Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The board does not order dismissal. It simply looks into and reports on the facts. If a case is reported to the board the facts are carefully explored and are then conveyed to the head of the responsible department. I think it would be very difficult to get people to serve on the board if their names were to be published. We all abhor McCarthyism, and so far we have been able to do a security job here without resorting to the kind of situation that arises in another country.

Mr. Fulton: The point is—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have allowed the hon. member who put the question to make comment, and perhaps I should not have allowed others, in view of citation 307, the latter part of which says:

> An answer to a question cannot be insisted upon, if the answer be refused by the minister on the ground of the public interest; nor can the question be replaced on the notice paper. The refusal of a minister to answer on this ground cannot be raised as a matter of privilege.

These two questions are dropped.

RIFLES—LENGTH, CAPACITY, ETC.

Mr. Churchill:

1. What is (a) the length without bayonet; (b) the length with bayonet; (c) the weight without bayonet; (d) the weight with bayonet, of the Belgian FN, the British EM2 and the Lee-Enfield rifles respectively?
2. What is (a) the capacity of the magazine; (b) the rate of automatic fire; (c) the rate of aimed single shot, fire of the Belgian FN and the British EM2 rifles respectively?
3. Can the user shift from single shot action to automatic action or vice versa instantaneously with the Belgian FN rifle?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Belgian FN

(a) Length without bayonet, 41·5 in.; (b) Length with bayonet, 50·5 in.; (c) Weight without bayonet (including 20 rounds of ammunition), 10·6 lbs.; (d) Weight with bayonet (including 20 rounds of ammunition), 11·3 lbs.

British EM2

(a) Length without bayonet, 35·6 in.; (b) Length with bayonet, 44·6 in.; (c) Weight without bayonet (including 20 rounds of ammunition) 10·8 lbs.; (d) Weight with bayonet (including 20 rounds of ammunition), 11·5 lbs.

Lee-Enfield

(a) Length without bayonet, 44·5 in.; (b) Length with bayonet, 53 in.; (c) Weight without bayonet (including 10 rounds of ammunition) 8·8 lbs.; (d) Weight with bayonet (including 10 rounds of ammunition), 9·6 lbs.

2. (a) FN, 20 rounds; EM2, 20 rounds; (b) FN, 650-700 rds per min is the cyclical rate; EM2, 650-700 rds per min is the cyclical rate; (c) FN, 60 rds per min; EM2, 60 rds per min.

These figures are of course approximate.

3. There are two designs of change lever with the FN rifle. With one design the user can fire the FN semi-automatic (single shot) only. With the other design of change lever, the user can fire either single shot or full automatic and can effect this change instantaneously.

WEAPON STANDARDIZATION—BELGIAN FN RIFLE

Mr. Churchill:

1. Did the Minister of National Defence or any representative of his department recommend the adoption of or indicate a preference for the Belgian FN rifle at any conference of NATO countries on the subject of the standardization of weapons?
2. If so, when and at what conference?

Mr. Blanchette:

1 and 2. Discussion at NATO meetings took place on the round but not on the rifle and the answer to this question is consequently no.

THE BANK ACT

PROVISION FOR DECENNIAL REVISION, EXTENSION OF CHARTERS, ETC.,

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the decennial revision of the Bank Act and the extension of the charters of the existing chartered banks till July 1, 1964, and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO JOINT MEETING TO CONSIDER INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last, as reported at page 2428 of Hansard, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) asked this question:

Can the minister inform the house of the approximate date when representatives of his department will be meeting with the coal operators of Nova Scotia and the mine workers jointly for the purpose of determining the future of the coal industry?

The date for the proposed meeting has not yet been finally settled, but the suggested date is Friday, March 12.

Mr. Brooks: May I ask a supplementary question. Will there be a meeting in New Brunswick with the coal operators there, as well?

Mr. Prudham: If the proposed meeting takes place, as suggested, on Friday next, the coal operators and mine union representatives, provincial governments and the dominion coal board will all be represented.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Will the mine operators of western Canada be included?

Mr. Prudham: No, not at this meeting. This is a maritime problem.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Does the committee intend to hold a meeting later to discuss the matter with western coal operators?

Mr. Prudham: We have had several meetings with western coal operators, and we will be glad to meet them at any time they wish to come.

TRADE

REDUCTION IN EXPORTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. In view of a statement issued today by the Department of Trade and Commerce, has the Acting Prime Minister any comment to make on the fact that our exports for January fell off to the extent of $100 million less than those for December, and were $55·9 million less than those for the month of January last year? Is this due to our reduced wheat sales, or what is the reason?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Many categories of exports were down, one of which was newsprint. I think my hon. friend knows that just as much newsprint was produced in January as usual, but part of that production was not shipped. The weather has something to do with it. Of course wheat shipments were down, as compared with January a year ago, owing to a slackening off of demand. But I think my hon. friend and his associates have reason to know that we cannot judge exports by the figures for any one month. Any period less than three months can be very deceptive. Some theories have been built up on exports for one month that have collapsed in succeeding months.

IMMIGRATION

READMISSION OF HAROLD C. BANKS TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether he can now give an answer to my question of February 25 with respect to Harold C. Banks.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked if the file on Harold C. Banks had been mislaid, as was reported in a newspaper in the month of August. The file has never been mislaid that the department knows about. It is still in our possession and always has been.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CORNWALL—CONTEMPT OF COURT PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked me, upon what authority in connection with the commitment for contempt of court of Edward Bryan of Cornwall, Chief Justice McRuer could in fact substitute the sentence of a fine for imprisonment after sentence had been commenced. The question raised by the hon. member had to do with the administration of justice, which is a provincial responsibility. I had no material before me indicating the basis of the chief justice's authority to make such an order. I had no responsibility for having such material before me. I therefore declined at that time to answer my hon. friend's question.

While there may be a distinct difference of opinion as to the propriety of asking such a question in this house, once it has been asked I think it would be unfair to Chief Justice McRuer that I should not complete the record of this incident by placing upon it Chief Justice McRuer's own statement as to his authority to make this order which the hon. member for Prince Albert has questioned. I have accordingly secured from Chief Justice McRuer the following statement, which is in the third person:

> The matter was brought before the court by an application made by Mr. Kelly, the counsel for the accused Balcombe in the case of Regina v. Balcombe, and the material upon which the order was based was placed before the chief justice McRuer on this application. The chief justice, exercising the inherent power vested in a judge of a court of superior jurisdiction, directed that the publishers and the distributor in the Cornwall area should be brought before the court to show cause why they should not be committed for contempt of court. In imposing the penalty, Chief Justice McRuer exercised the inherent power vested in a judge of any court of superior jurisdiction in a matter of this character, and likewise the chief justice in remitting part of Mr. Bryan's sentence, exercised an inherent power that is vested in a judge who imposes such a sentence when he considers that the service of part of the sentence may have sufficiently purged the contempt of the prisoner.
> The statement of fact in the question—

That is, Mr. Speaker, the question which the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked me yesterday.

> —that a fine was substituted for imprisonment, is not correct. The order releasing Mr. Bryan was made upon condition not that he should pay a fine, but that he should pay the costs of the application of Mr. Kelly, the counsel for the accused Balcombe.
> Statements appearing in the press that this order was made after representations had been heard by the chief justice from citizens of Cornwall are likewise incorrect. The order was made entirely on Chief Justice McRuer's own initiative after consultation with the crown counsel in the Balcombe case.

That is the end of the statement.

May I add one further note. The provincial authorities within whose field of responsibility the administration of justice comes are apparently in agreement with Chief Justice McRuer upon the point in question. Deputy Attorney General Magone of Ontario is quoted in this morning's Toronto Globe and Mail as having said last night, in reference to this matter:

If the judge feels the contempt was purged after the time spent in jail he is quite within his right in reducing sentence.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATION AT GENEVA CONFERENCE ON KOREA AND INDO-CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on February 22 the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked a question about the Korean political conference to be held in Geneva. A few days ago, on February 24, this government received a formal invitation to attend that conference, and that invitation has now been accepted.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING CO-ORDINATION ACT

AUTHORITY TO ENTER INTO AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES, CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act to meet present day requirements for defence and other purposes, including authority to enter into agreements with the provinces to grant assistance for rehabilitation training of disabled persons; also to provide for an increase in the number of members on the vocational training advisory council, for a per diem allowance for members of the council; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Mr. Gregg: At this stage I should like to make a brief statement to outline in a general way what is involved in this resolution. As the committee knows, the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, which was first enacted in 1942, was designed to provide legislative authority for the carrying out of the various forms of training for discharged members of the armed forces, and for such forms of vocational training or assistance for vocational training as could be foreseen as coming within the immediate post-war period.

The act provides that all training may be undertaken by provincial authorities under agreements between the provincial and federal governments providing for federal financial assistance.

There has been established under the act a vocational training advisory council which includes representatives of the provinces of employers, of organized labour, of women, of veterans and of other interested groups. The work of this council has been of very great assistance to the administration of the act. In passing I should like to pay tribute to the excellent work that has been done by the members of the council. Part of the amendments proposed here are for the special purpose, which I shall indicate later, of increasing the number from 16 to 20.

It is proposed to revise the wording of certain provisions of the act in the light of present-day training requirements. These differ in some respects from those existing at the time the act first came into force. These changes have been discussed with provincial authorities and the advisory council has expressed the desirability of the changes in the act and in the training program itself.

Training programs are conducted under the provisions of the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act through federal-provincial agreements, namely, the vocational training agreement, the vocational schools' assistance agreement, the apprenticeship agreement and the correspondence courses agreement.

Under the provisions of the vocational training agreement, the federal government co-operates with the provinces in the following types of programs: (a) the training of former members of Her Majesty's forces who are approved for such training by the Department of Veterans Affairs; (b) training for unemployed workers referred by the national employment service and for whom such training is required to fit them for suitable employment; (c) trades training for members of the armed forces and the provision of civilian instructors for schools operated by the armed forces; (d) training of skilled and semi-skilled workers for defence production; (e) training of foremen and supervisors in industrial establishments; (f) training for young people from rural communities who are not served by the existing provincial school systems; (g) financial aid to needy worthy university students and to nurses in training.

That covers the vocational training agreement, Mr. Chairman. Under the terms of the vocational schools' assistance agreement, financial aid is provided to the provinces for the construction, equipment and operation of technical, vocational and trade schools of less than university grades. I am sure hon. members will realize that in view of the great number of veterans who have been trained in skills under this act, the greater part of that program has been completed. In other words, the provinces, with the assistance of the federal government, have established a pretty substantial set-up of well-equipped vocational schools across the country; but it is under that section that that has been done.

Under the provisions of the third one, the apprenticeship agreement, training is provided in full-time and part-time classes for apprentices registered with departments of labour under the provisions of provincial apprenticeship acts.

I now come to the fourth group. Under the provisions of the correspondence agreement, the federal government shares with the provincial governments in the cost of the preparation of vocational correspondence courses which are made available under the same terms and conditions to students in all parts of Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the minister in the middle of his remarks, but I should like to suggest to the committee that there be sufficient quietness to enable those hon. members who wish to hear the minister's explanation to do so.

Mr. Gregg: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Under the amendments to the act as set forth in the bill, authorization is being sought for the provision of rehabilitation training to disabled civilians. At this point I should like to state that I do not want for a moment to overestimate the importance of the total number of amendments that are forthcoming here. This act has proved itself to be a very effective one; but there were certain routine amendments that were required, one affecting the council and other items.

To my mind one of the greatest improvements is that one which provides for rehabilitation training of disabled civilians in co-operation with the provinces. Then there is a provision to facilitate other types of training within the authority of parliament which may be required for other government departments. Authority is being asked to increase the membership of the vocational training council so as to provide representation from all the provinces as well as from other groups. There is also the question of the appointment of alternate members to act in the absence of the regular members. That is being brought forward after a good deal of discussion and upon the recommendation of the council. There were arguments for it and there were arguments against it, but it appeared that the arguments for it were the stronger. The other amendments in the bill are made necessary because we are no longer in an immediate post-war period.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that all members of this committee will congratulate the minister upon what has proved to be a very useful act. Some ten years having elapsed since it came into force, I suppose there are certain things that need to be amended. I was interested in the minister's remark that it was thought wise to increase the number on the council from 16 to 20. If I understood him correctly, this change is made because of the need for representation from all provinces. Since that time we have had another province added to Canada.

There was also the matter of an increase in the per diem rate for members of the council during its sittings. I understand that this rate has not been changed since the inception of the act, and certainly if the amount mentioned in the act was considered appropriate in 1942 I suppose there should be some adjustment at the present time.

We really have no criticism of the provisions which the minister has outlined so far. When we actually see the amendments we will probably have further remarks to make. There are some things that I should like to know. When we get into the field of training disabled civilians we enter a type of training different from that which would be given to students or to young people, as some of these people quite necessarily will not be young.

This opens up the question, under whose auspices will the training take place? Is it planned to confine this training to the schools or will some of the excellent rehabilitation centres which are operating throughout the country be authorized to carry on the training of older people? It seems to me that these centres would be far better qualified to do that work. Many of these people would have been out of school for some time and I think the set-up in the rehabilitation centre, especially those which I have in mind, would be admirably suited to the training of older people.

I should like to know also whether those who are to be trained in the trades will be trained along apprenticeship lines and whether that will be done in vocational schools or in conjunction with the various trades concerned. These are questions that interest us. As I said before, when the minister brings in the amendments we will have a better idea of what we want to discuss. At the present time I should like very much to have answers to the questions which I have put along these lines.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Gregg: I wonder if I might answer the hon. member's questions.

Mr. Gillis: Why not wait for the bill? Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the minister answering them, but I do think the questions should be answered when we have the bill before us so that our questions may be relevant. I listened to the minister but of course one cannot get the gist of everything he said with regard to the amendments. While these matters sound all right on paper they certainly do not work out in practice as the paper indicates they should. I have talked a lot over the years about vocational training.

The limiting factors in regard to vocational training in this country are still present. First, if you are going to have a vocational training system in this country you must have schools. That is a first requirement. We have not the schools. We are not going to get the schools under the present financial arrangements among the dominion, provincial and municipal governments. The provincial and federal governments can say, and they have said, that they will contribute their share of the cost, and then it is passed right back to the municipality.

Seventy-five per cent of the municipalities across this country are not in a position to take advantage of that government offer and the result is that we do not have schools. I do not care what regulations you may write, if a community has not the facilities for training they will be valueless. That is No. 1. Some thinking must be done by the provincial and federal governments if we are going to have vocational training, and that thinking must be on the matter of financing the establishment of schools.

I come now to my second point. While the vocational training system did assist a large number of veterans, there were thousands of good soldiers who came back to this country after making the maximum contribution in the war and who were never able to take advantage of the regulations because of academic limitations. I have placed on the record a good many times figures showing the number of soldiers who came out of the last war, who never had a job and who had not got to the eighth grade in school. They went into the service and served four or five years and when they came back to this country they were unable to take up vocational training or get into any kind of school. They went back to the ranks of the unemployed as untrained men. There were thousands in that class. No matter what the regulations are, even though you get schools, this type of person will not be able to take advantage of any kind of vocational training.

The same situation exists in connection with recruiting for the air force, army and navy. We are using very attractive slogans, we are saying to these young men, "Come in and we will give you a trade; make the army your future". There are thousands of sensible, clean-cut boys who are ready to go into the service, but they cannot pass the academic tests. Some of them came to see me in this building, boys of 19 or 20 years of age. When I asked them what about the service or the vocational training system they hung their heads and in many cases admitted that they had not got beyond the sixth grade. They have more brains than most hon. members in this house, including myself, though they have never had a chance to develop them. That is how you get potential gangsters or bank robbers. If the minister or the department or the government are going to take a look at this vocational training problem, then the first two things they must have a look at are the provision of schools across this country and the necessary instruction to enable these young people to take advantage of their opportunities.

If these young men of 19 and 20 years of age, who come from families numbering perhaps 12 to 15 members, have to go out and work instead of going through high school, in order to support other members of the family, then they will be in no position to take advantage of this scheme. Let us try and provide in the curriculum of the schools the academic instruction necessary to enable those young boys to take a vocational training course in diesel engines, electronics, or something else.

If we do not do that we will be wasting thousands upon thousands of potentially good citizens across this country. We gave that type of person a very raw deal in the aftermath of the war. He was good enough to fight but he was not sufficiently trained academically even to take a vocational training course, and he was discriminated against. I have said that many times in this house, and I believe now is the time we should assist them. We have unemployment in this country now. It may continue, though we hope not; but there are thousands of young fellows across this country today and unless we provide them with a means of getting into a place where they can get some training you are going to have trouble with them, and plenty of trouble.

What is essential now is not a whole lot more regulations, but the provision of schools and the necessary instruction to enable the young people of this country to get into these schools.

I believe it will be necessary to take a look at the present set-up in the services, because at the present time we are keeping out of the services thousands of young people who would perhaps make it their career if they had the necessary academic training. But at the moment they are out in the street.

These are the things I am concerned with. I am concerned about the provision of schools. I am concerned about giving the boy who had to leave school before reaching the eighth or tenth grade a chance to go back for a year and pick up the knowledge of mathematics necessary to get into a trade course. If we do not meet these two requirements, then we shall be defeating the whole intention of the vocational training act.

I am not going to quarrel with any of the regulations or with what the minister had to say, but I do wish to emphasize these two points, because if they are not taken care of we will not be meeting the purpose of this legislation. I am not concerned whether we pass these vocational training regulations or not, because vocational training is designed to take care of the type of people with whom I am not concerned. The boy who gets through high school or obtains a university education is in a good position to wrestle for himself. But it is the thousands and thousands of victims of economic circumstances who do not get through school that vocational training should be designed to look after.

That is the angle I am concerned with, and I will wait until the bill comes before the house before I make any other observations on the matter.

Mr. McIvor: It was my duty to obtain considerable information about what we are doing to assist the completely handicapped, and I was surprised to find the extent to which the Department of Labour, the Department of National Health and Welfare, and the Department of Veterans Affairs co-operate with representatives from the provincial governments. I learned that in our schools we have provided teachers who can be of great assistance to those handicapped persons. The situation may be somewhat different in Cape Breton, but from what I have seen in Fort William I know we have provided in our schools the type of teacher who can look after handicapped people whether they are deaf, dumb, blind or otherwise handicapped. I know that if such persons are fortunate enough to get into these vocational schools they are treated in a very generous manner. The complete co-operation which now exists between the Department of Labour and the Department of Veterans Affairs convinces me that the completely handicapped persons will be well looked after. I am looking forward with keen interest to the enactment of this legislation, for I believe there are the large number of people who are not completely handicapped, such as women who can use their hands on a typewriter, or in other ways, who will be able to benefit under this act when it becomes law.

I know of one young boy who was handicapped but had the use of his hands. He had artistic gifts and considerable initiative. That boy was able to design cards and finally sell them. However, he could not make very much without a printing machine and his father and mother mortgaged their home in order to get a machine. He made more money than anyone else in that community and he finally became a millionaire.

I appreciate the interest of the Minister of Labour in these handicapped people, and whether we have—

Mr. Ferguson: I would like to ask my hon. friend a question. What kind of dollar bills was your friend printing?

Mr. McIvor: It was a machine which would print the cards which he designed.

Mr. Ferguson: If they were acceptable, no wonder he made all that money.

Mr. McIvor: I am simply giving the information for what it is worth. The veterans in our community appreciate very much what has been done for the handicapped, and veterans in this house will know that what has been done is considerable. This assistance is now being extended to civilians, and I am sure that before the minister is through everything necessary will be done in co-operation with the provinces and with other ministers in the government to assist those who are handicapped.

There is one other problem. When a man goes along with only one arm or one leg it is difficult to get industries to employ him. These men or women could do a job if they were given the opportunity. However, I am sure the minister recognizes that as an outstanding problem.

Vocational Training Co-ordination Act

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, I noted the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton South and he made a statement that gangsters are born from a group of people who it is said are superior to hon. members of the House of Commons. I am delighted to hear that the House of Commons permits people—

Mr. Gillis: I included myself.

Mr. Ferguson: —of inferior ability not to become gangsters. That is certainly beneficial. Gentlemen, you are not going to become gangsters, as my hon. friend has inferred. I am sure you will all be delighted to learn that you are not going to become gangsters, and that no doubt will be of benefit to all.

As regards vocational training, after the war that training was granted to soldiers and they had the privilege of taking a course in vocational training. Some of these men who were granted this privilege simply took it because it was free, and money was allocated to their families or their wives while they were taking their training. Let us be factual about the expenditure made by the federal and provincial governments and the municipalities.

I have a concrete case in my own home town where the man was a bricklayer, and a fairly good one. His son had served overseas in a certain capacity, one which was not very hazardous. When the boy came back home to this country his father sent him down to take a university course at Hamilton, Ontario, where he would get a mortarboard for his head, apparently, as a bricklayer. After graduating he came back to my home town and one of the first acts performed by this gentleman was the casting of a brick through the main window of the veterans association.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member says that person obtained his training in Hamilton?

Mr. Ferguson: Yes; the town of the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross).

Mrs. Fairclough: We train them for everything there.

Mr. Ferguson: When he started bricklaying the father said, "Heavens, they have taken away from him all of the real bricklaying that I tried to teach him as a young boy." He is now back in the army where his services and his ability will be recognized.

There is no doubt in the world about it that Canada—never mind about the rest of the world—does not recognize the necessity for the proper guidance of our youth and the benefits to be derived therefrom. We are building institutions for the purpose of housing our criminals, and those who are insane. The primary cause of crime among our youth and of a great deal of insanity is the improper rearing of our youth.

There is not a municipality in Canada that is contributing 4 per cent of its income towards the welfare of the youth in the community. In my own community I endeavoured to have set aside from the taxpayers' funds a certain sum of money which did not amount to 1 per cent and which would be applied to uses for the benefit of the youth of our community. This measure was never passed. But in visiting our jails I had found young men and young women of 15, 16 and 18 years of age who were going to be tried and sentenced for some crime which I, when at their age, might easily have been guilty of if I had not had opportunity to use up the energy I had at that age. If I had been in identically the same position as that in which those people were, I probably would have committed the same crimes.

Canada should set an example to the world. From one end of Canada to the other it should be preached that we need to realize that, in order to economize, we must devise a method by means of which to build up the health of our youth, thereby building up their mentality, and thus eliminating the necessity for expenditures on jails and institutions for the insane. We in Canada could save—and nobody will deny it—hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars if we built up our youth to the stage where they learned to live properly. If we would keep them from temptation and give them the desire to develop the body, thereby developing the mind, we could eliminate the great horror which now confronts us with regard to extensive construction of penal institutions.

Each member of this House of Commons should just simply stop and recollect what is going on in his own community. Hon. members should be conversant with the actual facts concerning young people who are weekly brought into court before the magistrates and charged with offences that we all, being human, could have been charged with at their ages. If you do not play professional hockey or baseball, there is little opportunity for such pastimes. There are few corner lots nowadays on which the minors in our community can use up their energy. The alleyways, poolrooms, main streets and corners are where they become conversant with some place or other in which to commit a crime that is not innately in their make-up. But it is innately in the make-up of a young boy or young girl to use up his or her energies. We know where they could use up those energies beneficially, namely on the playgrounds surrounding our schools, under capable and competent instructors.

I ask members of parliament to think of their own communities. I am sorry to say—but I am not afraid to do so—that their communities are similar to those in my own constituency where almost the last thing they think about is expenditure for the development of our youth in order to keep those people in the future free of our penal institutions which are today imposing a terrific burden of taxation on the taxpayers of Canada, a situation brought about primarily and principally through neglect of our youth.

The federal government should waste no time in getting together with the provincial governments and with the municipal authorities, in coming down to earth as men and saying, "Just how can this condition be remedied? Just what can the municipalities afford?" These municipalities must bear in mind the fact that they have a terrific obligation towards those who will be the future taxpayers of Canada, namely the youth of their municipalities. Let not the municipalities slip out from under their burden. Let not the provincial governments fail to do their share. But as a unit composed of men with hearts and having consideration, appreciation and vision, let the federal authorities, the provincial authorities and the municipal authorities set about attaining one decisive and conclusive objective, namely the building up of our youth. Let them spend some money on the youth of Canada, thereby keeping them out of the penal institutions which are costing this country untold millions of dollars at present, and the amount is increasing annually.

I make this plea in the House of Commons today and I hope it is carried across Canada. I say that we have all neglected our duty to the future generations of Canada. Build up our boys and girls physically and they will become the people we want them to be mentally. They will become citizens we are proud of. They will be capable of entering our educational institutions and of absorbing the instruction we are paying for. Eliminate the unnecessary frivolities in our schools. Teach them to read, to write and to know the geography, the history and the traditions of the country which we all love. Then, when these children grow up and reach the point where they face the future, without the guidance of a father and mother, they will be at least partially capable of meeting the situation which confronts them. They will be capable of self-preservation. The thought will be in the back of their minds that they come from a great country that has done them a service they justly deserve.

Mr. Gregg: I wonder if the next speaker would mind if I just said a word in reply to the hon. member for Simcoe North. I will agree with him immediately that we, as older people, have not done our complete duty to our young people. I will agree that the federal and provincial governments, as well as the municipal governments, have not done all they should. But I do deny most emphatically the age-old inference one might take from his remarks that the young people of our day are going to the dogs. They are not going to the dogs. I contend, and I know there are many members in this house on both sides who will agree with me, that the young people today have better health, better training and a more serious outlook on their responsibilities than the young people had when my hon. friend and I were boys.

I shall come to the other point. I should like to challenge in a friendly fashion the statement he made at the outset of his remarks. He cited the example of a veteran of the second world war who had the advantage of the university training program, and from that individual case—we can always pick them out in any category—he drew general conclusions.

Mr. Ferguson: No, I did not. You drew them.

Mr. Gregg: Put it this way. He gave every member of this house the feeling that he meant general conclusions should be drawn from the example of that individual bricklayer whose training apparently had not worked out in the way it was intended. I am sure we have all seen in our own constituencies—I know the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has seen it—the magnificent way in which the vocational training program has worked out with respect to our ex-service men and women of world war II. I saw it first when I was minister of the veterans affairs department, and I have seen it since coming to the Department of Labour. I feel the hon. member for Simcoe North is not justified in taking the somewhat pessimistic attitude he has taken this afternoon. I am sure that upon further thought and upon investigating what has happened in the field of training young people in his own riding, he will have cause to amend the thoughts he expressed today.

Mr. Ferguson: In reply to the minister—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Simcoe North will have an opportunity to speak later. I had seen the hon. member for Saskatoon first.

Mr. Knight: I have been interested, Mr. Chairman, in this little debate, heated at times, between the Minister of Labour and the hon. member for Simcoe North.

Mr. Ferguson: Not the least bit heated.

Mr. Knight: I feel there is something in what both of them said. I certainly agree with the minister that youth is not going to the dogs.

Mr. Ferguson: Nobody mentioned the dogs, so far as I know.

Mr. Knight: Give me a moment; I am coming to the justification of your point. I think also that perhaps the member for Simcoe North is justified in saying that we have some responsibility in seeing that our youth do not go to the dogs.

Mr. Ferguson: Hear, hear; that was my view.

Mr. Knight: I believe that if there is a vocational training scheme or any other way in which the government, in conjunction with the provinces, can give this or any other kind of education, that is all to the good in the accomplishment of the hon. member's objective, namely that youth shall not go to the dogs.

Personally, as one who has had a good deal of experience with young people from time to time, I have the greatest respect for the good sense, collectively, of the young people today. One cannot say very much about the bill that is preceded by this particular resolution since we have not seen it. I can merely say that I welcome it. It seems to cover a fairly broad field. I see my hon. friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his seat, and I suppose he is expecting I shall go into a speech about the necessity of federal aid to education. I warn him I shall make no such appeal.

Mr. Martin: I was just exchanging an affectionate greeting with the hon. member for Simcoe North.

Mr. Knight: I was saying that this resolution certainly covers a very wide field, and I believe it could be termed a measure of federal aid towards education. It covers such things as grants for university students, and I certainly have been advocating that for a long time. I am interested also in seeing that it does cover some aid to student nurses. Whether this is a move to promote education or whether it is merely a move to promote training, may I point out to my hon. friend that, in my opinion, the two things go hand in hand, although they might appear to be altogether different. I think they should go hand in hand. I am sure there will be a good deal of academic work mixed up with this particular scheme for vocational training. I do not imagine any of the provinces will raise any objection under section 92 of the British North America Act to accepting money for this particular purpose.

I know that it might be argued that this is not education as such, within the ordinary definition of the term. It certainly could not be called academic education, but as I say I imagine there will be a good deal of necessary academic education in connection with this vocational training program. I should like to say a word in support of what the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said about the need for good equipment, particularly the need of trade schools. In view of the fact that we are becoming increasingly an industrial nation, we must encourage the trade schools and the teaching of trades to young people. There are a great many young people who are not suited perhaps for more academic education. There are a great many young people, and it is their own business, who are not interested in it but who are definitely interested in doing something with their hands. They form an extremely important part of this country because we are becoming more and more an industrial nation. I believe that if we are to hold our place in the industrial world today we shall have to give more attention to trade schools.

We have not the schools, as my colleague pointed out. Perhaps we have the teachers, but I would suggest to the minister that even the teacher of vocational work needs some training in teaching itself. One might say, why do not a great many of our students go on to higher academic training rather than into the trades? I have given one or two of the reasons relating to the matter of taste. Another reason is that a great many people today cannot afford a high school education. Oh, you say, but we have free high school education in the provinces, have we not? That, sir, is one of the greatest fallacies that one could state in regard to education. I have no statistics with me because I did not know the debate on this resolution would take this turn, but if one examines the figures showing the number of people who take high school education in this country, and if one considers the class standing—I am speaking now in a financial way—enjoyed by parents, one gets a considerable shock.

We find that when we come to the children of people in the higher professional classes the figure is somewhat over 80 per cent—I think it is 88 per cent—who enjoy the benefits of higher education. But the scale goes gradually down. When we come to the skilled labour group we get a much smaller proportion whose children get high school education. Then when we get down to unskilled labour the percentage goes down very far indeed.

I should like to say a word about nurses, particularly student nurses. I have no authority to speak on the question, but, by strange coincidence, my first interference, if one might call it that, or my first participation in public life, was a battle on behalf of student nurses who, in my opinion, were having a pretty raw deal, back in the time of the thirties. Of course, they were not the only people who had a bad time in those days. We do know however that they had to work very hard. A good deal of it was rough work of the kind which I should think nurses ought not to do regularly. Their accommodation was very poor, and their pay amounted to nothing at all.

It can be argued of course that the nurse is receiving a valuable training which, outside a hospital, would cost a tremendous amount of money. Even in those days however they did not receive even sufficient for pocket money, and I hope they will be treated differently from now on. They play an essential and most valuable part in our community. With the growing feeling of responsibility by governments and organizations in health matters and schemes, I do hope nurses will be given a better deal in the matter of their training.

While I am on my feet I should like to make what I believe is an interesting point. I am surrounded by doctors in the house, and undoubtedly they know more about this than I do. I have always felt however that perhaps three years is too long a period for the training of a nurse. I have never been able to rid myself of the idea that somehow or other the third year of training was, if I may put it this way, a bonus for the institution training them. In other words, after the first two years, I think a nurse is a pretty competent person, and that she should be compensated to some considerable extent for the third year of her training. Either that or she should be given her certificate at the end of her second year and allowed to practise her profession.

I have no doubt there are arguments against this contention. I remember one doctor, a friend of mine, who kept insisting that nurses were taught many things they did not need to know, things that came within the functions of a doctor, and which a nurse certainly would not be expected to perform if there was a doctor within forty or fifty miles. In his view the only justification for certain types of training would be in respect of nurses who might hold positions away up in the north country or at points where no medical help was available, and where the nurse might have to do her best under those conditions.

I asked what he would substitute. He said that if the authorities insisted upon keeping her around the hospital for an extra year she should be given lots of training in public relations and the use of good English. Perhaps he was right in that respect.

I believe I am straying farther afield than I had intended when I began speaking. Let me repeat that I welcome this bill, as I always welcome any expenditure of money for purposes which could be termed educational. I believe vocational training is a particularly valuable part of education as such, and of course has tremendous value on its own account.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that the minister has considered what I said as an indication that I believe the youth of Canada have gone to the dogs. There was no mention whatever in my speech about dogs. I did try to imply that I did not believe in unnecessary frills in education, and I indicated that in some cases there has been a waste of the taxpayers' money. I did try to impress upon the House of Commons the fact that the federal government in Canada should do something for the youth of Canada—that something should be done federally, provincially and municipally. At no time did I say that our youth were going to the dogs.

I did say however that our penal institutions and institutions for the insane are bulging today because in the past we have neglected the youth of this country. I pleaded with the government, through the Minister of Labour and his colleagues in the cabinet, to work in conjunction with provincial and municipal governments so that a program could be carried out harmoniously for the benefit of the youth of this country. There was no idea in the back of my mind, nor did I express any such idea, that the youth of Canada were associated with pups or dogs.

My plea was that the government should realize the situation and, through our schools and other institutions of learning, develop our youth physically and mentally, so that they may be capable of avoiding the pitfalls that confront all of us as we go along the thorny and difficult path of life. That was my plea.

And I am very sorry that the Minister of Labour misconstrued it, and chose to say nothing about his view concerning development through action by the federal, provincial and municipal governments. I believe something worth while could be done in this way to help our youth develop themselves mentally and physically so as to avoid the rocky shores of penal institutions, and institutions for the weak-minded which, unless they are given help, some are bound to enter.

This is my plea. I am sorry the Minister of Labour has miscontrued it, and has said that I have expressed the view that the youth of Canada were going to the dogs. I say the youth of Canada will go to the dogs unless something is done with some degree of expedition and efficiency, and at considerably more cost than all three branches of government are spending today on this most valuable asset, the youth of our country.

Mr. Gregg: If I misconstrued my hon. friend's remarks, Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, as my department is interested in this matter I thought perhaps I should say a word or two in the debate on the resolution. First of all, may I say to the hon. member for Simcoe North that he misunderstood the intervention by the Minister of Labour. All hon. members know that the hon. member for Simcoe North has a keen interest in the youth of this country. Indeed, he has given an exhibition of it in his own personal life. And while I do not suppose this is the place for me to particularize, I merely make mention of that because it is generally known. And I am sure he would be the first to admit that perhaps there are few men in our country who, by their character and integrity, have given a better demonstration of their interest in the young people of our country than has the Minister of Labour. He is one of the most gallant gentlemen of this house.

I should say that this subject is one that is not new to this parliament. At the end of the first war the government of the day took an interest in the matter of technical education, and special grants in aid were provided by the central government to the provincial governments to assist in the kind of work contemplated by the resolution introduced by the Minister of Labour today.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South, while he acknowledged the value of the kind of thing that is contemplated by the resolution, made a strong plea to provide for many other individuals who did not have the basic foundation which permits them to enter the vocational schools. He came over and talked to me about it while the Minister of Labour was speaking. I am sure the Minister of Labour is aware of the importance of this matter, but as I said to the hon. member for Cape Breton South, in replying to him privately, obviously there has to be a certain foundation if a student is going to take advantage even of vocational training, and it may be that the provincial governments, under whose jurisdiction this kind of thing comes, will be able to provide the foundation training which includes that which the hon. member for Cape Breton South said was lacking.

The hon. member for Simcoe North also spoke of his disappointment that the Minister of Labour had not indicated at the beginning of his remarks his desire to co-operate with the provinces and with other bodies in the country in trying to make this effort really a great one. It is a good thing that from time to time in the House of Commons all parties should be able to forget their differences, as on the whole we are doing today, and direct our attention to a really important problem that has to do with a vital section of the younger generation of our country. But the Minister of Labour has given evidence of his conviction as to the desire and the necessity of co-operating with provincial governments in this matter.

Two years ago he convened, along with the Minister of Veterans Affairs and myself as Minister of National Health and Welfare, a conference that was held in Toronto with all of the provincial governments and with those groups in the nation interested in rehabilitation, vocational guidance and vocational training. That conference was one of the historic occasions of its kind in this country, and to the Minister of Labour, along with the provincial governments who were generous in their co-operation, must go the credit for the leadership that was given on that occasion and for the work that has been done since. Out of that meeting came a national advisory committee that is truly representative of the federal, provincial and voluntary bodies of this country interested in providing rehabilitation and vocational training for the people of our country. It is well that we should take this occasion to emphasize this work.

The relation to this resolution of the work of the Department of National Health and Welfare is this. The emphasis now on rehabilitation is one of the great steps and advances in medical science. No longer are we taking for granted that crippled people or people mentally ill or suffering from other kinds of illnesses should regard themselves as incapable of playing their full part in the development of their own careers or of making the contribution that they would normally want to make to the nation.

I remember that not very long ago, shortly before I became Minister of National Health and Welfare, people who for instance were suffering from cerebral palsy were looked upon as unfortunate individuals who must no longer expect to live as normal human beings. That is not so in this country today. It is generally recognized that while the sufferer from cerebral palsy may not be able to become completely free of that terrible and unfortunate handicap, yet it is no longer necessary to regard the victim of that disease as incapable of playing any useful part in the life of the community.

I invite hon. members to go to the cerebral palsy centre in Ottawa. That centre is made possible out of grants provided by the service clubs and by the federal government under the national health program. There they will see the work of rehabilitation that is going on. It is one of the most satisfying experiences a man can have. I invite hon. members to go there and see the way in which some of the money provided by the taxpayers to the government is being expended for that particular group alone.

These people who are being given this training in the cerebral palsy centre, for instance, fall in with the kind of work that the Minister of Labour has in mind after they receive the basic training at the hands of a doctor and a nurse and are rendered more fit to look after themselves or to carry on their daily lives in a more normal way.

One could mention the work of the paraplegic association, in the aftermath of world war II. One of the most amazing achievements, surely, in our time is the work of the paraplegic association. I mention here the work of John Counsell, the head of that body, one of the great men of our country, a lad from Hamilton who lost the use of his limbs at Dieppe during the war, and who has taken a very active part in the paraplegic association. The work of that agency has resulted not only in the rehabilitation of veterans, but in the use of the same facilities for the rehabilitation of civilians. That work is likewise being assisted under the national health program, and the individuals who receive the benefits of the medical training and treatment as the result of these grants then become fit subjects for the training provided for under the vocational training program now being sponsored by the Minister of Labour.

One could go on and mention all kinds of things that are now being done in the realm of rehabilitation prior to many of those individuals being able to take advantage of vocational training provided for by the federal and provincial governments. There is the rehabilitation that is going on in our tuberculosis sanatoria, in our mental health institutions and so forth. There you will find individuals who formerly were looked after by the community in terms of medical and hospital attention, but who after that were completely forgotten. Many of them were young people. That is not so now. I am sure that we shall strongly support the principle behind this resolution, recognizing at the same time that the government was wise in adding to the national health program last year additional grants to provide, in a co-operative way with the provinces, for the important program of rehabilitation which must be regarded as going hand in hand with vocational training.

Mr. Fairey: Mr. Chairman, I now am conscious of the penalty of sitting away back in the corner of the house because I have been trying to catch your eye for a long time. I am bold enough to say that some of the questions that are being asked might not have been asked if I had had a chance to speak first. I say that because I have been associated with the program of vocational training in the province of British Columbia, and in the whole of the Dominion of Canada, for the last 17 years, and have been actively associated with this particular program.

It was one of my hopes that I would be permitted to trace the origin of this program from its very early days down to the present day, because I think this program demonstrates the great opportunity which has been embraced by this government and the provincial governments to co-operate with one another. I think under this system of vocational training which we have now—not perfect, it is true—we have demonstrated the ability to work together and to co-operate province with province and provinces with the federal government better than under any other measure we have been able to suggest, except perhaps the program under the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The act which we are proposing to amend is one of the shorter acts on our statute books and I have no doubt that the amending bill will be short and contain only a few clauses. I rather suspect that because of its brevity it may be considered as of not too great importance. To my mind it is one of the most forward-looking pieces of legislation we shall have before us this session.

May I take a few minutes to trace the origin of the vocational training program in Canada. Because of its modest beginnings and eventual importance it demonstrates the wisdom of starting with something very simple and being sure where you are going and building step by step to something worth while. It is a program that demands the partnership of the provinces as between themselves and the provinces with the federal government. The success of the many projects which have been operating under this program is, I think, testimony not only to the wisdom of those responsible for its early days but to the fact that ways can be found to solve any problem when the pressure of outside events brings together people of common aims and good will.

Because I am sure, more sure today than ever before, that some hon. members are only vaguely aware of the provisions of the vocational training act and what has been done under it, I propose, at the risk of being somewhat garrulous, to trace the growth of the operations under the present act from their early beginnings until the present day. I hope in doing so to show that in the field of vocational training, as in many other fields, the policy of the government has been one of wise caution but firm decision once the right road ahead was clear.

Federal participation in education has always been a subject to be approached with great caution, but here we have a form of federal aid to education, as one hon. member has mentioned already. It is an example of the sensible approach. We find that it has resulted in the operation of many successful undertakings. Vocational training began during the depression years at the time when this government had funds allotted for what we called unemployment relief.

Much has been said about the hungry thirties, but it was during those days that methods were adopted to alleviate, in some small measure at any rate, the plight of young men and women who were without employment. Those of us who are old enough will remember that there were thousands of the youth of this country who had left school, who had no jobs, who had no opportunity for training, and who were just walking the streets. It was in those days, as part of the relief procedures, that the provinces and the dominion government—I am sorry if I inadvertently use the word "dominion" but we like it in British Columbia anyway; I may lapse into its use once in a while—at any rate the federal government made money available in co-operation with the provinces for some kind of training which would fit the young people of those days for jobs which they hoped would eventuate sometime in the future.

Therefore classes were started, not only in the cities but in the rural areas, for young men and women between the ages of 16 and 25 years, I believe it was, which age limit was later extended to 30 years. Those young people received training in those classes and eventually found work. The employment services of Canada, together with many of the officials who were engaged on the program, co-operated in their placement. Because of their efforts we were able to alleviate to some degree the fear that we were training people for jobs that did not exist. That certainly was true for a time. Nevertheless as the program developed the worth of it became known, places were found and a great deal of good was done.

In those days we saw the beginnings of federal participation in physical health. We have an organization in British Columbia known as the PRO-REC, and it was in the days of the hungry thirties that the program of physical fitness had its beginning. I do not think I mentioned that, during those days, costs were shared on a 50-50 basis.

Because of the success—mind you, I am speaking now of 1938—of this program, this parliament decided to pass the Youth Training Act of 1939 under which the federal government authorized the continuation of those classes and the extension of the program. I am going to keep my remarks as short as I can, but I do want to say that under the Youth Training Act we were able to continue the program which had been established and to provide for other things as the need arose.

It is true that at that time war loomed its ugly head. Because we had these classes established in the provincial technical and vocational schools, as well as in rented quarters; because we had trained staffs of instructors it was possible with that foundation to build what eventually became known as the war emergency training program. We were able to carry on that program under the Youth Training Act with such amendments as were necessary under the War Measures Act. Mr. Chairman, I have sketched somewhat briefly the beginnings of what we are talking about today.

It is not my intention to bolster my story with statistics, as these can be found in the many reports of the Department of Labour dealing with vocational training, particularly in the Labour Gazette, which, as hon. members know, is published monthly. However, it may be interesting to know that from April, 1940, to the end of 1944, upwards of 360,000 men and women were trained for the navy, army, air force and war industry at a total cost to the federal government of $21 million. The growth from those modest beginnings which I have attempted to show continued, and in 1942 the act we are now proposing to amend, the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, was passed.

May I go back just for a moment to say that because we had started in such a modest way and were gradually extending over a wide field, the federal authorities thought it wise to call together those in charge of the program to Ottawa at least twice a year for consultation. It was out of that kind of unofficial advisory body that authority was given to form the advisory council which now exists under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act.

In 1942, therefore, because of the changing nature of the work, it was thought wise to introduce the act known as the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act. It was thought desirable to co-ordinate the various activities then being carried on, to provide for the continuance of those which were desirable and to drop those no longer necessary.

I am sorry the hon. member for Cape Breton South is not at present in his seat, because I wanted to congratulate him for putting his finger, with his usual foresight, on the two great needs. Provincial departments of education, speaking on behalf of their governments, have always maintained that the federal government encouraged the provinces to build technical schools, as they did under the vocational education act of 1931, and after these schools had been built, with federal assistance, the provinces were left to carry on their operation. I believe we all know that vocational or technical schools, because of equipment requirements, usually have much smaller classes but higher paid staffs. At any rate, they are more expensive schools to operate, yet no money was allocated from federal funds to assist in the operation of these schools once they were built.

However, that was remedied by the passing of the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, because under that act provision was made, not only for funds for capital expenditure, but also funds on an annual basis to assist in the operation of these schools. Perhaps the hon. member for Cape Breton South is not aware of that provision under the present act. The vocational training act provides for both these needs, modestly it is true, but the door is ajar; and there are those of us still around who are ready to give it a vigorous shove in order to push it wide open, if we get the chance.

By the end of the war there were a number of separate agreements between the federal authorities and the various provinces, and these covered a variety of activities by various definite schedules, providing for every class and age group of citizens. The vocational schools assistance agreement, to which the minister already referred, provided for capital and operational grants for a period, I believe, of ten years, The youth training agreement, already mentioned, was for unemployed youths who had never been employed and who were in that age group which needed some form of training in order to assist them to secure employment. Under the urban and rural occupational training, provision was made for those who had been employed, were out of a job, and who required training, or retraining, to fit them for a different type of job. Then we had training for war industries and for the armed services and the great rehabilitation program for veterans of the second world war, all of which were carried out under the same authority in co-operation with and at the request of the Department of Veterans Affairs. There was another great program, Mr. Chairman, on which I could talk for hours. We called it pre-university training for veterans of the second world war. An hon. member opposite mentioned the fact that sometimes the veteran who had come back had less academic training than he could have had because, due to the war, he was prevented from going on with further education. That was certainly true with many of the veterans who, had there not been a war, probably would have gone to university.

The officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs, for whom I have the greatest admiration because of what they did for the veterans of the last war, recognized that situation. They recognized that there were many men and women who had enlisted in the services who would have gone to university but who unfortunately were not properly prepared for it. Because of that fact, schools were established all over the country for the purpose of providing pre-university training; and I am sure you would be amazed, Mr. Chairman, to learn the number of people we were able to bring up to university entrance standards, young men and women with no previous education beyond grade 10. Further than that, they did better work in the university than students from the regular schools. That was probably because we gave them excellent training, and because they were mature and interested in their work. It was an excellent program.

There was also the apprentice training program and the student aid program. I have often heard the question asked in this house and outside as to why we do not provide for students who should go to university but who cannot afford to do so. We do provide that opportunity, and have been doing so since 1939.

Before I develop that, permit me to recite all these activities to show how comprehensive the program has become. When brought together these programs provide this pattern. There was federal aid for education at the secondary school level and capital expenditure for the operation of schools run by provincial authorities. There were classes for youngsters who had left school but who had no previous training at all. There were classes for those who had been employed but were out of work and wanted to change their jobs. There were classes for veterans and for older people, and correspondence classes for those in remote areas. The council, which has already been referred to, considered all these things and made recommendations. We therefore had a comprehensive program brought together under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, paid for in most cases on a 50-50 basis with the provinces, except for those portions which dealt with war services or training for members of the armed forces.

May I say for the benefit of the hon. member for Simcoe North that we did have classes for young veterans who lacked academic training, which provided training similar to the type we gave at the end of the war to veterans who wished to go to university and which I described previously as pre-university training. There are classes operating today for young soldiers who lack the required academic standards.

Federal expenditures covering all these programs since their inception in 1939—and I took the trouble to check this figure—amount at the present time to a little short of $90 million.

Reverting to the student aid program which is carried on in co-operation with the provinces. I might point out that this has been in operation since 1939. If I quote figures from my own province of British Columbia it is only because I happen to know them better than the figures relating to other provinces, though I do know that these other provinces have similar programs. From a very modest beginning in 1939, when the province and the federal authorities each contributed $2,550 or a total of $5,100, the scheme has grown until today, and for some years past, each government has made available $30,000 per year. To that amount the local government in British Columbia adds another $50,000 for loans, so that we have a total of a little more than $110,000 available every year to assist needy students of intellectual capacity to go to university.

It is interesting, Mr. Chairman, and very heartening to learn that in the province of British Columbia alone, regardless of the others, 5,765 young men and women have been assisted in obtaining further education. At the present moment there are 627 young British Columbians attending university because of assistance provided under this fund. I do not know the figures for the present year for the whole country but for last year, the academic year 1952-53, there were 4,663 students attending the universities of Canada under this fund, and of those some 1,093 were women.

All the activities which I have described were sponsored and directed by the training branch of the Department of Labour, and have been recommended to the ministry by an advisory council. I know it is understood that, because of changing conditions, modifications in the composition of the council itself are required. I should like to discuss that matter for a moment. This advisory council grew out of a need. In the early days we had this unofficial council—it was not really unofficial, but it was gathered together without any statutory provision—to discuss these matters. We met with the director of training. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that I keep slipping in a "we" once in a while, but I happened to be one of them. It was necessary then for us to meet to advise the minister on those matters which we thought wise, to recommend that the scheme be enlarged, and to assess the need for additional programs.

I do not know whether it is permissible in this chamber to pay tribute to an official by name, but I should like to place on record the admiration of all who knew him for the late Mr. R. F. Thompson, who was director of training in the Department of Labour. It was he who sparked the program and directed it from its early days until he died, quite recently. It was because of his industry and his ability to secure the co-operation of all manner of people throughout this country that we have such a measure on the statute books today.

On this council I have mentioned it was originally intended to have representatives in equal number of labour and industry. We have had representatives of labour, industry, womens' organizations, agriculture, veterans organizations and education. Not all provinces were officially represented. As a matter of fact, there were only three representatives of education.

I do not know the details of the amending bill, but the resolution we are discussing leads me to suppose that the purpose of increasing the number of the council is so that a representative of all ten provinces may find a place on it. The present bill provides for a chairman and 16 members. I know the resolution calls for an increase in the number, and I think that is why. Where the provinces are co-operating, as they are, willingly and anxiously, I think it is only right that they should have an official place on the council, and I believe that is what the minister has in mind.

There is one last subject that I wish to mention. I notice that the Minister of National Health and Welfare spoke very feelingly, as he always does, about this question of rehabilitation of the physically handicapped. It is one of the newer programs that have been operating under this act. It has to do with the training or retraining of those suffering physical handicaps. Much was learned over all these years from what has been done by the Department of Veterans Affairs, from the programs carried out in several of the provinces under the various workmen's compensation acts, and from the program we had ourselves, because we trained handicapped persons too. Those successful experiences have encouraged everybody connected with this program to the point of enthusiasm, I might say, as to the possibility of doing a great and noble work.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has announced a measure for the relief of those totally disabled. I am hopeful that this amending bill will contain provision for adequate funds and means for an all-out attack on a problem which must touch the emotions of all hon. members as well as commend itself to us all as a sound economic measure.

When I spoke on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I mentioned this subject and pointed out that men and women suffering a physical handicap can and should be trained for occupations they are capable of performing. There is a tremendous waste of talent when we allow such persons to swell the ranks of the unemployed. The last thing they want is sympathy, although that we must give in full measure. The best kind of sympathy is the opportunity to become self-supporting and self-respecting. This can be done. It has been done and it is now being done. What is needed now is authority to make it a major undertaking.

I am convinced, Mr. Chairman, that hon. members realize that it is not only the right thing but the wise thing to do. This act will make it possible to engage the resourcefulness of those now interested in the medical and physical rehabilitation of those who suffer a handicap from whatever cause. Mention was made of voluntary agencies. I think it was the hon. member for Hamilton West who asked whether the training would be done in schools or in industry or through the various agencies. The minister mentioned the paraplegic association, the cerebral palsy association, and so on. It is the intention—in fact it is being done now—to co-ordinate the efforts of those agencies and give the training wherever it can best be done.

I conclude by saying that throughout this country there are numerous organizations actively concerned with this problem I have just mentioned. They are all anxious to get going once we have a co-ordinator. They want the activities in these matters brought together. They want somebody to head it; they are going to get it under this act. They are seized with enthusiasm about what can be done. They await only some central authority to co-ordinate their services in a common effort. The provinces are willing. This measure, which authorizes the federal government and particularly the Department of Labour to be that co-ordinating agency, is one which, I suggest, will commend itself to all hon. members.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, as my colleagues the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Saskatoon have already pointed out, we welcome the introduction of this resolution. I imagine it would be fair to say that ministers generally, when they introduce matters which they must pilot through the house, like to get them through as rapidly as possible; but this afternoon I believe the Minister of Labour is really quite pleased that a fair amount of time is being spent on this important piece of legislation.

We all listened with considerable interest to the highly informative speech which has just been made by the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) who in his former capacity as deputy minister of education in one of our provinces had considerable to do with technical education. In passing may I say that we in the province of Manitoba appreciate the assistance that has come our way under this program. We are particularly pleased with and proud of our technical vocational school in the city of Winnipeg.

As my colleague the hon. member for Saskatoon has pointed out, we are interested in all possible education for the young people of this country, and we are indeed pleased to see this form of federal assistance to education. No one suggests that it interferes in any way with the complete jurisdiction over education which is accorded to the provinces by section 92 of the British North America Act. Rather the financial assistance provided in this way is for the benefit of the country as a whole. We hope to see that principle extended to still other areas of education.

However, Mr. Chairman, since my colleagues and the members of other parties have spoken on those aspects of the matter I shall not take further time on them. Rather I wanted to say a few words concerning the aspect of this legislation which was touched upon by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who referred to the fact that the resolution states that the measure to be introduced will include authority to enter into agreements with the provinces to grant assistance for the rehabilitation training of disabled persons.

I am sure we all share the sentiments expressed by the minister this afternoon when he pointed out that society has progressed to the point, and medical science has served us to the point, where disabled people no longer have to be regarded as useless to society or to themselves. There still are people who suffer very great misfortunes and disabilities, but the number of people who can lead happy and useful lives, despite physical disabilities of one kind and another, is steadily increasing due in part to the progress of medical science and in part to the attitude of society in accepting the responsibility to provide funds to help such people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the main point I want to make in connection with this is my very strong feeling that there must be the closest co-operation between the Minister of Labour and the Minister of National Health and Welfare in connection with the rehabilitation program and pensions to disabled persons. I know the immediate answer of those two ministers will be that they co-operate all the time. What I am asking for now is something more than just co-operation in the sense that they get together personally. I feel that these two pieces of legislation, the one before us now in the name of the Minister of Labour and the one the Minister of National Health and Welfare will be bringing in shortly, must be dovetailed together. From what we have before us now and from the sketchy information we have about the other legislation, my fear is that our disabled people are going to be put into one category or the other. There are going to be those for whom rehabilitation training will be useful and they will get that, whereas others will be regarded as totally disabled and they will get the disability pension provided they meet the means test.

As I say, the information we have had with respect to the legislation that is yet to come is sketchy, but it has been suggested that the pensions to be provided under that legislation will be only for those who are totally and permanently disabled. I do not think it should be that way. I feel the very fact that the Minister of Labour is now introducing a provision for a rehabilitation program calls for dealing with these two matters together. In my view there are people who are capable of taking a certain amount of rehabilitation training which means that they are not permanently disabled; but in order to take that training and get a start, they will need some financial assistance. On the other hand the fact that they are not permanently disabled may bar them from getting the pension. I hope that the hard and fast line which I see looming up will not be drawn, but that there will be a common sense and a humanitarian approach to this whole problem.

It is a great venture upon which we are launching, in that we are proposing to spend public money to try and do something worthwhile for disabled persons. This is a good move. Let us not scuttle the program by this hard and fast line I fear may be drawn. Let us admit that there will be some people for whom the only thing we can do is provide pensions. If that is the case, let us do that and let us make these pensions decent and adequate. There will be other persons who do not need pensions at the moment, but who do need rehabilitation training. Let us see that they get the kind of rehabilitation training that will be useful to them. Let us not forget that there will be a third group who are neither wholly in one category nor wholly in the other. I hope these people will not be shifted from one category to the other, and end up getting nothing at all. They need rehabilitation training, and financial assistance while they are taking that training.

As I say, I plead not only for close co-operation between the two ministers concerned, but co-operation between them and the Minister of Veterans Affairs as well. I plead for the legislation to be dovetailed together in such a way that it will provide the utmost benefit to our disabled persons, who need and deserve everything we can do for them.

Mr. Shaw: When one agrees with a measure it seems hardly necessary for him to indulge in extended debate in order to indicate his position. All those sitting with me agree wholeheartedly with the purpose of this resolution. We have spoken before when measures designed to amend the act have been before us.

It is noted in the resolution that it is deemed advisable to amend the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act to meet the requirements, first of defence, and second, other purposes. We feel, of course, that at a time like this, when defence is so essential, it is most important that we extend the act in such a way as to fully utilize the services of the largest possible number of Canadians.

However, if there were no need for defence we would still say that an act of this kind would be wholly necessary, and that every effort should be made by the federal government, working in co-operation with the provincial governments, to expand the program in its application to disabled persons. I agree that a step forward was taken when it was proposed that pensions would be paid to certain of our disabled people. I also agree fully with those who have asserted that there is something just as important, probably even more important, and that is providing training for those who are capable of being trained even though they are disabled. I have talked with a number of these people. They ask not for charity, although they realize there are certain of their numbers who are totally disabled or cannot be trained. At the same time they have stressed the fact that the disabled who can take advantage of the training want the training.

We certainly support the measure, particularly as it relates to the training of disabled persons. There were a number of things which I intended to say concerning the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, but I have thought it over and I believe it would be more appropriate for me to say those things when we are dealing with the estimates relating to vocational training. I simply say to the minister that we support the resolution. We feel that it will perform a most useful function for our Canadian people and for Canada.

Mr. Dinsdale: I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the need for broader facilities for vocational training in Canada is one of the great educational needs of our time. We have been passing through a technological revolution which has resulted in a great demand for trained technicians to man the machines of our mechanized civilization. Notwithstanding that fact, our high schools still continue to stress the straight academic program and preparation for the professions rather than preparation for the technical pursuits that are so necessary today.

As I have listened to the discussion thus far I have come to the conclusion that the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act recognizes this need. I am glad I did not speak before the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia, because I feel he has made an excellent and most enlightening contribution to the debate. I was keenly interested in the survey he made of the history of this particular legislation.

Notwithstanding the fact that there have been measures promoting vocational training in Canada now for a considerable number of years, and that this act has been in effect since 1942, as I have already intimated there is still a great need for the expansion of vocational training facilities. I believe the major drawback in meeting this need for vocational training arises from the bugbear of all education today, the financial problem.

As I look at the act it seems to me that the carrying out of its various measures must depend upon provincial initiative. Unfortunately, as all hon. members are aware, our provinces are already burdened with education costs. Therefore they are reluctant to take any action that would increase in any way their financial obligations in the matter of education. So in the final analysis the responsibility for action falls back upon the municipalities.

During the resolution stage of the discussion, for my own information, I would like to ask the minister one or two questions concerning which he might be able to enlighten me. Would there be financial assistance for agricultural schools which operate mainly for rural young people who have not had the advantage of formal high school education? I give as an example an agricultural school that provides training in the basic skills required for farming, a general practical course in farming operations for farm boys, and for the farm girls a basic training in home economics or the skills required for home-making. It seems to me that schedule "O" might provide for financial assistance to a program of this kind, and I was wondering if that interpretation would be correct.

Another query that comes to mind is this. Is financial assistance under this act possible for a large school area program, which endeavours to meet the demand for a broadened curriculum, and also the necessity for providing adequate facilities to meet the new demands in educational circles today? The large school area program has not been too successful to date in my own province. As a matter of fact we have established only one area, chiefly because the various communities are suspicious that a broadening of educational facilities in this way would entail large increases in the costs of education. I would hope that a program of this kind, where there is an attempt to introduce training in technical skills, in farm skills and in commercial lines, as well as giving the regular basic collegiate program, should come in for assistance under this act. Certainly it might encourage a more rapid acceptance of this new idea in educational circles.

I wonder, too, if there is any provision in the act for vocational guidance. When we begin to specialize in the field of education the problem immediately arises as to the necessity for offering special counsel and advice to our young people in the matter of selecting their areas of interest. The vocational guidance movement has emerged in Canada since 1930 to meet this need. I have looked through recent reports concerning the administration of the act, and I cannot see any specific reference to provision being made for financial assistance in the carrying on of a vocational guidance program. Perhaps the minister could give us some information on that point.

I see a possible solution in the very title of the act for some of the difficulties I have outlined. The act is known as the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, and the word "co-ordination" suggests to me one method of broadening the scope of this particular legislation. I note in the schedule of payments that for vocational training programs covering members of the armed forces and war veterans the federal government provides support to the extent of 100 per cent, whereas in the training of disabled persons and young people between the ages of 16 and 30, with particular reference in schedule "O" to the training of foremen, supervisors and the like, the support is either 75 per cent or 50 per cent.

We know that in military matters considerations of cost are never involved. It seems to me some attempt might be made to bring about a closer integration of the technical training required to meet the demands of a technological civilization as well as the technical training required to meet the demands of our defence program. While these activities parallel one another to some extent, they do tend to have separate treatment. Independent facilities are established which obviously would increase considerably the expenditures involved.

In the world of today the areas of civilian and military activities seem to be almost indivisible, because in a time of trouble, in a time of war, everyone would be caught up in the demands of defence. It should be in our best interests to explore every possible avenue whereby we might meet the growing demand for a larger number of people with training in the technical skills. Preparedness is the best defence in the long run, and I hope this suggestion might be given attention as amendments to the act are brought in when we finally have the bill before us.

One final word, Mr. Chairman. There would appear to be a need for some publicity on behalf of the activities under this act. I note that in the report for 1952 there are regional directors in every province, with the exception of British Columbia, Manitoba and Newfoundland. The maritime provinces are particularly well represented from the standpoint of regional directors. I would imagine that a regional director is largely responsible for applying the terms of the act to the situation as he finds it in his particular province. It might be that if we had a wider representation—for example, if there were regional directors in the other provinces which do not have such persons at the present time—these people would provide the necessary leadership in taking advantage of all the measures under the act and applying them to the situation they find in their particular provinces. There are provisions in the act, I am sure, that even those in educational circles are not aware of, provisions that would assist in a real way in meeting the demands for vocational training.

May I close by saying a few words with regard to the section dealing with bursaries for student aid. I note that this provision was established in 1939. It makes possible payment of up to $400, I believe, in the case of deserving students desiring to go on to some phase of university training. I wonder whether any consideration has been given to the changed cost situation obtaining today as compared with that existing in 1939. A bursary of $400 does not go very far today in meeting the cost of a university education. In fact in some universities it would hardly cover the tuition fees. That thought occurred to me as I read through the latest report on the administration of this act.

Again, I feel that there is a need for wider publicity concerning opportunities provided under this schedule. If we had a full-time regional director, a regional representative in the province of Manitoba, many more students might be encouraged to take advantage of the provisions of this legislation.

Mr. Hosking: Mr. Chairman, I want to make just a few remarks on this resolution. I should like to read the part in which I am interested:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act to meet present-day requirements for defence and other purposes.

I like the way it is worded, "to meet present-day requirements for defence and other purposes". Everyone knows that years ago skilled mechanics spent long years of their lives, at very little pay, learning their trade. Present-day requirements are much different. First, we are short of labour, or we have been for the past number of years. Ever since 1939 we have been short of labour, and it has been necessary to use these men who have learned their skills in productive work in a manner that was not conceived years ago when we had the apprenticeship system in operation. Today we have learned that students, by adapting themselves properly in the proper environment, can become productive much more rapidly than they could under the old apprenticeship system. Thus I am glad to see the government and our own Minister of Labour introducing a resolution to amend the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act to meet present-day requirements for defence and other purposes.

The most important responsibility of any government is to provide the opportunity for the citizens of that country to have employment. Everyone has seen in the past number of years that as long as there is full employment there are good times. That is the main requirement for the success and progress of a country. Each person in the country who has been trained in one of our vocational training schools generally provides jobs for three or four helpers who may not be as skilled as he is.

I would refer to the splendid work that our vocational schools have done in turning out electricians, carpenters, automobile mechanics, diesel engine mechanics and many others in the past. Today the need for vocational training is changing. When we look around this room, for instance, and notice the number of microphones and loudspeakers that are present, we can see that it requires men with the proper vocational training to maintain this equipment. Everyone knows that unless there are the proper courses available it is very difficult for men to learn the job of maintaining this equipment.

We have television, and we have the new jet engines. The developments in atomic energy have been tremendous. In all these fields the requirements for skilled mechanics to produce, maintain and keep in operation all these new pieces of apparatus are staggering. Today it is the responsibility of this government to go into fields which, under the British North America Act, could well be considered none of their business, so that we may have at the disposal of this nation men with the technical knowledge required to keep us in fair competition, both in business and in defence, with other nations.

We have heard many times that the Russians have outstripped us in their education of scientific men. If we had not seen during the Korean conflict how they have devised machines which have bettered our own equipment, which we thought was the best in the world, we might not have been inclined to go along with that belief. But after having had a demonstration of their equipment it is easy to believe that perhaps they have outstripped us in the production of scientists and engineers.

If that is true the academic side of our educational system must be improved. Although education is the responsibility of the municipality and therefore comes under the jurisdiction of the province, when it becomes a national issue as to whether we have enough scientists and engineers, then it becomes the problem of the dominion government. At the last session we passed legislation to help increase the number of scientists and engineers to produce the equipment necessary to be competitive in an industrial way and also for defence purposes. Now we must have the vocationally trained men, men with trades ability, to maintain the equipment put into the hands of the people of our country by the scientists and engineers.

Thus it is my contention that we should give favourable consideration to this resolution to amend the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act in order to meet present-day requirements for defence and other purposes. I should like to hear the minister, some time before this bill is completed, state just what proportion the dominion government is prepared to pay in connection with the financing of the construction of vocational schools. The need in some localities is considerable.

I know the vocational school in my riding is out of date. It is equipped to perform the services I mentioned at the beginning of my speech. It does a good job of training carpenters, bricklayers, machinists and mechanics, but it is not in position to turn out men competent to deal with the new electronic problems that face this nation today. This is one of the growing needs in many parts of the country, and certainly in my own riding we need a new vocational school adequate and up to date to handle the problems that face the young Canadians in that area.

I am told that this Liberal government is prepared to match donations with the provincial governments on projects of this kind, but I should like to have the Minister of Labour state that this is the dominion government's policy with regard to assisting municipalities in their efforts to build these schools. The demand for trained men to protect the country, to fulfil the requirements of the armed services, and to make this country competitive with other countries in the markets of the world, is such that it becomes a dominion responsibility to assist those people who pay taxes locally. I should like to hear just what the dominion government proposes to do.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks in connection with this resolution. The Minister of National Health and Welfare referred to the rehabilitation centre outside Ottawa. This centre has done a great work. I know something of what it has done since its inauguration many years ago. That centre was established by the lumbermen's safety association of the province of Ontario for the rehabilitation of maimed and disabled lumberjacks, and it did great work in that respect. Then the war came along and the dominion government—I make no apology for using the word "dominion"—needed something of this sort. It was taken over and made larger, bigger and better in every way. It has done great work over the years in rehabilitation, but I think they could have gone further in connection with vocational training. They have not done very much along that line, and there is room for improvement. I hope that there will be a change in that connection.

The resolution reads in part:

—for defence and other purposes, including authority to enter into agreements with the provinces to grant assistance for rehabilitation training of disabled persons—

I do not think the resolution goes far enough, although I am glad the dominion government is ready to go along with the provinces in connection with recreational and vocational training. Today the province of Ontario will make a grant of $5,000 toward the erection of a building for recreational and vocational training, and I do not know why the dominion government should not make a similar grant. I should like to hear from the minister in that respect. They should at least give dollar for dollar with the provinces in this respect.

We have a new school in our town, but it finds itself cramped in the carrying on of recreational and vocational training. We tried to carry on this program even before we had the new school but found it financially impossible to continue to employ a recreational director. We had to dispense with him a year or two ago. If the department would come along and make a grant in aid for recreational and vocational training that program could be continued in that little town, I am sure it would be appreciated, and I think the government should go that far. This bill does not say how far the government will go, but probably the minister will tell us when he comes to answer.

A great need in the country today is for nurses. If a bomb were dropped today in Ottawa or in any part of Canada the first people needed would be nurses. They are the first people needed to help the maimed, the sick and the dying. They have been a great asset to Canada in the past and I know they will be in the future. Many young women who would become good nurses find it financially impossible to undertake the training. I think the department could go a little further with this bill and agree to pay $10 a week to every girl in Canada who would take up nursing training.

Some hon. member referred to the need of additional training for nurses. Certain nurses might require some extra training. Those nurses who go into the far north on government projects or to Red Cross outposts probably should have some extra training along medical lines, because in many cases they are a great many miles from a doctor. I think the department should go so far as to say that any young girl who was willing to sign up for three or five years to go to distant places like this would have her extra training paid for the one year or whatever time it might take to qualify such a girl for the position. We are short of nurses in Canada today even without an emergency. We could use at least 25 per cent more nurses in Canada. Something must be done to encourage young girls to take up this work.

Then I spoke of rehabilitation grants to schools. This would prove a great asset to our country and to our young people. Someone said that our jails and institutions are completely full. I do not believe our country is as bad as that. I believe that we are probably better than average compared with other countries in that respect. However, we are not good enough. Our young people should be better; and if they were given the opportunity of obtaining training such as this legislation starts out to provide, and if it would go a little further than is mentioned in this resolution, then I believe we would not only all have a better place in which to live, but the young people of Canada could be improved and at the same time assist in the future development of Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I would like to add just one word. I have listened with respect to everything said in the house this afternoon. I am delighted to hear of the good work being done, and I approve wholeheartedly of projects for the extension of such work. However, none of us in this house believe that life consists wholly in things which come from vocational training, I mean things which are made by the teaching of various skills. We know that life does not consist wholly of these things, and I hope with these young people it will be possible in the course of the development of these skills also to introduce them to some of the thoughts of the great and good people who have made our civilization what it is.

It seems to me it would be a thousand pities if in the course of acquiring skills no attempt was made or time provided to turn their minds to these other things. I have just one practical suggestion to make and it is this. I believe there is no subject comparable to biography in developing in one's mind an appreciation of these things, and it seems to me there could be no better way of accomplishing that than by providing for that study perhaps in the sphere in which these young people are being trained, so their minds may be turned toward benefiting from the thoughts of people who have excelled in that particular sphere and who also had a broad view of life and realized that it did not consist wholly of the things that we touch, taste and handle.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, before the minister answers I would like to place two or three questions before him. Incidentally, it is quite obvious from this debate that everyone in this house approves of this vocational training scheme. I believe it has been of great advantage to Canada, and it is perhaps one of the finest illustrations of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments.

