. member wished to read abundant quotations from newspapers. If such was not his intention I apologize for interrupting him. I have allowed a reasonable use of quotations to support an argument—it is permissible in such a case to bring forth various quotations—but I wish to caution the hon. member against changing his speech into a review of the opinions expressed by every newspaper on the question which he intends to bring up.

Mr. Balcer: I understand your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and it is a pleasure to bow to it. However, my only purpose was to show that most Quebec newspapers approved the attitude of the provincial government in this regard and were asking, along with that government, that the provincial income tax be made entirely deductible. That is why I wanted to quote certain passages from various editorials. I shall therefore content myself with giving the references and if some hon. members want to take the trouble of referring to them they will recognize the truth of my statements, I am sure. In fact, newspapers like Le Soleil, L'Evénement Journal, La Patrie, L'Action Catholique, the Gazette, and Le Droit of Ottawa, all seem to admit that the federal government should decide right now to permit Quebec taxpayers to deduct the amount of that tax.

The problem can be summed up as follows: Should Quebec be punished by Ottawa for refusing to sign the financial agreements proposed by the latter? And when I say "should Quebec be punished by Ottawa", I do not simply mean the government of the province of Quebec, but the whole population of my province.

First, there is a point upon which everyone agrees: the right of a provincial government to direct taxation. There is no disagreement in that connection; the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) admitted that fact himself upon his return from Australia and he said so very clearly and unequivocally.

This right to levy a provincial income tax would be a joke if, by levying it, the government would be putting the people of the province in an inferior position compared to that of the citizens of the other provinces. And, vice versa, one could understand why the federal government would be reluctant to let go its revenue in one province to the detriment of the other provinces. This is precisely the point I want to make tonight. It indicates precisely the strength of the stand taken by the government of the province of Quebec in this respect: If the federal government denies to the taxpayers of my province the right to deduct from the federal income tax a tax required from them by the provincial government, the federal government puts them in an inferior position. On the other hand, the government of the province of Quebec, by demanding that this tax be made deductible, does not take a single penny away from the other provinces.

It is a well-known fact that the federal government offered an amount of $123 million to the province of Quebec. In return the province was to sign the federal-provincial agreements and to hand over succession duties, corporation income tax and, finally, personal income tax.

If we consider that in so doing Quebec would have been giving up revenue amounting to $80 million, the federal government would have been obliged to hand over approximately $40 million more than today.

We must also note that the great majority of the people of Quebec have shown that they wished the provincial government to keep its sources of taxation, so as to make sure that these taxes would be spent in the province, in accordance with the traditions, mentality and aspirations of the Catholic and French-speaking majority of that province.

Anybody who has read the editorials in the Quebec press in the last few years will have been readily convinced of that fact. If any further proof should be required, one has only to read the various briefs submitted to the Tremblay commission. The great majority of reports urged the provincial government to retain jealously its taxation sources and not to sign the agreements proposed by the federal government.

And yet, if the provincial government had accepted these direct grants, Quebec would have received $123 million, whereas by retaining, as it does, the taxation fields, it has received only about $80 million.

Income Tax—Deduction of Quebec Tax

Another point to be emphasized is this: the total grants given to the other provinces by the federal government amount to $322 million, and the taxpayers of the province of Quebec contribute part of this amount—perhaps not to the same extent as the others, but at least they do contribute some part of it.

In 1953, the central government levied $700 million in taxes in the province of Quebec, that is, $296 million in direct income taxes and $400 million in corporation taxes.

It is readily understood that the federal government cannot hand back to each province an amount equal to that paid in income tax by the population of these provinces, but, just the same, it is to be noted that all the provinces which have signed these agreements get more than if they had not signed them. Consequently, the federal government feels that it has to maintain its taxes at a very high level, and these taxes bear as heavily on the people of Quebec as on the people of the other provinces, but the province does not benefit by them. It follows therefrom that the province of Quebec gets less than all the other provinces because it has refused to sign an agreement with the federal government. Now, if the province of Quebec does not sign an agreement, it is because it does not want to hand over its taxation rights but wants to preserve its autonomy in order to better safeguard its traditions, its tongue and its religion, or because it simply wants to be its own master.

Besides, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) admitted in 1946 that these famous fiscal agreements could place a province that did not sign them in an inferior position from a financial standpoint, in relation to the other provinces, and that is why he allowed the provinces who refused to sign an agreement to deduct 5 per cent. Why that 5 per cent? Well, it is only because the federal government realized that it had no right to place in an inferior position the citizens of a province which refused to submit to that centralizing campaign the federal government is carrying on since 1946. The government of the province of Quebec did not make use of this 5 per cent, and thus has left since 1946 to the federal government an amount of $56 million. This is certainly not the time to refuse the deduction of $22 or $25 million during three years, when the population of Quebec have left here, in Ottawa, a sum of $56 million. If we add another period of three years at 5 per cent to these $56 million, well, we come to a figure of almost $90 million. Now, all the provincial government is asking is to deduct about $66 million during three years. The federal government would find itself still richer by $28 million, if the people of the province of Quebec were permitted to deduct the provincial tax. As to the provincial government, it would be richer by $22 million and the citizens of Quebec province would not be submitted to double taxation.

Mr. Breton: Will the hon. member allow me to ask him two questions?

Mr. Balcer: If I may finish my speech, I shall permit questions later. The result of the government's refusal—

Mr. Dupuis: Don't disturb his master's voice.

Mr. Balcer: Are you speaking for your son in this house?

Mr. Dupuis: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, the federal govenrnment's refusal is such as to put the Quebec taxpayer in an unfavourable position compared to the rest of the population. Quebec taxpayers are placed in a position of inferiority because they believe in autonomy, because they feel that it is for them the surest way to make certain that their legislation will always reflect the will of the majority of the population of Quebec.

Of course, I know that, for many members of this house, provincial autonomy is a fear that should not exist, and so on. I know many members opposite who would be delighted to see provincial governments disappear completely.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame! Shame!

Mr. Balcer: They prove it by their silence on this question.

Mr. Dupuis: A real joke!

Mr. Balcer: The province of Quebec wants the federal government to acknowledge the autonomy of the provincial government. We, of the province of Quebec, do not wish to force it upon other provinces; we do not want to take away one single cent of the money the other provinces may receive from the federal government. Even if this deductibility were granted, no other province would stand to lose one cent of service from the federal government. On the other hand, the people of Quebec have the right to ask the people of other parts of the country to respect their views on the matter, especially when it does not cost them a cent.

The policy of the federal government which aims at doing its utmost to compel the province of Quebec by the blackmail involved in these grand federal-provincial agreements puts the citizens of Quebec in a false position.

The federal government cannot of course give such large amounts to the other provinces and draw them only from the revenue of these provinces, but the government is bound to distribute its revenue fairly and to treat every Canadian on the same basis. However, that is not what is happening today, since the central government treats Quebec taxpayers as inferior citizens because they want to keep their taxation sources.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Balcer: I am convinced that no taxpayer from the other provinces would tolerate such treatment. The federal government cannot say that the means are lacking since it would be ready to grant $123 million to the province of Quebec. Neither can it say that the amount involved would have to come from the other provinces since the amount earmarked for Quebec does not serve to increase the total amount of the grants going to the other provinces when Quebec does not accept it. Since 1946, Quebec has left this amount to the federal government. The Minister of Finance may say to himself that this money might be used to reduce the national debt but if the citizens of the province of Quebec like to pay their debts they do not want to have to pay the whole of the national debt.

Some hon. Members: Oh! Oh!

Mr. Balcer: Attempts have always been made to strip Quebec of her rights of taxation. I believe that the reaction of the province of Quebec towards the provincial income tax as well as the position taken by the different associations which came before the Tremblay commission should make it quite clear to the central government that our people cherish their rights.

When deduction was granted to companies last year, the Minister of Finance said that he did not want to place the companies of the province of Quebec in a position of inferiority just because the provincial government had not signed a tax agreement. Well, we ask the federal government to do for the small taxpayers of Quebec what they have done for the big corporations.

Mr. Chevrier: You know something about big corporations.

Mr. Balcer: I suppose the Minister of Transport knows nothing about them, has never heard a thing about them!

One must not forget that the 15 per cent deduction which is asked for the taxpayers of Quebec will apply to 300,000 taxpayers, while the federal tax applies to 600,000 taxpayers, which means that the total amount paid to the Quebec treasury by the taxpayers will represent only 7 or 8 per cent of the amount paid to the federal government.

Mr. Lesage: This is where the mistake is made.

Mr. Balcer: My friends opposite may think that the provincial government in levying that tax only from those who are better off financially is not following the same method as the federal government but I believe it is fair—

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): That is where the mistake is made.

Mr. Balcer: The people of Quebec, no more than the provincial government, do not follow to the letter the instructions of the federal government. Not a single member opposite has yet made a speech during this debate. Yet I remember that during the last general election all those gentlemen in front of me all of a sudden became great upholders of provincial rights. Today, the same gentlemen are facing a problem affecting 300,000 taxpayers of the province of Quebec; it is up to them to solve the problem without the rest of the taxpayers of the country losing a single penny and without the federal government losing a penny since the province of Quebec in this way would still get less than the amount the federal government was ready to pay if the province had decided to sign the agreement.

Mr. Dupuis: You said all that in Verdun.

Mr. Balcer: Tonight, we press the government to take a decision to that effect; the matter is urgent because beginning April 1 the provincial tax will be deducted at the source from the salary of a large number of Quebec taxpayers. That is why I hope that the government and its supporters will avail themselves of this opportunity to break their silence in this connection, because we must not forget that the people of Quebec are all looking towards Ottawa and wondering whether the federal government will fulfil their wishes and treat the Quebec taxpayers on the same footing as other Canadians. Everyone is wondering whether Quebec taxpayers are to be penalized because the provincial government refuses to accept the terms of a federal-provincial agreement drafted by Ottawa and which does not please the people of Quebec who have their autonomy at heart.

Mr. Breton: Mr. Speaker, now that my hon. colleague from Three Rivers has concluded his speech, may I ask him two questions?

Mr. Balcer: With pleasure.

Mr. Breton: First, is it not true that the province of Quebec is opposed to the federal-provincial agreements because she is against the idea of federal subsidies to the provinces?

Mr. Balcer: It is true, when the subsidies are not related to education and other matters dear to the heart of the French Canadian.

Mr. Breton: Could you answer yes or no to this question: Is it not true that Quebec is opposed to the idea of federal subsidies?

Mr. Balcer: I have already answered you.

An hon. Member: Answer, answer.

Mr. Balcer: I do not have to take any orders from the hon. member. I have answered and if he is at all intelligent he will understand what I said.

Mr. Breton: Is it not true, hon. colleague from Three Rivers, that a deduction from the federal income tax would amount to a federal subsidy to the province of Quebec?

Mr. Balcer: It is a pleasure for me to answer the hon. member from Joliette that he may call this deductibility what he likes. If the federal government grants it, we will be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. Fernand Girard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, it is possibly a very good thing, for the sake of this fiscal question, that it happens to be broached more particularly by independent members. We cannot be accused, in this instance, of acting for political advantage—

Mr. Dupuis: Independent or Conservative?

Mr. Girard: I am very happy to see that the hon. member for St. Mary apparently wishes to speak very often since, on the other side of the house, everybody seems to remain silent. He will no doubt be happy to speak after I have finished my speech.

Our independence is such that it has prevented us from occupying positions of eminence. The government to which we have given our support on a number of occasions must listen to us attentively and objectively.

Our opinion has not been conjured out of political theory. We have found it in the light of the letter and spirit of confederation which must be the bible of every representative of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this preamble to be necessary to any discussion of fiscal problems.

Therein lies perhaps the fate of the province of Quebec. It depends upon the reply of the federal government to the province, which has just repossessed its rights in the field of direct taxation; and history will pronounce a severe judgment on those who will stoop to the point of placing political considerations over and above the provisions of the B.N.A. Act.

Subsection 2 of section 92 of the B.N.A. Act grants to the provinces direct taxation rights within their geographical boundaries, in order that they may levy funds for provincial purposes.

Quebec has refused to sign the fiscal agreement and it has repossessed the rights which belong to it; it is now up to the federal government to deduct in full this provincial tax, for it has no right to punish Quebec for having wished to safeguard its autonomy.

I do not wish to emphasize the soundness of the provincial tax and the priority right of the provinces to levy such a tax. My colleagues have done so with convincing logic. My intention is to show that the federal government itself has never had any real doubt about the rights of the province and that all the measures it has taken to monopolize the powers of direct taxation do not derive their force from the letter or spirit of the confederation pact. They aimed rather at luring the provinces by holding out certain advantages in order to gain that consent which eventually would have put us before the fait accompli. That was a clever process, for everyone knows that for most political institutions precedent is as good as law.

Not being able to claim as of right the exclusive use of the income tax, the federal government tried to transform a temporary situation into a permanent one. Each time it has offered subsidies for provincial purposes, the federal government has unquestionably exceeded its jurisdiction and proved that it was but an usurper of provincial rights. In offering to the provinces an annual subsidy, it not only proved its unconstitutional interference but showed that it is less interested in revenue than in centralization itself, for it has offered much more than what the province asks in a constitutional way.

In the eyes of members from outside Quebec, the attitude of our province may seem somewhat isolationist. To us, autonomy is a guarantee of survival and the provincial tax is the consecration of that principle. May I be permitted to quote, in this connection, an excerpt from the brief submitted to the Tremblay commission by the University of Montreal. In my estimation, it gives the fundamental reasons of two concepts, the concept of Quebec and the concept of the other provinces:

> Our English-speaking compatriots are often astonished at the importance which we give to constitutional problems, for they believe that one must think, first and foremost, of that which is immediately possible. There is evidently in all this a question of heredity, of a deep measure of atavism. The Anglo-Saxon constitution is in great part unwritten; the common law is evolved day by day through the judges' decisions; the Anglo-Saxon refuses to accept dictatorial rules . . . his ideal is, first of all, liberty and his decisions are both pragmatic and affective. Compare to that, not directly the French-speaking Canadians, but the French themselves and you find yourself immediately before such monuments as the declaration of human rights, the Napoleonic code, the concordats with the Vatican, the French Academy, the love of the soil, the preservation of family values and the nation's community spirit.

In the eyes of French Canadians, the Quebec resolutions are the debates of a real constituent assembly, like that of France in 1789. The act of 1867 may, with regard to its form, take on the appearance of an imperial law; but this has no importance whatsoever. It must be basically held for what it is, i.e a constitution as sacred as that of the United States.

Moreover, the fact that our people are sparsely represented in the key-posts of this country, though we are a bilingual nation, with two equally valid cultures, and though it is our group that went out to meet the other, as we are about the only really bilingual race, all this rather justifies our anxiety. Briefly, all those bitter struggles we have to put up with every time we call for the recognition of one of the rights of French culture, that are the special feature of the Canadian constitution, have proved without doubt that for us autonomy is somewhat like a rampart that does not exist for the English element of our country.

Consequently, we are entitled to ask the members representing other provinces to support our request in connection with the deduction of the provincial tax, not because such request is or is not in accordance with their approach to the fiscal question because autonomy does not mean to them what it means to a minority. We are asking their support because our request is in keeping with the spirit and the letter of the confederation pact which they have signed and because our request represents, in terms of money, a smaller amount than the one we would have received through the signing of the fiscal agreement.

The government, which wanted the fiscal agreement to be signed, has made a gesture which it has always claimed was unselfish. It offered a subsidy greater than the amount which the provincial tax will yield. Quebec has taken a measure consistent with the Canadian constitution; the federal government now owes an answer to the province of Quebec. Will it penalize her to the extent of $25 million a year for having preferred to keep within the constitutional bounds established by the fathers of confederation?

It has to choose between trampling down the rights of the most imposing province of Canada and thus uncover a move for centralization or giving back in fairness and equity what it had requested only temporarily for the duration of the war according to the very words used by the Hon. Mr. Ilsley.

The Liberal members from the province Quebec know perfectly well that it is their duty to join us in asking for this tax reduction, because it is clearly in the interest of their province and their 300,000 voters who would otherwise be sacrificing $25 million yearly to a party's centralizing policy. They should not come to us saying that their government cannot allow more than a 5 per cent reduction because they would then be contradicting their own government which has offered to pay even more through the centralizing method of grants. We should not let them tell us, as has been done so candidly elsewhere, that they do not want to give an opponent millions to spend. That would be shifting ground; this is an old method which the politicians have used so much that it has become valueless. They should take care not to subordinate the interests and the future of their province to a political philosophy; Quebec will have to pay $25 million yearly to keep it in mind and their action might have historical consequences because every one of them must remember that autonomy is a pedestal on which stands the monument of French culture, that other component of our national life which they represent in this house.

That matter transcends political parties as well as the men who have to solve the problem and is directly related to the confederation pact. If a province of her own free will declines to sign an agreement which leads to another device, it cannot be denied that right by the federal government unless the present wording of the compact be amended. One might object that the federal government has undertaken to sign no new agreement providing new benefits without extending it to other provinces.

That objection can easily be overcome because as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, this is not a new agreement, since Quebec has declined to sign a fiscal agreement. The full Quebec income tax deduction would carry no new benefit; it would only correct an injustice. Which other province would consider it an advantage to receive nearly $25 million less than the amount written in its fiscal agreement? In deducting the full Quebec tax the government merely releases the Quebec taxpayer from an overcharge.

Another objection which might be raised would be the fear on the part of the government that the request of the province of Quebec might give to the other provinces the idea to ask for the same right and claim their entire share of income tax.

I find an eloquent answer to that objection in the 1952-1953 budget speech by the Minister of Finance, in which he dealt with federal-provincial relations. I quote Hansard for February 19, 1953, at page 2131:

> As the house knows, his proposals took the form of optional agreements relating solely to taxes, known popularly as tax rental agreements. The virtue of this approach was that it was not dependent for success on the unanimous acceptance by all provinces. A cardinal principle in the offer was that no pressure, direct or indirect, should be placed on any province to accept an agreement.