The first question I would like to ask has to do with merchant seamen. I notice in the estimates for the present fiscal year that the administration item covering vocational training contains these words, "For the training of personnel for the merchant marine." That would appear to cover only those young men who are going into the merchant marine. But as the minister knows the actual situation is that young men are being forced out of the merchant marine, and Canada is disposing of her ships. The problem rather is to rehabilitate the seamen who are in that position. I would ask the minister to explain whether this scheme will be wide enough to give these men who are being put on the beach training for some other occupation.

The resolution refers to training for the defence forces in these words, "to meet present-day requirements for defence." I would be grateful if the minister would explain what changes are to be made in the training given to the men and I presume the women who are in the defence forces.

When the minister was introducing this resolution he mentioned that a change was to be made in the act to provide for substitution in the personnel of the advisory council. Under the act as it now stands the governor in council appoints the chairman and 16 members. I hope the minister will tell the committee what method is to be used for appointing substitutes. The plan he announced appears to go a long way. The cabinet appoints certain individuals and someone is to have the authority to name someone else to act in their places. I should like to know whether appointments will be made and substitutes appointed by the cabinet, or whether the provinces are to appoint them, or whether a person who has been appointed by the cabinet is to be given the right to name his own substitute. It seems to me to be going very far indeed to make provision for substitutions of that kind when a council is set up pursuant to the provisions of a federal act.

Finally, I was somewhat surprised to hear the statement that there is a shortage of vocational training schools. I hope that shortage is not as bad as some hon. members have indicated. I know in my own city of Vancouver we have a first-class modern vocational training school which, I believe, is doing a splendid job. I would like the minister to explain just how serious this shortage of vocational training schools is at the present time, and what steps the dominion proposes to take to overcome that shortage.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Green: Could I have an answer?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay my own resolution but I believe the least I can do, as an expression of appreciation for the very excellent and instructive suggestions that have come from all corners of the house this afternoon, is to cover some of the more substantial questions asked during the debate. If hon. members do not find me answering questions in detail I can assure them that I shall take the time to do so when this bill is referred to the standing committee on industrial relations. At a later date I propose to move that this bill be referred to that committee.

The hon. member for Hamilton West asked if I would state how disabled persons will be trained. I believe that was the general nature of the question. Let me state at once the reason the rehabilitation of disabled persons appears in this bill. As hon. members know, during the past few years we have been training disabled persons under existing schedules in the federal-provincial training agreements. The reason special authority is being asked in this legislation is so that we will be able to make, in conjunction with the provinces, special arrangements with regard to the disabled.

My colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare this afternoon gave a hint of the rehabilitation program which is now being carried out in conjunction with the provinces. He referred to that portion of it devoted to medical rehabilitation which he will be bringing forward again this year. As he pointed out, as soon as the medical teams have done what they can to repair disabled persons and the doctors and psychologists have completed their technical work and provided all assistance that can be given under the medical banner, then the vocational training people will be standing by ready to take the disabled person over with a full knowledge of what has happened medically. They will then, where needed, get vocational training under provincial jurisdiction, with part of the cost being borne by the federal government.

Right there I think I could give the answer to a part of the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Both at the medical phase of rehabilitation and then when we come into the second of the three phases—they are the medical, the training and the placement—we realize that there will be a need for special treatment of these disabled people, something which was not necessary for fit people who came in under well classified schedules. Hence we are visualizing the possibility, in conjunction with the provinces, where needed, of taking care of individual financial needs to make it possible for the disabled person to go and get the training. If that disabled person has special financial responsibilities while the training is being given, the program is so planned as to make it possible to help take care of that matter until the person has been able to gain the skill that can help to make him self-supporting, then the placement officials of the national employment service—who will then be even more highly skilled, I hope, than they are now—will take him over and so fit him into a job in industry on the basis of his value to industry and not in any sense on the basis of pity. These people, when they are trained—if they are properly trained—and their capacities are sharpened up, will be able to serve in industry just as well and just as valuably as do the able-bodied people at their sides.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister permit a question on that point?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Can he tell us under which legislation financial assistance of that kind might be forthcoming?

Mr. Gregg: I did not get the hon. member's question.

Mr. Knowles: Will financial assistance of that kind be given under the legislation now before us or by virtue of the legislation under the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Mr. Gregg: The financial requirements for medical rehabilitation up to the point where the disabled person comes over for vocational training will come in the estimates of my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As to the needs for the training—our federal portion of it—in the vocational training schools, that appears in my estimates, under vocational training, this year.

Then further to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West as to where the training will be done. It will be done wherever that training can be obtained, as was so well said by the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.). It may be a special kind of training on the job. There may be the necessity of placing the disabled person somewhere under special instructions. For this group, and for this group only, I will say to the hon. member for Cape Breton South that we will not be averse to seeing to it that the disabled person gets some academic training if that is necessary to be fitted for a skill.

Mrs. Fairclough: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: Suppose the person is not capable of assimilating academic training; what then?

Mr. Gregg: What does the hon. member mean?

Mrs. Fairclough: I mean that because of age or because of having been out of school for a number of years it might be a slow and tedious process. Can they not be trained in some vocation without the necessity for taking further academic training?

Mr. Gregg: What I meant was that the academic training would not be an end in itself. It would be given only if a bit of additional academic training would enable that disabled person better to enter into the job for which he or she is most fitted or could be made most fitted.

Mrs. Fairclough: I understand.

Mr. Gregg: To come to the remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I thought he was being a little bit more pessimistic this afternoon than he usually is. He is usually quite optimistic. He rather skirted around the edge of the responsibilities of the federal and the provincial governments in the field of training. If I understood him properly, I think he was suggesting that the federal government go farther back and assist in early academic education. It would appear to me that the great province of Nova Scotia, with its pride in its educational system, would look with a little bit of suspicion or askance if the Minister of Labour were to go back as far as is suggested by the hon. member in the academic training of the young people of that province; and what I say with regard to Nova Scotia I am sure would apply to a greater or lesser extent to all the other nine provinces.

But I agree with the hon. member to this extent. There is a very important point at which the rough edges can still be ground off, where the young person who does not intend to go on for advanced academic training can be advised properly, through interviews and skilled guidance, as to the vocation he should follow in life. Whether that should be done in the high school, or whether part of it should be done by our people in the employment offices, when the young people come seeking jobs, or whether it should be done by advisers under provincial departments, I do not know; but somewhere I think we can get together. To that extent I would agree quite heartily with my hon. friend.

I said a word about the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe North, but I want to repeat that if in my remarks I misconstrued anything he said this afternoon and made him feel that I was not being fair to him, I certainly regret it deeply. I am sure he knows that I did not mean in any way to put into his mouth words that he did not intend to say.

The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) gave an excellent outline of the historical background of this whole business. I may say quite frankly that I do not think any member of the House of Commons is better qualified to do so. He has been on the advisory council of the vocational training co-ordination plan since its inception. He has also represented his province on the advisory body with respect to the rehabilitation program. I am delighted to have him here. I can also say that I regret that we do not have him on these two advisory bodies. He has given a complete story of the background of this work of vocational training in particular, and I am glad to have it on the record.

To come to the points mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, he stressed the importance of co-operation between the two departments, namely the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Labour. I am going to tell him that there is the closest of co-operation between not only two but three departments, namely the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Labour. Since the beginning, three years ago, in getting this program going, they have worked in the closest co-operation and harmony. As a matter of fact the three ministers have acted as an ad hoc committee. All decisions that have been reached have been arrived at jointly by the three ministers. Each of the three departments has senior officials acting as representatives on the national advisory body on rehabilitation. In the provinces where there are now being created comparable co-ordination committees on this work, officials of the three departments serve on those co-ordinating bodies. Carrying the matter to metropolitan areas such as Montreal, Vancouver and Toronto, where metropolitan committees are functioning which co-ordinate all the many private agencies with the municipal and provincial agencies, there too the officials of our three federal departments are serving.

Perhaps I should enlarge upon that. To act as a permanent missionary or person responsible on the national level, we were able to obtain the services of Mr. Ian Campbell from that excellent workmen's compensation rehabilitation centre at Malton, Ontario. He has been appointed our national co-ordinator. The plan involves the appointment of provincial co-ordinators, and most provinces either have a man in sight or have already appointed one.

The way in which a disabled person in a province will find the channel to rehabilitation in the near future may be something like this. If that disabled person is in need of medical assistance before undergoing training, on application the provincial co-ordinator of rehabilitation, who will be in the provincial capital, will put him in touch with the medical facilities available. The co-ordinator will then carry through as adviser so that the disabled person will be able to take advantage of vocational training and placement services through the provincial and federal agencies that may be in that province. I believe that answers the hon. member's question on co-operation.

Mr. Knowles: We shall know better when we get the other piece of legislation.

Mr. Gregg: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris asked if it would be possible for young people who wished to take agricultural training to do so. I refer the hon. member to schedule "O", which he mentioned, and the second part of it which is commonly called the youth training program. This second part reads as follows:

> Youth training projects for persons from rural communities, fishermen, and those engaged in primary industries who are not served by the regular school systems. Training is given to short-time classes usually in the winter months. Costs are shared 50-50 with the provinces.

If the provinces make recommendations for training in agriculture under that schedule, they will receive the consideration of the federal director of training.

Mr. Dinsdale: Could the minister indicate whether there is any aid of that kind going to Manitoba at the moment?

Mr. Gregg: I should not like to express an opinion at the moment, but I will bring in an answer at a later time.

Mention is made also of the regional directors. The reason regional directors are not yet in some of the provinces is that there have been officials there known as liaison officers. My hon. friend will be glad to know that regional directors are now being planned for all the provinces, so they may be in a position to give the necessary publicity which he has suggested.

The hon. member for Victoria (Ont.) mentioned recreational training. I shall ask him if he will bring up that point on the estimates of my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Any co-operative plan for recreational training comes within the physical fitness program which comes under my colleague. He also stressed, as other members did, the training of nurses. I heartily agree with what has been said in that connection. It will be noted that under the plan for vocational training that phase of assistance is covered by the special grants to what are called worthy professional students at universities. Assistance has been given in the past to the extent of 50 per cent of that provided by the provinces.

The hon. member for Greenwood stressed that in the acquiring of skills or other things, the individual should not be forgotten. I am heartily in accord with him. In considering the material things, to which we attach so much importance, we should not overlook the importance of encouraging things of the spirit. As a matter of fact, in so far as this training is concerned my department just acts as the agent between this parliament and the ten provinces. We have the most cordial relations possible with all those ten provinces. I think the hon. member for Greenwood will agree that in the field of education generally a good deal of consideration is given by provincial systems to the development of the whole individual. Nevertheless, I am glad he made his point.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra mentioned the merchant seamen. He spoke of those who were being trained for seamanship, but I think he had in mind those former seamen who had become unemployed, and not necessarily those who served as merchant seamen during the war. We are in the midst of carrying out a survey across the country as to the needs in this connection. Of course we can train and are training some of them under other schedules, but we are attempting to give special consideration to the best way of serving them.

I should like to say a word or two about the advisory council and alternate members. There is a great advantage in continuity, but with busy people it often happens that some member of the council cannot attend a meeting. It did seem too bad that the province or organization that person might represent should be deprived of knowledge of what was taking place, and of the opportunity of making a presentation if that was desired. At first there was a good deal of feeling to the effect that if a member could not come it was just too bad, he would have to pick up the information next time. After a good deal of thought it was felt that there should be alternate members. These alternate members would be chosen in exactly the same way as the original members, namely in consultation with the people they represent. If the alternate member came to attend a meeting, his expenses would be paid just as the original member's would be.

Mr. Green: The alternates would be appointed by the cabinet?

Mr. Gregg: That is right, after getting the advice of the same bodies from whom we received it when the first representatives were named.

Mr. Green: Would the minister say something about the shortage of schools? He did not deal with that.

Mr. Gregg: Yes; and that reminds me that I did not reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Wellington South. He spoke of his municipality or community not being able to afford a school. Under our capital assistance plan on vocational schools we deal directly with the province. So I suggest to my hon. friend that if the vocational school he has in mind meets with the approval of the province, and if the province will make that recommendation to my department, it will receive consideration, just as a great many others have since this plan has been in effect.

To give a short answer to the question, our information is that in the main the need for vocational schools in Canada has been pretty well filled. That does not mean there is not a need for some in certain sections of the country for special purposes. This condition is reflected in the estimates for this department in the present year; the item is down, but we feel from the survey of the situation we have made that the amount provided will be enough to take care of this year's requirements.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Gregg thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 326, to amend the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR ADOPTED CHILDREN, CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Pension Act to make provision for the payment of additional pension for legally adopted children; to extend the benefits of the act in certain other cases; to provide that the salaries of the chairman, deputy chairman and commissioners shall be fixed by the governor in council; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, in introducing this resolution I should like to state that the proposal to amend the Pension Act at this time does not arise from any changes in the basic rates of pensions paid to disabled veterans, nor does it depart from any of the major principles underlying this legislation. Rather it is intended to confer some additional benefits upon certain dependents of veterans and to remove certain difficulties which have arisen in the administration of the act and in its interpretation by the commission.

I believe all hon. members will agree with me that, in general, the provisions of the Canadian Pension Act have been warmly approved and generously interpreted. And that is as it should be. I believe it is the general desire of the Canadian public that those who have suffered from service to their country, and the dependents of these people, should be adequately compensated.

Without going into any details of the bill which will follow the resolution, perhaps I might explain some of the major amendments. One which I am sure will meet with the approval of all members of the committee is a provision to allow the commission to pay pensions for adopted children of pensioners. For a number of years now members on both sides of the house have joined with the various national veteran bodies in the country in urging that consideration be given to such a measure. This proposal has had my own sympathetic support, and I must say I was very pleased to recommend to the government that in this bill an amendment should be introduced to empower the commission to pay pensions in respect of children legally adopted by a pensioner, subsequent to the appearance of an injury or disease for which he is pensioned.

I believe the restriction that has existed heretofore was in the act to protect the child as well as the treasury against a practice known as baby farming, which might have existed some years back. It is felt now that adoption legislation in the various provinces provides sufficient protection, and that the commission is capable of protecting both the child and the treasury of the state in this connection. Therefore I am happy to introduce that amendment to the Pension Act. Of course the amendment will also maintain the right to pension of legitimate children born to the pensioner subsequent to the injury or disease for which he is pensioned.

Another major amendment to the act will advance the cut-off date for the marriage of pensioned veterans of world war I. The house will recall that in 1951 the cut-off date was advanced from 1948 to May 1, 1951. This was the most recent of several changes made in the act concerning this dateline, and it is now proposed to recognize wives of pensioners who were married prior to January 1, 1954.

On this particular point I have been asked this question. Why not abolish the dateline altogether, since it is now 36 years since the end of world war I. I confess that at first glance I felt this suggestion had merit. However, on further consideration I have recommended an advance in the dateline which, I believe, was first introduced in May, 1933. I believe the reason for fixing a dateline was to protect the veteran and the treasury from so-called deathbed marriages between aged pensioners and very much younger wives who it was felt might have some mercenary motives. I must say that I have never thought this was very flattering to womanhood in general.

However, with the average age of world war I veterans steadily climbing, it seemed wiser to retain the dateline to protect the sound marriages and retain the terms which this method provides, because under the act as it exists today the wife of a pensioner who is in receipt of a pension of 50 per cent or over—that is, from 50 per cent to 100 per cent—automatically becomes the recipient of a widow's pension of $100 a month when the veteran dies, provided that she is otherwise qualified; that is, that the marriage was a legal one and the widow has not disentitled herself. I believe this generous provision merits the protection that a cut-off date for marriages provides.

Another feature of the bill concerns helplessness allowances. As hon. members know, helplessness allowance is paid to very seriously disabled veterans who need to have constant attention. This allowance is paid to them over and above the pension. The allowance can be from $480 up to $1,400. However, when the pensioner is in one of the departmental institutions for treatment and attendance is provided for him, the helplessness allowance is stopped. It has been found that many of these cases, after having been in the hospital for some time and having returned home, remain as what are called outpatients of the hospital. They are still on the departmental strength as outpatients, and the act as it exists has created some difficulty in permitting the commission to give such a pensioner the helplessness allowance which he was receiving before entering hospital. Fortunately there are not too many of these seriously disabled pensioners who must have helplessness allowances. I believe there are slightly over 1,000, distributed between world war I and world war II veterans. Others of course need to have constant attendance, but they are looked after in our institutions.

The other amendments, Mr. Chairman, are designed to facilitate the administration of the act by conforming with terms used by the department and by the commission, and they clarify certain powers vested in appeal boards of the commission.

Finally, as the resolution specifies, it is intended to introduce an amendment to permit the salaries of the members of the pension commission to be determined by the governor in council rather than by statute as it exists at the present time. This is really for the purpose of permitting, when it is felt that increases are justified, the commissioners to be adequately compensated, without it being necessary to introduce a bill. It is the pattern which is followed, I understand, in most governmental bodies set up as this commission is. Of course parliament has control of this money, as an item must be provided in the estimates to pay those salaries.

As I stated, Mr. Chairman, the changes in this amending bill do not involve any major new expenditures. They are designed more to make the administration of the act uniform and equitable and to tailor the procedures to present-day needs.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, it is almost six o'clock. I would ask you to adjourn the discussion, but before doing so I wonder whether I might congratulate the minister. I noticed in this morning's paper that today is the anniversary of his birthday and I should like to extend him my congratulations and to wish him many happy returns.

Mr. Gillis: Before we adjourn I have one question to ask. Is it the minister's intention to send this bill to the veterans affairs committee?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes; after the bill receives second reading it is intended to refer it to a special committee.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: As agreed, tomorrow we shall take the resolution with respect to the Bank Act. Then, if it meets with the approval of hon. members, we might conclude this resolution so the bill might be available for second reading early next week. After that we shall take the public works estimates and continue the debate we had yesterday. On Friday, if it is agreeable, we shall begin with the housing bill in committee and then take the remaining estimates of public works, in case the item under discussion is passed. I think it is the agreement as well that if the resolution on the Bank Act is passed tomorrow and the bill is given first reading, second reading will be called as the first item on Monday.

Mr. Fleming: I thought it was understood that, because the housing bill has to be reprinted and the banking and commerce committee completed its work only yesterday, the bill was to be brought before the house on Tuesday.

Mr. Harris: The bill will be printed and available at about 2.30 p.m. tomorrow. It had been intended to have the housing bill debated on Monday, but the hon. member for Eglinton will not be available that day, so it was decided to make it Tuesday. But we have found that the minister is not going to be available on Tuesday, so we have altered it to Friday because both of them can be present, or so I understand.

Mr. Knowles: That is very good of them.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

(Administrative)

PRIVILEGE

MR. FULTON—JOHNSTON-WESTERN CANADA PROJECT—ALLEGED INCOMPLETE RETURN

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On Tuesday, March 2, there was tabled in the house correspondence and so on in connection with what is known as the Johnston-Western Canada V.L.A. project near Kamloops, British Columbia. This was in compliance with an order of the house issued on February 8.

This order asked for a copy of all letters, telegrams and other correspondence, and memoranda of telephone calls, exchanged between the government or any minister, department, or agency thereof, and any other person or organization outside the dominion government service since June 1, 1953, concerning the allocation of funds for this project.

The return as tabled does not include a letter which I have reason to believe is in the possession of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair). I base my statement in that regard upon an article appearing in the Kamloops newspaper of January 25, which reads as follows:

Notice that a sum of $46,000 was approved and would be included in government estimates to be considered at the present session of parliament was received in Kamloops by Syd. J. Smith in a letter from fisheries minister James A. Sinclair. (Mr. Smith is president of the Liberal association of British Columbia and former M.L.A. for the Kamloops riding.)

And it continues:

The amount approved by the treasury board is specifically earmarked for the improvement and extension of V.L.A. land acquired by the federal government——and so on. It would appear that the letter was in detail as to the amount of the item, and what it would be used for. I would point out that the letter is not included in the return tabled the day before yesterday. I would ask the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) if he will cause the necessary activity in the cabinet to be undertaken which would result in the production of this letter as asked for in the motion passed by the house.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, once again I simply have to reply that personal correspondence I have with friends who are interested in public welfare in Kamloops is not to be produced here as government papers.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the Minister of Fisheries whether he regards a letter written by himself on a matter approved by treasury board for the inclusion in the estimates, and therefore confidential until the estimates are tabled, as one which might properly be regarded as personal correspondence.

Mr. Sinclair: That is a matter entirely for my decision. The letter I wrote was as one interested in public development in British Columbia to another man who is interested in public development, and had "personal" written across the top.

1. Were letters, similar to the ones sent to farmers in the Calgary income tax area, sent out to farmers in all provinces?

2. If so, how many were sent out in each province?

Mr. McCann:

1. No. Similar letters were sent in the Edmonton district in Alberta, in Manitoba and in Ontario.

2. They were sent from time to time to make appointments in a nearby town for farmers in the area. Statistics are not available because this was a routine procedure.

HEADACHE PILLS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the attention of the government been drawn to reports of infants suffering serious illness from poisoning due to overdoses of so-called headache pills?

2. Have any representations been received by the government urging that steps be taken by the food and drugs division of the Department of National Health and Welfare in an attempt to eliminate or minimize the possibility of such overdoses?

3. If so, what consideration has been given to such representations and what are the results of such consideration?

4. If no such representations have been received, is the problem being considered by the government on its own initiative?

5. What are the results of such consideration?

Mr. Robertson:

1. The attention of the Department of National Health and Welfare has been drawn to these reports by newspaper accounts only.

2. No such representation has been made by any association or organization, but the Department of National Health and Welfare was already aware of the situation and following it closely. There have been occasional reports over the years from individuals about unfavourable responses to several drugs, including a headache remedy.

3. Each report is investigated and if the circumstances reveal that there is anything useful that can and should be done under the Food and Drugs Act, such action is taken. However, the size of dose makes little difference to an allergic individual and the dangers to such persons can not effectively be prevented by regulation.

4 and 5. Yes. The department is taking steps to ensure that appropriate action will be taken to correct the situation by all means available.

CORPORATION TAXES, FEDERAL AND QUEBEC

Mr. Michener:

In the last fiscal year, what was the amount by which Canadian corporation income tax receipts were reduced by the allowance of Quebec corporation taxes as a deduction?

Mr. McCann: Information not available as the taxation division does not maintain a statistical record of the amounts by which corporation income tax has been reduced by allowable deductions for payment of Quebec corporation taxes.

MARGARINE PUBLICITY

Mr. Poulin:

1. Has any department of the federal government or agency under its authority issued a pamphlet or publication advising the use of margarine?
2. If so, what is the name of such publication and under what authority is it published?

Mr. Robertson:

1. There is no publication issued by the nutrition division of the Department of National Health and Welfare which is concerned with margarine alone or which advises the use of margarine in distinction to other spreads. Publications issued by the nutrition division deal simply with the nutritional quality of food.

2. See answer to No. 1 above.

OATS AND BARLEY—PRICE DIFFERENTIAL

Mr. Argue:

1. Is there a differential in the Canadian wheat board selling price for oats and barley as between Fort William-Port Arthur and Vancouver and between Fort William-Port Arthur and Churchill?
2. If so, what is the differential and for what length of time has such differential been in effect?

Mr. Dickey:

1. The Canadian wheat board does not have any fixed differential in its selling price for oats and barley as between Fort William-Port Arthur and Vancouver and Churchill.

2. Depending upon market conditions, the board does, at times, ask for and receive a premium over its Fort William-Port Arthur prices on sales of oats and barley ex Pacific coast ports and other export outlets.

ARMED FORCES—PURCHASE OF SKATES

Mr. Herridge:

1. Have any skates been purchased for the defence services at any time since January 1, 1952?
2. If so, how many times have such purchases been made?
3. What was the total number of pairs of skates included in each such purchase, and what was the total price for each such purchase?
4. From whom were these purchases made?
5. How many pairs of such skates were allocated to each of the three services?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2. Four.

3. (a) 100 pairs at a total price of $1,500; (b) 36 pairs at a total price of $1,224; (c) 38 pairs at a total price of $864.50; (d) 102 pairs at a total price of $1,045.50.

4. (a) George Bourne, Ottawa; (b) Murray & Co., Montreal; (c) H. H. Wilson, Toronto; (d) H. B. Kennedy, Toronto.

5. (a) 240 pairs of skates were purchased for the army for issue to the 25th Canadian infantry brigade in Korea; (b) 36 pairs of skates were purchased for College Militaire Royal de St. Jean.

HEALTH PROGRAM PAYMENTS, HALIFAX

Mr. Balcom:

What amount of assistance was paid out under the national health program, during the last five years in connection with the development of health services and the construction of hospitals in the city of Halifax?

Mr. Robertson: Development of health services, $528,466; construction of hospitals, $316,079.

ARCHITECTS—PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT

Mr. Fulton:

1. How many persons are employed as architects in the Department of Public Works?
2. What is the total of salaries provided to be paid to such architects in the coming fiscal year?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Thirty-six.

2. $217,235.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO RE-EMPLOYMENT OF TEXTILE WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister state the policy, if any, of ing it closely. There have been occasional textile workers in areas such as Lanark, Hespeler, or others throughout Canada where textile factories have been closed?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I shall take my hon. friend's question as notice.

FORT WILLIAM—REFERENCE TO INCREASE IN HOUSING PERMITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Labour to a report in the Times-Journal of Monday last to the effect that building permits in January and February of this year were nearly double those of last year, and ask if he has any comment to make.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I read the extract to which my hon. friend refers by looking across at his desk. I am happy to see this evidence of an upturn in employment in his constituency, as indeed similar news is coming in from other sections in Canada.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Can we therefore anticipate the same speed from now on in getting figures on unemployment?

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO MAKE SOURCES OF INFORMATION OF PRESS AND RADIO CONFIDENTIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. It arises out of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Wismer case, in which an appeal by Mr. Blair Fraser was denied. Will the government give consideration to introducing an amendment to the Canada Evidence Act at the present session so that the sources of information of press and radio in any future action shall be considered confidential and inadmissible as evidence; otherwise—

Mr. Chevrier: That is a strange position to take.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, it is not; it is of the essence that the wells of information for press and radio shall not be dried up.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): I will need to consult my colleagues before answering the question.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

REQUEST FOR SUSPENSION UNTIL CONSIDERED BY PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can he inform the house whether he will take steps to stop any death sentences being carried out until such time as parliament gives consideration to the findings of the special joint committee on capital punishment?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of his question. The governor general in council, in his present consideration of the question of commutation of sentences of death, carries out the laws of Canada in their present form. Until parliament amends the present law with regard to capital punishment the governor in council should not, in my view, by executive action, attempt to bring about in effect a change in the law, which only parliament can lawfully make.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Justice. Is the minister aware that in Great Britain the operation of the statute was suspended while capital punishment was under consideration in the House of Lords?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, my understanding of what happened in the United Kingdom is that for a short period in the year 1948 death sentences were commuted to life imprisonment. The sole reason that was given for the decision to recommend those commutations was the position resulting from the vote in the House of Commons on the clause in the criminal justice bill suspending capital punishment for five years. This was not because a royal commission or a joint committee of parliament was investigating the matter. The royal commission in England which reported on capital punishment was in fact appointed in 1949 and reported in 1953. During this period there was no suspension of capital punishment, nor were there any commutations granted for other than the usual reasons under the royal prerogative of mercy.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR REASON FOR ALLEGED INSTRUCTIONS TO DEPARTMENTAL STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. What is the reason the employees of the taxation division of his department are not treated in the same way as the rest of the taxpayers of Canada in regard to receipts for charitable donations?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I have not received any notice of this question. I shall answer it at a later date.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CALIBRE OF BELGIAN FN RIFLE—MEETING TO DISCUSS ADOPTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, arising out of answers given yesterday concerning the Belgian rifle. Is the minister aware that the rifle adopted and in use by the Belgian army is not the FN rifle which uses the standard NATO ·30 round, but is the FN rifle which uses the ·306 round, and therefore differs from the rifle adopted by the United Kingdom?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Yes.

Mr. Churchill: I have another question for the Minister of National Defence. Was there a meeting at Washington in September, 1951, to discuss the adoption of a rifle for NATO countries, and at that meeting were representatives present from the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Canada?

Mr. Claxton: The meeting took place on August 2 and 3, 1951, not in September. It was attended by representatives of the countries mentioned.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the minister whether the purpose of that meeting was to discuss the adoption of a rifle?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, indeed.

HEALTH INSURANCE

REFERENCE TO SPEECH IN TORONTO BY MR. AURELE CHARTRAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? As a resident of Ottawa East, has the minister's attention been drawn to a speech made two days ago in Toronto by Aurele Chartrand, member of the legislative assembly for Ottawa East, urging immediate action by Ontario on health insurance? Will the minister bring in the necessary legislation at an early date so that Ontario and any other province that wishes to participate in a nation-wide plan may have health insurance?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have been waiting for this sort of question for a long time. I am not usually caught unawares, but I am today. I can say, however, that I have seen the speech which the provincial member for Ottawa East directed to the attention of the provincial government, and I would say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that if he will read carefully the speech of the member for Ottawa East in the Ontario legislature he will derive a great deal of profit.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister agree with that speech?

TRADE AND COMMERCE—DEFENCE PRODUCTION

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he expects to be in position to table the reports of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Defence Production for the year 1953.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am informed that both reports will be ready for tabling before the end of March.

THE BANK ACT

PROVISION FOR DECENNIAL REVISION, EXTENSION OF CHARTERS, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the decennial revision of the Bank Act and the extension of the charters of the existing chartered banks till July 1, 1964, and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, the bill to be based upon this resolution provides for the decennial revision of the Bank Act. It extends the charters of the eleven chartered banks for a ten-year period from July 1 of this year. In accordance with the practice on similar occasions in the past, I am recommending a new act and the repeal of the one now in force.

At this time I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members the proposals contained in this bill for some of the more important changes in the present legislation. These are:

A provision that if parliament is not sitting during the 30 days preceding July 1, 1964, the charters will be extended until 60 days after the commencement of the next session.

A provision to increase the amount of capital which a newly-incorporated bank must have before it commences business. The present requirements were enacted in 1890 and are considered inadequate under present-day conditions.

A change relating to the issue by a bank of additional capital stock, which is intended to remove some of the obstacles which now exist.

A change regarding investments eligible for the pension fund of a bank.

A provision permitting each bank to determine the method by which ownership in shares of its capital stock may be transferred. At present this can only be done by registration on the books of the bank.

A change in the method of computing cash reserves of a bank and in the minimum ratio of cash reserves to deposit liabilities. This provision is complementary to the amendment proposed to the Bank of Canada Act which I explained at some length on second reading of that bill. Together, they are intended to give the Bank of Canada a better control of the reserves of chartered banks.

A provision which prohibits the issue of notes intended for circulation outside of Canada and terminates all note-issuing rights of the banks.

A provision complementing the amendment to the National Housing Act and permitting a bank to make loans on the security of insured mortgages.

A provision to clarify the lending powers of a bank on the security of oil in the ground and in transit. The banks have taken a very active part in the development of the oil and related industries in Canada and have been instrumental in providing them with substantial financing from time to time. The proposed revisions specify the type of loans which may be made to assist this comparatively new but very important part of our economy and the security which may be taken.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Changes in the provisions regarding amalgamations, to conform with current legislation and business practice.

Provision for payment from the consolidated revenue fund to the Bank of Canada of all unclaimed deposits of defunct banks, thereby placing with the bank all deposits of this kind.

There will be many consequential changes arising from those I have mentioned and others of less importance. I shall deal with these in greater detail, of course, on second reading and, when that stage is concluded, will move that the bill be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, the minister has outlined in considerable detail the special points which will be in the new bill, and there is just one question I wish to ask. I notice that the resolution is as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the decennial revision of the Bank Act and the extension of the charters of the existing chartered banks till July 1, 1964, and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Does that last provision cover the changes which the minister has outlined, or is there any general statement the minister would still wish to make to explain the phrase "changes in connection with the administration of the act"?

Mr. Abbott: I must confess that I have given that point little thought. The resolution was drafted by the very able law clerk of the House of Commons. I am afraid that unlike my hon. friend I did not give any special consideration to the language to which he has referred. However, I can tell him that the principal changes, the changes which involve any departure from previous policy, are those which I have indicated in the brief statement I have just given.

Mr. Macdonnell: Without contending that the minister should necessarily answer now, may I suggest that in the remarks he is going to make on second reading he might consider whether reference is to be made to the effect, if any, on home improvement loans under the proposed housing bill and also on farm improvement loans.

Mr. Abbott: I shall be happy to do that.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, it is not our intention to say anything at this stage of the resolution. More will be heard from us later. I should like to ask the minister if he is in position to put on Hansard a statement similar to that which was put on Hansard by the Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley, as appears at page 2550 of the 1944 debates of the House of Commons. That was headed "statement of current operating earnings and expenses and other information for the ten chartered banks."

Mr. Abbott: Of course that information could be made available. My recollection is that the 1944 revision of the act was not preceded by a resolution—why, I do not know. Perhaps it is because of the inclusion in the Bank Act of some provisions which were formerly in the Bank of Canada Act, but it was decided by the law officers of the crown that this bill should be preceded by a resolution. I shall give consideration to my hon. friend's question and see whether I can cover that in my second reading speech or whether it might be more appropriately made available in the banking and commerce committee. The information he has asked for can be made available and will be made available if desired.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I am going to be just a little different from the representatives of the other two parties. I do not intend to speak at any length, but I use as justification for taking a few minutes of the time of the committee a rather important point which is involved. I hope what I shall have to say may perhaps induce the minister when he is making his statement on the motion for second reading to get to grips with the one important point I shall raise, and by that method we can perhaps deal with the question at issue and do something about it.

I was interested to learn of the scope of the changes which are proposed in the new act, and I was glad to see that something is to be done to enable chartered banks to take certain securities and make provision for financing oil development. That is an important thing in our province. It will be of importance, I believe, in several of the other western provinces also, and it seems to me necessary to make it possible for the chartered banks to assist in that development. I was also interested in some of the other things the minister said, but I shall confine myself more to the question of the change in the minimum cash reserves, as related to the change in the Bank of Canada Act.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that a more important bill ever comes before parliament than the measure providing for the decennial revision of the Bank Act and the extension of the bank charters. This act, coupled with the Bank of Canada Act, lays down fundamental financial policy for Canada, and every aspect of that policy has a profound effect upon the lives, liberties and fortunes of every man, woman and child in the country.

For that reason the greatest care should be exercised in dealing with this measure which the minister proposes introducing today. It should be subjected to the minutest scrutiny and to most careful consideration by members of parliament both here and in the banking and commerce committee to which I understand it will be sent.

Our view in regard to all this banking legislation was very well expressed by the hon. member for Acadia when he spoke in the debate on the second reading of the Bank of Canada Act on February 25. He said in effect, though these are not his exact words, that we do not want the amendments dealing with the cash reserves of the chartered banks to be too restricted in degree to permit the government to institute what we consider to be a sound financial policy, that will encourage the optimum development of our resources and permit the equitable distribution of the goods and services resulting from that development. Most hon. members will agree, I believe he said, that during any long period of peace that has not been the case. Consequently, there is real need and room for considerable improvement.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I hasten to say that we—I do not like to interrupt the conversations which are taking place between hon. members, Mr. Chairman, as I like to allow them their peace, but I do believe it is in the interests of all hon. members that we have some order.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Low: I hasten to say at this point, Mr. Chairman, that we believe our Canadian branch banking system is one of the best banking systems in the world. We believe the Canadian chartered banks have done a very fine job of financing production, which is of course the major responsibility imposed upon them by their charters. We believe they have managed their affairs quite admirably and have maintained a standard of safety and liquidity which is very high by comparison with any other system in the world.

We are just as anxious as anyone else to see that our chartered banks maintain their enviable position in these and other respects which could be mentioned. We would like to see them privately-owned and we hope they will never become government-owned institutions. We do not take too seriously the declarations we sometimes hear that they will be nationalized under other administrations.

Governments of the past in Canada have given the chartered banks a virtual monopoly of money creation and issue. This monopoly of the chartered banks can and does exercise a tremendous power of control over every phase of private and national business. The manner in which they exercise that control determines to a very large degree whether our country enjoys prosperity or suffers adversity.

Authorities list about nine major factors affecting the economy which determine whether we have boom and depression or steady prosperity. I would like to name these nine factors, because I believe they must enter into any consideration we might give the Bank Act. They are these: debts, currency volume, price level, net worth, profit, production, psychology, currency turnover, which some people call rate of flow of currency, and rate of interest.

Of late years many outstanding authorities have come to believe that eight of these factors can be influenced by regulating the volume of deposit money in this country. The chartered banks are almost if not completely in control of deposit money. It is within their sole discretion to grant or refuse loans, which is the means, of course, by which deposit money is brought into existence.

It is true that the cash reserves against which loans are made are created and issued by the Bank of Canada. By varying the volume of this cash reserve the Bank of Canada can limit the volume of deposit money, but it can only use influence in the matter of increasing the volume of deposits. I stress that important point.

Deposit money becomes effective demand when it is immediately available to buy goods and services. By varying the volume of deposits, therefore, the chartered banks may create or diminish effective demand, sometimes with good and sometimes with drastic results. I would like to quote a short example of what can happen in this respect. This quotation is contained in a remarkable booklet by De Vee Lee, entitled, "Twentieth Century Economic System." Perhaps some hon. members have already seen this little booklet. This is the quotation:

> When the effective demand for goods is increased so suddenly and largely that current production cannot be speeded up fast enough to keep up with it, stocks begin to diminish and prices to rise. The first impetus upwards may be given by a relatively small increase in demand from the ultimate consumer, or it may be due to psychological causes. The upward movement, when once started, is, however, carried forward by the urgent and largely increased demands of the holder of stocks, whether manufacturer, wholesale dealer or retail trader. His action is based on fear and greed: the fear that if he does not buy now, prices will go still higher, and the hope that if he does buy now, prices will go still higher and he will reap the benefits. The result of his action is, in fact, to drive prices higher. When prices are falling, he holds off the market in the fear that if he buys now, his competitor will later buy at lower prices, and the hope that if he does hold off, prices will go lower. The effect of his holding off is to drive prices lower. This psychological factor could, it is submitted, be reversed and made to work in favour of stability.

When such uneconomic price fluctuations are set in motion, Mr. Chairman, the chartered banks, advised and assisted, of course, by the Bank of Canada, set about devising remedial action. What do they do under present circumstances? Again I would like to quote the author of "Twentieth Century Economic System" to illustrate what they do. The author states:

> The technique under which the Bank of England—

And I understand the technique and procedure of the central bank of Canada is approximately the same.

> —contracted the cash base of the joint stock banks, so compelling them—if they were to maintain their ratio of cash to deposits—to reduce their deposit by calling in loans, was always effective in stopping the boom and forcing down prices. The trouble arose when the prices reached the point of equilibrium and then passed it and the major slump supervened. Existing technique was incapable of stopping the fall in prices at the point of equilibrium. It was for this reason that the monetary authorities hesitated to check an upward rise in prices at its inception. They might so easily convert an incipient boom into an uncontrollable major slump.

There is the big problem under the system and policy as they now exist in Canada, how to stop a contraction of the volume of deposit money at the point of equilibrium and prevent the economy from going into a real depression. As I say, that is the real weakness of the present policy and mechanism.

I should like to take a brief look at what would happen in Canada when, after some reluctance—and I say that advisedly because I believe the Bank of Canada would approach this matter with considerable reluctance—the Bank of Canada would set about counteracting an inflationary danger by contracting the cash reserves of the chartered banks. They have that authority now under the amendment to the Bank of Canada Act. It is possible for them to contract from 12 per cent to 8 per cent or to increase from 8 per cent to 12 per cent. We do not believe that is quite enough, but at any rate for the time being it is a step in the right direction. When cash reserves are reduced by the Bank of Canada, the banks have to call in loans to enable them to meet their obligations. Producers, distributors and traders might therefore be forced to throw their stocks and their goods onto an unwilling market in order to get the money to repay the loans. Soon a surplus of unsaleable goods might be overhanging the whole market, and very likely would be. What was a drama in the upsurge of a boom becomes a tragedy.

If effective demand could now be increased to absorb the surplus goods, of course everything would be well. But this the banks could not do under present policy. They can only increase purchasing power by making loans to producers or distributors; but the deflationary policy will already have rendered many former customers uncreditworthy. Those who are still creditworthy would not want to borrow or produce more when they could not sell what they had already produced.

That is the stalemate. What we need in our policy is a mechanism for stopping the downward movement brought on by a contraction of the cash reserves, stopping it at the point of equilibrium, in order to prevent depression. The only mechanism that can do that, as far as I can see, is one by which new purchasing power can be put directly into the hands of ultimate consumers so they can immediately make it effective demand and halt the downward trend.

I am hoping that such a mechanism will be provided in the bill which the minister brings in. He did not say anything about it today. Of course I did not expect him to go into detail at this stage, and I shall be quite content to wait until I have a chance to examine the bill. I mention this matter now in order to get the minister thinking about the thing that is in my mind and, I believe, in the minds of those whom I represent. The trouble now is that, to save their own skins in a deflationary movement ordered by the Bank of Canada, the chartered banks feel that they have to take away, as one man put it, the parasol just when it starts to rain, and the rest of us get soaked.

I shall not speak longer at this stage. We shall have more to say on second reading of the bill when we know more about what is in it. I shall close by simply stating that inasmuch as the chartered banks enjoy a monopoly of money issue, it is only reasonable to expect that when the national interest requires an increase in money supply to meet the distributive need and to keep economic activity and employment at a high level, the banks will make that money available at a reasonable rate of interest. I think that would not be expecting too much in the light of the substantial profits shown by the banks over the years.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, some years ago I brought to the attention of my hon. colleagues the fact that in order to understand our banking system one should look at the Canada Gazette and the annual reports of the banks. They are sent upon request, but I wonder how many members of parliament have asked for them. They are extremely interesting, and they represent the practical side of banking.

There are many theories about banking, debt and credit. Everyone will realize that credit is just debt. However, there are debts that are an asset from the other point of view. Assets and liabilities are convertible. What I mean by that is that when there is an asset somewhere, there is a liability on the other side. But what interests me particularly is a tabulation that was published under date of January 26, 1954, in the Canada Gazette and which appeared in the issue of February 6. It shows the liabilities of the eleven chartered banks in Canada. I have not the report of the Mercantile Bank of Canada, which is a new one, but I have the reports of the other ten chartered banks.

The total liabilities of the banks is $10,715,-915,936. On the other hand, these are the liquid assets of the Canadian people. They represent deposits by and balances due to the dominion government; deposits by and balances due to provincial governments; advances from the Bank of Canada, secured; deposits by the public, payable on demand, in Canada, in Canadian currency; deposits by the public, payable after notice or on a fixed day, in Canada, in Canadian currency; deposits in Canada, in currencies other than Canadian; deposits elsewhere than in Canada; deposits by and balances due to other chartered banks in Canada; deposits by and balances due to banks and banking correspondents in the United Kingdom; deposits by and balances due to banks and banking correspondents elsewhere than in Canada and the United Kingdom; acceptances and letters of credit outstanding; liabilities to the public not included under the foregoing heads; dividends declared and unpaid; rest or reserve fund; capital paid up; and finally, total of foregoing liabilities.

This tabulation seems to be arid, but it is extremely interesting. In order to discuss the banking business sensibly we must get down to brass tacks and consider those official returns and available information about banking in general. With regard to theories of banking, I have my personal views which I shall have another opportunity to expound. But what strikes me is that our banks compare favourably with the banks of any other country. The dean of Canadian banks, the Bank of Montreal, was founded in the early 1800's. It has made its 136th annual report, which means that the bank has carried on business for 136 years. Very few United States institutions could compare with it. There was a time when the banks of our powerful and very rich neighbour were falling down and our banks were standing up and rendering great service to the public. Let me mention the opinion of Mr. Gordon R. Ball, president of the Bank of Montreal, about the revision of the bank charters. He said:

I earnestly hope that two basic considerations will be kept clearly in mind. One is that a competitive banking system, operating with the minimum of formal restrictions, has been amply shown by experience to be best suited to the needs of the Canadian community. The other is that both competition and flexibility can be most effective when they proceed from a position of strength. It would be doing an ill favour to the Canadian public unnecessarily to fetter the banks in the performance of their functions. And it would be no less dangerous, in pursuit of any doctrinaire notions, to push the banks into a position in which they were expected to assume risks, wholly inconsistent with their duty as guardians of other people's money, which they must be prepared at all times to pay.

This statement deserves serious consideration. Those who have read the report have found very appropriate remarks about "constructive banking", "a flexible monetary policy", "an opportunity to be seized", "the role of the United States", "Canada's responsibilities", and so on. The president of the Bank of Montreal suggests prudent optimism with regard to the future. I also commend to the attention of my hon. colleagues the remarks made by the general manager of the Bank of Montreal.

If we take the second oldest bank, the Bank of Nova Scotia, it has made its 122nd annual report, which means that the bank has carried on operations for 122 years. This is also a very fine record, and I hope that hon. members who received the report of that bank have read it. The title of the address delivered by Mr. H. L. Enman, president of the bank, is "Canadian Development is Unequalled in Free World". This is remarkable. Think of it, sir. The president of an institution like the Bank of Nova Scotia told the shareholders of the bank at the annual meeting that Canadian development is unequalled in the free world. This is a matter for thought. He also made remarks under the headings "Canada has come a long way since before the war", "High investment and consumer buying main features of 1953", and so on.

I am not going to read all he said about the outlook because all my colleagues are familiar with what has been said, but I draw their attention to another part of the address in which he dealt with the underlying growth of the Canadian economy. Mr. C. Sydney Frost, general manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia, delivered an address entitled "Production Growth Big Factor in Increased Bank Lending". This means that loans by the banks have been made wisely. Very often when someone goes to his bank manager to ask for a loan he is told that the matter will be referred to the head office. Naturally the banks must be cautious. They must show the prudent optimism or optimistic prudence referred to by one of these bankers. These men are human. They started at the bottom of the ladder. My hon. friends know very well that it is the practice of bank presidents to employ their sons in the banks as messengers in the first place and then in better positions, in order that they may be familiar with the whole banking structure. They meet other young men, become friends with them, and they learn their profession. They know their business, and that is the reason our banks have survived for so long.

I have referred to the two oldest banks. If we take the reports of all the other banks we will see that we have every reason to be proud of our banking system. I know that sometimes I have made requests to the banks that have been refused. They have to make such decisions, but that is no reason not to declare to the Canadian people that they must have entire confidence in our banking system inasmuch as our bankers have a free hand. For a time the Bank of Canada rendered very bad service to the lumbering industry when they cut their credit short, resulting in reduced operations. One of the reasons we have to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act is so that those engaged in forestry operations may have something to live on during the winter because those carrying on lumbering operations cannot get credit at their own banks on account of the instructions that were given by the Bank of Canada.

I have great respect for those gentlemen who consider that banking is a position of trust and confidence. They act in a very democratic fashion. They have annual meetings at which they meet their shareholders who are all invited to attend, and they give them any information asked for about the management at large of the banks. I could mention all the other banks. I have their reports here. I must not read long extracts, but I shall summarize the reports of the eleven chartered banks by saying that these men who are the pillars of finance in this country have confidence in the future of Canada and they are ready to help all those who come with serious representations to get credit in order to promote their own businesses.

But, here again, it is impossible for the banks to accede to all requests and grant all that is asked for. It cannot be done. On the other hand, however, management of the banks in Canada has been wise; and the proof of this is that the banks have survived the years of depression and other difficulties. Now they are prosperous, and everybody knows it.

The report of the Canadian Bank of Commerce is very encouraging. Then if we look at the report of the Royal Bank of Canada we find something of particular interest in the address of the president, Mr. James Muir, and also the address of Mr. Atkinson, general manager of the bank. They have published separately reviews of conditions in Canada and in other countries. If our trade is progressing by leaps and bounds it is due, in the first place, to the initiative of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has done so much to help our fellow citizens who are engaged in business, and due also to the facilities and opportunities offered by the banks.

I could mention also many other banks, including the Bank of Toronto, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and the Royal Bank. We find, too, a very interesting report from the Dominion Bank which makes reference to business conditions, mortgage lending and matters of that kind. These are things that should be looked into. Some banks publish in their annual reports lists of their branches throughout the country—and not only that, but in other countries as well. This is interesting, because they have afforded a number of facilities to Canadian exporters and importers.

The president of the Imperial Bank of Canada has said that the real output has expanded. He, too, has a message of cheer, as have also the two French-Canadian banks, namely La Banque Provinciale du Canada and Banque Canadienne Nationale.

I was also keenly interested in the report of Barclays Bank. My idea of banking is that the money deposited in banks in Canada should serve the Canadian people, and should not be sent outside. The danger with Barclays Bank is that it is a subsidiary of Barclays Bank, Limited, of London, and it is impossible to know what amount of Canadian money has been sent from Canada to the United Kingdom through that bank.

I had a question on the order paper, which was passed as an order for return, in which I asked for information about the assets of the fire insurance companies. These are powerful companies; some of them are American, some English and some Canadian. I would like to know if the assets of these fire insurance companies, made up of money from the Canadian people, are serving Canadian business. Information on this point is of more importance than a discussion of any theory, because so long as the money coming from the pockets of the Canadian people is in the hands of the banks, it should be used to promote Canadian business. I shall have more to say about that in the debate on second reading.

If Canadian business is prosperous now it is due to several factors. It is due to the initiative of the Minister of Finance as well as that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and other members of the government, including the Prime Minister, together with the initiative of those who are in the banks. And when I refer to the banks I do not refer only to those who work in bank offices. I refer to all those Canadian businessmen who have offices from one coast to the other, as far out as Newfoundland, men who are public spirited, who try to do the best they can with their own businesses and who, at the same time, are ready to help all Canadians with initiative who wish to make a success of any enterprise in which they are engaged.

I must add that bank customers are also an asset. The Canadian people should be very happy to have a banking system like ours, where there are no bank failures, and where the banks are good servants of the people.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North indicated when he spoke some few minutes ago that we were prepared to have the debate on this legislation, so far as policy is concerned, take place on second reading of the bill. From what I have said I do not want it to be understood that we offer any criticism of the last two speakers for taking advantage of the opportunity to speak now. However, in view of the more extended remarks that have now been made, it seems to me that perhaps a further brief statement might be made upon our behalf.

So far as these various stages of debate are concerned, no one can lay down a hard and fast rule as to whether debate should take place at the resolution or at the bill stage. As a matter of fact the practice varies from one piece of legislation to another. This legislation is somewhat complicated, and we shall certainly have much more to say when the bill is before us and the debate on second reading takes place.

However, since a few statements that might be regarded as of a policy nature are being made, I think it should be made clear that it is our view, as was expressed on February 25 by my leader when the bill amending the Bank of Canada Act was before us, that public ownership and control of the commercial banks is necessary if we are going to have complete control by the people over fiscal and monetary policies. We recognize and contend that those who control fiscal and monetary policies exercise tremendous control over the lives of our people. We are glad that some steps in the right direction have been taken. I refer to the fact that we have a central bank, and I refer also to such controls as we have over the chartered banks through the medium of the Bank Act.

We feel, however, that more social controls than we have yet achieved are necessary, and that eventually at any rate this calls for public ownership of the commercial banks. We feel, too, that it calls for social or public control of the flow of investment.

As I have already indicated, we are prepared to have the major debate on the matter when we reach second reading stage, when we shall develop our position more fully. I did feel that, in view of the somewhat extended remarks that were made by the last two speakers, we should not let this stage go by without it being made very clear that our position is still the one we have taken in the past, namely public ownership, as my leader pointed out in the debate last week on the bill amending the Bank of Canada Act.

Mr. Ferguson: I was quite interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Temiscouata. I gathered from his remarks that he was referring to the insurance companies and banks. He tried to imply that money received by insurance companies should be all kept in this country. I am sure he is not aware of the fact that before a foreign insurance company can start doing business in this country they must deposit with the federal government a substantial sum of money, sufficient in the minds of the government and others who have had years of experience to protect the policyholders.

Foreign companies, and particularly the British companies of which he spoke, have been established here for years and have spent millions of dollars in this country. Only recently a company took out a charter in Canada. The money of that company came from Switzerland. They purchased a large office building on St. James street in Montreal for something like $1 million. That company has already purchased bonds and securities in this country to the extent of millions of dollars. That same company has purchased the Buffalo Insurance Company of Buffalo, New York, for approximately $6 million. The Canadian company with head office in Canada is reaping the benefit of operating in the United States, and is bringing thousands and thousands of dollars back to this country.

I believe that if we tried to put the clamps on foreign insurance companies and others that are interested in investing in Canada, it would be a great mistake. They are entitled to earn a return on the money they have invested in the development of Canada. I do not think it behooves us to criticize foreign companies that choose to come here and make a start and endeavour to ultimately become something worth while and participate in the wealth of this country, if they help in the building up of the country.

Nobody can deny that the original companies, particularly the British companies, were instrumental in the building up of Canada's vast financial and other resources. They have contributed in a large way to the development of Canada. Barclays Bank was mentioned. I am sure that before Barclays Bank were permitted to operate in this country they were carefully scrutinized by the federal government. They are building up their position, and anybody who deposits money in that bank does so with his eyes open. They are not a small institution, and if they decide to take any money which may be deposited with them and invest it in some other part of the world, I am sure the stockholders and depositors will be satisfied with the returns they may receive either as depositors or stockholders.

I do not think foreign financial institutions should be criticized unless we have something positive to go on, unless we have some reason for saying that they are detrimental to the Dominion of Canada, that we do not want them here and that we want to enact laws which are going to try to make them invest in Canada every cent received.

It would be utterly impossible to cover the insurance requirements of Canada with Canadian insurance companies. We must have foreign insurance companies. Approximately $28 million a year in reinsurance money is taken by Lloyd's on insurance risks in Canada. Therefore we want to make sure those people who are taking the initial risk in investing in our financial institutions such as insurance companies and banks are protected. It would be a mistake to try to force them to invest all their money in Canada. They have invested in Canada for hundreds of years, and Canada has reaped the benefit.

Mr. Argue: I think the hon. member for Peace River made a very important point in his comment. That was that there is no assurance that when the nation is facing the possibility of a recession the chartered banks will do that which is in the interest of the nation at that time, namely make the borrowing of money easier. As a matter of fact the banks usually do the very opposite thing to that which is in the interest of the nation. When we are in a period of inflation it is usually quite easy for the citizens of the nation to obtain loans from the chartered banks in very large quantities.

The hon. member for Peace River came down, as I expected he would, on the side opposed to public ownership; but he did point out to the chartered banks now privately owned that if they were to fulfil their obligations to the nation they would need to exercise sound lending policies, particularly when the nation was facing a recession.

Mr. Blackmore: That is right.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre restated the position of the C.C.F. movement, namely that the chartered banks of this nation should be publicly owned and controlled. If that were done there is no question in my mind but that the right kind of lending policies would be undertaken by the chartered banks, so that an impending recession and depression could be averted.

I do not expect—no one in this house does —this government to adopt a policy of public ownership of the banking system of this nation. I do, however, believe the Minister of Finance is anxious that the chartered banks, whenever the country is facing the possibility of a recession, should adopt those policies that will help avert a recession. I believe the Minister of Finance would like to see the chartered banks of Canada undertake a policy of making loans whenever prices are falling and the nation seems to be headed for a depression.

Perhaps there is another means by which such a laudable objective might be achieved. I am thinking of the vast and valuable credit movement that has grown up from one end of Canada to the other, particularly in recent years. With the adoption in this house last year of a measure to provide for a central credit union for the deposit of funds on hand in individual credit unions, I believe the credit union movement is year by year becoming more financially sound. I am hoping that the minister and the government, along with the credit union movement of this country, will work out some arrangement whereby the credit unions in Canada can obtain some of the rights and prerogatives now enjoyed by the chartered banks in Canada.

I know as a primary producer that even though under our present banking legislation in Canada the chartered banks are given absolute guarantees against losses on such things as farm improvement loans, nevertheless in a good many instances the chartered banks do not lend the money to producers who really need such funds, and the reason is well known. Unless a primary producer, the same as any other potential customer of the bank, can prove to the satisfaction of the bank manager that he is in a very sound financial position, the chances are that he will go away without the loan. The credit union movement, without any guarantee from the federal government, has lent money to tens of thousands of Canadian citizens who were unable to get money from the chartered banks of Canada even though that money from the chartered banks would be lent on iron-clad guarantees against loss by the federal government.

Even though the credit unions have undertaken what would be normally high-risk loans, nevertheless in my opinion they are in very sound financial condition. I think co-operative ownership is one of the best possible types of ownership. I should like to see closer co-operation between the government and the credit union movement so that step by step our credit unions may be given the same rights and guarantees that are now provided for the chartered banks. If that is done I am sure that the credit unions would then be prepared to lend money in such a way as to assist the government in a fiscal policy aimed at avoiding a depression.

I have far greater faith in credit unions and the ability of people who operate credit unions to lend money wisely at a smaller loss than I have even in our well-established chartered banks. I think that by bringing the credit unions into the same category as our chartered banks and giving them the same rights the government not only would be supporting the co-operative movement, a most valuable movement, but would have one additional and powerful means of avoiding a possible recession.

Mr. Abbott: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the statements that have been made by hon. members. I hope that my not dealing specifically with the points raised will not be considered necessarily as either approval or disapproval.

Mr. Knowles: We can always hope.

Mr. Abbott: I was contemplating making my major contribution to the debate on the motion for second reading and I can assure hon. members who have spoken that that contribution no doubt will be influenced by some of the views which have been voiced today.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, before the resolution carries I think it is fitting that we examine briefly the whole question of the impact of the banking system on Canada's economy. I should like to give some attention to the suggestion raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Assiniboia in respect of the necessity in their opinion of having government ownership of the banks to ensure that people will be able to borrow money when they need it.

I should like to ask the hon. member for Assiniboia if he had been running the banking system in Saskatchewan in 1932 and people had come to borrow money from his banks to produce more wheat, would he have loaned freely in order to produce additional wheat and bring down the wheat price still lower than it was in 1932, by increasing the production of wheat? Would he have loaned freely, bearing in mind that a great many of the people who wanted to borrow money would probably never be able to repay it with interest? Would he have loaned money, being quite certain that he would have incurred a loss for his government banks? Not by any means!

Those are two vital points in respect of banking and obtaining loans by ordinary people. May I submit that those are facts which my C.C.F. friends seem to overlook entirely. I do not know that I have ever seen a bank privately owned that would refuse to lend money on a good risk for a good purpose when it looked as though markets and prices were such that the bank in question had a chance to get its money back. I doubt very much that very many banks have been guilty of negligence in that respect. There may be some exceptions.

Fundamentally there is the point for consideration in respect of the question whether or not we should have government ownership of banks. Social Crediters maintain that we do not have to have banks government-owned to ensure desirable borrowing any more than we need to have our coal mines government-owned in order to have coal produced. If there is an effective demand for coal, if there is an effective demand for money, and it is profitable to produce, you will get money from privately owned banks just as you will get coal from the privately owned coal mines.

While we are discussing this matter let us go just a little further afield and see what it was that was wrong back in 1932. Between some time in 1929 and some time in 1933—I do not recall the dates—$900 million and more were withdrawn from circulation in Canada because the banks called in loans and refused to lend any further. The main reason why they called their loans and refused to lend further was that prices were down so low and markets were so poor that the banks had no certainty of making money.

What should we have done in 1932 had we been adequately managing the banking and financial system along with the economy? Here is a right good chance to ask ourselves that question.

Mr. Hansell: The C.C.F. won't have any answer.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Obviously the answer is to put men to work.

Mr. Blackmore: How would you do that?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): By fiscal policy.

Mr. Blackmore: By what means?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): By building homes, by building schools, by building roads, by providing employment.

Mr. Blackmore: That is fine, but all those things cost money.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Everything in life costs money, even Social Credit.

Mr. Blackmore: If you were administering the government where would you get that money? Where would you have got the money in 1932 if you had been in authority in Canada, as the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was? Suppose you had had, also, absolute power, as he had not, what would you have done to build those houses and put people to work? There are many fine projects that everybody can think of; even a 10-year-old child can think of what to do if you can get the money.

The Social Crediters maintain that in a condition where you have surplus production —overproduction men called it, all during those years—what you in fact have is a lack of purchasing power, underconsumption. Where you have surplus production the nation can create money debt-free through the government—the minister of finance, against that surplus production—monetizing it, we call it. A nation can create money debt-free as was done under the Finance Act of 1914 and of 1923. Anyone who doubts what I say can go and read the Finance Act of 1914 and of 1923. In the light of the cold facts pertaining to those acts I doubt that anyone will attempt to tell me that what I am suggesting is unsound or contrary to Canadian legal financial procedure all the way from 1868 to 1934. I will challenge any one of the C.C.F. wise men to do that.

We have a lot of men, in the C.C.F. and elsewhere, who can use general terms such as fiscal policy, terms that can mean almost anything under the sun, but when you come to pinpoint their proposals and get right down to see what they are going to do—

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I gave my hon. friend an example, build schools, build homes, build roads.

Mr. Blackmore: But what the hon. gentleman did not tell us is where he would get the money with which to do it. Is he going to borrow the money? While this may sound like a little discussion between two groups, fundamentally we are discussing vital points with which we may be faced with utmost painfulness in two or three years right in this parliament. If we do not do a little thinking-through now, before the pressure comes on, we shall not be in the slightest degree prepared to meet the exigencies of a depression when they come. If the C.C.F. movement suggests that the government borrow from the chartered banks the money with which to build the houses, roads, hospitals, schools and all those things which we all agree ought to be built, then that is one approach. But it is impossible to tax the people for money during a depression because they have just not got it.

Mr. Argue: Then print it.

Mr. Blackmore: That is going very far down the road to social credit but the social credit line is the right line, and it is the sensible attitude and approach.

If we can agree that printing money may be sound, then that would be some progress. The next question would be, how much can you safely print? How much do you need in circulation at any given time, when do you need it, and when you have printed it, how much do you put into circulation in any given area? And how?

If we are going to have a housing scheme or any of the other schemes, do we require to have our finance minister print the money, or might we better borrow printed money from the Bank of Canada at 2 per cent interest? Can someone tell me why we cannot borrow it from the Bank of Canada at the 2 per cent interest? I challenge any of the wise men of the Liberal party to tell me why we cannot so borrow it. When the Bank of Canada was established it was capable of taking one dollar of gold and printing four one dollar bills against that one dollar of gold, so that there was only 25 cents of gold backing every dollar bill. But the Bank of Canada at that time was not under the necessity within Canada of redeeming that money in gold because after the suspension of the gold redemption clause in 1933 no ordinary citizen could acquire gold. We should bear these things in mind.

Would someone who knows please tell me why the Bank of Canada could not now take one dollar gold pieces or even one dollar Canadian bonds and produce four one dollar bills on each of them, and loan that money to the government or any other agency in Canada at an interest rate of 2 per cent, especially when that interest would go back into government funds? That is a question which requires to be answered. I would ask my C.C.F. friends to answer that question not in vague general terms but in specific accurate technical terms which will stand up to examination. I am ready to discuss the question with them at any time either in public or in private, and I am also ready to discuss these fundamental principles with the Minister of Finance or any of his wise men.

Let us go back to the question which I raised a moment ago in connection with the sum of $900 million which was withdrawn in the early thirties by the banks calling in their loans and refusing to advance more loans. Why could not that money have been put back into circulation? It is probable that considerations as regards gold had something to do with it, but such considerations should not now have anything to do with the matter as far as I can see. It is a fundamental fact that banks will not lend money to people who are not creditworthy, but except such money is available with which the people can buy the goods and services and the surpluses which at the time exist, then even greater distress is caused, whereas if that purchasing power were available it would serve to bring prices back up and provide work.

I maintain that even if every bank in Canada had been publicly owned in 1932, including the chartered banks, they still would not have dared to lend money until something was righted in the economy. What required to be corrected in the economy? The purchasing power had to be put into the hands of the Canadian people to enable them to buy that surplus production which was then available, depressing prices, closing factories, etc. Loans on the part of the banks would have created that purchasing power but no banker would lend the money. That money was there during the twenties and thirties, it was lying in the bankers' tills but it was not being used. Surely no sensible banker would welcome conditions such as that. He wants to lend money and he demonstrated that during the 1940's when we undertook war activities.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if there is one thing the minister should do in regard to this act it is to concentrate his attention on how to manage the banking and financial system so as to make them serve the Canadian people in case we go into a depression. I would also suggest that the one thing which requires to be done in amending both the Bank of Canada Act and the Bank Act is to make provisions whereby adjustments can be made in banking and financial policy in Canada in order to meet the exigencies which will arise in case of a depression.

I have studied every financial measure now before the house and the country; I find no sign of any realization of the need for such a change. For that reason I contemplate our present banking legislation with considerable concern and anxiety. If I might make a specific suggestion I would ask the Minister of Finance in all earnestness —since this is probably the last time he will bring legislation of this kind before parliament—to make provision for the re-enacting of the Finance Act of 1923 as an instrument to be used to supplement the activities of the ordinary banking practices of the chartered banks and the Bank of Canada. If he would do that he would bring into this house and before this country today one of the most hopeful measures that could be contemplated at this time.

When the Bank of Canada Act was passed the Finance Act of 1923 was repealed, and the Finance Act of 1914 was repealed through the Finance Act of 1923. The greatest disservice that has been done to Canada in the past 75 years was done when the Finance Act of 1923 was repealed in 1934. We will never get back to a sound financial basis as far as our mechanics of finance are concerned until we re-enact the Finance Act of 1923 which will give the minister of finance the authority and the power to create money and put it into circulation.

The minister of finance had such power under the Finance Act of 1923 and he had authority to create that money against approved securities of a wide variety.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

In the case of the Finance Act of 1914 the minister exercised that power. As I have already this year pointed out, he created $50 million in 1917 and bought Canadian cattle and horses and other commodities and sent them to Britain on loan, greatly to the advantage of Britain and also to the advantage of Canada, and there was no flaw in that procedure.

Sir Thomas White in reviewing the whole matter in his memorandum of dissent, set out at page 85 of the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada published in 1933, tells what remarkable things were done under the Finance Act of 1914 during world war I without inflation. That man went right through eight years during several of which that act was applied. That was the view of a great Conservative minister of finance. It was Hon. W. S. Fielding, the great Liberal finance minister, who caused the act to be re-enacted in 1923, at which time he said he was quite of the opinion that this act would have to become a permanent feature in the financial system of Canada. To my C.C.F. friends I suggest that all they need is the re-enactment of the Finance Act of 1923. Then if the banks will do their part, if the Bank of Canada will do its part and if a wise minister, with a wise government behind him, will use the Finance Act of 1923 re-enacted as a means of supplementing purchasing power, we can weather a fairly severe depression or we can even prevent a depression from coming on.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 338, respecting banks and banking.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR ADOPTED CHILDREN, CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, March 3, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Lapointe—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Pension Act to make provision for the payment of additional pension for legally adopted children; to extend the benefits of the act in certain other cases; to provide that the salaries of the chairman, deputy chairman and commissioners shall be fixed by the governor in council; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Mr. Brooks: At six o'clock last night, Mr. Chairman, the minister had finished his explanation of this resolution standing in his name. I wish to take this opportunity of thanking him for the explanation he gave. I think the material in the resolution will, with some exceptions, meet with the general approval of the members of the house and the veterans across the country. The subject matter will be better understood, of course, when we have the bill before us on second reading, at which time there will be further discussion. We have also been told by the minister that the bill is to be sent to the committee on veterans affairs which is to be set up.

Last night the minister told us that there would be no change in the basic rate of pensions. Whether or not this is necessary is possibly a matter that we need not discuss at the present time. However, there seems to be no great agitation at present for an increase in rate, if we are to judge from the brief which was submitted not long ago by the Canadian Legion to the government. This matter of increase in basic rate was attended to in 1952. At that time some of us thought that the increase was not as great as it should be. As you will recall, Mr. Chairman, there was an increase of 33⅓ per cent over and above the pension which had been set up in 1925.

The resolution is divided into a number of sections. The first section has to do with making provision for the payment of additional pension for legally adopted children. To many of us at different times it had seemed that there was here a rather anomalous situation. The children who were adopted before the pensioner received his pension for his disability were considered to be eligible for pension while those who were adopted subsequent to his receipt of pension were not considered to be eligible. This has been quite hard for a good many people to understand, particularly the pensioner involved.

It was contended, of course—and the minister mentioned this point last night—that there might be something wrong with the adoption, that the adoption procedure in years past was different from what it is at present, that there was danger of baby-farming and so on. I do not think there was too much danger of that as far as the veteran is concerned. As the minister has explained, under our present adoption laws in the various provinces in this country, this danger has certainly been obviated. My opinion is that the veteran at present—and the same would be true of the veteran in the past or the veteran in the future—if he adopts children, has one or more special reasons for doing so. I am sure the first reason would be that he and his wife like children. Probably they would be in the position where they had no children of their own and realized that a home without children is hardly a home at all. Another reason why the veteran and his wife would adopt children is that they wished to help out some child of their acquaintance who did not have a home, and wished to provide one for it. From experience with people I have known, veterans among others, I have found that often some near relative dies—for instance the father and mother of the children have passed away—and the children are adopted into the home of a brother, sister or some other relative.

As I said before, it was a rather anomalous situation which existed in the past and we are glad that it is being corrected. After all, when we look at the legal aspect of the matter in connection with adopted children, we find that, for instance, they receive the children's allowance and that, under the laws of this country, they have exactly the same legal rights as have other children in matters of inheritance and all other legal matters. The adoption laws in Canada are good despite some unsavoury situations which have arisen in the city of Montreal and other cities recently. We have encouraged adoption of children in this country. A thorough investigation is made to ascertain whether or not a home is fit for adopted children. All provinces have adopted a system whereby a child is not put in a home unless the people who ask for adoption are thoroughly investigated and are vouched for by suitable persons. The home surroundings and conditions are also thoroughly investigated. As I said a moment ago, I am sure there will be no objection at all to this change in our Pension Act.

The minister mentioned the section which deals with the helplessness allowance. I remember that in the committee of 1948, of which I was a member, this subject was fairly thoroughly discussed. At that time the helplessness allowance, which seemed to be and was insufficient, was increased to a minimum of $480 and a maximum of $1,400. At that time there were certain anomalous situations whereby different ranks seemed to be unfairly treated, but that situation was also cleared up to a certain extent. The reasons given by the minister last night I am sure will commend themselves to all of us, namely that many of these men in a helpless condition who are being cared for in their own homes are sent to an institution, and when they leave the institution and go back home no provision is made for a helplessness allowance. This situation certainly should be corrected, and I am very glad indeed that the minister is doing so.

Another change is to advance the cut-off date as far as marriages are concerned. In the past I have heard this matter argued a good many times in committees. I have heard it argued that there should be no cut-off date, and I have heard very strong and, I think, convincing arguments that there should be a cut-off date. There is a cut-off date, and it is now being changed from 1951 to 1954. The minister mentioned that it was more or less a reflection on the women of this country. I am sure we all agree that the great majority of the women of Canada are what we expect them to be and what they should be. But there has always been a certain class of people known as "gold-diggers", and the purpose of the law is to protect even the old veteran against this type. I think it is well to have a cut-off date, but whether or not 1954 is the proper date will have to be discussed further in the committee.