Further on, the minister adds:

> This double-barrelled system would, I think, imply the unanimous acceptance by all provinces before it could be adopted. This might never be possible. As a matter of fact, I am by no means sure if I were a provincial minister of finance that I would agree to such an arrangement. I am afraid I would find something repugnant in the idea that an outside body—a board, council or commission—would be investigating provincial affairs and determining the size of the fiscal needs for a particular period which amount in turn would be the measure of the federal grant.

Those words of the Minister of Finance uttered in this house last year also favour the deduction of the Quebec tax.

The federal government cannot contend that it fears that the province might increase her requests up to 100 per cent of the tax. The offer of a fiscal agreement sets a standard and the request made in this motion is inferior to it by several million dollars. That is why to accede to Quebec's request would not be detrimental to any province or to the federal government.

How can the Minister of Finance say that the principle underlying the taxation question is that no direct or indirect pressure will be brought to bear upon the provinces and that their choice would be optional, if, in order to exercise her rights to taxation, a province must assume an additional burden of $25 million?

If the federal government refuses to authorize the deduction of the Quebec tax, that will go against the statement of the Minister of Finance and will mean rather: "I leave you free to accept or not the tax agreement, but if you reject it, that will cost you another $25 million." It is not the Quebec government that should be considered by the federal government but the taxpayers of this province which must not be penalized because they have made the choice which, even according to the federal government, they were free to make.

The basis of the American constitution is this great democratic principle: "No taxation without representation". I believe that the opposite is also true. No government could efficiently carry on, deprived of its taxation powers.

It becomes a servant of the central state, an honorary body, and thus destroys the very existence of its national entity which is a constituent part of confederation.

Nobody in this country can deny that the confederative pact was a convention between two races. The Massey commission is definite in that regard. Every eminent Canadian has praised the dual culture which is the basis of Canadian unity. No single important politician in this house has failed at one time or other to emphasize the importance of maintaining Canadian unity by respecting the dual culture which is the most valuable attribute of Canada. It is therefore agreeing in principle to the fact that each racial group has the right and duty to have its own culture flourish and, thus, to develop our national life.

Therefore there can be no over-all or universal formula to develop both racial bases of the Canadian people equally. That is why it is up to each racial group to direct its destinies the richness of which is found in their diversity. The province of Quebec, the natural garden of French culture, has an exclusive right in the pursuit of its national destiny.

Its aim is to retain it within the framework of its autonomy, and the taxation issue serves to put that autonomy in a concrete form; even if it were mistaken, Quebec is the only one having the right to commit that error.

To deny it the right of choosing its own method of attaining its destinies is to seek to destroy that Canadian unity based on a dual culture.

Mr. Robert Perron (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate.

The matter under discussion is of very great importance to at least half the taxpayers of the province of Quebec. At the same time it is of the very greatest importance, from the point of view of the principles involved.

Before entering into the heart of the matter, may I be allowed to congratulate the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) who has initiated this most important debate. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, it is the first time that I am privileged to speak in this house. I crave your indulgence, especially since I am rising after the eloquent speeches which we have just heard.

The government of the province of Quebec, therefore, in the session just ended, has adopted legislation taxing the income of a certain number of its taxpayers. I will not spend any time discussing the various details of this legislation. I would nevertheless like to say briefly and simply that it only affects those taxpayers whose income is greater than $3,000, and more if they are married, and the single persons who earn more than $1,500 a year, and the rate of this income tax is 15 per cent of the federal tax.

The purpose of this provincial legislation and the reasons why it has been adopted are outlined in the preamble of the act, 2 and 3, Elizabeth II, chapter 17 of the statutes of the province of Quebec. The act which was adopted by the legislature this year is entitled: "An act guaranteeing to the province the income required by its developments".

Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote the preamble of this act which outlines its purpose and which, at the same time, is a declaration of principle:

> Considering that the extraordinary progress enjoyed by the province in the last few years implies ever-increasing governmental expenses, especially in the fields of education and public health;
> Considering that it is essential to the survival of the provinces that they have at their disposal the necessary financial resources to exercise their rights and fulfil their obligations;
> Considering that the Canadian constitution grants priority to the provinces in the matter of direct taxation;
> Considering that the province wishes to co-operate with the federal authority in order to establish a fiscal system that is fair, proper and in accordance with the spirit and the letter of the federative pact;
> Considering that, in that spirit of co-operation, the province, since 1946, has not availed itself of its rights in the matter of income tax;
> Considering that it would be unfair and detrimental to the province if it were deprived any longer of a source of revenue where it has a priority by right and which it requires in order to face the new needs resulting from its powerful development;
> Considering that, under the circumstances, it is advisable to enact for a period of three years . . .

. . . an act taxing the income of the taxpayers in the province; and section 168 states more precisely the purpose of the act. I quote:

> The purpose of this bill is to provide for expenses which are necessitated on account of the needs and the developments of the province in the fields of education, public health and social legislation, and all revenue derived from it will be used to such ends as the lieutenant governor in council may determine for each fiscal year.

In other words, as Quebec lacks the means required to meet the growing needs of education, public health, and of the different social measures which it has to administer, the province had to find a new source of revenue.

Those who have examined the financial position of the universities in our province during recent years, as well as that of our secondary schools and of the various specialized institutions within our Quebec school system; those who, in another field, are familiar with the balance sheet of our hospitals, of our asylums, our charitable institutions, have been able to satisfy themselves that those resources are necessary in the various fields of social activity, and that there is a great need of money.

Those needs are due, up to a certain point, to the tremendous development of the province of Quebec, a development that also prevails throughout the country.

No one has denied, up to now, and no one will dare deny I hope, that the province of Quebec has the right to tax the revenue of its citizens. The question is whether the federal government will allow this new provincial tax to be deducted from the tax it collects.

Section 92 of the British North America Act sets forth, among matters exclusively reserved to the provinces, "direct taxation within the province". It is perhaps the clearest clause in the constitution. Even if section 91 confers on the federal government the power to collect moneys, by any means or system of taxation, in fields other than those reserved to the provinces, it follows that the provinces enjoy at least a priority right in that field.

Moreover, it is the historical interpretation given to those sections of the constitution. And, on constitutional matters, we must not disregard history if we want our federative system to survive.

In 1917, when the federal government established the income tax as a temporary measure to meet war expenditures, the then minister of finance, Sir Thomas White, stated in that debate, as reported at page 1441 of Hansard of 1917, volume II:

> The income tax is peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the province and is a suitable tax for the purposes of the province and the municipality.

Up until that time income tax had been considered to be a provincial matter, and was considered as such thereafter, so much so that when the matter of wartime taxation agreements was brought up in 1941, the hon. minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, stated:

> It is proposed, therefore, as a temporary expedient for the duration of the war only, to ask the provinces to vacate these two tax fields.

That is the personal income tax and the corporation tax. And when in 1942 the provinces entered into an agreement with the federal government, surrendering for the duration of the war their rights with respect to the personal income tax and the corporation tax, it was then agreed that:

> The dominion alone will have the right to levy taxes on the income of individuals, institutions and corporations for the calendar year ending on the 31st of December nearest to the date of expiry of this agreement and it undertakes to deduct from the taxes on personal and corporate incomes for the next calendar year an amount which will allow the province to re-enter the field of personal and corporate income taxes.

The sentence is perhaps a bit long and in rather poor French, but nevertheless it is a quite clear and well defined pledge which indicates exactly the respect for the spirit and the letter of this pledge that the taxpayers of Quebec are asking for today. Quebec did not sign any fiscal agreements in 1947 and 1952 and the only agreement still remaining between the province and the federal government is the one signed in 1942.

In 1947 and 1952, the government signed agreements with the other provinces, agreements that the government has always held to be free and voluntary. Some provinces did sign cheerfully. Others did it with the knife at their throat!—

Some hon. Members: Oh! oh!

Mr. Perron: —according to the phrase used by the premier of Nova Scotia. The province of Quebec declined to sign because she was unwilling, and rightly so, to forsake her autonomy.

To say that an agreement is free and voluntary and to state moreover that failing to sign will cost taxpayers between 20 and 25 million dollars more is, to say the least, illogical and it strangely reminds us of the knife at one's throat referred to by the premier of Nova Scotia.

Now the province of Quebec has decided to tax personal income and to take back the rights she had rented in 1942. Will the federal government refuse her taxpayers the necessary deduction? When this should be but a redistribution of taxes, some people want to make it a new tax, a heavier burden. Taxpayers have been paying annually for the last ten years millions of dollars to the federal treasury for the benefit of Canadians in general and without deriving themselves any benefit whatsoever. The federal government acts in the same way as a tenant who would refuse to give back to the landlord even a part of the dwelling.

It would be understandable at least if someone suffered. But the federal government is ready to grant $115 million to the province of Quebec if that province will sign an agreement. And yet the federal government would not agree to do without a revenue of about $20 million, an amount which, added to the product of other taxes collected by the province, would represent a total of $90 million! In other words, the federal government would be saving money. I cannot see how it would lose in accepting those deductions.

If the revenue of such a tax plus that of the other taxes mentioned in the agreements with the other provinces were greater than the amount which the province would have received if it had signed such an agreement, the government would have some justification in refusing, not completely but at least up to the amount of the grants. Such is not the case however; the contrary is true.

Besides, the government has already admitted, on two occasions, I believe, the principle of deductibility. This was when it amended the corporation income tax legislation in order to allow companies to deduct 7 per cent of their federal tax, i.e. the amount of the Quebec provincial tax. The same thing happened when these companies were allowed to deduct the amount that they were called upon to contribute to the educational fund of the province of Quebec, and that, by means of an amendment adopted at the last federal session.

Mr. Speaker, I understand it is now ten o'clock, but I could conclude my remarks in two or three minutes.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Do hon. members give unanimous consent to the hon. member to complete his remarks? He says he can finish in a minute or two.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Perron: I was saying, then, that the government had admitted, on two occasions, the principle of deductibility, that is first in the case of corporation income tax, and again in the case of the amounts these companies were called upon to pay the province for educational purposes. Must we then conclude that the government lends a favourable ear to the corporations' requests and yet turns a deaf one to those of the taxpayers? Must we conclude then that the government's hearing is more acute when it is a matter of listening to representations made to it by corporations and yet that it is unable to hear those made by 300,000 taxpayers of the province of Quebec?

The two main sources of revenue involved in the agreements with the provinces are personal income tax and corporation income tax. Why should the government refuse to make the same allowances as regards both personal income tax and corporation income tax?

Even if there were some doubt or at least some discussion—which I do not admit, however—as to whether agreements with the provinces violate the autonomy of the provinces, even if it could be held that the power to collect its own taxes is independent from the power of legislating and, in other words, that the power of legislating is divorced from that of levying the necessary funds to administer the legislation enacted; even if it can be held that grants from the central government to universities do not interfere with education, which comes under the sole jurisdiction of the provincial government, one thing is certain, that is that in enabling the provinces to use their taxation right, without penalizing the taxpayers, we shall put an end to the dispute, preserve autonomy and do justice to everyone.

Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I wish to sum up by saying that we must not forget that there are things which cannot be sold and which a government should not try to buy.

There are 3,000,000 French-speaking Canadians in the province of Quebec. The province has her own history, traditions, customs, tongue and faith, which set her apart in our confederation.

The province of Quebec, if I may say so, would like to preserve its personality, while continuing to maintain cordial relations with the rest of the country and to respect the absolute rights of the minorities within its own borders.

The province of Quebec is asking for no favour, but it would like to be treated fairly. I cherish the hope that the present government will do it justice.

On motion of Mr. Blackmore the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue this debate tomorrow and if the motion to go into supply is carried we will take the departments of mines and technical surveys and transport. I understand it is the desire of hon. members, perhaps not all, to have the motion disposed of tomorrow so that we can proceed on Thursday with the motion I mentioned preparatory to the debate on external affairs.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 24, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SESSIONAL COMMITTEE

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln) presented the first report of the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

REFERENCE OF PETITION TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved:

That the petition of Wilfrid Lavoie for a bill of divorce presented March 23, 1954, together with the report made thereon by the clerk of petitions March 24, 1954, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS, MONCTON—REAL ESTATE

Mr. Brooks:

1. Has the Canadian National Railways recently purchased any real estate in the city of Moncton?
2. If so, (a) where is it located; (b) from whom purchased; (c) price paid?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Between the right of way of National Transcontinental Railway and the old Intercolonial Railway; (b) city of Moncton; (c) it is not the policy of the company to divulge prices paid in transactions of this nature.

FEDERAL SECURITY PANEL SECRETARIAT—PERSONNEL

Mr. Fulton:

From what government departments or agencies are the personnel forming the secretariat of the security panel selected?

Mr. St. Laurent: The personnel forming the secretariat of this committee, like that for most other interdepartmental committees, are selected from the privy council office.

FEDERAL SECURITY PANEL—GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS OR AGENCIES REPRESENTED

Mr. Fulton:

What government departments or agencies are represented on the security panel?

Mr. St. Laurent: Like other interdepartmental committees, the security panel is made up of representatives from those departments most directly concerned with the matters to be considered. In the case of the security panel these are at this time: the Department of National Defence, the Department of External Affairs, the Department of Defence Production, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the privy council office. It is also provided that representatives of other departments and agencies may be asked to attend meetings at which matters of particular concern to them are to be considered.

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

Mr. Holowach:

1. Has Canada ever been a member of the inter-American association or the O.A.S., (Organization of American States) formed in 1890?
2. If so, during what years was Canada a member?
3. If not, what are the particular reasons for Canada not being a member?
4. What nations are now members of the above organization?
5. Has the government a knowledge of the basic democratic principles incorporated in the charter of this association of North and South American countries? If so, what are the principles enunciated?
6. Was an invitation from any source extended to Canada to participate or send an observer to the tenth inter-American conference held recently at Caracas, Venezuela?
7. If so, from whom was the invitation received?
8. Did Canada have any observers or delegates?
9. If not, for what reason was there no observer or delegate present?
10. Has Canada been officially informed of the general action and policy for the succeeding five years as enunciated at the tenth conference of the inter-American association?
11. Is the Canadian government in agreement with the anti-communist resolutions passed at the conference?
12. What position does the government take with respect to such resolutions?

Mr. Pinard:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Canada's position with regard to the Organization of American States was explained to the house by the Prime Minister on March 27, 1953. (See Hansard, page 3341.)

4. Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, El Salvador, United States, Uruguay and Venezuela.

5. Yes. The charter of the Organization of American States, signed at Bogota, Colombia, in 1948 is a public document.

6. No.

7. Answered by No. 6.

8. No.

9. Delegates may be sent only by states which are members of the organization and Canada is not a member. There is no provision in the charter of the organization or the regulations of the conference for governments to send observers.

10. No.

11 and 12. The government's position with regard to the threat to the free world presented by communism is a matter of public record and there seems to be no reason for it to be restated in relation to a resolution of the Organization of American States.

KURT MEYER

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo):

1. Was SS. General Kurt Meyer convicted solely on evidence of crimes against Canadian troops?

2. Was the Canadian government consulted about the personnel of the tribunal which recommended commutation of his sentence?

3. If so, did the Canadian government give its consent to the inclusion of two German members on that tribunal?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. Article 6 of the "Convention on the settlement of matters arising out of the war and the occupation" (known as the "Bonn convention"), entered into between France, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, on the one hand, and Germany on the other, provides for the establishment of a mixed board, consisting of six members, one to be appointed by each of the three occupying powers (France, the United Kingdom and the United States of America) and three to be appointed by the federal German government. This tribunal was to look into the sentences of each of the war criminals and make its recommendation to the government of the occupying power concerned.

Due to the delay in bringing this agreement into effect, the occupying powers and Germany agreed to establish mixed advisory boards to review the sentences of war criminals in each of the respective French, British and United States of America zones. Pursuant to this arrangement, a board was established to review the sentences of prisoners in the British zone by order of the British high commissioner, dated September 1, 1953. This board was to consist of five persons appointed by the United Kingdom high commissioner, two of whom were appointed at the nomination of the federal German government.

Canada was not an occupying power and consequently was not a party to either of the above-mentioned two arrangements. However, the Canadian government was kept informed of the negotiations throughout leading to the appointment of the board established in the British zone and did agree that the sentence of Kurt Meyer should be looked into and reported on by that board in precisely the same manner as the sentences of all other war criminals held in the British zone. It is understood that the review of war criminals' sentences in the French zone and the United States of America zone followed the same pattern as that in the British zone.

FEDERAL SECURITY PANEL SECRETARIAT—FUNCTIONS

Mr. Fulton:

1. What are the functions of the secretariat of the government security panel?

2. Does the secretariat, in discharging its duties, in fact exercise most of the functions for which the security panel was originally created?

Mr. St. Laurent:

1. The functions of the secretariat of the security panel are no different from those performed by the secretariats of other government interdepartmental committees. They are, under the direction of the panel, to prepare papers for its consideration, to transmit its views to government departments, and to carry out such routine duties arising from its work as the panel itself may from time to time direct.

2. No.

WATER POLLUTION—PREVENTIVE LEGISLATION

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has the government received representations from either the city of Prince Albert, the town of North Battleford or The Pas, or from any organizations in any of said municipalities requesting that the Criminal Code and/or the Fisheries Act be amended so as to constitute an offence where pollution of rivers or streams takes place which has been caused by anyone dumping therein chemicals, or other substances which causes the waters of such rivers or streams to be contaminated in taste or odor?

2. If so, has the government decided whether legislation will be introduced at the present session to make it an offence under the Criminal Code and/or under the Fisheries Act for anyone to pollute any stream or river of the waters on which people depend for domestic or industrial purposes?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, part 1 could be made an order for return. The answer to part 2 is that it is not the practice to state government policy in answer to questions on the order paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That will give great hope to the people.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return, subject to the remarks of the minister.

SAINT-JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE—CIVIL EMPLOYEES

Mr. Dufresne:

1. Have any civil employees been recently appointed to the administrative staff of le Collège Militaire Royal de Saint-Jean, province of Quebec?
2. If so, (a) what are their names; (b) on what dates were they appointed; (c) what positions do they occupy in the administration?
3. Are they bilingual?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. No civilian employees engaged on administrative duties have been appointed since September 1, 1953.
2. Not applicable.
3. Not applicable.