I remember reading not long ago that in the United States there were widows of veterans of the civil war in that country, which ended in 1866, to whom the government was still paying pensions. The civil war was over almost a hundred years ago. We can benefit by the experience of the United States, and it is just as well to protect our treasury from situations of that kind. But of course very few veterans marry because they want to pass on a pension to someone else. Very often older veterans remarry because their first wives have passed away. They have no one to look after them, and they want to have someone who will take care of them in their old age. I think that type of marriage is a sensible one, and one for which we can very well make provision in the Pension Act.

The third point I wish to discuss has to do with the third provision in the resolution, which provides that the salaries of the chairman, deputy chairman and commissioners shall be fixed by the governor in council. So far as the Pension Act is concerned, this is certainly a drastic change from the existing provision. For the benefit of the committee I should like to read the section of the Pension Act which provides for the payment of the commissioners. It is section 3, subsection 11, and reads as follows:

> The chairman shall be paid a salary of twelve thousand dollars per annum, the deputy chairman shall be paid a salary of ten thousand dollars per annum, and each of the other commissioners, including ad hoc commissioners, shall be paid a salary at the rate of nine thousand dollars per annum; such salaries shall be paid monthly out of any unappropriated moneys forming part of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

This provision has been in the Pension Act since its inception in 1928. I am not going to discuss here whether the amounts paid to the chairman and other commissioners are too much or too little. That is not the question at all. This is a change in the principle with respect to payment, and any criticism I have of this provision has to do with the principle and not the amounts. In my opinion this is a matter which should receive the most careful and critical study. There are other acts in which salaries are set out. For instance, there is the War Veterans Allowance Act. I would ask the minister now whether it is the intention to similarly amend the War Veterans Allowance Act.

When an amendment of this kind is being made in the Pension Act I think that to be consistent the minister will have to submit a similar amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act. If he is going to introduce such an amendment to the War Veterans Alowance Act I should like him to tell us now whether there will be other amendments to that act. Incidentally, so far as veterans legislation is concerned, in my opinion no act requires amendment today more than the War Veterans Allowance Act. The salaries of members of the tariff board, the board of transport commissioners and judges are set out in the pertinent legislation. If a precedent of this kind is to be established, then what is going to be done in these other cases? As far as the commissioners under the Pension Act are concerned, I say that they are more or less in the same category as judges. They hear evidence and judge whether or not the applicant for a pension is entitled to it. In that capacity they act in much the same way as judges, and salaries for judges are definitely set out in the Judges Act.

The action it is proposed to take now removes from parliament the right to set salaries. I think we have already gone too far in this direction. This provision will establish the right to set salaries by order in council. It is my opinion that it is time for a halt to be called to this practice. The more this precedent is followed the easier it will be to follow it. The practice has gone on for so long now that it has become easy for the cabinet or governor in council to assume a responsibility which is really a responsibility of parliament.

Although it is not altogether analogous, I might refer to the indemnities of members of parliament. We discussed Bill No. 171 at considerable length in the house. What sort of situation would we have if the governor in council had the power to set the indemnities of members? What sort of situation would we have if under the Salaries Act the governor in council had the power to set the salaries of the different ministers? I just point this out to show what I consider is not a healthy situation, and one to which I think we would be justified in calling a halt. I am satisfied, also, that the people of this country do not want any further legislation of this kind. They want the parliament of Canada, the people they sent here, to look after these matters. They are tired and fed up with orders in council and with the governor in council assuming the role of representatives of the people.

There are other changes in the act mentioned by the minister which have reference to administration. I believe I would be fair in saying, Mr. Chairman, that the Pension Act has been and is being well administered. I have said before, and I repeat, that I consider the minister and his department have been very fortunate in having at the head of different branches in the Department of Veterans Affairs men who are good administrators and who, I believe, and know, have been doing a good job.

Whatever changes are made in the administration should and must have careful study. This will be done in the committee, because we have always had very careful study in our committee on veterans affairs. We have before the committee men from the different departments of government, and men from veterans organizations, and all the facts are placed before us. I do not think there should be any change in the administration unless it can be shown to us that those changes are entirely for the benefit of the veterans and their dependents. They are our first consideration. I am sure they are the first consideration of the Department of Veterans Affairs, as they are of all members of the House of Commons. Certainly they are deserving of first consideration by the people of this country.

If I may I should like to revert to the question of salaries. In his opening remarks yesterday the minister said:

> Mr. Chairman, in introducing this resolution I should like to state that the proposal to amend the Pension Act at this time does not arise from any changes in the basic rates of pensions paid to disabled veterans, nor does it depart from any of the major principles underlying this legislation.

I claim that this method of raising salaries of officials in the department is a departure from a major principle underlying this legislation. It is a principle that has been in the Pension Act ever since we have had a Pension Act; and it is there for reasons I have stated before and which I am sure will be stated by some of my colleagues in a better and more concise fashion at a later time.

In the light of these facts, Mr. Chairman, I should like to move an amendment to the resolution as introduced by the minister. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green):

> That the resolution be amended by deleting all the words between the word "cases" in the fourth line, and the word "and" in the fifth line thereof.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up a great deal of time, but I think every veteran in Canada is pleased at the progress being made in eliminating some of the sore points in the Pension Act. I am convinced it is the minister's desire to eliminate all these sore points, and for that reason I should like to take just a moment or two to discuss a point that I think should be ironed out at this time.

In his speech the minister said that—> —under the act as it exists today the wife of a pensioner who is in receipt of a pension of 50 per cent or over—that is, from 50 per cent to 100 per cent—automatically becomes the recipient of a widow's pension of $100.

I think that is fair and proper. However, I should like now to refer to a case that came to my attention recently. We will assume that a veteran is receiving a 55 per cent pension, and that upon his death his widow automatically receives $100 a month. However, if a veteran dies while receiving only a 48 per cent pension, the widow gets nothing at all—nothing whatsoever. To my mind this is unfair. In the case I have in mind the veteran had no other income. He and his wife lived on the 40 per cent pension, just managing to get along. Upon his death, however, the department turned down the widow's application for pension because the act would not permit it, the complete pension having been less than 50 per cent.

I would ask the minister to consider changing this part of the act under which the widow of a veteran receiving less than a 50 per cent pension receives nothing upon his death. I suggest it should be changed so that the widow would receive at least half the pension received jointly by the pensioner and his wife before his death. The widow should not be left with nothing whatsoever. The case I have in mind is too sad to repeat here, although I could give all the details.

I am sure however that similar situations are arising time and again across the country. Before the minister gives final approval to the bill I would ask that he give some support to those widows who are unfortunate enough to be the widows of veterans who received pensions less than 50 per cent. It may be that those widows are more deserving than the widows of some pensioners who were on 100 per cent pensions. I trust the minister will bear these facts in mind when we proceed further with the bill.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, I am sure veterans organizations across Canada will be glad to see this legislation on the order paper, although I am sure some of them will regret that no increases have been mentioned. However, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Royal, there has not been a great deal of pressure put on in the last while in the matter of increases.

The move to place adopted children under the act is in my opinion one of the most important amendments made thus far, because the presence of children in a home is one of the greatest safeguards we could have against neuroses. Undoubtedly their presence would save a great deal of psychiatric treatment that has been found necessary in veterans hospitals. The same observation would apply to people in general, because persons with growing families do not have time to become neurotic.

The hon. member for Royal mentioned the fact that many people like to give homes to children who have no homes. It is a commendable thing, but there is no doubt in the world that no matter how much people can give to adopted children, the children can give them far more. I do think that childless veterans should be encouraged to take children rather than discouraged. Undoubtedly it would help the peace of mind of many childless veterans, and as I said a moment ago the result would be that the government would save a great deal in the long run in hospital care of some of the so-called neurotic cases.

As for the cut-off date, the minister said it was a precaution against deathbed marriages. If it is a precaution I wonder why they keep advancing the cut-off date by three years at the end of every three years. Apparently they have not had too much trouble in that respect or they would not have been advancing the date at the end of the three-year period. If that is so, perhaps the cut-off date is not necessary and other precautions are necessary. We might be able to find some better way of doing it. All the veterans across Canada will welcome the change with regard to the helplessness allowance. I know of several cases where hardship was inflicted on some of the veterans when they were taken off the helplessness allowance.

As for the cabinet taking over the responsibility for altering the salaries of the commission, I do not find too much fault with that. I have always been against order in council government, or the taking of too much power or responsibility by the cabinet. But in this case I do think there might possibly be a reason for a certain amount of flexibility. And although, as I say, I am against the principle of the cabinet taking more and more responsibility and more and more power out of the hands of parliament, I have no particular quarrel with this instance. After all, we are going to have the opportunity to discuss these things on the estimates.

When this bill is sent to the veterans committee, as the minister indicated it would be, I hope the committee will be allowed to dig into the Pension Act, to discuss it thoroughly with the members and with the various veterans' organizations, and that we shall not be held too closely to the amendments brought forward in the bill. We welcome it, but we hope that we shall have an opportunity to dig into the Pension Act as a whole rather than be confined to the amendments in the bill.

Mr. Philpott: I want to say a few words against this amendment and in support of the resolution. It seems to me that some parts of this resolution are extremely important. For years Canada has had the finest veterans' legislation in the entire world, and there are a good many members in this house who have watched the developments over the years and the improvements that we have gradually been able to get who are well aware that that is a fact. That is owing not only to members of one party but to members of all parties. We started out with a not too bad act in the beginning, but we gradually improved it as the years went by owing to the fact that veterans' measures were never considered to be partisan measures in this house, or for that matter in the country.

I for one was very gratified when I heard that there was to be another veterans' committee at this session of parliament. My observation, for what it is worth, is that if it runs true to form of past committees, then the committee will not have any difficulty in finding ways and means of discussing pretty nearly anything that it wants to discuss.

Today I want to mention two particular points. It seems to me that the change in the law to make orphans eligible, on the same basis as other children, for the benefits of the act is one of the finest things ever done in this House of Commons. I for one entirely approve the sentiments expressed last week by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam when he suggested that this country, Canada, was big enough and strong enough to be made a haven for all of the homeless orphans that there were anywhere in the world who would be able to grow up in good health and become citizens and assets of Canada. It seems to me that this small piece of legislation that we are now dealing with is symbolic. It may not be a very important thing, and certainly is not a very important thing from the point of view of money, to pass a small amendment to the Pension Act so that orphan children who are legally adopted shall be on the same basis as natural-born children.

As one who in his own modest way has tried for a good long while to have this particular change made, and one who knows a number of families who have gone to the trouble of taking on the care of children not their own, I say that this is a very great thing indeed and deserves the support of the house.

With regard to the rest of the resolution having to do with the fixing of salaries and that kind of thing, I could not care less, because I have every confidence in this government that it will fix the right salaries. If they are to be fixed by the governor in council, it seems to me that that should be all right with this house and all right with the country. We now have the best veterans legislation in the world. I think it is the aim of every hon. member on all sides of the house to keep it that way.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): I just wish to say a word before the resolution passes. I concur in the remarks of the hon. member for Royal and in what was said by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary. I hope that the minister will say something before the resolution passes about the point raised by that hon. member with regard to the widows of pensioners who receive 50 per cent and over and of the pensioners who receive less than 50 per cent. Perhaps the minister can say why and how it was arrived at that the widow of a pensioner who got more than 50 per cent was entitled to a pension, whereas the widow of a pensioner who received less than 50 per cent was entitled to no pension. The only instance of any explanation that I can recall was that someone in the department made the statement that it was put at 50 per cent so that all application cases would be covered. I think the minister will agree that there are many cases where the widow of a pensioner who is receiving less than 50 per cent pension needs that pension far more after the pensioner dies than she did during the lifetime of her husband.

I hope that the minister has carefully read —I know he has—the brief submitted by the Canadian Legion, and that his attention has been drawn to the few clauses that deal with the Pension Act, especially section 11 (1) (a), which reads as follows:

> Pensions shall be awarded in accordance with the rates set out in schedule A to this act to or in respect of members of the forces when the injury or disease or aggravation thereof resulting in the disability in respect of which the application for pension is made was attributable to or was incurred during such military service.

The minister is well aware that there are many cases that come before the pension commission in which it is found that the disability was pre-enlistment, that it was not aggravated by war service or was wilfully concealed. The comment made by the Legion in their brief is fair and clear and it expresses better than I could the reasons why the government should adopt a different position. They say at page 9:

> That section 11 (1) (a) of the Pension Act be amended so that, where a pension applicant who served in an actual theatre of war is found to have disability resulting from an injury or a disease not recorded on his medical examination made on his enlistment, such injury or disease shall be presumed to have occurred or had its inception subsequent to enlistment.

I do not think the minister or any hon. member can quarrel with that suggestion. As the minister is well aware, a soldier is examined by the army's capable and competent medical staff. He is given an X-ray and is marked fit and eligible for service. Surely it is not too much to expect that any injury or disability resulting later on should be attributed to his war service. I should like to direct the attention of the minister to a question of mine which was answered yesterday by the Minister of National Revenue. The question and the answer follow:

> Is a pension payable to a widow of a member of the forces under the provisions of the Pension Act capitalized for succession duty purposes?
> Mr. McCann: I shall answer this question orally. The answer is yes.

I think that answer will come as a great surprise to many members of the house, certainly to veteran members. As everyone knows, a pension is not subject to income tax and it seems to me that the widow of any Canadian killed in action should not have her pension capitalized and have to pay succession duties to the provincial and federal governments.

I should like to ask the minister what would happen where a pension is capitalized, the succession duty paid and the widow then remarries. Under the provisions of the act the pension is cancelled and she receives a lump sum equivalent to the pension for one year. It seems to me that this creates a serious difficulty and I would be interested in having the minister explain just what would happen in such a case. I am sure that the number of cases where succession duties would be payable would be quite small. I have spoken to members of the legal profession who have had much to do with the Pension Act and they tell me they have never yet known where an estate of this kind was large enough to be subject to succession duties. I am sure that if the minister gives this his usual careful consideration he will agree that a pension payable to a widow should not be capitalized for succession duty purposes.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to debate the subject matter of this resolution because if we were to do that there would not be any necessity for a committee. I have my own opinion as to the changes that are proposed. I emphatically do not agree with the amendment proposed. I am sure the hon. member for Royal will agree that the committee which is to consider the proposed bill should have the right to consider a matter as important as this and debate it in committee. It deserves more consideration than we could give it here. If any amendment of that kind is indicated, it should be after due consideration in committee. I am going to vote against the amendment and I make that statement after consultation with other members of this group who are particularly interested in veterans affairs, including the hon. member for Kootenay West, who is under doctor's orders not to get excited at the present time.

I wanted to let the hon. member for Royal know that, because I think on further consideration he will agree that members of the committee should have an opportunity to debate the desirability of the governor in council setting the salaries of the chairman, the deputy chairman and members of the commission, or whether that should be done by the House of Commons. It is a debatable subject and I think it should be considered by the committee.

Dealing with the resolution itself, there is not very much in the Pension Act that could not be discussed under its terms. As I read it, you could bring in almost anything as they are proposing amendments in the administration of the act. While it sets out specifically one or two instances in which the act is going to be amended, it says also "in certain other cases", which would mean that we would not be restricted very much in our discussions of the Pension Act as such.

I am not going to say very much on the question of the cut-off date for veterans of world war I, as to when a veteran's wife may be considered for pension purposes. I would imagine that there comes a time in a man's life when he needs a nurse more than he does a wife. We can roll this around a bit when we are in committee.

If the matter raised by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary has not been considered already in connection with other matters, it might be amended in the committee. The widow of a deceased serviceman is protected if his pension was 50 per cent or higher, but if it was 49 per cent, 25 per cent or 10 per cent she has no continuing right. I have always considered that that was an injustice. If a man was 40 per cent disabled his widow had to live with him while he was thus handicapped all his life. Most of them do not save very much money. When such a man passes away the widow receives a lump sum equivalent to a year's pension and that is all. Many of them are in the age group where they cannot work any more and they cannot get old age security or qualify for old age assistance. They are pretty pathetic figures, and while the pension is paid for the handicap suffered by the veteran himself, nevertheless that woman who has spent a greater part of her life living with him also shared that handicap, and whether the figure is 10, 20 or 40 per cent I do not believe it is asking too much to suggest that the government should continue with her share of the pension at the agreed percentage until such time as she passes away. That at least would provide here with some assistance instead of leaving her completely destitute, as any widow would be who has not a continuing right under that act. I would suggest the minister give some consideration to that angle.

There are many things we can discuss in that committee and I rose, Mr. Chairman, to indicate that I cannot support that amendment, because I think any amendments which might be made to this resolution or to the bill can more properly be made in committee after due consideration by members of that committee. My experience with that committee over the years has been that it is pretty sensible, very reasonable, and rather flexible as far as committees are concerned, and it is my hope that the minister will allow us to push him around this time, do important things in this committee, and have features injected into that bill which he does not anticipate at the present time.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this resolution forecasts certain amendments to the Pension Act. I will not go over these proposed amendments in detail because they have already been discussed by several hon. members.

The first seeks to make provision for children who have been legally adopted, and I believe that would be a very good move, and a move in fact which has been advocated for some years.

The second amendment advances the cut-off date for the marriage of pensioned veterans of world war I. We have extended that date on different occasions; indeed, I believe every time there has been a special committee on veterans affairs. That amendment to the act is also praiseworthy.

Then we have a provision for increasing the helplessness allowances, and that too is a provision which, I believe, will meet with unanimous support.

The fourth amendment dealt with by the minister relates to changes which will facilitate the administration of the act. Apparently there are some changes to be made which will facilitate the handling of administrative problems and streamline the administrative machinery. We really cannot say very much about that until we know what these changes are.

The fifth amendment deals with the question of salaries to commissioners. I shall deal with that in a little more detail in a moment or two, but meantime I would ask the minister to make it quite clear when he replies whether the special committee on veterans affairs is to be permitted to consider any part of the Pension Act.

The government notice of motion calling for the setting up of the committee is to be found at page 11 of routine proceedings and hon. members will notice that the motion refers to certain bills which have already been passed, namely the bill to amend the War Service Grants Act and a bill respecting benefits for members of the Canadian forces, and then it goes on, and these are the words I wish to stress, "such other legislation relating to veterans affairs as may be referred from time to time to the said committee."

I have had the privilege of serving on every special committee on veterans affairs since 1935 and there have been times when the minister, or the chairman of the committee acting for the minister, has taken the stand that the committee could not consider anything beyond the terms of reference. I am afraid that if this notice of motion setting up a committee is passed in the terms in which it now stands, when we try to raise some of these questions which have been raised on the floor today we will be met with the reply, from whoever happens to be chairman, that they are not contained in the bill. "You can deal only with the sections in regard to adopted children, the extension of the deadline, helplessness allowances and salaries, and anything else is out," we will be told.

That has actually happened in the committee on more than one occasion, and I think the minister owes it to the house to make it quite clear today whether he will permit that special committee to deal with anything arising under the Pension Act.

Reverting to the question of the salaries of commissioners and the amendment moved by my very good friend the hon. member for Royal, hon. members will notice that that amendment seeks to strike out of the resolution the words "to provide that the salaries of the chairman, deputy chairman and commissioners shall be fixed by the governor in council."

That amendment brings up two questions and they are questions which cannot be ignored by this house. The first relates to the independence of the Canadian pension commission; the second to the supremacy of parliament as distinguished from the cabinet. I was somewhat surprised to hear my old friend the hon. member for Vancouver South say that he could not care less what was done about this amendment, and he could not care less how these salaries were handled. These two vital principles are principles about which he has been writing in his column for a good many years. I repeat them again: the independence of the Canadian pension commission and the supremacy of parliament.

Why do I stress these two points? Let us look back at this pension legislation. The Canadian pension commission was set up in 1919 under the original Pension Act of Canada. At that time they were called the board of pension commissioners. Provision was made in that original statute for the appointment of a chairman and, I believe, two commissioners. The chairman was to be paid a salary of $7,000 and there was a salary of $5,000 for each of the ordinary commissioners. They were appointed for a set term and they were not subject to change except for cause. Furthermore, the commission was given the widest jurisdiction quite purposely from the start, and that was 35 years ago. It was set up as an independent judicial body in just the same way as our board of transport commissioners was set up, and I suggest in just the same way as the judiciary of Canada was set up. That was the original provision made for a body in Canada to deal with pensions to veterans.

That original charter is of great importance to the veterans of Canada today. They do not want a commission that is subject to pressure by the cabinet. There is no protection at all left for the veterans of Canada if the pension commission is not to be an independent body functioning in a judicial way. The commission was not made part of a department. Under the original legislation it was attached to a department. If hon. members will turn to the Pension Act as it stands today—it is chapter 207 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952—they will find that that provision is still in the act. Section 4 reads as follows:

> The commission shall be attached to the department and the expenses required to be incurred for the discharge of its duties shall be paid out of the moneys provided by parliament.

There have been changes in salary. In 1920 the salary of the ordinary commissioners was increased from $5,000 to $6,000. In 1946 the salary of the chairman was raised from $7,000 to $9,000 and provision was made for the deputy chairman to get $7,500 a year and the ordinary commissioners $7,000. Less than three years ago, in 1951, there was another increase. The salary of the chairman was set at $12,000 a year, that of the deputy chairman at $10,000 a year, and that of the ordinary commissioner at $9,000. In each case those changes—certainly since I have been here—were made in the shape of an amendment to the act. There was none of this business of the cabinet making the increase. The changes were made by amendment to the act. The Legion and the national council could come before the special committee on veterans affairs and make representations and there was not any hole-and-corner business about it at all. It was all handled just in the same way we would handle an increase in the salaries of our judges.

The fixed term has now been extended to 10 years. A commissioner holds office during good behaviour for that period and can only be removed for cause by the governor in council. The jurisdiction of the commission is contained in section 5 of the act. I will read the first subsection because it indicates just how wide the jurisdiction is at the present time and how independent this commission is supposed to be. Subsection 1 reads as follows:

> Subject to the provisions of this act and of any regulations, the commission has full and unrestricted power and authority and exclusive jurisdiction to deal with and adjudicate upon all matters and questions relating to the award, increase, decrease, suspension or cancellation of any pension under this act and to the recovery of any overpayment that may have been made; and effect shall be given by the department and the comptroller of the treasury to the decisions of the commission.

What is the meaning of a change such as that which is proposed by the minister? In the first place, I suggest to the members of the cabinet that the commissioners are entitled to have statutory protection in the matter of their salaries. If the minister's change goes through, then the cabinet can reduce the salary of a commissioner if they so wish. They can pay one commissioner $9,000 and another commissioner $10,000. This change puts the commissioners completely under the thumb of the cabinet. That situation is exactly what was being avoided right from the start of this pension legislation. Then on the other hand, if the change is to be used for giving an increase to the commissioners, there again you have the commissioners under the thumb of the cabinet. As a matter of fact the minister explained clearly that increasing the salaries is what he had in mind. In his remarks, as reported at page 2646 of Hansard, he said:

> Finally, as the resolution specifies, it is intended to introduce an amendment to permit the salaries of the members of the pension commission to be determined by the governor in council rather than by statute as it exists at the present time. This is really for the purpose of permitting, when it is felt that increases are justified, the commissioners to be adequately compensated without it being necessary to introduce a bill.

That change again puts the commissioners right under the thumb of the cabinet. Why was the board of transport commissioners set up in the other way? Why is it that their salaries are set out in the Railway Act? The reason is, for the one purpose of going as far as possible to make them an independent body. Why do we have our judges' salaries set by statute rather than by the cabinet? Again for the same reason, namely to make the judges of this land independent. If a change such as that which is now sought by the minister is made in the Pension Act, there is no reason whatever why the legislation governing judges' salaries should not be changed so that those salaries also should be set by the cabinet.

I repeat that my first point is that this change strikes at the independence of the Canadian pension commission and that that is a retrograde step of the worst kind. Then, Mr. Chairman, it strikes at the supremacy of parliament. Sometimes I wonder whether the cabinet have any ideas left at all of the importance of parliament, as they are always so ready to belittle parliament or to evade parliament. That is exactly what a change of this kind is doing.

The minister said, "Oh, we will have a chance to have a vote when the estimates are considered". How is that done? A vote is brought in and discussed in the chamber; maybe it is brought forward in the last day or two of the session when there is no adequate opportunity for discussing any vote. It is not considered at all in the other place; these votes are not gone over in that place. On the other hand, if a change has to be made by legislation, there is the opportunity to have it discussed at the resolution stage, as is being done at present; again on second reading; again when the house is in committee of the whole; and again, if necessary, on third reading. There is all the difference in the world between the effectiveness of parliament in passing a vote in the estimates and its effectiveness in passing an amendment to a bill. This change certainly takes away power from parliament. It is another example of order-in-council government. These salaries are to be set by order in council. I am surprised to hear my friend of the C.C.F. arguing in favour of order-in-council government.

Mr. Gillis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I do not want the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra to put words into anybody's mouth. Nobody over here argued in favour of that proposal. I questioned the tactic of proposing the amendment here because a decision in the house will militate against any decision in that committee. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra knows that the place to amend this is in committee. Nobody argued in favour of that proposal.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I submit that is not a point of order. The answer to that suggestion is this. This question involves the rights of parliament. Here we have at stake the supremacy of parliament; and the place to deal with that matter is right here and not in the special committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. Gillis: Why send it to the committee?

Mr. Green: The special committee on veterans affairs never had any trouble in dealing with questions that were referred to it, and it will not have any trouble on this occasion. But this question goes a whole lot further than the question of veterans affairs. Here you have a clear belittling of the Canadian parliament. I repeat that I am surprised that members of the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties should vote against an amendment which seeks to retain the supremacy of parliament. I can only suggest that perhaps they do not understand what they are doing.

An hon. Member: You do not know what you are talking about.

An hon. Member: Get the stiletto out.

Mr. Green: It is pretty obvious that the shoe is fitting somebody. I repeat in all seriousness that this amendment brings up two vital questions, the independence of the Canadian pension commission and the supremacy of parliament. I would hope that the house would realize the importance of these two questions and vote to support the amendment.

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to add a word to what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. As he said, this is just another instance of what we are getting so accustomed to, things being taken away from parliament. Many of us have been sitting long hours in the banking and commerce committee studying the housing bill. There we have been faced with the fact that the real meat of the bill, at any rate a very substantial part of it, namely, the regulations, is not available to us in our study. To a certain extent it is like having the play without Hamlet. We have to vote on it without knowing what is in it.

I also want to add that we have become more or less accustomed to the government cracking the whip in the house. We are getting used to it. It is painful, but nevertheless we have to put up with it. But if a matter is decided in the house there is at least the publicity, and the chance that the public will step in as they occasionally do. There have been one or two instances in the last year or two when the public have asserted themselves and when the government has had to go into reverse.

But the government is not content with the power to do things in the house, to trample on us here. They say that is not enough. Now they are going one step further, they are going to exercise power in secret, so that no one will know anything about it until it has been done.

The public will know nothing about it, the house will know nothing about it, and we will be faced with an accomplished fact. Of course it is infinitely more difficult to reverse an action which has been taken than it is when a matter comes before the house still in the formative stage. I merely wished to add a word to what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has said. This is a matter of regret to me, and I think it is a most serious matter that the majority of members of the house do not appear to take it seriously and are willing to allow the rights of parliament to be eroded more and more and more.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, first I want to say a brief word with respect to the matters that may be covered by the bill other than the one which is now receiving the greatest amount of attention. With regard to those other items, I support those who have expressed the hope that there will be a change with respect to the point at which the pension is continued to the widow in the event of the death of the veteran. As others have pointed out, it does seem most unfair that the line is drawn where it is and that widows of veterans on a 40 per cent pension are cut off completely whereas at 50 per cent the full widow's pension follows automatically. I realize it is argued that a line has to be drawn somewhere but from my experience it seems to me that the figure of 50 per cent certainly must be lowered, and I hope something will be done about that matter.

With respect to the issue which is receiving considerable attention just now, I want to make my position clear. I might also say that I do not think the hon. member for Cape Breton South needs anyone to speak for him in the house. He has established his ability to do that throughout the years, but I think that he has been misunderstood and perhaps misinterpreted by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. The hon. member for Cape Breton South—and he can certainly correct me if I do not state his position aright—was not expressing his view with respect to the substance of the matter as to whether or not the salaries of the commissioners should be set by statute or by the governor in council, but rather he was expressing his view on the strategy employed by the hon. member for Royal in introducing an amendment at this time.

As I understand it, the hon. member for Cape Breton South fears, and he has been around here long enough to have fears of this kind, that if the amendment is voted on in this committee and is defeated, then when an attempt is made in the special committee on veterans affairs to have a change made in that section of the bill Liberal members will rise and say that the house endorsed the principle of the proposed change in the vote on the amendment of the hon. member for Royal.

Mr. Brooks: A pretty weak argument.

Mr. Gillis: That is exactly correct.

Mr. Knowles: I submit the hon. member for Cape Breton South is entitled to that approach and that it should not be misinterpreted. As for the substance of the issue before us, I have not discussed the matter with the hon. member for Cape Breton South to know where he stands on it, but I think I do. I certainly know where I stand. This change should not be made, and I shall vote accordingly. In my view the supremacy of parliament should be maintained and the independence of the members of the Canadian pension commission from the cabinet should be maintained. Therefore we should not have the change in the Pension Act foreshadowed in the resolution now before us.

I thoroughly agree with those who have argued that the change should not be made, and I am as strongly opposed to it as I can possibly be. Indeed, there has been far too much moving in this direction across the years. I cannot for the moment think of all the examples, but if I took the time to look them up I am sure I could find half a dozen in the last number of years where the basis of salaries formerly fixed by statute has been changed so that they are now fixed by the governor in council. I deplore very much a move in that direction both because I think it is unfair to the commissioners themselves and because I think it is unfair to parliament. Whatever happens to the amendment now before the committee—and I shall vote for it—I certainly hope that the government will reconsider the matter. If the amendment comes to a vote, we all know what will happen. The amendment was moved on the opposition side of the house and so the government members, including the hon. member for Vancouver South who in his column used to believe in the independence of parliament, will stand up and vote against it. Therefore the amendment will be defeated. Despite that fact I hope—

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, if and when the opposition ever moves anything that my intelligence and independence tell me is worth supporting I shall be glad to support it.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member is trying to lapse into his columnist days. I suggest to the government that, despite what may happen on this vote, they should reconsider this aspect of the proposed bill and decide that this change should not be made. I urge very strongly that the change placing these salaries on a basis such that they will be set by the cabinet should not be made.

Mr. Macdonnell: Back your opinion by your vote.

Mr. Knowles: I certainly will.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I have but a very few words to say in regard to this matter, in so far as the legislation consists of changes to be made in the Pension Act itself. I do agree with the representations that have been made by the hon. member for Royal and by succeeding members who followed him in the debate, that a change should be made at this time, and is long overdue, when a widow of a pensioner receiving less than 50 per cent disability pension is denied any pension or any share of the pension after his decease.

With regard to the other matters which will be included in the measure to be introduced, those are matters that deserve the attention and the consideration of the House of Commons. For there is one matter that does deserve attention, one that was dealt with at length by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. It is the tendency, the trend on the part of this government, to centralize authority in the cabinet. And with that trend goes the inevitable litter of orders in council.

In the 14 years I have been in the house I have noticed a continuing trend, a trend under which the centre of gravity of legislation has shifted from the House of Commons to the cabinet, and to departmental heads. Year by year parliament becomes less of a governing council and more of a censor of executive acts. And we have even arrived at the point where one of the newer ministers, the Secretary of State, has made outside parliament a speech in which he has set forth in detail the degree to which parliament should be entitled to information. He gave it as his considered opinion that there were many matters upon which parliament did not deserve information. In the words he spoke the other night in his speech he indicated the attitude on the part of this government, one which has been apparent in the trend that has accelerated in recent years.

Parliamentary supremacy with an overwhelming government majority has become a memory and a fiction, with nothing left to parliament but the right to fulminate against the trend that is taking place.

I was very surprised at the stand taken by the hon. member for Vancouver South because, through the years, on many occasions his remarks in his column have been quoted in the House of Commons as championing the supremacy of parliament as against centralization of power in the hands of the cabinet.

An hon. Member: Now he is on the government side.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I have nothing to say regarding that—although it is amazing when one realizes the regimentation of opinion that does take place with the coincidence of election to parliament.

Mr. Harris: On either side.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Parliament, docile and stagnant—we wonder sometimes why there are so few members in daily attendance. Well, one of the reasons is that, after all, we have become nothing more than a sounding board to legislate and to put through whatever the government decides is for the benefit of the country.

I cannot mention any recent examples; but when members were given their freedom from regimentation to vote on legislation, it was amazingly interesting to watch that vote when one after the other supported the stand taken by the cabinet. I am going to quote from Keeton's book "The Passing of Parliament", and a statement delivered in the British House of Commons on October 23, 1950, upon which occasion the Liberal leader in the British house said this:

> It was sad to see how little interest was being taken in a matter that concerned the sovereignty of parliament by members of all parties. During the last thirty years the tendency had been to surrender back to the executive powers that had been won from them over the centuries. There was a tendency to initiate a new judicial power, to create administrative laws, making the executive to a large extent judges in their own case. The sovereignty of parliament was threatened. All the time we were being called on to surrender more and more of our rights and privileges to the government of the day. This continuous erosion was far more dangerous to liberty than any attack from the other side. We were awake to that and could resist it, but the drip, drip, drip of erosion was more likely to destroy the house.

In this country it is no longer a drip. Week after week parliament is asked to surrender its power, to give up its supremacy. What is the minister's explanation for placing the pension board as a pawn in the hands of the government in the manner outlined by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra? What is his explanation for this change? The minister said:

> Finally, as the resolution specifies, it is intended to introduce an amendment to permit the salaries of the members of the pension commission to be determined by the governor in council rather than by statute as it exists at the present time.

Wherein is the statute found ineffectual? Wherein have members of the pension board found themselves paid in lower brackets than otherwise would have been the case but for the statute? And then we have this further explanation by the minister:

> This is really for the purpose of permitting, when it is felt that increases are justified, the commissioners to be adequately compensated, without it being necessary to introduce a bill.

Just another surrender to the all-knowing, all-powerful government. Certainly I feel the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Royal had to be introduced at the resolution stage. Where else could it be introduced? Where else could parliament speak—in a committee composed of 25 or 30 members? It is a matter that affects all parliament, every member in the House of Commons. It is a matter that must be voted upon by the House of Commons as a whole.

I have mentioned order-in-council government, and the power of the governor in council. I have here an example, one that has nothing to do with pensions, but which indicates this trend to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra directed our attention so effectively a while ago. I am going to refer to it because it is a recent example of the sort of thing the governor in council will do if parliament empowers him to do it. When Newfoundland entered confederation, one of the terms in the government white paper entitled "Conference Series 1948 No. 2" was this, dealing with the sales tax on oleomargarine:

> The Canadian government will be prepared to submit to parliament legislation designed to exempt oleomargarine sold in Newfoundland from the federal sales tax, in the same manner as basic foodstuffs in other parts of Canada.

That was the undertaking. Today in Newfoundland oleomargarine has no sales tax, because of the fact that the government used the power that it has under order in council. Instead of bringing the matter before parliament they took the back-door method of the order in council, and passed an order in council to the effect that there be a refund of sales tax paid by manufacturers.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order; I do not think my hon. friend realizes that we are about to be summoned to the other place. I suggest that if he desires to finish his remarks on the point at issue he might avoid these particular points which have nothing to do with the case we are discussing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am giving examples of this dangerous trend.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I am placing before the committee a recent example of how this cabinet, once it secures power from parliament, uses it in a back-door way against parliament.

The Chairman: Order. I have been listening with considerable interest to the remarks of the hon. member and I have no wish to interrupt him when he is giving an example, but I think the example should be short and he should now proceed with his main point.

Mr. Harris: May I raise a point of order again? With all respect to you, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is referring to the passage of an order in council under the Emergency Powers Act. There is nothing in this resolution to suggest that that can be used in connection with pensions—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That indicates how far removed even the minister is from the facts. I did not say it was an order passed under the Emergency Powers Act. As a matter of fact, apparently he did not know about this back-door method himself. It was passed under the Financial Administration Act.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member will realize that we are discussing in committee a certain proposed resolution to amend the Pension Act. The terms of the resolution are somewhat broad, and it is difficult for the Chair to determine questions of relevancy. Nevertheless I must rule that a discussion, for instance, on oleomargarine would not come within the terms of this resolution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right. I simply conclude my remarks by saying that the resolution contains many things that parliament will support and should support, but included in it is another of those subterranean removals of the power of parliament and an increase of the power of the cabinet over parliament. I intend to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Royal.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I feel that I should say a word on this, not that the chairman and the commissioners of the pension board are getting enough. I have often said in this house, and I said it especially with respect to the film board, that they should engage men and pay them good salaries; they should obtain good executives and give them good salaries. That is why I am on my feet at the present time. Over three years ago I asked the minister who is responsible for the film board whether the man that they had engaged would, inside of three years, be offered a diplomatic post.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): He said no.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): It has something to do with it.

The Chairman: Order. Will the hon. member resume his seat? The hon. member who was in the chamber knows that I interrupted the previous speaker, and he will realize that the remarks which he is making now have no bearing on the resolution which is before us and which concerns the Pension Act. I must ask him to confine his remarks to the resolution.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I am confining them to the resolution, Mr. Chairman. This has to do with the resolution. The resolution says that the governor in council will decide what salaries will be paid. What I am getting at is this. In the other case they decided just what the salary was going to be without authority from parliament. Three years before this man retired they decided just exactly what he was going to get, and he got a diplomatic post, after the minister said he was not going to get it.

The Chairman: Order. I hope the hon. member will agree that these remarks are not within the scope of the resolution before us.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): It has to do with the same thing, because in that case the governor in council, and that means the cabinet, decided exactly what was going to happen, and they decided three years ahead of time.

Mr. Winters: As a matter of privilege, let me say that that is not correct.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Why was it that exactly three years after it happened he got the post?

The Chairman: Order. Really, I cannot allow this discussion to continue. We must confine ourselves to the discussion of the resolution having to do with the Pension Act.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): All I am trying to show is that I said three years before it happened that it would happen. It did happen, even if the minister says it did not, and the cabinet decided three years before what was going to take place.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: Is the house ready for the question?

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 41; nays, 66.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 339, to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

368. Quebec, $10,890,000.

The Deputy Chairman: House again in committee of supply, Department of Public Works, item 368, and the amendment thereto moved by Mr. Thatcher.

Mr. MacLean: When we were interrupted shortly before six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I was commenting on the real contribution which had been made to the discussion of the national film board by various members of the committee, not only in this group but in others. I should like to refer particularly to the hon. member for Ottawa West and the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. They had sound observations and a worthwhile contribution to make in the way of constructive criticism. It is my intention to refer to some extent also to the speech made on this subject by the Minister of Public Works. In that connection I should like to draw attention to the fact that the minister devoted a great deal of his time to defending the construction of a new building for the national film board and a relatively small part of his time to defending the suggestion that the new building should be in Montreal. I do not know whether it was intentional but it perhaps had the effect of misleading some people into believing that since the major part of his support was given to the suggestion that a new building should be constructed, it was that suggestion that was being criticized by this party and other members of the committee. I think it is well known that practically all members of the House of Commons are of the opinion that a new building should be constructed for the national film board. That recommendation was made by various groups which had studied the problem previously. There is no question as to the necessity for a new building for the national film board. It is definitely a question of where the new building should be located. I should like to quote briefly from the speech of the Minister of Public Works in reference to this matter. As reported at page 2599 of Hansard he said:

> Recommendations that the government should provide suitable and efficient quarters for the national film board have been made for some years now. Hon. members will recall that since 1950 three independent studies have been made of the board's operations. One was by J. D. Woods and Gordon, management consultants; another was by the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, and the third was by a special committee of the house which sat in 1952.
> After a firsthand examination of the conditions under which the board now functions, all those bodies recommended that better operating facilities should be provided. A specific and unanimous recommendation of the parliamentary committee was that the board's headquarters operations should be centralized in one building specially designed and constructed to meet its production, technical and distribution needs.

In fairness, I must say that the minister pointed out that none of these three bodies made recommendations as to where the new building should be located; but owing to the great amount of time he gave to the recommendations of these various bodies he left the impression—perhaps accidentally; we hope so—that it was to the construction of a new building that objection was taken.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to quote from these recommendations so that there will be no question in anyone's mind as to what was recommended by the various people who made recommendations. I quote first from the summary of principal recommendations of the Woods-Gordon report and action taken thereon, item 11:

> The work of the board in Ottawa should be centralized and suitable accommodation provided.

It does not say the work of the board now carried on in Ottawa should be centralized; neither does it say, on the other hand, that the work of the board should be centralized anywhere else than in Ottawa. As I have already quoted, it says:

> The work of the board in Ottawa should be centralized and suitable accommodation provided.

When the term "in Ottawa" is used, it is implied, I think, that Woods and Gordon at that time had no intention of recommending that that work should be continued at a later date in any other place. I think it is quite obvious, as I have already said, that there was no recommendation or no hint of recommendation by Woods and Gordon as to where the new building should be.

As to the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, they made the following recommendation with regard to the film board premises:

> We have observed with anxious concern that the various premises in which the film board conducts its operations are cramped, scattered, inconvenient and hazardous. In the interests of economy and efficiency, and in justice to film board employees, this deplorable situation should be changed.

We therefore recommend: That safe and efficient premises be provided without delay for the operations of the national film board.

I think every member of the House of Commons, or nearly so, agrees with that opinion that the national film board definitely needs a new and efficient home. But there again the Massey commission report does not hint in any way that it has considered for one moment that that new home should be anywhere else than in Ottawa. If they thought it should be somewhere else, they would have recommended that.

The third group of people who considered this problem was the special committee of the House of Commons which sat almost two years ago. In its report to the house there appears the following:

Your committee inspected the production premises at John street and found that these premises are unsuited to the purposes of the board. Your committee concurs in the recommendations made in survey of organization and business administration report of J. D. Woods and Gordon Limited in March 1950 and by the royal commission on development in the arts, letters and sciences in 1951 that the headquarters' work of the board be centralized in one building designed and constructed especially to meet the production, technical and distribution needs of the board.

There again there is no hint that the committee agreed with the statement that the new building should be constructed anywhere else than in Ottawa.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might rise at this point and ask the hon. member if he was a member of the committee and present on the day on which it was suggested that the board's operations be moved to Montreal.

Mr. MacLean: Yes, I was. I am coming to that matter shortly. What I said, Mr. Chairman, was that in the committee's report there is no hint that they agreed with the information they were given that the board was to be moved to Montreal. Therefore, as far as these three bodies are concerned, it is clear that the question of where the new building should be located was not one of their major considerations, to put the matter mildly. However, the minister was careful to point out—and I have no objection to his having done so—that none of these bodies recommended that the new building should not be in Ottawa. With respect to the arguments advanced by the minister as to why the film board should be moved to a larger centre, I should like to quote what he said in the house on March 2, as found at page 2601 of Hansard. He said:

The making of motion pictures is a creative operation. The board must be staffed by people with creative minds behind whom there is a full head of creative talent. In Canada this creative talent must of necessity come from both our French and English speaking populations. It is abundantly clear from the board's operations over the years that this pool of creative talent is more readily available in the larger centres of Montreal and Toronto than it is in Ottawa. It has been necessary to import much of it here from those centres. Of the two large cities I have mentioned, Montreal is the one with the larger pool of cultural and creative talent in both English and French.

That is an argument that must be considered, but if we are to move the headquarters of one of the activities of government from our capital to any other centre in order to accommodate certain groups of people whose services may be required from time to time it seems to me that it is a case of expecting the mountain to go to Mahomet. That argument does not take into consideration that it will be necessary for a large number of people with talent who are now working for the film board in Ottawa to be moved to Montreal if the new building is constructed there. I do not know whether or not the criticism is just, but it has been observed that that would be the largest forced migration of persons in this part of the world since the expulsion of the Acadians. I think that is putting it rather strongly.

Mr. Winters: You have been talking to the mayor of Ottawa.

Mr. MacLean: In any case it will mean that a large number of people will have to be moved. Their domestic arrangements will have to be dislocated, and they will have to find new housing accommodation in Montreal.

Mr. Abbott: Lucky people.

Mr. MacLean: It is said that Montreal is an area where there is a large amount of both English and French talent and therefore it is suitable that the headquarters of the film board should be moved there because the board's production consists of both English and French films. It can be said that there is a vast amount of talent required in parliament and that our production is in both English and French, and therefore if you follow the argument advanced with respect to the film board to its logical conclusion the day may come when it will be necessary to move the House of Commons from Ottawa. That is again an extreme case, but I think it is following the reasoning to its logical conclusion.

With respect to when the decision was made that the film board should be moved to Montreal, the Minister of Public Works gave a quotation from the brief presented to the special committee by Mr. Irwin, the then commissioner, which interested me. Mr. Irwin had this to say, as quoted by the minister at page 2601 of Hansard of March 2:

> On February 8 last, the minister of resources and development, Hon. Mr. Winters, announced that after detailed study of fifteen possible sites in the Montreal area—

—a certain site was considered suitable. The thing that strikes me about that is that there is no mention made at that early date of examining any other sites. It seems to me that the decision had already been made by somebody prior to May, 1952, that the building would be in Montreal because apparently all fifteen possible sites that were investigated were in Montreal. None of them was in Ottawa or anywhere else. Therefore the decision must have already been made. It is true that some arguments were presented by Mr. Irwin as to the advantages of having the national film board in a large city, but here again it is a matter of degree. He does not say that these advantages pertain only to a city larger than Ottawa or that they all obtain in a city the size of Montreal. During the sittings of the special committee on the national film board of May, 1952, Mr. Irwin was asked the following question, as found at page 88 of the report of the proceedings of the committee:

> Mr. Fraser: Your distribution will be made from Montreal?
> The Witness: Yes.
> Mr. Dinsdale: What is the reason for locating in Montreal?
> The Witness: That is a matter of policy, sir, and I do not know whether or not I should review it.
> Mr. MacLean: From a technical point of view is it necessary for you to be in a large city, or is it advantageous?
> The Chairman: I think that Mr. Irwin might comment on the relative use to his organization of a large city as compared with some other city. That would be a general type of question.
> The Witness: As I understand it, sir, these are some of the considerations which lie behind the policy decision. Film production, to begin with, is a manufacturing process, the heart of which is a creative function which has to be manned by creative people. Ottawa, whatever other advantages it has, is a relatively small community and it does not attract many people of the particular kind you need to man the heart of the board's operation. I am thinking of musicians, composers, actors, writers, designers—the whole gamut of the type of people you need in motion picture making.

He went on to say that it was possible that at a future date it would be necessary for the film board to produce films for television broadcasting, and that since the main headquarters of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation were in Montreal it would be advantageous for the film board to be there as well. I do not think it is a valid argument that because one element of our government services is moved to one place you should follow suit with something else. That can become a vicious thing. It is like the camel getting his head in the tent. It could then be argued at a later time that if we had a national theatre it should not be in the capital because these people with special talents are not in the capital. You could go on from there indefinitely.

The main argument made by Mr. Irwin was that in a larger city you have a large pool of talent from which you can draw. I would be interested in knowing if even now that type of talent is readily available in Montreal. I believe that in the case of recording it is more advantageous to go to New York to have music recorded for films. Therefore the argument is weakened to a certain extent.

I should like to deal very briefly, Mr. Chairman, with some of the arguments which seem pretty apparent to me as to why the film board or, as a matter of fact, most new and expensive buildings should not be located in a very large city. To begin with, the cost of land is extremely high. We have been told already that the land will cost at least $256,000, and it may cost as much as $286,000. The particular site has the disadvantage that it is near an aircraft plant where jet engines are being tested and jet aircraft flown from time to time. The new building will require special sound-proofing to make the operations of the film board possible in that locality.

Mr. Winters: There will be no more sound-proofing required than in any other location, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacLean: I am sorry. I was under the impression that that had been said. If I am wrong, I stand corrected. I thank the minister for pointing that out.

There is another consideration, however, that some may consider farfetched. I warn the committee that many people will consider it farfetched, but I do not think it is. We must keep in mind that the city of Montreal is an area in which there are aircraft plants. It is a very important railway centre, and one of our most important ports. Great oil storage plants are located there, as are depots for some of the armed services. There is a large and highly skilled labour force in that city. In other words, Montreal is a choice target, perhaps one of the choicest on the North American continent, for an atomic bomb attack. I am certain that if Russia has any plans to use a hydrogen bomb, Montreal would be one of the prime targets, from a tactical standpoint.

Mr. Sinclair: Ottawa would be No. 1.

Mr. MacLean: Ottawa may be No. 1, but I am coming to that.

Mr. Lennard: No, Hamilton, the steel centre, would be No. 1.

Mr. Sinclair: Quit bragging.

Mr. MacLean: If that is an impossibility, then a great proportion of our defence effort makes no sense. Our whole defence against the possibility of a bombing attack from the north is senseless, if that is not a possibility. Therefore it is a very real consideration which must be kept in mind. I think, too, that if we are to have a capital city in our country, the head of every department and branch of government should, if at all possible, operate from that capital.

It is true that the film board is not a department of government; nevertheless it is not very different from a department of government. Governmental departments have top civil servants who are answerable to ministers, and the same is true of the film board. I think every activity of government which has for its purpose the carrying on of some function applicable to the whole country should, if at all possible, have its operations directed from the capital.

I think therefore the arguments advanced back in the nineteenth century when Queen Victoria suggested Bytown as the nation's capital, the capital of this new country, were sound arguments. It was pointed out that Bytown was on the Ottawa river at the junction point of the two great racial groups in this country. And I think the arguments advanced in that day for selecting Ottawa as our capital are equally true today.

As I said earlier, in my opinion every activity of government should be carried on here, if at all possible. After all, if Ottawa is our capital in name it should also be our capital in fact.

The question has arisen as to whether Ottawa would be the No. 1 bombing target in Canada, in the event of an atomic attack. I think this does not enter into the argument, because I would say and recommend that if the film board building were to be built in Ottawa it should not be built right in the city, but rather at some point in the capital area removed some ten or fifteen miles from the Peace Tower. Indeed, I think that principle should be carried out in all of our large cities. We are coming to the place where we would be foolish if we were to place all our eggs in one basket, or to locate buildings where a large percentage of our industrial effort and governmental services could be wiped out by the dropping of just one atomic bomb in the right spot.

So, Mr. Chairman, in closing I should like to quote briefly from the statement made on January 19 by the Prime Minister when he said:

> No decision has been reached in that regard—

He was speaking as to the location of the new building.

> —but until the government comes to parliament with a definite recommendation for a definite amount to be expended for a building at a definite place there is always a possibility that changes in the recommendation may be made.

I am delighted to realize that. In all sincerity I hope that this statement still stands, and there is still a possibility of reconsidering this matter. In the name of good sense and good government, and in the interests of our national capital, I appeal to the minister to reconsider the matter so that the item may be withdrawn in its present form and a recommendation brought before the house for the building of a new national film board building in the Ottawa area. If this is done I believe it will meet with the sincere approval of the vast majority of members in the house.

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Chairman, as one member from the Montreal district who was very active in urging the government to transfer the main building of the national film board to the Montreal area, I am naturally delighted to think that the government is about to follow through.

I have read with a great deal of interest the debate which took place here on Tuesday of this week and, if I have read correctly, it would seem to me we can all agree as to the purposes of the national film board, that the job it has done up to the present time has been an excellent one, and that the Minister of Public Works is certainly to be congratulated because, having taken over the film board in 1948, when it was at a very low state—and I emphasize the word "low"—he has brought it to a position where most of us will agree that it is a credit not only to itself but to the country as a whole.

Further than that, he was responsible for bringing in Mr. Arthur Irwin, son of the Rev. Alexander Irwin, who became the chairman of the national film board after he gave up the editorship of Maclean's magazine. Under Arthur Irwin certain policies were decided upon and put into force and effect which have brought that organization to the forefront in the production of films in North America. I think that act of constructive policy will be carried out under Dr. Trueman, who is a native son of New Brunswick and a past president of the University of New Brunswick, and who has given ample evidence of his capacity for the job which he now holds.

If I read the debates properly, I say that the only question that we seem to disagree upon at all is whether the location of the production facilities should be in the Montreal area or should be retained in the Ottawa district. It seems to me that a great deal of agitation on this subject has been whipped up and brought about by a certain few disgruntled employees of the national film board. I should like to refer to a letter which is signed "a film board wife" and which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on Monday, February 22, 1954. Of course, I am not going to read it all, but one or two extracts will present the point of view of some of the employees—I hasten to add, I am sure not of a majority by any means. It is rather interesting, and among other things the film board wife says:

> Any number of reasons have been given proving conclusively that the operation and function of the film board can be carried out far better in Ottawa than anywhere else—in fact, only in Ottawa.

Then she goes on:

> There are so many things about Ottawa that we love.

And this might amuse the committee for a minute:

> To be sentimental, the Gatineau hills across the river, the sound of the carillon on a hot summer night, Stanley Wong's restaurant, Rockcliffe park on a Sunday morning in January, Byward market in August, Jack Kash's concerts both junior and senior, and the brave new world of the CRT, the flowers that bloom and bloom from April until November everywhere throughout the city, the lions on the post office, the gay abandon of confusion square—many intangible things.

I see she did not put the mayor of Ottawa in there. She goes on:

> What lies ahead if we move to Montreal? First, we must sell our house—at a considerable loss . . . then we must try to find another one somewhere on the island of Montreal. Shall it be a jerry-built model in a row of fifty others, all exactly the same? Or shall we live in the slums and have our children play on the streets?

Then later:

> Of course, the staff of the film board can huddle together in a tight little inbred bunch—but where then are the great artistic and cultural advantages of cosmopolitan Montreal which seem to bulk so large in the minds of cabinet ministers who insist we should be better off out of civil service Ottawa?
> Members of the film board staff are not going to experience any spiritual uplift from working in industrial Ville Saint-Laurent, and since they will be living under worse housing conditions than in Ottawa, this cannot help but affect their work, to say nothing of the strain it will put on family relations.

Mr. Winters: Who signed the letter?

Mr. Macnaughton: The wife of a film board employee.

Mr. Winters: Does it give the name?

Mr. Macnaughton: No, the name was not signed because the editor put a note at the top of the letter:

> The wife of N.F.B. employee tells what the move to Montreal means in human terms.

And then he said that obviously he did not want to give the name but that he has the name on file. The letter goes on ad nauseam.

Far be it from me to list here certain of the advantages for those of us who happen to be located in the city of Montreal; but I would say that at least in Montreal we have the advantage of a dual culture and in so far as the town of St. Laurent is concerned we have plenty of good housing, most of it constructed under the National Housing Act. We have plenty of good schools, both regular and separate, English and French and Jewish, and we have one of the oldest preparatory colleges in the Dominion of Canada, namely college St.-Laurent. We have parks and we have churches, and we also have the new member for Dollard constituency, who will certainly be there eager and willing to receive those employees.

I say, further, it is the custom of people who work for private companies and organizations that if the company decides to move its headquarters you go along and move with the company; and if you do not want to move you have the privilege of resigning and looking for a job with greater security and perhaps greater pay elsewhere.

Mr. Charlton: That is it.

Mr. Macnaughton: We feel that the national film board has expanded far beyond its original purposes. It is true that we are busy making films in Canada, but there is another developing market, namely, the process of making television films not only for the Canadian market but for the growing and vastly superior United States market. I am told that many United States television companies and outlets are now coming in large numbers to the national film board seeking national film board television films because they are better. Certainly, it will be the big business of the future, and part of the job of the national film board will be to produce those good films and also to sell them at a profit.

That brings us right down to the basic question at issue. The film board has grown immensely during the last few years, and the question is primarily one of production and commerce. The problem of location of the production facilities is best solved by locating in Montreal. One of my reasons for that statement is that I believe we shall produce better films because in the city of Montreal, being a large city, naturally we shall have greater sources of material. It will be possible to have much closer co-operation with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is becoming an increasingly larger user of television films. Furthermore, Montreal is the natural location because of its close contact with the outlets for distribution. Also in that location you have close contacts with the United States sources of supply of materials, and also close contacts to sell to the United States market.

I am informed that at the present time several crews of the national film board are now working in the Montreal area, and also that the large United States film companies, together with most of the Canadian film companies, are located in that area, as are the large film suppliers. In other words, you will have a two-way flow of raw materials and finished products. It seems to me that commercially it is a sensible thing to go to the market where you can produce better and at a much cheaper price and where your chances of outlets for sales and contact for raw material increase.

If I understood him correctly, the hon. member for Queens, Prince Edward Island, said in effect that the special committee gave no hint that they agreed the building should be erected in Montreal. That was also elaborated on by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. In order to set the record straight, I shall try in a few seconds to prove that during the hearing of witnesses by the special parliamentary committee that subject was dealt with. At page 33 of the record we find that Mr. Browne posed the following question:

> Q. How far has that project gone?
> A. The minister may wish to answer that question.
> Hon. Mr. Winters: We acquired land in Montreal, and plans are being prepared for a building to be built at some time on that site.

At page 36 of the same record is given a summary of a number of the recommendations of the Woods-Gordon report. The hon. member for Peterborough asked that that summary be filed. Item 11 of the recommendation reads:

> The work of the board in Ottawa should be centralized and suitable accommodation provided.

Item 11 of action taken reads:

> The minister of resources and development has announced that a site has been obtained in Ville Saint-Laurent, a suburb of Montreal, for a proposed new building for the board. An amount is contained in the 1952-53 estimates for the Department of Public Works for the preparation of working plans for such a building.

[Mr. Macnaughton.]

Then on June 3, 1952, under the heading of "Minutes of Proceedings", as reported on page 79, we find, among other things, the following:

> On motion of Mr. Carter,
> Ordered,—That the subcommittee on agenda draft a "Report to the House" for consideration at the next committee meeting.

Then on June 24, 1952, as reported on the same page of the report:

> The said draft report was considered and with minor amendments was adopted unanimously by the committee.
> On motion of Mr. Boisvert,
> Ordered,—That the "Draft Report", as adopted unanimously, be submitted to the house.

So I think that the charge that members sitting on the other side were ill informed as to the intentions of the government with respect to the national film board cannot be substantiated.

I think it is obvious that in Canada we have a bilingual country. The national film board is serving, not only English but also French-speaking Canadians. I maintain that the national film board needs the stimulus of a large city of dual culture. I think it is important that the employees of the national film board keep on top of the ball, that they keep close to the movie industry in this country, and that they maintain a close liaison with the new techniques in art and with the new techniques in the production of film, both for the screen and for television.

At this stage I think it might serve some purpose if I recalled to your attention the words of the former chairman of the film board, which appear on page 21 of the proceedings of the special parliamentary committee, 1952. I quote:

> You have heard, gentlemen, something about our operations and our problems.
> What's the purpose behind all this activity?
> The Canadian Image
> In so great an area as Canada, with a relatively small population, we, as Canadians, can achieve an abiding national identity only if we cherish those things we hold in common while understanding those things wherein we differ—region from region, race from race, interest from interest.
> A nation is more than a geographical area. As Canada has proved, it may be more than a single racial group. A nation is a set of values, a belief, a common body of thought.
> To fulfil the belief which is Canada, we must steadily nourish the paradox of unity with diversity which characterizes our life as people.
> The board's films, I believe, contribute substantially to that nourishment by stimulating in Canadians pride in their achievements, by projecting their growing sense of oneness while portraying their diversities, by interpreting the parts to the whole and the whole to the parts, by holding up images of the Canadian past, the present and the long road that leads to the future.
> Canada is on the march to great new achievement. In the film medium, certainly one of the most potent information media available today, only Canadian films can record and interpret those achievements.

The national film board is now truly a national board, not only portraying departmental activities of the government but interpreting Canada to Canadians, interpreting Canada to the United States, in fact interpreting Canada to the world. The national film board has left its purely governmental role and it should seek the larger horizons. With the head office still in Ottawa, but the production facilities located in Montreal, the national film board is taking a forward step to even greater success.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. I am glad that this amendment does not reduce the vote to $1 because that would eliminate the work being done by the national film board, but it does reduce it by the amount necessary to move the national film board to Montreal. I do not think there is any intention in moving this amendment to say that there is not a need for a central building in which the film board could operate. I think the intent of the amendment is to prevent a move from Ottawa to Montreal. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration made a statement on March 2, 1954, and I quote from page 2577 of Hansard as follows:

> The board therefore presented to us over the past three or four years urgent requests for the construction of a suitable building.

I am sure that there is not one member in this section of the house who would oppose a grant sufficient to carry out that objective. We are vitally interested in how the move to Montreal is going to affect the operations of the national film board. We had some suspicions, and these were confirmed by the hon. member for Mount Royal, who has just admitted that he had considerable influence in bringing about this move. We all know that Mount Royal is near if not in the city of Montreal.

I rose more to refer to the satisfaction which the people of Canada obtain from the activities of the national film board rather than to specifically object or partially object to this move, which I understand is well under way with the awarding of the contract. We appreciate the activities of the film board in making many films available to Canadians living in outlying areas. Otherwise these people would see very few films during the year. The activities of the local film organizations working in co-operation with the national film board have been of great benefit to people in rural areas. I think the national film board is doing a great job and I hope it will do an even greater one in breaking down the isolationist thinking which still goes on in the minds of many Canadians.

The question of bilingualism has been raised. I should be happy to see 300 films made in the western half of Canada with the use of the French language and distributed in Quebec and New Brunswick. With equal satisfaction I should like to see 300 films made this year in Quebec and in the French-speaking portion of New Brunswick with the use of the English language and distributed throughout the rest of Canada. I think through the national film board we can do much more to bring about greater unity in our dominion.

I cannot think of a finer place in which to centre such bilingual activities than the city of Ottawa, where I understand almost half of the people are French-speaking. I cannot see that moving it to Montreal will serve the cause of bilingualism. I agree there are occasions when the people of Quebec are not adequately served by the national film board, but I maintain that they will not obtain better service simply by moving the head offices of the national film board to Montreal. It has been repeatedly pointed out that this move is necessary in order to facilitate production. I observed an admission in this regard by the Minister of Public Works when he said as reported at page 2599 of Hansard of March 2:

> While the major part of the board's film work will always be carried out on location in various parts of Canada—

Therefore, when hon. members speak of the production effort I do not think that it matters very much where the headquarters of the film board are located. I believe the major production efforts take place in the field in locations anywhere from the Pacific to the Atlantic ocean.

There is one other feature I like about the national film board and that is that it is a relief to see films which do not contain advertising. The films produced by the national film board are such that we can safely send our youngsters to see them and we can recommend them to others. We know that in the production of these films there is no ulterior motive. They are produced in an effort to show Canada to the Canadian people. There is no tinge of propaganda but only the desire to present Canadian situations to the nation.

The film today has to be recognized as a major educational medium and I would like to see, if it is at all possible, the national film board giving a little more support to the starving visual-aid sections of the provincial departments of education. All our provincial departments of education have by now, I believe, visual-aid branches and I am sure they would not turn down the type of help which the film board might be able to offer. Since films have now become a major educational medium I doubt very much whether it would be safe for us to allow the manufacture of ordinary films to fall into the hands of advertisers. I doubt very much whether we can say—

The Deputy Chairman: I hope the hon. member who is now speaking will not take it too personally, but perhaps I have been unduly lax in permitting this debate to go too far afield, and to that extent I apologize to the hon. gentleman if I have allowed him to go astray. However, I would remind him and other hon. members that there are on page 38 of the estimates items 245 and 246. Item 245 relates to the administration, production and distribution of films and other visual materials, and item 246 relates to the construction or acquisition of equipment. I would suggest to the hon. member and to the committee that we are dealing with estimates of the Department of Public Works in so far as construction is concerned, and particularly with the amendment moved, which seeks to reduce this estimate. I think it would be agreed by all hon. members that we should try to keep this debate to the subject of the construction of a building for the national film board, and that other matters relating to the film board should be discussed at another time.

Mr. Regier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Probably I did not relate what I had to say frequently enough to the matter under discussion. I am very much concerned about the effect this move will have. I would like the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to keep the operations of the national film board right here in Ottawa where he himself could be in close contact with developments and where hon. members of this house would be in a position to watch its operations. I feel that the national film board in the future can do much for Canada. The operations of that board have been subject to attack from widely separated quarters within recent years. These attacks are, I feel, inadvisable and I believe it would help a great deal and we would be in a much better position to protect and foster this new medium of teaching citizenship if we had it near at hand where we could observe it continuously.

I suppose I must be realistic, and in view of past observations perhaps come to the conclusion that the decision has already been made and there is little more to be done. However, I can only express the faint hope that it is a good move and I would say, even though I do support this amendment, that if I thought for a moment there was anything in the amendment that would hamper the efforts of the film board to expand and become even a better influence than it is now then I would be opposed to the amendment.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I rise to make just one or two observations which I would be glad to have the minister answer. Perhaps I could put my observations in the form of questions. But before coming to that I think some reference should be made to the remarks made by the hon. member for Mount Royal. As I understood his remarks, if one is to draw the inferences from his speech which he certainly left there, he implied if he did not directly suggest that in the Ottawa area there is not a dual culture. He said, and these are his words as I put them down: "At least in Montreal we have the advantages of a dual culture".

I take it from what the hon. member said that, by the use of the words "at least", the inescapable conclusion is that in his view there is not a dual culture here in Ottawa. That seems to me to be a rather extraordinary—

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Chairman, if I am obliged to answer the hon. member—

Mr. Fulton: You are not.

Mr. Macnaughton: —I would point out that I said no such thing.

Mr. Fulton: I believe the hon. member will find when he checks his remarks in Hansard tomorrow that the words I have quoted, or words very like that, were used by him. If that is not what he intended, then I am glad to have his explanation, because I was certainly under the impression that not only here in the city of Ottawa is there a dual culture, but that in this city and the city of Hull combined it would be quite impossible to maintain that there is not a dual culture in the Ottawa area. Therefore, from that point of view, it seems to me that the so-called advantages of the move to Montreal are entirely non-existent.

The hon. member made some perhaps less serious suggestions as to the advantages which will flow from the move to Montreal. I could not help being struck and rather amused, and I suppose he intended it to be amusing, when he suggested that after all we have down there the new member for the Dollard constituency who would be very glad to welcome the transplanted employees of the film board on their arrival in Montreal. I could not help but wonder about the other two hon. members for Ottawa, who I know are very much concerned in this matter. I wonder whether the welcome these two hon. gentlemen would extend to the film board employees, if they were allowed to remain in Ottawa, would not far outweigh any welcome which might be given by the hon. member for Dollard if they were forcibly transplanted to Montreal. However, that is a contest between the two Liberal members for Ottawa and the hon. member for Dollard, and perhaps it would be wiser to allow that particular contest to be resolved by hon. members themselves on the other side. They are all Liberal members so hon. members opposite will have to choose between them.

Mr. Knowles: Some choice.

Mr. Fulton: But then perhaps there was another more weighty suggestion made by the hon. member for Mount Royal, namely that the film board in Montreal would produce films for the C.B.C. television and for other television purposes. I was not able to hear in his argument any serious reasons advanced as to why it would not be possible to do that in Ottawa. I should like to point this out to him. I am sure he knows it, but I should like to emphasize for his consideration and that of the other members of the committee that Crawley Films Limited have their headquarters and their production facilities here in Ottawa. They produce fine films. They have recently won an award with their films. I have never heard them or anyone on their behalf suggest that they could produce films better, more cheaply and with better competitive advantages if they moved their production facilities to Montreal. I admit that Crawley Films is a private enterprise, and I suppose that I should not say too much in favour of private enterprise; but I suggest that it is only reasonable to assume that if private enterprise, with all the disadvantages which some of my friends in this chamber sometimes suggest attend that form of enterprise, can produce good and praiseworthy films here in Ottawa, then there is no reason on earth why the film board should not be able to do the same thing.

The advantages of the Ottawa location have been rehearsed at great length and I am not going to say anything beyond what I have already said, except that the one unanswerable argument in favour of the motion moved by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre seems to me to be that to leave the production centre of the film board here would result in a saving of money to the country because the city of Ottawa has offered a free site. Therefore, even if one were to accept the argument of the minister that the sound-proofing necessary down in Ville St. Laurent is not going to be an additional expenditure—an argument which as a non-expert in the construction business I would not venture to differ from in detail but which does seem to me nevertheless to be hard to accept—the fact is that the cost of the site would be saved; and unless the government has been an even worse judge of property than one would expect, they should be able to sell that site for something close to what they paid for it or to use it for some alternative purpose, thus avoiding the necessity of buying a new site, and to take advantage of the generous offer of a free site made here by the city of Ottawa.

The other aspect that I should like to mention—and perhaps I might mention it while the Minister of Finance is still here—is a question involving the position of the employees after they have left and have been forcibly transplanted to Montreal. I want to put this matter in the form of questions. The minister can answer as he wishes. Perhaps he can find an argument in it one way or the other. I understand that the province of Quebec has recently decided to impose a personal and corporation income tax at the rate of 12 per cent. That is a decision for them and one which I am not going to question. But it seems to me that from that it follows—and the minister can disagree if I am wrong—that if these employees of the film board are forcibly transplanted to Montreal, after having taken up residence there and become residents of that province, they will be liable to that income tax, something which seems to me to be a strong argument, reinforcing those which have already been made, against the forcible transplanting of these employees against their will.

I should like to ask the minister whether it has yet been decided that the taxpayers in the province of Quebec will be allowed a credit against federal income tax of the amount of their tax in Quebec, whether the employees of the film board will be allowed a special deduction of Quebec income tax after they are transplanted, or whether it is contemplated that they will receive an increase in their salaries equivalent to the amount that they would otherwise have to pay in extra income tax. Whichever way those questions may be answered, I think that the implications of this situation are overwhelming arguments in favour of changing the decision for the move to Montreal, and if not changing it, at least postponing it until the position of those employees with respect to the problem I have raised is clarified. I should like the minister responsible for the board itself or the Minister of Finance or his assistant—whichever cares to do so—to tell us what will be the position of the employees with respect to that matter.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fulton: Is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in a position to reply to those questions?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I am not competent to pass upon the situation that might obtain with respect to these employees, as to whether or not they will be subject to income tax in the province of Quebec. I am not even familiar with the terms of the act because it is not in my province. All I can say in answer to my hon. friend is that there is no compulsion on any member of the film board to move to Montreal.

Mr. Fulton: Will the government undertake to find alternative employment for an employee if he elects to stay here in Ottawa?

Mr. Harris: The government does its best to assist the civil service at all times in its discharge of its duties to the public. I think that would be a sufficient answer.

Mr. Fulton: It indicates that it is sufficient to the minister.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver South has the floor.

Mr. Fulton: I wanted to ask if the Minister of Finance might give me an answer to the question which the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration indicated that he did not feel able to answer.

The Chairman: I have said that the hon. member for Vancouver South has the floor.