TOTAL NATIONAL INCOME AND PRODUCTION, 1910-1953

Mr. Leboe:

1. What was the total national income for each year from 1910 to 1953?
2. What was the total national production for each year from 1910 to 1953?
3. What percentage of the national production was for war during each year (a) 1914 to 1918; (b) 1939 to 1953?

Mr. Dickey:

1, 2 and 3.

SAINT-JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE—APPOINTMENT OF PROFESSORS

Mr. Dufresne:

On what date were the following professors appointed to le Collège Militaire Royal de Saint-Jean, province of Quebec: Samuel E. Stallard (mathematics); Donald E. Tilley (physics); Walter Thumm (physics); Eli Mandel (English), and Gordon Smith (history)?

2. What was the occupation of each of them at the time of their appointment?
3. Are they bilingual?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Samuel E. Stallard, July 2, 1953.
   Donald E. Tilley, September 15, 1953.
   Elias Mandel, July 2, 1953.
   Gordon Smith, August 1, 1953.

Flying Officer W. Thumm, as a member of the R.C.A.F., was merely seconded from the school of English at St. Johns, Quebec, to lecture in physics when no other suitably qualified candidate was secured as a result of a competition; he took up his duties on August 1, 1953.

2. Mr. Stallard was a graduate assistant in mathematics at Queen's University. Mr. Tilley was a part-time lecturer in physics at Sir George Williams' College and at Macdonald College. Mr. Mandel was an instructor in English at University College, Toronto. Mr. Smith was an instructor in history at the University of Alberta.

3. Of the five professors above named, four are civilians appointed as a result of competitions held by the civil service commission. The notice for teaching positions at le Collège Militaire Royal de Saint-Jean pointed out that in the exercise of certain duties it would be necessary to lecture in English while for others it would be necessary to lecture in French. English-speaking, French-speaking and bilingual candidates were invited to apply. As a result of the competitions, forty professors were appointed, of whom ten were assigned to lecture in French only, six in English only, and the remaining twenty-four in both languages. Among the six assigned to lecture in English only are the five professors mentioned in the question.

COAL AND GOLD MINES—NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Purdy:

According to the latest figures, what is the number of employees in (a) the coal mines of Canada; (b) the gold mines of Canada?

Mr. Dickey:

(a) and (b)

Number of Employees

1953	Coal Mining	Gold Mining
Jan. 1	22,777	20,302

Dec. 1	20,155	15,379
Average for year	20,722	18,893

Source: Reports from employers having 15 or more employees.

Note: The declines in employment in gold mining during the later months of the year were largely caused by labour-management disputes in this industry.

[Mr. Blanchette.]

IMPORTS—SOYA BEANS AND COPRA

Mr. Pommer:

1. What amount of soya beans was imported into Canada in the year 1953?

2. What amount of copra was imported into Canada in the year 1953?

Mr. Dickey:

1. 274,807,510 pounds.

2. 24,828,590 pounds.

*EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—SECURITY—STATEMENT OF MINISTER

Mr. Fulton:

1. Did the Secretary of State for External Affairs make the following statement in Washington, D.C., on March 15, 1954, in connection with the Canadian government's method of dealing with communist subversion: "We leave that to the agencies of government appointed for that purpose, who work quietly and, we think, fairly and effectively and normally without benefit of headline; and who are all responsible to some minister. He in his turn is responsible to parliament, of which he is an elected member, and answers for the conduct of his officials on the floor of the House of Commons"?

2. If so, does this statement reflect official government policy?

3. Will the government now give answers to questions in the house seeking information as to the nature and extent of its security program, including answers to the questions following?

4. What agencies of government have been appointed for the purposes referred to?

5. To what minister are they responsible?

6. Who are the officials for whom the minister is answerable to parliament in this field?

7. What are the activities of these agencies for which the minister concerned will give answers in the house?

8. What is the total number of government employees of all categories dismissed, released from government service, or transferred to less sensitive positions in the government service, for security reasons, since January 1, 1947?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, this question has before it an asterisk, which denotes that the hon. member putting the question wishes to have it answered orally. This question is in eight paragraphs, the first of which is as follows:

Did the Secretary of State for External Affairs make the following statement in Washington, D.C., on March 15, 1954, in connection with the Canadian government's method of dealing with communist subversion:

And then follows the quotation. The answer to that question is yes.

The second question is:

If so, does this statement reflect official government policy?

The answer is that this statement is a description of Canadian parliamentary practice and government organization, and the way it normally works, rather than a declaration of policy.

The third paragraph is as follows:

Will the government now give answers to questions in the house seeking information as to the nature and extent of its security program, including answers to the questions following?

This question is answered by the answers to Nos. 2 and 7. They are a description of Canadian parliamentary practice, and how it works.

The fourth question is:

What agencies of government have been appointed for the purposes referred to?

The answer is that the civil service commission is charged with the duty of determining the qualifications of candidates applying for positions in the public service and for making normal inquiries regarding their character and competence. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are charged with the duty of making special investigations relating to security. All ministers and the departments and agencies which they direct have the duty of determining whether or not persons whom they employ and retain in employment are reliable from a security point of view. The security panel has been established as an interdepartmental committee for consultation between officials whose duty it is to assist ministers on security matters, and for the preparation of general questions in this field for the consideration of the government.

Then, the fifth question:

To what minister are they responsible?

The answer is that the civil service commission, in the making of appointments, acts within the scope of the Civil Service Act and is responsible directly to parliament through the Secretary of State.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are responsible to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and report through him to parliament. Each department, in the administration of its own personnel, is responsible to the minister who is the head of that department. The government as a whole has and accepts responsibility for all procedures or policies of general application which may arise from the work of the security panel. Normally it is the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice who answers in parliament in regard to these matters, but if they are especially concerned with one department it might be the minister of that department who would feel called upon to answer in parliament.

Question No. 6 reads:

Who are the officials for whom the minister is answerable in parliament in this field?

Well, the minister is answerable in parliament for the decisions made and any actions taken by him or in his department by any of the officers of that department. Question No. 7 reads:

What are the activities of these agencies for which the minister concerned will give answers in the house?

Well, the extent and nature of the answer to be given in the house have to be determined in respect of every question that arises.

Then, question No. 8 reads:

What is the total number of government employees of all categories dismissed, released from government service, or transferred to less sensitive positions in the government service, for security reasons, since January 1, 1947?

I understand that by "security reasons" the hon. gentleman is concerned with reliability with respect to loyalty, and on that assumption the answer is as follows: Reasons for the transfer or removal of government employees because of unreliability include not only indications of communist or fascist activities or associations, but also indications of weakness of personality or character or habits, and circumstances that render a person susceptible to pressure or blackmail, or unintentional indiscretions. Security reasons involving risks of disloyalty are only part of the circumstances giving rise to certain removals or transfers. To segregate the cases of suspected unreliability with respect to loyalty, it would be necessary to analyse the circumstances of each case where there has been a dismissal or a transfer to determine the degree to which security reasons of that kind were responsible for the removal or the transfer, and that would make it, if not impossible, very difficult to draw up a list that could set out in a mathematically accurate way the number of cases—and they are not very numerous, you know—where there have had to be removals or transfers because of indications of unreliability with respect to loyalty to Canada.

It is practically impossible to give the exact number of employees of all categories dismissed, released or transferred for such security reasons, and if that list were established it might even be found to be not in the best interests of the public to make that kind of list public.

Here hon. members will realize that whenever anything like that has to be done, it is of course done because we feel it is necessary; but we feel sorry, whenever there does arise that kind of case, that action has to be taken, and we endeavour to act as a discreet employer and not to give any publicity that would be unnecessarily harmful, because, as has been said more than once here, we do not attempt to find guilt. We merely attempt to discharge our responsibility to be careful. We are not in the position of a court trying an individual and having to have direct evidence, but we would rather have the benefit of the doubt go the other way. If there is any doubt about the likelihood of there being disloyalty, we just cannot take any risks; but we do not feel that we are making any kind of conviction that would justify branding an individual in such a way as to cause him harm in the community generally. Whenever there are questions, we have to consider whether or not it is in the public interest that there be this possibility of identification that will cause unnecessary prejudice to an individual who has not had any trial, against whom no charge has been brought, but about whom we feel it would be undesirable to take risks.

I mentioned the possibility of there being, well, involuntary indiscretions. We know of cases where that has happened. In an evening party something occurs that unloosens one's tongue, and it wags more freely than it should in view of the information one has acquired because of his official position. We do not want to make that a scandal, but we do feel that it requires being careful and cautious, and I assure hon. members that we do try not to be unfair; but we also do try not to raise any hysterical anxiety over the personnel of the public service, because my experience has been that on the whole Canada is entitled to be proud of both the loyalty and the devotion of most of its public servants.

[Later:]

Mr. Fulton: Having regard to the answer the Prime Minister gave me earlier this day, and particularly the answer to part 8, might I ask if the Prime Minister is aware of the fact that on two occasions in the United Kingdom details as to the number of government employees released for security reasons have been given, and also that the names of an advisory board which hears security cases have been made public? In the light of that information, will the Prime Minister reconsider the matter of whether or not similar information could be produced in Canada?

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, Mr. Speaker, of course this government has no responsibility for what is done in the United Kingdom. Naturally, this government is always impressed by what is done in other countries, and it does consider whether what is done elsewhere would be appropriate to Canadian conditions. I know the hon. member is just as much concerned about this subject as we can be on this side of the house, and is concerned that the measures be effective without being unfair. I expect there will be a discussion about it when we come to the estimates of the Department of Justice.

If at that time the hon. member still feels that we are not going far enough, and will give his reasons, I can assure him they will be carefully considered, because it is not a matter between one party and another party. It is a matter in which all responsible Canadian citizens want to be fair, but they want the government to be prudent.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the Prime Minister a question on that point? What provisions, if any, exist for appeal on the part of a public servant affected by such decisions?

Mr. St. Laurent: There has been no formal mode of procedure set up, but I believe the gravity of making a removal or an exchange is always one of the considerations that the minister responsible for it has in mind. There are some cases where a thing like that can be done, you know, and it involves no possible unfairness. A suggestion may be made that an ordinary messenger become a confidential messenger. Whether or not he shall be made a confidential messenger has not been brought to his attention, so that is not dealt with nearly as seriously as where an officer in an important grade in the service is found to be someone who should be transferred to some other department.

We gave consideration to the possibility of appeal, and we even inquired from the officials in the United Kingdom how it worked there. We have not yet been able to convince ourselves that there would be any greater assurance of fairness to an individual by going beyond the rather informal character of the proceedings that are now taken in that regard. We have not found any system that could be considered as an appeal that would work.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CAPE BRETON PARK—BRIDGES

Mr. Nowlan:

In each of the calendar years since the Cape Breton park was instituted, how much money has been spent by the government of Canada for or in connection with each of the bridges in or adjacent to the said park?

Mr. Lesage: Return now tabled.

RURAL MAIL ROUTES—DISCONTINUANCE IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. Pommer:

1. Have any rural mail routes been discontinued in 1953, in (a) Manitoba; (b) Saskatchewan; (c) Alberta?

2. If so, in what locations?

3. Are steps being taken to discontinue any rural mail routes in (a) Manitoba; (b) Saskatchewan; (c) Alberta, in 1954?
4. If so, in what locations?

RURAL MAIL COURIERS—CONTRACT PRICES

Mr. Kickham:

1. Since 1935, has the government increased rural mail couriers contract prices?
2. If so, on what dates and in what amount?
3. What has been the total percentage of increase granted to all mail couriers since the above date over their own firm tender contract price?
4. What is the average rate of remuneration per mile now paid in each of the ten provinces of Canada for rural route service?

BELCHER HOSPITAL—TOTAL BED CAPACITY

Mr. Hansell:

1. What is the total bed capacity in the Belcher hospital, Calgary?
2. How many patients were treated, other than preliminary examinations in 1953?
3. What has been the total percentage of incraese pital, what are the categories of employment, and how many in each category?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence that passed between any department of the government of the United States and any department of the government of Canada, and a copy of all agreements entered into, since the 1st day of January 1952, in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway and power project.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, there is no difficulty in regard to the production of information sought in the last part of this question. It deals with all agreements entered into, since the 1st day of January, 1952, between Canada and the United States in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway and power project.

The first part of this question, however, asks for correspondence between the two governments in this matter. Such correspondence, being diplomatic correspondence between two governments with a view to working out an international agreement, and in that sense working papers leading up to that agreement, is normally privileged and not made public. There would therefore be a very real difficulty in producing that correspondence, quite apart from the fact that the consent of the United States government would have to be obtained.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow a question? Would the United States government raise any objection to producing that correspondence?

Mr. Pearson: At this time I am not objecting to it on that ground at all, but on the ground that this kind of correspondence is privileged here and is not produced.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the statement by the minister, is the motion carried?

Motion agreed to.

JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES—CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. Gagnon:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged since January 1, 1948, between the international Bible students, the watchtower and tract society, the Jehovah's witnesses and the national defence, justice and post office departments and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have spoken to the hon. member who is moving this motion, and suggested to him that the words "of a general nature" be inserted in the motion after the word "correspondence". It has been represented to me, by all the four departments concerned, that if we left the motion in its present form they would have to search every file they have because their filing system is based on subject. I have informed the hon. member of this fact, and he agrees that if we put those words in it would not be necessary for the department to scrutinize all their files but only to look in the most likely places for this correspondence. If the motion can be passed on that basis, it is quite agreeable to the government.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry, subject to the statement by the minister?

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

CIGARETTES—COMPLAINT ON LOSS LEADER PRACTICES IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister received a telegram from the retail tobacco merchants of Quebec, complaining against the selling of tobacco at cut prices, especially cigarettes which in some stores are sold at cost price and in some instances below cost price? If so, has the minister any declaration to make now with regard to this matter?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. I have received such a telegram, and I have written in reply to Mr. E. Falstrault, secretary of the retail tobacco association in Montreal, to the effect that the restrictive trade practices commission is now engaged in an inquiry into the practice of loss leader selling in the cigarette field and in other fields. The commission has announced that it will hold hearings beginning in early May for the purpose of receiving information and submissions. I have sent a copy of Mr. Falstrault's telegram to me to the commission so that the commission may advise the retail tobacco association as to the time and place of its hearings in the Montreal district, since I gather from the telegram that the association would wish to appear before the commission.

The purpose of the inquiry is to try to determine the prevalence and effects of the practice and to recommend suitable amendments if necessary to the Combines Investigation Act.

LOSS LEADERS—HOLDING OF COMMISSION HEARINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister inform the house at what points in Canada it is proposed to hold hearings under the restrictive trade practices commission on the subject of loss leader selling?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I cannot do so in detail but I can find out from the commission and inform the house tomorrow, if indeed the commission itself has as yet decided.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTIBILITY OF QUEBEC PROVINCIAL TAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. When can we expect the government to take a position on the question of the deductibility of the Quebec provincial income tax, and when can we expect that position to be made public?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I think I should take the two parts as forming one question, and answer that government policy on fiscal matters is normally announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in his budget speech, which this year, as has already been announced, is to be made on the evening of April 6. It can be expected the government's position in relation to the matter referred to in this question will be made public in that speech.

[Mr. Garson.]

ARMED FORCES

REPORTED REMOVAL OF UNITS AND SCHOOLS FROM CAMP BORDEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Will the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Speaker, give assurance that the current report that a substantial portion of the armed units and schools are to be moved from Camp Borden to the eastern part of Canada is not correct?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): There is nothing in the report.

NARCOTICS

SUGGESTED SOURCE OF SUPPLY IN ITALY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Has the attention of the Minister of Justice been drawn to a report in the Globe and Mail under date of March 23, 1954, to the effect that Sergeant Price of the R.C.M.P. said that he thinks Charles Luciano is the supplier of most of the illegal narcotics entering Canada by the west coast?

If so, can the minister inform this house if the R.C.M.P. has evidence to back up this statement, and if so will the Department of Justice be taking the matter up with the appropriate authorities in an endeavour to bring this vicious trade to a halt?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. In reply I would say that my attention has been drawn to articles which have appeared in the press which give the impression that a member of the R.C.M.P. narcotic drugs squad in Vancouver has given it as his opinion that Charles "Lucky" Luciano is responsible for the supplying of drugs now being smuggled into that city. I am advised that the member quoted merely referred the newspaper reporter to a report published by the subcommittee on narcotics of the judiciary committee of the California legislature in 1952 in which it is stated that Luciano has established headquarters in Italy from which he was supplying narcotic drugs to New York and San Francisco. The R.C.M. Police member did not express a personal opinion.

Luciano has been prominently mentioned in many newspaper headlines during the last few years which linked his name with the international drug traffic. His name has also been mentioned frequently by witnesses appearing before various vice commissions and committees in the United States.

I think the hon. member will understand that it is not a question of the R.C.M.P. having evidence, but I may say that the force has been in touch with police forces in several other countries in this connection and with the Italian police. I may also say that Luciano is the subject of a warning circular issued by the international police body.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO SHUT-DOWNS IN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. After sending the minister notice of this question it occurred to me that perhaps it may have been more appropriate to address this question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham). My question is this, based upon a telegram which I received this morning. Has the government any knowledge of the report appearing in the Calgary Albertan that the coal mines in Coleman, Alberta, are to close down operations on March 31, and that other mines in the Crowsnest pass are likely to follow with shut-downs? If so, does the government contemplate any remedial action?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, notice of my hon. friend's question reached me as I was entering the house. I have no information on the matter and I did not have an opportunity to speak to my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, who is more likely to have some information. Perhaps he could add something to my reply.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the report to which my hon. friend refers. I am sure all hon. members know that the coal industry in both eastern and western Canada is experiencing difficulty at the present time. In western Canada the industry's difficulties have been brought about largely through competition from oil and gas. I need not remind hon. members that the natural resources belong to the provinces. The province of Alberta has prospered enormously from the sale of natural gas and oil rights; only recently I saw a report of one sale amounting to over $30 million for two comparatively small areas of land. The province of Alberta is prospering from these recent developments. The coal industry is suffering from these developments. What I would like to know is, what is the Alberta government going to do about it?