Mr. Fulton: I hope the Minister of Finance will remain until he gives me an answer to the question.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend speaks so much in the chamber that I have got into the habit recently of reading the newspaper when he is making speeches.

Mr. Fulton: It is not only recently that the minister is in the habit of reading the newspaper.

Mr. Knowles: There is something in the papers that he might well read.

Mr. Fulton: However personal the Minister of Finance may choose to make his comment I will, if he wishes me to do so, repeat the question if he did not hear it while he was reading the paper.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver South has the floor.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman—

[Mr. Fulton.]

The Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. Philpott: If it were only a question of moving the film board from Ottawa to some other city, I doubt that I would take much part in the discussion. In fact, I might be tempted to be facetious perhaps and say that the ideal solution would be quite a bit different and that it would be to build the film board in the capital but to move the whole capital, bag and baggage, to the Pacific coast. I believe that even if we made an experiment for one session—

An hon. Member: Would you take Charlotte Whitton?

Mr. Philpott: We would even take queen Charlotte for one session. If we moved the department, bag and baggage, to the Pacific coast even for one session, I think we would never have the problem of where the capital ought to be. I think we could save so much time and money by so doing that there would be no question about it. Of course, we might lose a little bit in January and February when some of the boys played hookey in the afternoon and went playing golf.

Mr. Knowles: This chamber consists of both boys and girls now.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Philpott: I think we might save considerable time over the long week end because not so many people would be able to take a week end from Thursday afternoon until Tuesday afternoon. Perhaps we could then cut down the length of the sessions.

Speaking seriously, Mr. Chairman, I must say that I was astonished to hear the amendment moved by such a usually hard-headed and common-sense person as the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. While I know it takes a good deal of ingenuity and mental agility to be at one and the same time a member of local 999 of the socialist millionaire hardware chain store magnates union and also a socialist theoretician, I must say that the ambivalence shown in this particular amendment is just a little bit too much for the genius and geniality of the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre to bridge. What do I find? I find, for instance, that my predecessor and neighbour, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, said a few moments ago that this amendment had to do entirely with the cost of moving the film board to Montreal. As I read the speech of the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre he said, as found at page 2599 of Hansard for March 2:

Under these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I wish to move that item 368 of the estimates be reduced by $1,500,000 . . . That of course, is the amount which the government proposes to spend this year on the actual construction of the new building at Montreal.

Then I find certain rather remarkable arguments developed by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre when he attacks the whole idea of modernization of equipment of the national film board. At page 2598 of Hansard he said:

> In the second place I think this move is extravagant, because of the nature of the building which is being erected. According to the Montreal Gazette it required eighteen months to prepare the 150 blueprint sheets which were used. The plans provide, among other things, for marble mosaic hallways, eight auditoriums, two garages, a viewing room with chairs with push button ashtrays, decorative ceilings and concealed lighting. According to the plans which have been laid down, the following is to be provided:
> "An inner courtyard with a pool roughly fifteen feet long and three feet deep, with a fountain sculptured on the themes of sight, motion and sound; light would illuminate the fountain at night".
> In other words, when you look at the plans you begin to wonder if the government is proposing to put up some kind of luxury studio, something that will make some of the Hollywood studios look a little bit dull or drab.

I submit that when we are engaged in equipping a great public enterprise that has served the people of Canada as well as the national film board has served us in past years we can afford every cent of this modest expenditure to give the national film board of Canada the finest equipment in the entire world. I for one will be very glad to make Hollywood take a back seat in that particular regard.

Mr. Ferguson: What poppycock!

Mr. Philpott: So I find it most remarkable to hear that argument advanced against the expenditure of some $10 million to give the national film board of Canada the plant and equipment to enable it to do a real job. I must say I find that a remarkable argument to come from my hon. friends immediately opposite. One week ago in this chamber we listened to speech after speech from these same members urging and prodding the government to institute a program of public works. They were asking what was the matter with the government, was it asleep on the job or waiting for spring? They wanted a great program of public works. But when we get the first item for something that everybody in Canada from coast to coast knows perfectly well that we need—

Mr. Thatcher: Let us have it in Ottawa, not Montreal.

Mr. Philpott: —not on an emergency basis but to do something for the good of Canada, not for this year, not for next year but for twenty-five or fifty years to come, we have exactly the same group saying that this is gross extravagance and that we should not spend a dollar.

Mr. Thatcher: We want it in Ottawa and not Montreal.

Mr. Knowles: Is this tomorrow's column?

Mr. Philpott: Finally, we have another remarkable argument used: I for one do not believe that the film board was made for Ottawa, nor do I believe that Canada was made for Ottawa. On the contrary, I believe that the capital was made for the country and not the country for the capital. Therefore where we locate any soldier, sailor or airman in our Canadian forces is exactly where that soldier, sailor or airman can best serve Canada. Where we locate the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or where we locate any agency of the Dominion of Canada is where that agency can do the best job for Canada.

Mr. Thatcher: Here in Ottawa.

Mr. Philpott: As a newcomer and freshman M.P. in the house I would not presume to set myself up against the studied advice given time after time by the boards which we selected to advise us exactly how to make this great public enterprise a success. I say that is a very poor way for any party to try to assist a great public enterprise. We have had political parties of different types in this country and in different parts of the country. We have had the Conservatives in Ontario who brought forth that great public-spirited enterpriser, the late Sir Adam Beck, who probably laid the foundation for the political success of the ladies and gentlemen who sit on my left. The Liberal party brought to Canada another great public servant who put the Canadian National Railways on a sound basis and whose only fault was that he was perhaps twenty or twenty-five years ahead of his time. He was criticized by some people for trying to dieselize the road twenty-four years before the United States roads first undertook that modernization.

We have had people who have made public enterprises a success in all parts of the Dominion of Canada, but I must say that it comes as a rather remarkable argument by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre for him to suggest that even though it has been recommended that a public enterprise be moved to a certain part of this great country, Montreal, that recommendation cannot be carried out—

Mr. Ferguson: Put it on the record.

Mr. Philpott: —because of the possibility of provincial censorship. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre said, as found at page 2599 of Hansard:

> May I remind hon. members that a short time ago Mr. Duplessis, premier of Quebec, suggested that he was going to introduce the censoring of C.B.C television programs. Now, what assurance has the government, if the national film board does move to Montreal, that Premier Duplessis will not decide to censor their work also? I can tell the minister and the cabinet that the people of Saskatchewan will not look kindly upon Premier Duplessis, or any other provincial premier, censoring the kind of film fare they may see; yet if the board does go down to Montreal can the government say this will not take place?

I say to the hon. member that he knew perfectly well when he asked that question that it was sheer downright poppycock and nonsense, that no provincial government in Canada, whether it be the government of Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia, Alberta or Saskatchewan, can step one inch over the jurisdiction of the national parliament and national government.

Mr. Thatcher: They did with the C.B.C.

Mr. Philpott: Provincial governments have made fools of themselves in various parts of the country and at various periods of our history. I can remember that when I was perhaps twenty or twenty-five years younger than I am now a Conservative administration in Ontario did not do anything to see that people had the right of free speech even within 100 yards of the legislature in Toronto. I can remember episodes twenty or twenty-five years ago in my hon. friend's province of Saskatchewan that do not look so good when you look back on the history of those times.

An hon. Member: Under a Liberal government.

Mr. Philpott: We had in British Columbia not very many months ago an act—

Mr. Ferguson: You are going all over the world. Why don't you get down to reality and common sense? You are talking about nothing. You have made no headway at all. We are talking about the film board. Why don't you give your life history?

Mr. Philpott: My point is this—

Mr. Ferguson: What a windbag! You're the best we've ever had.

Mr. Philpott: Thank you for that compliment. My point is this—

The Chairman: Order. The discussion on this item has gone far afield. I suggest the co-operation of hon. members should be given to limit themselves to the subject under discussion.

Mr. Philpott: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am coming to my conclusion—

Mr. Ferguson: Good.

Mr. Philpott: We have even had in Alberta administrative action by the government forbidding the showing of a product of the national film board entitled "Man—One Family". But I think that should not warp our judgment, that this board should be located wherever the best place is, in the interests of the country.

There is one argument, that whether we like it or not this country is a two-language, two-religion and two-race culture; and I think that we can live together, that we can prosper best and that we can go forward best if we accept the spirit of that situation. And one reason I think for the great success of the party on this side of the house is that, over the generations, it has accepted the spirit of that underlying basis of confederation perhaps better than some other political organizations have. And, whatever else we do or do not do, let us hope to have the national film board where it will do the best job for all the people of Canada—and by "all the people of Canada" I mean all the people of both cultures.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Yorkton.

Mr. Castleden: Go ahead.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I was observing closely while the hon. member for Vancouver South was making his remarks, and I noticed that the Minister of Finance interrupted the reading of his newspaper long enough to converse briefly with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I wonder if the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is now in a position to answer the question which he said earlier was really one having financial implications rather than one for his department.

Mr. Harris: I am sure the hon. member for Kamloops is not in a position to do mind-reading, on this side of the house at least. It was I that conferred with the Minister of Finance, and not he with me; and our conversation was one which I am sure the hon. member would not like to hear.

Mr. Knowles: Very smart!

Mr. Fulton: There are lots of conversations over there that we do hear sometimes, but that are not very enlightening. So what passed between the two ministers, in the light of the minister's remark, perhaps could be left for the public to judge.

However, the Minister of Finance is here, and—

Mr. Knowles: —has finished his paper.

Mr. Fulton: Could he tell us what the implications are of this move to Montreal, so far as employees of the film board are concerned, with respect to income tax?

Mr. Abbott: I have not the faintest idea, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Ferguson: And you care less.

Mr. Fulton: Well, that is obvious. My hon. friend from Simcoe North merely draws attention to the obvious. Does the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, then, not consider that perhaps the move to Montreal should be delayed a while, and this item therefore eliminated while the implications are being considered and the matter possibly straightened out?

Mr. Ferguson: He cares less, too. So, why talk about it?

Mr. Castleden: I have listened with great interest to the hon. member for Vancouver South. Listening to the hon. member one would almost think that the C.C.F. group had suggested that we should not spend money on a building for the national film board. That was the basis of the hon. member's argument. I would point out to him that we have supported a building for the national film board, but we want it built here—and I think he knows that very well.

You know, Mr. Chairman, his speech reminded me of a little poem that goes like this:

> You cannot hope to bribe or twist,
> Thank God, the British journalist.
> But seeing what the man will do unbribed,
> There's no occasion to.

And I think that probably fits him quite well. The protests which have followed the news that the government is moving the national film board from Ottawa to Montreal show that you can push the Canadian people too far. These protests do not come only from Ottawa. You cannot always measure public reaction or opinion with an engineer's slide rule.

To give an illustration, my constituency is located almost two thousand miles from here. I have received resolutions from very responsible groups in my constituency of Yorkton who are interested in the value of the educational work the film board is doing. To some people this interest might seem strange, but it is an indication of something that is very important. I am pleased to know that they have protested, and I was pleased to receive a request from them to rise in my place in the House of Commons and express their protests against this move by the government. My people are protesting against the removal of this fine organization, the film board, with its record of progress, and its establishment here in Ottawa for a number of years. It is an organization just reaching its full vigour of maturity and manhood which, suddenly, finds that it is torn up by its roots and moved to Montreal.

My people are asking the reason for all this. Why is it being done? What is behind this? Has there been a clear statement of government policy? Who started it? Have they studied the full implications of their actions? I am pleased, as I say, that the Canadian people are alert to an injustice. Naturally they imply—because they have been given no information to the contrary—that some concessions must be given to some people, or some personal privileges handed out here or there. They know that that part of Canada sends a pretty solid bloc to support the government in Ottawa at every election—irrespective of what they might do provincially, when they send a solid bloc to support the Duplessis government in Quebec.

The manner in which the government has carried out this piece of administration is, in my opinion, pretty bad, and they will reap the results.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): And that is what the hon. member for Ottawa West said.

Mr. Castleden: The maintenance of unity is a matter of great concern to every government in Canada; that is one of the things that make the maintenance of government an unpredictable thing in this country. It is an odd experience. And this government is responsible for stirring up all kinds of suspicions that something is wrong. The people would prefer to have a forthright statement right from the beginning. They would ask the government what it intends to do and what arrangements have been made—instead of allowing all these rumours to be circulated across the country from coast to coast. The protests being made from all parts of Canada are a clear sign that something is wrong. We have tried to get forthright answers from the government ever since the session opened last November, at which time members in the opposition asked the government what was going to be done. The reply was, "Oh well, the matter has not been finalized", and "the contracts have not been let."

The whole matter of the effect which this will have upon the established people who have helped to build the film board is an important matter. It cannot help but have an effect upon them, since it will mean tearing up by the roots what they have established over the years. It will have an effect on the education of their children, since they will be leaving places where they have established themselves and where they have felt secure, where they have been able to build the kind of home they like. The morale of these people is very easily destroyed by moves such as this.

Tonight an hon. member from Montreal said that if we decide to move they can come along or they can quit. Such an attitude is scarcely the one to adopt toward senior civil servants who have abilities and qualities which are of a high order and of the calibre required to do the kind of delicate job that is undertaken by the national film board. I can only say that the whole thing has been ill-conceived, poorly timed and miserably executed.

It is very harmful to the good work that the national film board has done and it disturbs, to a greater degree than the government probably realizes, the balance that is required in Canadian unity. It might have been avoided if this government had come out with a policy in the early stages and had given a forthright statement of policy right from the beginning to the end.

I want to tell this government that there are some things, such as the feelings of people, and ideas that lie in the minds of people, which are dear to them, and when they are hurt, it takes a long time for the wound to heal.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): When the hon. member for Vancouver South spoke he said to hon. members that what we should do is to let the members of the national film board pick out the site, do this, that and the other thing. He said that they had studied the matter and they knew all about this project. The hon. member did not tell us what a mess the members of the national film board made of the national film board before 1948 when the Gordon report was brought in. If the members of the national film board were the same as those previous to 1948, I think he would agree with me that the decision as to the change should be left to parliament.

I was glad that the hon. member for Mount Royal mentioned that, before the present minister took over, the national film board was at a very low ebb. I said that he had better not let the Minister of National Revenue hear him say that.

The minister said that the site for the film board in Montreal was going to cost $240,000. I think that is the figure he gave us the other day. The city of Ottawa offered a site free.

I have one objection to the moving of the film board to Montreal. I am afraid that by moving the national film board to Montreal its activities will not be watched as closely as they should be by the minister. He will not have the opportunity or the time to be running back and forth.

This afternoon I mentioned the director who was put in to clean up the mess. I will say this—I said it a year ago—that he did a good job; but I do object to the way in which he was engaged, with a plum hanging out on the end of the limb to the effect that if he did a good job, at the end of three years—

Mr. Winters: That is no more accurate this evening than it was this afternoon.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): If it was not right, then how is it that three years before it happened I asked the minister if it was going to happen and he said no. And three years afterwards, almost to the day, the gentleman was appointed to a diplomatic post. I say, more power to him. But if he retires after five years he has a pension for life. That was quite a nice plum to hang out, and I hope that the present director of the national film board worked out a bargain with the minister that is just as good. If he did, he is a good man.

The Chairman: Order. May I also say that these remarks are about as much in order this evening as they were this afternoon.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I agree with you, Mr. Chairman. Since you have said that, I will not say any more about it.

In the public accounts for 1953 there is an item of $306,892 for removal and travelling expenses. I just wonder what that item will be after this film board building is put up in Montreal. It will be triple that or more. It cannot help but be that much.

When he spoke the minister said that in the United States the different departments of the government were spending more than the film board spent here. The minister did not say that the different departments of the government of the United States pay their own way. They do not get buildings absolutely free. I understand that the buildings they occupy in the United States are charged up to them, but they are not charged up to the national film board here. The national film board in this country does not pay rent for the buildings or anything of that kind. All they pay is their operating expenses and what they purchase. I should like to ask the minister a few questions. He mentioned the New York architect who had been engaged. Will the minister tell us what has been paid to that architect so far, and what arrangements have been made with him? The minister mentioned on April 9 that they did not have the plans of the building. But in Mr. Irwin's report of 1952 I find this:

> The minister added that plans for the proposed building were being prepared by the Department of Public Works. It is expected that these will be available during the current fiscal year.

That was the fiscal year 1952-53. I want to know whether the minister was right or wrong when he said on April 9 that he did not have the plans.

Mr. Winters: Of which year?

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Of last year. The minister said in 1952 that he did not have the plans, but that they were being prepared.

Mr. Winters: One minor point: the Minister of Public Works said that on April 9, 1952; but there is another Minister of Public Works today. However, he was correct in the statement he made at that time.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Well, if he was correct at that time, why did the minister not have the plans last year? I think the minister is wrong, because in the paragraph preceding the one I just read, these words appear: "Hon. Mr. Winters". I think that is the Mr. Winters sitting opposite me now.

I should like to know what it costs to rent the nine buildings here in Ottawa, as well as the two storage buildings which the minister mentioned the other night. What does the char service cost—as Minister of Public Works the minister should know this—for these buildings? I do not believe the government carries any insurance on the buildings, and if there is a fire, everything will be gone. Some of these buildings are rented and I believe some are owned. I should like to know what the upkeep charges on these buildings are. I should like to know if the department has figured out what will be the cost of the upkeep of this new luxurious building in Montreal.

Mr. Winters: It is not luxurious.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): It is a luxurious building in every sense of the word; it cannot be anything else at that price.

Mr. Winters: It is minimum accommodation.

Mr. Macdonnell: What about the pool?

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I should like to know what the upkeep cost will be. What will be the carrying charges? There will be interest on the money expended and I should like to know just what that will be. I have asked about the char service. What will be the total cost of the upkeep on the new building, and what is the total cost of the present buildings?

I have said this before, but I repeat that I sat in on the national film board meeting and I sat in on the public accounts committee. I feel that the national film board should be placed on a sound business basis in every way so the people of Canada will know exactly what is being spent. The public works department absorbs the cost of char service, rentals and everything else, and I feel that those should be charged to the national film board as well as interest charges on the money expended. I feel that it is due to the people of Canada that that should be done.

I said last year, and I shall not repeat it, that the film board is doing a good job. I said also that I thought it was on a better basis by far than it had been before. It provides something that the people of Canada need, something that they want, but they want to have this board run properly. When this matter was brought up on Tuesday there seemed to be some misunderstanding as to the distribution functions of the film board. I believe tonight one hon. member mentioned the fact that it was a great boon to the rural people.

From what I can see, from what I have heard, and from what I have read, I believe that the people in the urban centres of Canada benefit just as much as those in the rural sections. There seems to be some understanding also both in and outside the house with regard to the distribution of films and the work of the film councils that are set up. The national film board has a man in each district who is paid a salary plus living expenses. I believe these men are doing a pretty fair job. They set up the film councils. These councils have nothing to do with the board, except that the district man guides them along their way.

I know that in my own city of Peterborough those who wish to belong to the council pay $2.50 per year. They are allowed to have what films are in the library, and if they are brought from outside they pay the shipping charges or whatever it may be. It may cost them fifty cents a night for a film, or it may cost $4 or $5.

There is also a film council in the county. There is one school in which I am interested that pays $20 to belong. The district man comes up about once a week to show films and it is worth it. They are doing a good job. It is not only national film board films that are shown; films produced by different companies in different countries are also shown. In most cases they are educational.

I am afraid that the chairman may call me to order on this, so I had better not say anything more. I repeat, I am afraid that if this move is made to Montreal the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who is now responsible for the board, will not be able to keep his finger on it as he should. We do not want this film board to get out of hand, as it did, and grow up like Topsy.

Mr. Winters: This is an item to cover part of the cost of a new building in Montreal and I have not before me the figures on the char and other maintenance service for the buildings here in Ottawa occupied by the film board. I am speaking from memory and subject to correction, but I believe the fee to John and Drew Eberson was $35,000. I wonder if the hon. member would be satisfied if I got the other information and gave it to him when the first item of public works is before the committee.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): That will be quite satisfactory.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, it has become quite a habit in this house—sometimes I have fallen into it myself—that when an hon. member rises he says that he has been listening with a great deal of interest to the speeches that have been made. But I must confess tonight that I cannot pull that one this time because I have not listened with very much interest to any of the speeches that have been made on this matter of transferring the film board from Ottawa to Montreal. I was interested in the minister's reply, and I considered it a rather weak attempt to give a reason for the move. But I really have not been able to work up too much interest in the subject.

One or two hon. members have said that they have received many protests from all over the country. I am not going to doubt their word, but frankly I do not believe the people outside of Ottawa and Montreal care one snap of their fingers where this film board is located. I do not think the people in Macleod constituency care where it is located. As for receiving protests, I have not received one. I have inquired of some of my colleagues around here and they have not received any either. Of course we come from the two western provinces and the matter may be so geographically remote that we do not expect them to do much protesting.

[Mr. Fraser (Peterborough).]

There are one or two things I should like to say since this is an item respecting the national film board. In years gone by I have been somewhat critical of the national film board and also of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, while at the same time I have tried to be fair and admit that in a measure both these organizations are trying to do a good job. As far as the films turned out by the national film board are concerned, I believe they have done some pretty fine work. However, when it comes to films of a dramatic nature I do not care how much we spend on a building or how much hon. members talk about the various cultures that are to be found in Canada, and whether there is more culture in Montreal than in any other centre. I do not believe there is. I believe there is just as much culture in any other great metropolis in Canada as there is in Montreal. I follow some of the cultural programs on the radio and I must admit that Montreal has its fair share of dramatic talent, but there are other places in Canada, and I am thinking of Winnipeg, where there is equally good dramatic ability. As regards the dramatic arts, Winnipeg must rate very high indeed.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hansell: I do not include the political arts.

Mr. Knowles: It is higher still when it comes to that.

Mr. Hansell: As regards the city of Vancouver, I will say that it must rank pretty high when it comes to the dramatic arts. You can listen in to the radio as well as visit the "Theatre Under the Stars" during the summer and you will hear and see some pretty good productions. An hon. member here suggests Toronto, and I can say "Amen" to that. As regards the dramatic arts, I wish the film board well in their efforts, but if they are ever going to attempt to compete with Hollywood productions or some of the J. Arthur Rank productions then they have another think coming. Never in the wide world will they be able to surpass the productions of the major motion picture industries of the United States and Great Britain. However, when it comes to publicizing Canada, I believe that is where their main effort may be most effective. The series "Canada Carries On" has been of tremendous value to Canada. The series "Eye Witness" are excellent productions. But I have some limited criticism to make of the "Eye Witness" productions. I do not like the first scene of "Eye Witness" when the picture opens and you have to look twice to see what that thing is. After you look a few times you gain the impression that it must be the lens of a camera—and it is.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. gentleman may remember that a short time ago I considered it my duty to point out to a previous speaker that we are discussing the construction of a building for the film board and not the production of films. I would be glad if the hon. member would confine his remarks to the matter under discussion.

Mr. Hansell: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for drawing that to my attention. I should have been wise enough to recognize that. However, you have stopped me at an extremely interesting point and I would like to know whether, if the film board is moved to Montreal, we will still have to look at that lens, and whether we will still have to look at what appears to be a relief map. When I first saw that map I thought I was looking at someone's cancerous liver, and on a second glance I found I was looking at a relief map of Canada. If that is changed, the "Eye Witness" productions will be much better.

I have only a few minutes left, Mr. Chairman. I would like to emphasize that the film board has not only the responsibility of producing good pictures, but also the responsibility of depicting, if possible, the glories of our free and democratic way of life. That, Mr. Chairman, is a tremendous responsibility. In days gone by there has been some feeling on the part of several hon. members that perhaps the film board has not been doing its job along that line. In addition, the minister has not given a reason that will satisfy me for moving the board to Montreal. I will project my own reason, and I do not know whether I am far out. I believe they want to get the board away from this parliament. I believe they regard members of parliament as being capable of learning too much if that institution is located near where we operate.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Hansell: Some hon. members say "Oh," but that does not impress me in the least.

Mr. Knowles: That is all some of them can say.

Mr. Hansell: An organization such as the national film board is one of the most powerful media of thought and propaganda in the world, and I believe the government thinks that members of parliament should not be too close to the scene of operations lest they learn too much. I base my opinion on what I believe is a very important principle. The hon. member for Kamloops asked a few questions the other day and was unable to obtain answers.

Mr. Fulton: I did not get the answers tonight either.

Mr. Hansell: Subversives have operated in various democratic countries and my bet is, Mr. Chairman, that they have not overlooked the most powerful medium of propaganda which is operating in this country and in the world. They are not so foolish as to overlook that. One might ask "What are you inferring?" But what can I do but infer? I cannot get any information.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Ten o'clock.

Mr. Hansell: My hon. friend from Lambton West calls it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and for him I would ask you to call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if it might be possible for both my hon. friends to agree to suspending the ten o'clock rule until we get a vote on this amendment.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hansell: As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I would be agreeable.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Mr. Thatcher: No, Mr. Chairman, it is not.

Mr. Fulton: I put certain questions to which I am still awaiting an answer.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Last evening I announced the business for tomorrow. We will take the housing act first. When it is disposed of, we will proceed with this debate.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 5, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ARREST OF CERTAIN PERSONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? Has the minister any statement to make on the report appearing in this morning's Montreal Gazette concerning the arrest of certain persons in connection with alleged unemployment insurance irregularities? In making such a statement, will the minister do what he can to protect the good name of the nearly 7,000 unemployment insurance employees who give good and honest service from one year's end to the other?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): With regard to the first part of my hon. friend's question, as he will be the first to agree, since the matter of arrests reported in this morning's Gazette is now in the hands of the courts it would be quite improper for me to make any statement on it.

With regard to the second part, I welcome the words he used. As hon. members know, the staff of the 220 unemployment insurance offices across Canada handle very large amounts of money each day under circumstances which make the work very difficult. I would be the first to ask the house to pay high tribute to the work of the many devoted servants of the unemployment insurance commission, and as far as I know this is the first instance of the kind of any importance that has happened during recent years.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CALIBRE OF BELGIAN FN RIFLE—STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO ROUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) asked me a question about the rounds, whether I was aware that the Belgians use the FN rifle which uses the ·306 round. I answered yes. I answered that really on the understanding —perhaps I did not hear him correctly—that he was asking about the 30-06 round. In that event the answer is yes. If he was asking about a ·306 round then I would have to answer no, because I do not know of the existence of any such round. I should add that the Belgian government announced its intention to adopt the FN rifle with the ·30 standard NATO round on February 10, 1954.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

MANITOBA—EXTENSION OF SCOPE OR DESIGNATED AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is it the intention of the minister to recommend to parliament the extension of the scope or designated area of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in the province of Manitoba?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member for Dauphin was kind enough to send me notice of his question. I will have to say in reply that such a decision is a matter of government policy which will be determined in due course.

INCOME TAX

STATEMENT OF REASON FOR ALLEGED INSTRUCTIONS TO DEPARTMENTAL STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Yesterday, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) asked this question:

> What is the reason why the employees of the taxation division of his department are not treated in the same way as the rest of the taxpayers in Canada in regard to receipts for charitable donations?

The answer is: For good administration and to ensure that the integrity of our own staff is beyond question. I might also point out to him that the Canadian procedure is not as rigid as that of the bureau of internal revenue in the United States, where employees of that department are required to file affidavits with their tax returns.

Mr. Balcer: May I ask a supplementary question. Is it the intention of the department to extend this practice to all the taxpayers of Canada?

Mr. McCann: That is a matter of policy, Mr. Speaker, which has not yet been determined.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CANCELLATION OF COAL ORDER—DRUMMOND COLLIERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. McCulloch (Pictou): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Will the government state why the total order for 37,000 tons of coal as agreed upon by the Canadian National Railways management and the Drummond mine at Westville has not been completed according to arrangements? Is it the intention of the C.N.R. to complete the full order? If not, why not?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I have not had prior notice of this question and I should like to take it as a notice, and either the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) or I will answer on Monday.

WHEAT

ALLEGED COMPETITION OF ARGENTINE CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Would the Minister of Trade and Commerce comment on a dispatch in this morning's Montreal Gazette that the new Argentine crop, together with a proposed change in export price policy, will provide stiffer competition this year for Canadian wheat?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Argentina is a traditional exporter of wheat, as are Australia, the United States and more recently Turkey. Each of those countries sell their wheat in competition with one another. I am confident that the quality and the pricing policy associated with Canadian wheat will enable Canada to hold its own in competitive consuming markets.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question. Does the coming of Argentina into the export markets explain in any way the fact that Italy has not bought any of its 31 million bushel quota under the international wheat agreement?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Argentina has always been in the export market. For two or three years that country had droughts which cut down the quantity of grain available for export. Last year they had a very good crop and they sold some wheat to Italy. Italy bought certain wheat from Canada, I may inform my hon. friend.

Mr. Argue: That was last year.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Last autumn.

Mr. Argue: But not under the international wheat agreement for the current crop year.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. Argue: Not according to your wheat review.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I know that certain Durum wheat was sold to Italy last autumn, and anything that is sold after July 31 is included in the current crop year.

UNITED NATIONS

FAO COMMITTEE MEETING—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): May I address a supplementary question, perhaps to the minister of external affairs. I am sorry that I did not give notice of it, but it is a supplementary question with respect to surpluses of food and agricultural products. I believe the food and agriculture organization is presently holding a conference in Washington at which several nations are represented, but I do not believe that Canada is among them, at least not officially. Would the minister care to say now, or perhaps on Monday, whether Canada has a delegation or an observer at that conference. They are discussing the possibilities of disposing of agricultural surpluses.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I answered that question a few days ago. The situation is that we were at the FAO conference in Rome and a committee was appointed upon which Canada was not represented. It was understood that Mr. Hopper, the agricultural representative at Washington, was to be called in if there was any necessity for doing so.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO MAKE SOURCES OF INFORMATION OF PRESS AND RADIO CONFIDENTIAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) has asked me to reply to a question which was directed to him yesterday by the hon. member for Prince Albert. The question was:

> Will the government give consideration to introducing an amendment to the Canada Evidence Act at the present session so that the sources of information of press and radio in any future action shall be considered confidential and inadmissible as evidence?

This question arises, as the hon. member has indicated, as a result of a certain action in the British Columbia courts entitled Wismer v. Maclean-Hunter Publishing Company and Fraser. This was a civil action for damages arising out of an alleged libel. I understand that in the course of these proceedings it was held that where malice is a relevant issue the defendant may be asked the name of his informant unless it appears that the plaintiff had an improper motive in seeking that information.

The Canada Evidence Act does not apply in the case of civil actions in the provincial courts; consequently the amendment to the Canada Evidence Act which has been suggested by the hon. member for Prince Albert would be entirely ineffective in any such future action.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Would the Minister of Justice comment on the fact that in the Alberta press case of 1938 the Supreme Court of Canada held that freedom of the press was not a matter of provincial jurisdiction but came within the ambit of the federal authority as part of our parliamentary system.

Mr. Garson: I should be glad to comment upon that. My hon. friend is quite right in what he says about the Alberta press case. But that point has nothing to do with the judgment in the present case under discussion which was in a civil action for damages for an alleged libel; and the question we are discussing was as to whether a defendant could by interrogatories be asked the source of his information. I am sure that my hon. friend will agree that if it were thought desirable, as he seems to think it is, that an amendment to an evidence act should be passed to apply to a situation of that kind, it would have to be to the British Columbia evidence act and not to the Canada Evidence Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was just wondering whether in view of the supreme court decision that would be so.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs whether the government has yet reached a decision on the question of introducing legislation at this session to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I might say to the house that some time ago I indicated that legislation other than that which had been introduced up to then would be introduced before the end of the session. My hon. friend will find out when it is brought before the house just what that legislation is.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF NEW LEGISLATION TO INSURE APPROVED LENDERS, ETC.

The house in committee on Bill No. 102, to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of housing and building conditions—Mr. Winters—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, with the return to the House of Commons of Bill No. 102, the house is again faced with a bill referring to what is still one of the most vitally important subjects for all Canadians, namely, housing.

It was on January 28 that the house gave second reading to this bill. In the meantime the bill has been submitted to what I believe I may fairly call exhaustive study on the part of the standing committee on banking and commerce. That committee proceeded to its task with diligence. In the period between February 2, when it held its first meeting on the bill, and March 2 when it concluded its labours on the bill and reported it with a number of amendments that committee held, if my reckoning is correct, no fewer than 23 meetings. In my experience of 8½ years as a member of the banking and commerce committee I do not recall any case where that committee has given more careful and constructive study to any measure laid before it than it did to Bill 102. There has been no evidence whatever of partisan considerations in that committee, but the desire evidenced on all hands was to make this bill as good and as effective a piece of legislation as was possible within the principle of the bill as approved by the house on second reading.

The chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Spadina, is I believe also deserving of commendation for the way in which he presided over the sittings of the committee, and for his conduct of the affairs of the committee. While we did not agree on all matters, nevertheless he did contribute to the atmosphere of co-operation which prevailed.

The committee has heard extensive evidence. That evidence has not been printed as yet in its entirety, Mr. Chairman, and perhaps it is regrettable that the house, now in committee of the whole, is dealing with this matter without having before it all the evidence taken in that committee. It is probably a fair estimate that the evidence when printed in its entirety will extend to something like 600 printed pages, all in small print at that.

The evidence was drawn from many very competent witnesses representing organizations whose views are entitled to be treated with respect on the part of that committee and this house. No doubt the principal witness was Mr. Mansur, the very able president of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It is not the first time that Mr. Mansur has appeared before the banking and commerce committee as a witness. The committee heard him at very considerable length two years ago when it reviewed the operations and reports of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I believe this tribute is due to Mr. Mansur. He has always shown himself to be a well informed, willing and co-operative witness. His answers were clear and they always impressed the committee as being frank. I believe the committee is much indebted to Mr. Mansur for the evidence which he tendered to it at many of the 23 meetings which were held.

We also heard evidence, Mr. Chairman, from representatives of such organizations as the Dominion Mortgage and Investments Association, represented by its president, Mr. John T. Bryden. We heard from Mr. Atkinson, president of the Canadian Bankers Association, and from Mr. Graham Towers, the governor of the Bank of Canada. We also heard from representatives of the three national labour organizations, and from representatives of the Canadian Construction Association, the Canadian Home Builders' Association, the Canadian Association of Mayors and Municipalities, the Co-operative Union of Canada and others.

In all cases, Mr. Chairman, the evidence given was of very substantial assistance to the committee and through the committee to the entire House of Commons.

Organizations of this kind and their representatives perform a most useful public service in placing before a parliamentary committee the fruits of their study of a measure of this kind and the important subject upon which it is based.

Let me turn back to put in its setting the position in which the house found itself after giving this measure second reading on January 8. In saying this, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to reopen the debate on second reading. What I propose to do is to put in its setting what occurred then and to lead up to what I hope will be a constructive review of some of the evidence submitted to the committee, much of which is confirmatory of the views which some of us sought to place before the house on second reading, and other parts of the evidence of interest on other accounts.

The procedure of this house requires that even in a bill of a technical nature in which the principle is not easily isolated or identified, that principle must nevertheless be approved before the bill is submitted to a detailed study in the committee to which it is referred, whether the reference is to the committee of the whole or to one of the select committees of the house.

I believe the procedure followed in another place does not involve that same approval in principle on second reading before the bill is given detailed study in a committee, and there are occasions when such a procedure, it seems to me, has a definite value. It would have value on a bill of this kind which is largely a technical bill, which covers a vast territory, and which by common agreement was to be referred after second reading to the standing committee on banking and commerce for detailed study and review.

On second reading, Mr. Chairman, the point of view of the official opposition was put forward—and I think I am summarizing it fairly—in a manner which was designed to enable us to discharge our duty as an opposition by scrutinizing that bill very closely and by seeking to compare it as far as was then possible with the accomplishments under the legislation which it was proposed to replace. We sought to expose what we believed to be the dangers involved in the bill, acknowledging at the same time benefits that were held out for the bill by those who introduced it. We sought in a fair and, I hope, constructive way to put the bill in such a setting that its value could be measured not in terms of the propaganda which had been built up around it, but in terms of its true merits. It was recognized that the bill, in the great majority of its provisions, was simply a re-enactment of existing provisions of the National Housing Act and it was on that basis, Mr. Chairman, and I want to lay emphasis on this, that we of the official opposition voted for the bill on second reading in order to approve what we considered to be the principle of the bill.

It was a little surprising that, despite that frank and, I hope, constructive way in which we approached the bill, and made our position known for the four days during which this bill was debated on the motion for second reading, hon. members opposite should shout in derision when we voted for the bill on second reading as though there was something inconsistent in the position which we had taken in voting for that bill on second reading. The official opposition was completely consistent with the position which it had taken on that bill.

Whatever may have been our feeling about the way in which hon. members opposite conducted themselves when the vote was being taken on second reading, let me emphasize, sir, that it did not affect our position in the committee. We went into that committee, and I am quite sure the chairman and other hon. members of that committee will readily acknowledge this, with a completely constructive attitude. There were no partisan considerations evident in that committee, so far as I am aware, at any time.

The desire shared by all members of the committee, regardless of party, was to report back to the house as effective a measure as could be devised within the powers given to the committee with respect to Bill No. 102. The bill has now come back to the house, which is now sitting in committee of the whole, with a number of amendments which I think, in all cases, can be described as technical amendments. In these amendments there has been no interference with the essence of the bill or with the nature of the new scheme that is proposed therein.

Let us then consider this bill in relation to the underlying purpose of it. The purpose indicated in the debate on second reading and before the committee can, I think, be fairly classified under two headings. Broadly speaking, the purpose of the bill is to maintain the rate of house construction in Canada which last year reached a round figure of 100,000 housing units and, if possible, to increase that figure. The second aspect of the purpose of the bill is to bring it within the reach of more Canadians to build houses for their own occupancy. Therefore the question which the committee must ask itself at this stage is whether, in the light of the knowledge that we now possess, the bill is likely to accomplish this purpose of a twofold nature.

One of the first questions put to Mr. Mansur—and I am dealing now with the latter aspect of the purpose of the bill, namely to bring it within the economic power of more Canadians to build their own houses—was what would be, in his estimation, the increase in the number of those within the band of effective economic demand as a result of the enactment of this bill with its provision for reducing the down payment and lengthening the amortization period of mortgages. I consider his answer must be regarded as setting the boundary within which we must approach the whole question. I think it is correct to say that Mr. Mansur's answer came as a surprise to many of us, in view of the elaborate build-up the bill has had. His answer was that the bill would enlarge existing effective economic demand in Canada for homes by between 5,000 and 15,000 persons.

That answer is to be measured as against further testimony of Mr. Mansur. He was asked what is today the effective economic demand for houses; in other words, what is the number of Canadians who want to build houses under the provisions of the National Housing Act and who have the means today to meet the existing terms as to down payment, income and so forth. His answer was 120,000.

In order to see this bill in its true perspective, Mr. Chairman, we must realize that what Mr. Mansur was saying was that if the bill is enacted you will increase the number of those who are today in the field, qualified under the act and able to purchase within its terms, by between 5,000 and 15,000. Let us take the middle figure for percentage purposes and let us say it is 10,000. That would represent an increase of 10,000 on top of an existing number of 120,000. Therefore it means an increase of something between 8 per cent and 8½ per cent.

Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, when we look at the bill in the light of that important evidence, I think it becomes immediately apparent that the bill is not going to work all the wonders that some—and particularly some hon. members opposite in their speeches on second reading—held out for it. The pictures that were drawn of the new heaven and the new earth that was suddenly going to be created following the introduction of this bill and the new scheme of insured loans just does not stand against the evidence given by Mr. Mansur, who was a most capable and informed witness. I say that not in any hostile sense, Mr. Chairman; far from it. I say it with a view to asking this committee of the whole house to consider the bill in its true proportions, stripped of a lot of the propaganda that has been built up around it from government sources.

Let us now examine the means by which the existing band of economic demand is to be enlarged. The two methods put forward are, first of all, a reduction in the down payment and, second, the extension of the period for repayment of principal. I am not going to dwell on those aspects because

I am sure the terms of the measure are well known to the committee. So far as the down payment is concerned, I think what has been said on the other side of the chamber in relation to the measure must be compared with what I have just recalled of the evidence of Mr. Mansur. As to the extension of the period of amortization from the present period of twenty years to a maximum period of thirty years, it is quite evident that the extension of the time will help to increase the number of economic purchasers, as will indeed the provision for reducing the down payment. But let us remember that extending the period of amortization increases, in the aggregate, the carrying charges. Let us also bear this point in mind because I think it is something that is of crucial importance, and I propose to say a little bit more about it when I come to the subject of interest. Simply because there is an extension of the period of amortization from the present twenty years to a maximum of thirty years, we cannot assume that there will necessarily be any reduction in the amount of the monthly payment. Let us also bear this further point in mind. With the reduction in the down payment, there will be a corresponding increase in the mortgage. Let us bear in mind also that if there is an increase in the rate of interest you are going to have a situation where, depending upon the amount, the monthly payments could actually increase under the present bill.

Having made those passing comments on the problem of bringing it within the power of more Canadians to qualify for home purchase under the act, let me turn now to what has become, in the light of the bill, a matter of the highest importance. When the Prime Minister made his announcement of this measure on October 1, he indicated that the purpose of the legislation, when introduced, would be to increase the supply of funds available for loan on mortgage security. He took account of the present prevailing high rate of home construction in Canada—running in 1953, as I have said, to a figure of about 100,000 units per year—and said that it would be necessary to find new sources of mortgage funds if the necessary financing to sustain a home construction program of that size were to be assured. The scheme of insured mortgages is the government's answer along with the enlargement of the group of approved lending institutions by the inclusion therein for the first time in Canada's history of the chartered banks and Quebec savings banks. No one in Canada, in fact, no one on this globe, can say with certainty what will be the result of the enactment of this bill so far as sources of mortgage funds are concerned. We can simply take the evidence that has been put before us and weigh it, recognizing that it is based largely upon estimate and opinion.

The first result of the bill will be the abolition of the joint loans under the present part I of the National Housing Act. That will immediately result in the withdrawal from the supply of available mortgage funds of $60 million per annum which the government now is contributing through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to the total now available. Therefore we must be assured that under this measure there will be at least $60 million of new funds available, and we hope more, for there would be little use in tearing up the present National Housing Act and replacing it with another if there were not reasonable assurance of a substantial increase over that $60 million per annum from funds available from new sources.

The great bulk of mortgage funds available hitherto has come from the approved lending institutions consisting of the life, loan and trust companies in Canada. The evidence tendered on their behalf before the committee indicates that we may expect, subject to payment of attractive interest rates, a continuation also of approximately the same volume of mortgage funds as they have made available in record amounts in recent years. They do not foresee an increase in funds available. They consider that they are now lending to the limit on mortgage security. The question was asked: Will there be other new sources? Is there any indication that funds will perhaps be available from outside Canada which have not hitherto been available from foreign sources? Mr. Mansur was able to tell us that there had been some inquiries from foreign capital, which might indicate that there is some little possibility at any rate that funds may be attracted into this country for investment in mortgages under the provisions of this bill which may not have hitherto been available. As things stand now, those are only inquiries.

But it is quite clear, Mr. Chairman, that the house must depend principally upon the chartered banks for new sources of mortgage funds to replace first of all the $60 million of government money which will not now be contributed to the pool of mortgage funds, and to augment the total after that. I wish to be fair in my treatment of the evidence on this very important aspect of the bill. Let us recognize in the first place that insured loans, that is, mortgage loans insured by a government agency, are something absolutely new in Canadian experience. The United States has had a form of insured mortgage loans under federal legislation, but for Canada this is something quite new, and only time will tell the extent to which the insurance feature of this scheme will have the effect of attracting sources of capital. Time will be needed to measure public reaction, the reaction of sources of capital, and the usefulness of the scheme in general.

Let us recognize, sir, that there are disagreeable tasks accompanying the enforcement of the mortgage security. Under the bill there is no claim open to any mortgagee holding an insured loan unless he delivers title and possession to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That undoubtedly will require in all cases either foreclosure or acquisition of the title of the mortgagor by quit claim deed. Those tasks are not very attractive to any mortgagee, particularly if this is new in his experience. The prospect of moratorium legislation or debt adjustment legislation in the event of a recession in Canada looms very high, and the effect of moratorium legislation or debt adjustment legislation would be to put it beyond the power of any mortgagee holding an insured loan to deliver title and possession and thereby qualify himself to make a claim for payment under the insurance guarantee on the part of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

I come directly now to the question of what we may expect from the chartered banks of Canada by way of funds for this new type of mortgage. This, I take it, is in the last analysis the crux of the bill. We are looking to the possibility of sustaining the rate of house construction in Canada of 100,000 units a year. We hope to increase that. The capacity of the Canadian house building industry was described to us as somewhere in the neighbourhood of 125,000 units. Very well. Let us then examine the evidence on this point. Mr. Atkinson, the president of the Canadian Bankers Association, was their spokesman. He brought a brief which he said had been submitted to all members of the association, which includes all the chartered banks of Canada, and he said he had no doubt that they subscribed to the brief and the views which he put before the committee.

These are the facts which are outstanding in the evidence of Mr. Atkinson in relation to the vital question of what the banks are likely to contribute to the pool of mortgage funds. First, the banks were not consulted before this legislation was announced. Second, the banks did not seek legislation of this kind nor the power to lend money on the security of real estate. Third, there is no enthusiasm on the part of the banks made evident in any degree for the scheme of the bill. Fourth, Mr. Atkinson did express genuine concern about the effect on the public relations of the banks if they are obliged, as an incident of realizing on these insured loans, to foreclose on the homes of people who undoubtedly in a large number of cases will be their own customers. He did not relish the effect on the banks' public relations of having to take that course.

Fifth, this is an entirely new field in the experience of Canadian bankers, and Mr. Atkinson was extremely cautious in many of the opinions he expressed because, as he said, he was not qualified to do so, having had no experience whatsoever in the field of mortgages on real estate. Mr. Graham Towers in his evidence recognized that this is, in the words of the expression used on page 269 of the proceedings and evidence of the committee, "a radical departure" from Canadian banking legislation and Canadian banking practice hitherto.

Sixth, let me say a word about the use that will be made of bank branches. The picture has been drawn for us that with 4,000 bank branches in Canada there will be 4,000 local mortgage lending offices.

Well, sir, that may be a very pretty picture, but it does not accord with the evidence given on behalf of the banks by Mr. Atkinson. While assuring us that the banks would do their best to make this scheme work, he did say that, while the local branches of the banks will receive these applications for loans, there is going to be very extensive supervision exercised by the banks from their regional offices, usually one in each province. If one looks at the evidence on page 301, it will be seen that Mr. Atkinson is saying that most of these mortgages, once up into the figures into which most of them are going to run, around $8,000, are going to be referred to the regional bank office for approval before the local bank manager will be able to give an answer to the applicant for the mortgage loan.

On the subject of co-operation, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Atkinson confirmed what everyone knew he could expect, namely that the banks would co-operate. The Canadian banks are such that, and I think this should be said to their credit, their co-operation in matters of public policy on any proper subject is assured. I said when I spoke on second reading that we could be assured of that co-operation. My words to that effect are recorded on page 1329 of Hansard for January 21, 1954. I said, "I know we can assume that the banks will co-operate". Speaking later, the hon. member for Brantford, as recorded at page 1344 of Hansard for the same day, said:

> The hon. member for Eglinton thought that the banks would not co-operate . . .

His statement, of course, had no basis whatever in fact. It was completely without foundation, and indeed was the very opposite of what I had said. Let there be no doubt about it. It was said on behalf of the banks of Canada that they would endeavour to make this scheme work. There can be no doubt about that.

Mr. Dupuis: It is to their profit, undoubtedly.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member says it would be to their profit. It must be remembered that we are dealing with a measure here which depends for its success very largely upon making this new form of investment attractive to those who have capital. Unless we recognize that fact, we can finish up legislating to provide for a scheme of mortgages which would fail to attract that capital that is going to be necessary to make the scheme work. When one talks, as I shall have occasion to do in a moment, about some of the features of this scheme, let us be quite frank with one another and let us recognize that one does not say these things with a view to mollycoddling any particular holder of capital. One says these things with a view to recognizing the realities of the situation, and to show that unless these mortgages are sufficiently attractive to capital then the whole scheme under the act could prove abortive. We could finish up with a situation where we were worse off than we are under the present act.

Before I leave that subject let me stress this. The present act has produced substantial accomplishments. There is no hon. member in this house who can contend with any degree of success that the present act has broken down or has proven a failure. On the contrary, the evidence that was adduced before the committee went to show that the accomplishments of the present act have been substantial; it has worked well. The scheme of joint loans under part I of the present act has been successful. I, for one, Mr. Chairman, do not wish to see us reaching out for shadows and giving up the substance of the present act unless I can be very sure the new bill does offer substantial advantages over what I know to be the existing advantages of the present act.

The eighth point in the evidence tendered on behalf of the banks was that the funds of the banks are now fully employed. Indeed, Mr. Atkinson said, "We are now relatively fully loaned". I am not overlooking the fact that there will be, we trust, new sources or at least there will be new bank deposits in the future. But let us remember that the banks are going to have pressing claims upon them to continue to finance business and industry in the whole broad picture of national development. Whatever funds may be put into the hands of the banks by way of new savings of the Canadian people are not going to be available in their entirety for loans on mortgage securities; let no one believe that.

Let me make this final comment upon the evidence given on behalf of the banks. How much money are the banks likely to put into this pool of mortgage funds in Canada? That is the principal question. The answer, and the only answer I think that can be accurately given to that question in the light of the evidence tendered before the committee, is that the banks are going to be very cautious in their approach. Their participation, certainly in the early stages of this scheme, is going to be limited. Mr. Towers, in his evidence, made it quite clear that, even before it became apparent to him that new sources of mortgage money would be required to sustain the existing program or to enlarge it, he felt that the time had come to remove the strict prohibition upon bank loans on mortgages and real estate. He said that in his opinion the banks would subscribe a fairly modest percentage of the funds available in their hands. At another point he said it would not amount to 25 per cent of the funds in the hands of the banks available for lending. When I pressed him, he said he had just picked that figure out of the air, and was not prepared to say what that figure would be. It was purely a negative statement he had made with regard to that percentage.

I come now to one aspect of this matter on which I think it can be fairly said the Minister of Public Works dwelt with some emphasis in his statements, both during the resolution stage and in his two speeches on second reading of the bill. It was the answer he sought to give to the problem of liquidity. Of course, we realize that the twin problems of security and liquidity facing the banks are different in their nature. The answer to the problem of security, in the view of the government, is the insurance. But let us look at this problem of liquidity. It is a different thing altogether to say that the bank's loan on real estate is secure, because at the same time you must recognize that the bank is stepping out of a field in which credit is extended for periods up to a maximum of nine months and into a field where the period of the loan extends to a maximum of 30 years. In the face of that situation, even recognizing that the banks' loans on mortgages are quite secure if you will wait for redemption over 30 years, how can we maintain the necessary liquidity that is the essence of the Canadian banking system?

The answer put forward by the government was the provision to be made for financing on the part of the Bank of Canada. And so the committee awaited with no little interest the evidence of Mr. Graham Towers in this respect. I think the evidence of Mr. Towers in this respect was a severe surprise to many members of the committee. Mr. Towers made it abundantly clear at the outset that the Bank of Canada will not buy and will not discount a single insured mortgage. In the second place, the Bank of Canada, on certain terms, will be authorized and will be prepared, on terms acceptable to it, to accept these insured mortgages as collateral. But he said these insured mortgages would not be the first security resorted to by the chartered banks in seeking accommodation on the part of the Bank of Canada.

In the third place, the Bank of Canada reserves the right to refuse to extend that accommodation if it is not satisfied. And while under present conditions one cannot imagine the Bank of Canada refusing, nevertheless who is to say that the circumstances might not drastically change?

And in the fourth place, Mr. Chairman,—and this no doubt was the greatest surprise of all—Mr. Graham Towers said emphatically that the period for which accommodation would be extended to the banks would not be anything like the period of the loans, 30 years, would not be for a year, would not be, if you please, more than a matter of several months, and finally he got down to saying a matter of weeks.

Well, in the light of that evidence, when Mr. Atkinson came to the committee as a witness the following day, naturally we asked him about the use the banks would make of that provision for accommodation, and what value they attached to it. If you will look at page 270 of the evidence, Mr. Chairman, you will see that Mr. Towers sums up the value of this provision for accommodation on the part of the Bank of Canada in these words. My question is at the bottom of page 270, and reads as follows:

Q. Have you formed any estimate or are you prepared to express any opinion as to the extent to which you think the banks may be expected, over a period of one year, or over a few years, to use their portfolios of insured mortgage loans as collateral with the Bank of Canada?—A. Oh, I would say very little.

Then, further on, at page 302 where Mr. Atkinson replied to a previous question as to this same matter and said that this provision for accommodation by the Bank of Canada would have very little bearing on the banks' attitude toward taking insured loans, this extract from the evidence follows:

Q. You say it would have no bearing. What value would it have for the banks to be able to get this limited accommodation at the Bank of Canada on these insured mortgages as collateral?—A. From a practical point of view, none.
Q. No value?—A. None.

The Chairman: Order. I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Winters: Go ahead.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I thank the committee for its courtesy. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that what I am saying now by way of review will perhaps help to shorten the debate later on; in fact, I can say to the committee that that will be the result.

Now, sir, I leave that subject of liquidity with the observation that in the view of those who are principally concerned, namely, the banks, they attach no value whatever to the right to obtain accommodation from the Bank of Canada on their portfolio of insured mortgage loans for short periods.

I turn now, sir, to a wider question. Naturally this next problem is one that must give us concern. It certainly gave the government concern following the outbreak of hostilities in Korea. I refer to the possibility of inflation. It is the question of pressures resulting from an enlarged demand for what might prove to be a limited supply of houses and materials.

The government has said that the reason it stepped in in 1950 and 1951 to curtail house construction in Canada was that they felt it necessary to do so because of the threat of inflation. Well, sir, this must be a question to engage our consideration. Today the price of houses is high. It is at an all-time height in Canada. It has levelled off in the past year. It might be said that the price of houses and the cost of construction have been stabilized. Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, I do not think anyone will say that, even in the face of that levelling out, we can just accept without concern the high cost of housing in Canada today.

Mr. Mansur has indicated that the existing demand, namely, 120,000 units—and that he said is the effective economic demand—is more than a whole year's output of housing in Canada according to present rates.

Mr. Philpott: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

Mr. Philpott: At page 92 of the evidence Mr. Mansur very clearly points out that the effective demand is now 125,000 to 130,000. Why does the hon. member persist in using a figure that is 10,000 lower than that which Mr. Mansur gave?

Mr. Fleming: Well, it is not a figure of 10,000 lower. The figure of 120,000 was used elsewhere. It will be remembered that Mr. Mansur was asked this question in several places. Let me draw my hon. friend's attention to the statement he has just read. Mr. Mansur was asked about the rate at which the market would absorb housing coming on the market at the present time. The answer was:

> At the present time new houses, both for home ownership and rental, are coming in at the rate of about 105,000 units a year. I believe that the effective demand is sufficient to look after new production at the rate of 125,000 to 130,000 units a year.

My hon. friend was a member of the committee and will recall that when we came to the question of capacity of the house construction industry in Canada, it was put at 125,000 and questions were asked of Mr. Mansur, even up to the last day of testimony, about the ability of the present demand to absorb 125,000 to 130,000 units a year, namely, the full capacity, without appreciable inflation. I think my hon. friend will find that the same figure was not used in all cases. I am not going to take the time now to refer to the figures. As a matter of fact, I am quite prepared, for the purpose of the point I am now making, to take the figure of 125,000 as the existing effective economic demand, but not the housing need. Here we are thinking simply in terms of those who have the means to buy, to qualify under the existing act. I am dealing with the point whether, in the face of the existing demand, if you bring on to the mortgage market another 5,000 to 15,000 persons, heads of families who can qualify under the new provisions, you may expect an upward pressure on existing prices as the result of that enlargement of demand.

I wish here to say, Mr. Chairman, that opinions on this point on the part of the witnesses were not unanimous. Representatives of the Canadian Home Builders' Association and the Canadian Construction Association said that the Canadian market could absorb another 25,000 housing units a year, namely, a total of 125,000, without appreciable inflation. On the other hand, there were witnesses such as Mr. Bryden, president of the Dominion Mortgage and Investments Association, who felt the inevitable effect of enlarging the present effective economic demand would be to exert upward pressures upon the cost of construction in Canada.

There remains the problem of the lack of serviced land. The Minister of Public Works has recognized this quite frankly in several speeches he has made in the house. The lack of serviced land is still the principal bottleneck limiting house construction in Canada. Mr. Mansur referred to this on page 87 of the evidence. This shortage exists in its most acute form in the places where the need is greatest, namely, in areas contiguous to the large metropolitan centres where the housing need is felt most keenly today. This bill contains no new provision in relation to this subject; it simply re-enacts the present provisions.

I leave this subject with the observation which I have made not a few times in this house, that we are not going to grapple effectively with the problem of the lack of serviced land until something really concrete is done to assist the municipalities in this country who are compelled, in the face of rising costs, to limp along with the same sources of revenue which they were given in 1867.

The problem of rural housing was of concern to the committee and I assure you that that concern was not confined to hon. members representing rural ridings. The fact of the matter is that only insignificant use has been made of the provisions of the housing act to assist rural housing. At page 59 of the proceedings Mr. Mansur is reported as having said:

> The result is that the loans on the farms have been much more in the field of maintenance and improvement than in the new construction field. We have made, I think, only about eight farm loans in the last six or seven years.

And again:

> There just does not seem to be any demand for loans for new farm houses. The actual number, sir, is nineteen farm loans.

So far as farm loans are concerned, the bill has no special provisions. The provisions in relation to loans on farm homes are the same as those for city homes. The problem remains one of willingness on the part of the lending institutions to lend money for the construction of farm homes and, on the other hand, the existence of an effective economic demand.

With regard to slum clearance, a very important question, there is no new treatment under this bill except in one particular. The bill re-enacts the provisions of the existing act in precisely the same form with one change. Instead of referring to the kind of conditions that the legislation proposes to grapple with after a fashion as slums, substandard and dilapidated housing conditions, the word "slum" is now omitted and we find that the statutory description is confined to dilapidated or substandard housing conditions. Whatever may be the sufficiency of the reason for eliminating the word, let us realize that simply by taking the word "slum" out of the National Housing Act we are not doing one thing to grapple with the problem of slum clearance.

This problem of slum clearance must receive more attention in all parts of Canada than it has hitherto. Something very frank and wholesome was said on this subject on behalf of the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities in the evidence that was submitted to the committee, in which we find this statement:

> There is considerable public apathy with respect to the matter and active opposition to the idea of public housing in some quarters.
> It is perhaps because of these considerations that the federal government itself appears to be somewhat reticent in encouraging the use of those provisions in the National Housing Act whereby a large-scale program of slum clearance and low rental housing could be undertaken.

There is a lot of public apathy in regard to this question. Indeed the matter has been submitted to local electors in some areas and in some cases they have rejected proposals for slum clearance. There are many in this house and elsewhere who make a habit of throwing brickbats at the city of Toronto. As an unrepentant citizen of the city of Toronto I wish to say that I am proud that my city has taken the lead in this respect and that the Regent Park project has set a standard, an example which, if followed in other parts of Canada where similar conditions exist, would create beneficial results.

I had the privilege of being a member of the civic body in Toronto, the city planning board, which in 1943 made the first concrete recommendation for the establishment in the area bounded by Parliament, Dundas, River and Gerrard streets in Toronto of a housing project to replace existing slums. I think that enterprise has been a credit to the city of Toronto and it sets an example which I commend to other municipalities.

Mr. Dupuis: I assure you that we cannot say the same thing for Montreal.

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend will have to speak for his own city. I am simply commenting on what I think has been a salutary example. May I say also that this question was first submitted to the electors of the city of Toronto who approved of the proposal by a substantial majority.

Mr. Dupuis: A good thing.

Mr. Fleming: Let me say in passing that a very effective presentation was made to the committee on behalf of the Co-operative Union of Canada. The bill contains no change in the provisions of the existing act with respect to co-operative housing. The minister did say why in his opinion the request of the Co-operative Union should not be granted. Their request was that they should be accorded the same terms as are now available to limited dividend housing corporations in the matter of interest rates and the period of amortization. I think members of the committee felt that something should be done to encourage co-operative housing. Certainly the statement made to the committee in support of co-operative housing was an impressive one.

Finally in this review of matters that were considered I should like to report to the committee of the whole, as the evidence of the committee on this point has not yet been printed, that when the minister was asked when the government proposes to proclaim the provisions of part IV of the act in relation to home improvement and home extension loans he indicated that the government is not prepared to do so at the present time but would review the situation in six months' time to see to what extent funds made available for the assistance of housing were fully employed. I think we shall all hope that it will be possible for the government to proclaim the provisions of part IV of the housing act soon. Parliament does not like legislating, I am sure, provisions that are simply permitted to remain a nullity.

I am trying to hurry to a conclusion, Mr. Chairman. This bill, if recognized for what it is, is to a substantial degree simply enabling legislation. It proposes to confer the widest powers on the governor in council to pass regulations, regulations which will be essentially legislative in nature. This should concern us. We are not legislating fully in passing this measure; to a considerable degree we are legislating in the dark. We are legislating in terms of what in many important respects is simply a skeleton measure. We sought information as to what kind of regulations would be passed. We were given some information. There was certainly no unwillingness on the part of Mr. Mansur to answer questions as far as it was possible to do so, apart from questions relating to policy. But there are important questions the answers to which are essential to an appreciation of the whole scheme of this bill, and which the government must be aware of because if this bill becomes law next week, and we have been given to understand it will be brought into effect very quickly, then the government must know what it is going to do with respect to many of these important questions on which they are reserving the power to make regulations. In my estimation that information should have been made available to the committee. Let me remind the committee that there is much we do not know, and witnesses were not in a position to answer questions on these matters.

First of all, we do not know what will be the maximum loan under the new legislation. There have been hints that it will be increased from $10,000 to perhaps $12,500. But no one knows for sure.

Secondly, we do not know what forms will be laid down or prescribed by the regulations, and these forms are highly important. The form which the insurance guarantee will take is extremely important. Let the committee estimate the importance of that in considering this evidence of Mr. Atkinson, as reported at page 303 of the proceedings in the banking and commerce committee. It reads as follows:

> Q. I gather that you do not think of this simply as holding insured loans in your portfolio, but you will try to find a market for them, and the readiness with which a market can be found will depend on the readiness of the instrument and ease of transfer?—A. Yes.
> Q. And that will depend on the form of the regulations?—A. Inevitably, I think.

These are therefore matters of great importance, Mr. Chairman.

Third, we do not know for certain what will be the requirement in regard to the income of the applicant for one of these approved loans. Today it is 23 per cent of the income of the head of the family and that is enforced with only narrow exceptions. There have been suggestions that that income will be enlarged by the inclusion therein of one-fifth of the wife's earnings where the wife is gainfully employed. But there is no guarantee of that, and this matter of income requirements is of very great importance in estimating now the effectiveness of the proposed new scheme.

Fourth, and far transcending in importance the other three points which I have just mentioned, is the matter of interest rate. Let the committee fully understand, sir, that under this bill the government reserves the right to set the interest rate on mortgages provided for under this legislation. The statute simply fixes the maximum spread between the existing return on government 20-year securities on the one hand, and the permissible interest rate on the other. Today the effective yield on government long term securities is 3·51 per cent, and at the time of the second reading of this bill it was 3·66 per cent. That is a drop of ·15 per cent since second reading. We do not know whether that drop was the result of market operations on the part of the Bank of Canada in seeking to buoy up the government bond market. But the fact of the matter is that the statute permits the rate to be set today at 5·76 per cent as things stand at this moment. What is the rate to be? No one knows. The government has not given any indication. Mr. Towers pointed to the fact that there has been a slight reduction in recent months in the effective yield on government securities. It was made clear by Mr. Mansur that it is not to be expected that the government will be making frequent adjustments in the rate. They will have to gauge the market as best they can, so we need not look for frequent changes in the interest rate.

The prevailing rate today on mortgages under the housing act is 5¼ per cent, and it is 5¼ per cent because the government takes a return of only 3¾ per cent on its one-quarter contribution to the amount of the maximum loan by the approved lending institutions who are today receiving a return of 5¾ per cent on the three-quarters of the mortgage loan they contribute. Is it to be expected that there is going to be any reduction by the government on the return effective today to the approved lending institutions on mortgages? It seems to me to be almost certain, Mr. Chairman, in the light of the limited information we have, that there is going to be a slight increase over the present effective rate on these joint mortgages of 5¼ per cent.

If the rate is increased, the inevitable effect will be to enlarge the instalments which mortgagors will be required to pay under the new mortgages, and they will also be required to possess a larger income to qualify. That, sir, is a matter of the highest importance and the committee must realize that it is legislating in this respect, if not in the dark, then certainly in the dusk.

I must apologize for the length of this review of the evidence tendered to the committee. It must be apparent, Mr. Chairman, that the bill will command whatever we can give in the way of hope, but when we are attaching any hope to a new scheme it must be a hope, in my submission, based on a realistic consideration of some of these factors which I have sought to lay before the committee.

There are dangers in a scheme of this kind. There is the danger of setting up a giant bureaucracy, and the danger that we will be centralizing a vast mortgage scheme under which the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will approve or reject loans for insurance purposes, because no loans can be insured without the approval of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That corporation will make all valuations and inspections. That is a measure of centralization which ought to give us all very serious concern; and Mr. Mansur, to his credit, recognized the degree of concern which ought to exist in reference to conferring wide power of that kind on the corporation.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation acquires the right to set the standards of construction for all houses which will be constructed under this legislation. That, sir, is a vast power to place in the hands of a government corporation.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me say that there has been a lot of propaganda and exaggeration about the effect of this measure. There has been much exaggeration in regard to the terms it would offer and of the way the bill would reduce the down payment and make it possible for people to extend the period of payment for their homes. The prospect was held out of easy building. But, Mr. Chairman, we owe it to the people of Canada to strip away exaggerations of that kind and dispose of such propaganda. It would be cruel to disappoint many of the hopes that have been built up on the part of many Canadians who would like to own their own homes.

We will wish this measure well. We will hope that this measure will make it possible for more funds to be made available. We will hope that it will make it possible for more houses to be constructed and for deserving and creditworthy Canadians to acquire their own homes. We hope the result will be not to load with a heavy burden of debt those who will never be able to pay and who ought to be renting property rather than saddling themselves with a burden of mortgage indebtedness which they may never be able to repay, but will be to put the acquisition of a house within the power of Canadians who have it within their economic prospects to carry the expense of houses at today's costs. Mr. Chairman, we view the abolition of the joint loan scheme under the present housing act, with its substantial accomplishments, with a feeling of concern lest, in reaching out for a larger shadow we may be giving up the substance that has done much to assist in the provision of houses for Canadians.

We wish to see this measure given a fair trial. We will put no obstacle in its way, Mr. Chairman; you may be sure of that. We have given it careful study. We have brought to the consideration of this measure and the review of the clauses in this committee a co-operative and a constructive attitude. That is still our attitude. But the close scrutiny that we have tried to apply to the provisions of this bill we will continue to apply to the administration of this measure when it becomes law. Our concern over this measure will not end with its enactment.

We do not like to hear the government taking a lot of credit that is not due it. We do not view with any degree of satisfaction situations in which the government claims the credit for all houses that are being built in Canada. I regret that that note found its way into the speech made by the minister in closing the debate on second reading of this bill on January 28 when he talked about "the houses we are building". The "we" in that case meant all the people of Canada but the impression created was that it was the government's doing. Last year, Mr. Chairman, of the 105,000 starts that were made on houses in Canada, just 39,000 were done with government assistance. Let us not have on the part of the government vain claims to credit that is not due it.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, perhaps at this point I should rise on a question of privilege. I know my hon. friend will wish to be corrected. I made that matter perfectly clear in my speech on second reading of the bill. I made it clear that I was not taking credit for the government nor taking credit for the legislation. I said housing was an effort on the part of all Canadians concerned therewith. I must say at the same time that the minute there is a downturn, then the responsibility is placed on the shoulders of the government and blame is attributed to the legislation.

Mr. Fleming: I am happy to have the statement made by the minister this afternoon. It makes the matter perfectly clear as far as I am concerned, and I shall say no more on that score. I simply make this clear because the impression I formed, as I said, when the minister was speaking, was that of too much "we". As he realizes, I am referring to what he said on page 1572 of Hansard. In view of what the minister has now said, I will say no more about it.

This is my final word, Mr. Chairman. We wish to see houses built. We will give every opportunity to any measure that holds out any hope of providing more houses for Canadians, by proper schemes and sensible undertakings. In keeping with the careful scrutiny that we have given to this measure, we will continue to apply careful and, I hope, co-operative and constructive scrutiny to the administration which the bill will receive at the hands of the government.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, may I just make one interjection before the next hon. member who speaks takes the floor? I wish to refer to the page of Hansard of which the hon. member for Eglinton was good enough to remind me, namely page 1572. In reply to a question by the hon. member for Eglinton in which he said:

> I think the minister will agree that not all were under the act.

I said as follows:

> I readily agree with that, Mr. Speaker, and I have said so. This is an effort by all Canadians who are concerned with the house building business, encouraged, aided and abetted by the government under the terms of the National Housing Act.

Mr. Fleming: That was a big rider you added.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Having listened to the hon. member for Eglinton for about seventy minutes and having dug into the rubble of loquacity to which we have been subjected, I come up with one bright and shining suggestion of his, namely that he hoped his lengthy review would shorten the debate. I must admit that I do not know where he got the idea that his review was going to curb the eloquence of any of the other hon. members. I might, however, make this suggestion to him. The debate could be shortened appreciably if he would cut out his redundant verbosity and if my hon. friend would learn to compress into 40 minutes what could be a good speech within that space of time. But unfortunately he starts off in so many directions, over a longer period, that we are not quite sure what his position is when he has concluded.

However, I can certainly join the hon. member for Eglinton in the tribute which he paid to the capacity and the impartiality of the chairman of the banking and commerce committee. The hon. member for Spadina is a good chairman, even though he errs occasionally by trying to answer questions himself instead of leaving it to the witness to do the answering. The committee was also extremely fortunate in having before it a very capable group of witnesses. I do not think it would be invidious on my part if I were to single out Mr. Mansur, for obviously he has a very complete knowledge of the housing situation. He is not afraid to speak his mind and to give his opinions. One can only assume that these opinions are based on a fairly large amount of knowledge. But it must be said that there is substantial disagreement with some of the opinions which he expressed and with which I hope to deal later.

Ever since coming to this house I have felt myself to be quite capable of preparing and giving my own speeches. Today, however, is going to be somewhat of an exception because my speech really is going to be made up of excerpts from the minutes of evidence of the committee. I think they would be much more interesting than any views which I may have to present. Having spent a great deal of time in that committee and having listened carefully to everything that was said, may I say that I have heard nothing yet to convince me that this legislation is going to add to the number of houses that are going to be built in Canada. Rather, I think its effect is going to be to decrease it. From that point of view the government is open to legitimate criticism.