Mr. Hansell: May I ask the minister a supplementary question, since his answer was somewhat long? Does the minister believe that the reason the railroads have adopted the diesel engine lies in Alberta's prosperity?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR CHANGES TO COVER SHORT DAY WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour and I trust he will take this as notice. In view of the relatively new and increasingly large-scale current practice in many industries, including the textile and machine-tool industries, of placing employees on a short day week in order to prevent lay-offs and consequent total unemployment, would the minister take into consideration making either appropriate changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act or appropriate changes in its present administration in order that industrial employees working on a short day week may receive full benefits under the act?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to take that as notice of my hon. friend's question.

GOLD

TRADING ON LONDON MARKET—STATEMENT AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) asked me if the government intended to initiate a gold market in Canada. There are no restrictions on the buying, selling, or ownership of gold in Canada. There are no restrictions placed by the government of Canada on the use which Canadians may make of their holdings of sterling or of any other currency. Gold may be imported into Canada but no undertaking will be given that a subsequent application to export the gold will be approved.

No changes in the regulations concerning the export of gold are currently under consideration. In the judgment of the government the present regulations serve the best interests of Canada. If any changes were to be made, there would, of course, be an immediate public announcement.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMMUNICATIONS

SALE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH SYSTEM—PROVISION FOR EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister now in a position to answer my question as to what provision is being made for government employees when the telephone and telegraph services of the federal government in British Columbia are taken over by private companies on April 1?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I am unable to add a great deal to what I have already said. The reason for that is that negotiations with the British Columbia Telephone Company have been proceeding satisfactorily. The negotiations with the Canadian National Telegraph Company have not yet been completed. These negotiations are proceeding at the present time. In any event, if it is felt that there is any immediate urgency the railways and shipping committee will be sitting all of next week and members of that committee can obtain information from Canadian National railway officials in connection with that part of the undertaking.

Mr. Winch: I would like to ask a supplementary question. Is the minister aware of the fact that agents of the Canadian National Telegraph Company have been visiting government employees now in the service for over a period of two weeks and informing them where they stand as far as the Canadian National telegraph service is concerned?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I should think that that is exactly what should take place and that the purchaser would wish to communicate with the vendor and ascertain what relationship will exist after the sale. That is I presume the reason why the officers of the Canadian National Telegraph Company have been in communication with the employees of the government telegraph and telephone services.

Mr. Winch: They have not asked them, they have told them.

Mr. Chevrier: As to what is transpiring between these two bodies I would rather not make any statement until the negotiations between our people and the Canadian National Telegraph Company have been completed.

[Mr. Abbott.]

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

TABLING OF SUPLEMENTARY ANSWER TO QUESTION ASKED MARCH 8

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on March 8 the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) was asked a question in regard to Votes and Proceedings No. 59, for February 26, in the name of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan), and he stated at that time that it would be difficult to supply all the information sought, but that if it was agreeable to the hon. member the information would be provided which it was hoped would serve the purposes he had in mind. The hon. member agreed to have the question answered in a modified form, and I am tabling the answer now.

PIPE LINES

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF SUBSIDIES—TRANS-CANADA GAS LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Has the government made any commitments, verbal or in writing, for the provision of tax concessions, tax remissions or any other form of subsidy in order to make financially feasible a trans-Canada gas pipe line in the form apparently desired by this government? If so, what are those subsidies? If not, does the government intend to extend such subsidies?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no. The second and third parts are answered by the answer to No. 1.

SUPPLY

INCOME TAX—PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply.

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member going to debate the subject which was under discussion prior to the adjournment last night?

Mr. LaCroix: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Very well. I understand that the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) will introduce a new subject later, once this matter has been disposed of.

M. Wilfrid LaCroix (Québec-Montmorency): Monsieur l'Orateur, le 28 novembre 1952, quelques mois avant la dernière élection fédérale, j'ai déclaré à la Chambre ce qui suit:

Je crois qu'il serait de l'intérêt de tous que la délimitation des possibilités de taxation accordées à chaque gouvernement soit revisée et précisée le plus rapidement possible car les subsides temporaires en face de droits acquis laissent entièrement le gouvernement qui les reçoit à la merci du donateur et constitue une situation inacceptable pour ma province.

Plusieurs rapports soumis à la Commission Tremblay depuis cette date m'ont donné raison. Permettez-moi de citer, entre autres, celui de la Corporation des ingénieurs professionnels de la province de Québec, qui déclare:

Les octrois, d'où qu'ils viennent, impliquent une possibilité d'intervention immédiate ou ultérieure, directe ou indirecte de la part du donateur, une possibilité de marchandage. Le danger est grand que la crainte du retrait de l'octroi tienne sous silence ou élimine de saines oppositions. A vrai dire, il faudrait que tous les gouvernements, ainsi que les universités se suffisent à eux-mêmes, sauf dans les cas d'extrême urgence.

En défendant cette thèse, je reste d'ailleurs dans la meilleure des traditions libérales. En effet, n'est-ce pas sir Wilfrid Laurier qui, en 1887, déclarait à Somerset, aujourd'hui Plessisville:

C'est un principe tout à fait faux que celui d'après lequel un gouvernement perçoit les revenus et un autre gouvernement les dépense.

Un article de la loi relative à l'impôt fédéral sur le revenu permet aux contribuables du Québec de déduire 5 p. 100 de la cotisation payée au fisc provincial. A la suite de l'élection fédérale, un échange de correspondance a eu lieu entre le gouvernement de Québec et celui d'Ottawa afin de déterminer si le gouvernement fédéral se chargerait au moins, volontiers, de la collection de ce 5 p. 100 déductible de l'impôt fédéral, et cela afin d'éviter une double taxation et de conserver la possibilité de distribuer en entier aux universités, aux collèges classiques et aux commissions scolaires le revenu provenant de ce 5 p. 100, leur assurant ainsi l'assistance dont ils ont absolument besoin. Le gouvernement fédéral a refusé, et il est évident que l'on a forcé ainsi le gouvernement provincial à organiser lui-même son service de collection dont le coût, à être déduit de ce 5 p. 100, ce qui ne peut laisser grand'chose aux institutions et services ci-dessus mentionnés.

A mon avis, le gouvernement provincial a parfaitement raison d'estimer qu'une part de 5 p. 100 ne serait pas suffisante, actuellement, pour lui permettre de donner à nos universités, maisons d'enseignement supérieur, etc., l'assistance dont elles ont absolument besoin pour leur permettre de vivre et développer l'héritage sacré de notre culture française dans le cadre de l'autonomie éducationnelle et fiscale.

J'ose espérer que le Parlement canadien consentira à accorder des dégrèvements plus considérables couvrant la totalité de l'impôt payé à l'État provincial. La justice et le bon sens réclament que l'on permette aux contribuables québecois des déductions équivalentes aux subsides qu'Ottawa leur a offerts pour signer une entente à laquelle le gouvernement du Québec renonce, comme c'est son droit pour exploiter lui-même ses sources de revenu et empêcher ainsi qu'un droit, laissé à la débandade sous forme d'abandon temporaire,—renouvelé trop souvent,—devienne périmé.

On objectera peut-être que le gouvernement provincial pourra un jour ou l'autre augmenter cet impôt et réclamer de nouveau une autre déduction, mais je crois qu'avec un peu d'esprit de conciliation, il y aurait moyen que les deux gouvernements s'entendent pour fixer une limite, basée sur un pourcentage du total de l'impôt sur le revenu et sur les sociétés perçu par Ottawa dans la province de Québec, comme je l'ai suggéré à la Chambre le 21 novembre 1952, ce qui aurait pour avantage de tenir compte des variations de la situation économique canadienne.

La province de Québec est chez elle dans le domaine de l'impôt sur le revenu, et d'ailleurs elle n'en retirera qu'une somme d'environ $25,000,000, somme très inférieure à ce que le gouvernement d'Ottawa lui offrait pour signer une entente fiscale, raison de plus pour déduire totalement de l'impôt fédéral celui qui sera versé au fisc provincial. Ottawa a, du reste, déjà donné des preuves de conciliation et cela sans consulter les autres provinces, lorsqu'il a permis aux corporations puissantes du Québec de déduire de l'impôt fédéral le 7 p. 100 qu'elles étaient obligées de verser au fisc provincial. J'ai confiance que cet esprit de conciliation servira à traiter les individus sur le même pied que ces corporations dont l'influence considérable a entraîné ce résultat.

On nous objectera que le gouvernement fédéral a besoin de tous ses revenus pour la défense. Mais examinons ce que représentent dans le budget fédéral les déboursés résultant des lois de sécurité sociale.

Nous constaterons que si le gouvernement provincial avait passé ces lois sans l'apport de l'impôt sur le revenu, il n'aurait pas resté grand'chose pour l'administration de la province, et tous admettront qu'aucun des gouvernements provinciaux, sans l'impôt sur le revenu, ne pouvait les adopter. Plus le gouvernement fédéral pénétrait dans le domaine de la sécurité sociale, plus il assumait des obligations financières qui le forçaient à augmenter l'impôt fédéral jusqu'au point de saturation, où il est rendu actuellement, provoquant la presque impossibilité, pour les provinces, d'utiliser l'impôt sur le revenu, et s'assurant ainsi le monopole de ce revenu.

A mon humble avis, tout cela est la conséquence des recommandations de la Commission Rowell-Sirois, créée à la suite d'un travail persistant des bureaucrates du Conseil du Trésor fédéral, afin de trouver un moyen de centraliser définitivement entre les mains du gouvernement d'Ottawa, sous prétexte de veiller à la défense nationale et à la sécurité sociale, ces deux importantes sources de revenus de l'impôt sur le revenu et de l'impôt sur les successions, auxquelles les provinces avaient droit et sans lesquelles elles ne peuvent pas se procurer les ressources nécessaires à l'administration des domaines qui leur sont assignés par la Constitution.

En résumé, si le gouvernement d'Ottawa, tout en adoptant les lois de sécurité sociale actuellement en vigueur dans notre pays,—que j'approuve entièrement d'ailleurs,—a pu offrir quand même à la province de Québec un subside de plus de 100 millions en échange de l'abandon de ses droits à l'impôt sur le revenu, comment peut-il alors refuser d'accorder aux payeurs de taxes du Québec une déduction de l'impôt fédéral représentant une somme inférieure à l'octroi ou au subside offert en échange de l'abandon de ses droits.

La population de la province de Québec jouit d'une culture française et confessionnelle dont elle est fière. Les écoles, les universités en sont les véhicules indispensables; mais pour les maintenir et les développer il est nécessaire d'avoir les revenus essentiels permettant de donner aux professeurs des traitements non pas dérisoires comme ceux qui leur sont payés actuellement, mais une rémunération qui les attache de plus en plus à l'apostolat magnifique qu'ils accomplissent chez nous depuis longtemps, avec tant de dévouement et de désintéressement.

L'école est l'usine où se moulent les générations montantes des jeunes Canadiens d'origine française, des citoyens dont la collectivité pourra, à juste titre, s'enorgueillir, permettant ainsi à deux cultures différentes de se développer parallèlement et d'enrichir notre patrimoine national d'une richesse intellectuelle qui n'a son équivalent qu'en Suisse.

[Mr. LaCroix.]

Les municipalités, qui relèvent du pouvoir provincial sont dans une situation précaire, et cela tout le monde le sait. Les commissions scolaires ont accumulé tant de dettes que l'État provincial a dû les assumer presque toutes; après cette intervention des autorités provinciales, elles tombaient à une vingtaine de millions de dollars. Mais, trois ans plus tard, elles atteignaient 59 millions et ont encore augmenté depuis, indication très claire que les ressources sont insuffisantes.

Au cours de l'exercice 1952-1953, la province de Québec a reçu comme contribution totale, de la part du gouvernement fédéral, la somme de $4,211,000, soit 1·49 p. 100 de son budget qui, pour cet exercice, était de l'ordre de $281,735,000. Ontario a touché la somme de $127,442,000, alors que son budget, pour la même période de 1952-1953, s'élevait à $339,566,000. Voici le tableau d'ensemble, pour 1952-1953, des revenus de chaque province et de la contribution qu'elles ont reçue du gouvernement central. Je cite:

Provinces	Revenu total	Contribution fédérale
Nouvelle-Écosse	$ 45,228,000	$ 20,360,000
Nouveau-Brunswick	46,401,000	16,333,000
Île du Prince-Édouard	7,133,000	3,939,000
Ontario	339,566,000	127,442,000
Manitoba	53,737,000	28,173,000
Saskatchewan	88,960,000	28,193,000
Alberta	142,467,000	35,440,000
Colombie-Britannique	184,737,000	48,579,000
Terre-Neuve	30,925,000	20,107,000
Québec	281,735,000	4,211,000

Ces chiffres vous démontrent combien modeste, juste et raisonnable est notre requête d'un dégrèvement de l'impôt fédéral couvrant la totalité de l'impôt payé à l'État provincial, ce qui équivaudrait à environ 25 millions.

Pour l'année fiscale terminée le 31 mars 1953, le gouvernement fédéral a perçu dans la province de Québec $286,595,000 en impôt sur le revenu des particuliers, $387,019,000 en impôt sur les corporations et $6,771,000 en impôt sur les successions, soit au total $680,385,000 en impôts directs. Cela représente un montant de $167.73 par tête. Or, la loi de l'impôt provincial ne représente que $5.50 par tête. Peut-on dire qu'on n'est pas raisonnable de demander $5.50 sur $167.73?

En 1930, le gouvernement fédéral et les municipalités, qui relèvent des provinces, percevaient à peu près le même montant de taxes, soit 316 millions et 307 millions respectivement; quant aux gouvernements provinciaux, leurs revenus s'élevaient à 158 millions. En 1951, les revenus fédéraux atteignaient la somme astronomique de 3,791 millions, tandis que les revenus provinciaux s'établissaient à 918 millions, et ceux des municipalités à 636 millions. En pourcentage, ces chiffres donnaient le tableau suivant:

REVENUS DE TOUS LES GOUVERNEMENTS

	1930	1939	1951
Fédéral	40·5	48·0	70·9
Provinciaux	20·2	22·3	17·2
Municipaux	39·3	29·7	11·9
	100·0%	100·0%	100·0%

L'examen de ce tableau nous indique qu'en 1930 le gouvernement fédéral prélevait 40·5 p. 100 de tous les impôts; en 1951, il en touchait 70·9 p. 100. Les gouvernements provinciaux n'ont pas bénéficié d'une avance équivalente durant la même période; leurs revenus sont passés de 20·2 p. 100 à 17·2 p. 100. Les municipalités ont subi un désastreux recul; elles percevaient 39·3 p. 100 de tous les impôts en 1930, et elles n'en touchent plus que 11·9 p. 100.

La province de Québec subit actuellement une perte matérielle sensible en menant seule cette lutte pour le maintien des privilèges et des libertés qui lui ont été reconnus par des traités engageant l'honneur britannique.

Ces privilèges et ces libertés ont été garantis par le pacte confédératif, garantie sans laquelle ses chefs religieux et politiques n'y auraient pas souscrit. En plus de ce que peut lui rapoprter son patrimoine, la province de Québec entend rester maîtresse de ses lois civiles, de ses libertés éducationnelles et religieuses, de ses traditions sociales. Et elle compte sur le sentiment d'équité de ses amis des autres provinces pour reconnaître que sa cause est juste et raisonnable.

On November 28, 1952, Mr. Speaker, a few months before the last general election I made the following statement in the house, as found at page 194 of Hansard:

I believe it would be in everybody's interest to revise and specify as soon as possible the limits of taxation possibilities granted each government; for temporary subsidies, because of vested interests, leave the receiving government at the donor's mercy and produce an entirely unacceptable situation as far as my province is concerned.

Since then many reports submitted to the Tremblay commission have supported my opinion. May I quote, among others, an excerpt from the report by the professional engineers corporation of Quebec. They say:

Subsidies from whatever source always imply the possibility of an intervention sooner or later, directly or indirectly, on the part of the grantor—the possibility of bargaining. There is much danger that healthy opposition may be stifled or suppressed by the fear that the grant may be withdrawn. Indeed, all governments, as well as universities, should be self-sufficient, except in cases of extreme emergency.

In supporting this theory I follow one of the best traditions of the Liberal party. Indeed, Laurier stated in 1887 at Somerset, now called Plessisville:

The principle whereby the revenues levied by a government are spent by another is absolutely unsound.

A provision in the federal Income Tax Act permits taxpayers of the province of Quebec to deduct 5 per cent of the amount paid to the provincial treasury. Following the federal election, an exchange of correspondence took place between the Quebec government and the federal government, to ascertain whether the federal government would at least agree to collect this 5 per cent tax deductible from the federal tax—and this in order to avoid double taxation and to ensure the distribution of the whole proceeds from this 5 per cent tax to universities, classical colleges and school boards, thus providing these institutions with the help which is absolutely needed. The federal government rejected this request, and by so doing obviously forced the provincial government to set up its own tax-collecting agency, the cost of which, if deducted from this 5 per cent tax, would not have left much for distribution to the above-mentioned institutions and services.

I think that the provincial government is perfectly right in assuming that a 5 per cent tax would be insufficient at present to provide our universities, our high schools and so on with the help they urgently need to carry on and develop the sacred heritage of our French culture, within the framework of educational and fiscal autonomy.

I hope that the parliament of Canada will agree to grant a more substantial tax deduction in order to cover the full amount of the tax paid to the province. Justice and common sense make it imperative that Quebec taxpayers should be granted deductions equivalent to the subsidies offered them by Ottawa to sign a tax rental agreement. The Quebec government was within its rights in rejecting this offer, as it preferred to tap its own sources of revenues and, in so doing, prevent the lapsing of a right which is too easily lost when it is repeatedly relinquished, even if only temporarily.

It may be objected that the provincial government may later on increase this tax and ask for a further deduction, but I think that if both governments showed some conciliatory spirit they could set a limit based on a percentage of the whole income and corporation taxes collected by Ottawa in the province of Quebec. This suggestion which I made in the house on November 21, 1952, would allow for variations in the economic situation of the country.

The province of Quebec is mistress in its own house in matters of income tax; besides, it will derive from this source only about $25 million, which is considerably less than the amount offered by the federal government in return for a tax rental agreement. This is a further reason to deduct from the federal tax the whole amount of the tax which will be paid to the provincial treasury. Moreover, Ottawa has already shown some conciliatory spirit, without consulting the other provinces, by allowing large Quebec corporations to deduct from the federal tax the 7 per cent tax they are required to pay to the provincial treasury. I am confident that the authorities will agree to deal with individuals on the same basis as with those corporations, whose widespread influence brought about such a result.

It may be objected that the federal government requires all its revenues for defence purposes. But let us examine the portion of the federal budget which disbursements for social security represent. It is seen that if the provincial government made such provisions without collecting the proceeds from the income tax, it would have had but little left for the administration of the province. Everybody will agree that none of the provincial governments, without imposing an income tax, could have passed such laws.

The farther the federal government entered into the social security field, the more it assumed financial obligations which compelled it to increase the federal tax, up to the saturation point which it has now reached. It has thus made it almost impossible for the provinces to levy an income tax, and has monopolized that source of revenue.

All that stems from the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois commission which was set up as the result of persistent efforts on the part of the bureaucrats of the federal treasury board, in order to find means of centralizing definitely in Ottawa, ostensibly to provide for national defence and social security, those two important sources of revenue—income tax and succession duties, to which the provinces were entitled and without which they had not the wherewithal to administer those fields assigned to them by the constitution.

In brief, if the government at Ottawa, when passing the social security legislation which is now in force, in this country, and which I approve entirely, was able to offer at the same time a subsidy to the province of Quebec of over a hundred million dollars in return for the abandonment of its rights to income tax, how then can it refuse to grant Quebec taxpayers a deduction from the federal tax of an amount smaller than the subsidy offered in exchange for the relinquishment of its rights?

The province of Quebec is endowed with a French and religious culture of which it is proud, and which is necessarily embodied in its schools and universities. In order to maintain and develop those institutions, it is essential to have sufficient revenues to pay our teachers salaries that will not be so ridiculously low as they are at present, but adequate to uphold their interest in the magnificent work which they have been carrying on for such a long time with deep devotion and self-denial.

The school is the mould in which the growing generation is being fashioned and which will produce young Canadians of French origin who will become citizens of whom the community will justly be proud. Thus two different cultures, developing side by side, will add to our national heritage intellectual treasures the equal of which can be found only in Switzerland.

Municipalities in my province which come under provincial jurisdiction are now in a precarious situation. School boards are so heavily in debt that the province was forced to assume most of that indebtedness. After the province stepped in, those debts were reduced to approximately $20 million. Three years later, however, they had reached $59 million and have increased since. That clearly indicates the inadequacy of financial resources.

During the 1952-53 fiscal year, the province of Quebec received from the federal government a total contribution of $4,211,000 or 1·49 per cent of its budget, which amounted to $281,735,000 for that year. Ontario received $127,442,000, although its budget in 1952-53 amounted to $339,566,000. I shall now place on record a table giving the revenues of each province, during the 1952-53 fiscal year, with the amount each province received from the federal government:

Provinces	Total Revenues	Federal Subsidy
Nova Scotia	45,228,000	20,360,000
New Brunswick	46,401,000	16,333,000
Prince Edward Island	7,133,000	3,939,000
Ontario	339,566,000	127,442,000
Manitoba	53,737,000	28,173,000
Saskatchewan	88,960,000	28,193,000
Alberta	142,467,000	35,440,000
British Columbia	184,737,000	48,579,000
Newfoundland	30,925,000	20,107,000
Quebec	281,735,000	4,211,000

Those figures show that our request for a deduction from the federal income tax of the whole amount of the income tax which is paid to the province—approximately $25 million—is reasonable, modest and fair.

During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1953, the federal government levied, in the province of Quebec, $286,595,000 in personal income tax, $387,019,000 in corporation income tax, and $6,771,000 in succession duties, a total of $680,385,000 in direct taxes. This represents $167.73 per capita. Under the provincial income tax law, the tax per capita is only $5.50. Can anyone say that it is unreasonable to ask for $5.50 out of $167.73?

In 1930, the amount of taxes collected by the federal government and the municipalities under provincial control was approximately equal: $316 million and $307 million respectively, while the revenues of provincial governments amounted to $158 million. In 1951, the revenues of the federal government reached the astronomical figure of $3,791 million, while those of the provinces were only $918 million and those of the municipalities $636 million. Expressed in percentage, the figures were as follows:

	Revenues of all governments
	1930	1939	1951
Federal government	40·5	48·0	70·9
Provincial governments ..	20·2	22·3	17·2
Municipalities	39·3	29·7	11·9
	100·0%	100·0%	100·0%

This table shows that the federal government collected 40·5 per cent of all taxes in 1930, and 70·9 per cent in 1951. The levies of the provincial governments increased only slightly during the same period. The situation of the municipalities has seriously deteriorated. While they collected 39·3 per cent of all taxes in 1930, they collect only 11·9 per cent at the present time.

The province of Quebec is now sustaining a heavy material loss in its lonely struggle for the maintenance of its privileges and freedoms, which have been recognized by treaties based on British fair play.

Those privileges and freedoms have been secured through the confederation pact, and nobody denies it; without this guarantee the religious and political leaders of the province of Quebec would not have accepted that pact. The province of Quebec intends to keep control over its heritage, its civil law, its educational and religious freedoms, and its social traditions. It has confidence that the sense of fair play of its friends from the other provinces will convince them that its claims are just and reasonable.

Mr. Balcer: Would the hon. member allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LaCroix: Certainly.

Mr. Balcer: Does the hon. member's speech reflect the general feeling of the federal Liberal members from the province of Quebec?

Mr. LaCroix: I was stating my own views.

Mr. Boisvert: I would like to direct a question to the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix). Will the hon. member allow me to do so?

Mr. LaCroix: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Boisvert: The hon. member seems to be well informed but has he any proof that the government of the province of Quebec was compelled to resort to a tax on personal and corporate incomes within the province in order to obtain an additional sum of $25 million?

Mr. Poulin: The people of Quebec will answer that question.

Mr. Boisvert: I am not directing it to the hon. member, but to the member for Quebec-Montmorency. Has he any proof that the government of the province of Quebec had to impose a tax on the taxpayers and the corporations of the province of Quebec to obtain additional revenue of $25 million?

Mr. LaCroix: In the circumstances, yes.

Mr. Balcer: Definitely, yes.

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before the hon. member for Lethbridge speaks, I understand that he is introducing a new subject. Do I understand that the previous subject is exhausted?

Mr. Dufresne: Perhaps the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) would like to speak on the subject.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, I rise to voice a grievance. The senior citizens of the federal riding of Lethbridge are suffering serious deprivation occasioned by the woefully inadequate financial assistance now being provided them by reason of the action or lack of action of this federal government and parliament.

May I remind the house and the country that prices of practically all commodities and services in Canada have risen enormously, in some cases doubling, since this parliament last substantially increased its allowance to the elderly folks in Canada.

May I also remind the house and the country that never yet has the meagre pension granted the senior citizens of Canada rendered possible even the bare necessities of healthful existence to any old age pensioner obliged to live upon only that pension. In other words, we have never provided the bare necessities of healthful living for our elderly citizens in this country.

May I further remind Canadians of the tremendous amount of goods and services this nation is equipped right now to produce? In this connection may I cite once more the fact that in 1952 our production exceeded $23 billion in value, equivalent to well over $1,530 for every man, woman and child in this country. On the face of it, it looks utterly preposterous that we should not be able to give our senior citizens enough of those goods and services to provide a comfortable and satisfying standard of living.

May I finally remind Canadians that in any community of richly varied resources and richly varied products such as Canada has, what is physically possible could be made financially possible provided that a realistic financial system be employed, a financial system including an instrument appropriately resembling the Finance Act of 1923?

I have gone into this with some care in times past, and I hope to go into it more elaborately as days go by, for somehow or other it must be brought to the attention of the ordinary person of Canada that what is physically possible ought to be financially possible and if—

An hon. Member: C.C.F. policy.

Mr. Blackmore: —we are not rendering what is physically possible financially possible then something is radically wrong. In all probability, that something is the financial system.

Mr. Ellis: Economic system.

Mr. Blackmore: Financial system, because the financial system is the system which has to do with distributing goods.

May I point out that it is becoming almost monthly more and more difficult for any one of most individuals to provide for his own needs. We often hear people say, "When my old dad came to this country he went out into the wilderness and he hewed out a home, etc., etc." They quite forget that the conditions which obtained when "my old dad" came out to this country no longer prevail.

An hon. Member: Go west, young man, go west.

Mr. Blackmore: Now, if you go west you go into the sea. As a matter of fact, while we are on this matter, it is no longer possible for the ordinary person to go out into the wilds, take up land, and have a chance of making good. This means that conditions have completely changed.

Now, there are other reasons why it is next to impossible for people to provide for their own old age. Taxation is severe. "My old dad" did not have to exist under any such taxation structure as that levied by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) today. Living costs are high. Regulated standards of living are almost unavoidable. Jobs for those over 45 are becoming less and less available. I know of people who have walked the streets for days and days, and who have been refused even consideration after it was learned that they were 45 years of age. What conceivable chance have men and women under such conditions to provide for their own declining years?

Self employment is growing harder to provide. Such industries as laundering, sewing, knitting, the provision of milk, cream, butter, cheese, eggs, etc., all of which were occupations through which the elderly used to be able to eke out an existence, are now mainly non-available to our senior citizens. Practically every member in this house can recall the time when, if elderly people fell upon difficult days, they were able to take in washing or keep a cow and sell the milk, butter and cheese, or sell a few eggs, and get a few cents in that manner. In the average community today, no one of these industries is available to the elderly people. This is because machines have taken the place of these industries, and in many cases the keeping of a hog or a cow is forbidden by community laws.

All these matters and many others must be taken into consideration in any realistic approach to the problem of the elderly citizens of this country.

The problems of elderly people become yearly more pressing for several reasons. In the first place people are living longer—and we want them to live longer. We want them to attain the age of 125 or 150. The Bible commands:

> Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

Canadians are keenly sensitive to that command. How can we be honouring our fathers and mothers when we are almost starving them to death or when we are forcing them to live for years with only one suit or in a hand-me-down overcoat? This matter requires attention, and requires effective redress. In the second place, families appear to be growing smaller. Just why our particular race should be cursed with the idea that they ought to eliminate themselves from the earth now by having one child and four or five poodle dogs per family, I do not know. Nevertheless, that is what is happening. Since the elderly people are living longer and the number of elderly people to be taken care of by those who are actively producing and paying taxes appears to be getting progressively larger in proportion, something must be done. We have to face up to this matter.

There is no reason why we cannot take care of our elderly people, considering the accumulating machines and skills which enable us to produce enough. Our problem is how to distribute our production to the elderly.

In previous parliaments I have asked that we consider, and if possible grant, $60 per month to our elderly citizens at the age of 60. We could make that possible. It will be objected that an increase in taxation would be necessary in order to pay such a pension. I maintain that an increase in taxation would not be needed if we employed a realistic financial system, one that was genuinely able to make what is physically possible financially possible. We can take the money out of production by simply monetizing our surplus production.

Let us bear in mind that a dollar bill, looked at in the most realistic sense, is merely a ticket to goods. This would naturally suggest to any practical mind that where there are surplus goods dollar bills can be created as tickets to represent those goods. If we start with that concrete way of looking at the matter, I believe we can think ourselves through. We can monetize our goods and our services either by using the Bank of Canada or by re-enacting and using a finance act as they had it in 1923 or in 1914.

It will be recalled that through the use of the finance act of 1914, $16 million—

Mr. Martin: I rise to a point of order. I do not like to interfere with the hon. member's argument, but I do feel that, under the circumstances, I should point out to you, sir, that while it is understandable that the hon. member perhaps should discuss the immediate proposal he has in mind, it is doubtful if on this particular motion it is proper for him to discuss monetary policies or Social Credit theory, commendable or not commendable as that theory may be. There is a place for that kind of discussion. An opportunity will soon be afforded when the budget is presented, but I would submit that on this resolution a discussion of the theory of Social Credit is not in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister has raised a point of order which is of considerable interest. I notice also that in the estimates, vote 282 under the Department of National Health and Welfare, there is a provision for the administration of old age assistance and blind persons allowances. Under citation 345, of which I shall only read a part, we find the following:

> The ancient doctrine that the redress of grievances should be considered before the grant of supplies is maintained in the House of Commons of Canada . . .

Then later it goes on to say:

> Matters of detail which should be discussed in committee cannot be debated on these occasions, nor can debate be permitted relating to grants already agreed to, or to resolutions which will be proposed in the committee, or to items in the estimates.

Such questions are always difficult, and I hesitate to make a definite ruling, but I do feel the point of order raised by the minister is well taken, and I would ask the hon. member to confine himself to a discussion of grievances which can properly be discussed under this motion.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order may I ask that at some stage further study be given the point which arises out of the sentence Your Honour read from citation 345. There is a reference in that citation to discussing items in the estimates. I submit it is one thing to discuss an item in the estimates, and to say that that item should or should no be passed. It is another thing to discuss a matter which, it might be said, could be raised on the estimates. That matter is dealt with not only in citation 345 of Beauchesne's third edition, but it is also dealt with in citation 467 of the same edition. At the end of citation 467 there appears the notation "M.525." That means that the gist of citation 467 is to be found at page 525 of May's thirteenth edition, and if one goes a little further in his research he will find that on page 525 of May's thirteenth edition the point is dealt with by a reference to some footnotes. These footnotes take one back to volumes 165, 173, 189, and 209 of the British Hansard. I have taken the trouble on former occasions to look up these various volumes of the British Hansard and it is quite clear that the significance of that citation is that an hon. member is not permitted on the motion to go into supply to discuss the estimates themselves. There are instances in these volumes of the British Hansard which are referred to in that footnote, in which members were proposing to argue for or against an item in the estimates. The speaker stopped the member from doing so but permitted him to discuss in general the question which he had raised, so long as he stayed clear of speaking for or against an item in the estimates as such. Your Honour has not stopped the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) so I shall not pursue my argument further, but I do submit that since the point has been raised the references I have given should be studied before the point comes up again on another occasion.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, may I just briefly say that I certainly did not suggest that the hon. member had no right to discuss old age pensions and assistance at this time. What I was complaining about was that this was not a motion to discuss monetary policy which may have some, but only some, bearing on this matter. The hon. member can discuss the need to improve old age pensions and that sort of thing but I was suggesting that this was not the time to engage in a discussion of monetary theory.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am afraid we are interfering with the hon. member for Lethbridge at too great length. I was very glad to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). This point is one of considerable difficulty and interest and I will be glad to take his remarks into consideration.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, if anyone were to rise and advocate a pension of $60 per month at the age of 60 in a country of which 90 per cent was desert anyone would be justified in asking how in the world we could produce goods to support that pension. One of the most important things would be that one would have to satisfy oneself that we have sufficient goods and a sufficient level of production to enable us to provide such a standard of living.

But having established that there will be plenty of goods, one has to satisfy oneself next as to whether there is a method of making these goods available to the old age pensioners. If that cannot be done then certainly the strength of my appeal on behalf of old age pensioners will be greatly vitiated. Consequently, I fail to see how a person could make a real case for increasing old age pensions in Canada without referring to the method by which that production, once it is brought into existence, can be placed in the hands of elderly people without taking so much in taxation from the population as to render the burden unbearable.

I spent some time on that subject and it was not my intention to discuss Social Credit. I merely wished to show that to any person facing existing facts realistically it is an absolute outrage for us to deprive our elderly citizens of the good things of life.

I am rather surprised that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) should rise on a point of order when a method was being suggested by which, if he acted on the suggestion, he could strengthen his hand tremendously in doing the thing he surely wants to do. Certainly the Minister of National Health and Welfare wishes to increase the old age pension to $60 a month if means can be found whereby that can be done. But for him to raise a point of order when the problem is being solved for him surprises me considerably.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and also the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for what both of you have said, but if hon. members of this house do not want to learn these things then I suppose we shall have to stop discussing them lest we offend them.

I was about to point out that there will be those who will claim that in connection with the use of the device I referred to, and I referred to the Finance Act of 1914, nothing effective can be done. But I would point out that, under the Finance Act of 1914, $16 million were created and brought into circulation by the Minister of Finance and that sum was backed only by railway securities. What has been done in the past can surely be done again, and if it cannot be done again then certainly an explanation ought to be forthcoming as to why it cannot be done again.

That was all I was dealing with. I had intended to say something about the remarks of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Jones) when he maintained the other day that such a procedure would cause inflation. I had intended to show that he was in error when he supposed that the operation of this act would cause inflation. I was also going to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). He displayed some anxiety and felt that if we used the finance acts of 1914 and 1923 we would be placing in the hands of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) a very powerful weapon which he might use to the detriment of the nation. I was going to point out that when the minister of finance created money under the finance acts of 1914 and 1923 every dollar he created had to be created with the specific permission of parliament, and every dollar he spent had to be spent with the particular permission of parliament. In the same fashion, we must now have the permission of parliament in order to raise money as is prescribed in each budget, and the estimates under which that money is spent receive the scrupulous scrutiny of members of parliament. It is therefore obvious that parliament now controls the behaviour of the Minister of Finance. In a similar manner parliament would control the actions of the minister administering a finance act like that of 1914 or of 1923.

Once that difficulty has been cleared up there can be no serious objections to the proposal I was making. I do not hesitate, Mr. Speaker, to advocate once again that we should set up as our immediate goal the payment of a $60 a month pension to our senior citizens after they reach the age of 60. I stipulate that that would not cause an increase in taxation if we used a realistic financial system.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to comment on the financial proposals put forward by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, but I should like to say a few words in support of his contention—which some of us have made frequently on the floor of this house—that the time has come for an increase in the amount paid to our old age pensioners.