I have heard some hon. members on the other side of the chamber say, "Why must you always criticize us? Why do you never praise us for something?" The obvious answer is that there are 160 of my hon. friends who can do the praising much better than I can. Our job in the opposition is not to praise Caesar but to bury him, and that we intend to do with all the zeal at our command. At the same time, let me say this. While I am critical of this legislation, that criticism does not extend to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. There we have an extremely efficient instrument. There we have a highly necessary instrument. From what I can gather it is well run and well administered, although I rather suspect that it is not impossible that many of its staff are underpaid. Nor do I have objection to the low rental provisions in the legislation. I think they are good. Nor do I have any objection to the fact—indeed the welcome fact—that there were about 40,000 starts last year. They are all to the good and tribute should be paid to current legislation for that achievement. But we ought to remember that 40,000 starts or 40,000 new homes does not mean that there is another 40,000 houses available for those in the lower income brackets. In all probability the new houses which are being built are going to be occupied by those who are presently doubling up or tripling up or by those who are newly married and are forming new families. Arising out of the proceedings of the committee we have to ask ourselves the question: Is the government really tackling the problem of housing? My answer still is no. I find myself in substantial agreement with most of the comments made by my colleagues in the debate on second reading of the bill. The government is not tackling the problem because we still have a terrific backlog of housing needs in Canada. Mr. Mansur gave his opinion of what the backlog was. He said that he thought the backlog of housing in this country was between 75,000 and 200,000 units. I happen to disagree with him and there are others who disagree. I think the figure is much nearer 500,000.

With respect to doubling up, Mr. Mansur told us that there were about 377,000 families involved and that two-thirds of the doubling up amongst these families was voluntary. I think it is reasonable to say that if Dr. Forsey did not demolish that argument he at least put a very serious dint in it. Dr. Forsey pointed out that the amount of doubling up in families with incomes over $6,000 a year was 1·4 per cent, in families between $4,000 and $6,000 it was 3 per cent, in families between $2,000 and $3,000 it was 11 per cent, and in families between $1,000 and $2,000 it was 15 per cent. Of course as we go lower down the income scale the percentage becomes higher, and in the case of families whose income was under $1,000 doubling up was almost 20 per cent. Dr. Forsey made this rather tart comment about the situation:

> It is perhaps flattering to the working class to assume that family affection and ardent friendship increase so markedly as income decreases.

That of course is profoundly true. If, as he said, the percentage of doubling up amongst wealthy people amounts to 1·4, then it is reasonable to argue that amongst poor families there is no more desire to double up and therefore the percentage might be about the same. I suggest that instead of 66 per cent of the doubling up being voluntary, as was suggested, the percentage is much nearer 1½ per cent.

Last year in Canada a little over 100,000 homes were built, and in that year there was an extraordinarily high marriage rate. There were about 130,000 marriages. Obviously the number of homes built did not meet the number of marriages, assuming that every couple immediately wanted to move into a new home, which is not always a safe assumption. Demographers estimate that the average annual number of marriages that will take place in this country in the next few years will be about 90,000. These demographers have been wrong in the past and they may be wrong in the future. But let us take the figure of 90,000. The government's intention is to have 100,000 new homes every year, and again assuming that each married couple would like a home of their own that means only 10,000 homes a year to meet the backlog of housing which I insist is much nearer 500,000 than the figure of 200,000 we heard in the committee.

That being so, we are entitled to ask whether this legislation is going to help to solve in any radical way the problems of the majority of the Canadian people. Again I submit there is only one answer, and that answer is no. Statistics were produced to prove that 70 per cent of our 3 million families only have one member of the family in the labour force and that such families have very little other income. It was pointed out to us that 50 per cent of the families in Canada earn less than $3,000. That being so, that 50 per cent is almost automatically disqualified from owning their own homes under this legislation. If, according to the figures submitted to us by the corporation, we take $10,000 as the going price of a house, probably the lowest price one can get today, then with a 30-year amortization period and an interest rate of 5¼ per cent the salary required would be $3,380 on the 23 per cent basis.

Let us take the same $10,000 house with an amortization period of 30 years and an interest rate of 5½ per cent. The worker would have to have a salary or wage of $3,450 to qualify under the legislation, and of course that does not take into consideration at all the problem of the down payment. The vast majority are disqualified. Dr. Forsey again put some rather interesting figures on the record. He took the case of a $10,000 home under the present legislation with a $2,000 down payment and an interest rate of 5¼ per cent. Over a period of 20 years the purchaser would have to pay $12,878 at a monthly rate of $53.66. Under the new legislation it is true that the down payment would be reduced to $1,400, but at 5½ per cent, assuming that would be the rate, over 25 years the sum of $16,065 would be paid at a monthly rate of $53.55. Again Dr. Forsey tartly remarks that the workers would be saving the princely sum of 11 cents a month while he would have to pay $2,587 more for his house.

What this means is that the 50 per cent of our population who are earning less than $3,000 a year are out of luck under this legislation in so far as housing owning is concerned.

Mr. Enfield: Would the hon. member answer a question? Is the figure of 50 per cent not based on the fact that they will apply for a maximum loan on a $10,000 house?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): It is reasonable to assume that they would have to apply for maximum loans because their income is so small they could do nothing else. They have little savings.

Mr. Enfield: But do you not think you should qualify that statement because they can get smaller loans if they make their down payment larger?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): My hon. friend says that they can get smaller loans. Surely that is very academic in view of the cost of living today and the fact that the normal family must find it extremely difficult to exist on $3,000, let alone save money to increase their down payment. The minister said in the house that whereas stimulation and assistance for housing can come from the federal government, in the final analysis it is the municipality which decides the amount of housing to be built. There is a regrettable element of buck-passing in this matter because today municipalities in Canada are finding themselves increasingly squeezed owing to the financial conditions under which they operate. Into municipalities around the area where I live are coming new families with children who are occupying new homes. The municipalities have got to provide services, sewer, water and police services, perhaps even hospital services, roads, and of course educational facilities. I find that municipalities are faced with the problem of having to decide to build either roads or schools. They cannot afford both even if they can afford one, and such is not always the case.

Are these municipalities going to look with assurance on still further additions to housing in their areas when they find that their financial means are such that they cannot service those already there? I do not think so, not unless the government changes its policy and decides to come to the rescue of municipalities by making long term low interest loans for the purpose of providing the ordinary amenities of life such as education and other necessities. If that is not done the response of the municipalities will of necessity be a negative one.

I assume that one of the purposes of this legislation is to make the rate for lending more attractive. Fears have been continually expressed that the supply of funds is drying up. We were told that the insurance companies already have 30 per cent of their assets in mortgages. At page 1314 of Hansard of January 21 the minister said:

> . . . it has become increasingly clear that at some stage they would have to reduce their rate of new mortgage lending from its recent level.

[Mr. Enfield.]

Later he said that a decline in mortgage money from this source must be anticipated. There is going to be a decline, and what is the government's answer, in part, under this legislation? It is to make that decline even worse by taking away the quarter share of the guaranteed loan. That is not an answer for which I have any appreciation. In the committee Mr. Mansur said that financing in 1953 would depend on the continued willingness of the life companies to increase their relative holdings of mortgages. The increase last year made possible the expenditure of about $95 million. The life companies were willing, Barkis was willing last year, but what of this year and what of the years to come? If the companies decided not to increase their ratio, if indeed the companies decided to decrease their ratio of mortgages, then from what source would we get the additional funds?

Mr. Mansur said there is no substantial source of private mortgage funds available under present arrangements to provide an offset. Yet, what is the government's solution? It is to cut out their quarter, to cut out their payment of $60 million spent on acquiring homes. Mr. Mansur said again under the new arrangement the quarter share provided under joint loans by Central Mortgage will no longer be available. That is not an answer, as I said, that I understand or appreciate. Mr. Bryden said in the committee that the number of units financed will decrease by the abandonment of joint lending. Under this part of its policy the government is going to decrease the number of units; the government's answer is to reduce the money available from government sources for home building.

Obviously then it has to find some other source of money. As the minister said, it is quite clear if there is to be an increase in home building additional funds must come from somewhere other than the present source of institutional mortgage funds. Then, someone in the government had an idea, a revolutionary idea. He looked at the banks' reserves; he looked at the banks' liquid position and said: Boy, here we have got it. The banks are going to supply the money. We will pass legislation and get out of the business; leave it to free enterprise and everybody will be happy. We will put the banks in the real estate field, and we will revolutionize everything in Canada; we will get started on free enterprise home building.

The announcement about the banks being allowed to advance money on real estate was made in October by the Prime Minister. One can only assume that in Montreal the topless towers of Ilium quivered and shook. I suggested to Mr. Atkinson that the banks were rocked to their foundations by this drastic change in policy. His answer was that he would not agree that they were rocked to their foundations, but he was surprised. For a usually conservative banker to admit surprise is, I would say, equivalent to a lesser person saying he was thoroughly shaken. However, the government sugared the pill.

On page 1316 of Hansard for January 21, 1954, the minister said:

> In the matter of liquidity, as I mentioned earlier, it is proposed to make insured mortgages eligible security for Bank of Canada advances to banks in the same way as government bonds.

What did these ungrateful bankers do? They spat the pill out. They did not like it. Mr. Atkinson said he was confident it was not the intention that the central bank should carry for an indefinite period these mortgages as security for loans to banks. When he was asked, as the member for Eglinton pointed out, about their value as collateral, Mr. Atkinson said that, from a practical point of view, there was none. So much for the government's policy.

Then, what were the reasons for asking the banks to go into this field? I think the minister told us when he spoke of the widespread branch system, and of the 4,000 branches stretching from coast to coast. Perhaps the government envisages queues of potential borrowers lining up before the banks to get money to build homes. The evidence given by Mr. Atkinson must have poured cold water on the government's idea, if nothing else, for Mr. Atkinson informed us that very few of his branch managers were entitled to lend even as much as $10,000 without reference to a regional supervisor.

Then Mr. Atkinson said also, dealing with the type of loan, that he thought the banks would not attempt to make loans which they felt were likely to go into default. I am convinced that is true. The only money the banks are going to lend is on such gilt-edged loans that there will be very little risk. I cannot conceive, under this legislation, a worker in my constituency being able to go to the Bank of Montreal and say, "I want $8,000 for a house", and getting it. I do not think it is practical under our present banking system.

What was the banks' answer in case there should be a default? Let the government take the "rap"; that was all there was to it. Mr. Atkinson agreed the government should stay out of business. Mr. Atkinson agreed the banks should be allowed to make profits without government interference. But when it came to losses, Mr. Atkinson agreed that the representatives of the people of Canada should stand the losses for the banks, and leave the banks to take the gravy. It is not a system to which the C.C.F. adheres, but of course it is the regular free enterprise system which we happen to oppose.

Now, one of the reasons for going to the banks was their liquidity. I suggested again to Mr. Atkinson that the banks' position was very good; that the banks were drowning in liquidity, but naturally he did not quite see eye to eye with me on that. Mr. Towers said the banks could make up the deficiency for the government's quarter share in the joint loans. Mr. Towers was quite certain of that. He thought it could come, in part, from savings deposits. There is about half a billion in savings deposits in Canada today, not all available for loan; let us admit that. Mr. Towers was pressed as to what percentage might be available, and thought 50 per cent was most immodest and 25 per cent perhaps a little less immodest. We could not pin him down to any specific figure. I suggested 10 per cent of savings deposits. Mr. Atkinson in his evidence thought 10 per cent was still high, and that the banks could not possibly reach that amount for some considerable time.

Mr. Towers thought that a moderate percentage of savings deposits would not impair the liquidity of the banks. Again, we asked for a definition of "moderate", but there was none. We asked for a definition of "modest", but there was none. I do not have it in me to blame Mr. Towers, although I should like to have some sort of a definition. Mr. Towers agreed that at least $60 million a year advanced by the banks would not be overly much. Mr. Atkinson subscribed to that idea, and thought $60 million was well within the capabilities of the banks. By a happy coincidence, I suggested that the sum of 6 per cent of the savings deposits was what the banks would perhaps feel inclined to lend over a long period. This 6 per cent would be about $300 million and if that was put up over a period of, say, five years, it would be about $60 million a year. By another odd coincidence, $300 million was the hypothetical figure which Mr. Towers pulled out of the air when he was discussing this matter. My only point in stressing this is to suggest the banks are going, in their own mind, to fix a percentage of the savings deposits that they will be prepared to lend in total. When they reach that percentage, they are not going to go any farther. In other words, the borrowing from the banks is not going to be indefinitely recurring, except in so far as there is a revolving amortization fund and in so far as there are increasing savings deposits.

There again, there is a disagreement amongst the experts, and who am I to enter that field when the experts disagree? Mr. Towers thought that over the next five years savings deposits might increase by $200 million a year. Mr. Atkinson felt that if in 10 years you got the deposits up from approximately $5 billion to $6 billion it would sound very high to him. In other words, that would mean about $100 million a year, and it would sound high to a commercial bank manager. The position taken by the Bank of Canada was that it might be $200 million a year. There is no agreement about this.

What about the rate of interest? Every fraction between 5 and 6 has been batted about. It is obvious that Mr. Bryden, on behalf of the life insurance companies, would like to see 5¾ per cent, and he certainly made a play for it. I have no reason to think that the banks would like less than 5¾ per cent, and certainly they would be quite prepared to take more. We found out—perhaps I am being rather unfair in this, but it was the impression I got as a result of the examination by the committee—that the liquidity of the portfolios of both the banks and the insurance companies depends entirely on the rate of interest. That is one of the problems that has to be faced in deciding government policy.

Now, with regard to the commercial lending companies' portfolios, Mr. Bryden was asked certain questions about his company and it appeared that in its portfolios were provincial bonds on which his company was getting from 4 to 4½ per cent; municipal bonds on which it was getting from 4½ to 5½ per cent; public utility bonds on which it was getting between 4 and 5 per cent and on industrial debentures and so on, between 4 and 5 per cent. These securities cost about 10 cents a year to service. Mortgages cost about 75 cents. Now we have the government coming along offering them something which is going to be a lot better than current investments.

I do not think the rate should be better than 5¼ per cent. Five and a quarter per cent is more than adequate. If this government were to suggest 5¾ per cent it should be shot. Five and a half per cent would be more than enough; as a matter of fact 5¼ per cent is adequate for such mortgages, because on a rate of 5¼ per cent the life insurance companies and the banks would still get a net return of 4½ per cent on a gilt-edged investment, and that is not a bad return these days.

The government obviously think the economic picture is going to be bright. They have told us that repeatedly. They are quite optimistic about the future of this country, and the government's concept as to what the rate of interest ought to be should consider the risks which may be taken. If things are as bright as the government say they are, there will be no risk; therefore why should a high rate of interest be given on these mortgages?

How secure are the mortgages? Mr. Bryden said:

> There have been very few losses under the National Housing Act.

He was asked:

> Q. Have you any idea what they amounted to?—A. No.

He was being coy. He was asked:

> Q. Did the lending companies lose any money under the guarantee?—A. There has been some loss.
> Q. Have you any idea what it is?—A. It has been very small.

Mr. Bryden was not only being coy, he was being positively kittenish, because there has been no loss whatsoever. I asked him later if he thought these mortgages were inadequately secured, what sort of reserves for losses he would build up in his company, and the answer was none. Of course there would be no reserves because, as I said earlier, these are gilt-edged securities, and these new mortgages are being insured up to 98 per cent. As Mr. Towers said, the mortgages as securities are equal to government of Canada bonds, and long-term government of Canada bonds today return about 3·6 or 3·7 per cent. What the banks and insurance companies would like is some cake with butter on it, then jam on that, then whipped cream on that, then they want to eat it and then keep it. Well, if the government falls for that sort of nonsense they are going to hear much more about it.

What is the situation so far as the banks are concerned? Some fear was expressed that other investments would suffer if the banks were to enter this mortgage field. I do not consider that at all probable. When this question was asked of Mr. Atkinson:

> Q. What part of your portfolio will suffer most, your bonds or loans?

He said:

> A. It is impossible to say. If no disturbing inflationary pressure comes we are safe in assuming that the Bank of Canada would increase bank reserves to take care of these loans as they come about.

I should love to see these words capitalized. At least the insurance companies are lending money, which in turn they have borrowed, and they are paying interest on it. But not the banks; no. What the banks are going to do is to put, let us say, $30 million into the Bank of Canada. It is true that that $30 million will be immobilized so they will not earn anything on it; but on the basis of that $30 million they can expand their loans to $300 million and get five plus something per cent on it. I never heard such an extraordinary proposition in my life, and in view of that a rate of 5¾ per cent would be shocking. Five and a quarter per cent is the most that they should be offered under any consideration whatsoever.

Let me sum up. It has been said that the effective demand this year is going to be in the neighbourhood of 125,000 houses. I accept that. That has nothing to do with this impending legislation. It is a fact; though the 125,000 houses may disappear like snow in a thaw if people come to the conclusion that times are going to get rather rough or that anything like a depression is to come. Anything of that kind could make effective demand vanish. But what of the situation two or three years from now? We know that the lending institutions are going to lend less, and in any event if they lend as much as they have in the past it will mean fewer houses, because the lending institutions will have to lend $100 where previously they lent $75.

We know the government is going to remove its share of about $60 million from the joint loan section of the act. We know that the banks are cold to this legislation, cold to the point of frigidity, and only social compulsion is going to make them lend anything, but I cannot tell how far social compulsion will work. Over the long run I cannot see more than 7 per cent of construction being financed by the banks through some percentage of the banks' savings deposits being devoted to the building of houses in this country. Then houses for those who really need them are not going to be built, part of the reason of course being the impoverishment of the municipalities in this country.

I said in the committee on one occasion, Mr. Chairman, that this legislation is a rather shoddy piece of wool which is being drawn over the eyes of the Canadian people. I am now convinced I was right.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to add my voice to this debate at this time. At the outset, I want to say that in my experience in this house of over 19 years this committee was one of the most effective I have ever sat on. I say that because the evidence given by the witnesses on all occasions was straightforward. They gave the very best evidence they could. In most instances they did not hesitate to add their own opinions, and because of that it was a very successful committee. They had a difficult problem to deal with, a problem which most of us in this committee and most of the people in the country agree is most disturbing.

Bill No. 102 endeavours to deal with the national housing problem. The government hope that through the medium of this bill they will be able to stimulate house building in the country. I said on another occasion in this house that I did not think the bill would do what the government expect it will do, and I am still of the same opinion. One of the main things upon which the government is basing its hopes is the fact that by bringing the chartered banks into this field a greater amount of money will flow into the construction of houses. I shall speak on that a little later on. The Quebec savings banks are being brought in.

It is possible that with the addition of the chartered banks and the Quebec savings banks some additional money will be found. I suggest to the government at this time that they go one step further and permit the provincial government treasury branches of Alberta to participate as well, on the same conditions. Whether the inclusion of the banks will accomplish what the government hopes remains to be seen. There are some changes in Bill 102 which will have serious effects. One which I would just note for the moment is that this bill will assist people in the income brackets of over $3,000 a year, but I am positive it is not going to increase home ownership by people in the income brackets of less than $3,000 a year. As I said when talking on this bill on another occasion, it is the people in the low income brackets we should concern ourselves with more than those in the higher income brackets. Those in the higher income brackets could participate under the old set-up. I do not think there will be any improvement in that respect under the new bill.

Then there is the provision for a lower down payment, reducing it from $2,000 to $1,400 on a $10,000 house where the lending value is $8,000. That is going to be of some assistance and will permit a few more people to participate in this plan than was the case heretofore. Then there is the longer amortization period of 25 to 30 years. That will reduce the monthly payments but it will increase the indebtedness, and in the long run the ordinary person is going to pay for his house almost double what he would pay if he had the cash to build it himself.

Then there is the possibility—and I use the word "possibility" advisedly—of better inspection. That to my mind is probably the most important point in building a house, outside of financing. It caused probably more trouble in the past than any other single factor. Mr. Mansur was quite frank in his evidence before the committee when he said he was not entirely satisfied with the inspections in the past, but hoped the new bill would bring about some improvement. I do not hesitate to say at this point that I think perhaps the new bill will bring about some improvement in this regard.

Then there will be higher interest rates for the loan companies. That is good for the loan companies, but it is not so good for the people in the lower income brackets. There is a better guarantee for the loan companies, which is charged up to the borrower and for which he gets nothing in return except the privilege of getting a loan.

This brings us to the over-all question of whether this bill will result in stimulating house building. As I said a moment ago, it is hoped that the banks will come to the government's assistance. I should like to refer at this point to the evidence appearing on page 291 of the proceedings of the committee. Some of the sections to which I intend to refer may have been referred to by others, but I think to refer to them again would only serve to bring out the point I wish to bring out. At page 291 of the evidence Mr. Atkinson, vice-president and general manager of the Royal Bank of Canada, who appeared for the mortgage companies and banks concerned, had this to say:

> When it was announced by the Prime Minister on October 1 last and simultaneously advised to the banks on the same day by the Minister of Finance, we had not any prior knowledge that such a move was being considered by the government. As I have intimated, such a move would not, I think, have been sought by the banks, particularly at the present time, when the chartered banks in Canada are relatively fully loaned—certainly in our own case it would not have been sought.

The point I want to make there is that according to Mr. Atkinson the banks are relatively fully loaned. Under the present set-up, therefore, the banks will not be in position to make money available under this plan. I should like to refer to what the minister said on December 16 in dealing with this very point, and I quote from page 998 of Hansard:

> Later in this session my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), will place the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act before the house for revision, when it is proposed to make insured mortgages eligible security for Bank of Canada advances to chartered banks, as is the present position in respect to government bonds.

I do not think I am wrong in assuming that what the Minister of Public Works had in mind then was that more money was going to be made available to the banks, in addition to what they already had, in order to assist in this house building program. If I am not right I hope he will correct me at this moment. That was the interpretation I placed upon it when I was speaking to this measure some time ago. Of course that is not going to be the case. If the minister expects that to be the result he is doomed to disappointment. Mr. Graham Towers was questioned on this very point by the hon. member for Acadia, and I quote from page 246 of the evidence as follows:

> Q. Could you explain just what the provision will be by which additional cash reserves will be made available by the Bank of Canada to chartered banks? Will it be in the form of the purchase of mortgage—or bans against?—A. It won't be in either form, Mr. Quelch. The Bank of Canada, in open market operations in government securities, influences the amount of cash which the banks have. So if we add somewhat to our holdings of securities, as we have in recent times, that puts up bank cash.

The point is that the banks cannot use these insured mortgages to get long-term credits or to increase their cash reserves from the Bank of Canada, and further it will not result in what the minister hopes, because, as Mr. Graham Towers pointed out, if the banks needed money they could use government securities, such as government bonds, and get all the money they needed. But he says, and I have put it on the record already, that the banks are fully loaned, so I am afraid the hopes of the minister are doomed to disappointment. In order to make doubly sure that I am right in this respect I should like to refer to page 270 of the evidence. This has been referred to already, but I refer to it again. Here the hon. member for Eglinton asked this question:

> Q. My next question is this: Have you formed any estimate or are you prepared to express any opinion as to the extent to which you think the banks may be expected, over a period of one year, or over a few years, to use their portfolios of insured mortgage loans as collateral with the Bank of Canada?—A. Oh, I would say very little.
> Q. Within that small area, is it possible?—A. In fact, perhaps I ought to go further than that and say that I would not expect them to use them at all as security unless they thought it was desirable to do so for psychological reasons.

It is not because they need money but for psychological reasons. I agree with that statement.

> Otherwise if they had occasion to borrow funds they would probably put up government bonds because they have plenty of them, and it is a very convenient method of doing it.

Therefore when we are told that under this bill the insured mortgages will be of assistance in financing the construction of homes that is not the case, and the evidence is very clear in that respect.

Mr. Winters: Is the hon. member familiar with section 11 of the bill now before the committee?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Is the minister referring to the section which deals with advances?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes, I am familiar with that; but the trouble is that while the chartered banks might be able to use these insured mortgages for advances from the Bank of Canada that is only for a matter of two or three weeks. I believe the evidence is clear on that point also.

Mr. Winters: Central Mortgage has the right to buy or lend.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I understand the Bank of Canada is not going to buy the insured mortgages. They will buy bonds and they can do that; and if the chartered banks required the money they have sufficient bonds now which they could sell to the Bank of Canada in order to raise their cash reserves to the degree desired. They do not require insured mortgages for that purpose. The only result of the insured mortgage is to give the lender a greater degree of protection than the 25-75 per cent arrangement which was in force before. Now they have 98 per cent. I believe that statement, that the banks will not and do not intend to use the insured mortgages to increase their cash reserves and thereby make more money available for housing, still stands.

We all know that we really require houses in this country, and the extent of this problem has been referred to on other occasions. As I said before Dr. Forsey on behalf of the C.C.L. gave the estimate that the backlog amounted to 300,000 houses and possibly ran as high as 500,000 houses. Mr. Mansur himself suggested that the backlog in his judgment would run to between 75,000 and 200,000.

If we intend or hope that legislation under Bill No. 102 will maintain the pace which was set last year, at around 105,000 starts, then how can we ever hope to overcome that backlog so the people who really need the houses will get them? It will not be possible under this legislation. I think we will be fortunate if this legislation succeeds in maintaining the present pace, without increasing it. I am certain the government intends that this housing scheme will to a large extent assist in meeting the major unemployment problem which faces us at this moment.

I suggest that anyone who takes advantage of this housing legislation will go into debt for 25 or 30 years. Everyone who has already taken advantage of it has gone into debt for a period of 20 or 25 years. That means that unless a policy can be implemented whereby the present unemployment situation will be taken care of, the lending institutions will be faced with the problem of evicting many families. Why? Because they cannot earn sufficient money to pay the monthly charges on the loans they have acquired.

Our biggest concern is not for the people of this country who can afford to build their own houses at the present time, nor are we concerned with those who can afford to pay the high down payments required under this present legislation. Our concern is and should be with those people who cannot afford to come under the housing act, and who have not sufficient income to pay $1,400 as a down payment and then continue to meet high monthly payments over a period of 25 or 30 years.

Dr. Forsey, speaking before the committee, referred to the fact that in June, 1951, about 58 per cent of wage and salary earners were obtaining less than $2,500 per year. This is roughly equivalent today to about $3,000. I would emphasize that point, namely that 58 per cent of our people are in a financial position where they do not obtain more than $3,000 a year. That means that this bill will be of assistance to only 50 per cent of our people.

Speaking in the house not so long ago the minister, referring to this fact, said in effect that not more than one-third of the Canadian people could afford to own or rent homes of their own. I have used that quotation before, and I use it again at this time to demonstrate how closely the remarks of the minister were to the facts which were produced by Dr. Forsey when he represented the C.C.L. before the committee. The words in fact are almost the same, and I believe it is quite safe to say that one-half of our population will not be able to take advantage of the provisions of this bill. I do not think that is good enough.

Let us look at the cost of some of these houses. If we turn to the evidence presented before the committee we find something about this question. These remarks were referred to a moment ago, but I am going to put them on the record again because they fit in with what I am saying. In their submissions the C.C.L. gave this illustration, and I am reading from the bottom of page 336 of the evidence:

> Then there is the question of the down payment and the period of amortization and the mortgage insurance, and so of the total cost. For a $10,000 house, under the present act, this works out as follows:
> Interest: 5¼ per cent, compounded semi-annually.
> Amortization: 20 years.
> Down payment: 20 per cent.
> Monthly payment on $8,000 mortgage: $53.66.
> Total monthly payments: $53.66 x 12 x 20: $12,878.40
> Down payment: 2,000.00
> Total: $14,878.40

Now let us look at the position under the new bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it is five o'clock, and the house must proceed to consideration of private and public bills.

NIAGARA GAS TRANSMISSION LIMITED

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved the second reading of Bill No. 325, to authorize Niagara Gas Transmission Limited to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipe line.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Green: May we have a statement from the sponsor?

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, this is an application by Niagara Gas Transmission Limited, an Ontario company, for authorization to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipe line as defined in the Pipe Lines Act, chapter 211 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, and further, that the general Pipe Lines Act will apply to this company. The issued share capital of this company is owned 65 per cent by the Consumers' Gas Company of Toronto and 35 per cent by the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company. Any further issue of capital stock will be in the same ratio, and the balance of funds required will be obtained through the sale of bonds and/or debentures.

The fact is that the Consumers' Gas Company of Toronto is a limited dividend company, incorporated by a special act of the provincial legislature. After ordinary business expenses, allowance for the plant and buildings renewal fund and directors' fees, any surplus remaining goes into a special surplus account which, when it becomes the equivalent of five cents per thousand cubic feet of the amount of gas sold in the previous year, is used to reduce the price of gas.

This special surplus was wiped out in 1933 following a reduction in the price of gas the previous year.

The company has had two other reserves, one established under the act of 1887 of $1 million, and the other arising from the premium received from shareholders on the sale of the capital stock of the company from time to time. The result of recurring deficits over the last 20 years has been that the reserve arising from the premium on capital stock, which was $7,499,680, was reduced by $6,239,871.

For some years the Consumers' Gas Company of Toronto has been fighting a losing battle and in most of the recent years has been forced to dip into its reserve. The cost of manufactured gas has been so great that this company has been gradually pricing itself out of the market. The Toronto city auditor reports that the earnings on the shareholders' investment were 5·08 per cent in the year ended September 30, 1952.

The company is authorized by the act of 1887 to pay in dividends 10 per cent on the par value, which was then $100 per share. As from the 1st of January, 1941, the company has been paying 8 per cent, or 80 cents on the present par value of $10 per share. The actual return to individual shareholders depends, of course, on the amount paid for the stock, either from the company treasury or in the stock market. The company has not been permitted since about 1928 to issue rights to existing shareholders. Additional stock must be sold either by auction or tender. The average price received for the stock has ranged from $149 in March, 1932, to $201 per $100 share in February, 1937. Thus the premium on the stock is part of the capital investment. In so far as dividends have tended to reduce the reserve created by this premium, the dividends have been a return of capital.

The directors' fees are limited to $25,000 per year in total. This includes the remuneration to the president, who is not a working president. Two of the directors, the vice-president and general manager, and the assistant general manager are full-time employees of the company, and presumably receive salaries commensurate with their duties and responsibilities.

The plant and buildings renewal fund, as shown by the report for the year ended September 30, 1953, stood at $9,869,605, compared with investment in plant and equipment and real estate of $31,835,198. This fund arises from the authority of the company to appropriate each year a total of 5 per cent of the value of plant and buildings, but not real estate or unfinished construction. The company has no other provision for depreciation. At the end of 1952 the fund was approximately 32 per cent of the value of plant, buildings and equipment.

When natural gas reaches Toronto the coal gas plant will be obsolete, and it is understood it will be scrapped. The gas holders as well as the water gas sets and the propane plant will be maintained as stand-by units. The equipment to be abandoned, while not new, is, I understand, carried on the books at several million dollars.

The annual report of Consumers' Gas for the year ended September 30, 1953, stated that sales of gas for the 12 months were lower by 4·6 per cent than for the previous year. This was attributed to milder weather. In the first three months of the current fiscal year —that is, October, November, December— sales were again reduced by 4·52 per cent. However, there was an increase in January due to the fact that the average temperature was 8 degrees lower than for January, 1953. The over-all loss of output for four months was 2 per cent.

The sales department of the company, particularly in the house heating division, is very seriously concerned because it is a fact that gas is too expensive under present conditions. The company was holding its business, but not increasing it, in proportion to the increase in population, up to April, 1952, when a further substantial increase in wages resulted in an over-all increase of 25 per cent in the cost of gas. The new rates were calculated on an expected loss of business; and the fact that the company showed a profit for the first full year under the new rates, the first one in 20 years, is due in fact to the inability of householders to quickly change from one kind of cookstove or other appliance to another.

It is estimated that the franchise area of the company now has a population of 1,300,000. The total number of meters divided into that population shows a population of about eight per meter. In contrast, in 1933, when the population of the area was estimated to be 650,000 the population per meter was four persons. The fact is that the manufactured gas business is a dying business. Wages all the way from the coal mine to meter reading have made the price disproportionately high in comparison with electricity, which is untaxed in this province, and with fuel oil which can be delivered at a much lower labour cost.

The 1953 report of the company showed that there are 5,801 shareholders. The average holding is 251 shares. The percentage owned in Canada is 95 per cent, and of the total number of shareholders 55 per cent are women. A large part of the stock is owned by insurance companies, which accounts for the fact that there are two insurance company presidents on the board of directors: Mr. J. K. Macdonald of the Confederation Life and Mr. Ross Poyntz of the Imperial Life. The city of Toronto is a shareholder to the extent, I believe, of 15,000 shares.

The company's charter provides that so long as the city owns shares to the par value of $10,000 the mayor shall be ex officio a director of the company and entitled to vote the stock or shares held by the city. A curious feature of the company's charter is the provision whereby no shareholder may have more than ten votes, no matter how many shares he owns. The owner of one share has one vote. I think three shares entitle him to two votes. By the time he gets to the ownership of 20 shares, he has ten votes, and no more.

From the foregoing it is obvious that Consumers' need for a reasonably priced and dependable supply of natural gas to replace the present expensive manufactured gas is urgent and immediate. Unfortunately none of the applicants for an export permit from Alberta to eastern Canada has given Consumers' a definite quotation or has indicated conditions of delivery. It is, of course, impossible to estimate probable gas sales, or sales of any other kind for that matter, unless the price of the product to be sold and delivery conditions are known.

Last year the Consumers' Gas Company made a contract with some United States suppliers in Louisiana and Texas for the purchase of 22,600 million cubic feet of natural gas, this to be transferred to the Niagara river, the international boundary, by Tennessee Gas Transmission Company, and from the centre of the Niagara river by Niagara Gas Transmission Limited, the company making application for this act. At the time this company was formed no authority was required under the Pipe Lines Act, and it was not until the amendment at this session that this application was required.

It is believed by Consumers' Gas Company that the purchase of this gas will be of very great benefit to the consumers in the greater Toronto area. It is believed that natural gas will become directly competitive with oil and will probably be competitive with coal. Because of the very high British thermal unit content of natural gas, and because of the degree to which its heat may be controlled, it is believed that many industries will find it more suitable for their purposes than either coal or oil.

The experience of similar cities in the United States has been that over a period of a few years the consumption of gas has doubled, and many industries find it economical to use it with small auxiliary appliances to be turned on at times of peak loads during very cold weather. With the present limited production of electric power it is felt that this will be not only economical but of valuable assistance to the people in areas served by this company.

It should be pointed out that the Consumers' Gas Company of Toronto was incorporated by special act of the province of Ontario, which act has been amended a number of times since. As mentioned above, the salaries of the officers and directors are limited. The mayor of Toronto is automatically one of the directors, the dividends to be paid are limited, and when the reserves reach a certain figure the price of gas must be forthwith reduced. The franchise is exclusive to this company for the city of Toronto and for the townships of Toronto, Toronto-Gore, Etobicoke, Vaughan, North York, York, Markham, East York, Scarborough and Pickering, which area of course now includes such municipalities as Forest Hill, Leaside, Swansea, Mimico, New Toronto, Long Branch and Port Credit.

At the time this contract with the United States suppliers and the further contract with Tennessee Gas Transmission Company were made, application was forthwith made to the federal power commission of the United States and authorization was granted for the export from the United States to Canada of this gas. Naturally at that time it was not known that a Canadian pipe line would be built from Alberta to Ontario and Qnebec. Accordingly it was not realized that it might be considered that this contract for United States natural gas might be depriving a Canadian pipe line of one of its major customers. However, a contract has now been made between Tennessee Gas Transmission Company and Consumers' Gas Company of Toronto whereby over the period of the 20-year contract between Consumers' Gas and the United States suppliers, Tennessee Gas Transmission Company will purchase all or any of this gas at any time. This latter contract was made so that if Canadian natural gas is brought to Toronto the Consumers' Gas Company can purchase Canadian gas and dispose of the United States gas for which they have contracted, without any loss to Consumers' Gas.

It is not known at this time how this Canadian gas is to be handled in the province of Ontario and whether a provincial authority will be used for its disposal, but Consumers' Gas Company of Toronto is now in the position that, upon this act being passed and assuming approval by the board of transport commissioners, they will be able to supply the greater Toronto area with cheap natural gas before the end of this year, and if and when Canadian natural gas becomes available they will be in a position, without loss to themselves on the United States contract, to switch to Canadian natural gas. It is felt, therefore, that the passing of this bill will be of great, immediate and long-term advantage to the Toronto area, and will fit into the Canadian over-all plan to the general benefit of Canada.

It is of course clear to all members of the house that the passing of this act is the embryonic stage in the building of this pipe line. Evidence must still be adduced before the board of transport commissioners showing public convenience and necessity, and to have the location and construction approved. In addition, the company will have to satisfy all provincial legislative requirements and regulations.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, what has been explained to us has dealt largely with the immediate requirements of the city of Toronto and the importance of an early supply of natural gas for that large city which is now embraced in the metropolitan organization that has been set up. I submit there is a great deal more to this situation than has been mentioned so far. I am not disagreeing with the facts or figures put forward by the hon. member who is presenting the bill, but I do believe there are very important details which should be in the minds of all members in dealing with the measure now before us.

As has been explained, the bill authorizes the construction of a gas transmission pipe line for the purpose of carrying to the outskirts of the city of Toronto a supply of natural gas from Tennessee, which would then be distributed in the metropolitan area of Toronto by the Consumers' Gas Company. This gas would originate in Tennessee and would flow into a new pipe line to be constructed under the authority of the charter that would be granted by this measure, and then into the servicing lines of the Toronto system.

It has been mentioned already that this in fact is expected to be a temporary arrangement. It was stated the day before yesterday by Mr. A. R. Crozier, the fuel controller of the province of Ontario, that it is expected that within two years there will be a pipe line from western Canada carrying Alberta natural gas to the Toronto field as well as to other parts of eastern Canada.

What is important is the understanding very clearly expressed by Mr. Crozier, the Ontario fuel controller, and the Ontario minister of mines, to whose department Mr. Crozier is attached, that when western gas becomes available the flow will then be reversed through the pipe line to be constructed under the authority of this act, and Canadian gas will be carried to that area in Ontario through which the pipe line will pass coming from Niagara Falls. This, I think, is clearly understood. However, it should be remembered in considering this measure that in expressing their belief that it is desirable that authority be granted for the construction of this pipe line, the Ontario minister of mines and the Ontario fuel controller have both made it clear that this is related to an unqualified condition that this area will be available and will be supplied by gas from western Canada when the Canadian pipe line is constructed.

That being the case, I think we must consider the position in which we find ourselves in dealing with this measure. It is a simple bill of two sections giving general authority to Niagara Gas Transmission Limited to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipe line. There are no details as to where the pipe line will be constructed but it is understood by everyone that it will run from the Niagara Falls area to the outskirts of the city of Toronto.

A bill of this kind became necessary as a result of the amendment to the Pipe Lines Act which became law on December 16 last, which required a company to be authorized by a special act of parliament before constructing or operating an extra-provincial pipe line as defined in the amendment. We must remember that whatever is proposed by Ontario or Quebec or any other provincial government is subject to the interprovincial and international authority of the federal government in matters of this kind.

For that reason I feel this government should insist upon an unqualified undertaking that with the construction of an all-Canadian pipe line to eastern Canada, this gas from western Canada, which would then become available, would be used in the area that would be supplied by the pipe line to be constructed under the authority of the proposed measure now before us. I feel it is appropriate that the government give us the assurance that such a condition will be insisted upon during the course of the debate on second reading.

There is more to the measure than simply the construction of a pipe line. There is the broad pattern of the use of natural gas in this country which we cannot deal with in airtight compartments, and which must be regarded as part of the whole mosaic of construction throughout the whole of Canada.

I have seen statements made, even in the past few days, which suggest there is still in the minds of some people the thought that it is economically unwise to construct an all-Canadian pipe line. I have seen the suggestion that this would create a situation that would be unfair to the producers in Alberta. I hope anything that may be said here will be said with the acceptance of the basic proposition that as Canadians we are having full regard for the future economic welfare of the producers in Alberta and the people of that province, just as we are having regard for the people of eastern Canada who may be served by this project.

In dealing with this subject when that time comes—and this is not the time when the details of this problem can be dealt with—I think we should at all times remember that the price to be paid for natural gas in Alberta should be one that is fair to the producer, that will encourage new exploration and development, and that will afford to those who have risked their capital the reasonable expectation of profit which, in a country that fortunately still supports in the majority a system of free enterprise, will encourage the development there.

No question need arise in connection with this proposal as to the problem of export of gas from Canada or import from the United States. The supplies are enormous, according to the report of the petroleum and natural gas conservation board of Alberta dated November 24 last. It was estimated then that the reserve of natural gas already established in that province as of June 30, 1953, amounted to 11·5 trillion cubic feet. It is established with reasonable certainty that new wells will add at least 3 trillion additional cubic feet each year. These are astronomical figures. Taking those figures and dividing them by the demand that might be reasonably expected, it is expected that they will meet the demands of the local market, the markets of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec who will be very large consumers of that gas, for some time to come.

It may well be that the figures will be higher as time goes on. The figures, however, already established with a high degree of certainty make it clear that the demands of all the provinces to the east, including Ontario and Quebec, can be supplied, and that in addition there can be a substantial export of gas to the United States. For that reason there has been an arrangement under which the company which sought permission to export to the United States has combined its activities with those of the company that applied for permission to build the all-Canadian route. The result of this agreement is that the present plans contemplate an all-Canadian pipe line through the prairie provinces into Ontario and Quebec, as well as a branch pipe line south from Winnipeg to supply the Minneapolis area in the United States. With the added supplies, the amount available for eastern Canada and the United States will doubtless increase.

I mention this now because it is to be hoped that in the consideration of the measure now before us there will be no opposition to the bill on the grounds that it involves importation into Canada from the United States, or any suggestion that in the over-all plans now under consideration there is any objection to that measure of export which can be assured once our own future demands are protected. I would hope that in dealing with this we would have the assurance of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that it is the intention of the government, with its wide powers over these matters, to insist that the construction of this pipe line carries with it the definite understanding, and in fact the undertaking, that when Canadian gas becomes available and the local market develops as a result of the supply of gas from Tennessee sources, then the market will be supplied by Canadian companies.

I mention that for a definite reason. There are those who believe it is absolutely necessary that a very large consuming area in Toronto and the surrounding districts be part of the area supplied by western Canada if the financing of that development is to be a practical possibility. Concern is also felt by some that this proposal might in some way endanger the construction of the all-Canadian line, unless the most rigid assurances are given. To indicate that this is no idle concern may I mention something I noticed in a quarterly publication called The Heartland, which is published in Washington. I have before me the edition for the fall of 1953. In referring to this development of a pipe line from the Niagara district to Toronto, which would carry Tennessee gas into Toronto, I find on page 50 this statement:

> This development is taken to mean the death knell of the all-Canadian project so dear to the federal officials in Ottawa.

I immediately concede that a statement of that kind has no bearing on the prospects; I merely mention it to indicate that there are those who do hold the opinion that this might endanger the construction of the all-Canadian line. I would also point out that this statement was made some months ago, before the statement had been made about the over-all plan for a Canadian pipe line which embraces the combined activities of the two companies which were mainly concerned with this problem.

In dealing with this we should all be assured the government has decided definitely that, subject to the availability of financial resources for that purpose, the all-Canadian route will be encouraged, and the encouragement of that route will not be adversely affected by the support of the measure now before us. I do not think we can look at this measure alone without looking at the whole proposal. This is the time for us to decide that not only in the use of gas but in the use of our other natural resources the first consideration in every case will be the development of Canada and the employment of those resources to provide more work for Canadians here in Canada.

There can be no reasonable objection to that proposal by anyone living in the United States. After all, the United States built its great wealth and its great strength upon that basic proposition. They would be the last who could reasonably complain if we adopted the very same policy which was at the root of their rapid and impressive development during those past centuries.

When we have said that let us always make it clear that this does not carry with it any suggestion, such as is sometimes made, that we are refusing to deal on a fair and equitable basis with our friends in the United States. That would be unreasonable; it would be unsound; it would be contrary to the future interests of our country. Nevertheless we must remember that as we encourage immigration we are encouraging new demands for work at a time when there are those who are already looking for work in Canada. It is doubly important that we should remember that everyone who comes to Canada is also looking for a chance to work. It does seem inconsistent to me that we should encourage and accept as new citizens of Canada people who need work, while at the same time we export any resources which could more economically be used here, because the exportation of resources is not merely the export of some physical commodity; it is the export of work itself. As we encourage new working hands to join with us in building the greater Canada of tomorrow, it is surely wise for us to be certain that we keep within Canada whatever sources of employment are required to give work to these new Canadians on their arrival.

This proposal is related, and directly related, to other measures which have been before us at different times in the past two years. Long debates have taken place in this house on pipe lines in the past. Quite frankly, those debates were for the purpose of keeping those bills before this house so the need for a truly all-Canadian policy on this subject should be established. I know that on the other side of the house there was a great deal of resentment that those private measures, which were in fact government bills for all practical purposes, were held so long in this house before being passed. Nevertheless, it is significant that out of those debates there has emerged the Canada-first policy which was advocated by the members of this party. We made it clear that in those extended debates, which it would perhaps not be inappropriate to describe as filibusters, the one purpose was to use the right of debate to insist by every means within the power of the opposition that the interests of Canadians be given first consideration before we agreed to the export of this or other resources from Canada.

The debates on this subject began with the oil pipe line. I have no hesitation in saying that I still regret the decision of the government to support the construction of an oil pipe line south of the great lakes before we were assured of an all-Canadian pipe line. Nevertheless I am not going to renew the debate on that matter. However, I would point out that some of the warnings were justified. That line was constructed to carry oil to Superior, Wisconsin, from which port the oil could be carried by tankers to the Canadian refineries at Sarnia. However, it was only a short time after the oil pipe line to Superior was completed that the next step was taken and the pipe line was extended through the United States south of the great lakes and then back into Canada at Sarnia.

I do not believe for one moment that this intention was not in the minds of those who constructed that pipe line in the first place. I think that intention should have been disclosed to us. I am not making the statement that the government withheld information in their possession, but I am making the statement that I do not believe that those who constructed the pipe line so suddenly changed their minds after it had been constructed to Superior.

However, I agree with the statement that there is a difference between the transmission of oil and the transmission of gas. Gas can be carried only by pipe line; oil can be carried not only by pipe line but by tankers and tank cars. Therefore oil is more easily moved to different places than gas. I think it is certain that unless the gas pipe line is constructed through Canada we will be denied any advantages of the use of that gas in the area through which that pipe line would pass, which would not otherwise be served if it were to pass south of the great lakes. I mention this now because I believe it is a consideration in support of my request that the government assure us that in supporting this measure we have the right to do so in the belief that appropriate steps will be taken to make sure that the market developed in the metropolitan area of Toronto as a result of this will be available to the suppliers of Canadian gas when that pipe line is completed in two years, as we hope it will be.

Sometimes this subject is discussed as though you could deal with it only on the basis of dollars and cents in determining the economic factors which should be borne in mind in reaching a decision. Mr. Chairman, the difference in cost, which has been estimated variously to be in the neighbourhood of $25 million, is something which should not be left to stand alone when considering what the effect would be of building this pipe line through Canada the whole way.

If the pipe line were to be built south of the great lakes presumably it would go south at some point near Winnipeg. You would have half of a pipe line costing in the neighbourhood of $300 million being built in the United States. That money would go to workmen in the United States. It would go for the purchase of land in the United States. It would go for supplies in the United States. It must be perfectly obvious to everyone that we would lose a great deal more than $25 million by the route passing into the United States and returning to Canada at some point in eastern Ontario. When I say eastern Ontario I am speaking of the Sarnia area which is in fact eastern Ontario, although it is sometimes called western Ontario.

The advantages of this construction should not be regarded as selfish advantages desired by people living in any particular community; nevertheless let us look at what would happen. If this gas was transmitted by a Canadian route instead of going south of the lakes it would pass through such cities as Kenora, Fort William, Port Arthur, Sault Ste. Marie, Sudbury and North Bay. There would be feeder lines into other areas in northern Ontario. It would then pass on to serve the Toronto area, the Montreal area, southwestern Ontario, eastern Ontario and those parts of Quebec which would receive service from feeder lines. The possible use of gas throughout that area is tremendous. Unless there were diversions of gas from this United States pipe line at different points, there would be nothing to equal the demand that would be created by those very active and important communities which would be using gas from this pipe line.

New demands are emerging almost every day. They are dramatic, they are romantic. For example, we have all been reading the dramatic story of the new discovery of metal in the Manitouwadge area in Ontario. Already it is estimated by the Ontario department of mines that there would be a daily demand of ten million cubic feet of gas a day in that area alone, which was nothing but bush only a short time ago. It is estimated also that there would be a demand of ten million cubic feet a day at Cobalt in Ontario and Noranda in Quebec. Similar demands would be expected in these other communities.

The history of the use of power of this kind, whether it be gas, oil or electricity, is that the consumption multiplies far beyond the estimates of the most optimistic at the time the original arrangements are made. I have seen what happened in Ontario in the use of hydroelectric energy. There is no reason to expect other than that the use of natural gas as a source of power for industry as well as for domestic fuel for the home owner will multiply far beyond the original expectations, in the same way as in the case of electricity and oil. That being the case, we may expect that the first use of gas in these areas will create new uses and new demands. All this will be lost, not only to those areas that would have this advantage but to those carrying the gas to eastern Canada, unless that route is followed.

I think this bill is part of what I referred to earlier as a great mosaic of development of a new source of fuel and power in Canada. I hope it will be regarded by the members of this house as part of that mosaic. However, can we have an assurance that it is part of that mosaic, and that in offering support of this measure we do so with the assurance that there is no wavering in the declaration of policy in regard to an all-Canadian gas pipe line?

I do not believe it would be right to pass from this discussion now without commending those who so persistently and for so long have fought for this policy. This policy has been stated, and we can say without boasting that this was the policy we advocated from the beginning, and continued to advocate over long weeks and months. I hope we will have the assurance now by the one minister who is in a position to give that assurance that this bill with its two sections does not stand alone. I hope we can have the assurance that the great possibilities in the development of an all-Canadian route, with full consideration for the rights and expectations of the producers in Alberta as well as the consumers in eastern Canada, will be part and parcel of the decision we make in approving this bill.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will say at once I believe there is no substantial difference between the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and myself as to what we hope to do in serving Ontario and Quebec with natural gas.

I think, though, I should at once correct one misconception. The Leader of the Opposition asked the government to give assurances that if this bill passed certain things would happen. I would like to point out to him that by an act of this parliament the importation of gas across the international boundary was brought under the provisions of the Pipe Lines Act. Prior to that legislation the government had no authority whatever to control the importation of gas from the United States, as he knows. The Pipe Lines Act, before it was amended, provided for gas moved across provincial boundaries, but perhaps through an oversight it did not provide for the movement of gas across the international boundary.

However, this is a private member's bill asking for the incorporation of a company to build a pipe line. No import permit is required to do so and if parliament passes this bill the government as such would have no control over the situation. It is true that the bill must go to the board of transport commissioners, which, as hon. members know, is a judicial board. I sincerely hope the board of transport commissioners will be seized with the long-range problem of bringing gas to Ontario and Quebec, and will measure the effect of the application made under this bill with regard to the over-all results.

I would emphasize, however, that once this bill is passed the machinery operates as set out in the Pipe Lines Act, and no further federal government authority of any kind is required. If the board of transport commissioners should decide that no regard should be paid to the situation brought about by plans to bring gas from western Canada, the government would be powerless to intervene.

Having said that I would point out that I am not opposing the second reading of this bill. I believe that if a responsible company desires to build a pipe line for a purpose which is in the interests of Canada or any section thereof, then the incorporation should be granted. But I believe it is the duty of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, to which this bill will be referred, to bring the interested parties before it in order to deal with the points raised by the Leader of the Opposition, which are certainly most important, and to report to the house its findings based on what it learns from an examination of the bill. I have no doubt the committee will wish to see the contract for gas which would be implemented through the building of this pipe line, and that it will also wish to make sure that the Toronto area is reserved for natural gas from the west.

The incorporators of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited have embarked on the largest operation of this kind ever undertaken. It is a project which will adequately supply gas to the fuel-starved areas of Ontario and Quebec. In regard to this great national project it is my desire, and I am sure the desire of every hon. member of this house, to see that nothing intervenes in the meantime which would jeopardize the success of that project.

Strangely enough I have never received any communication from the incorporators of this bill. I have read letters addressed to me in advertisements in the press, but I have never had a letter laid on my desk which was signed by anyone connected with the Consumers' Gas Company. I must say I did not read these letters very carefully because I do not care to be addressed through the public press, but it seems to me an extraordinary complex must exist in certain sections of Ontario, when people prefer to address a minister of the crown in that fashion. However, I do not resent that particularly. I merely wish to emphasize that I know very little about the plans of the incorporators of this bill.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) but I do not believe he will question the fact that those interested in this project were here in Ottawa discussing this matter.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Not with me; never with me.

Mr. Drew: I think the Acting Prime Minister will agree they were here. I happened to see some of them myself.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have seen them here also, but they have never discussed the subject either with me or any member of my department. A year or so ago Colonel Bishop came to see me about the matter and we discussed the situation in a general way; but ever since then, as I say, all I have seen were letters addressed to me through advertisements in the press. I have never talked to any of the officers of the company face to face.

I would like to give my views on the situation in some detail, but meantime I would ask that the debate be adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) the debate was adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): At eight o'clock the house will resume consideration of the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF NEW LEGISLATION TO INSURE APPROVED LENDERS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 102, to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of housing and building conditions—Mr. Winters—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, at five o'clock I had just put on the record the cost of building a house under the present act over a 20-year period of amortization. That appeared at page 336 of the evidence. I wish now to turn to page 337, the following page, and put on record the cost of building a house.

Under the new bill, with interest at the probable rate of 5½ per cent, the cost works out as follows:
Interest: 5½ per cent, compounded semi-annually.
Amortization: 25 years.
Down payment: 10 per cent on the first $8,000: $800
30 per cent on the other $2,000: $600
Monthly payment on $8,772 mortgage (includes 2 per cent insurance): $53.55
Total monthly payments: $53.55 x 12 x 25 $16,065.00
Down payment 1,400.00
Total 17,465.00
With a 30-year amortization period, the monthly payment is $49.47, which brings the total cost to $19,209.20.

You will notice there, Mr. Chairman, that the cost of $9,209.20 is due entirely to a financial charge. That figure is almost equal to the original cost of the house. It seems to me that in itself is evidence that the financial cost of erecting one of these houses is out of all proportion, having regard to what the people can afford to pay. When I said a while ago that two-thirds of the people of Canada—using the minister's own words—were not in a position to own or rent homes of their own, I think this is the answer to it.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

If we can get around that difficulty or if we can devise some means whereby we can bring down the financial cost—

Mr. Winters: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit me to interrupt at this point. He has used that illustration on one or two occasions. What I meant was to own new accommodation or pay an economic rental for new rental accommodation.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I did not catch the first part of that explanation.

Mr. Winters: It applied to new accommodation.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): To provide new accommodation. I do not think there is any material difference between what the minister had in mind and what I have in mind. Let us take the fact that only one-third of our people can afford new homes or can afford to rent houses at the ordinary rate of rent. That still is the same picture. It is deplorable when we consider that two-thirds of our people will be unable to take advantage of this legislation, even under the new bill. I think that fact should have some bearing on the type of legislation we bring in.

I should like to refer again to page 161 of the evidence taken before the committee in order to draw a comparison. This was during Mr. Mansur's evidence, and I refer to appendix "D". He gives examples here of payments on a house costing $10,000, including land $1,000; taxes estimated at $200; loan, $8,772, including fee of $172; gross debt service ratio 23 per cent. With the interest rate at 2 per cent for 25 years—and that is the one I want to refer to—the monthly payment would be $37.15 and the yearly income required would be $2,808. That is at the rate of 2 per cent. I use the 25-year period because I think that length of amortization period will be the one generally used.

If we come down the column we come to the interest rate of 5½ per cent, and I am using that one; I am assuming that the probable rate of interest will be 5½ per cent. At 5½ per cent, on a 25-year amortization, the monthly payment would be $53.54 and the yearly income required would be $3,663. According to the figures I have used, Mr. Chairman, I think it is evident—since over 58 per cent of our people earn less than $3,000 a year—that under this plan as proposed two-thirds of the people of Canada will not be able to participate because the carrying charges are so extremely high.

Mr. Philpott: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. Philpott: I am surprised to note that the hon. member makes no reference whatever to two sections of the act which provide for co-operation in large scale building of rental projects. Section 36, for instance, provides up to $50 million.

An hon. Member: That is not a question; that is a speech.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What is the hon. member's question? The hon. member is right. I have not referred to the co-operative housing section yet, and I would be quite out of order if I did so. I am now dealing with home ownership, and this does not apply to the co-operative section. I shall have something to say about co-operative housing when we arrive at it, and that will be when that section comes before us as we discuss the sections of the bill. I have not overlooked it by any manner of means.

On other occasions in this chamber I have proposed a plan which I think would solve the problem. I may be wrong. This Social Credit party which sponsors that plan may be wrong, but at least we have offered something, and I have not heard any other proposition offered today. I therefore want to repeat the one that we have persisted in offering. I am speaking now of making money available to people at 2 per cent.

Mr. Ellis: That is C.C.F. policy.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): No; that is not C.C.F. policy.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The C.C.F. have just adopted the policy which we suggested. I am sure they are becoming enlightened. For that fact I am indeed grateful.

From the figures I put on the record a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, you will see that it is possible to build a house, charging 2 per cent interest, and come within the bracket of $3,000 or less. In fact, as I said a moment ago, it would be $2,808. When the bill we have before us will not take care of that class of people, it seems to me that something in addition to what we are doing under Bill No. 102 should be contemplated by the government.

This suggestion as to 2 per cent interest is not new. There is on the statute books under the title of the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act a law which permits money to be loaned to municipalities at 2 per cent. We in Alberta have been practising that principle in self-liquidating projects, where the province lends money to municipalities at 2 per cent to create the so-called self-liquidating projects which could be used for servicing land.

If the provincial government can do it, it does not seem to me that it would be such an impossible task for the federal government to do the same thing. It would take but little adjustment in the wording of the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, which deals with self-liquidating projects, to put housing on a self-liquidating basis as well. I do not see what difference there is between calling the installation of a water system or an electric light system a self-liquidating project and calling a housing project a self-liquidating project. Over a period of time the loan is paid off, and as the money is repaid it is put into the revolving fund and can be used again.

Under the present legislation the down payment is $1,400. I would suggest that under a revolving fund plan established by the government the down payment could be set at at least $500. I use the figure of $500 because I think if a person is going to build a home he should have a fairly substantial equity in it when it is started, and in my opinion $500 would be sufficient. Then when he and his family started to live in the house his equity would increase every month, and that would be an encouragement to take proper care of the premises.

One of the biggest difficulties we have had under the National Housing Act, which was admitted by Mr. Mansur, has to do with supervising construction and the detailed management of the corporation. Inspection has been one of the things that have caused the greatest trouble. I think the municipalities should have that responsibility. The only part the federal government should play is to see that the money is made available at 2 per cent, that there is proper backing from the municipalities and provincial governments, and that the houses are built according to the plans and specifications. An inspector is all that is required in that field, and I think there would be much greater satisfaction than exists now.

As I said a moment ago, if the federal government refuses to accept this proposal, at least it could extend the same privileges to those people who are unable to come under this legislation, the class of people to whom the minister himself referred, those with incomes of $3,000 a year or less.

There is a good deal more that I should like to say. An hon. member on the other side of the house mentioned a while ago the construction of houses under a co-operative plan, I should also like to speak on subsidized low rental housing. No matter how low the down payment or the monthly payments may be, there is a class of people who just cannot qualify. There is a class of people who for one reason or another never will desire to own their own homes. Circumstances control that situation as far as they are concerned. In that case I think we would have to go beyond my proposal of a revolving fund or the provisions of the bill now before us, and definitely enter the field of subsidized low rental houses. I should like to speak on that if time would permit. I do not have time to deal with these matters now but I shall reserve the privilege of speaking on them when the various clauses of the bill are before the committee.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Chairman, a few weeks ago I had the privilege of telling the house that the present legislation involved a fair and middle of the road course. The legislation has now come back from the banking and commerce committee and I still am of the same opinion. But at the same time I think it is my privilege and my duty to draw the attention of the house to certain recommendations I made at that time which for some reason the banking and commerce committee has not seen fit to adopt. I refer to the scope of the National Housing Act. I think the act in itself is national in scope, but it should also be national in its application.

When speaking early in January I suggested that the down payment should be uniform at 10 per cent for all categories of houses, not only for housing costing $8,000. I merely made a simple statement at that time, but today I should like to amplify it and give the house the reasons which led me to make this recommendation. During the debate an hon. member from the province of Quebec asked that loans should be made for the benefit of the large families of Quebec. I should like to correct this statement, because I do not believe Quebec is the only province in Canada that has large families. I do not believe large families are only a matter of creed, religion or race. I can cite from history, for example, the case of George III and Queen Charlotte. They had 15 children. So I say that under the housing act we should as far as possible give everybody the privilege of borrowing the amount of money they need to build a home that will suit their own purposes.

A man with three children will need a greater loan than $8,000, because if he does build a home worth $8,000 he is building a slum house. I regret that the banking and commerce committee has not seen fit to take this fact into consideration. We speak of immigration and enlarging our population, but I think we should take care of our human capital at home because our human capital is most vital and important. I have no objection to bringing immigrants to this country; they can become very good Canadian citizens. But at the same time I think we should see that our Canadian families have the possibility of expanding. I think we should let nature take its course. That may seem a humorous remark to the house, nevertheless I think it has a social bearing. I believe it is my duty to again draw the attention of the house to this matter.

In the second place, I wish to state that there is also an economic reason. If we grant loans on houses and give preference to $8,000 homes, we are creating a market for $8,000 homes. If we build too many $8,000 homes under present circumstances the housing market in Canada will not have the diversity which is needed in any commercial market. I do not think a manufacturer who produced only size eight stockings or gave preference to that size just because he had machinery for that size of stocking would be able to compete in the market. This same argument applies in the housing field.

I should like to make a few remarks on the application of the National Housing Act. I said in January I was glad to see this bill before the house because I believed it would solve the problem of housing where the old act failed. I can say now, and I shall repeat it in this house, that the old act failed in my constituency to the extent of about 80 per cent of the population. Why was that so? It was simply because the joint loans which were made through the finance companies were left entirely in the hands of the finance companies. If they did not wish to lend in one community or another, then those communities were denied the benefits of the act.

Under the new bill, and I must bring this to the attention of the house, the people of Canada will ultimately be footing the bill if foreclosures occur. For this reason, I feel that we should give every Canadian and every region in this country the opportunity to get loans. In the international field this country has seen fit to give grants under the Colombo plan. Well, I agree with that. On the other hand, I do not feel there should be any underprivileged regions in Canada. I should like, therefore, to see this act applied in such a way that all regions are given a fair chance to get loans. If the act is applied properly by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and if the lending institutions refuse loans in certain regions, then I advocate that the government step in and say that loans must be made in every town in this country. Then we would have a National Housing Act applied nationally. That is what I am asking here tonight. I should like to see fair play for all Canadians.

After all, the principle of no taxation without representation does not find its full expression merely because a constituency has a member sitting in this house. It finds its full expression through the benefits which the whole population derive from that taxation. If the people of Canada as a whole are going to foot the bill in case of foreclosures, they should be given an opportunity of obtaining loans under this National Housing Act. There should be no underprivileged regions.

In closing, I recommend that these few remarks be taken into consideration, and I thank the government for whatever steps are taken to see that all the people get a fair chance to get loans under this act.

Mr. Thatcher: I was rather interested in the remarks of the hon. member who just took his seat. I feel that he expressed some of the doubts which many of us have about the bill which is before us. I should like to invite him, a little later, to vote against the bill, as no doubt I shall.

The main purpose of this legislation, as I understand it, is to try to find a method of easing Canada's housing shortage. Some weeks ago, along with the hon. member for Nanaimo, I voted against the motion for second reading of this bill. I did so because I was convinced that it was not an effective answer to our housing difficulties. After sitting in the banking and commerce committee during a substantial number of meetings I am even more convinced of that fact today.

What is the housing situation in Canada at the moment? I think all hon. members would agree there is a very heavy backlog of housing because of the depression and the war years. As a matter of fact, the housing shortage continues to be desperately acute. Mr. Mansur, the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation summed it up in one sentence, in this way. He said, at page 88 of the committee evidence, that "starting from 1948, I think the effective demand is higher today than at any other time". We, as members, I suppose must assume that this legislation is the government's answer to that present demand.

Surely in evaluating this bill tonight, whether we sit on the government or on the opposition side, we should ask ourselves one question. Will this legislation ease the acute housing shortage in Canada? Will this bill give housing to the people who need it? It seems to me there are a number of weaknesses in the legislation which could make it virtually ineffective. I hope this will not prove to be the case, but I fear it will.

In the first place, so far as I can see this bill will do nothing to provide housing for those in the lower income groups. Mr. Mansur placed some very interesting evidence before the committee at page 161 of the proceedings. He put on the record several tables. The first table shows that to build a $10,000 house and amortize it over a 20-year period with interest at 5·5 per cent, a man must have an income of $4,002. If we look at the figures which the Department of National Revenue puts out, in its report "Taxation statistics for 1952", we find that 85·4 per cent of Canadian wage earners in that year did not earn $4,000. In other words, if we do not count the income of wives only 15 per cent of Canadian wage earners could qualify under this act to build a $10,000 house.

If we take a $12,000 house—and many people with children would have to build a $12,000 house with the extra bedrooms—we find that Mr. Mansur's statement shows that with interest at 5·5 per cent a person must have an income of $4,686. In the year I mentioned, 90 per cent of Canadian wage earners did not earn that amount. I suggest, therefore, that only 10 per cent of Canadian wage earners could qualify to build a $12,000 home under those circumstances. Thus, as I see it, the first weakness in this legislation is that it will do nothing to bring home ownership to the vast working class that really needs it.

In the second place, if I interpret this legislation correctly we have no assurance that even if the bill passes, the mortgage funds available for housing will increase. It was pointed out this afternoon that as soon as this bill passes the government will cease making joint loans. Thus there will be approximately $60 millon which was available last year from this source that will not be available this year. In other words, in this bill the government is abandoning what little responsibility it did have in the field of house financing. Mr. Mansur pointed out fairly clearly, as did Mr. Bryden of the insurance companies, that in the coming year Canadian insurance companies will have smaller amounts of mortgage funds available for housing than they had in past years. Therefore this legislation is designed, I suppose, to more or less take up the slack, to make bank deposits available for long-term housing loans. Mr. Speaker, we should realize that this is only permissive legislation. We have no assurance that the banks will make available the amount of money we need for adequate housing.

In his evidence Mr. Atkinson, vice-president and general manager of the Royal Bank made it very clear that the banks did not regard housing as a suitable field for investment. Time and again the banks have told us that they are already fully "loaned" and that they have not large sums available for housing mortgages. Thus I say this legislation gives no assurance that the banks will lend the amount of mortgage money required. It is very clear that the banks themselves are dubious about this legislation.

In the third place, I suggest that this bill will do nothing to provide cheaper houses. Certainly in my constituency, and I presume in others, one of the main obstacles to a man becoming the owner of a house is the very high cost. Under this new plan housing is going to be much more expensive than it was under the old plan. Under the new plan, for instance, the purchaser must pay a premium for insuring the loan. That will amount to 2 per cent of the mortgage. If the mortgage is $10,000 that amount will be approximately $200. Moreover, the lower down payment, the extended amortization period and the higher housing interest rate are going to force the prospective owner to pay more for his house in the long run.

I should like to compare the cost of the same house built under the old plan and the new plan. For example, let us take a $10,000 house. Under the old plan the down payment was 20 per cent, the interest rate 5¼ per cent, and the amortization period 20 years. Under the old plan the total cost was $2,000 down, $8,000 principal, $4,878 interest. Under the new plan the down payment will be $1,000; the interest rate at least 5½ per cent—it may be 5¾ per cent; we have not been told yet—the amortization period 25 years. The total cost could be $1,000 down; $9,000 principal; $7,482 interest. I have compounded the interest semi-annually in both cases. In other words, an identical house built under the new plan is going to cost the purchaser, by the time he owns the title, roughly $2,600 more than it would cost him under the old plan. I suggest that is not a very satisfactory answer to the nation's housing needs.

There is one other aspect of this bill which I do not like. Even if the banks can find adequate funds, they may do so only by taking those funds from somewhere else. Such a diversion might make it more difficult for farmers in eastern and western Canada to obtain funds from the banks at a time when they need them urgently. The banks might also be forced to tighten up on industrial and commercial loans. In other words, I maintain that this legislation is not the answer to Canada's housing problem.

Even if the bill passes new houses will still be beyond the reach of the average Canadian family. Under this legislation the interest rate is excessive, the over-all costs are too high, and the income qualifications are too severe. In my opinion this legislation is little more than a mirage to the vast majority of would-be house owners.

Mr. Blackmore: That is right.

Mr. Thatcher: Under this legislation the government is passing the housing buck to Canadian banks, and the banks understandably are reluctant to receive it. They are not enthused about being made the goat. The bill is unsatisfactory and inadequate, and I shall continue to vote against it at every stage, if further votes are called. We in the C.C.F. still believe that the present housing problem in Canada can only be solved by the marshalling of public funds to complement private construction.

(Translation):

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Chairman, the evidence heard during the sittings of the banking and commerce committee has not only been very interesting but it has enabled us to appreciate the great service rendered by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to the Canadian people.

The associations that have been called upon to do business with the corporation have been pleased to recognize that they have always obtained useful and frank co-operation from the corporation.

There is no doubt that the benefits of the new legislation will be appreciated by citizens in a position to take advantage of them, that is, people earning $3,600 and over per year. I am in favour of the present bill because it is absolutely necessary in spite of its shortcomings. I would like however to call the hon. minister's attention to the need of helping family heads earning less than $3,000 per year. In that connection it might be advantageous to copy the Quebec family housing act and grant a rebate of interest to the borrower.

The housing problem is a highly social matter and, in my opinion, those who are less fortunate should be looked after first, because they are the ones most in need of help and protection. To save a few hundred dollars, most workers must toil and make sacrifices for several years. It is practically impossible for them to meet the conditions prescribed by the present legislation.

In my constituency, particularly in the city of Chicoutimi and the town of Port Alfred, farsighted and courageous men, moved by an extraordinary civic spirit, have succeeded, through hard work, will power, steadfastness and in spite of many obstacles, in organizing housing co-operatives, the results of which are now the pride and beauty of those towns. It is the duty of the government to stimulate that kind of activity and to contribute to its development.

Those are, Mr. Chairman, the few remarks I wanted to make in connection with this bill.

(Text):

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): In the first place it must be said that it is rather regrettable the government saw fit to bring this bill back to the house before the minutes of the final meeting of the banking and commerce committee on the bill were made available to all hon. members. However, in the minutes that hon. members now have in their possession we have perhaps a basis for discussing the actual realities with regard to this bill.

I have always regretted that I was out of the house at the time the Minister of Public Works made his speech with regard to the criticisms of this bill by members of the opposition. Of course since that time I have had an opportunity of reading his speech, and I must congratulate him upon it. But I wonder if before he and his officials see this bill put into effect he will think he was quite wise in the view he took on that occasion of the position taken by the members of the opposition.

I have in mind, for instance, the criticism he made of the various estimates made by hon. members with regard to the possibility of people with lower average incomes owning their homes under this bill. Referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview, he said it was a complete distortion of the realities of the situation to suggest that only houses of $10,000 and up could be built under this bill. The minister is reported at page 1574 of Hansard of January 28 as follows:

> I have just checked with Central Mortgage, who tell me that in 1953 approximately 25 per cent of the houses for home ownership were below $10,000 in cost. He took the example of a $10,000 house, and gave the impression that anybody with an income of less than $3,860 a year need not apply for a loan under the National Housing Act.

I think the hon. member for Broadview was probably on fairly sound ground when he took that position. We find on page 163 of the minutes of the banking and commerce committee a table set out which was presented to the committee by Central Mortgage showing the relationship between home ownership income and down payment and interest rates. I notice, curiously enough, that the example Central Mortgage and Housing saw fit to present to the banking and commerce committee was that of a $10,000 house. While it may be true, as the minister says, that in 1953 a number of houses were built at a cost of less than $10,000, he does not tell us how much less than $10,000.

When we turn to a statement presented to the committee by Mr. Bryden, appearing at page 170 of the evidence, we find set out the experience of the companies for which he was speaking. He had some interesting figures to give. He showed that in 1953, which was only last year, the average loan for new single houses was $7,990. If it had been $10 more the average house cost would have been $10,000 in 1953. It is quite true that because the average was $7,990 for an 80 per cent loan instead of $8,000 there were a number of houses built at a cost of less than $10,000. But how much less? How important a factor in the whole picture did they constitute?

As I say, I was interested in the minister's tour de force on the second reading of this bill, but I was interested also in what he had to say at an earlier stage. At that time he was more in the role of a statesman introducing legislation than a politician replying to attacks in the House of Commons. As I recollect it, the minister was telling us at that time of the manner in which the government through this legislation was enabling larger sums to be made available for mortgage purposes for the building of houses. Then, so that the banks would not endanger the liquidity of their assets, he pointed out that there were two features in the bill which offset the possibly dangerous tendency involved in this new departure in banking practice.

These two new features were, first, the fact that mortgages issued under the authority of this legislation would have a comparable status with government bonds for the purpose of deposit with the Bank of Canada for loans. The other was the insurance feature whereby when a bank had finally evicted a delinquent borrower they could go to Central Mortgage and Housing and they would bail them out.

We had before the banking and commerce committee Mr. Atkinson, who is general manager of the Royal Bank of Canada. He had a few things to tell us. He was asked a question with regard to this strange proposition of the minister that these loans being made available for deposit with the Bank of Canada ensured the liquidity of the bank's assets. In answering that question Mr. Atkinson apparently was of a different frame of mind from the minister.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): No, it is not carried. Take your time. I have no doubt you would like to have it carried, and the minister would like to have it carried. I should like to quote from page 326 the questions which I asked Mr. Atkinson in the banking and commerce committee and the answers he made thereto, as follows:

Q. Mr. Atkinson, I would like to revert again to the question of liquidity. As you are no doubt aware, sir, when the Hon. Mr. Winters was introducing the resolution which brought in this bill he mentioned the question of the liquidity of bank assets and suggested—you can correct me if I am wrong—that without certain provisions with regard to these mortgage securities the government felt that the liquid position of bank assets might be endangered; or rather he expressed the view that the government felt perhaps the banks would feel that their liquid assets would be endangered without certain provisions. Is that right, that the banks felt that the liquid position of the bank's assets might be affected unless there were special provisions?—A. I think you are speaking of the provision for using them as collateral into the Bank of Canada.

Q. That and another provision. I was coming to that. Do you agree that something had to be done to avoid having this type of business endanger the liquidity of a bank's assets?—A. I find that a rather difficult question in that I am more inclined to agree with what the governor said yesterday that the reason for doing that was to keep a black mark off this type of security.

And the next question.

Q. You agree that the provision whereby a bank may deposit these mortgages as a basis for loans at the Bank of Canada really has not practical application with respect to preserving the liquidity?—A. That is right.

So we must come to the conclusion that no matter what they thought with regard to this particular provision, the chartered banks of Canada considered that his statement had no bearing whatever on the realities of banking practice.

The next provision which was going to preserve the liquidity of the banks' assets was, of course, that by which Central Mortgage was empowered to bail them out when they finally had to foreclose. I asked Mr. Atkinson this question as reported at page 326:

Q. Then you went on to explain your very grave dislike for the role in which the banks are going to be cast, that is of a Scrooge. Would I be wrong in assuming that your policy would be to exercise such care in the granting of these loans that you would not under any circumstances be obliged to take advantage of the other provision the Hon. Mr. Winters suggested as a method of maintaining the liquidity of the bank?—A. What was the other provision?

Q. The fact that under this new bill as anticipated when a mortgage is in default a bank may after certain procedures call on the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to bail them out?—A. By the collection of the insurance?

Q. Yes.—A. It is a very natural position to dislike, as you put it, being a Scrooge.

Q. You would exercise every care not to have to take advantage of that provision?—A. I think we would attempt not to make a loan which we felt was likely to go into default.

[The Chairman.]

That pretty well disposes, I believe, of the two provisions advanced by the minister for assuring the liquidity of the bank assets when they embark on this new type of business. But it brings us to an even more fundamental question, namely whether they are actually going to embark on this particular type of business. I was quite astonished when Mr. Atkinson told the banking and commerce committee that though it was announced by the Prime Minister on October 1 and by the Minister of Finance on the same day, he had no prior knowledge that such a move was being considered by the government. As I have intimated, I suggest the move should not have been decided upon by the government, particularly at the present time when the chartered banks of Canada are fully loaned.

Here we have a most astonishing situation, Mr. Chairman. We have all the accumulated political wisdom in Canada assembled on the government benches and with this vast conglomeration of administrative ability not one minister had brains enough to suggest consulting the chartered banks before they introduced this legislation. We are asked to believe, Mr. Chairman, that the chartered banks of Canada are going to leap gladly into the breach and save the day for the government. No one who listened to the careful, courteous and extremely cagey comments by Mr. Atkinson of the Royal Bank of Canada could be under any illusion on that score. The only possible hope Mr. Atkinson held out that this legislation might prove effective was the hope that somehow, at sometime or other, there might perhaps develop a market for these mortgages.

This led me to another line of inquiry in the banking and commerce committee, namely to find out just where they expect this market to develop for these mortgages. There was very little light to be shed on that matter, but it did become quite obvious that unless such a mortgage market develops, and develops very quickly, then there will be very few mortgage loans made by the chartered banks. That is quite right, of course, because it is not their business to engage in long-term loans even under the beneficent auspices of this all-wise government.

I have heard it suggested, incidentally by very responsible members of the Liberal party in this house, that in the final analysis the government is not really very interested in permanent loans by the chartered banks. I have heard that they are more interested in securing the services of their 4,000-odd outlets, and that when these loans are made steps will be taken to have them taken over by Central Mortgage. I find it hard to believe that even when it is suggested by responsible members among the government supporters in this chamber. If that is the case, and if that is where the market for mortgages is going to arise, then why has not the government told us what its plans are going to be in that regard?

It may very well be, Mr. Chairman, that the government could adopt a policy, though not under the existing legislation, under which by embarking on a fairly modest scheme of public investment in housing they could increase the chartered banks' deposits and make more money available for housing. But if that is the plan why do they not tell us? If I had any doubts whatever about the aptness of the term applied to this legislation by an hon. member whom modesty prevents me from identifying—he described it as a "cruel hoax"—these doubts were resolved by the dismal proceedings before the banking and commerce committee.

In the first place, the government had not sense enough to find out whether it was a feasible plan with regard to the chartered banks, and in the second place the government is apparently not yet prepared to tell us just what ought to be the terms of these loans. No matter how hard we pressed the minister we were unable to get from him any undertaking with regard to the interest rate. We still do not know what people will be required to pay on these loans. Possibly the minister has it locked in his bosom where he had the whole plan locked without even unveiling it to the chartered banks, but certainly he has taken no one else into his confidence.

No one knows today, Mr. Chairman, whether these family groups to which the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre referred are going to be able to carry these charges, because this government has not yet given us the information upon which to judge. We do not know whether the interest rate is to be 5½, 5¾ or 6 per cent. No one could have been more coy than the minister in evading answers to questions on this subject, both in this chamber and in the banking and commerce committee. He hid behind the voluminous skirts of the Minister of Finance whenever questions of that sort were asked, telling us these questions were not within his province and they would more properly be directed to the Minister of Finance. Unfortunately the Minister of Finance was not on the stand and available for questioning.

I trust that some time before this bill is finally dealt with in the chamber the minister will have the courage to come before the house and tell us that for once this all-wise, omniscient government has made a mistake; that there will have to be some further amendment of this act before it will work, and that in the light of the disconcerting evidence given before the banking and commerce committee the government freely admits that it miscalculated as regards this situation. The government would then perhaps assume a stature in the eyes of the people which not even its electoral successes of last year have endowed it with to date.

On clause 3—Authority to lend.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question on this clause? I am sorry it has not been possible for me to read all the minutes of the evidence in the committee, so I will simply have to ask whether the point I have in mind was considered there. My question comes under the wording in this clause which refers to "an approved lender". Was there any discussion of the possibility of pension funds being made available for housing on the same insured basis as funds are to be made available under this legislation?

Mr. Winters: I was not in attendance at all the proceedings of the committee. However, I read the evidence, and to the best of my knowledge that matter was not considered by the committee.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether it has been considered by the government? I have in mind the substantial moneys that are put away by companies with private pension plans and so on. Moneys of that kind are, under the present order of things, seeking to earn interest. It is also true that funds are needed for housing. Hence my question, was consideration given by the government to making such funds available for housing on an insured basis?

Mr. Winters: Although we have not done it so far, and although I do not believe it was discussed by the committee, we are prepared to recommend that pension funds be made eligible to approved lenders, for the purpose of making insured loans.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Interest.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the minister will not treat the committee of the whole house with a little bit more frankness on this question than that with which apparently the banking and commerce committee was treated. A few moments ago reference was made to a secret that is locked up in his bosom, or maybe it is behind the skirts of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Abbott: Behind what?

Mr. Knowles: Despite all the arguments that have been used against it, surely this committee of the whole has the right to know what the rate of interest is going to be when this legislation is enacted. I remember the night the resolution preceding this bill was introduced—it was one night in December before we went home for the Christmas recess —when the minister made the statement that the rate of interest would not be made known until the bill had been passed through all its stages, both in this place and in the other place, and had been given royal assent. At the time I heard that statement I thought the minister had made a slip and really did not mean that; but apparently he knew what he was saying.

It seems to me that we are dealing here with perhaps one of the most important aspects of this legislation, namely what the rate of interest is to be. The minister will no doubt come back and tell us that this idea of having it in the act in the nature of a formula is not new, that this is the way it was before. Surely the minister knows what the rate is going to be. Surely he should not be so coy and should not kid us along in the way he is doing, but should tell us what the rate of interest is going to be.

Mr. Winters: This section of the present act provides authority for the governor in council to establish the interest rate. The section has not been amended. The position I have always had to take is that there will be another order in council under the section establishing the interest rate. In the light of developments I think it is just as well that I did not attempt to announce any interest rate when this bill first came before the house. Interest rates have been declining. At that time the interest rate on long-term government bonds was about 3¾ per cent, permitting a maximum mortgage interest rate of 6 per cent for home ownership. That interest rate has now declined to about 3·51 per cent. The corresponding maximum interest rate permitted under the section would be 5·76 per cent. The interest rate is still declining. It may be that by the time I am required to make a recommendation to my colleagues the interest rate will be somewhat lower. Naturally I want to ensure that we get the lowest possible interest rate, having in mind the debt burden on the borrower and at the same time, of course, keeping it high enough to attract a sufficient amount of mortgage money.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister suggesting that we keep on talking on this bill and stall along until the interest rate falls a little bit more? Perhaps the hon. member for Eglinton would help him out if that is the proposal.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member can do it all by himself.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Insurance of loans, etc.

Mr. Vincent: Subsection 2 of clause 6 I think refers to the principle at which I was driving a while ago. It reads as follows:

> The corporation may prior to the issue of an insurance policy in respect of a loan give an approved lender an undertaking that it will issue the insurance policy if the loan is fully advanced in accordance with this act.

Does this mean that the government or Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will take into consideration the recommendations made by the bank; or does it mean—and I should like the minister to answer this question—that if an application is made to a bank for a loan, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will have the privilege of refusing this loan?

Mr. Winters: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The fact that the bank applies to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation does not automatically imply approval on the part of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. However, it is a safe bet that any mortgage security which the bank refers to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be accepted. That is a fairly safe assumption.

Mr. Vincent: Does that mean that any loan referred by the bank to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be more or less accepted in principle?

Mr. Winters: That would be a fairly safe assumption, although it does not of necessity follow.

Mr. Vincent: A while ago I was referring to the fact that in certain regions the lending institutions and even today the banks will not favour lending. In that instance, what will be the policy of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the application of the act?

Mr. Winters: It is the government's hope that, with the banks now authorized to lend under the sections of this act, the coverage will be broader than it has been. There is in addition the continuation of the old section 31A of the present National Housing Act which authorizes the government to make direct loans. Up until now Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—acting of course on the authority of the government—has been reluctant to make direct loans in any metropolitan areas. We feel that is a field for approved lending institutions, and we would hope that these institutions would now see fit to lend more widely in metropolitan areas.

Mr. Vincent: In case these lending institutions do not see fit to lend, does the minister think the same principle would be followed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Mr. Winters: That would be something that we would have to assess in the light of developing conditions. We would want to see how this new arrangement works.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Insurable loans.

Mr. Thatcher: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that one of the obstacles to the average Canadian's purchasing a new home is the high price involved. The average workingman simply finds that $10,000, $12,000 or $14,000 is too high a price. On the other hand, it is rather difficult for him to purchase a used home today because the sellers of used homes seem to want cash, half cash, or at least a substantial portion in cash. When he goes to the bank, under present circumstances he cannot borrow money on a mortgage on an old house. I wonder whether there would be any objection by the minister to making these new regulations apply to the purchase of used homes? Personally I think it would help to solve the problem of home ownership so far as many people in the lower income groups are concerned. For that reason I should like to move the following amendment:

That clause 7, section 1, be amended by inserting therein at the end of subparagraph (a) the following:

(iii) for the purchase of an existing residential structure.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, this of course is the sort of amendment that one would like to be able to say he accepts at once. The policy under the National Housing Act, dating back to the earliest days, has been to encourage the production of new houses in Canada. My hon. friend from Moose Jaw-Lake Centre is one of those who talk about the great backlog of housing in this country, and at the same time as recently as this evening he expressed fear that there might not be sufficient mortgage money available to take care of the construction of new accommodation. I feel at this stage we should concentrate on the construction of new housing accommodation. While saying that, may I add that the day may come when it will be feasible to add such a provision to the act, but at the moment I think our efforts should be directed to providing new accommodation. Therefore I must oppose the amendment.

Mr. Ellis: It has been pointed out by some hon. members that the new housing legislation overlooks a great percentage of low income wage earners, and it has been suggested that if houses are built at a cost of $10,000 or more the housing situation may be eased in that some people may be able to acquire houses formerly occupied by those who build new homes. The advantage of the amendment is that it would perhaps enable some people to purchase homes who are not in a position to build new homes. It would enable them to purchase homes occupied at the present time by those who will occupy new homes in the very near future.

As has been pointed out repeatedly in the house, a great percentage of the people of the country will never be able to afford to build new homes under this legislation. They have been completely ignored by the government. While I appreciate that the main purpose of the bill is to facilitate the construction of new homes, I think there is a strong case for making it possible for people to purchase used homes for perhaps $6,000 or $7,000. If people do not have the money to build new homes at the present time they are not in the position where they can pay all cash, or a good part of the purchase price in cash, for an existing house. In view of the fact that this legislation will not afford any advantages to those in the low income groups, I ask the minister to consider the amendment very seriously. I believe it may make it possible for a few more Canadians to own their own homes, and I think the minister will agree that in itself that is a most worth-while objective.

Mr. Stanton: I believe the minister and all other members of the house should give wholehearted support to the amendment. There are homes 40 or 50 years old that are sound and solid in every respect and that are possibly much better built than a new $10,000 house. These old homes are found on the outer fringes of our cities and towns throughout the dominion. Many of them are being sold at the present time for $5,000, $6,000 or $7,000. They are far more substantial and are worth more money than new homes that are being built at the present time at a cost of $10,000 or $12,000. I believe the minister should give serious consideration to accepting the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Thatcher) negatived: Yeas, 8; nays, 79.

Mr. Pouliot: There is one class of Canadian citizens who cannot benefit from this legislation. I refer to members of parliament. I wonder whether the minister would have any objection to letting the clause stand and discussing the matter with his colleagues, with a view to amending the Senate and House of Commons Act to permit members of both houses of parliament to take advantage of this legislation for building homes.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister whether this is the point at which one should raise a matter about which I spoke in the debate on second reading, namely the making of the facilities of this act as fully available to smaller communities as is the case in larger centres; or would it be more appropriate to discuss that on clause 40? It seems to me that it might be done under this clause, but if it is felt that it would be more appropriate under clause 40 I would be prepared to wait until then.

Mr. Winters: I think it would be. Clause 40 is the direct loan section. I think it would perhaps be more appropriate there.

Mr. Fulton: There is no absolute prohibition against the lending institutions making loans in the smaller centres, is there?

Mr. Winters: No. We would be delighted if they would do it.

Mr. Fulton: What is the policy of the corporation with respect to urging the lending institutions to enter the field in smaller centres so they may take advantage of section 7?

Mr. Winters: Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has made every effort to encourage the lending institutions to make their lending operations as national as possible. It is only to the extent that they did not do it that the old section 31A was finally introduced to provide that type of coverage.

Mr. Fulton: I know that doubts have been expressed whether the chartered banks would be willing to constitute all their branches as lending offices, although I understand the minister has expressed that as a hope. Is there anything in the act to prevent a chartered bank, with this new authority to advance money on mortgage loans, advancing that money for housing loans in smaller centres?

Mr. Winters: There is nothing whatever, Mr. Chairman, to prevent them from doing so.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister any further information, or any light to throw on the remarks he made earlier to the effect that it is hoped the branches of the chartered banks will become lending offices? Has he had any further conversation with the banks which would indicate whether or not that could be done?

Mr. Winters: I based that on the traditional role of the branch bank manager, who becomes an integral part of the local community, who knows the problems and circumstances of the various people. He is more likely to be in a position to judge their ability to retire loans than perhaps the lending institution that has no local agency as close to the people.

Mr. Vincent: Earlier tonight I advocated the possibility of having the 10 per cent down payment apply on all homes, not only on those costing $8,000. I am referring to subparagraph (d) of clause 7. Would there by any possibility of the government considering this request?

Mr. Winters: Before introducing the present formula of 90 per cent of the first $8,000 and 70 per cent of the balance, all these possibilities were considered and it was decided that in the light of conditions prevailing now, the formula in this bill was the best one.

Mr. Ellis: Was the $8,000 figure set in the belief that would be the minimum figure at which a home could be built? How did you arrive at the $8,000?

Mr. Winters: It was an effort to reduce the amount of the down payment on houses generally which everybody in this house has seemed very anxious to do. I heard some doubt expressed tonight by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, who said that this was contrary to his concept because it increased debt burdens. It does increase debt burdens. That is one of the things I pointed out on various occasions. It is one of the penalties a borrower must pay if he wants a lower down payment. It does, at the same time, widen the band of potential home owners, and I think that is a good thing. This, therefore, was an effort to reduce the down payment and at the same time make available the greatest amount of loans for low cost houses.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to.

On clause 9—Payment by corporation upon conveyance of property.

Mr. Fleming: On clause 9 I should like to observe that the fact there are very few points being raised with respect to the clauses of the bill is, I think, a tribute to the thoroughness with which the banking and commerce committee reviewed these clauses in detail.

There was a point, however, discussed with the minister concerning the form of clause

9, subclause (d). This clause was rewritten by one of the technical amendments introduced into the bill in committee. There is no problem about the intent with respect to the compounding of interest in case of default, but there was a serious question raised as to whether the clause, in the revised form in which it appears now in the reprint of the bill, does carry out that intent. I offered an amendment with a view to eliminating what appeared to be a difference of opinion as to whether the clause, as reprinted and amended, did give effect to the intent.

The problem arises, Mr. Chairman, in clause 9(d)(i) with respect to the meaning of the words, "for the period of such excess." The question was whether the use of the words "of such excess" limits the application of the compounding to the period following the conclusion of the first six months of default. Three lines above those words you find the expression "in excess of six months", and with the use of the expression "period of such excess" it does suggest that a proper interpretation of the section means that the compounding applies only to that portion of the arrears arising at the end of the six months, and not to the portion of arrears accruing during the first six months of the period of default.

The view expressed by Mr. Mansur in the committee was that there was no problem on the interpretation, and that the compounding will be applied in the usual manner to all arrears dating from the date of the first monthly default. Perhaps the minister is prepared to make a statement on the view taken with respect to the meaning of the expression.

Mr. Winters: I am aware there has been some question of the adequacy of the wording, but at the same time I agree with the hon. member for Eglinton that there is no question whatever as to the intention. This particular subsection was discussed at great length by the committee, and then by various individuals on the committee. I have had discussions on the same point with Mr. Fortin, who is representing the Dominion Mortgage and Investments Association, and I know his views on it as well.

It seems to be one of those points in which lawyers regard various combinations of words as expressing different meanings. After discussing this both with the law officers of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and with the Department of Justice I am advised that the words as now set forth in the clause in the bill are adequate. The law officers of the crown are satisfied that the clause is so worded that the approved lender will receive interest at the appropriate rates compounded in accordance with normal mortgage practice at the six months rest periods, for the full period of eighteen months, if the default period extends to this length. It is the intention of the government that this should be the case.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I was on my feet, Mr. Chairman, to raise a point on clause 8 when you rushed through 8 to clause 9 and then called on the hon. member for Eglinton on clause 9. May I revert to clause 8?

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member has permission to revert to clause 8?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): This clause refers to co-operative housing associations. I wonder whether the minister can clarify the situation for us. He will recall that it was discussed at the final meeting of the committee, and that is one of the reasons I regret the minutes of that meeting are not here. I rather gathered from what communication I have had that there was some misunderstanding as to the position of the minister and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation concerning this proposition. It will be recalled that a question was asked as to whether a co-operative housing association could qualify as a low rental housing project, and with some qualifications I gathered that it could do so. One qualification was that there was no technical assumption of title, and that provision could be made for the member of such an association who moved out of the low income bracket to receive his equity in order to make it available to someone still in that bracket. Could the minister give us some clarification of that position?

Mr. Winters: Yes, Mr. Chairman, this clause was discussed by the committee on the last day of the sittings, at which time I made a statement which I thought clarified the position. I said that although it was not the intention to set up a separate class of home owners who could qualify for the low rate of interest normally applying to the limited dividend section, if a co-operative could in fact qualify as a limited dividend company then it would be eligible for the low rate of interest prevailing for limited dividend operations.

There is one requirement in respect to co-operatives as set forth in clause 16 of this bill. There must be independent management of the co-operative, and that is one of the points we have been discussing with the Co-operative Union. I had quite a discussion with Mr. Staples, the president of the Co-operative Union, this evening, and I believe he understands our position on the matter.

Mr. Zaplitny: Clause 9 contains a provision calling for the payment to the approved lender of an acquisition fee of $125. It does not seem clear how that figure is arrived at. Is it a flat amount, or is it only an estimate in order to cover all exigencies, or is it a maximum figure? Suppose, for example, the acquisition costs fall below $125. In some cases they may not amount to anything. Would the approved lender still get $125, regardless of what his costs might be?

Mr. Winters: Yes, he would.

Mr. Zaplitny: If that is so we should have some explanation of why the provision is there, because eventually it is going to come out of the taxpayers of Canada. What is the reason for guaranteeing $125 as an acquisition fee, even though the cost to the approved lender may be considerably less? If it read "not exceeding $125" we would have some protection; otherwise we have none.

Mr. Winters: This figure was evolved as the result of many conversations between the lending institutions and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. There is no doubt that the average cost of getting title to a property is considerably in excess of $125. The lending institutions think this is far too little, especially if they are obliged to go through legal proceedings. There are some instances in which one would hope and expect that they would get quit claims, and then their charges would not be as great as $125. We took this as a minimum average, having regard to conditions across the country. The lending institutions believe that their average costs are more likely to be $225 than $125.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That refers only to the expenses of the lending institutions if they have to go to law. What about the poor home owner who may have to go to law against the mortgage companies? Does he get any compensation? It has happened before now.

Mr. Winters: There is no provision in the legislation for that. That does not happen very often.

Mr. Holowach: Would the Minister of Public Works care to make a statement relative to the period allowed for a loan to be in default? Is there any definite period allowed for that sort of thing, or is it left to the discretion of the bank?

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Winters: Under the provisions of the legislation the lending institutions must report to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation if a loan is in default for a period of three months, as to principal, interest and taxes. Then it will be a matter for decision as to what action will be taken. There is a period of 18 months provided in the legislation, during which time they are required to get clear title to the property.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 agreed to.

On clause 11—Investments by corporations.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I presume this is the clause under which the government would act if it does intend to carry out such a policy as I suggested earlier this afternoon. Can the minister give us any information as to the government's real intention? Does it intend to take off the hands of the chartered banks the mortgages they have issued and assume the role of the lender, or to take them off their hands and assume the task of disposing of these mortgages otherwise? We should know what is the government's real purpose in this regard.

Mr. Winters: As I said in my second speech, which the hon. member for Nanaimo termed statesmanlike, before I became a politician—

Mr. Fulton: He is a new member.

Mr. Fleming: You will never do that again.

Mr. Winters: I said that our considerations were for the liquidity, negotiability and marketability of these mortgage documents, and we had in mind the general structure and the healthy structure of the Canadian banking system. My hon. friend made certain comments on my references to liquidity, but I would remind him that we were concerned with the broader concept. He was concerned only with the ability of the banks to borrow from the central bank whereas we, as a government, must of course be concerned with the matter of general public confidence in the banking system.

It is the hope that the banks themselves will be able to operate and provide the amount of loan money necessary for operations under this legislation and to ensure a high house building program in Canada. To the extent that the banks, for one reason or another, in the light of developing circumstances wish to use insured mortgages to obtain money from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, they may proceed under clause 11 (a) and (b) which are the enabling sections to provide the necessary authority to Central Mortgage to buy insured mortgages or to lend on the security of insured mortgages as required.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am sorry that in answering this question the minister decided to take as his model his second speech rather than his statesmanlike speech. I still do not know, and I suggest no hon. member knows, what the government really has in mind with regard to this clause. We are entitled to know in view of this fact. The banks told us before the banking and commerce committee that in the first place it is an illusion to imagine they have any large pool of available capital. In the second place, Mr. Atkinson told us that the only way the banks could possibly participate to any appreciable extent in this scheme would be if a market was developed for mortgage funds. I suggest that here there is a suggestion that the government itself is going to provide that market, and I think we are entitled to know the government's fiscal and monetary mechanisms by which they may do so.

Mr. Winters: I do recall that when Mr. Towers gave evidence before the committee he said the banks should have no difficulty in making loans of $100 million a year under this legislation. I would imagine that it was in his mind that such could be done without difficulty at all, and that a larger amount could easily be envisaged.

Mr. Fleming: He said it would not be a large sum for the banks.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): May I have a word in regard to this section, because the minister referred to it while he was speaking this afternoon. He wanted to know if I recalled clause 11. What I was speaking of this afternoon was the possibility of the banks carrying out this housing scheme by creating more credit, and the minister suggested to me that under this section they would be able to do that. Under this section they would not be able to do it. It is true that under this section the corporation can buy back mortgages from the banks, but that would only be reimbursing them for the money they had already paid out; it would not in any way increase their cash reserves so they would be able to lend new money for the building of houses.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 12—Regulations by governor in council.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister make any statement as to whether any change is to be made in the regulation which determines the minimum income that a person can have and still qualify for an N.H.A. loan?

Mr. Winters: I take it that the hon. member is referring to the 23 per cent which is normally considered to be the limit for good credit risk. If a borrower must devote more than 23 per cent of his income to the payment for his home he normally goes beyond that category. The only stipulation set forth in the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation regulation is that when the ratio gets beyond 23 per cent the loan must be discussed by the lending institution with Central Mortgage. Up to that time the lending institution is free to act without consulting Central Mortgage as to the risk involved. There are loans made beyond the 23 per cent, depending on the circumstances, but the 23 per cent is the point at which under the regulations there must be discussions between the corporation and the lending institution.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister say that has been the case under the act as it has stood, or is that the situation envisaged at the moment?

Mr. Winters: That has been the case. I am informed that in 27 per cent of the loans made in 1953 the ratio was greater than 23 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: When a person seeks a loan where the amount to be paid would be in excess of 23 per cent of his income, who initiates discussions with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the applicant for the loan or the money-lender?

Mr. Winters: The lending institution.

Mr. Knowles: Suppose a lending institution is not prepared to initiate those discussions; has the applicant for a loan any recourse?

Mr. Winters: They are the ones who take the mortgage risk. Application is made to the lending institution, and that is the normal channel.

Mr. Knowles: My question is still valid. Has the applicant any recourse or appeal? The minister indicated that the ceiling is 23 per cent of one's income. As he knows, there are many people who have to pay an even greater percentage of their income by way of rent. It seems to me that there ought to be some way for such persons, when the lending institution turns them down, to make an appeal to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Is there not some way in which that can be done?

Mr. Winters: I do not understand how one could force a lending institution to lend money on a risk they did not consider to be good. I think that is the criterion. We are trying by these means to enable the lending institutions to lend money to encourage the production of new houses in Canada. The negotiation is between the lending institution and the borrower. The government extends its facilities to enable the lending institutions to lend money more expeditiously.

Mr. Knowles: Do I take it that despite all that has been said in the house, in the press, in the committee and in other places about this matter, for all practical purposes it still stands that nobody whose income is less than around $3,800 a year can qualify for an N.H.A. loan? If that is the case there has certainly been very little improvement.

Mr. McIlraith: I would point out to the hon. member that in Ottawa last year more than one-quarter of the loans made under this legislation were in that category.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister or the hon. member for Ottawa West know what the situation is in other parts of the country? What is it that puts Ottawa in that special category?

Mr. McIlraith: I do not think it is a special category. That is the normal practice, for the lending companies to send in the applications and have them considered.

Mr. Hunter: May I point out that in Toronto about 17 per cent of the loans were in that category.

Mr. Knowles: It is good to have these parliamentary assistants to the minister giving us information. Perhaps somebody else can tell us what the picture is in other cities, and also for the country as a whole.

Mr. Harris: Perhaps the hon. member can give it for Winnipeg.

Mr. Knowles: I do not know. I am not a parliamentary assistant to the minister.

Mr. Ellis: In his speech the minister referred to the creditworthiness of a borrower, and I am just wondering whether a person who qualifies under this 23 per cent would be considered as a creditworthy borrower.

Mr. Winters: I do not think we can take that as a criterion. It is a matter of the lending institution determining the creditworthiness of a borrower. A man might have only 20 per cent and still have a bad credit rating, and the lending institution would not accept his mortgage loan. As I said before, the 23 per cent is simply the point at which the lending institution comes to Central Mortgage and says, "Let us discuss this and see whether we should make a loan".

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Knowles: The minister says that the lending institution comes to Central Mortgage, but that is done only if the lending institution decides to follow that course. So far as the individual applicant is concerned, if the lending institution says "No," I gather that he would have no recourse. I think there will be considerable disappointment that there has been no improvement in connection with this very important point over which there has been so much discussion while this matter has been before us.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, there is some information I should like to have. I hope the minister will forgive me, as I was not a member of the committee and the information I want may have been supplied already. It occurs to me that there may be cases where the credit of the borrower is good. He may want to borrow perhaps only 75 per cent of the cost of his house, or even a smaller percentage. Is it possible that he would be informed by Central Mortgage and Housing that the lending value of his house was far below the cost and he could not be granted a loan even though he himself was considered to be a good risk? I would like to know how the lending value of a property is arrived at. Is there an element of speculation as to what the future value may be? In other words, if you have identical houses in different places would the lending value be the same? Is there some formula by which the lending value is arrived at, so that a borrower could be informed beforehand and have an idea whether it would be possible for him to build in a certain area?

Mr. Winters: Generally speaking the lending value is based on current construction costs in the area plus a 5 per cent profit. That was explained in committee. I know the hon. member was not a member of the committee, and I am pleased to have the opportunity of explaining that to him. As regards the question whether a loan could be less than the maximum prescribed under the act, the answer is that it could go down to 70 per cent of the appraised lending value of the house.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 13 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 17—Loans to borrowers engaged in mining, lumbering, logging, or fishing.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, on clause 17, the function of which is to make loans available to operators in the mining, lumbering, logging and fishing industries, I would like to ask the minister if he would outline the considerations in committee which led to the elimination of the agricultural industry from this particular clause. I know consideration was given to this matter in the banking and commerce committee, but the elimination is so striking that I feel some additional clarification would be helpful.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, knowing the hon. member's interest in the farming community I am very glad to be able to inform him that there is a provision for financing homes on farms under part I of the act. As to why farming was not mentioned in this particular clause, there are three reasons which occur to me, though there are perhaps others. In the first place the parent company must be an incorporated entity, and there are not many large corporations which are primarily concerned with the farming industry. Second, loans have to be secured on mortgages on the land on which the houses are to be built, and this sometimes presents difficulties because of the fact that there is often a mortgage on the land for other purposes. Third, the period of amortization has to be 15 years, and this might not be appropriate for farming purposes.

Mr. Fulton: While I do not wish to provoke a discussion on the subject I would suggest that the reasons advanced by the minister as to why agriculture could not be included under clause 17 do not apply in the case of quite a number of ranching concerns in British Columbia. I would like to know whether these concerns would be covered under the other provision he mentioned in part I. The ones I have in mind are practically all incorporated companies which have a considerable problem in providing housing for their employees, even though they own the land.

Mr. Winters: The answer is yes.

Mr. Fulton: They would be covered under that other provision?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Cardiff: I would like to pursue that statement the minister made regarding mortgages on farm property. In towns you have nothing but the ground on which the house stands; and even supposing a farm was mortgaged, that should not prevent them from obtaining assistance of this kind.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, there is a section under part I of the bill which covers that. I am simply saying here that clause 17 applies to incorporated companies, and there are not many farms of the type my hon. friend has in mind which are incorporated companies.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 18 to 23 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 24—Corporation to pay losses upon terms prescribed.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister tell us how much activity there has been under the home improvement loans section and how much there is likely to be under the new act?

Mr. Winters: This clause, Mr. Chairman, has been proclaimed only on a regional basis. I believe there are three areas, the Fraser valley, Kamsack in Saskatchewan, and Yellowknife. The only place in which advantage was taken of the section was Yellowknife, where there have been 12 loans recently.

Mr. Knowles: Is it intended to proclaim the section in any other regions?

Mr. Winters: When the measure was before the committee I said that it might not be wise to proclaim the section at this moment when we are trying to secure the production of new houses and develop a flow of mortgage money into that channel. We hope that within the next six months or a year we will be in a better position to proclaim this section.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 25 to 35 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 36—Corporation may undertake projects jointly with provinces.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman, we have heard over and over again in this committee of the whole the contention that nothing has been done under this act for people with incomes of less than $3,800. That, of course, is absolute nonsense, because one of the most important clauses in this bill has been carried over from the old act, and it provides very large sums of money indeed for the financing of low rental housing projects to be carried out between the federal government and the various provinces. Hon. members opposite who have emphasized with some vigour the necessity for large scale public works have an opportunity right in their own provinces and in their own municipalities to go ahead without further ado and promote such projects. We have the evidence of Dr. Forsey in support of this who said, speaking before the banking and commerce committee, as reported at page 338 of the evidence:

The subsidized low-rental housing provisions of the present act have not been used as widely as they should have been. This is partly the fault of the municipalities, which have to set the whole thing in motion; partly the fault of citizens who ought to have prodded the municipalities into action; partly the fault of the dominion government, which has been content to hide this particular light under a bushel, instead of setting it on a national candlestick. The government ought to have trumpeted its achievements in putting this section on the statute book four years ago, and ought to have encouraged people all over the country to take advantage of it. Instead, it has been strangely reticent about one of the things it should have been proudest of.

Therefore, if that strong contingent from Saskatchewan wishes to get money for low rental housing projects all it has to do is get busy. The hon. member for Bow River talked a great deal about the wonderful revolving fund in Alberta. All he has to do to get the merry-go-round going around is to get busy and get hold of some of this $50 million.

Mr. Knowles: Ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, in the light of the urgency of having this legislation passed; in view of the speed we have been making and the relatively few clauses still remaining, I wonder if hon. members would be prepared to sit a few minutes after ten in order to complete this bill.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, the banks are not open tomorrow. There is not that much hurry.

The Chairman: Is it the unanimous wish of the committee that we sit after ten o'clock?

Mr. Knowles: No.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, in view of the relatively few sections of this bill left to be dealt with, I would suggest that on Monday we take it first, followed by the Bank Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

NEW PLAN FOR PROCUREMENT AND TRAINING OF JUNIOR OFFICERS

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think hon. members will be interested to learn that approval has been given for the immediate implementation of a new plan for the procurement and training of junior officers for the Royal Canadian Navy. Entitled the "Venture Plan", it offers a seven-year short service appointment to young men between 16 and 19 years of age possessing the necessary qualifications, including junior matriculation or the equivalent. Cadets who show a desire to make the navy their career may later obtain permanent commissions if they have the necessary qualifications. The plan has been devised to meet the continuing demand for officers for the Royal Canadian Navy. It does not replace any existing officers' entry plan, but is a supplement to them.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence arising out of the statement which he made in the house this afternoon. What is the degree of shortage of officers for the Royal Canadian Navy which has made it desirable to introduce this new plan for training naval cadets? Will this plan require a new establishment?

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, I have not the figures for the difference between the establishment and the present strength for officers of the navy, but it is quite a manageable figure and I will send it to the hon. member. This plan requires no new establishment.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO TENURE OF PLACE IN SENATE

Mr. F. S. Follwell (Hastings South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 354, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, with respect to the tenure of place in the Senate.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Follwell: I have always believed that the Senate should be reformed and this bill, if accepted by parliament, will bring about a measure of reform by amending the British North America Act so that senators will retire at the age of 75 years. This would bring them in line with judges who retire at the same age. When they get the bill hon. members will find that the second amendment which I propose will not apply to any person summoned to the Senate before the coming into force of the act.

Mr. Knowles: Why spoil it?

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

GRAIN—DIVERSION CHARGE

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What is the diversion charge made on grain moving through Port Churchill?
2. What is the reason for this charge?
3. Who pays the charge and who collects it?
4. When did it first go into effect?
5. How much has it amounted to for each year since it went into operation?
6. Does the diversion charge have any effect on the price differential on grain sold through Port Churchill and grain sold through the head of the lakes?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

1. 1½ cents per bushel.

2. Revenue in lieu of terminal earnings.

3. The Canadian wheat board pays the diversion charge on wheat which it orders shipped to Churchill. The diversion charge is paid to the elevator company originating the shipment.

4. The diversion charge predates the operations of the Canadian wheat board and probably goes back to the first shipments to the port in 1931-32.

5. The board has only paid the diversion charge in crop years when wheat was shipped from Churchill subsequent to date (September 27, 1943) when the board became the sole agency to receive and market wheat. No wheat was shipped from Churchill between August 1, 1940 and July 31, 1946.

FRASERVIEW HOUSING PROJECTS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Have any contracts been awarded since the 1st day of January, 1951, by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the construction of houses etc., to the Vancouver Associated Contractors Limited for a project known as Fraserview housing projects?

2. If so, what is the total amount of all such contracts?

3. How much has been paid to date to the said company and how much is still due and owing?

4. Did the corporation before making payment or payments under the said contracts to the said Vancouver Associated Contractors Limited require proof that subcontractors of the said company had been paid?

5. What is the amount, if any, which the records of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation indicate said company is owing to such subcontractors?

6. Does the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, as a regular procedure before making payment to contractors, require proof that subcontractors or suppliers of material have been paid? If not, why is such course not followed?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Contracts were awarded to Vancouver Associated Contractors Limited for the Fraserview housing project, as follows:

Contract awarded	Number of units	Contract price
January 10, 1952	66	$507,706.26
February 13, 1952	62	473,232.52
June 12, 1952	91	713,699.96

2. Total amount of contracts, $1,694,638.74.

3. $1,522,596.18 had been paid to the contractor as at February 16, 1954. At that date $88,988.20 was still due and owing on account of the contract and $56,724.56 on account of security deposit and interest thereon, making a total of $145,712.76.

4. Statutory declarations by the contractor were obtained in the usual manner to the effect that accounts of subcontractors were paid.

5. The corporation does not receive statements nor maintain records of amounts owing from time to time to subcontractors by its prime contractors save as mentioned in answer No. 6. In this case the corporation has been verbally advised by the Canadian Credit Men's Trust Association, who represent the contractor and the creditors, that the contractor's over-all debts are approximately $337,000.

6. All construction contracts with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation provide "before making any payment on any progress or final estimate, the corporation may require the contractor to furnish evidence as may be satisfactory to the engineer that all work performed and materials supplied and all structures built for which payment is being made are free and clear from all lawful claims or liens under any law for labour, workmanship, materials or otherwise." The evidence required is a statutory declaration by or on behalf of the contractor that he has paid all accounts for work included in progress claims up to and including the last one paid. Before final payment, the declaration is to the effect that all such claims have been paid. This evidence is required from all contractors. In addition, on all contracts where the holdback is calculated on a maximum of $250 per housing unit rather than the usual 10 per cent of progress payments, the subcontractors and principal suppliers of material furnish to the prime contractor signed forms to support each of his progress claims. These forms do not specify amounts but they contain an acknowledgment of payment in full for all work done or materials supplied up to and including the date of the prime contractor's last progress claim. The Vancouver Associated Contractors Limited were operating under this holdback arrangement and the required forms were furnished by the subcontractors and suppliers of material.

SECURITY SCREENING—GUILT BY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Fulton:

In arriving at their recommendations or decisions in security matters affecting individual government employees, do the security panel and/or the security officers of the various government departments and agencies concerned reject any conclusion based on the principle of guilt by association?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): In reaching a decision as to whether a person should be given access to secret information, there is no question of guilt or innocence. The Prime Minister stated in this connection in the House of Commons on December 3, 1951:

> The question at issue is not guilt or innocence of some particular charge. The sole question is whether a certain person can or cannot be entrusted with secret defence material. It would give a completely false atmosphere to the matter if it were assumed that reliability can somehow be put beyond doubt by meeting formal charges—or indeed, that reliability cannot be brought into doubt except on the basis of formal charges. Assessment of character may be the only consideration in some instances. That is not a matter of charges, or of trial or of proof. It is a matter of judgment.

These words were spoken by the Prime Minister in referring to security measures in industries engaged in defence production. They apply with equal force in the public service. Because a person is known to associate with communists does not establish that that person is a communist, nor is that assumed by those in charge of departments. However, in determining whether a person is or is not suitable for employment in a particular job, a review is made not only of that person's professional qualifications and character but also, where access to secrets is involved, of all the available information bearing upon his reliability and the degree of confidence in which he can be held. If such a review establishes a history of communist associations, it is not assumed that that person is or is not a communist, but it may be decided that there is too much risk involved in allowing a person with such a background to have access to important secret information.

Because it is important to prevent any implication of guilt from attaching to these cases, such transfers and dismissals are dealt with in the same way as other transfers and dismissals, which is only proper since they are all subject essentially to the same criterion: does a given person possess all the qualifications required to fill a given position satisfactorily. The concept of guilt or innocence has no place in this process. The government, as an employer, is not a tribunal nor does it dictate to individuals what they must or must not think or with whom they may or may not associate; but, like any other employer, the government makes every effort to ensure that its employees are properly qualified for the work they have to do—and such qualifications must in some cases include a high standard of reliability.

WHEAT—SELLING PRICE

Mr. Argue:

1. Has the 7 cents per bushel drop in the price of wheat at Fort William-Port Arthur resulted in any reduction in the wheat board selling price at such marketing points as Winnipeg, Brandon, Regina, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Swift Current, Calgary or Edmonton?

2. If so, what is the reduction per bushel at each point?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

1. Yes.

2. At each of these points the wheat board selling price for No. 1 northern has followed the price in store Fort William/Port Arthur.

FOOD AND DRUGS—IMPORTED CANNED CHICKEN

Mr. MacLean:

1. Has the Department of National Health and Welfare, in the administration of the Food and Drugs Act, examined canned chicken imported from the United States into the maritime provinces, during the last four months?

2. If so, was such canned chicken found to comply with the regulation of the Food and Drugs Act and, if not, in what way did it not conform and what action has been taken to prevent recurrence?

Mr. Robertson:

1. Yes.

2. Two shipments of a brand of canned chicken not previously imported from the United States did not comply with the regulations under the Food and Drugs Act. The product was not properly labelled and the contents of some of the cans examined did not meet the food and drug standard in that they contained some bones and skin.

The manufacturers in the United States have been informed that no further shipments of their canned chicken will be allowed entry into Canada unless the product meets all requirements of the Food and Drugs Act and regulations.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING—SUBCONTRACTORS

Mr. Nowlan:

1. In the calendar years (a) 1952; (b) 1953, did subcontractors notify Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation of claims outstanding against contractors engaged in construction for or on behalf of the said corporation?

2. If so, on how many occasions in each of the said years?

3. In how many of such instances did the subcontractors accept a compromise settlement of their claims?

4. According to the files or information of the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, what was the total amount of loss of subcontractors in each of such cases where compromise was effected?

5. At the time of awarding any contracts in (1) above, did the corporation have information indicating that on previous occasions any such contractor had had difficulties in making payment to subcontractors?

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

6. Have any contractors included in (1) above subsequently been awarded further or other contracts or been engaged to perform services for or on behalf of the corporation?

Mr. Winters: This question in its present form involves the checking of every construction contract correspondence file held by the corporation in respect to all work under way. Because there is no privity of contract between Central Mortgage and the subcontractors, no record of moneys owing to subcontractors is kept by Central Mortgage.

I understand from a conversation I have had with the hon. member that he is interested in circumstances surrounding general contractors and subcontractors where financial difficulties have occurred. If he is agreeable to having the question answered accordingly, I shall be happy to do so at an early date.*

Mr. Nowlan: The minister telephoned me with respect to this matter and I am prepared to accept the answer as suggested by him.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

SECURITY SCREENING—COMMUNICATION TO INDIVIDUAL

Mr. Fulton:

When a decision has been arrived at to release or transfer a government employee for security reasons, does the individual concerned in each case have an opportunity of learning the nature of the allegations or suspicions against him before being transferred or dismissed?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Under normal circumstances the information obtained about a person as a result of a security screening—and any consequent doubts as to the advisability of allowing him access to his country's secrets—are not discussed with a person who, as a result, may be subject to transfer or dismissal. There are cases where the circumstances do permit this to be done. Where a useful purpose could be served, and where security considerations permit, it is done, and an exception is made to normal practice.

The main security considerations necessitating this procedure were given in December, 1951, by the Prime Minister when he spoke in the House of Commons about a security case in defence industry. He said: "There is a further consideration of an entirely different order that is also relevant. It is that hearings could and probably would compromise our general security precautions. Some of the people about whose access to secret material we have to be most concerned operate in the interests of an organization that is skilfully and tightly bound together. This organization acts with a ruthlessness and a readiness to sacrifice its own followers, which we find it almost impossible to appreciate. It is only by careful, long continued and patient work that means have been established by our police forces of getting information about the operations of this organization. The organization would be more than ready to precipitate hearings involving their own followers, even if it meant the personal ruin of those individuals, if the hearings would lay bare the sources of information that the police have established. If hearings were held, the information as to the background or other considerations causing doubt about an individual would have to be revealed. I do not see how a "hearing" could be regarded as serving any purpose if they were not. More than that, it would be argued that the validity of such information or the grounds for doubt could not be assessed nor could any "charges" be properly refuted unless the kind and sources of information were disclosed, the informants questioned, and so forth. If that were done in even two or three instances, they might be sufficient to nullify, in very short order, such security defences as we have been able to build up after years of painstaking effort. The well-organized opponents of our way of life would be more than ready to sacrifice a good many of their supporters to gain the kind of information that hearings would inevitably reveal."

It follows logically that doubts or suspicions of a person's fitness to know his country's secrets cannot be conveyed to him if, in the public interest, the information which gives rise to those doubts must be withheld. There are cases where, for instance, human weaknesses are the cause for doubt of a person's reliability and in a number of these cases neither the information nor the source of the information may need protection. But in many such cases telling a person about these weaknesses will neither correct them nor remove the doubts which they cause. In the few cases where a purpose might be served and where it could be done safely, security officials are prepared to discuss the matter with the individual in question. But these few individual cases could not justify the application of such a procedure to security decisions in general.

A person who is denied access to secret information has been so treated because in the careful and considered opinion of reasonable men there is doubt as to his reliability. This is a matter of judgment. The Prime Minister spoke of this in his speech in December, 1951, and what he said with regard to defence industry then applies equally to the public service. He said on that occasion: "...we are not in the realm of what have come to be called "human rights" and "fundamental freedoms". There is no human right or fundamental freedom involved. No person has a right of access to secret defence items and no man's freedom is infringed when he is denied such access".

The fact that under our present security system a person may have no knowledge of the reasons why he has been dismissed from or transferred within the public service as a result of a security screening places a very grave and unpleasant responsibility upon the government. The Prime Minister expressed the government's views about it in this way:

This means, of course, that the responsibility of the government is the greater to see that every case is carefully assessed and that no decisions as to the reliability of an individual are lightly taken. They are not lightly taken. Moreover, the cases can always be re-examined and the government will have no reluctance about reversing an original decision if further review suggests that it can safely be reversed. This whole matter is, however, distorted and seen in a false light, if it is confused with loyalty and thought of in terms of specific, provable or disprovable charges. You can doubt the reliability of a man for the security of some vital defence matter without considering him to be disloyal. You can continue to doubt no matter how much he argues or protests. The problem that is thrust on the government of assessing the reliability of employees in defence industries, and occasionally of deciding in some cases that reliability is uncertain, is not a pleasant one. In the present state of things it is, however, an unavoidable one. It is the government itself which is and must be answerable for the security of our defence secrets. The government is, however, fully aware of the importance of ensuring in so far as possible that no injury is done to any individual through the decisions that must be taken. Security procedures are constantly under review and if they can be improved, the government will always be ready to make the improvements and will always welcome and seriously consider constructive suggestions to that end.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RECOGNITION OF RED CHINA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Does the statement of the Prime Minister yesterday, that the communist government of China must sooner or later be recognized, now represent settled government policy?

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has some information and I will ask him to reply.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been attempting to get confirmation of the report in question and until we receive the actual text of what the Prime Minister said I believe it would be unwise to make any further observations. I can however say this. The press report of the statement, as my hon. friend knows, reads:

> We have got to be realistic. Sooner or later we would be bound to recognize the government that the people want.

That is a press quotation from the Prime Minister's statement in respect of the recognition of the communist government of China. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said almost exactly the same thing in Ottawa on June 12, 1953, when he spoke on the same subject. He said then:

> We have got to be realistic on such problems and be prepared to deal with those who represent the nation over which they exercise authority.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am directing this question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs because there is a very marked difference between the two statements. Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs believe that the people of China have had any opportunity to indicate whether they do or do not want the present government?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis).

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I have directed an appropriate question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, my views on that matter are probably the same as those of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Drew: That is no answer.

Mr. Rowe: It is obvious the minister cannot answer that question.

INTER-AMERICAN ASSOCIATION—QUESTION AS TO CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister care to say whether Canada has any intention of becoming a member of the inter-American association?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In reply to that question I can only say that the necessity for making such a decision has not arisen because we have not received such an invitation.

PUBLIC WORKS

ALLEGED USE OF GERMAN STEEL ON FEDERAL PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has his attention been drawn to a recent press dispatch to the effect that German steel is being imported into Nova Scotia to be used on a federal government project?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to indicate that he intended to ask this question designed to find out what we know about this steel and whether or not it was intended to use it in the construction of the proposed ferry terminal at Yarmouth. Tenders have not yet been asked for in respect to this construction, and we have no knowledge of any such shipment of steel for that purpose.

GRAIN

WHEAT AND BARLEY—PROPOSED GIFT BY UNITED STATES TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister comment on a morning press dispatch to the effect that an agreement has been arrived at whereby the United States will make a gift of 500,000 tons of wheat and 100,000 tons of barley to Japan? Does this mean the loss of our second best wheat customer and our best barley customer?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I heard two announcements on the radio this morning. The first announcement mentioned 500,000 tons of wheat and 100,000 tons of barley, and the second announcement mentioned 250,000 tons of wheat and 100,000 tons of barley. I asked our people to get in touch with Washington for confirmation or otherwise. Inquiries were made at the state department and also at the Department of Agriculture, and neither agency would confirm that any such arrangement has been made. I will say, however, that steps have been taken to safeguard the position of Canadian wheat and barley in the Japanese market for the next two years.

TRANSPORTATION

ARROW LAKES—WITHDRAWAL OF STEAMER SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I may say, if he will forgive a personal reference, that my doctors have told me I must keep cool, calm and collected, but some news I have received from my constituency has rather disturbed my normal composure. I trust the minister's answer will restore my circulatory equilibrium.

In view of the announcement by officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway that the company will withdraw all steamer service on the Arrow lakes on April 24 this year, and, in view of the serious loss and inconvenience this will cause residents of the Arrow lakes, will the minister have the present situation investigated to see if the service can be maintained until other means of transportation are available?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have great concern for my hon. friend's health and I wish my answer might assure him perfect health in future. However, I am afraid I cannot go that far. My hon. friend sent me a copy of the question which he intimated he intended to ask and I received it only a few moments ago. I have had an opportunity, however, to look into the position during that time. I am impressed by the question which reads as follows:

> Will the minister have the present situation investigated to see if the service can be maintained until other means of transportation are available?

The only manner in which this service could be carried on would be by means of a subsidy. That is the only method which occurs to me at the moment, though there might be others. The government gave careful consideration to a subsidy in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the amount of $60,000 some time ago and I am sorry to report it decided against it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANCER

RESEARCH INTO RELATION BETWEEN SMOKING AND LUNG CANCER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of news reports over the week end, will the minister make a further statement in reply to my question of about a month ago as to what the federal government is prepared to do in the matter of research into the relation between cigarette smoking and lung cancer?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, when my hon. friend asked this question a few weeks ago I deliberately refrained from making a statement at that time because of the great importance of this subject. As the house knows, the Canadian cancer institute is the agency in Canada through which cancer research is directed, and through which moneys provided by the federal government in the field of cancer research are allocated. The Canadian cancer institute came into being as the result of an idea proposed by my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), then minister of national health and welfare.

A few weeks ago the officers of my department reviewed with the institute those research projects relating directly or indirectly to cancer of the lung, with special reference to the effects of tobacco and its products.

More recently I conferred with the director and certain officers of the institute regarding this matter. A liaison has been effected with research groups in the United States and in the United Kingdom through Dr. Hartcroft of the department of medical research of the University of Toronto who attended a meeting for this purpose a few days ago in the United States. Following the discussions I had with these officials of the cancer institute, I took occasion to suggest that the tobacco industry might be disposed to provide unconditional grants in addition to those provided by federal and provincial governments for research in lung cancer.

This suggestion has been unreservedly accepted by the industry and the president of the national cancer institute will announce some time today that the institute has received a donation of $100,000 from the Canadian tobacco industry for the support of such research. This fund will be administered at the discretion of the board of directors of the institute which, with the assistance of their research advisers, is preparing an appropriate plan to encourage further investigation into this form of cancer.

Any grants made from this fund, or from the fund through which federal assistance has been given, will come under the same regulations as any grant in aid of research awarded by the national cancer institute of Canada. It is deemed desirable that I should add that the research program of the national cancer institute embraces a number of projects relating directly or indirectly to cancer of the lung. In addition to certain projects now under way new projects are under consideration at the moment specifically related to the effects of tobacco and its products on the lung and air passages. The statistical officer of the institute has been working on the problem of lung cancer for some time. He has the full co-operation and assistance of the vital statistics branch of the dominion bureau of statistics and of the principal treatment centres of Canada. He has already been of assistance to the department's Indian health services and is working closely with the Department of Veterans Affairs.

So far the clinical and statistical approach to the investigation of cancer is considered to be important. Possibly the largest group of people on whom there are very carefully kept records is the veterans group coming within the field of special interest of my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe). Officers of my department and of the Department of Veterans Affairs have been in consultation regarding cancer in general but more especially primary cancer of the lung. It is agreed by the experts that every effort should be made to derive all the information possible on this subject from the Department of Veterans Affairs records. The records of deaths from cancer to date are being searched for any indication which might help solve some of these problems. Furthermore, the system of recording will be reviewed for the purpose of ensuring that future compilations of statistics will include the necessary data on smoking habits.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CLEANING STAFFS AT WINNIPEG—SUMMER HOLIDAY SCHEDULE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. What steps are being taken to ensure that members of the cleaning staffs in Winnipeg federal offices will not be required to double up on their duties as a result of summer holiday schedules?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): For the male cleaning staff it has been the custom to provide two additional employees as holiday relief, and that custom will be continued. The question of holiday relief for the female cleaning staff is under consideration.

FISHERIES

UNIFORM SALMON FISHING REGULATIONS—PROPOSALS TO CERTAIN PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries a question. When can we expect a statement about the recent proposals made to the governments of the Atlantic provinces and Quebec concerning uniform salmon fishing regulations?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): We had a conference up here with the provincial authorities concerned. As a result of that conference certain recommendations were made which have been taken up by the provincial governments concerned. When they have dealt with them, we will have a second conference and announce what agreement has been reached between the federal and provincial authorities.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CANCELLATION OF COAL ORDER—DRUMMOND COLLIERY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McCulloch) asked a question relating to the supply of coal by the Drummond Coal Company at Westville, Nova Scotia, to the Canadian National Railways. That question was fully answered on February 25 by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), as recorded at page 2427 of Hansard.

DISABLED PERSONS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister give an approximate date at which he may be prepared to bring in legislation dealing with pensions for disabled persons?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am sure the hon. member will appreciate the fact that I cannot give a precise date, but it will be this session.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE—HAROLD C. BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask either the Secretary of State or the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the house may expect soon the tabling of a return having to do with questions of mine relating to health insurance? The order of the house was passed on January 25 of this year.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not guilty of delay and I am sure my colleague's department is not guilty of delay, so we shall have to confer in the matter.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Can he tell me when I may expect an answer to questions which I placed on the order paper with reference to Harold C. Banks, for which a return was ordered on February 25?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question related to a considerable extent to the department over which I have the honour to preside at the moment. We have completed our inquiries and I think the return will be available later this week.

FRED ROSE

REPORTED RUMOURS OF RETURN TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I regret that I did not have time to give him notice of it. Is the minister aware that in Montreal rumours are persistent regarding the re-entry of Fred Rose into Canada?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The answer is no.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF NEW LEGISLATION TO INSURE APPROVED LENDERS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Friday, March 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. 102, to promote the construction of new houses, the repair and modernization of existing houses, and the improvement of housing and building conditions—Mr. Winters—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 36—Federal-provincial projects.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at its previous sitting, we were discussing clause 36. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fraser (St. John's East): Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the views expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver South last Friday just prior to the time of adjournment. Like the hon. member, I believe that this clause contains some valuable features of Bill 102. As hon. members know, clause 36 reproduces section 35 of the present act. I believe that section has great possibilities. In order to illustrate, I should like to show what has been done at St. John's, Newfoundland, under section 35 of the present act. I turn to pages 28 and 29 of the minutes of the committee on banking and commerce, table "A". There I find that out of a total of 1,712 federal-provincial projects of land assembly completed throughout the whole of Canada in the four years since the inception of the scheme, no fewer than 594 have been completed at St. John's, Newfoundland. That is more than one-third of the total for the whole country. At the same place in the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the banking and commerce committee we find that out of a total of 1,832 federal-provincial low rental housing units completed in the whole of Canada during the same four-year period, no fewer than 392 have been completed at St. John's, Newfoundland, more than 20 per cent of the total for the entire country.

The population of St. John's is a good deal less than one per cent of the aggregate population of all the incorporated cities, towns and villages in Canada. Four hundred federal-provincial low rental housing units have been completed in four years at St. John's, Newfoundland, and if a similar proportionate total had been achieved in the other municipalities 40,000 new low rental housing units would have been created under section 35 in four years. That, I submit, would be a not inconsiderable addition to the housing accommodation for those in low income brackets throughout this country.

There are two further points in connection with the experience in St. John's. First of all, I should like to point out that the scheme there has worked out very well. We have the testimony of Mr. Mansur, the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, for that. I turn now to page 124 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the banking and commerce committee where Mr. Mansur describes the scheme at St. John's as highly successful and says:

> I believe that the experience in St. John's has been excellent and it has fulfilled our highest expectations.

The second point is that, so far as the experience of St. John's at any rate is concerned, there need be no conflict between the construction of low rental housing and the expansion of home ownership and of economic rental housing. There has been an addition of at least one-third to the total housing units in St. John's over the past ten years and that, I submit, is a rate of growth little short of phenomenal in a city so venerable as St. John's, for ten years is but a brief period in the history of that city. Therefore may I say that I believe clause 36 of the bill provides a basis for a most fruitful partnership between federal, provincial and municipal authorities, and I trust that the municipalities and provinces throughout Canada will take full advantage of the generous offer of 75 per cent participation made by the federal government through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under this plan. We can see what can be done, and I hope that it will be done in the future.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the hon. member for St. John's East has placed on record his tribute as to what can be done in the matter of building low rental housing under the provisions of section 35 of the act as it now stands or clause 36 of the bill now before us. I must point out, however, that there are one or two shortcomings so far as this part of the legislation is concerned. In the main the difficulty is that it is possible for a provincial government which is not prepared to accept its full responsibility under this clause to shelve a part of that responsibility by trying to pass it on to a local municipality. When that happens, as it happened in my own city of Winnipeg last year, you come up against a very difficult situation. In Manitoba, as the minister and others know, the provincial government refused to put up the 25 per cent of the cost of a federal-provincial project for my city but contended rather that half of the provincial portion would have to be put up by the city of Winnipeg.

That made it necessary for a bylaw to be placed on the ballot at the last civic election, and according to the city charter that bylaw could be voted upon only by property holders in the city of Winnipeg. To the credit of the people of Winnipeg, there was a very large vote in favour of the bylaw but by no means sufficient to carry it. When one realizes that the only people allowed to vote on the question were those who already owned property one realizes the significance of a fairly sizeable vote. But the plain fact of the matter is that if you have a provision in the act making it possible for a portion of the cost of a low rental housing project to be levied against existing real property in the form of a real estate tax you run up against a very real barrier.

In my view a provision such as this will only work if the provincial government accepts its share of the responsibility as set out in the act. If you have provincial governments that feel they cannot put up their 25 per cent, or that simply refuse to do so, that raises the question whether the federal government's proportion should not be increased. I believe that it should. I would say that you could separate the two elements referred to in subclause 2 of clause 36, namely, the capital cost and the profits or losses. I would say it is perfectly all right to expect a province to bear 25 per cent of the losses on any such project and that it is financially possible for a province to do that, but it is a different story for a province to find the amount of money involved in 25 per cent of the capital cost.

It looks very nice on paper. It looks as though the federal government is being generous in offering to put up 75 per cent as against 25 per cent on the part of a province, but anyone who thinks about it at all knows that it is easier for the federal government to find the money necessary for its 75 per cent than it is for the provinces to find the money necessary for the 25 per cent. In my view, as long as it is possible for a province such as Manitoba to crawl out from under its share of the burden and try to pass it on to municipalities, the only way a clause such as 36 will work is for the federal government to bear a larger portion of the capital cost. I hope that even yet we may get consideration by the government of that aspect of the clause.

I want to say a word now in reply to something said on Friday night just before we adjourned by the hon. member for Vancouver South. He rose and threw out a statement the like of which he might get away with in his newspaper column but which he can hardly expect to get away with in the house. He said, as recorded at page 2741 of Hansard:

> Mr. Chairman, we have heard over and over again in this committee of the whole the contention that nothing has been done under this act for people with incomes of less than $3,800. That, of course, is absolute nonsense, because one of the most important clauses in this bill has been carried over from the old act, and it provides very large sums of money indeed for the financing of low rental housing projects to be carried out between the federal government and the various provinces.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver South knows—if he did not realize it when he made that statement he should look back into Hansard and read it now—that those of us who were talking about the failure of this act to be of assistance to those whose incomes were less than $3,800 a year pointed out very clearly that the act does not make possible home ownership for people with incomes of less than that figure. It is true that there is a possibility, if the other levels of government participate, for some assistance to be rendered to people with low incomes under clause 36 of the bill, which has to do with low rental projects. He knows that what we were saying is not nonsense, as he termed it the other night, but the absolute truth, namely, so long as you have that $3,800 cut off point on housing loans, people with incomes less than that figure cannot get loans under this act for the purpose of owning their own homes.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that is still an important matter with which this bill fails to deal. I was interested in reading only this morning an editorial in the Winnipeg Tribune from my own city which points out that with wages being what they are, this bill is still of no help to the great majority of people so far as home ownership is concerned. We now know that, with the bill as it now stands, one has to have about $76 per week in order to obtain a loan for a $10,000 home, or $90 per week to obtain a loan for a $12,000 home. Since the average weekly wage in the city of Winnipeg, according to recent statistics, is only $52.51 per week, one readily sees how this bill will fail to help the great majority of the workers in my city to obtain a home.

If one dared to hope that under clause 36, with which we are now dealing, we might get a low rental housing project in Winnipeg it would soften the blow a bit so far as the other parts of the bill are concerned. But so long as this legislation makes it possible for the government of Manitoba to pass on part of its responsibility to the city, and so long as the percentage the federal government will pay is only 75 per cent, there is not much hope of getting a project of this nature in the city of Winnipeg. Nevertheless, despite its shortcomings, I agree with those who contend that publicity should be given to what is possible under clause 36, and that there should be as much educational work as possible so that the people of the country will get the best they can out of this inadequate legislation.

A moment ago I mentioned having read an editorial in the Winnipeg Tribune. In addition I want to mention a news item which came to my attention last week. On Saturday evening at a quarter to seven I was across the hall in room 16 listening to and watching the television news. It so happens that included in the news at that time there was a brief shot of a Canadian soldier arriving from Korea by plane. I believe the picture was taken in Montreal where this soldier arrived after being flown back to this country. Why had he been flown back to Canada? Was it because of a tragedy on the field of battle? No, it was because he had lost a child who had been burned to death in his tar paper shack back here in Canada. I know the fuss that was raised in this house some weeks ago when one or two members of this group started talking about tar paper shacks. There are members on the other side who do not like references to that kind of housing. I suggest this house should take very seriously the fact that every year, every month, almost every week we see items in the news like the one to which I have just referred, where people lose their lives because of fires which take place because the houses in which they are living are fire traps that easily catch fire and burn down.

So far this clause, indeed this bill, does nothing to rectify that kind of situation. It does help to provide, sooner than otherwise would be the case, homes for certain people. But it does nothing for the group of people who really need homes, such as the soldier who had to leave his family in a tar paper shack with the result that one of his children was burned to death. Incidents such as that are a national scandal. There is no help in this clause or anywhere in this bill for such people. I submit that this parliament still has a long way to go in devising the kind of housing legislation that this country really needs.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 37—Powers of corporation.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): This clause, Mr. Chairman, represents the last possible opportunity, I suppose, of amending this bill in such a way as to make it serve the purposes that are described on the front of the bill. Without some amendment to this clause, replacing the provision in the old act by which the government entered the field of housing on a joint loan basis, I submit that the act at present represents the clear withdrawal of the government of Canada from the housing problem of this country.

It is true that the other day in a discussion of clause 11 I secured a tacit agreement from the minister that the government, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, would be entering the field under that clause by the purchase of mortgages issued by the chartered banks. Now that may be so, Mr. Chairman, but unfortunately the legal authority for doing so limits the participation to the sum of $30 million. I believe the minister will agree with me that the two sections referred to, the one in the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, and the other clause 22 of this bill, between them limit that participation to a total of $30 million.

I suggest that such participation is merely a drop in the bucket. I hope, before this bill is given third reading, the government will give serious consideration to the reenactment of that section of the old act under which the government really participated in the housing program in Canada. I want to point out that the figures presented to the banking and commerce committee showed that in the past the government's participation has been in the neighbourhood of $60 million under the joint loans program. There has been no definite statement from the government, and I am merely making an assumption since my suggestion was not denied on Friday, but I assume it is the government's intention to use clause 11 for this very minor feature of participation. I cannot put it more strongly than to say I feel the government has been disingenuous in the house here in the manner in which it has brought this legislation before parliament, which has resulted in a false impression in the public mind as to the purpose of this bill. Unless they are prepared to at least reinstate the provisions for participation, then I cannot see how this house can support such legislation, because it does not do what it purports to do on the front of the bill, that is, promote increased construction of houses in Canada.

The bill before us actually permits the government to withdraw from the very modest participation it had in the housing program of Canada, as set out in the old act. So I hope the government will see fit to maintain the very modest share it has taken in solving one of the important problems of this country.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 38—Contracts for houses to be sold to prospective home owners.

Mr. Weaver: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express my pleasure and satisfaction in the fact that this bill has come forward at this time, and is being dealt with so expeditiously. A very fruitful discussion took place in committee. In fact, the discussion that took place there was one of the most satisfactory I have ever seen.

I have one question to ask, and I believe that this is the proper clause on which to ask it. A year and a half ago a group of veterans in Flin Flon were desirous of building homes under the provisions of the Veterans Land Act, through the Department of Veterans Affairs. The understanding was that loans would be advanced by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. My information is that after agreeing to make the loans available it was decided finally that this was outside the scope of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. My question is this: what will the prospects now be, under Bill 102, of proceeding with such a project?

Mr. Winters: There are two avenues through which the government can make loans for projects such as that envisaged by the hon. member for Churchill. One is under an arrangement with the Department of Veterans Affairs, whereby they assist veterans who are interested in contributing toward the construction of their houses by providing labour content. Under that arrangement Central Mortgage, when a house is completed, can take over the mortgage and administer it from that point on. That is an arrangement that has worked out well to the extent that it has been applied thus far. I understand my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs feels the arrangement is one that can be continued.