It seems to me that the case is so clear for an increase in that pension that it should not be necessary to argue for it at all. The amount of the pension across Canada at the present time is $40 a month, a figure that was reached in 1949 just prior to the election before the last one. Since that time the cost of living has gone up. It should also be pointed out that the Canadian standard of living has improved. As technological progress makes possible an improved standard of living I submit that our senior citizens should share in that improvement.

Not only has there been an increase in the cost of living and an improvement in the standard of living in this country but there has been a tremendous increase in our gross national production. In the year 1949, when the old age pension was fixed at $40 a month, our gross national production was of the order of $16 billion a year. At the present time that figure is of the order of $24 billion a year, or perhaps it is even closer to $25 billion a year. If we have been able to increase our gross national production in this country by 50 per cent since the time the old age pension was set at $40 a month, I submit that that pension should be increased at least by that same amount, namely 50 per cent. If a pension of $40 a month is increased by 50 per cent, that brings it at least to the figure of $60 a month.

Moreover, in the years that have gone by since the pension figure was set, there have been other increases. There have been wage and salary increases in many cases. There have been many increases, voted by parliament, in the salaries of various people, not forgetting the increase that was voted this year in the indemnities paid to senators and to members of parliament and in the salaries of cabinet ministers. In the light of all of these changes that have been made and in the light of the improvements that are enjoyed by other people, I suggest that it is a disgrace to parliament and a crying shame that the government has done nothing to improve the position of our senior citizens. I feel that this session should not be allowed to go by without the government's introducing the necessary measure to increase the amount of that pension.

Like the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), I feel that the eligible age should be lowered with respect to the pension without a means test. There are those who suggest that the pension should start at age 60 and there are others who suggest that it should start at age 65. Perhaps that is a point over which we should not get into an academic argument at this time. However, I certainly believe that the very least that should be done at the present time is to remove from the pension at age 65 the means test which we now have and pay the full amount of at least $60 a month at that age. It is utterly ridiculous that so many people find themselves in the position of being retired from industry at the age of 65, having just enough by way of their own resources that they cannot qualify for old age assistance but being told that if they can somehow manage to live through the five years from age 65 to 70, they will then get the full old age security pension without a means test. It does not make sense; it does not add up; it is not to the credit of the parliament of Canada. I suggest that that change is long overdue.

There are other changes of a similar character that should be made. I hope that we shall not have to wait many more days before the government will bring in whatever other legislation it has respecting our veterans, and that that other legislation will include an increase in the amount of the war veterans allowance. In my view our senior citizens in these various groups deserve more than the brush-off they have had from the government in these recent years.

The plan that was put through as a result of the sittings of the committee on old age security back in 1950 was, in principle, an excellent one. At that time it was also good in respect of its terms. But just because something was good at one point in time does not mean that it is good enough in those precise terms for all time to come. What annoys me is that the government seems to be satisfied to sit back and let the matter stand as it was settled as a result of the meetings of that committee in 1950. Time has moved on and our senior citizens deserve a better deal than we are now giving them. As I have done on previous occasions, I urge strongly once again that the amount of the old age pension should be increased to not less than $60 a month. At the same time that that pension is being increased, the amount paid to our blind pensioners should be increased and, in my view, the means test should be completely removed from the blind pension.

These, Mr. Speaker, are but some of the items of unfinished business that were left over when parliament was dissolved last year. If I recall correctly, the very last recorded vote in the House of Commons before the dissolution of the twenty-first parliament was on an amendment of mine asking for an increase in these pensions commensurate with the increase in the cost of living. That amendment, of course, was defeated by the majority on the government side; but that item is still a matter of unfinished business and I submit that it has high priority so far as the people of Canada are concerned. I support strongly the proposal that at this session of parliament something should be done to increase the old age pension and the blind pension. I also hope that, before very long, the government will bring in legislation increasing the amount of the war veterans allowance and doing something about the means test in respect of the burnt-out pension. These things are long overdue.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) intends to introduce a new subject. Do I understand that the hon. member for Macleod desires to speak on the same subject?

Mr. Hansell: Yes. I will take only a moment or two. I had not intended to say anything and would not have done so except that another note has been injected into the discussion. I am thankful that the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has introduced this subject. I wish only to amplify his remarks with one or two other suggestions. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is in the house at the present time. He interrupted the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) when he was attempting to give the minister a remedy for his apparent dilemma. I am quite sure we all agree that the minister is just as anxious to increase old age security pensions as anyone else. We have always regarded the minister as a humanitarian. Otherwise I do not suppose he would be occupying the position he does. Yet it does seem quite strange to me that when the hon. member for Lethbridge began to put forward a suggestion as to how this thing could be done the minister rose on a point of order which, Mr. Speaker, you are now considering. I am not dealing with the point of order. The only point I am raising is that surely the minister wants to find a remedy.

Is the minister looking around for a remedy? Can the minister find this remedy within the confines of the government's present taxation policy? If he cannot, then he is up against it for a solution. There is no other argument to that. The minister can rise in his seat session after session and explain the marvellous work that his department has done and I will give him credit for all that has been done. But, after all, in the final analysis the remedy resolves itself into the financial policy that the government wishes to pursue because it is the government's present financial policy that is tying the hands of the minister so far as increasing old age security pensions is concerned.

I have heard ministers and political speakers boast before of what their government has been able to do, but I have never been able to bring myself to believe that it takes such a huge amount of brains to be able to figure out how much you need to do a certain job and then turn around and ask the law clerks to devise a piece of legislation that is going to increase taxation. It does not take any brains to do that. A schoolboy can take out his pencil, figure out how much is needed for a certain thing and then go to his old man and ask him to cough up. That is all the brains it takes to do such a thing under present monetary policy.

Mr. Zaplitny: What if the coffers are empty?

Mr. Hansell: If the coffers are empty you have another problem, and that, my hon. friend, is where we as Social Crediters come in.

Mr. Goode: Then you put on the 5 per cent sales tax.

Mr. Hansell: Our remedy is to change the basic financial policy so that it can be done.

Mr. Prudham: In other words, start the printing presses.

Mr. Low: The minister ought to go and learn something.

Mr. Hansell: I fancy the reason the Minister of National Health and Welfare rose was that he did not want this matter to be discussed now. He rose and said that there was a proper time to discuss it. O.K.; suppose we agree with him. When it is discussed at that time I do not suppose the minister will be the least bit interested in listening to the discussion.

Mr. Martin: I would always be interested in listening to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Hansell: I surely appreciate that, Mr. Speaker. Is he interested in—

Mr. Blackmore: In learning.

Mr. Hansell: —finding a remedy? Can he find it under the present policy, and is he interested enough to urge the government to change the policy so that a remedy can be found?

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I will only detain the house for a few minutes. I want to support the plea made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It is not the first time, and I am sure it will not be the last, that he has made a plea for the senior citizens of this country. I agree with everything he said and therefore I see no necessity of repeating his arguments. The particular question I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has to do with the administration of the Old Age Security Act rather than with the over-all question of what the amount of the pension should be. From time to time we run across the problem of proof of age, with which I am sure the minister is familiar. I realize that some adjustments have been made in the regulations but we still face the problem, particularly in the case of persons who have come from other countries where quite often the only proof of age they can submit is their immigration record. The information on that record is of course taken from their passports when they enter Canada.

I realize that in these days passports are fairly complete documents containing considerable detail with respect to the person's age and so forth. But in the early days of immigration into this country, in the last part of the nineteenth and the early part of the twentieth centuries, people who came here from European countries had passports that were not particularly complete. I have examined hundreds of them myself and I have yet to see one in which the actual date of birth of the person concerned is stated. In those days only the year of birth was shown. The result is that in such cases, even though the applicant may be able to prove that he or she, as the case may be, was born in a certain year, that of course does not prove that the applicant reached the age of 70 at such and such a date. That part of the submission must be supported by other means.

As I have stated quite often, these passports are the only existing available documents containing any proof of age. As one who has had a great deal of experience in dealing with these matters in my own part of the country, I would certainly recommend that the department lean over backwards in accepting the stated date of birth provided there is some supporting evidence to substantiate it. If the inflexible attitude is taken by the department that the applicant must prove his exact date of birth and only in the case of inability to do so will it accept the year of birth it means that the pension may not be paid until the end of the particular year in order to make sure that the person has reached the age of seventy. In many cases an injustice is done.

I realize there is some risk in accepting a person's word as to the exact date of birth, particularly if it is unsupported by any evidence, but if it costs the treasury a few thousand dollars a year because of cases where there may be errors, that is a small sum to pay to avoid injustices such as have occurred in the past. I have plenty of evidence of such injustices. I hope the minister will take this matter into consideration. I realize it is one having to do with regulations under the act and does not require legislation by the house, but it is one way in which injustices can be avoided. I merely want to add that I support the contention of my colleagues with respect to the removal of the means test, particularly in the case of blind pensioners.

People who are in that category are perhaps the most unfortunate type of citizens, and I think we should use the greatest possible leniency in respect of persons who are receiving blind pensions. Often it is possible for them to supplement their incomes to some extent by some form of employment. We are told, by those who know better than we do, that nothing could be better for the mental health and well-being of persons of that type than to have some kind of employment to keep them occupied and happy, and to give them a feeling of usefulness in society. It seems to me unfair and unnecessary to penalize such persons because they are able to earn a few dollars in addition to the pensions they receive. I certainly hope that if there is going to be some priority exercised in the removal of the means test from pensioners it should be exercised first of all in respect of the blind pensioners.

I support to some degree the arguments offered by my friends to the left. Occasionally I make interjections when they speak, but I hope they will not feel I do so in any spirit of levity. It is merely because at times they do say humorous things. I agree with hon. members in the Social Credit group on the general principle that what is physically possible should be made financially possible. Perhaps we do not agree one hundred per cent on the method by which this could be done, but certainly I think it is time the house considered the fact that the productive capacity of our country has increased tremendously, and is still increasing. As was pointed out not long ago, our gross national product in 1953 reached a value of more than $24 billion. If it is possible to produce goods and services to the extent of $2 billion a month, then certainly there must be something radically wrong with our financial system if it does not distribute the wealth it has created.

I certainly hope the house will give its unprejudiced attention to the ways and means by which the distribution of wealth in this country can be accomplished. We have our views on that subject. My colleagues and I on various occasions have suggested how we think it can be done. I simply reiterate that we still believe the best and most effective way in which to redistribute the wealth of the country and to place purchasing power in the hands of the people who need it, and who can and will use it, is by the social security measures we have championed through the years.

There may be other ways. We are open to suggestions and would like to hear the government's views of how they intend to do it. But there is one thing upon which I think we will all agree, regardless of party, and that is that if we can produce goods and services to a value of $24 billion, even allowing a third for capital replacement and extension, we must find some means of distributing the other $18 billion to the people so that we may raise the general standard of living of all our citizens.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take only a very few minutes to place on record one or two statistics that I do not think have been borne in mind by those who have spoken this afternoon, with the exception of the sponsor. At least the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) predicated his submission upon a monetary theory that is not now the orthodox and accepted way of financing government expenditures in this country.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

But others who have spoken, I take it, assume that the general monetary policy pursued in this country at the present time is, generally speaking, the one that should be pursued. And within the context of that assumption it should be noted that the proposal made by the hon. member for Lethbridge, on the basis of 1951 figures, assuming a population aged 60 of 1,631,900 would cost a total of $1,174,968,000. On the basis of an estimated population aged 60, for 1954, of 1,734,000, the total cost of that program would be $1,248,480,000. This would mean that we would spend in 1954, for old age security, not the sum of $339 million, as we now estimate, but an additional $900 million.

Now, I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member who has just spoken, and who generally gives great thought and care to what he says, if they seriously wish anyone in the house or in the country to believe, having in mind even the present level of the national product, that it is possible for us to do these things?

I take second place to no man in my desire to see improved and responsible social measures; but it is my duty as Minister of National Health and Welfare to point out the limitations and the extent to which some of these things can be realized.

Mr. Argue: Try deficit financing.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says to try deficit financing. Well, let me tell him what the provincial treasurer in the province of Saskatchewan has to say about irresponsible suggestions such as are made from time to time by some people, including the hon. member. Here is what Mr. Fines, provincial treasurer in Saskatchewan, said the other day:

> We must not increase our social services and health services and educational services to a level beyond which we cannot maintain them.

Those are words which, if used by me, would bring opposition at once from my honourable and genial friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. But I have quoted, not a Liberal—no, not a doctrinaire Liberal—I have quoted the provincial treasurer in the only socialist government in this part of the British commonwealth.

Seriously, sir, I think we must realize that when proposals are made in the House of Commons they can raise false hopes; and I suggest the proposal made today, having in mind that it would be financed under an orthodox financial system, is one that cannot be taken seriously. When one considers that the total expenditures of the government are in the neighbourhood of $5 billion, can an hon. member suggest that, in one particular field alone, we should make an increase which would cost an extra $900 million on top of what we are now spending? I suggest that is a proposal which cannot be taken as having been offered on serious reflection.

Before the recommendation by the parliamentary committee on old age security in 1950 we were spending $106 million on old age pensions. Today we are spending on old age security, as I said, for 714,197 recipients the sum of more than $28 million a month by way of old age security in respect of those aged 70 and over. We are spending for the fiscal year 1953-54 the sum of $339 million; and every year there is an increase on an average of about $15 million. When one takes into account the ageing of our population, it will be seen that the cost will grow.

Even on the basis of the present amount, which represents three and a half times what we were spending three years ago, old age security within the next few years will become the most expensive single item in our social security program. On the 700,000 to 800,000 aged 70 and over—and I am not now dealing with those aged 60 and over—we will be spending more than we spend now for two and a half million families, with five million children, through family allowances; three times as much as for disability pensioners of world wars I and II, and three times as much as for unemployment insurance benefits paid out to insured unemployed members of our entire national labour force of 5 million paid workers.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister relate that to our defence budget as well?

Mr. Martin: Our defence budget is around $2 billion. I would suggest this. The government will be introducing during this session a nation-wide scheme of disability allowances. As I said earlier, and as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) indicated, the government, having in mind its responsibilities in peace and war arising out of our relations with other countries, having in mind our other domestic obligations, continually bears in mind the desirability of providing responsible measures for social welfare for our people. When these various schemes are proposed without any relation to what we are doing in other fields, without any relation to what we still have in mind, I suggest that they present the greatest obstacle to the realization of other measures which in the course of time, in the light of our obligations, we will want to consider and propose.

Do we want to see a nation-wide scheme of disability allowances such as contemplated by the government at this session of parliament?

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear; and soon.

Mr. Martin: Do we want to see Canada's national health program expand in public health, cancer control and so on.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, and health insurance too.

Mr. Martin: Do we want to see improvements in certain features of veterans' social welfare measures? Do we want to see improvements in our unemployment insurance provisions? Do we want to see improvements in the provisions we make for the blind? Do we want further measures taken to relieve the burden on our people in the matter of our hospital and medical care? If we really want to see these things done, then I ask my hon. friend if he really is sincere. If we are really sincere, no one then will make a proposal which at this time we all know could not possibly be accepted and would only thwart the fulfilment of these other objectives.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was a member of a parliamentary committee that went into the whole question of old age security. That committee, made up of all political parties, was of the view that we should now try to base our social security measures on the contributory principle in so far as that was possible, if we were going to extend universal coverage as distinguished from the partial coverage system that they have in the United States.

Well, now, if we were sincere then, why should we be less sincere now in trying to maintain the contributory principle? Here is what the committee of which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was a member, of which the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), representing the Social Credit party, was a member, a committee which did distinguished work, said:

> The committee is in favour of the contributory principle, not only because of the importance of this in raising total moneys required, but also because of the importance of establishing a close association in the mind of the individual between his contribution to the cost and the ultimate benefit he is to receive.

That was what all hon. members wanted in 1950. If we are going to still maintain that principle which they advocated with great vigour, then they should at the same time not bring in these proposals without letting the country know what it would cost by way of additional contributions by the people of Canada. This would mean an additional cost; it would impose an additional burden not of 2 per cent, but a burden going up as high as 10 per cent on individual persons in this country.

I commended the members of that committee when they made that recommendation to the house for the objective approach that they had made to this problem. I should like to think that in the consideration of these important matters I would be able to continue to commend hon. members for adhering firmly to the principle that they themselves recommended to this house. If they do that, they will find that we shall make very considerable progress in developing responsible social measures for the people of this country whom we all want to help.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister permit one question?

Mr. McIvor: I want to ask one question.

Mr. Fulton: We are not in committee.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister for or against an increase in old age pensions?

Mr. Martin: There is no one in this house who is not as anxious as the hon. member to do what they can to improve the welfare of any segment of our population.

Mr. Knowles: Where does the minister stand?

Mr. Noseworthy: I want to ask the minister what answer we are to take back to the old age pensioners who are now literally starving on $40 a month?

Mr. Martin: The answer to take back is this. The hon. gentleman can point out that in addition to the assumption of full responsibility for people 70 years of age and over the federal government is now being assisted in what it is doing for our aged citizens by supplementary payments that are being made in the province of British Columbia to the extent of $15, in the province of Alberta to the extent of $15, and in the province of Saskatchewan to the extent of $2.50. I would say that if my hon. friend really wanted to, he should examine the extent to which all provinces are bearing their share in the matter of supplementary assistance.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH SYSTEM

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we should leave this interesting debate on old age security where it now lies. Hon. members from the C.C.F. party and Social Credit party have had their answer, but I am quite sure no one could advise them as to what interpretation they put on the answer given by the minister. I must say that it did not seem to me to deal very specifically with their questions; but I want now to deal with another matter which is of concern to the whole province of British Columbia.

Mr. Martin: Sometimes the best way to water a garden is not to put water on it.

Mr. Fulton: That is a profound observation.

Mr. Knowles: The minister is all wet.

Mr. Fulton: I want to bring forward a matter which is of concern to a large area of the province of British Columbia, namely, the sale and transfer to the Canadian National Telegraphs and the British Columbia Telephone Company respectively of the government telegraph and telephone system in that province.