The other arrangement, of course, is through a direct loan under clause 40 of this legislation. I would say, replying directly to the hon. member's question, that the prospects of having the project in Flin Flon continue on the basis of participation with the Department of Veterans Affairs would be quite good, if the Department of Veterans Affairs placed it before us.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 39 agreed to.

On clause 40—Where loans not available corporation may lend.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on Friday evening the minister indicated that this would be the proper place to ask if he could give us information as to what the government has in mind for the smaller communities affected by this legislation.

On January 28, in the debate on second reading, I drew attention to certain complaints I had had from one of the smaller communities in my constituency. It is, I understand, a complaint which is shared generally by other small centres.

Mr. Winters: Would the hon. member give me the name of that community?

Mr. Fulton: Yes; I did refer to it on the earlier occasion. It is the village of Williams Lake. The discussion on the point is found at page 1559 of Hansard. It is my impression, based on conversations, although not officially, that the government or Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has something in mind under this measure to meet the request from the smaller communities, which at the present time appear to find themselves handicapped in that the terms upon which loans are made available to them, with respect to the amount of down payment, and the like, are less advantageous than those given to larger centres.

Mr. Winters: Clause 40 in the bill is a reenactment of section 31A, which enables Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make loans to creditworthy borrowers in all those areas where lending institutions are not operating. There has been considerable activity under that section in the act. I have before me a table showing as of December 31, 1953, a total of 7,324 direct loans made by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and also showing that 3,887 of them have been for private accommodation of the one-family type, in a great many communities. I see that five of them are in Williams Lake.

Mr. Fulton: The minister is referring to five loans?

Mr. Winters: Yes, five loans in Williams Lake. And I find another interesting thing, that of 188 loans made in smaller communities in British Columbia during 1951, 1952 and 1953, there were 121 approved for the full amount requested. I find that 21 were approved in an amount between 97·5 and 100 per cent of the loans applied for.

So I think it is clear that Central Mortgage has been operating pretty effectively under the old section, and has been making loans close to the amount asked for in most instances.

Mr. Fulton: What has the minister to say about the relationship of the problem of the approved lending value to this situation? It is Central Mortgage and Housing which, under this clause, would set the lending value. Our experience has been that there are centres in which Central Mortgage sets the lending value at very much less than the amount of the tender submitted by the contractor as the cost at which he will build a house. I am wondering whether that has some bearing on the matter.

It might be possible that the corporation would give an approved loan for the full amount applied for, but the amount applied for would have to have relation to the approved lending value. Has the minister anything to say on that?

Mr. Winters: It is possible that that is a factor. But it is also true that a large percentage of loans made under the old section last year were in the amounts requested and were, at the same time, the agreed sales prices of the houses.

Mr. Fulton: Has the corporation a policy, in places where they think building costs are higher than they might be, of setting lending values at a smaller percentage of the actual cost of construction than would be set in other centres?

Mr. Winters: That is so, yes.

Mr. Fulton: I can appreciate the corporation might wish to do what it can to keep building costs down. But surely the minister will agree with me that that inflicts a hardship upon those who live in those communities and wish to build houses there. The prospective borrower does not wish to have building costs higher than they should be, but he is there, and those are the figures submitted to him by the contractor.

I wonder whether the minister or the corporation would consider whether, after perhaps two or three years of trying to get building costs down by consistently making smaller approved lending values than the figures given in tenders, and when that policy appears to have failed, they would not consider bringing the approved lending value up to the same proportion of the actual cost of construction as applies in other communities?

Mr. Winters: In reply to that I can say that, rather than cause hardship, the whole purpose of the clause in the bill is to alleviate hardship. It is designed to enable the corporation to make direct loans where, otherwise, no loans of any kind would be made. So the extent to which the prospective borrower can get any amount of a loan is some alleviation of what otherwise would be perhaps a hardship. We do hope that under the present bill, with the banks in a position to lend through their many branches, there will be an extension of lending by lending institutions in the smaller communities. We will have to wait and see how this operates to determine to what extent this section must be applied.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: In view of what the minister has said, I should like to ask him if in the course of the next few weeks he would please have the corporation look into the situation in Williams Lake in the light of the comments which I placed on the record at page 1559 of Hansard. Certainly there have been placed before me what are regarded as bona fide complaints or requests for alleviating action to be taken by the corporation.

Mr. Winters: I shall be pleased to bring that to the attention of the corporation.

Mr. Ellis: What amount of money has the corporation available for loans under the provisions of this section?

Mr. Winters: The answer to that is $250 million.

Mr. Ellis: Has the government ever made any loans under this section, or does it anticipate making any in areas where lending institutions for one reason or another will not make loans? I am thinking of sections of a city in which the established lending institutions will not make loans, and I am asking whether under those circumstances the government would consider that Central Mortgage should make loans under clause 40?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, we have gone pretty far in making this section operative. We have extended it to municipalities with a population of up to 55,000 or less as the lending institutions have withdrawn their own operations. The purpose of this section is to enable the corporation to make loans where the lending institutions are not operating. The government believes that there is a field for operation by lending institutions in large metropolitan areas and for that reason it has not been the practice of the corporation to make direct loans in large centres of population.

Mr. Ellis: Simply because there are lending institutions in a community does not assure that persons in that community are going to be able to get any money. It has been pointed out by a number of hon. members that there are certain areas where loans are not available. I believe the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam mentioned certain areas in his constituency where the lending institutions will not advance loans for building purposes. Under those circumstances the people living in those areas are in exactly the same position for all practical purposes as those residing in areas where there are no lending institutions.

Mr. Winters: We are hopeful that with the admission of banks as lenders under this act, the situation will be helped substantially.

Mr. Regier: I should like to emphasize what has just been said by the hon. member for Regina City. I feel that the government should give serious consideration in the regulations to making all the provisions of this act available to people in suburban areas. Although people living in suburban areas are actually living in metropolitan areas they are excluded from the benefits of this section. The lending institutions insist that they will have nothing to do with houses except those being built in exclusive areas.

I think there is a splendid opportunity for the government to make this provision available to suburban areas where lots can be purchased in the neighbourhood of $1,000 instead of the $3,000 or $4,000 which must be paid for a lot in certain exclusive areas. In many respects the lots in these suburban areas have just as good a future as those in some of the older areas.

I can think of a number of federal ridings in British Columbia which have received no help under the National Housing Act. However, I do want to compliment the minister on some things he has done. I have had something to do with many of the 188 houses which have been built in British Columbia under this section. Our experience has been that we were able to do business with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under this section much more easily than we could have operated under part I of the act. I think the government is to be complimented upon giving some assistance to those areas in British Columbia where because of administration costs it must be a losing proposition for the government.

Mr. Knowles: May I put one question to the minister arising out of the discussion he and I had on Friday evening. If an individual in a city, like the city of Winnipeg, whose income is less than $3,800 applies to a bank for a loan and is turned down, and if the bank fails to initiate conversations with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as to whether the loan should be granted, could that individual make a direct application to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for a loan?

Mr. Winters: He can apply but whether he gets the loan is another consideration.

Mr. Knowles: Have there been instances where such applications have been granted? My question, as to the past, would assume the substitution of life insurance companies for banks.

Mr. Winters: We have records of a number of instances where prospective borrowers were unable in their first approach to the lending institution to convince them they were good mortgage risks. After speaking to us, and we in turn have spoken to the lending institution, loans have been made.

Mr. Knowles: By whom?

Mr. Winters: By the lending institution.

Mr. Knowles: So it is possible for an individual who has been turned down by a lending institution to bring the matter to the attention of the corporation?

Mr. Winters: That is possible.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is it possible that he might get a loan from the corporation in such event?

Mr. Winters: I think we covered that when we discussed the practice of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation staying out of the field in which private lending institutions operate.

Mr. Noseworthy: Why should the application of subsection 1 be limited to communities of a certain size? This reads:

> Where in the opinion of the corporation a loan is not being made available to a person pursuant to part I or section 15, the corporation may make a loan to such person to assist in the construction of a house—

Why not administer the act as it is written instead of bringing in a provision saying that it will be applicable only in the case of certain smaller communities?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, this section of the act is being administered in accordance with parliament's intent. This was put on the statute books to enable the corporation to make direct loans in those areas where the lending institutions are not normally operating. It has been the practice for lending institutions to operate in the larger centres of population and for that reason Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has not made a practice of making loans in those areas.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 41 and 42 agreed to.

On clause 43—Each part to come into force upon proclamation.

Mr. Knowles: This section provides for the coming into force of the various parts of this bill. I should like to address a question to the minister with respect to what might be done before part I is brought into effect. The other night I asked the minister whether consideration would be given to making it possible for the substantial sums of money which are set aside in pension funds to be loaned on the basis of insured mortgages for the building of homes. I was pleased to have the minister's reply, as reported on page 2733 of Hansard of March 5, when he said in part:

—we are prepared to recommend that pension funds be made eligible to approved lenders, for the purpose of making insured loans.

It has been suggested to me that in some instances there are pension funds in the hands of trade union organizations where the rate of interest being earned is not quite as large as is expected to be the rate for loans under this legislation. It has been represented to me that some of these trade union pension funds might be available for housing at the same low interest rates which they are now earning, rather than at the maximum rate that could be allowed under this act. Will the minister consider permitting such trade union pension funds to lend money on the basis he announced the other night and to loan these funds at a rate of interest below what the banks are likely to charge, or in other words at a rate more in line with what they are now getting on these funds?

Mr. Winters: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that would be a very pleasant development. Section 21 defines a lender as follows:

. . . insurance, trust or other company or corporation, trustee of trust funds,— —and so on. That would qualify the pension fund to which my hon. friend has referred. Clause 4, subclause 2, provides that the rate of interest prescribed under subsection 1 shall not exceed the interest rate of long-term government bonds by more than the specified amount so there is no reason why the interest rate cannot be less than the maximum prescribed under the act.

Mr. Knowles: Then perhaps the trade unions might be in on the administration so they could encourage the banks to follow the same course.

Bill reported.

Mr. Winters moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, before this bill is given third reading I would like to state that I regret very much I cannot support it in many respects. While it purports to give some advantages to those seeking to build homes, I believe those advantages will not transpire. In fact, I think they will prove to be mere illusions.

It is said, for example, that there will be an advantage in the lower down payment. It is true a few dollars will be saved on the down payment but the interest rate will be higher, and any benefit which might accrue from a saving on the down payment will be swallowed up in the increased rate of interest over the years. All this bill presents is a hope on the part of the government that the banks will be induced to put some money into house building to replace the money which the government formerly supplied under the joint loan system, and possibly to make up for the money which the lending institutions may not advance in the future.

There is a hope, but there is very little evidence that there is much ground for that hope, and there is very little assurance that the banks will be sufficiently interested to put a sizeable amount of money into house building. Certainly there is no assurance that the 25 per cent which the government formerly put in under the joint loan system will be made up through loans advanced by the banks, and there is considerable evidence that the lending institutions may make fewer loans available than in the past.

The bill does not solve our housing problem. It will be just as difficult for those in the lower income groups to get houses after this bill becomes law as it was under the old act. It will also be equally difficult to get the provinces and the municipalities to co-operate with the federal government in the provisions under clause 36 as regards low rental housing. Evidence was given before the committee to the effect that there is considerable public apathy towards clause 36, and that the municipalities are loath to take advantage of it. Recommendations were made suggesting ways in which the government could improve clause 36 whereby the provinces and the municipalities could be induced to enter into an agreement with the federal government for the provision of low rental housing.

For those who need the houses most, this bill will be a disappointment. It will offer them very little more than the bill which it is designed to replace. One feature which I believe is open to criticism is that no one knows at this stage what the interest rates will be on loans. When the minister was asked whether he would consider fixing a limit for the interest rate and, if necessary, introducing a subsidy, we were told that that would be determined by government policy. But if there is any place in which government policy should be considered it is in this house now, before this bill is given third reading.

The government should continue subsidizing the interest rate, as it has been doing all through the years under the joint loan arrangement. It can do so, and it can fix a limit above which the interest rate will not go, and if necessary subsidize that interest rate just as it has been doing over the years.

Before this bill is given third reading, Mr. Speaker, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That Bill No. 102 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house for the purpose of amending it so as to provide a fixed limit as to the rate of interest to be charged on loans made under the provisions of the said act.

I know there will be criticism of this amendment on the ground that we are holding up an act which is necessary in order to enable us to get our spring building operations going; but this bill is going to determine the extent to which the people of Canada will be able to get houses not only this spring but next spring and possibly for years to come. Consequently, I suggest that we give this bill more consideration before it receives its third reading.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on this amendment. I do not think there is anyone in the house who has put forth his views any more energetically than have we of the Social Credit party. I am in accord with what the amendment suggests in the matter of protesting to the government because they did not see fit to implement some of the suggestions we made. We think that had the government adopted some of the proposals which we have suggested in this debate they might have found them to be of a great deal of assistance. We suggested in this house that there should be a lowering of the interest rate. We went further than that. We pointed out how we thought this interest rate could be lowered, but the government has not seen fit to go as far as we should like them to go.

When I say that I intend to support the amendment, may I say that it is merely in protest because the government has not seen fit to go as far as we should like them to go. I want to say that, when the amendment is disposed of, we propose to support the bill because, in my judgment, it is better than the old bill. I think it will bring some assistance to those in the lower income groups. In the matter of home ownership it certainly does not assist those in the income groups below $3,000. We think there is a way to solve that problem whereby a great many people in the lower income group could be assisted. But even though the bill does not go as far as we should like it to go, we are going to support it because we think it is an improvement over the last one and will bring some assistance to the people of Canada. I would hate to place myself in the position of voting against the bill itself because its defeat would deprive many people of badly needed houses. We shall therefore support the bill although we do not think it goes as far as it should or as far as we should like to see it go.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to say a brief word with regard to this amendment. In the first place, I believe its adoption would take much valuable time at this particular stage when we are heading into a construction season. The builders should have the act before them so as to know just exactly what are its provisions and what their operations will be under it. I think all hon. members would wish this bill to become law at the earliest possible date. If one can assess the feeling of the house, as judged by the recent debate on the employment situation, one would certainly arrive quickly at that conclusion.

As to the fixed limit for interest rates, the upper limit is now fixed in relation to long-term government bond rates. I therefore do not believe that the amendment would achieve anything of substance in that regard. After the committee was fully apprized of the reasons for having the interest rate formula in the bill in the manner it is, I recall that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), speaking on behalf of the official opposition, said he was satisfied that it was in the public interest to have the interest rate flexible in the legislation so that the borrowing public could take advantage of any downward adjustment in the rate on long-term government bonds. The government feels it is in the public interest to have the interest rate determined as it is in the bill. I must therefore say that the government intends to oppose this amendment.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say just one word in reply to the minister? Obviously I shall support the amendment. The minister suggests that one of the reasons he is opposed to the amendment is that it might take time to make this alteration in the bill. Surely he does not advance that argument seriously. I trust he realizes that the other place has recessed until Thursday so that, even if we pass the bill today or tomorrow, it cannot become law until some time after this coming Thursday.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Just before the vote is taken on the amendment, Mr. Speaker, without in any way questioning the interpretation of what has already been said on behalf of the opposition and on behalf of our party in connection with this matter, I should say that I believe this is a subject that is causing a great deal of concern. I have received a great many questions as to why it is that the interest rate is going to be so much higher than the amount that is paid by the government for money that is borrowed. The problem in regard to a flexible interest rate is one that presents a real question. However, I think a great deal more could be done to explain exactly why this course is being followed and why it is that the interest rate that will be charged here is substantially in excess of the interest payments that will be paid in connection with the money itself. I think the reasons are apparent why there are certain charges that must be borne in one way or another.

As to this amendment, I do not feel at this stage that I could support it. I must say that there have been given in support of it certain explanations with which I could not agree. However, that fact would not affect the matter if the wording were in itself not open to objection of any kind. But for the reasons which have been given by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), subject to all of the weaknesses that have been pointed out, it is felt that this bill should now proceed and that the government should have an opportunity to make it work to the best advantage possible.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): The fact that the Liberal Senate will not be available until Thursday, Mr. Speaker, means that there is no great haste for getting this legislation through today, which gives us another chance to have a look at it. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) said this afternoon that the government was withdrawing from the housing field. I am not sure if that was entirely correct. Certainly they are withdrawing so far as the quarter share of joint loans is concerned, but the government is not withdrawing from that area where guarantees have to be given to free enterprise before we can get homes. I suspect free enterprise never would work in any event were the government to refrain from giving it the guarantees which it has today.

The most serious omission in this legislation in our opinion is the withdrawal of the quarter share of the joint loan on the part of the government. The reason for it, I do not know. It may be that the government felt that the prospects were good for the building of 125,000 homes this year. Perhaps the government felt that would absorb the capacity of the industry. Again, I do not know. But I do know this, that the government is not thinking in terms of the very near future and I do not put that "near future" later than next year when there will be demands for homes which have been left unsatisfied.

The situation today is that the government is going to refrain from lending its quarter share under the joint loan scheme. The lending companies are not going to lend as much as in the past. We have no idea what the banks are going to lend, if anything at all. Since homes can only be constructed with the help of money or by credit resulting from such security, we fear that there are going to be less homes built under this legislation in the long run than might have been the case under the old legislation which is now going into limbo. The fact is that less money has become available, and by making less money available this government hopes more homes will become available. That is the logic of free enterprise to which we do not adhere.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight):

That Bill No. 102 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house for the purpose of amending it so as to provide for the reinstatement of participation by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in joint loans for the construction of new houses.

Mr. Speaker: If an amendment to third reading of a bill must refer to provisions contained therein, it seems to me that to move the recommittal of a bill at this stage with instructions to insert a clause involving expenditures cannot be moved by a private member. Citation 710 of Beauchesne's third edition indicates the restrictions to amendments to third reading. It reads as follows:

The question for the third reading is put immediately after the report from the committee of the whole. All amendments which may be moved on the second reading of a bill may be moved on the third reading with the restriction that they cannot deal with any matter which is not contained in the bill.

The participation of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in joint loans was not included in the bill, and an amendment providing for it in committee would have to be moved by a minister. The minister sponsoring the measure has already declared his objection to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North which, if adopted, would constitute a direct order to the government to do a thing which cannot be done without the expenditure of money. In view of these considerations and of citation 453 of Beauchesne's third edition, I cannot receive the amendment.

Is the house ready for the question?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

THE BANK ACT

PROVISION FOR DECENNIAL REVISION, EXTENSION OF CHARTERS, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 338, respecting banks and banking.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the revision and re-enactment of the Bank Act and for the renewal of existing bank charters for a further period of ten years. It is one of the most important items on the agenda of this session of parliament. At the same time I think it will be found that in its essential aspects it is a non-controversial bill. There will, of course, be differences of view on particular points, and various groups in the house will differ on the emphasis they place on certain parts of the bill. But if I gauge the sense of the house correctly there is general agreement that within the framework of our accepted economic structure our banking system is an excellent system; that it is efficient; it gives good service; it commands the confidence of the Canadian people; and it is highly regarded abroad.

I realize, of course, my hon. friends in the C.C.F. group believe that in due course, and as part of a general policy of socialization, the commercial banks should come under public ownership and operation. For those who accept their ultimate objective such a position is not illogical, but I take it that we are not at this time initiating a debate on socialism in general and that is why I suggest that in its essential aspects this is a non-controversial bill. It is nevertheless, as I have said, a very important bill. I hope, in fact, all interested members will consider it carefully and that it will receive careful and constructive scrutiny in the banking and commerce committee.

Before dealing with the bill itself, perhaps hon. members would be interested in a very brief statement on the history of banking in Canada. The first institution to offer full banking services in British North America was formed in 1817 in Montreal. The first Canadian bank to operate under a charter commenced business in Saint John, New Brunswick, in 1820.

At the time the first four provinces entered confederation, parliament endorsed and continued the charters of the provincially incorporated banks. At July 1, 1867, in the new Canada, there were 29 bank charters which were active or to become active. In addition there were three in Prince Edward Island and one in British Columbia.

Since confederation, 77 banks have obtained charters, of which 39 actually commenced business. The other 38 failed to open their doors to the public because, so far as can be ascertained, they were unable to raise sufficient capital.

In 1880 there were 36 banks in actual operation, 38 in 1890, 36 in 1900, 25 in 1913, 11 in 1923, 10 in 1934 and 1944, and at the present time there are 11.

Of the 72 banks which have operated under the Bank Act since confederation, 26 have failed and 35 have been absorbed by other banks. Of the 26 that failed, 13 were wound up without loss to noteholders or depositors. In the other 13 cases depositors suffered varying degrees of loss. While the losses suffered by the creditors and shareholders of some of the latter banks were unfortunate, they had a salutary effect. It compelled all other banks to strengthen their management and internal controls, and parliament from time to time passed legislation to improve the safeguards and protect the funds of depositors and shareholders. I should add that the last bank failure in Canada occurred more than 30 years ago. As hon. members know, our banking system weathered the economic storm of the 1930's in a manner of which we may well be proud.

The 11 banks which comprise our commercial banking system today have a combined age of almost 900 years, the oldest bank having been incorporated 136 years ago, and the youngest less than a year ago.

[Mr. Abbott.]

The latter incorporation was an important event in our banking history, as only one other bank—and that in 1929—has commenced business in Canada in over 40 years. With the exception of these two, each of our banks has been in business for over 80 years.

In 1871 the parliament of Canada passed its first bank act. One of its most important provisions was the extension of the charters for a period of ten years, and the consequential principle of a decennial revision of the Bank Act. It has been said that this period was chosen by agreement between the government and the bankers of the time, as both were of the opinion that there should be a periodic review of the legislation and of the manner in which the banking system was operating.

With the exception of four occasions, on which the charters were extended for one-year periods, because parliament wished to defer consideration of the act, there have been decennial extensions of charters ever since.

The principle of the decennial revision is an important one. It provides a good balance between stability and flexibility, between tradition and change. I am glad there is general agreement on this principle. Conditions in all countries change with the passage of time, and this is especially so in a rapidly expanding country like Canada.

In each decade as we review the Bank Act we ought to look both backward and forward; backward to see what weaknesses need to be remedied or what gaps need to be filled, and forward to make sure that our banking system has the capacity to meet the expanding needs and the changing circumstances of the future.

Ten years ago, in 1944, parliament gave careful study, not just to the Bank Act itself, but also to a group of related measures which, taken together, formed a coherent pattern for dealing with our expectations of the post-war period. In that year parliament not only revised the Bank Act, but it also created the industrial development bank, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Export Credits Insurance Corporation and passed the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Experience has shown that these were all good measures, and collectively they played a very large part in the relative smoothness of our post-war readjustments and in our progress and expansion since that time.

This year, in 1954, our legislative program in respect of banking is incorporated in four measures—the Bank of Canada Act amendments, the sections of the housing act relating to insured mortgages, the bill now before us, and the act relating to the Quebec savings banks. The first two have already been approved in principle. I am now inviting the house to approve the third, and the last will be introduced shortly.

I thought we had a very useful discussion on the resolution preceding the introduction of this bill. I appreciated the thoughtful and moderate speech of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). He will not expect me to agree with all the implications of his remarks or with the precise balance of his emphasis. But I felt it was a good speech, that it recorded a useful degree of progress toward a mutual understanding of these matters, and I am glad to accept his invitation to deal briefly with the fundamental points he raised. He mentioned nine major factors which determine the course of economic progress and prosperity, and he concluded that they could be pretty well summed up in the dominant role of the regulation of the volume of bank deposits. The control of bank credit is, of course, a very important matter; but I would not be prepared to go as far as my friend from Peace River when he says, or implies, that if you look after bank deposits everything else will take care of itself.

It seems to me that steady and sustained economic progress depends upon two broad sets of factors. One is monetary, the other is non-monetary. The non-monetary factors include such basic things as the skill and efficiency of our people in applying their energies to our available resources. Constantly improving productivity is essential. Without it the most ingenious and efficient monetary arrangements will not get us very far. Skill, energy and efficiency together with confidence, integrity and a spirit of adventure—these are the foundations of economic progress.

But in a complex economic society sound monetary arrangements are also essential. I agree that the control and regulation of bank credit is important, but I would not assign it such an overriding importance as does the hon. member for Peace River. I prefer to think in terms of three related and interlocking factors: 1, the variation in cash reserves with its effects on bank credit and bank deposits; 2, the interest rate structure, with its effects on saving and spending and on the allocation of productive resources among the many competing claims; and 3, the effects of over-all fiscal policy. None of these are independent variables, each reacts upon the others; and the essential task of monetary and fiscal policy is to harmonize these several factors and use them to direct and encourage the economy as a whole in the right direction and at the most desirable pace. There are times and circumstances when major reliance should be placed upon fiscal policy; at other times the brakes should be applied or relaxed chiefly through variations in cash reserves; at still other times or places influencing the interest rate structure, as a whole or at some point, may be the most sensible approach. I do not think you can generalize for all times or for all circumstances.

In other words the administration of monetary policy requires a high degree of skill and good judgment. It requires selecting the right means or combination of means, and applying those means at the right time and place and in just about the right degree. For this, there is no simple formula.

One last point, before I leave these general considerations. There is a tendency in general monetary discussions to overlook the international elements in the problem. Too often the argument is developed in relation to what economists, I believe, call "a closed economy". Canada, of course, is almost the very opposite to a closed economy. We live by trade and are exposed to all the economic winds of the world around us. We cannot hope, indeed we should not wish, to insulate ourselves against the world.

This means two things. First, we can never expect to be free from a certain amount of economic ups and downs transmitted to us from abroad; and, second, for that very reason we should assist wherever possible in promoting sensible international trade and monetary co-operation, while at the same time keeping our own economy as efficient and as flexible as possible in both its physical and monetary aspects.

I turn now to the substance of the bill before us. I shall not attempt, nor would it be in accordance with the rules, to deal with all the numerous changes proposed. A great many of these are technical, some of them indeed purely verbal to improve the language or clarify the meaning. I shall deal first with changes of substance or principle which will affect the general public.

One of the most important amendments proposed is a change in the method of calculating the cash reserves of a bank and the minimum rate thereof. I referred to this change at some length when speaking on the amendments to the Bank of Canada Act, and I am sure it is not necessary to repeat all of the explanations which I gave at that time. The minimum cash reserve ratio is to be increased to 8 per cent of Canadian dollar deposit liabilities and, as hon. members will recall, there is an amendment proposed in the Bank of Canada Act to permit the Bank of Canada to vary that rate from time to time, within a range of 8 to 12 per cent. The basis of calculation is to be changed to a monthly average instead of the daily basis now in effect. This will permit much more flexibility, as a bank may allow its cash reserve ratio to fall below the minimum rate for several days to meet temporary emergencies, providing that it reaches the required average over the entire month.

Another important amendment relates to the power of banks to lend on insured mortgages. The first bank act of 1871 prohibited the banks from lending money on the security of mortgages on real or immovable property, and this prohibition has remained in subsequent acts. There is no doubt that during the early development stages of this country, with a high loss factor and the lack of liquidity of mortgage investments at certain periods, this was a wise provision and contributed greatly to the safety record of the banks. The Farm Improvement Loans Act in 1944 and the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act in 1946 provided that, notwithstanding anything in the Bank Act, a bank was authorized, under certain circumstances, to make a guaranteed loan on the security of a mortgage. This house has just completed consideration of a revision of the National Housing Act, of which one of the principal features is authority to the banks to lend money for residential construction on the security of mortgages insured by a government agency.

This major change in bank legislation was given very careful consideration before it was proposed to parliament and it is believed that with the insurance, amortization requirements and other liquidity features, this type of mortgage lending will become a safe investment for a portion of the bank funds and will provide a useful additional source of funds for this very important sector of the economy of our country.

It has been suggested in some quarters that a limit should be placed upon the aggregate amount that a bank may lend on this type of security, but I am not in favour of a restriction of this kind. A limit established by legislation is likely to become a target, either for the lender or for those who wish more to be loaned. Conditions will alter from time to time as between one bank and another and for the system as a whole, and I prefer to leave this matter to the good judgment of those whose duty it is to invest wisely the funds entrusted to them.

For some years the banks, by means of loans, have been assisting materially in the development of the country's oil resources. When the act was drafted in 1944 this part of a bank's business was relatively unimportant, and the provisions relating to the security which may be taken for such loans are not entirely satisfactory under present-day conditions. To permit the banks to give to this very important industry the measure of financial support which is required, a new section containing very extensive provisions has been inserted in the bill.

Section 88 of the Bank Act is a unique piece of banking legislation. Some of its provisions have a history in Canadian banking which commenced long before confederation. In changing form it has carried the same section number in each act since 1913. I believe that, for the most part, it has proven satisfactory in its present form and the only change I am proposing at this time in the lending provisions is authority to the banks to lend money to farmers for the purchase of seed potatoes. In the other provisions regarding notices of intention to give security, several changes have been made on the recommendations of the banks and Bank of Canada. These relate almost entirely to the routine of filing, registration, release and cancellation of such notices, and are intended to enable the Bank of Canada to dispose of obsolete records and notices.

The Bank Act of 1871 authorized the banks, with certain restrictions, to issue notes for circulation in Canada, and in 1897 authority was given for the issue of notes in any British possession outside Canada where the bank had a branch and where this was not contrary to the laws of the country. After the advent of the Bank of Canada in 1935 the chartered banks' note issues were gradually withdrawn. In January, 1950, the banks paid to the Bank of Canada approximately $13½ million, an amount equal to their outstanding Canadian notes, and thereafter the Bank of Canada became liable to redeem the notes on presentation. With this payment the additional liability, often referred to as the "double liability", which formerly attached to a bank's shares in proportion to its outstanding note issue, was extinguished.

For many years the cost of foreign note issue including taxes has made this an unprofitable operation, and the banks have been reducing the outstanding amount as occasion has permitted. It is now approximately equivalent to $130,000. The bill before you provides that all note-issuing privileges of the banks shall cease and also for methods of retiring the foreign note circulation now outstanding.

I turn next to a group of amendments relating to the incorporation and the share capital of banks. I am proposing an amendment to provide that if parliament is not sitting during the last month of the ten-year period for which this act authorizes the banks to carry on business the authority is extended until 60 days after the next session commences. This, of course, is meant solely as a safeguard in case parliament should rise before or during that last month without dealing with this act and thus leave the banks without authority to carry on.

Another amendment is to increase the amount of capital that a newly-incorporated bank must have before it commences business. The present requirements are a minimum subscribed capital of $500,000 and a minimum paid-up capital of $250,000. These requirements were established in 1890, and with the greatly increased costs likely to be incurred in bringing a bank into profitable operation under today's conditions a larger amount of initial capital is considered necessary. In this bill the minimum subscribed capital is stated at $1,000,000 and the minimum paid-up capital at $500,000.

With the rapid and very substantial growth in the assets of the banks during the past few years it has become desirable for some of them to obtain new capital. There are difficulties attached to making a new issue of capital stock under the provisions of the present act if the bank has shareholders resident in countries where considerable detailed information must be filed before the issue of capital stock by a foreign bank is approved. An amendment to the present procedure with respect to the allotment of new stock which will help to overcome this obstacle is proposed.

When there was additional liability attached to the bank shares for the purpose of protecting the note issue it was essential that the shares could be transferred only by registration on the books of the bank. This protection is no longer necessary, and a proposed amendment authorizes each bank, if it so wishes, to provide by bylaw for another method of share transfer.

The present act provides for the procedure when one bank purchases all or part of the assets of another bank. Because of legislation which imposes a tax on the undistributed income of a corporation when it is wound up, a bank which is solvent but recognizes that its future may be limited is, in effect, prevented from joining with another bank. Section 100 of this bill provides a procedure for the amalgamation of two banks and their continuance thereafter as a single entity.

Hon. members will find in this bill several changes in the provisions relating to the financial statements and periodic returns made by the banks. These changes, intended to clarify and improve the information in the statements and returns, have been made after consideration of recommendations received from the banks and their auditors.

At present the banks are required to file an annual return of unclaimed deposits, drafts and accepted cheques after they have remained unpaid for a period of five years and each year thereafter until they are paid to the owner or to the Bank of Canada in trust. The returns now filed contain as many as 25,000 names. They require a substantial amount of work to prepare and, as far as can be ascertained, relatively few payments to creditors have resulted therefrom.

I am proposing in this bill that the returns contain only the details of amounts unclaimed for a period of over nine years, that is, one year before they are paid to the Bank of Canada in trust, if still unclaimed. The returns will then contain between 4,500 and 5,000 names, and it is provided that this information will be published in the Canada Gazette. It is hoped that publication will result in more amounts being returned to their rightful owners.

At the time of the 1944 revision of this act it was provided that the banks should make an annual return of earnings and expenses in a form which now appears in the act as schedule Q. A compilation for all banks of these returns and of the averages for 15 years has since been tabled annually in parliament and published in the Canada Gazette. Hon. members will, no doubt, have noticed the last statement in the Canada Gazette of February 13 of this year.

When the 15-year period was chosen for the return it was not considered sufficiently long to present a fair basis for average figures of earnings, expenses and losses, but as there was no relative information available with respect to the banks which ceased to operate during the twenties, this was the longest period for which reliable comparative figures could be obtained.

I am now proposing a change in schedule Q to lengthen the period of averages to 25 years, which is considered a more suitable basis for a report of this kind.

In that connection, I believe hon. members would be interested in a few comparative figures which indicate the growth of our banking system in the last quarter century. At the end of 1928 the banks reported total assets of approximately $3,470 million. At December 31, 1953, the reported assets had expanded almost threefold and amounted to $10,140 million.

The following figures give the distribution of profits for the average of the 25 financial years of the banks ending in 1953: Profits after taxes, but before losses and provision for losses on investments, loans, and other assets amounted to $36·6 million. That is dealt with in the following manner:

Dividends paid to shareholders, $14 million.
Additions to profit and loss accounts and to rest accounts including amounts retransferred from contingency reserves, net, $3·5 million.
Losses and provision for losses on investments, loans and other assets, net, $12·4 million.
Additions to contingency reserves, net, $6·7 million.

It will be noted that the latter figure of $6·7 million is about 2½ per cent of the $266·8 million average increase in assets for the same period.

As the house is aware, it is my responsibility under the Income Tax Act to inform the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) if, in my opinion, transfers in any year to the contingency reserves of a bank are excessive. There have been very few occasions in the past ten years when this has occurred. The total of such excess transfers for all banks in the fiscal years 1944 and 1945 amounted to $378,000, on which full taxes were paid. Subject to final audit of the reports for the fiscal years ending in 1953, no excess transfers have been made by the banks in any of the last eight years.

Finally, there are certain changes relating to the internal management of the banks' affairs which should be mentioned. The present act requires the pension funds of the banks to be invested in securities in which a trustee may invest under the Trust Companies Act. A bank pension fund is usually under the management of a board consisting of the directors and members of the staff of the bank, and is maintained in part by contributions from the staff and to a greater extent by contributions from the bank. It is the practice to have an actuarial survey of the fund at least once in every five years, and for the bank to make up any deficiencies which occur because of changing rates of income and other factors. In my opinion the management of these funds should be left to those concerned, and I am recommending that the present investment restrictions be withdrawn with the exception that no contribution be permitted to a fund that invests in bank stocks.

There are changes also in the provisions relating to the bank auditors. It is now usual for bank auditors to act in an advisory capacity with respect to many matters outside the scope of a normal audit, such as income tax returns, capital stock issues and accounting methods and routines, and it is provided that they may be engaged for and remunerated for such special work, if it is approved by the directors of the bank.

[Mr. Abbott.]

In the 1944 act provision was made for destruction of bank records in which the entries had been made more than 30 years before. The accumulation and storage of a vast quantity of paid cheques and obsolete records has become a major problem with the banks, and it is now proposed to reduce to 20 years the period for which such documents are to be kept, with a provision that the signature cards and other identification records pertaining to an account transferred to the Bank of Canada in trust shall be kept as long as they are required.

There are a great number of changes from the 1944 act in this bill consequential upon some of those to which I have referred. In particular, the elimination of the provisions relating to note issues has meant a redrafting and redistribution of a great many of the sections in the act. None of these make any important changes of substance or of principle, and therefore require no explanation at this time. At the conclusion of this debate I propose to move that this bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee, where hon. members will be able to obtain all the detailed information and explanations they may require.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I can sum up by saying that the only really important changes of principle in this decennial revision of the Bank Act relate to cash reserves and lending on insured mortgages. These changes themselves are not new or untried developments. They flow naturally from our own experience and from the experience of other reasonably comparable countries. They follow the precepts of "conservative innovation" and the "matching of new institutions to old" described nearly a century ago by that great authority on English banking, Walter Bagehot.

That the experience of the last ten years, which has included such confused, difficult and complex problems as well as such an unprecedented rate of Canadian growth and development, should require so few major changes is a tribute both to the wisdom of our predecessors in parliament and to the skill and integrity of those responsible for the operation of our banking system. Canada has been well served both by its central bank and by its chartered banks. Doubtless there have been faults in the past, and faults of degree or of timing can hardly be avoided in the future, for banking and monetary management will always be matters of skill and judgment and a careful assessment of risks.

Whether we look back 10, 50 or 80 years, I think we can be proud of the Canadian banking system which has developed with the country, adapted itself to our own conditions, learned from its past mistakes, and steadily expanded in size, strength and flexibility, and in the confidence it commands both at home and abroad.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all listened with great interest to the minister's review of the situation. We can agree fully with him as to the importance of this measure, and we can agree also with the wisdom of having this decennial review.

I understand it was established some short time after confederation when it was felt both by the government and the banks that it was well worth while to have this periodic review in order to assess what had been done, to take stock of the situation, and to see what changes required to be made.

The review of ten years ago contained a good deal of spirited argumentation not merely because there were some views from the gentlemen on my far left, but also because on the government side itself very strong views developed among some of its members as to the inexpediency of some of the provisions of the act.

I shall not deal at any length with what the minister said today. The points he raised will naturally come before the committee. I agree fully with what he said at the conclusion of his remarks, namely that the two important things in the bill are the cash reserves and the new powers to make mortgage loans. Without pursuing the matter further, may I say that I was struck with what seemed to me to be a superficial inconsistency. I stress the word "superficial", because it may be that in committee I shall be constrained to change my mind. I notice that the minister on the one hand said that he was not in favour of fixing any limit in connection with mortgage loans to be made by the banks. That emphasized what had been in my mind already, namely just why in the matter of the cash reserves it is felt necessary to become more rigid and mechanical. I raise the question as to the ratio of reserves which, through the practice of decades—one might almost say of centuries—has proved a satisfactory working arrangement. Why does this now need to be altered in the way proposed? But that is a matter for the committee.

Any temptation I might have had to indulge in a historical review I think has been entirely swept away, because the minister himself has given us a good many interesting points in connection with early banking. There is only one point I wish to make. Though in fact I think our banking system may be said, in the main, to follow the Scottish system, nevertheless I read to my interest in the Macmillan report:

> It is generally agreed that the Canadian banking system is a direct descendant of the first bank of the United States . . .

I read that with interest. The report goes on to say that in the charter of the Bank of Montreal, which was the first charter, actually a considerable amount of wording from this United States bank charter was to be found. I mention that fact purely as a matter of interest.

The minister has also dealt with the disappearance of the double liability which used to be such a great feature of our banking system, and has explained that it has disappeared as the individual bank notes have disappeared. I recall one interesting historical point. When the banks were free to issue notes there was a special provision by which they could increase the note issue for the moving of the wheat crop, for which privilege, incidentally, they paid a special tax.

As we pause for a moment to reflect on our banking service, it seems to me to be worth while to remind ourselves what an amazing service it really is, if you take time to consider that we can send money almost anywhere in the world practically instantaneously, even by telegraph if we wish to do so, and that it costs us nothing but a four-cent stamp—no, I mean a five-cent stamp—to send a cheque, when we pay by cheque. It seems to me that the service is one that we have become so accustomed to that we forget actually what an amazing convenience it is that almost within a stone's throw of each of us we have a fully equipped banking service which can do business for us anywhere in the world.

In the second place I think we are fortunate to have 11 competing banks. The minister has already referred to the new bank that came in this year, namely the Mercantile Bank, with a Dutch background. I think we are fortunate to have this addition to our financial equipment, because actually they bring in a background of experience somewhat different from that of our own banks. Of course behind regulating, advising and sometimes virtually controlling the actions of the chartered banks, we have the Bank of Canada which has now been in existence for 20 years and which has rendered services that we all know about.

I want to say a word about one aspect of our banking system which I think is of vast importance, namely our branch system. We realize that it was a tremendous strength to us in the early thirties when United States banks were going down like ninepins. In our system of a small number of banks with a large number of branches we are really like an army with many divisions, with a general reserve available for all. Although legal arrangements have strengthened their position in the last few years, the United States banks at one time really had to carry their own reserves, with the results that we saw only too unhappily in 1932. Of course it was a well-known fact that many United States banks which then had to close their doors had plenty of assets but were not able to realize them quickly enough.

I now want to add a sentence or two about early banking in order to recall to our minds that in the beginning, banking really was just custody of property. Men of reputation and probity were asked to take care of the valuables of other people. That was the way it began. To deposit merely meant leaving valuables with a dependable person. Next came discount; that was the purpose of bills of exchange. Then last of all there was the question of issue, and along with it came the development of payment by cheque. All of this was completed by the end of the seventeenth century and that virtually set us up with banking as we know it today.

As I say, the business of banking began with deposits. The lifeblood of banks is deposits. We cannot walk a hundred yards in any of our cities without seeing advertisements urging us to deposit our money in banks. As we know, that raises questions which I do not propose to delve into here. I am not going to pronounce judgment as to whether we lend deposits or the proceeds of deposits. Those who have the time to read the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee of ten years ago will find that that was a question which was argued at that time. The one thing I wish to stress is that the conception we seem sometimes to run across, namely that the banks have piled up in a corner huge amounts of money that they might lend if they wished, is something we must get away from. We must try to clear our minds, at any rate, and to remember that deposits are liabilities of the bank.

If you take any bank statement, here is what you will find. I have here the statement of one of the larger banks. If you look at the asset side you will find first of all that there is some $600 million cash or its equivalent; then there are $1,700 million of government and other securities. Following that there are some $700 million of current loans. On the other side, the liability side, you will find a liability which overshadows all other liabilities—indeed it is about nine-tenths of the whole of the liabilities—namely the deposits, amounting in this case to $2,527 million. I am just raising this point, Mr. Speaker, because it seems to me that we should try to have a clear view as to what is the situation when we talk about loans.

I want to say just one word about credit. Much excitement has been caused from time to time by misunderstanding of the banks' function of creating credit. Banks do create credit. I want to read a brief word on credit from the budget speech of Mr. Dunning in April of 1939. As reported at page 3144 of Hansard of that year he said:

> The policy which has been followed has been one designed to expand money and credit as rapidly as the needs of the public require, but not so rapidly as to create an unhealthy, speculative expansion which would be bound to end in a serious depression.

What really happens is that when banks create credit, what they do is, as it were, to turn into money, in advance, goods which are going to be created. Let us consider the situation, for example, in the fall of 1939. We all remember what the position was then. There had been a good deal of unemployment. Then we ran into a situation where goods were needed, materials were available, labour was available and purchasers were available. Then what do we find? We find that in the autumn of 1939 Mr. Ilsley brought in a budget in which he indicated that there was going to be $156 million—I think that is the figure—of a deficit deliberately incurred because it was necessary to stimulate business and get things started.

Let me give a simple case. You have a man who owns a stone quarry. Nearby is a line of railway which needs rock ballast. The owner of the quarry goes to the bank and states his case. He has the material and he has the labour. Transportation is available, a market is available, and he wants to borrow $100,000. The bank examine the situation. They have expert, skilled people who are able to estimate potential value. Let us assume that the bank considers the potential new wealth sufficient for repayment and a loan is granted. What is the result? The result is that the bank's assets and liabilities are both increased by the amount of the loan. On the asset side is the borrower's note; on the liability side is the new deposit. If the stone quarry succeeds the note will be repaid, which means that the wealth which has been created has, so to speak, caught up with the credit which was created in order to enable it to be done. Always, of course, the bank must have regard to its cash position, to its cash reserves held by itself and with the central bank.

There is another point I should like to make. The only way the banks have to earn money is to make loans. They are in business to lend as much as possible. That is the only source of their income. Sometimes people talk as if, somehow or other, the banks did not want to make loans, as if they were holding back and sitting on large sums of money which they did not want to lend. Of course that is absurd. The average bank manager wants to have his loans just as large as he safely can. The view is apparently held that in some way or other the banks can, by some magic process which I have never been able to understand, go ahead and really take the place of government. I want to read an extract from a speech made the other day by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and also one from a speech made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), both of whom we often hear in the house. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, as recorded at page 2660 of Hansard for March 4:

> . . . public ownership and control of the commercial banks is necessary if we are going to have complete control by the people over fiscal and monetary policies. We recognize and contend that those who control fiscal and monetary policies exercise tremendous control over the lives of our people.

The hon. member for Assiniboia said, as found at page 2661 of Hansard for March 4:

> . . . there is no assurance that when the nation is facing the possibility of a recession the chartered banks will do that which is in the interest of the nation at that time, namely, make the borrowing of money easier.

I want to make one or two comments on these statements because it seems to me they are all wrong, and that there is no justification for the views put forward. There is no justification for the view that the banks are going to hold back. But if I were the head of a bank I would not want to have to explain to the hon. member for Assiniboia, who is a big, strong fellow, that I had made so many bad loans I could not repay his deposit. In other words, when a banker is making a loan he has to have regard to his liabilities, particularly his cash, when he has a liability to a big, able-bodied man. I ask most seriously whether the hon. members to whom I have referred have thought this matter over in a really serious manner. I have tried to think it over, and I present my views for what they are worth.

I have tried to ask myself what would happen if the banks were nationalized. Let us imagine the banks nationalized. What happens the next day? You have the same men presumably, the same assets presumably, and very little change in personnel. The bank managers will be reporting to the same seniors to begin with, at any rate, but I submit that a change has taken place. I submit that we now have men who have become civil servants, who are subject to rigid legal requirements and strict regulations and are liable to criticism if they depart from them in any way. As far as these men are concerned, I suggest that actually it will probably not be easier but harder to get loans. I suggest there will be a new rigidity coming into the situation.

The other day I was struck by something said to me by a senior and very able official of one of the crown companies. He has come to his post from private business, and he said to me, "People come to me and want to make deals with me". He said, "They suggest to me that after all I need not be very tightly bound by legislation and that I could use my discretion". He said, "I cannot; I am bound by legislation". I think he was right.

In my own mind I was trying to compare his very senior position with that of the general manager of a chartered bank. He will have regulations to guide him, and of course he has a board of directors to whom he is responsible; but I suggest that he is a very much freer agent than my friend, the senior official of a crown company. I suggest that within a reasonable range he will be expected to use his discretion. Indeed, if he were tied and afraid ever to step a little to the right or to the left of strict regulation I suggest that his board of directors would tell him that he was not the man for their money at all. They would expect him to take responsibility and, as I say, to use his discretion.

That is the situation on the one side. Incidentally, so far as nationalizing the banks is concerned, I am going to point out in a moment that the socialists in England are apparently entirely cured of the desire, which I think they did have 20 years ago, to socialize the joint stock banks.

I want to come back to a second and what I think is a worse danger on the other side. I refer to the danger of political interference. Let us be candid and honest with each other. Let us assume there is a large company operating in a small town where it provides most of the employment. Let us suppose it has got into real difficulty and let us imagine the situation with the chartered banks as they are now and if you had them under government auspices.

If you have proper management of the chartered banks, as we have now, what will you find? You will find that there is every desire to help that company if it can properly be done, but nevertheless you will find that in the last analysis the matter will be decided on sound business principles because the officials of the bank always have in the back of their minds the strong obligation they owe to the depositors whose money they have. Now let us assume that you have the banks nationalized and let us assume, as I say, that you have this business operating in a small community where it is vital to the lifeblood of the community. Am I being unfair, am I being cynical if I say it is just not possible that the local member of parliament will not be approached and pressured to see that that company gets its loan? As a result the transaction will not be carried out on the basis of strict business principles.

Therefore it is my feeling that you would have two undesirable factors. First of all you would have an area in which there is rigidity, and in which loans will perhaps not be made as freely as they are now. Second, you would have an area which politics would certainly try to invade. I need not say that if loans are made on political principles I would be prepared to predict disaster in the end.

Here I mention again the English socialists. The Bank of England was nationalized. I have no criticism to make of that. I think the control of credit should be, as is the case in Canada now, in national hands. But the Bank of England, just as the Bank of Canada, does not engage in the conduct of ordinary business. It leaves that to the joint stock banks of England. They are not interfered with in their ordinary operations by the Bank of England. The English socialists have accepted that. I was talking to a well-informed economist from England the other day, and he said he thought the English socialists believe it is a good thing to have competition among the joint stock banks.

I submit further that in those two extracts I read from the speeches of the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre what they really wanted, whether or not they intended it, was the chartered banks to step outside their own prerogatives and undertake what is the business of the government. If business has to be stimulated, if projects have to be carried on which will stimulate activity, that is a matter for the government and not for the chartered banks. The banks are there to safeguard the interests of their depositors and, within that proviso of course, to make loans just as freely as they possibly can.

I want to say a word or two about the conditions facing our banks today, because it seems to me that they may be in difficulty. We have had 15 years of boom. Prices have been going up. Nearly everybody has made money, although failures are beginning to show up now. The banks have had really a rather easy time, you might say. It is always easy when prices are going up, provided they are not soaring in a wild, crazy fashion. As I say, the banks have had a rather easy time. Whether or not it is going to continue to be so easy we are not so sure at the moment. There is hesitation today. There is fear of what might happen in the United States. In the United States it is being said that March is their deadline. The other day our own Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) said this was an anxious time.

I want to take just a moment or two to indicate what I think are the processes of mind through which a banker goes when he is making a loan. He has, of course, to study the business. He must have a complete knowledge of the conditions affecting the borrower. I want to read just a word or two from an article appearing in the Globe and Mail of last Saturday by Wellington Jeffers pointing out, in what I thought was an interesting way, the extent to which the banks had organized themselves in connection with the new loans to which the minister referred this afternoon and to which section 82 will relate. He said:

> Some of the main banks have developed complete organizations for geological and statistical study of every new field and of the operations of companies working in it. They have their own geologists and a banker on this sort of work soon becomes one of the chief experts. All this organization is to enable the banks in this booming but speculative business to decide where loans would be justified because of hopeful operations and for the protection of the money loaned.

Then he goes on to say:

> The geologist of one of the great New York banks told me that this is one of the active lending sectors of United States banks and is based on geological studies which can now make clear in a proved, developing field how much oil or gas is below the ground just as much in many cases as though they were stored above ground.

This interested me, because it seemed to show at once the thoroughness and initiative which banks do show in helping the development of business in a country.

The banker must know, of course, in the case of a manufacturing business what is the productive capacity of the total industry in Canada, so as to be able to judge what competition his borrower is going to have. He must know something about the home market, the export market and competitive conditions both at home and abroad. He will be concerned, for example, with a remark made by Mr. Muir of the Royal Bank the other day. He said:

> Startling and unpleasant as it may be, however, there is evidence also that Canada is tending to become a high cost economy in which natural and artificial barriers prevent us from achieving the degree of flexibility and mobility required for orderly adjustment. One marked evidence of this inflexibility is to be found in the failure of retail prices to reflect the general fall, since 1951, in the prices of raw materials.

He will be concerned with another remark made by Mr. Muir to this effect:

> It was with this possibility in mind that I felt obliged last year to voice some doubts about the permanence of a prosperity built so largely on the "treacherous sands of consumer credit".

I am just trying, Mr. Speaker, to indicate how, as I see it, the banker views his business and the extent to which he must be an expert in conditions today. When I say "banker" of course I am thinking not only of the branch manager but of the senior officials right to the top, where he gets the most expert assistance available.

He will also have particularly to consider conditions in the United States. Are our prices really higher than those in the United States? Is it true that United States tourists no longer buy our goods when they come here because the prices are so high? Then he would, of course, consider the question of the premium on our money; that is a problem. It is a problem which, of course, is costing our manufacturers and exporters a great deal. For example, the newsprint people get paid in United States dollars and then have to take a sizeable discount. The same condition applies to other industries as well. This condition curtails exports and stimulates imports. It flatters our ego, perhaps, but it picks our pockets a bit, too. It is brought about by the fact that the interest rate is lower in the United States, and that stimulates borrowing in New York. Competent people fear that this premium may stimulate borrowing causing it to go higher, and that would act as a brake on business.

I repeat that the stimulus about which we are talking, and about which the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) talked particularly, must come from the government and not from the banks. The banks have their proper duty to perform, but it is not that of a government. I want to say, too, a word about money management, though of course that is primarily the concern of the Bank of Canada. I do not believe it can be stressed too often that the only safeguard we have is the wisdom and foresight of the people in charge of the Bank of Canada and their power, if necessary, to withstand political pressure.

This raises the question I raised at the time we dealt with the Bank of Canada Act. It is a difficult and perplexing question, I admit, but could we have some kind of automatic check put in the Bank of Canada Act? There was such a check in the original act, but it has been nullified by subsequent legislation. Were we wrong when we put it in the Bank of Canada Act? Is it true that any check becomes meaningless when we go into the business of managing money?

I believe that it is a very important question for the committee to consider. Should there be some kind of check? Should there be some way by which the Bank of Canada, if it wished to take a stand against government policy, could do so? Let us assume that a time arises when the government is under great pressure, as the United States government has been. They started in with what they called a hard money policy, but they have taken flight from it so far as I can make out. They have had to put the shoe on the other foot. The Macmillan commission, composed of thoroughly able men, recommended a check. The question is whether the committee should come back with a recommendation that some check should be provided.

It is fair, I think, to remind ourselves that money management is a tricky business. We had a good deal of experience with it in 1946 and 1947, and later when we were managing our money to the extent of fixing the value of it rather than leaving it free. We remember that in 1946 the dollar was put back to par at a time when subsequent events showed it was not worth par. We remember that in 1947 we lost $1,150 million in reserves. We remember that in the autumn of that year drastic action was taken, what some of us called legislation by radio. We remember that a prohibition against certain imports was imposed, and I think it is fair to say also that these drastic restrictions gave an amount of protection far beyond any tariff. It was absolute protection, and it stimulated the development of certain industries in a rather extravagant fashion. It may be that, in the long run, it was not a very desirable thing. These restrictions were finally removed, but by that time we had these industries which had been built up under this absolute ban on imports.

There is one other thing to which I want to refer because it has always amazed me, having regard to the main concern, and that is that we went through a period here when there was a belief we could control interest rates. When I look back to the men concerned, for whom I have great respect, it is almost impossible for me to realize how they got themselves into that state of mind, but they did. I want to read briefly into the record a statement made in October, 1945, in connection with the sale of victory bonds:

> Of course, when you buy victory bonds you don't know for sure just when you may need to turn them into cash. Perhaps you will wait until they mature.

I should say this statement from which I am reading was an official statement and has in it statements made by the then minister of finance and one of the senior officials of the finance department.

> Perhaps you will wait until they mature. Perhaps you can't wait that long. What happens then?
> Most Canadians know the answer to this question. They know victory bonds can be turned into cash at any time. To meet temporary needs for cash, they can be used as security for a bank loan. To meet other needs, they can be sold through any bank, investment dealer, stock broker, or trust company. The current market value of the bonds, with interest up to the day of sale, is paid to you while you wait. It's as simple as that.

And then I shall read the statement from the bank, which says this:

> Government bond prices reflect the level of interest rates. A decline in bond prices could happen only if interest rates were to rise. In my opinion, the needs of the future will require and enable the kind of monetary policy which has brought about the current level of interest rates. Continuance of this policy means stability in victory bond prices.

Having read that, hon. members will not be surprised to learn that many people went about saying the treasury had positively made the statement that 3 per cent bonds would not go below par. It was the easiest thing in the world for a salesman, in view of what I have just read, to go one-tenth of one per cent farther.

I think it was in January of 1947 when bonds were allowed to go down two or three points in price. They had been at 105, and they came down to around 102. I was travelling with a man who was quite well up in the bond business in Toronto. Referring to this drop in the price of bonds I said to him, "Is nature going to be allowed to take its course?" He said, "Perhaps; but of course, bonds cannot go below par." I said, "Why not?' He said, "Because Mr. Ilsley said they could not." I said, "I do not think you will find that Mr. Ilsley did say that." Here was a man with some competency in his profession who held that view.

I have said just a word about the minister's remarks on increased reserves. I think I should add no more on that. The matter will come before the committee in due course.

Another point we will have to discuss in committee is that of convertibility, and I think I need not add anything further on that point.

As to the new provisions concerning mortgage loans, I think that has been fully discussed and I shall say nothing further about it, except that it is so long since liquidity was considered a matter of any importance that I feel that, while we expect the banks to co-operate fully—and I am sure they will, so far as they can—on the other hand, simply because we have gone through so many years with liquidity, practically so remote that it was like a subject that is discussed only in textbooks, we should not allow ourselves to forget that the primary obligation of a bank is to be able to pay back its depositors. We must keep in mind that these restrictions were put on by men who were considered wise and prudent in their dealings, and that they have prevailed for many years.

The governor of the Bank of Canada said frankly the other day that for some time he had held the opinion that banks might be allowed to make mortgage loans. Nevertheless I hope we will never reach the point where pressure is put on the banks to go beyond that point which they themselves consider prudent.

Having said this I think, Mr. Speaker, that I shall permit the matter to go to the committee.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, as has already been said, the decennial revision of the bank charters act and, of course, the motion now before us, together provide an opportunity for the house to make some review of the policies followed by the chartered banks and to suggest such improvements and changes as from the experience of members of the house and the country generally would seem to be desirable. That is the purpose of the decennial review of charters.

I am going to say at once that the Canadian banks have a very impressive record of efficient management, of safety and of profit to their shareholders. I shall offer some criticism of their operations in relation to the public and national interest, but I shall keep what I have just said in mind, because I think one should do so. In discussing this measure I shall not refer specifically to the criticism made of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). I think he will see in what I am about to say an inherent defence of what they said the other day.

Traditionally the concept of the responsibility of the commercial banker in this, as in other countries, has been a relatively simple one. That is, his responsibility can be considered to have been, in his view, a comparatively simple one. In the past it was generally recognized and widely accepted that the banker's responsibility was, first, to safeguard the interests of the depositors and of the institution itself. And this, I say at once, Canadian banks as a whole have done well. His second function, he considered, was to use the proceeds of the deposits to make loans and investments calculated to give the best results to the shareholders of the banks.

Hon. members will note that I said "to use the proceeds of the deposits", not necessarily the deposits. For I have in mind the undisputed fact—which I am sure the hon. member who has just taken his seat and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will not dispute—that loans from banks, or a bank's ability to loan, to put it in perhaps a better way, are both only in part based upon deposits, and as well of course on the reserves of the bank, rather than on the actual amount of the deposits. That is, loans are not limited to the actual amounts on deposit in the keeping of the various banks. In other words, banks do create credit. I think that is generally agreed.

In modern times, then, banks have not loaned moneys actually deposited by the public; rather they have based the extent of their loans in relation to their deposits and reserves. In other words they have created credit and created new money several times in excess of the actual funds in their possession, if you consider credit to be a form of money, knowing that at no one time would all the depositors demand the repayment of all their deposits but only a fraction of them.

This bill, like the Bank of Canada Act we discussed a short time ago, restricts these privileges to a greater extent than heretofore under our legislation. As has already been said, the safety of the Canadian banking system has been largely due to the fact that it developed into a branch banking system with such risks as existed spread not over a single community, or even a single region, but spread over the whole country. I believe this is preferable to the United States system of setting up independent local banks. The safety that springs from the system in use in this country is, of course, the justification for the branch banking system.

The twofold responsibility assumed by the commercial bank manager is still regarded as being the principal responsibility today. However, changes in economic conditions have imposed upon the banking system a much wider responsibility to the public than heretofore was dreamed possible.

The great depression of the 1930's concentrated public attention—and I believe for the first time to any extent—upon the importance of the monetary system and its effect upon the general economy. It is now recognized that the banking system has a major responsibility in regulating the flow and direction of the nation's credit. That is why Canada, in common with many other countries, established a central bank; to give some over-all control over the system.

Now, the failure to provide proper credit regulation can be reflected of course in the fluctuation of prices, in the general condition of industry, in the condition of employment, in agricultural production and so on. In short, there can be general economic instability if there is failure to provide proper credit regulation.

Before the Bank of Canada was established the government could make advances, as the minister stated this afternoon, under the finance acts of 1914 and 1923, to the chartered banks in the form of Dominion of Canada notes against deposits made by the banks with the minister of finance. I think that is largely the genesis of our central banking system. Those deposits were in the form of securities approved by the minister and, as the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada said in their report issued in 1933—and I quote their words—it was entirely a matter "left to the discretion of the banks as to what their cash reserves would be" in relation to this.

The result was that they extended their bases of credit—and this caused a great deal of discussion in the early thirties—in periods of inflation and contracted them when depressed conditions should have demanded an increase in credit facilities. This was demonstrated very clearly in Canada between, we will say, 1925 and 1935, when for a few years we experienced a boom when credit was pretty easy, followed by a depression when things tightened up drastically. That concentrated public attention upon this problem probably to a greater extent than anything else could have done.

Today the regulation of the ratio between a bank's cash reserves and its deposits or liabilities is controlled by the Bank of Canada, and thus bank credit, the instrument which carries out, as we said the other day, the monetary policy, is largely laid down and controlled by the federal government. So it is no longer regarded as a matter of concern only to the individual bank in relation to its obligations to its depositors or to its own shareholders; it is now a matter of national interest.

Let me repeat what I said when I discussed the Bank of Canada Act the other day. The banking system has become, through the Bank of Canada operations, the instrument of monetary policy decided upon by the government. I want to repeat that. Yet, and here is the paradox, the actual financial decisions which affect public welfare are still in the hands of the private chartered banks. They decide how they shall meet demands for credit made upon them by various sectors of the economy, or indeed if the demand which is made upon them shall be met at all. The final decision is with the chartered banks, not with a public authority.

Because of the nature of the Canadian economy, consisting as it does so largely of primary and seasonal industries, the requirements for credit make the consideration of both short-term and intermediate-term credit a matter of primary concern, particularly to our primary industries. Take agriculture and fishing as examples. The farmer or the fisherman is dependent most of the time upon bank credit to carry him until he can realize on the sale of his products. That is particularly true of the farmer.

This kind of credit, or the issue of it, the granting of it, is entirely in the hands of the chartered banks and is a matter for their sole decision and judgment. Only in the larger industries which are able to finance out of their accumulated reserves is there less need to depend upon the chartered banks. I believe there is abundant evidence over the years to prove that in time of special need the chartered banks have failed to meet the important credit needs of agriculture and other seasonal and primary industries. Yet these are of fundamental importance to the Canadian economy.

Mr. A. F. W. Plumptre, formerly professor of economics at the University of Toronto, and I believe later an adviser on finance in the Department of External Affairs—

Mr. Abbott: And about to be an official of the Department of Finance.

Mr. Coldwell: About to be an official of the Department of Finance.

Mr. Knowles: Is this a notice of his appointment?

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. Coldwell: He stated in his discussion of central banking in Canada, at page 124:

> The most distinctive feature of the Canadian system is the relatively small extent to which the Canadian banks engage in agricultural finance. They have customarily left the field of long and intermediate credit in rural districts almost entirely to other financial institutions, and have themselves provided little but the seasonal needs of their rural clients.

I think that is equally true of fishermen. The fact of the matter is that farmers have succeeded in obtaining anything close to their short-term credit requirements only after government guarantees against losses have from time to time been given to the banks. That is the point I want to emphasize. This was recognized when the Farm Improvement Loans Act was passed in 1944 to provide short and intermediate credit for farm improvement and development. The act, we were told, was designed for the purpose of assisting "the average farmer who ordinarily would not be able to obtain bank credit for these purposes," and here I quote what was said at the time.

Under that act the government guaranteed losses up to 10 per cent of the total of the loans made by the banks. From the time the act became operative until December 1, 1952, the losses on those loans was only ·01 per cent. That is to say, there was a loss of $1 for every $1,000 loaned under the act. I think that is a very impressive record. Thus the government guarantee of 10 per cent of the total loan meant that there was very little likelihood of the banks losing one cent under the act.

The other primary industry I mentioned was fishing. The fishermen have been unable to obtain short or intermediate-term credit, either from banks or from mortgage institutions, mainly because they lacked the necessary collateral.

In 1944, section 88 of the Bank Act, to which the minister referred this afternoon, authorized the banks to lend money upon the security of fishing vessels, fishing equipment and even the catch itself. But the authorization to lend under the act is one thing and the making of the loan or the securing of a loan is quite another thing. Parliament may authorize, but the banks make the final decision in what they conceive to be the interests of the banks and their shareholders rather than of the industry.

Mr. MacInnis: And of the country.

Mr. Coldwell: And of the country. Mr. Ilsley, referring to the provision for such loans when it was brought up before the house, recognized this fact and I should like to quote what he said, as reported on page 2560 of Hansard of 1944. He said that it would be necessary to——enact a companion measure somewhat similar to the Farm Improvement Loans Act—

I skip a few words.

—which will enable the government to give a limited guarantee in respect of loans made by chartered banks to fishermen.

He recognized that point. I do not know why, and I did not remember it until I began to prepare my notes for this discussion, but the suggestion of the minister of finance was never adopted by the house or by the government, with the result that the banks have not assumed the risk themselves of advancing necessary credit to this industry and the industry has had to go without necessary credit.

Generally speaking, these primary industries of farming and fishing have had to be assisted even in obtaining long-term credit through legislation and by government guarantees. The banks have not assumed the function which they should have assumed. I have in mind the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act, both administered by the Canadian farm loan board. I am not criticizing the banks in this latter respect with regard to long-term loans because they have been prohibited by law from lending on long-term mortgages, as the minister said this afternoon, ever since the first bank act was adopted by this parliament in 1871. What I have been referring to was their failure to provide the most essential intermediate and short-term credit when it was required.

Let me give a further illustration of the point I am making that only one type of pressure was used on the banks to make them accept even effective government guarantees against the losses which might have arisen when they agreed to meet certain important credit needs. The example I have in mind is the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act of 1937, which was passed when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and I were both new members in this house.

In 1944 the late Dr. Clark told the standing committee on banking and commerce, at the time of the last decennial revision, as reported at page 1366 of the proceedings, which I will summarize, that all the pressure possible had been used on the banks to make housing improvement loans and other loans to create employment, and that only because of this pressure did the banks make the loans that they would not normally have made.

It was clear from what Dr. Clark stated at that time that the banks yielded to this pressure because the act provided that the federal government would guarantee losses up to 10 per cent of the total amount of loans made by the banks. The banks incurred few if any losses, and such losses as did arise were covered by guarantees under the legislation. Dr. Clark's evidence can be found at page 1366 of the report of the committee's proceedings, and I would like to quote him directly from the record:

Our total losses up to date have been just a little over three-quarters of one per cent. I think the figure is ·8 per cent. The loans are nearly all paid off. There is perhaps one or two million dollars of the principal still outstanding so even if all the rest of the loans were not recovered, if we did not recover a cent in respect of them, our total losses would be of the order of 2 or 2½ per cent, I believe. Actually we will recover a very substantial proportion of the amount of principal still outstanding so that the total loss ratio will be very low.

My purpose in referring to and reading this evidence is to show that without guarantees the banks would not advance credit to those people who were creditworthy, nor would they make loans to such people without specific government guarantees against loss.

We have often heard of private enterprise in connection with our banking system, but the banks required government guarantees against loss, thus eliminating the risks we are told the bankers take in making loans. Indeed, throughout the period under discussion at the moment the banks failed to meet the credit needs of the country or to take the risks they formerly undertook without guarantee.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would my hon. friend permit me?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would he agree that in the years preceding these measures he refers to very heavy losses were incurred in that respect?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, there were some heavy losses incurred during the early depression years, but may I just add that these losses were in no small measure due to lack of control through legislation over the chartered banks. I believe the inquiry into the chartered banks of Canada undertaken by both a royal commission and at the decennial revision of the Bank Act of 1934 will clearly indicate that.

As I said, however, I am not criticizing this feature. At one stage the government of Mr. R. B. Bennett, by means of a secret order in council—and the hon. member for Quebec South and the late minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, were both members of the opposition which dragged it into the open to the surprise of this house and the country—allowed the banks, because of the position in which they had landed themselves in 1930, to value their securities at an unwarranted high level in order to prevent a run on one or two of the major banks. That was the value of the securities prior to a drastic drop in their value.

Mr. Abbott: I think the hon. member will agree in all fairness that conditions during the thirties were partly the result of world conditions, and did not reflect conditions in Canada only.

Mr. Knowles: Does that justify a secret order in council?

Mr. Abbott: I was not referring to that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Coldwell: It is interesting to hear the minister say that. I read the debates which took place during that period from 1930 to 1935—

An hon. Member: He was not here then.

Mr. Abbott: That was before my time.

Mr. Coldwell: I was not here either. I was referring to the legislation which provided these guarantees. One outstanding example during the period to which I am referring was the $60 million loan made by eight chartered banks to the Canadian Pacific Railway in, I believe, 1933. Hon. members will recall the circumstances and will agree that this was done, as the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) I think will confirm, in order to prevent widespread unemployment at the Angus railway shops at Montreal and in other sectors in Canada. That entire loan was guaranteed by the federal government in 1933.

Again, because of the failure of our banking system in respect to certain phases of industrial development, this house had to take the initiative, and we passed an act placing the government in the banking business when we set up the industrial development bank. It was set up as a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada, which was authorized to buy the securities of the industrial development bank. Why was that done? The government explained very clearly at the time. The minister said it was necessary to supplement the banking system by extending to small and medium-size industrial enterprises the credits they were—and I quote—"unable to obtain from the chartered banks".

Mr. Abbott: Because of limitations on the granting of credit.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, partly; but what I am getting at is that we saw fit to set up a bank of our own to do what it was generally believed the banks were doing. Here was an admission that either the chartered banks were unable or were not permitted to fulfil the function for which they were brought into existence.

Mr. Abbott: In all fairness I think it should be pointed out—and I conducted the debate—that it was set up in order to supplement the facilities which were provided by the chartered banks on the basis of long-term credits which were available to large concerns but which were not available to the smaller ones, and which were not provided through the banking system at all but through investments.

Mr. Coldwell: That does not upset what I have said.

Mr. Abbott: But we are talking about commercial banking now.

Mr. Coldwell: These facilities should be available to the smaller industries as well as to the large ones—

Mr. Abbott: It was not—

Mr. Coldwell: —and the very fact that the banking system failed to function as it should have functioned—

Mr. Abbott: It was not set up to provide that kind of banking accommodation at all.

Mr. Coldwell: —demonstrates that there was no justification for this particular move at all, if the banks functioned satisfactorily.