The government telegraph and telephone system serves the central and northern areas of the province and some portions of Vancouver island. For some time we have been trying to obtain from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) a full statement of the position which is going to result from this sale and transfer. The minister has indicated to us from time to time in replying to questions that he feels himself not in a position to give any details on it for the reason that negotiations with the purchasers are still continuing. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that, according to the last information I have, the transfer is going to be made effective as of April 1, just one week from today.

The reason I am bringing the matter forward now is that there are matters which are giving very great concern to the public generally served by that system as well as to the employees of the system, and it would seem to me to be a rather hollow discussion if we are not to have any details or are not going to be in a position to make any recommendations as to the points that should be covered in the terms of sale or, alternatively, if we should find that these features are not covered, and we are not going to be in a position to make any protests until the transfer is made. If we are going to make protests and carry on a discussion after the transfer has taken place, at a time when the chance of effecting adjustments and obtaining satisfaction with respect to these points has gone by, then it would be a hollow discussion. It is for that reason that I raise the matter now, although I appreciate the obvious difficulty the minister finds himself in while negotiations are in process.

I suppose the negotiations are of a character that might normally be regarded as private, and it is difficult to make public the details of what you are actually negotiating at the time the negotiations are taking place. But I raise the matter now for the further purpose that the minister may know, and the purchasers may know, the opinion of this house and of the member who represents a constituency where a large area is dependent upon this service. The government and the purchasers will thus learn the conditions which we feel should be covered in that transfer concerning the protection that should be afforded to the public with respect to continuation of service, and to employees of the government system with respect to their seniority rights if they transfer to the service of the purchaser, and also with respect to their superannuation rights.

Now, I do not think I need to go into much detail, Mr. Speaker, as to the importance of this question to the area served. I believe it will be sufficient if I say that by and large it is a comparatively sparsely populated area, a portion of which lies in my constituency. It is mainly farm and ranch country, including the territory from Ashcroft and Lytton to Lillooet and the whole of the Cariboo and Chilcotin range area. There are some settled communities, but by and large it is sparsely populated country with quite rigorous winter conditions. It will be seen that the maintenance of telephone communications is a very real consideration to the inhabitants of a country of that sort. It is, therefore, from that point of view first that I should like to say a few words on the matter; that is from the point of view of the continuation of service to those presently using the government-owned system.

As a result of such information as I have been able to obtain on this matter in answers to questions that have been asked in the house, I find that an important consideration arises in relation to the price to be paid by the purchasers. When the minister announced on November 12, 1953, that negotiations had been concluded to the point where he was able to say the system was being sold, he told us the purchase price was $1·5 million. That is the total price to be paid by the two purchasers together.

I asked on February 3, 1954, for information as to the value of the system, and as reported at page 1734 of Hansard for that day, the minister informed me that the system had been valued by the Department of Transport at $4,436,000; by the Canadian National Telegraphs at $3,776,000 and by the British Columbia Telephone at $2,357,000, but the telephone company valuation covered only a portion of the system. I should say that those valuations were based on the replacement cost of the system, depreciated as of June, 1952. It will be seen, therefore, that the total purchase price of $1·5 million to be paid by the purchasers is just about one-third the valuation made by the Department of Transport, and well under half the valuation placed on the system by the Canadian National Telegraphs as a result of their survey.

The fact is that the purchasers are getting a system the depreciated replacement cost of which exceeds by two or three times the amount that they are paying for it. There is a considerable concession being made from the point of view of purchase price. This being the case, Mr. Speaker, not only are we entitled to ask why that small purchase price, in terms of its relationship to the actual replacement value of the system, is being paid; we are entitled also to insist upon the most stringent assurances that the purchasers will be bound to continue the service, even in those areas where the service might not operate at a profit.

I think it is true to say that in some of these sparsely populated areas where there is a long telephone line, it is obvious the number of subscribers paying for the use of the line will not be enough to produce an actual operating profit. The system is being sold to a private company that is in business, and can only continue in business, on the basis that it makes a profit on its over-all operations. I make no criticism of the private company from that point of view; that is the only way they can continue to operate. The point I am making is that they might be tempted to say, well this line obviously does not operate at a profit and we should discontinue the service there until such time as the population increases so we can show a profit or at least operate without a loss.

I maintain that since they are getting this concession with respect to the purchase price, there must be the most absolute conditions written into the terms of sale so the companies will be required to continue the service to these sparsely populated areas. I should like an assurance from the minister that such a provision will be written into the terms of sale.

I believe, too, that we should have assurances that the terms of sale will contain satisfactory restrictions on the right of the purchasers to apply for rate increases. It is true that, in this respect, both the British Columbia Telephone Company and the Canadian National Telegraphs come under the board of transport commissioners. However, neither the railway company nor the telegraph company has displayed any undue reluctance in applying to the board for increases in rates where they feel such increases are necessary if they are to continue profitable operations. Once again I point out that if they are to take over this system at a price that is less than the value of the system, and they are obtaining what is a valuable and exclusive franchise in that area, there should be not only the most strict provisions requiring them to continue the present service and to improve it where possible, but also a restriction on the right to apply for increases in rates.

This is a rapidly-growing area and the franchise will be most valuable in the future, and although they are obtaining it on these advantageous terms, I take it as a fact that they will be able to show that portions of the system are not operated at a profit, and that might normally be taken to justify an application for an increase in rate. My position is that having obtained these advantages they should be required to accept restrictions on their rights to increase rates.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it may be of interest to the house and to the country to know just what these purchasers are getting, at least with respect to the telephone system. On January 18, the minister answered another question of mine, as appears at page 1190 of Hansard for this session. He gave details as to what the system comprises, I find there are 4,720 telephone sets in the government telephone system.

There are 37 exchanges; or rather, counting those places where there are multiple switchboards, there are 37 exchange switchboards. Anyone here who has studied the matter knows that a switchboard is a highly complicated and very expensive piece of machinery—think what 37 of them represent. There are 3,159 miles of pole line which, at approximately 35 poles per mile, makes 110,250 poles. There are 17,661 miles of wire, of which 11,354 miles are copper wire. That information will indicate that it is an extensive and valuable system with a great deal of expensive and complicated equipment.

We also find, as appears at page 1190 of Hansard for January 18, that since 1943-44 there have been seven repeater stations constructed, all comparatively new installations, four of which have been taken over by the Canadian National Telegraph Company and three by the British Columbia Telephone Company. The total cost of these repeater stations was approximately $685,000. In other words the cost was not very far short of half the total purchase price of $1,500,000. It will therefore be seen that these companies have acquired between them a very valuable and extensive system with an exclusive franchise, and they have acquired this at a price which is considerably less than the replacement cost of the system, according to the government's own figures, and at a price, I suggest, very much less than the actual worth of the system on an installed cost basis.

In view of that feature, if for no other reason, my position is that we are entitled to assurances from the minister. If he says he is not in a position to give us any details today we are entitled to assurances from him that binding conditions will be inserted into the agreement for sale and transfer which will require the purchaser to continue the service as it exists at present, at no less frequency than it operates at present, and which will restrict them in their right to apply for increases in the rates.

I would like next to say a word about the position of the employees of the system. There are many hundreds of faithful civil servants engaged in the operation of the government telegraph and telephone system throughout British Columbia in that part of the province which I have described, and throughout my constituency, the constituency of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite). It is and always has been the only communication system available, and by and large the regard of the population for the personnel who serve them and operate the system is of the very highest order.

Many of these men and women have many years of service in that government system. I believe it is only proper therefore, and I know the minister shares this feeling, that we should insist that so far as it is possible the position of these government servants should be protected. Where it is possible to arrange for them to be absorbed into the staff of the purchasing companies that should be done, and due regard should be paid to their present seniority. Some arrangement should also be made to carry into the purchasing companies their superannuation or pension rights. I am satisfied some arrangement could be made between the Department of Finance and the purchasing companies to facilitate such a transfer.

I would also suggest it is but fair to insist that where it is not possible to absorb any of the employees of the government system into the staff of these purchasing companies so that an employee is in a position of relative equality to that which he enjoyed in the government service, then arrangements should be made for these men and women to be absorbed into some other branch of the civil service. I do not believe it is fair that men and women with long and faithful service should be left, as it were, to fend for themselves after having given such service, nor that they should be placed in that position as the result of a decision over which they have no control.

We have already asked the minister for assurances in this regard. The reason why I believe it is safe to say the minister shares our feeling in this respect is that he has from time to time given us assurances that this matter will be looked after, and that negotiations are proceeding with the purchasers to work out the details on this point.

I was therefore very much disturbed when on March 16, eight days ago, I received a telegram from the Vancouver branch of the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada reading as follows:

> Statement made in house by minister transport recent date to effect efforts being made by C.N. Telegraphs and B.C. Telephone Company place as many employees possible but minister also stated he did not know what final disposition of staff would be. C.N.T.—

That is C.N. Telegraphs.

> C.N.T. representatives now interviewing employees various offices state no recognition of past service government telegraphs being considered and employees seniority dates from day of entry into C.N.T.; also representatives know nothing what proposed for employees superannuation plan. Entire staff of government service definitely contend this intolerable situation and submit their welfare not at all safeguarded. Employees consider be grave breach faith if departmental communications sold before these questions namely past service recognition superannuation rights and salary clarified for well-being employees and announcement made to employees by department understand proposed date set for takeover April first.

When one receives a telegram which contains a very disturbing communication to the effect that the rights and the position of the employees are simply not being safeguarded, at least in so far as the C.N. Telegraphs are concerned, and one receives it just about two weeks before the actual date of transfer, then our concern is understandable. That concern is shared by my colleagues in my own party from British Columbia, and also hon. members from British Columbia in the C.C.F. and Social Credit party, and I am sure by hon. members in the Liberal party as well. We therefore wish to obtain assurances from the minister that these matters will be rectified and will be adjusted in so far as the Canadian National Telegraph Company is concerned, and that provision will be made by them to absorb the employees of the government system with due recognition for seniority rights and with proper arrangements to carry forward their pension and superannuation rights.

I understand from conversations with the minister that apparently the British Columbia Telephone Company has not found the same difficulty in making satisfactory arrangements, and I must confess that I have received no complaints from anyone on the telephone side of the government service. The complaints I have had with respect to the position of employees relates only to those on the telegraph side. I should like to supplement what I have just read with some specific information with respect to one employee. I am not going to mention his name but a summary of his position will indicate just how unfair this could be to an employee or to all employees of this sort unless some satisfactory solution is worked out.

This is a man with 20 years' service with the government telegraph and telephone system, on the telegraph side. He has been offered what is called a swing-relief position at a salary of approximately $260 per month. He points out that that position is not at all comparable with the position that he now occupies with the government service and that, with the bidding rights available to operators on the Canadian National Telegraphs, he is apt to stay in that position for a long time because he does not carry with him into the Canadian National Telegraphs any seniority, not even proportionate seniority based on the 20 years' faithful service that he has put in with the government service. Then he points out that suppose he should decide that the offer made by the Canadian National Telegraphs is not sufficiently attractive because it is not at all comparable with his present job and that he has no seniority in it, he would have to look around for other employment or else go on superannuation. Yet, by what I can only call, under these circumstances, a cruel stroke, he points out:

> Under the new superannuation act effective January 1, 1954, it will be another seven years at least before I will be eligible for pension benefits.

He is now 43 years of age. He has had 20 years' service on the government system. By the new act, which became effective January 1 of this year, he has to wait until he is 50 before he can draw his own superannuation. He would therefore have seven years to wait. Then he says this:

> An employee entering the Canadian National Telegraph service over 40 years of age is not eligible for pension benefits.

He is just three years over 40 years of age; he has seven years to wait before he can draw his own pension. Yet he cannot qualify under the Canadian National Telegraphs superannuation fund. So he has seven years to wait for his own superannuation to start, and no seniority and no pension rights in so far as the Canadian National Telegraphs are concerned.

He goes on to point out that he has paid into the superannuation fund for 20 consecutive years, has also paid up some back time, and that these contributions were paid under the provisions of the old act which provided that in the case of abolition of office—which is what is in effect happening here—of a permanent employee, pension benefits would commence immediately. Yet as I have said, by what under these circumstances amounts to a cruel stroke, by virtue of the regulations which came into effect on January 1, and because he does not cease to be employed by the government service until April 1 that three months interval has the effect of depriving him of his pension rights under the government superannuation scheme until he reaches the age of 50.

I have placed that individual case before the minister and the house because it serves as a clear illustration of the unfairness that can result to the employees of the government system unless some satisfactory arrangement is worked out with the Canadian National Telegraphs to cover the employees on the telegraph side.

I do not wish to take longer on this matter. There is much more material that I could read into the record, including further material from the amalgamated civil servants branch in Vancouver, but I think I have said enough to outline the situation. I should therefore like to conclude with this suggestion. If there could be an opportunity for a full report as to the extent to which the interests of the public and of the employees are being safeguarded in the sale agreement, before April 1, that situation will take care of itself; we can discuss the matter in the light of the facts of which we then have knowledge and we shall have a few days—it may only be a few days, it is true, but it will still be valuable time—in which to try to force an adjustment if we should find that the situation is not satisfactory from the points of view that I have mentioned.

If, however, the minister finds that the negotiations on these points are not going to be completed until after April 1, I would urge most strongly that the justice of the situation demands that the turn-over date be postponed until after April 1, in fact, until after the agreement is concluded, so that the agreement can be laid before the house and can be discussed in the house before the physical assets are transferred.

For the reason I gave at the beginning, if the system is to be handed over before the house knows what are the terms of the agreement, then any dissatisfaction which we might express would be useless, and any discussion which would take place as to the terms of the agreement would be a hollow discussion indeed because we would be dealing with an accomplished fact. We could register our protests, we could say what we wished had been done, but the fact would be that what has been done will have been done and we would be powerless to change it. I have tried to lay before the minister, as briefly as I can, the things which I think should be incorporated in the agreement. I hope he will be able to give us some assurance, either that these matters are in fact being satisfactorily written into the agreement or, if he is not able to report to us at the present time on the situation of these negotiations, that he will postpone the date of the transfer.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might be allowed to interject here the remarks that I would have made at the normal time but should like to make now because, just as soon as I have made my observations, it is necessary for me to leave the house.

I want to thank the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) for raising the question in the fair manner in which he has raised it. As he has said, I know that there are other members of the house who are keenly interested in the subject of this sale, as there are on this side of the house. Over and above those who I know will take part in this debate, I want to make special mention of the correspondence which I have had, more particularly with the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) and other members from British Columbia on this side of the house about the transfer of these assets.

The hon. member for Kamloops has, in effect, dealt with two main questions, first the price of the facilities that are being sold and, second, the conditions of employment after the transfer. I should like to follow him in sequence on those two points. It is a fact that the assets of the government telephone and telegraph services are being sold for $750,000 to the Canadian National Telegraphs and, in the same amount, to the British Columbia Telephone Company. Those assets were valued at various prices following a survey in 1952 made jointly by the British Columbia Telephone Company, the Department of Transport and the Canadian National Telegraphs.

According to the Department of Transport survey the total valuation was $4,436,000; according to the Canadian National Telegraphs survey it was $3,776,000 and according to that of the British Columbia Telephone Company it was $2,357,000. No appraisal was made of these facilities on the basis of depreciated value of capital originally invested. This would have been a complicated study since many parts of the system are very old and moneys have been spent from time to time on renovation and replacement as well as on new services. However, it is quite reasonable to assume that had the appraisal been based on depreciated value of capital invested instead of on replacement value, the figure would have been very much lower, in all probability lower than the offer which has been accepted.

It is the policy of the government to provide service such as this in isolated areas until such time as private initiative or private enterprise can take them over. That time, it appeared to the government, had arrived, and we had before us a joint bid or joint offer from these two companies. But that joint offer must be considered in relation to the operation of the government facilities. By that I mean the financial operation, whether or not there was a profit or a loss, and over the years the financial operation has not been a good one. Having regard to that as well as to the large capital expenditures required in the very near future to place these facilities in a better operating condition, and also having regard to the increasing traffic, particularly in the northwest part of the province, we had to give serious consideration to this offer.

Let me bring this to the attention of the committee. The cost of operating the government telephone and telegraph system in British Columbia for the year 1952-53 was practically $1 million. The exact figure is $997,881. For the first six months of the current fiscal year operating costs amounted to $638,381, an increase of $41,573 over the corresponding period of last year. I have here the financial results of these facilities for the last three years. For 1950-51 operating expenditures were $863,000—I will give round figures—earnings were $599,000, and the deficit was $264,000. For 1951-52 operating expenditures were $935,000, earnings were $787,000, and the deficit was $148,000. For 1952-53 operating expenditures were, as I have already indicated, $997,000, earnings were $858,000 and the deficit was $139,000.

I referred to capital expenditure for the future. We had before us a report prepared by the departmental officials indicating a capital expenditure of approximately $3 million over the next four years. That was required to renovate and to expand the existing system which is now heavily overloaded. During a portion of this period there would be an operating deficit now estimated at about $300,000 provided leased circuit demands anticipated at the present time actually materialize.

In the face of these circumstances and having been presented with these offers, we came to the conclusion that we should accept. I should say that in the case of Canadian National Telegraphs the offer for their part of the facilities was from the outset $750,000.

B.C. Telephone and Telegraph System

However, the offer of the British Columbia Telephone Company was not that at the outset because when that company had completed its survey and had made a complete valuation of the facilities it felt that the amount of expenditure required on the line was such that it could not offer a great deal, and they were told that if that was the position the government would not consider a sale.

Having regard to that, the company first decided to offer $110,700. This was turned down. Then the company increased its offer to $400,000, which was also refused. Finally, it raised its offer to $750,000. When the offers were submitted to the government the government felt, having regard to all the circumstances, having regard to the expenditure of money which was required, that they were fair offers and did accept, namely, a total of $1,500,000.

Having disposed of that, the next step was to enter into negotiations to ascertain the conditions upon which the transfer would be effected. When the government had made its decision to accept the offer it was indicated to these purchasing companies that we proposed to include in the agreement for sale certain conditions that would protect not only the employees but also those who were receiving services in the area concerned. Here are some of the conditions that we indicated to the purchasers we proposed to include in the agreement for sale:

1. As of the date of the sale, the federal government will no longer operate its telegraph and telephone service west of the Rocky mountains. The said service will not again operate in that area nor will the federal government be in any way responsible for the provision of such services.

2. The B.C. Telephone Company . . . will give, or cause to be given, telephone service to all places and communities now served by the above-mentioned facilities—such service at all times to be at least equivalent to the service heretofore given by the government telegraph and telephone service.

3. The Canadian National Telegraphs will give or cause to be given telegraph service to all places and communities now served by the above-mentioned facilities—such service at all times to be at least equivalent to the service heretofore given by the government telegraph and telephone service.

4. The new owners will promptly and efficiently and without undue delay augment and increase their telecommunication facilities so as to supply adequate service as required from time to time by the development of the above described area.

There is set out as an annex the areas where these facilities exist.

5. The new owners will employ—

This is the matter to which the hon. member has given attention.

—all personnel now on the payroll of the government telegraph and telephone service who meet their employment requirements and who are desirous of being so employed and will give such employees every reasonable consideration for employment in other parts of their systems.

6. The new owners agree to inspection of the area from time to time as may be deemed necessary or desirable by the federal government to ascertain if the conditions of this agreement are being met.

Mr. Fulton: For what term is the right of inspection expected to continue? Would that be a permanent thing?

Mr. Chevrier: This is a general condition as set out in the proposal for the agreement for sale. No time has been mentioned there, but I suppose it will be worked out in the agreement. I am not able to answer that. A series of discussions were then held between the government, British Columbia Telephone Company and Canadian National Telegraphs. I can say here and now that the discussions with the B.C. Telephone Company have been conducted on a very satisfactory plane. For instance, the B.C. Telephone Company has informed the department that it is willing to take over, as of the effective date of the sale, all of our people then engaged in telephone work in the British Columbia division and who were employed with the telephone service. There would of course be a provisional period of not more than nine months and if during that time the ex-government employee's services are satisfactory he or she will then become a full-fledged employee of the telephone company.

The company has stated further that in no case will there be a reduction in salary and that in the majority of instances there will be an increase. We thought that was a very fair offer.

Mr. Green: Could I ask the minister whether there is any provision for superannuation?

Mr. Chevrier: I am coming to that.

Mr. Fulton: I think that is very fair too.

Mr. Chevrier: With reference to existing services, the company is undertaking to provide telephone service to all points served by the facilities which it is purchasing, such service to be at least the equivalent of what was given by the Department of Transport. The company wishes to commit itself only to the provision of such additional service as it considers reasonable.

My hon. friend asks: What about superannuation, etc., and I suppose that includes seniority. There then followed a series of discussions having to do with those matters. I think that in so far as seniority is concerned the position is a satisfactory one because the British Columbia Telephone Company has indicated to us that they have a collective bargaining agreement with their employees. To the question which was asked of them, in these words:

Will seniority rights apply on a local or system basis?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The reply by the British Columbia Telephone Company was:

Seniority rights will apply on a system basis consistent with Article XII of the British Columbia Telephone Company agreement with federation of telephone workers, which reads:

"Arrangements of staff shall be made on the basis of ability, seniority, merit and service requirements. Seniority, under all circumstances, shall be given every consideration."

And then, with reference to superannuation, I might say that the matter is a pretty complicated one, and it would take a great deal of time to discuss it in detail now. I believe however I can put it in this way, by saying that none of our employees—and I am speaking now only with respect to British Columbia Telephone—will lose superannuation benefits from the federal government. Employees entering the service of the British Columbia Telephone will be brought under their plan; and from the letters I have seen and read I believe I am safe in saying that their plan is an even better one than we have in the Department of Transport to cover government employees. I say that because the wage rates are higher. That is, I believe, on the subject of superannuation, the arrangement that the telephone company intends to put into effect and which, in so far as I understand the situation, I feel will be a satisfactory one.

Now, then, the other point raised by my hon. friend was that of Canadian National Telegraphs. I have been unable to give the house any information in the matter, because it was thought that if first we could dispose of the arrangement with the B.C. Telephone Company, we could then proceed to enter into a detailed discussion with Canadian National Telegraphs. It has not been possible to do that until this week. The officials of my department are this very day in Montreal discussing with Canadian National Telegraphs the points I am now relating in regard to the telephone company.

They are discussing not only the question of employees that will be taken over, not only the question of salaries which will be paid, but also the matter of seniority, superannuation, and all such other matters. Therefore I am not in a position to make a statement in so far as that is concerned, other than to say that I am hopeful that Canadian National Telegraphs would not want to place themselves in a position of inferiority vis-à-vis British Columbia Telephone Company, in so far as the treatment of our employees is concerned. I know that I have already in my conversations with the president of the Canadian National Railways brought to his attention the importance of dealing with these people on a fair and equitable basis; and I am sure from communications I have received from him that he will be co-operative to the fullest extent.

My hon. friend suggested a method of procedure, that of holding over the agreement for one or two months until we know what the position is. Well, in answer to that all I can say is that we have no funds in the estimates after April 1 to make that provision. Negotiations have taken a far longer period of time than I had anticipated and certainly longer than departmental officers had anticipated. But if there is any fear that any of our employees will be prejudiced, there are still the sittings of the committee on railways and shipping, which will begin on Monday. The officers of the Canadian National Telegraphs could be made available if necessary. It is the Canadian National Railways we are studying—their annual report, and general business activities—but I think I could make available officials of Canadian National Telegraphs if it were thought necessary.

I am hopeful that it will be possible to make this transfer on April 1 in a manner as equitable as possible under all the circumstances. There are bound to be some difficulties; there are bound to be complaints. We cannot cover them all. My hon. friend has brought up one case with which I must say I am not familiar, but I shall read in Hansard what he has said and see what the position is. If I am able to make a statement —and I hope I shall be able to before April 1 —as to the rest of this transaction, I shall be glad to do so. But, so far as I can see, I do not think there is any reason why there should be undue anxiety over the matter.

Mr. Green: Will provision be made by the government to retain in the civil service those employees who cannot be taken over by the British Columbia Telephone Company or Canadian National Telegraphs?

Mr. Chevrier: I would not like to answer that until I can look at the position in greater detail. From the statement I have made to the house thus far it would appear that all the employees can be taken over by British Columbia Telephone Company. So that that point will not arise. I know also that in the case of Canadian National Telegraphs there are a number of men who have reached retirement age; some are over 65 years. It would not be the intention of Canadian National Telegraphs to take those men on. I do not think the house would expect that to be done. And there are one or two other cases where the position is a little more difficult. For that reason I think I should withhold my answer until I know the number that Canadian National Telegraphs and British Columbia Telephone Company are able to take on.

Mr. Leboe: I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question with regard to the extension of services in that part of British Columbia east of the Rockies, which might take up some of the slack, so far as personnel is concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: Does my hon. friend mean extension of facilities by ourselves or by British Columbia Telephone Company?

Mr. Leboe: By yourselves, east of the Rockies.

Mr. Chevrier: Is that included in this sale?

Mr. Leboe: No; how will the sale affect services there? I thought perhaps the minister might be planning extensive work there which might take up some of the slack, so far as members of the staff are concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, in so far as the facilities being sold are concerned, we will have no further responsibility for any extension. In so far as facilities that are not being sold are concerned, well, that is a matter of policy which will have to come up when from time to time facilities are required. I cannot answer that now.

Mr. Barnett: In relation to the question just asked by the hon. member for Cariboo, I am under the impression that the minister misunderstood the import of the question. As I understood the question—and I would like to know the answer myself—in the case of one who is now employed in the British Columbia division and who wishes to remain in the government service, would provision be made for his transfer to a division of that service which is not involved in this sale so that he could continue his employment with the government telegraph and telephone organization?

Mr. Chevrier: I think the intention is to have all the employees taken over either by British Columbia Telephone Company or by Canadian National Telegraphs. If there are some who are not going to be taken over, then consideration might well be given to their employment in some other part of the service.

INCOME TAX COLLECTIONS FROM FARMERS IN CALGARY AREA

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a grievance concerning methods employed in collecting or attempting to collect income tax from certain farmers in the Calgary area and other places.

Income Tax—Calgary area farmers

This matter came to my attention while I was in Calgary during the Christmas recess, at which time I was shown a letter sent to one of these farmers from the income tax office demanding a large amount of information. The information supplied as a result of the letter, and an interview with the farmer, was then used for the purpose of determining his net worth and then, in many cases, imposing arbitrary assessments for income tax purposes.

I made a copy of this particular letter. It was headed in this way: "Re income tax returns 1946 to 1952, inclusive." In other words, they were going back a considerable length of time. I will not take time to read it all because I want to get finished shortly. In any event, the farmer was required to come into the income tax office and bring his records. The letter says:

Please bring with you all record books, vouchers and receipts pertaining to the income and expenses of the years under review; also your bank pass books or ledger sheets (all banks), for both current and savings account (a wife's account to be included) and your cancelled cheques.

The farmer is asked to give all sorts of information in regard to land owned, when it was secured and so forth, balance of principal owing, interest and so forth during this period. He is asked the same in connection with any land that had been sold and in connection with all chattels; he is asked questions in regard to his machinery and so forth back over all this period. He is asked about items he had purchased, the original cost, the date and month of sale, the selling price or trade value and the name and address of purchaser or dealer. He is asked the same in connection with all livestock.

It is manifestly clear that when you ask a man to go back six or seven years and tell how many pigs he had on a certain date and how many chickens he had and so forth, he just cannot do it; he has to guess at it. In other words, a good deal of the information was not such as 99 farmers out of 100 could reasonably be asked to furnish or could furnish. Then the letter goes on to say that:

"Certain other information respecting your affairs will be requested at the time of the interview. If you are unable to attend on the day mentioned, please arrange for an alternative date to suit your convenience.

You will realize that this arrangement affords you a reasonable convenient opportunity of giving or requesting needed information and enables you to produce documents for examination without the difficulty that sometimes arises through correspondence.

Your efforts in assembling the records and bringing them with you at the appointed time and place will be appreciated and should serve to provide a proper understanding of your affairs which may be of benefit in the future.

[Mr. Harkness.]

The whole tone of the letter is to give the farmer the opinion that this is going to be of benefit to him, to help him out. Any benefit that might be derived from that procedure was quite naturally going to be for the income tax officials and not for the farmer. That certainly is not the way the thing was worded, and the understanding which I think was wrong was that it would help the farmer. I put some questions on the order paper in connection with this matter. The first question was: Was a letter of this kind sent out? The answer was yes. The answer was contained in a return dated February 12, 1954. The second question was:

If so, to how many farmers?

The answer was:

Approximately 500.

That is in the Calgary income tax district. My third question was:

Were similar letters sent to any other class of income taxpayers?

The answer was no. I would ask first of all why our farmers of all the classes and groups of taxpayers in Canada are singled out for this particular type of treatment? Why are they the only class of people? If farmers are going to be subject to this type of thing and to the inquisition, which I will come to later, which follows it, why are not other classes of taxpayers to be subject to it? Why pick on only one group of people? Why are they treated in a different way from other income taxpayers in this country? My next question was:

If so, how many of these letters were sent out in each of the provinces?

The answer to that question was:

Answered by No. 3.

In other words, I did not get any further information there. My next question was:

If this letter was sent out, what was the purpose of same?

The answer was:

To arrange a meeting with each farmer, at a time and place convenient to him, at which his income tax returns for specified years could be reviewed and reference made, where necessary, to his books and records supporting the figures shown on the tax returns.

My next question was:

What benefit to the farmers is envisaged?

The answer was:

An opportunity is afforded the farmers to clarify, with the aid of factual data, all points in their returns requiring explanation and to discuss, in general, income tax matters of interest to them.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that these two answers were, if not designed to mislead me, certainly phrased in such a way that if I took them at their face value I would be misled, as would anybody else who reads Hansard, because the purpose for which this was sent out was quite clearly to establish the net worth of these farmers and in some cases at least arbitrarily to assess them for income tax purposes back over a period of years. It was wrong to answer the question in that way. In other words, it looks to me like an attempt at evasive tactics as far as giving to me as a member of this house and the house generally a true picture of the situation with regard to how this income tax is being collected from farmers.

I put another set of questions on the order paper and got a return on March 3, to further clarify this matter. The first of these questions was:

Were letters, similar to the ones sent to farmers in the Calgary income tax area, sent out to farmers in all provinces?

The answer was:

No. Similar letters were sent in the Edmonton district in Alberta, in Manitoba and in Ontario.

In other words, the only places in Canada in which farmers are having this letter sent out, and in which they are being brought in and subjected to inquisitorial methods, are in Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario. If this is being done in these three provinces to farmers, why is it not being done in all provinces? Why is it not being done in Saskatchewan where conditions are certainly the same as they are in Manitoba and Alberta? Why are these letters not being sent out to those farmers, and why are they not being treated in the same way? The only answer that suggests itself to me is that probably the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was able to exert sufficient influence so that such treatment was not given to farms in Saskatchewan.

Mr. McCann: Shame; poppycock.

An hon. Member: What is the reason?

Mr. Harkness: The minister says "poppycock". I should like to get any other reason. In other words, this is the one that suggests itself as the only possible reason, because we have exactly the same conditions in Saskatchewan as in Alberta and Manitoba. Yet, the farmers in Saskatchewan are not being subjected to these methods. Again why is it in Quebec, where conditions are certainly similar to those in Ontario as far as farmers are concerned, that such letters are not sent out? Once more the inference that one would draw seems to be fairly obvious.

However, the general question remains. If certain farmers in three provinces are being subjected to this sort of thing, why are farmers throughout Canada not being subjected to it? Why pick on the people in three provinces only to give them this treatment?

Following the appearance of the answers to these questions and some comments I made in the Calgary Albertan I received some letters from farmers in connection with this. I have one here which details just what happens when a farmer is called in for this interview which has been represented to him is going to be of benefit to him. This man writes as follows. I will not read the whole letter:

I know of what took place at the meetings, and of the gestapo methods of questioning.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member reading a private document? If so, he will have to divulge the source.

Mr. Harkness: That is fine with me, Mr. Speaker. I wrote and got this man's permission to divulge his name. The letter is written by W. H. Evans of Calgary. He says:

I know of what took place at the meetings, and of the gestapo methods of questioning. Our objection is to the demand for a net worth statement. As far as I can learn no other industry but farmers are asked for a net worth. As so many things over years and years could go into a net worth which are not taxable, I am convinced such a demand is definitely not just. So you will have a clear picture of what takes place at a first meeting with tax officials, the person would go in with receipts and expenditures prepared to answer questions regarding the years asked for. Then without any warning: We want your net worth and how did you acquire those things? In the case of my son the questioning went this way: What did you do with your gratuities when you were discharged from the air force?

Now, there is the first thing. A man who is an air force veteran is taken into the income tax office and the income tax people ask him: "What did you do with your gratuities?" What business is it of theirs what he did with his gratuities? Surely, when a man returns here after fighting for his country, the last thing he should be subjected to some seven or eight years later is a demand to know how he spent the money he got as gratuities.

The next question was, "What clothes do you buy?" Is it any business of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) and his officials what clothes a farmer or any other taxpayer buys? Then he was asked, "Have you been buying any fur coats or jewelry?" This would be for his wife, of course. Once more they are trying to pry into all the details of a man's domestic life.

Then, the next question was, "What does it cost you for board?" They want to know what he pays for groceries and so forth, how much it costs. This is another thing that is no business of theirs. Then, he was asked, "How much do you spend on liquor?" I do not know whether the Minister of National Revenue and his minions are turning themselves into agents of the temperance association, but certainly it is none of their business how much liquor a farmer or any other individual buys. I know the minister would resent anyone asking him how much liquor he buys.

Mr. McCann: I never got any from you, anyway.

Mr. Harkness: These officials are demanding that he give the information or he would be arbitrarily assessed for his income tax. They asked, "Have you been on any holiday trips, and how much did they cost?" The writer of the letter goes on:

> You can imagine how perplexed one would be to have to depend on memory and to have had no inkling such was expected.

The general situation is this, that a certain limited number of the farmers in the southern half of Alberta, which is in the Calgary income tax district, were dragged in and subjected to these gestapo methods of questioning concerning their private affairs. Then, on the basis of that, as I say, the department goes ahead and establishes the net worth and places an arbitrary assessment on it. No doubt they do the same with a limited number of farmers from other provinces. We have not been able to find that out. That is one answer I did not read from this return. I asked:

> Were letters, similar to the one sent to the farmers in the Calgary income tax area, sent out to farmers in all provinces? If so, how many were sent out in each province?

The answer I received was:

> They were sent from time to time to make appointments in a nearby town for farmers in the area. Statistics are not available because this was a routine procedure.

It is not very routine when you have 500 farmers in southern Alberta, and no doubt a like number in the northern half of Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario, subjected to this procedure. It is anything but routine. I would think the first thing the minister should do would be to repudiate these methods and give the house an undertaking that this sort of thing will not be continued at any time in the future.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the motion?

Mr. Rowe: Is the minister going to answer?

Mr. McCann: I shall answer at the proper time.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

84. Departmental administration, $3,333,583.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

239. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $300,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection 3 of that section, where equipment or supplies acquired by the Canadian forces after March 31, 1950, are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall, if the governor in council so directs, be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection 3, and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $4,577,641,724 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $2,711,822,159 will come due for payment in future years), $1,865,819,565.

Mr. Harris: Would the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, the following motion will be presented as the first item after orders of the day:

That items Nos. 84 to 103 inclusive, the main estimates, 1954-55, be withdrawn from the committee of supply, and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

There has been an effort made to ascertain the best means of disposing of the debate which will follow on the presentation of that motion. We have felt that it would be the wish of the house to have a fairly complete survey of matters on external affairs. For that reason, we are suggesting that the first speaker will be the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who will touch on matters in general and then the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will make a statement with particular reference to some of the matters concerning his recent trip but more especially with the subject of China.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