But I wish to pass on to another point. I want to suggest to the committee that there is another phase of this whole lending problem which should be given a thorough investigation, and I hope some means will be found of doing that. The banks have failed to meet the needs of the community; therefore we have small loan companies springing up all over Canada, opening up branches in almost every city and larger town in the country. They charge a rate of interest of 2 per cent per month. That is quite legal. They have been doing a huge business in Canada in the past few years. That indicates, I believe, that the chartered banks have not met the credit needs of the public.

One method of meeting the needs of the public would have been through credit unions, but unfortunately the spread of co-operative education and the organization of credit unions has so far failed to fill the gap. However, with more adequate educational efforts and encouragement on the part of governments, I think they could do so to a large extent.

In 1939 the Small Loans Act was passed. This act authorized small loan companies and personal money-lenders to make small and personal instalment loans "on the basis of a charge for interest and other costs of 2 per cent per month for loans extended up to 15 months". The reason the act was introduced, of course—and I say this immediately in fairness—was that it was necessary to regulate a widespread practice whereby money-lenders evaded existing laws relating to interest and usury. As early as 1936, however, one of the Canadian banks, namely the Canadian Bank of Commerce, organized a personal loan department to make loans to wage earners and others who could not qualify for such loans in the ordinary way of business. I often think that if the Bank of Commerce or the other chartered banks doing this sort of business would publicize to a greater extent the facilities they offer, many people who now go to these loan sharks and pay 2 per cent per month would be able to get some help at least from the banks, although the banks do not meet the need that exists.

What was the experience of this new department of the Canadian Bank of Commerce? Mr. Stewart, the assistant general manager of the bank, appeared before the banking and commerce committee in 1944. He showed that loans were made at, I think, an effective interest rate of about 11·78 per cent. Again, the hon. minister's predecessor, Mr. Ilsley, proposed an amendment to the Bank Act to regularize these bank loans with an effective interest rate not to exceed 9¾ per cent. That proposal was dropped. I think it would be well for the committee to question the banks carefully as to their experience with loans of this description, particularly with a view to curtailing or, better still, eliminating the operations of the small loan companies with their extortionate if legal rate of interest. It might inquire into that matter, for I do not remember why the proposal Mr. Ilsley brought in for an effective rate of interest of 9¾ per cent was dropped. I do not remember it, and I could not find the reason for dropping it in my search of the records.

The committee should also consider how the rapid development of credit unions could be promoted, because they operate in a quite different way. They operate among people whom they know and to those who need them they are able to provide loans more on the basis of personal integrity and character than on the possession of collateral which the banks and indeed the loan companies demand. Under a branch banking system I suppose the branch managers are obliged to do this.

Hon. members might look at page 300 of the report of the last banking and commerce committee. I was going to make some quotations from it but I cannot do that. There they will find a fairly complete record of the operations of the personal loan department of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. In the first seven and a half years of operation—that is, up to 1944—Mr. Stewart testified that only one-quarter of one per cent of the loans had to be repaid by the guarantors of personal loans made by the Canadian Bank of Commerce. I believe that bank required two guarantors in connection with these loans. From the reading of the evidence it would appear that up to that time at least the bank really lost nothing under the arrangement.

That the banks are unwilling to extend credit facilities to meet national problems was clearly stated again recently by Mr. T. H. Atkinson, president of the Canadian Bankers Association, before the banking and commerce committee when it was discussing the housing bill to which we gave third reading this afternoon. He replied to a question relating to the financing of housing in these words:

> Such a move would not, I think, have been sought by the banks—particularly at the present time when the chartered banks in Canada are relatively "fully loaned".

If time permits, I should like to say a little bit later something about that statement to the effect that the banks are fully loaned. In his capacity as general manager of the Royal Bank he added, "Certainly in our own case it would not".

I am not going into the question of housing finance under the proposed new housing act, but it should be noted that bank credit facilities to meet this public need are only being reluctantly extended in consideration of the banks receiving ironclad guarantees against any losses under this act. Why is it that the banks have never made any serious effort to meet outstanding credit needs of the country? First, the banks have always raised the question of liquidity when it has been suggested that they are not fulfilling their obligation to the nation. In other words this objection underlines the conflict, which I noted in the discussion of the Bank of Canada Act, between on the one hand the private banks and their admitted obligations to the depositors-shareholders and, on the other hand, what I conceive to be the obligations of the banking system to the public as a whole.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I have not finished, but this is a good place to break off.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, lest I forget or go over my time a moment or two, I am going to move now the amendment that we have in mind. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge):

That Bill No. 338 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the national ownership and public control of the chartered banks.

Before dinner I was remarking that there appeared to be a conflict between the interests of the public and the interests of the banks when we consider the matter of making loans and providing the necessary credit to the community. Of course it would be foolish for me or for anyone else to deny that there is some validity in the argument that the banks must be in a position at all times to fulfil the demands of their depositors for the withdrawal of their funds immediately or on short notice. The banks must have liquid reserves sufficient to meet such demands whenever they arise. However, the liquidity of the banks has for a long time exceeded anything the most conservative banker of other times ever anticipated.

The reason for this is the long-term decline in the relative importance of bank lending. It is only in the last few years that some recovery has been made, but the ratio of bank loans to total bank assets is still far lower than it was in the earlier part of this century. I say that statement is beyond dispute, as I think I can show.

Today bank loans constitute as little as 35 per cent of total bank assets, while before the first world war bank loans constituted over 60 per cent of total bank assets. This is confirmed by the monthly review of the Bank of Nova Scotia in its September and October, 1953, issues. In the latest annual report of the Royal Bank of Canada the general manager, Mr. Atkinson, after analysing their call loans, government and municipal bonds and holdings of other securities, together with cash on hand, had this to say:

This amount represents what is normally referred to as the liquid assets of the bank and equals 65·42 per cent of the bank's liabilities to the public.

But even this does not tell the whole story of the Royal Bank's liquid position—I selected the Royal Bank only because its general manager appeared before the committee the other day—for it has in addition a reserve fund of $70 million which is twice as large as its total paid-up capital. Then, of course, before net profits are declared appropriations are made by the banks to cover their so-called contingencies. These can be used against bad or doubtful debts and to provide additional working capital for the bank.

Of course it would be absurd even to discuss this matter except that the banks' liquidity is always raised when they are required to undertake certain lending activities. If a bank finds itself embarrassed it can of course always fall back on the rediscounting facilities provided by parliament through the Bank of Canada. The fact that these facilities have very seldom been used is additional proof of the excellent liquid position of the chartered banks.

Throughout the war bank investments in government securities were unusually high. This was because they were used to assist our financing of the war. Since the war bank holdings of government securities have declined. It is difficult, however, to reconcile the facts of the case with Mr. Atkinson's statement that the banks are "fully loaned". I am not naïve enough to expect that privately-owned banks will meet all the public needs which I have discussed, when they consider that their own interests must be their first consideration.

The banks are profit-motivated institutions. Their lending activities and investments, if they coincide with the public welfare, do so rather by accident than by deliberate planning. If it is more profitable and safer to invest in government securities than it is to undertake loans to fishermen, farmers or individual Canadians, then the banks will invest in government securities.

Let us take a look at their net profits for a moment. Their net profits indicate that they have followed principles in accordance with their business instincts. In 1945 the net profits of the Canadian banks were $12,541,408. By 1950 they had risen to $23,429,363. In 1951 there was a slight decline to $22,743,225, but in 1953 they had risen again to $30,386,000.

Mr. Harkness: Is this before income tax?

Mr. Coldwell: No, after. I was about to say that it should be noted that these profits are after full provision has been made for contingency reserves, depreciation and income tax. If we take their percentage of net profits to their paid-up capital, according to the latest figures, which were placed on Hansard last Friday, I believe, we find that the percentage of net profits to the paid-up capital of the three largest Canadian banks, the Royal Bank, the Bank of Montreal and the Canadian Bank of Commerce in 1953 was 24·67 per cent, 19·56 per cent and 19·30 per cent respectively.

The point of my argument is this, that as long as the banks continue to be privately owned their managing officers must inevitably and quite properly continue to give priority to their obligations to their shareholders rather than to the credit needs of the Canadian people. This is the paradoxical position of our banking system. It is expected on the one hand to regulate and provide money and credit to maintain the economic welfare of the nation, and on the other hand its obligations to its shareholders demand that it be operated with the object of producing the highest possible profits. We believe this conflict can only be resolved by bringing the banking system under public ownership. Let me quote from a memorandum submitted to the banking and commerce committee in 1944 by the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section. They said:

> We consider that as the money and credit system of Canada is actually the heart which must regularly and evenly pulsate to keep the economic body properly functioning, it is therefore too important to the very life and well-being of the nation to be entrusted to private corporations.

Of course it was said this afternoon that a publicly-owned system would perhaps lead to political interference. I think one of my colleagues may discuss, either here or in the banking and commerce committee, the record of that great publicly-owned institution in the Commonwealth of Australia, the Commonwealth Bank, one of the great commercial and now central banks of the world today.

May I conclude by summarizing the concessions the banks have received over the years in order to show that the risk has been taken out of banking, that wherever there was risk the government stepped in and guaranteed them against that risk. First of all we have the finance acts of 1914 and 1923. That was the beginning. They allowed the banks to obtain dominion notes against deposits of their securities with the finance minister. Then of course there was the very valuable privilege allowing them to create all the credits they cared to create without limitation, until the Bank of Canada was established in 1935.

In 1933, as I remarked this afternoon, we had the C.P.R. loan of $60 million by eight banks which was guaranteed in full by order in council. This afternoon I mentioned the fact that when the banks were in a difficult position in the early 1930's another and secret order in council was passed so that the real position of one or two of the banks at least would not be known to the Canadian people.

I am not saying I am critical of that, because had there been a run on those banks there might have been something of a financial panic in the country. In 1937 we had the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act, under which loans were guaranteed up to 10 per cent of the total loans made. In 1944 there was the farm loans act which guaranteed against losses up to 10 per cent of the total loans.

May I just remark, because I did not do so this afternoon when I was mentioning this, that it was suggested, as I recall it, by Mr. Ilsley that we should have a fisherman's loan act somewhat similar. I had forgotten that the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) made a similar proposal in May, I think it was, of last year. This year again, 1954, we have the housing act under which we guarantee 98 per cent of the loans and the provision that the banks can sell their mortgages to the central bank, and I think they hope to sell some housing mortgages to the public. I recall that in 1944, though I could not put my hand on the quotation, Mr. Graham Towers told the banking and commerce committee that in his 25 years of experience in banking, which covered the depression period, the losses of the banks were not more than ¾ of 1 per cent. If my recollection does not play me false he also remarked he had heard bankers say that over the period of Canadian banking the losses of the banks would not be more than ½ of 1 per cent.

My point is this. We guarantee the banks against losses; we eliminate their risks; we allow them to take all the profits that are in the banking business, and we in this parliament take all the risks. Where is there private enterprise in a banking system of that description? Is it not time we took the profits for the people of Canada as well as the risks?

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say at once that we will not be able to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), chiefly because we feel that it is not in the best interests of the country to nationalize the banks.

When I spoke at the committee stage of this bill I believe I said that I never did take very seriously those declarations that are frequently made that such and such a party would nationalize the banks. The fact is we have heard declarations of that kind for many years in many places. The socialist party have been famous for saying that they would nationalize the chartered banks. They got themselves in a position to do so in Britain, and backed away from it. They got themselves in a position to do so in Australia, and backed clear away from it. I do not know any place where they have done so.

All down the years, as a matter of fact, so far as I can recall, they have been among the chief supporters of the system of finance that has controlled the banking system, which in turn has controlled the industrial system, in the various countries. The hon. member mentioned the Commonwealth Bank of Australia, and stated that during the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee one of his colleagues would outline the great record of that institution. Well, everyone knows that is not a chartered bank but a central bank. We have one, too.

Mr. Coldwell: It is a commercial bank with branches.

Mr. Low: It is a central bank just like the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Abbott: It is a hybrid. It is both a commercial bank and a central bank. It is unique.

Mr. Low: It is not to be compared with the chartered banks of this country. There would have to be more than a delineation of the record of the Commonwealth Bank to prove that nationalization of the banks would be in the interests of the people.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, what difference would nationalization make? It is not the ownership of the bank that counts but the policy that is followed. In this country we have what is purported to be public control of the chartered banks; that is why the Bank of Canada was set up in 1934. Through it can be exercised any amount of public control to which the government is prepared to agree. The whole thing resolves itself down to a question of government policy, and how far that policy is prepared to go in the control of currency and credit.

I am much more concerned about government policy than I am about the ownership of the banks. Let me say, though, that if at any time the government laid down a specific, comprehensive policy for the control of currency and credit in the public interest, and the chartered banks refused to co-operate in the administration of that policy, then of course it might be necessary to consider nationalization. I cannot imagine that situation would ever arise in Canada. Until it does, then I would not take very seriously the question of nationalization of the banks.

The legislation now before parliament is of greater importance to the Canadian people, in our judgment, than almost any legislation that is ever brought before us. Because they touch so intimately the lives and interests of every Canadian; because the welfare, the security and freedoms of all our people depend so much upon what is provided in the Bank Act and its companion piece the Bank of Canada Act, I believe every member of this house should be sufficiently interested to make a thorough and detailed study of the acts themselves as well as of banking practices and procedure. A thorough study should be made of government financial and economic policy, which must go along with those acts.

Now, those three things, the Bank Act, the Bank of Canada Act and government financial policy, are so closely related, in my judgment, they cannot be separated in any attempt to study the impact of finance upon the Canadian economy and upon the lives and fortunes of our people. I suggest that the success of our work in connection with these important measures this year will depend to a great extent on our approach to them. We shall not get far, nor will we do much of a job for the people who sent us here, if we take for granted that finance is a mystery that no layman can understand, or if we are too ready to believe that we have a perfect banking system.

Let me say right here that I believe we have a strong banking system, and an efficient one and a good one. If we believe for one moment, however, it is perfect we are not going to do much of a job in connection with the consideration of the Bank Act. If we believe that Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill, and perhaps other economists, enunciated immutable economic laws with which our banking and financial policies are in complete harmony, we shall get no place. We are likely to get some place if we approach our studies of these two bills with the assurance that finance is no mystery, except as it is made to appear so by those pundits. If we approach the study believing that there are weaknesses in our banking system that have to be corrected, and if we approach our study from the point of view that the economic laws enunciated by Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill are only economic practices and conventions operating in certain periods of economic development, which are being constantly outmoded by the march of events and the tempo of human progress, then we shall get some place.

Now, when the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act are before the banking and commerce committee we intend to give them the most searching study of which we are capable, and a full inquiry, no matter how long it may take. I do not wish to go deeply into the history of banking at this time, but I have a purpose in wanting to make a very brief, historical statement of the reasons we Social Crediters are so deeply interested in the subject of finance and banks.

The industrial revolution brought about great struggles between nations for markets. During these struggles the internal economies of the nations involved were undergoing tremendous change. The individual industrialists began to find that unrestricted competition among themselves was often a form of business suicide. It was better, they thought, to avoid such competition by amalgamating their common interests, and so monopolies were born. This, in turn, demanded larger and ever larger issues of capital and ever-growing recourse to overdrafts with the banks for working expenses.

The powers of the banks which alone had the right to create financial credit grew rapidly with this change in the internal economy, and became the dominating factor in business everywhere. Industrial capitalism gave way to finance capitalism, and this is now universal in all democratic countries.

It was recognized quite early by great financiers and bankers that the control of industry and of the nation itself resided in the banking system, and that the power of creating, regulating and controlling bank credit made them, in a way, a hidden government, practically overriding and controlling every activity of the national life.

This great fact, with its wide implications and effects, was kept as secret as possible from the public for many years and was, for quite obvious reasons, denied by the banks themselves. Most economists and politicians do not seem to have discovered it to this day. And, except for monetary reformers, —and we include ourselves in monetary reformers—it is still more or less a secret.

With the growth of trade between nations and the need for adjusting the necessary means of exchange, banking became international in its operations, and the great banks of the world became related organizations, functioning to their mutual advantage. This international co-operation of the banks had a parallel influence on the monopolies they controlled through overdrafts and interlocking directorates. These industrial monopolies became international also, and are one of the features of today—the giant cartels and combines appearing in the industries of all countries, and of course levying tribute in peace and war from both friend and enemy.

Canada is within the ambit of these industrial and financial forces, and it seems to me we would be very blind if we did not see these operations around us everywhere. The system I have been describing is often spoken of as the system of private enterprise or capitalism.

This is not, of course, the place to discuss the merits and demerits of the system. But arising out of it are certain manifestations that cannot be disregarded by any red-blooded man who is anxious for the welfare and future of his country. The disparity between the great wealth of the industrial capitalists and the appalling poverty among all the workers in the industrial system some years ago became quite obvious to a large number of people, and gave rise to bitter and, I suppose, in a measure justifiable discontent.

Exploitation of men, women and children in the early stages of the industrial period makes one of the blackest pages in history. No one can read history without being convinced of that. From the humanitarian point of view the system known in that day as capitalism—and I am speaking of the day of the industrial revolution—stood condemned, and there was much revolt against its economic effects on a large proportion of the people.

Out of the revolt that took place against it arose the trade union movement in Great Britain, the regulation of child labour, the factory acts, the fixing of hours and wages and, on the intellectual side, the theories of socialism and the gospel of Karl Marx. These interests got into war with one another, and they have never been reconciled to this day. So even now we stand in a world of economic conflict in which the contending forces of capitalism and communism are striving for mastery.

From the Social Credit point of view it would be tragedy for either side to conquer. We believe that salvation for human beings lies along the middle road that we are following, the road to Social Credit. That is our deep conviction, when we realize that the age of abundance has in reality arrived, providing plenty for everybody. We know that we can have economic security with freedom, which is the first step along the road to the new era of abundance which we seek. We can secure that first step, not by revolution and force but by a new financial concept, the central point of which is making money and credit the true reflection of material facts, and using them and controlling them for the benefit of the whole community.

Now, we think nothing—and I am speaking generally of people in this day—of controlling public utilities such as the supply of gas, the milk supply, electricity, railroads, and all that sort of thing. We never think of dictatorship or slavery or anything of that kind when we lay down laws and policies to control these things. People today justify themselves by saying that these things touch the lives of the people so closely and affect them so intimately that they have to be controlled in the interests of all the people.

Well, I ask hon. members, what greater utility is there than the supply of money and credit? But when some of us advocate non-political money management in the interests of all the people in the country, there are certain people who jump at the chance to charge us with wanting dictatorship. Actually what we want to do is relieve the people from the great dictatorship under which they have suffered for years.

Sometimes the term "money management" is misunderstood—and I am saying this for the benefit of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). He is a good friend of mine, whose opinion I respect. But I say that sometimes the term "money management" is misunderstood, and perhaps in some quarters deliberately so. I will not say that in connection with the hon. member, because I believe he really believes what he says. I wish to pay him that compliment. However, in order to illustrate what I mean let me point out that Abraham Lincoln is credited with having made this statement:

> The government should create, issue and circulate all the currency and credit needed to satisfy the spending power of the government and the buying power of consumers. This is the government's greatest creative opportunity.

In that quotation from Lincoln the word "government" needs some amplification. It is not necessary—in fact it may not even be desirable—that government, in the narrow sense of that word, should do the regulating. The point, so far as we Social Crediters view it, is that it must be done by a responsible body of men on the strength of accurate federal statistical information, and it must not be left to chance.

It does not matter, as I say, whether it is done by this body or by that body, so long as it is a responsible body of men. And that could mean the government. It could be carried out by the Bank of Canada, by a special committee appointed by industry, agriculture, banking and government known as, let us say, a permanent monetary commission; or it could even be done by a national banking association under a policy carefully and specifically laid down for it by the government. And in all those cases it would be government-controlled, as we view it.

When it is said that such a task allotted to the government would give it too great powers and perhaps admit of too much political interference, I say that is not true, especially when it is reviewed in the light of the explanation I have just given. The government has greater and more dangerous powers today than that, by far. And for all practical purposes the government can raise all the money it finds necessary for its activities at the present time, mainly by expropriating it through taxation. It can do that through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott).

Surely that is not to be compared with what we have suggested by way of money management. Under the Social Credit proposals, even if the powers were allotted to the government in its narrowest sense—the government being those on the front benches over here, of whom my genial friend the Minister of Finance is a leading member—it would be allowed to create money only corresponding to the power of production, which at any time can be determined with about 90 per cent accuracy by our bureau of statistics.

Whether Abraham Lincoln realized fully the implication of his words I do not know, but they mean in terms of our present sciences that the sum total of money creation must not surpass the sum strictly needed to ensure buying the goods that may be produced and are wanted at any given time. The spending power of the government and the buying power of the consumer strictly limit the powers of government if they take the controlling power. Anything in excess of that would mean inflation. On the other hand, insufficiency would mean deflation and eventual depression and starvation which would require a war to get out of. We do not want that sort of thing.

The bill we are considering is not merely a simple amending bill; it is a revision of the whole Bank Act. Consequently there are many clauses which relate to routine matters of procedure to which I suppose we will not pay too much attention because they have been in operation for many years and have proved to operate and function smoothly. However, there are a few sections which are of particular concern and interest to the country at this time. Mr. Speaker, I hasten to assure you that I am not going to deal with specific sections, except to name the clause and speak of the principle.

Section 75 provides authority for the chartered banks to make loans in connection with housing on the security of insured mortgages. The government expects the banks to put up a good share of the mortgage money which the government has put up in recent years under the joint loan arrangements with the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. As far as I can tell, the banks are not enthusiastic about this authority. Unless they become more socially-minded than they appear to be at the present time they will not be making up the 25 per cent of the mortgage money which the government put up last year. That is my guess. They may do it, and if they do I shall be the first to compliment them. But from what I have seen I would not think that will happen.

There must be additional cash reserves provided to the banks if they are to be able to make any reasonable contribution to housing in the years ahead. How are those cash reserves to be provided? We have suggested already to the banking and commerce committee the way in which those reserves can be provided, and at the same time a fund for low-income housing by which municipalities could service land for housing and build houses at an interest rate of from 2 to 3 per cent. This could be done under some such arrangement as the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act. The only argument against our proposal that we have heard thus far is that it was not government policy. We knew that, but we would like to have someone come to grips with it and show why it would not be good government policy.

Section 82 of the Bank Act authorizes the banks to make loans to oil companies for oil development, taking various kinds of securities including the security of the oil pool away down under the earth. That is quite a departure. In my judgment this provision will go a long way to help oil development in the prairie provinces. I think it is a splendid idea. I wonder why it was not done long before. I had thought it might be due to the fact that we were finding it difficult to get working capital in some places. In my judgment this provision will be of great help.

In the past oil companies with the most excellent prospects have been forced to seek capital in the United States or some other country because of a lack of operating credit here. There has been altogether too much of that sort of thing, but it was inevitable if development were to take place. We should be supplying much more of our own capital for Canadian development—just as much as we possibly can, as a matter of fact. Otherwise foreign control begins to extend itself, and in my judgment that is not good for the country. In fact it contains elements of danger. For that reason among others we welcome this particular change in the Bank Act.

Clause 6 provides for a revision of the Bank Act in 1964. Somehow or other we have got into the habit of thinking that the act should not come before parliament oftener than every ten years. That was answered only partially today when it was said that the balance should be established between stability on the one hand, I think the minister said, and flexibility on the other. I agree that that is desirable, but I cannot see that there is any connection between that desirable balance and having the Bank Act come up for revision only every ten years. I doubt that there is. It is just that we have got in the habit of thinking there is. I think that ten years, which covers the life of almost three parliaments, is too long. Just think of it, it covers most of the life of three parliaments. If we continue with our present practice of a decennial revision, the idea is bound to grow up that the Bank Act and our financial policy are somewhat sacrosanct, or untouchable. I am afraid there is that feeling now in some quarters.

We suggest that the annual statements of the chartered banks and the annual report of the Bank of Canada be referred to the banking and commerce committee at least once during each parliament, and that on each of those occasions a complete review be made before that committee by the governor of the Bank of Canada. In my judgment such a procedure would bring parliament in much closer touch with financial policy than has been the case in the past. I believe the more you think of that suggestion the more it will appeal to your judgment.

At the same time we also press for the setting up of a committee similar to the reconstruction committee which was established by parliament about ten years ago. That reconstruction committee did a good job, and some of its recommendations have been approved by the government. If it were reconstituted it could make an annual or biennial review of the economic situation in Canada. It could make recommendations to parliament, and those recommendations could be related closely to the financial considerations and recommendations of the banking and commerce committee. I believe those are things which we should think of.

Perhaps a most far-reaching change in the Bank Act is made in section 71, which introduces the variable reserve principle. This section must be considered in conjunction with section 18 (1) (o) of the Bank of Canada Act. Section 71 of the bill now before us specifies a floor of 8 per cent on cash reserve requirements, but it does not specify a ceiling. That is interesting. The Bank of Canada Act sets a ceiling at 12 per cent.

We believe that this variability of cash reserve requirements is a step in the right direction, but we think the act should provide for a much higher ceiling. Not that we think we should jump immediately to a much higher cash reserve requirement, not at all; but if the mechanism is there it will prove mighty useful when it is needed. We think that by so doing the Bank of Canada can provide purchasing power to the government of the country with which the government can buy new business activities for the country when they are needed, business activities in the form of housing, highways or slum—pardon me, I must not say "slum clearance" since last week —for substandard housing clearance and so on, to the extent that ordinary commercial channels do not keep economic activities at the highest possible level.

Those who have studied this idea know that such a provision of purchasing power to the government by the Bank of Canada would mean no additional expense to the nation at all. On the contrary, it would save expenses, and particularly taxes.

The two acts now before parliament, taken together and viewed in the light of government policy, have, in my judgment, two serious weaknesses. The first of these is that government policy continues to accept the fallacy that for the goods produced somehow or somewhere enough purchasing power will be brought into existence which will enable these goods to reach the hands of the consumers. But that just is not so. That is a delusion. Under our wages system of distribution of purchasing power, and under the peculiar way in which we finance capital development and expansion, a shortage of purchasing power is always generated in times of peace. It may not occur in times of war because then we give away the top third or approximately 40 per cent of what we produce. It is largely because of the failure of our present system to distribute mass-consumer purchasing power in sufficient quantities to make it possible for people to buy back what they produce that periodically we find our country as a whole with what we call large surpluses of production with consequent unemployment, recession and possibly depression.

There are many authorities today to testify to the truth of that statement. I shall not spend time quoting all of them, but I would like to quote one who spent 18 years as head of the economics department of one of the great universities in the United States, the University of Texas. At page 33 of his book "The Divine Right of Capital" he said, speaking of our economy:

> It fails to distribute mass-consumer purchasing power in sufficient quantity to permit the entire product of industry to be purchased. This failure exists at all times under capitalism and is noxious at all times.

That is a quotation from Professor C. E. Ayres, who as I have already said was head of the economics department of the University of Texas. He is only one of many who have testified to the shortage of purchasing power generated under our present system, and if we look around and take cognizance of our economic history we will observe over the years a succession of booms and slumps in times of peace which, in time of war, disappear because we are giving away the top third of all our products. Perhaps instead of saying it has disappeared I should say it is negatived, because it is generated in wartime as well as in peacetime although we do not see it in wartime because we give away part of that production.

When we go into a slump the one way to get out of it short of war is to increase the mass-consumer purchasing power in the country. No other factor will accomplish this task, as far as I can see. There cannot possibly be real security with freedom for all our people, no matter how great our Canadian productive capacity may become, unless and until government financial policy recognizes the shortage of purchasing power generated under our present system of distributing that purchasing power and financing plant expansion and renewal of heavy industry.

Before I deal with the second weakness to which I have referred I would like to say a word about the minister's speech this afternoon. I wish to thank him for the attention he obviously paid to what I said on March 4. The minister observed that while he did not agree with the emphasis I placed on fiscal means, yet he found what I said of some interest. I thank the minister for that. Perhaps I did not make myself quite clear the other day, but I certainly meant at any rate to recognize, and I do recognize, a number of non-monetary factors as well as monetary ones which do have an effect upon our economy. I believe the one factor which to some degree influences all the other factors is the regulation of the volume of deposit money. As I said during that speech on March 4, and I quote from page 2556 of Hansard:

> Of late years many outstanding authorities have come to believe that eight of these factors can be influenced by regulating the volume of deposit money in this country. The chartered banks are almost if not completely in control of deposit money. It is within their sole discretion to grant or refuse loans, which is the means, of course, by which deposit money is brought into existence.

I believe that is what the minister is referring to, and I quite agree with him. I would like it definitely known here that I recognize there are non-monetary factors which affect our economy, and there are certainly monetary factors which also affect the economy. I believe the minister will agree with me that the one which exercises some influence over all the others is the regulation of the cash reserves of the chartered banks which, of course, regulate in turn the volume of deposit money.

I placed emphasis on one of these factors while at the same time recognizing that there are others. I would like the minister to note that I believe perhaps one of the most important of the non-fiscal means of affecting our economy is taxation, which does have a profound effect on the economy. There are things he could accomplish by lowering taxes which could perhaps be accomplished just as well by increasing the volume of purchasing power.

Let me deal with the second weakness to which I referred in the government's financial policy. This second weakness is one which I mentioned at the committee stage of the resolution. I refer to the lack of an efficient mechanism by which the government and the Bank of Canada can quickly and successfully halt at the point of equilibrium a deflationary operation brought on by the Bank of Canada when it uses its powers to decrease the cash reserves of the chartered banks.

I hope that when we get into committee the minister will join hands with the governor of the Bank of Canada and permit us to examine that point. I do not believe they have the answer, nor do I believe they have the mechanism, and I am satisfied in my own mind that when the cash reserves are decreased as a means of halting an inflationary tendency or an inflation, then the banks must reduce their deposit liabilities by calling in loans. When the downward trend is started it is like a chain reaction carried along by its own momentum. It will not stop itself short of recession or depression, unless some way is provided of quickly putting purchasing power into the hands of consumers so they can put on the brakes and ease off the accelerator by buying the surpluses of available goods and taking them off the market.

That is the only way I can see of doing it, and the minister has not shown me that there is an alternative brake to halt the downward movement. A softening up or lending policy will not do the job, because no bank will be prepared to make loans to producers to produce more of the things which already cannot be sold. A deflationary movement makes the borrowers uncreditworthy, when before they have been looked upon as good risks. What is needed is a means by which the Bank of Canada can make available to the government enough credit to balance the effective demand with the available goods and services in the country to make up the deficiency of purchasing power and to halt the downward trend.

A start in the direction of getting such a mechanism was made when the variable reserve principle was injected into the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act. The government could use that principle to make it possible for the Bank of Canada to provide the government with national credits on the basis of government deposit certificates lodged with the bank. But if such a thing is to be of real value, the ceiling on cash reserve requirements will have to be raised considerably above the 12 per cent limit imposed by paragraph (o) of subsection 1 of section 18 of the Bank of Canada Act.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker—I see that my time has elapsed—may I say that our concern in connection with financial policy is that every possible scientific fiscal means be included in our government's policy to ensure freedom from inflation on the one hand and freedom from depression or recession on the other. We are anxious about the lack of an effective brake and accelerator in the government's money management machinery. We want the optimum development of our country's resources and the most equitable possible distribution of the goods and services that our country can produce.

When the bills are before the committee we shall put forward specific proposals that will strengthen our financial policy and make it effective in insulating our country against inflation, and in guaranteeing our people economic security with freedom.

Mr. R. E. Anderson (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal on Bill No. 338 with one or two matters pursuant to section 88 of the Bank Act as it applies to farmer-producers and their produce. It seems to me that, when companies go into bankruptcy, everybody is on the preferred list but primary producers who provide the raw materials without which the companies could not operate. I think there should be more protection for primary producers when companies fail, and more protection to farmer-producers and producers who ship on consignment.

In 1951 I had on the order paper a resolution dealing with this same matter. This matter came up for discussion on February 26, 1951 and was recorded at page 667 of Hansard of that year, and then on pages 777 and 781. The subject matter placed on Hansard for those dates is still relevant and of vital concern to all primary producers. Mr. Speaker, I feel that there should be no preferred list, and that every creditor should share equally in case a company is forced into bankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): No, Mr. Speaker. I thought there were to be several other speakers. I had no idea that the debate would reach this stage so soon. Perhaps it is a good thing, and shows what an admirable presentation the minister made today.

There are, however, one or two points I should like to mention about what he said today, and I think I had better start off with this one. I was not able to hear the entire speech of the leader of the C.C.F. group, but in reply to the plea for nationalization of the banks, I think I should first of all say that the banks are the people. I do not know how many millions of people are depositors in the banks today, but a huge majority of the Canadian people are depositors in and users of the banks. Not only that, but the banks through their shareholders are owned by a great number of Canadians across Canada, the average shareholder having only comparatively few shares. Therefore I think one of the great assets in our Canadian banking system is that it is used by a large number of Canadians, who own it either through deposits or through their ownership of shares. It is a truly national system now.

The minister today made a point having to do with the alteration of the type of bank share. I do not know whether or not the banks are going to accept that alteration, but I want to make this suggestion. At the present time the banks have what is known as book stock. The stock is, as the name implies, only transferrable on the books of the various chartered banks. It is not good collateral at the banks. I think that is a useful quality of bank stock. I say this because, during the depression, one of the types of security which maintained its price, its equity and its income better than any except gold shares was bank stock. One of the banks—I think it was the Bank of Toronto—in its annual report after the depression made a special point of saying how few shareholders of the bank had to liquidate their stocks for various reasons.

I think the fact that the bank stocks today are not good collateral is one of their most valuable features. I would hate to see the bank stocks become negotiable securities, like common stock certificates. If the bank issues scrip stock which is transferable merely by signing on the back, and which can be used as collateral either to protect a broker's loan or to protect a loan at the bank, it becomes like any other stock. Human nature being what it is, I am afraid that when a loan needs more collateral or a broker needs more margin, it is only natural to put up the good stocks. Then if things go from bad to worse the real assets will be lost. I think that was one of the great assets of our type of bank stocks during the depression.

In the bill I notice that there is nothing to suggest that a savings bank or any type of corporation such as the savings and loans associations in the United States are contemplated. I am not a professional banker, but certainly the savings and loans associations in the United States, together with the mutual savings banks, have assets of some $43 billion dollars, which represents about half the time deposits in the United States—a useful source of mortgage money, to say the least. The figure for demand loans in the United States at November 25, 1953 was $100 billion and for time loans $69 billion. Of that $69 billion, about $43 billion was in the form of assets of savings banks and trust and loans associations. As I say, I am not putting forward my opinion that this is something that should be in the act, but I certainly feel that here is an opportunity for study with a view to the raising of funds for real estate mortgages and other purposes under the housing act we have just passed.

There is one other point I should like to bring out. The banks are to be asked to provide funds for housing loans. The evidence we have had shows that their reluctance is not based on the use of their capital, assets and deposits, but is based on a lack of knowledge of the housing and mortgage business. They are afraid of being forced into a business which up to this time has been specifically proscribed by the act, and now they find that the situation is turned about and they are being put directly into the mortgage business. It is my opinion that possibly the banks will want to form an organization which will act for the chartered banks as a group, so that instead of having eleven mortgage and loan associations there will be one association which will do the actual technical work of providing mortgages, servicing loans and performing the other work which is not done by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at the present time.

When the bill goes to the committee I hope, if the banks should consider it desirable to enter into such an arrangement, some agreement can be reached so the banks will not be contravening the combines act. Here we have an entirely new situation, one in which the banks may really wish to co-operate. Because of their lack of knowledge of the mortgage business they will be hesitant to embark upon the lending of money on mortgages. The evidence before the banking and commerce committee showed very clearly that it is not a case of unwillingness to act on the part of the banks, but rather a lack of knowledge that inhibits them at the present time.

I would also hope that in the not too distant future the banks will again be allowed to have gold as part of their assets. I believe that the right of our chartered and commercial banks to use gold as part of their reserves should be restored to them. I feel that the issuing of gold certificates by the chartered banks could be a very useful form of assistance in facilitating international trade.

I merely make these few suggestions because I do not want to hold up the bill, and because they were not mentioned by the minister when he introduced the measure this afternoon.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I suppose there are very few subjects, with the possible exception of the sort of witchcraft upon which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) frowns, that are surrounded with quite so much mythology and superstition as the subject we are discussing tonight. I have always been entertained to note that only within the last 20 or 30 years those who are in control of the temples of finance have been prepared to admit truths that were enunciated almost 300 years ago by, as one would guess, a gentleman of the same racial origin as myself. He was the father of modern banking, a man called Paterson, who sold a very smart idea to King William III in Great Britain when, in return for the privilege of issuing the then newly developing paper currency, he provided King William III with funds to fight some of his continental wars. Mr. Paterson had no illusions at all about the sort of business he was engaged in or about the realities of that business, but it is only within comparatively recent years that we have had fairly clear recognition of these same principles on which Mr. Paterson worked 300 years ago.

I was very interested in reading not long ago a book by the eminent Australian economist, L. F. Giblin, on the affairs of the Commonwealth Bank of Australia. Professor Giblin has some rather satirical comments to make on the curious myths and illusions which those who were in charge of banking and financial matters in Australia about 30 years ago held with regard to the realities of their business. I noted in this book that it took experience to convince those gentlemen that they were really living in a world in which the basis of a financial system is trust and confidence, shall we say, rather than a more solid, metallic basis. These myths and folklores of course have been very useful to those who control the financial system, just as the myths and folklores of the old priests of Egypt used to delude the people of that country.

Earlier today the leader of this group gave an account of the very profitable operations of the chartered banks of Canada, and I do not believe I need to go into that. I do not think, at any rate, that the actual fact of the really exorbitant profits, and they are exorbitant, which the chartered banks of Canada have made over the years is a very important point. I think the important point made by the leader of this group was that the government had repeatedly not merely come to the rescue of the banks but had been obliged to protect the banking system of this country by legislation from every possibility of danger and disaster—and quite rightly, too. It is important to us that the financial system of the country should operate smoothly and efficiently, without danger of breakdowns, just as it is that our transmission lines should continue to supply electric power and that our water mains should supply water for the consumption of the urban population. As I say, it was quite necessary that they should do so.

However, that raises this point, Mr. Speaker. A sector of our economy that is so essential that our government must at all costs make sure there shall be no shadow of danger attending its operations is far too important to be left in private hands. In fact it seems to me there is no moral justification for leaving in private hands a sector of the economy that must at all times be supported by the people and by the government of this country; which must be rescued if at any time it has taken some injudicious action, and that must always be, in the final resort, able to come back on the government of Canada. I believe that is the first point we should bear in mind in considering the proposals made by this group for the public ownership of the banking system.

Only today in this chamber we concluded the discussion of a piece of legislation that is an example of the government's inability to direct the operations of our financial system in the way in which this government considers it should be directed for the welfare of the people of Canada. There can be no doubt that the government takes the position, and quite rightly, that housing is an important matter to the Canadian people. It requires the investment of the savings of the Canadian people to provide that housing. We have to hold out inducements, and hope that the people who own this particular sector of our economy will co-operate with us and do what we, as the people's representatives, consider should be done with the savings of the people of Canada. We have no guarantee that they are going to do it. In fact there is every indication that they are not going to do it. There is every indication that the inducements—and there have been very tasty inducements—are going to fail. I believe that is another important consideration in dealing with the proposal for public ownership of the banking system of Canada.

As I said earlier there is a lot of mythology concerning the banking system, and one of the most persistent myths about the present banking system in Canada is that there is danger to the liquidity of the banks' assets. I believe my leader pointed out this afternoon that in actual fact the proportion of quickly realizable assets in the banks' portfolios has increased tremendously in recent years. From that point of view there is no danger of the banks getting into difficulty through lack of liquidity of their assets.

There is another much more important consideration, and I suggest it is this. Every one of us knows that since the failure of the Home Bank no government in Canada could possibly allow any bank to fail. There is no possibility of it failing at all. The banks will be protected from that danger. As I say, the government has it in hand, and quite rightly, because it is essential that the financial system should be protected from every one of these dangers. I would suggest that the proper way to regard our banking system is as perhaps our most important public utility. Not so many years ago there were people who were quite sure we were on the high road to bolshevism when we so much as took over a lighting system and operated it municipally, but today we find on all sides those who are firm advocates of public ownership for the provision of essential public services. I suggest to you, sir, that there is no more essential public service than that of looking after the savings of the people, and of placing them in proper investments for the social welfare of the people.

Earlier this evening the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) had something to say about the Commonwealth Bank of Australia. I was very interested in his remarks because I happened to have with me the latest report of that bank. Before dealing with that, I might spend a moment or two discussing the history of that bank, because it has considerable interest to us as Canadians. This bank was established largely through the efforts of a Canadian, a rather famous character in Australian history, known as King O'Malley.

Mr. Abbott: Born in the eastern townships.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Yes, born in the eastern townships. Unfortunately, he went to Australia instead of staying in Canada. It is obvious there was far more need for his efforts in Canada than in Australia. However, King O'Malley, after tremendous efforts, managed to get the Australian government to agree to the establishment of a publicly-owned bank known as the Commonwealth Bank. When it was first established it was a commercial bank, because this was long before the idea of a central bank had emerged.

Another interesting feature of the establishment of that bank is that it was established without any capital. It was set into operation by a small appropriation from the consolidated revenue fund. The latest report shows the bank has assets of some Australian £2 billion or more than $4,000 million, which have been accumulated since it was established in 1911. This bank later branched out into every type of banking business, the savings bank business, mortgage and loan business, rural credit, and finally in 1924 it was established as the central bank of Australia. At that time an act was passed which regulated the operations of the various departments of that bank. It has now become the major factor in Australian finance, in spite of the fact that it was only set up upon the undertaking there would be no aggressive attempt to compete with the private trading banks of Australia. The latest report and Professor Giblin's book stressed again and again that there have been no aggressive attempts to compete with the private trading banks, yet in spite of that the Commonwealth Bank, in its commercial banking feature, is now the most important bank in Australia.

I might say also that in Australia there are state-owned savings banks in every state in which the bulk of the people's savings are deposited. For the information of the hon. member for Peace River, the people of Australia did not back away from the proposition of taking over the entire banking system. What happened was this. The procedure was challenged by the private banks, who took the matter to the privy council in London. The privy council's decision was that under the Australian constitution it was not possible for the federal government to deprive the states of their right to regulate banks. It was on that basis that the private trading banks retained their position. Nevertheless, the Commonwealth Bank of Australia is the most important financial institution in that country. Last year it had a net aggregate profit of £10·75 million, of which £4,860,481 was paid into the consolidated revenue fund and £2,127,424 into the national debt sinking fund.

I am going to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, apart from any other consideration, that was a handsome contribution to the welfare of the people of Australia. Apparently it was accomplished without ushering in the ogre of bolshevism, because the national bank has been established for many years. One of the people who was responsible for the development of that bank into the central bank of Australia was a gentleman who is known to many in Ottawa. He was at that time a very eminent economist in the service of the government, and it is largely due to his efforts that the modern ideas of central banking were finally accepted in Australia and the Commonwealth Bank, as a central bank, was established. He has appeared here recently; not many weeks ago I saw him in the diplomatic gallery, right in this chamber.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that these facts constitute considerable evidence that a publicly-owned banking system can bring to the people some solid, satisfactory benefits. I suggest to you, sir, that there are two developments in Canada which indicate that our banking system falls far short of serving the needs of the people. One of these is a particularly iniquitous development, while the other is a particularly beneficent one. The first is exemplified by the various private lending companies which, as was pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), are springing up all over the country. And I suggest to you, sir, that if we only knew the extent to which these loan shark companies have their claws on innumerable young people in Canada, we would see that something was done about it. There is hardly a young married couple who have not at some time or another, as the result of need, gone to one of these loan shark companies, because they represented the only place they could get money for their immediate, desperate requirements.

The other development—and, as I say, this is a highly beneficial one—has been the growth of the credit union movement. I do not know how widespread this movement is in eastern Canada, but I do know it is becoming a very important factor in British Columbia. I myself am a member of a credit union that last year did some $600,000 worth of business, and this was in a small town on Vancouver island. They do not have even the small percentage of losses we hear suggested as the percentage possible in the banking system; they have had literally no losses in the last three or four years. They have lent money for the building of houses; they have lent money to people to buy cars, when required. They have enabled people to save money by being able to pay cash for the goods they required.

The rise of the credit union movement has been an example of the way in which the private banking system in Canada has totally failed in serving the people. I was extremely interested in the address of the hon. member for Peace River. I must confess I am still rather at a loss to know exactly his position and that of his party. I notice he referred to the financial monopoly as the hidden government. Well, I am temperamentally averse to using apocalyptic language about such matters as these, and I rather doubt anyway whether the financial monopoly is entirely the hidden government. I am not sure that the government is hidden. I think the privately-owned financial system is merely part of a very plain and obvious government in Canada that is not represented here, in this chamber; and I am referring to government by those who hold the means of production and distribution in this country. It is merely part of that picture.

But when my hon. friend suggests that we have here, right in the heart of our society, a hidden monopoly, a hidden government, and then in the very next breath dismisses the idea presented by this group for dealing with that hidden government, I must confess I am at a loss to understand his position. He has said there are controls that have to be exercised over the banking system. Quite right; but we have seen right here in this chamber that those controls have very severe limitations, just as they are bound to have when there is a conflict between the interests of shareholders of the private banking system and the interests of the people generally. The interests of the shareholders must be safeguarded by the directors, because that is their job; they would be faithless to their trust if at all times they did not safeguard the interests of their shareholders. And when those interests come in conflict with the public interest, then if the directors are to be faithful to their trust they must abandon the public interest. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, you cannot marry publicly-controlled financial systems to a private profit motive, because the marriage just will not last.

My hon. friend from Peace River asked what greater public utility there could be than money and credit. I quite agree with him; there is no greater public utility than money and credit. But that has been the burden of the song of socialists all along with respect to the financial system, that it is the most important public utility and for that reason must be removed from private hands where, perforce, it must serve private interests before public interests. Just as today no one would suggest that our highway system should be returned to private ownership, where at one time it was controlled; just as all people would insist that our highways should be kept open and operating at all times, and that they should not be endangered by floods or disaster of any kind, so should the highways of commerce, as represented by the banking system, be brought under public control for precisely the same reason.

I suggest to hon. members that, although today the vast majority of members in the House of Commons will, without thought, vote against the proposition put forward by this group, it will not be many years before even many of those members now sitting in the house will accept as a matter of course the principle that the banking system should be publicly owned.

Professor Giblin in his book has something to say with regard to the attitude of a very famous financier in Great Britain, Mr. Montagu Norman, who had considerable to do with the original work of setting up the Commonwealth Bank as a central bank. One of the things that gave Mr. Norman pause with regard to establishing a publicly-owned commonwealth bank as a central bank was the fact that it was publicly-owned. He is quoted in this book as saying that he was unable to see how a publicly-owned institution could possibly operate as a central bank. That happened not very many years ago; in fact it was only 30 years ago. At that time Mr. Montagu Norman was the voice of orthodox finance throughout the world; his word was gospel. Yet he was unable to see how a publicly-owned institution could function as a central bank.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo).]

Not long after that the Bank of Canada was established. The same idea that apparently had been in Mr. Norman's mind was still in the minds of those who established the Bank of Canada in its original form. The result was that it was set up as a curious hybrid, publicly-owned and privately-owned. But it was not very long before the logic of events decided what should be done with the Bank of Canada, and no one today would suggest it should be returned to private hands. No one, I think, would suggest it has not been possible for the publicly-owned institution, the Bank of Canada, to function effectively as the controlling agency of currency in the Dominion of Canada.

While I know hon. members will throw out the suggestion we have made, I hope the time is not far distant when many of them will accept as a matter of course the principle that this vital necessity in the heart of our society should be brought under public control. The major argument I have heard advanced against the scheme has always been that there might be political influence in connection with loans made by that institution. I asked the gentleman to whom I referred a short time ago that very question, when I was speaking about the Commonwealth Bank. He told me there had never been even the slightest suspicion in Australia that political influence had in any way affected the bank's lending habits or their attitude in granting loans, so I think we can dismiss that as being purely a chimera of the imagination. But I suggest that you had better keep on thinking about it; you had better marshal some facts as argument against it in the years to come, because I am quite sure you are going to need them to stem the tide of public opinion that is going to sweep us into a position of public ownership of the financial system of Canada.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to support the submission made by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Anderson) with regard to the amendment of section 88 of the bill we have before us. I am sure that many fruit and vegetable growers in the Niagara area will be grateful to the hon. member for Norfolk for bringing this matter to the attention of hon. members, first in 1951 when he introduced it as a private member's bill and again when speaking in this debate.

The hon. member for Norfolk has proposed that any reservation as to security under the provisions of section 88 should be eliminated. I suggest that some security should be given to the grower by creating a reservation under the operations of section 88 of the bill. Under the provisions of section 88 a bank is permitted to take additional security by way of a warehouse receipt or a notice of intention under the provisions of the section. This document gives the bank precedence over all claims except those of wage earners as covered by the provisions of subsection 5.

I assume this protection has been given to the banks because of the fact that the possession of property raises a certain presumption of ownership by the possessor. Thus the bank is provided with ample security through knowing that their customers have in their hands a tangible product on which a loan can be made. It is quite satisfactory when considered from that side of the picture.

But on the other side of the picture we find that the fruit and vegetable growers and other primary producers have put forth hard work and sustained effort in the development of their products. There is altogether too little profit for the primary producer in the first place. The fruit and vegetable producer is required to deliver his produce to the canner. After strict scrutiny and examination the canner accepts the natural products which have been delivered to him. The grower has actually provided the raw material which is the essence of the business itself.

In the last four years three canners in our particular area have made assignments in bankruptcy. They were well stocked with natural products which had been processed by them. These assignments have brought about a resultant loss of over $1 million to the growers in the area. This loss is spread over the four counties of Wentworth, Haldimand, Welland and Lincoln. The loss is quite heavy, and these people who have been obliged to accept the burden cannot afford to bear it.

An individual may make an assignment in bankruptcy and then commence business again under his wife's name; as an incorporated company, or in the name of some other relative. The whole process is started over again. I think some protection must be given to the primary producer who produces the actual product. I appreciate the fact that a bank must look to a manufacturer for some security before it provides a line of credit, but the provision of this additional priority to the grower may cause the bank to exercise greater care before making a loan, and they might become a bit more selective as to the type of client or customer to whom a loan would be made.

I think the amendment suggested by the hon. member to delete the priority provision altogether probably would not be a safe thing to do. I do urge the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to give serious consideration to providing a priority similar to the one given by subsection 5 of section 88. This could be done by adding a subsection to provide that the products of the soil shall be given a similar priority when delivered to a processor.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, the two main amendments to the Bank Act relate, first, to long-term loans being made under the National Housing Act and, second, to changes in the cash reserve requirements of the chartered banks. In so far as the first of those is concerned, I think it is a debatable point. Many feel that it will be a mistake for the chartered banks to go into the field of long-term loans on real estate, but personally I believe it would permit them to perform a worth-while service by working under this formula.

The second amendment provides that the minimum cash reserve requirement be raised from 5 per cent to 8 per cent and be made variable upward to 12 per cent at the discretion of the Bank of Canada. As I pointed out when I spoke on the amendment to the Bank of Canada Act, this is definitely a step in the right direction, but we feel that the limit of 12 per cent is too restrictive, that it should be at least 16 per cent, and it might be well worth while to make it higher to meet future needs.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) pointed out that while the Bank of Canada can take steps to increase or decrease the cash reserve of the chartered banks, the final decision rests with the chartered banks as to whether or not they will make loans. I would say it is not really as simple as that. I would say that the final decision really rests with the government, because it all depends on the type of policy we have in operation as to whether or not chartered banks can expand their loans.

For instance, if you have a situation where our production is at a very high level, where inventories are accumulating, where unemployment is increasing, where industry is beginning to curtail production because it cannot sell its goods, it would be questionable whether it would be wise for the chartered banks to expand loans to industry which cannot sell its existing supplies of goods. We face that situation in a depression. So I would think that in that regard the decision rests not so much with the chartered banks but with the government adopting a type of policy which makes it possible for us to maintain production at a high level. If we create a condition where industry is able to expand production on a profitable basis I doubt very much whether there will be any difficulty in getting the chartered banks to make loans to help finance that type of expansion.

I want to go back over the past 25 years to refer to a number of changes which have taken place. There have been a number of somewhat radical changes made which I believe have been definitely in the interests of the people of Canada as a whole. It will be recalled that in 1929 we were on the gold standard. That was the last year of a few years of post-war prosperity. Then in 1930 we started on a vicious spiral of deflation which landed us in a ten-year depression. The responsibility for that depression, I would say, initially rested upon the United States. It was largely due to the fact that the United States cut off the supply of dollars to the nations buying their goods. Then, due to the fact that we were on the gold standard and at that time had what one might call a gold mentality, the government of the day lacked either the power or the will to deal quickly and effectively with the situation. Lest anyone think I have no right to place the blame upon the United States for that situation, I would like to quote from "The United States in the World Economy" published by the United States Department of Commerce and printed in 1944. This is the only quotation I shall make in the course of my remarks. It is as follows:

> American investment activity in other countries was not revived. On the contrary, from 1931 on there was a substantial reverse flow through a reduction in previous investments abroad.
> During the four years from 1926 through 1929 the amount of dollars supplied ranged between $7,300 million and $7,500 million and foreign incomes and spending habits and the international debt structure were fairly well adjusted to this level.
> The abrupt fall in the dollar supply by some $5 billion or 68 per cent, over the short space of three years, necessitated vast changes in the foreign use of dollars and in the economic systems from which the demand arose. In further contrast to the more flexible situation at the beginning of the decade, the world at large had returned to a regime of fixed exchange rates under the reconstituted international gold, or gold-exchange standard which had won general adherence by the end of the twenties. The initial endeavour to defend their exchange parities and reserve positions let the task of readjustment in their external demands fall full force on their internal economic life, thus strengthening the forces of depression and deflation throughout the world generally.

Consequently in Canada, as a result of the cutting off of $5 billion from the dollar supply, foreign markets largely disappeared, prices collapsed and unemployment increased in Canada.

During the first three years of the depression over $900 million was withdrawn from circulation, and it became quite a popular habit to criticize the chartered banks very severely for that situation. I would say the chartered banks at that time were largely the victims of the situation rather than responsible for it. In the first place they had to protect their gold reserves because we were on the gold standard; and then, though we went off the gold standard in the early years of the depression, we continued on a gold basis throughout the depression right up to the year 1940. In 1940 the section of the Bank Act setting up the basis for gold reserves was suspended. With prices falling and markets greatly restricted the chartered banks, consequently, were not in a very good position to make loans, because if industry was not able to sell its produce at good prices then there was very little likelihood it would be able to repay loans even if they were made to it. Moreover, industry was not very anxious to expand its borrowings when it was not able even to sell its limited production. Therefore, of course, the demand for loans fell off and the amount of money in circulation was correspondingly reduced.

When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar criticizes the banks for not making loans in the thirties, especially to the farmers, one has to remember what was happening to the farm industry at that time. The price of farm products had dropped to a very low figure, and in 1932 the price of wheat fell to 19½ cents per bushel. Quite obviously any farmer trying to expand his farming operations with wheat at that price would not be in a very good position to repay his loan even if he had been able to borrow money from the chartered banks. Probably the best thing that happened was that the farmers were not able to go to the banks at that time, because they would merely have greatly increased their debts, and would not have been able to repay them.

Unfortunately during the depression the government of the day had not learned the lesson that the only way to get out of a depression is to spend your way out of it. By that I mean that when you have a situation where industry is not able to maintain an effective demand against its own production, it is then essential that additional money be put into circulation in order to create an effective demand for the goods which are available for distribution. In that way the demand for goods will increase and as it increases industry will be in a position to expand production in order to satisfy that demand.

Instead of taking action of that kind the government adopted a policy of belt tightening, not only in their own administration but in so far as the people were concerned. The gospel preached at that time was that everybody should tighten their belts and curtail their spending. That, of course, still further aggravated the situation we were in, because the more people saved and the less they spent the harder it was for industry to sell their goods, and when they could not sell goods they had to curtail production which consequently increased unemployment.

The Bank of Canada was set up in 1934 and in 1937, I believe, it became a public institution. But there was very little visible change in the financial policy in force at that time. There had been a great deal of ballyhoo about the nationalization of the Bank of Canada. Statements were made that currency and credit would be made available in terms of public need. Everyone jumped to the conclusion that this meant that money would be put into circulation to increase the purchasing power of the people to enable them to buy the goods which were available and for sale. Shortly after that transaction took place it was explained that currency and credit in terms of public need did not mean that at all, but merely meant that currency and credit would be available to meet the needs of the financial and industrial concerns of this country.

At that time we urged that the government should spend money into circulation to finance national projects and increased social services and that they should obtain that money from the Bank of Canada in order to expand effective demand in the country and also, incidentally, to increase the cash reserves of the chartered banks. We felt that as the demand for goods increased the chartered banks would be able to expand loans to industry in order to expand production of consumer goods required to satisfy the increased demand by the people.

Unfortunately the minister of finance at that time, Mr. Dunning, insisted that there was only one source of money for the government. He claimed that the only place from which the government could obtain money was from the people, either through taxation or by borrowing their savings. It is interesting to note that when the banking and commerce committee met in 1939 Mr. Graham Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada exploded that fallacy. Mr. Graham Towers pointed out that there were three ways by which the government could obtain money, namely, by taxation, by borrowing the savings of the people, or by monetary expansion. We advocated that, if the government indulged in monetary expansion, that expansion should take place through the Bank of Canada. We are all familiar with the changes which took place during the war. There has been some discussion on that question both on this motion and on the motion regarding the Bank of Canada Act. I am not going to take up any time in dealing with that period except to say that during the war our main criticism was the method of expansion that was adopted. It will be recalled that the government indulged in a great deal of monetary expansion and borrowed the money from the chartered banks instead of the Bank of Canada, an action which consequently increased the debt charges of the country. It is interesting to note that we had to have monetary expansion during the war in spite of the fact that we had heavy taxation and heavy borrowing of the savings of the people. In spite of that it was still necessary to have a heavy expansion of money in order to meet the requirements of a maximum war effort, and in order to provide the government with the necessary money with which to buy the products of the war industries.

I now want to jump to the period we are in at the present time, because the period from the war up to the present has received a good deal of attention both in this debate and in the debate on the Bank of Canada Act. The situation we are in at the present time seems to be somewhat peculiar. The government does not seem to be quite certain whether we are coming or going; that is, it does not seem to be quite certain whether we are going into a depression or coming into a period of full employment. Undoubtedly the government hopes that when the spring comes everything will be satisfactory. I think most of us will agree that the situation should improve when the spring opens up. But on the other hand it looks as though the situation, in some regards, has got out of hand and that all may not be well.

As a result of the amendment of the Bank Act the cash reserves of the chartered banks will be extended in order to meet the needs of the National Housing Act. Perhaps I should not make that as a definite statement, but that is the definite impression the president of the bankers' association had. He states that he assumes that when this housing act is passed the Bank of Canada will take that action because, in his opinion, the only way the chartered banks could enter the field to any degree would be by the Bank of Canada making additional cash reserves available to them. But whilst money will be made available to finance the building of houses under the National Housing Act, of course it will not be possible for the banks to make money available to people in the low income groups.

If action is going to be taken to make it possible for people in the low income groups to build houses, it will have to be a different type of action to achieve that objective. To try to do so by expanding taxation or by borrowing the savings of the people would certainly not increase the purchasing power of the people. On the other hand, the government may decide upon a policy of expanding the money supply by borrowing from the chartered banks.

At this point I want to examine briefly the financial machinery we have at our disposal, and the division of responsibility as among the chartered banks, the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance. When I refer to the chartered banks, I want to deal with them collectively, as one body. The chartered banks are responsible for making loans to industry; and of course loans can be reallocated as between industries on the basis of existing cash reserves. The expansion, of course, depends to a large extent upon the action the Bank of Canada may take. Hence action of the chartered banks in expanding or contracting loans will depend upon action of the Bank of Canada.

However, a situation such as we had in the 1930's or the situation that may well develop at the present time, if it continues to deteriorate, cannot be met by that means alone. Industry cannot expand without markets. If we are going to have an expansion of industry, we will first of all have to provide for expanding markets; and expanding markets, of course, depend upon maintaining an effective demand. Therefore if we are going to bring about a situation where there can be an adequate supply of purchasing power, it will require action by the federal government in order to expand the purchasing power of the people either by capital projects, by social services or by reduction of taxation, or by a combination of all three.

I want to point out that it is quite evident that we cannot hope to expand the purchasing power of the people by obtaining money through an expansion of taxation, especially the sales tax or taxation of people in the lower income groups. Neither can we hope to expand the purchasing power of the people by expanding borrowings from their savings. Therefore, in a situation such as we had in the thirties, or a situation that may develop at the present time, it is necessary to have an expansion of credit and we insist that should be by using the Bank of Canada rather than the chartered banks.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Quelch the debate was adjourned.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RECOGNITION OF RED CHINA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he been able to confirm the statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in regard to the recognition of communist China, and, if so, has he any comment to make?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, by lunch time no reply had been received to our telegraph message requesting the actual text of what the Prime Minister is reported to have said in the Philippines, and in Korea.

REPORTED VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER TO WASHINGTON

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he prepared to say whether there is any foundation in a newspaper report today to the effect that the Prime Minister on his return will immediately go to Washington to discuss with President Eisenhower what he has seen on his world tour?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I know of no foundation for that newspaper report.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED LEAK FROM FILES, VICTORIA, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Is the minister aware that the person or persons charged by him with the duty of investigating the alleged leak in Victoria, B.C., from R.C.M.P. files failed to contact or interview Reeve Casey of Saanich, the person who was, in the first place, responsible for the allegation that there had been a leak from the R.C.M.P. files; and is the minister, in view of this circumstance, prepared to have a further investigation made of the matter?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. I am aware that the persons charged with the investigating of the alleged leak of information in Victoria did not interview Reeve Casey, and I am also aware of the reason they did not do so, namely that the only occasion on which any member of the R.C.M.P. was in contact with Reeve Casey in relation to this matter was a considerable time after Mr. Marshall was released by the Victoria public library board.

The federal government does not permit or condone the giving of information by the R.C.M.P. to private citizens from its special branch files. Our investigation has established that there was no disregard or violation of this policy by the R.C.M.P. in respect of the person named. This language, Mr. Speaker, I believe, is quite clear, but lest there should be any misapprehension concerning it may I state the same facts in another way. The federal government forbids the giving of information to private citizens from its special branch files. In the present case the federal government is satisfied that no member of the R.C.M.P. gave information to anyone concerning Mr. Marshall from its special branch files.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NAVAL DOCKYARD, ESQUIMALT—PROPOSED PAY REDUCTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister received a protest from labour organizations in British Columbia regarding the reduction of rates of pay for certain classes of work in the naval dockyard at Esquimalt? If so, will the minister comment on this protest?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of the question. Representations have been received with respect to the proposed reduction in rates of pay concerning six, I believe, of the number of riggers on the establishment of the naval dockyard at Esquimalt. These representations are at present under consideration and in the meantime action with respect to the proposed reduction has been postponed.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Does the minister yet know the date on which he intends to bring down the budget?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker? Will it be before or after the 22nd of March?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know, Mr. Speaker.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS FOLLOWING REQUEST BY MANITOBA GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the federal government received any representations from the government of Manitoba concerning the possibility of amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which will allow the act to apply on a more equitable basis to Manitoba farmers in relation to the farmers of Saskatchewan and Alberta? If so, what has been the nature of these representations?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris was kind enough to send me notice of his question. In reply I would say that the government of Manitoba has on quite a number of occasions communicated to us its view that Manitoba does not get as much assistance under the act as the other two provinces, and on each occasion on which these representations have been made we have pointed out that the same conditions apply in different parts of the provinces of western Canada. There are areas in all the provinces that never have crop failures and those areas, of course, never receive payment, but they make payment on delivery of grain to the elevators. I might say, for the benefit of the hon. member, that the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) at one time in the house a few years ago moved an amendment to the act to deal with the question just raised. The question came up for discussion here and all of the members from Manitoba present, except the hon. member for Provencher, were opposed to making the change.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

NEW PLAN FOR PROCUREMENT AND TRAINING OF JUNIOR OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Has the Minister of National Defence an answer to the question I asked yesterday with reference to the statement he then made?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have the number of officers on strength today which is 2,318, representing 13·8 per cent of the total strength of the Royal Canadian Navy today. The target for officers in the build-up to 21,200 men would be a total of 2,900 representing 13·6 per cent of the total strength. Numerically the relationship is satisfactory at the present time. However, it takes longer to train officers than to train men. On that account we should like to get an additional group of officers trained to match the men necessary to man the ships as we put them into commission. Hence we have instituted this new plan.

Mr. Pearkes: I wonder whether the minister could elaborate a little bit more on the plan? Press reports indicate that there is a separate establishment or separate school.

Mr. Claxton: The press report was wrong.

Mr. Pearkes: I thank the minister.

Mr. Claxton: I should correct this misunderstanding. We set up—and this is, I am sure, what misled the press—a new shore establishment with a new name, H.M.C.S. Venture, but that will be in the existing buildings at Esquimalt, with the existing staff, equipment, recreational facilities, educational facilities and so on. There is a new name but no new establishment.

Mr. Pearkes: Is this a new principle as distinguished from the tri-service college idea?

Mr. Claxton: It is comparable to the R.C.A.F. short-service commission plan or the army officer candidate school program which we used to raise the special force. This is to meet this particular situation.

Mr. Pearkes: Just one other question. Do these other plans take in young men of 16 to 19 years of age and train them?

Mr. Claxton: The ages are about the same.

THE BANK ACT

PROVISION FOR DECENNIAL REVISION, EXTENSION OF CHARTERS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for the second reading of Bill No. 338, respecting banks and banking, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, before the adjournment last night I was stressing the point that during a depression we cannot hope to expand the purchasing power of the people by financing government expenditures through an expansion of taxation, especially an expansion of taxation upon people in the lower income brackets or of the sales tax or by borrowing from the savings of the people because that procedure is bound to reduce their purchasing power to the extent of their borrowing. We insist that it must be done at least in part by monetary expansion.

At the present time we are on a managed currency; and I would say it is a fully managed currency. We in this group support that policy. We have been a managed currency since the year 1940. Prior to that time, for a number of years, we were on what might be called a semi-managed currency; that is, we were on a gold parity although we were not on the gold standard. I would say that the real test of the efficiency of the government's management of currency has yet to come. Ever since 1940 we have had a high level of economic activity, largely as a result of the war; in the post-war period it has been largely as the result of consequences arising out of the war.

In the past the Minister of Finance has supported the general principle of cyclical budgeting. I think we will all agree that during the past few years he has not hesitated to budget for a substantial surplus. I think perhaps there was a good deal of logic in that action because during those years we had a high level of economic activity and we had present strong inflationary pressures. It therefore might be said that it was necessary to withdraw a certain amount of the redundant money from circulation in order to reduce the inflationary pressure.

But whilst I would agree that there was probably a certain amount of justification for that action, I would also point out that in the future, for the same reason, it may be necessary to budget for a deficit. What I mean by that is that if we have a condition where economic activity is falling off and where we are getting into a depressed condition, then the government must be prepared to budget for a deficit. In other words, if a system of equitable taxation and moderate borrowings from the savings of the people fails to provide the government with the money that is necessary to finance their program, then they will have to be prepared to indulge in a certain degree of monetary expansion.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I cannot help noticing—and probably the hon. member who has the floor has also noticed it—that there is so much noise in the house—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: —that the hon. member who has the floor is speaking under extremely difficult circumstances. I would imagine that hon. members will keep silent from now on because I noted that those who were the first to applaud my remarks were perhaps the worst offenders.

Mr. Quelch: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On the Bank of Canada bill I quoted the governor of the Bank of Canada in words to the effect that during a situation where economic activity was low, where unemployment was increasing and where private spending was insufficient to maintain the economic activity of the country at a high level, then there might be justification for the government not financing the whole of their program from taxes and from borrowing the savings of the people. The governor argued that, in that case, there might be justification for financing government projects through credit expansion and that, provided the projects were sound, they would have his blessing. I would therefore say that the question we must consider is this: How far can we go in that regard? To what extent can we have monetary expansion in this country without any danger of inflation?

Let me point out that at no time have we in the Social Credit group ever advocated the issue of unlimited sums of money. We have always made it clear that there is a definite limit to the amount of money that can be issued in that way. We would say that the limit is the amount required to maintain an effective demand against the goods and services coming from an optimum development of the resources of the country; that is to say, there should be in circulation enough money to provide for the exchange of the goods and services available for distribution.

As an example let us take the present situation. At the present time many industries are building large inventories. Many industries have already had to cut their production to 50 per cent. In other cases industries have closed their plants entirely. That is one side of the picture. On the other side you have a large group of people who are enduring a low standard of living and who would very much like to have access to these large inventories of goods. You might call that a potential demand. Therefore we would argue that in a situation of that kind we would be fully justified in issuing money to make that potential demand an effective demand against the production of the country. In that way you would be able to maintain production at an optimum level.

There are many ways in which the government might issue that money. It might be issued for the purpose of financing national projects. The governor of the Bank of Canada says that he would support such an idea if the projects were sound. It might be issued for the purpose of financing low-cost housing for people in the low income groups. It might be for the purpose of increasing social services, for the purpose of increasing old age pensions, war veterans allowances, family allowances, pensions for people who are disabled, and in many other ways. Of course the purpose would be to direct that money to the points where it was most needed.

The second question we come to with respect to monetary expansion is how it should take place. The government argues that when monetary expansion is necessary it should take place through the chartered banks. Of course we all know that the government borrows consistently from the chartered banks on a very short term basis at a very low rate of interest. But for a project of this kind they would have to borrow for long terms and borrowing for long terms would be at a substantially higher rate of interest. The rate of interest on long term loans would be over 3 per cent. The result of that would be to increase the debt charges of the country which would require an increase in taxation so that the increase in debt charges could be met.

On the other hand, we argue that when it is necessary to have an expansion of credit it should take place through the Bank of Canada, our own national institution. Provided it was done through the Bank of Canada and acquired by the government depositing what might be called a perpetual certificate or perpetual bond with the Bank of Canada, that money could be obtained without any requirement that it be repaid. It would be on a perpetual basis. In so far as interest rates are concerned, the rate of interest would really be immaterial because all profits of the Bank of Canada come back to the government and therefore the actual cost of that money to the government would be the actual cost of handling it. In other words, the money could be issued interest free and the amount of revenue coming to the government from the Bank of Canada would be reduced by whatever cost was involved in the transaction.

In the past the main basis of the government's opposition to a proposition of this kind has been that to finance through the Bank of Canada would be more inflationary than to finance through the chartered banks, the argument being that when that money was paid into circulation it would eventually reach the tills of the chartered banks thereby increasing their cash reserves and thereby enabling them to expand their loans on the ratio of ten to one of the increased deposits. For that reason it is argued that it would be more inflationary, but on the other hand that argument no longer holds water today because we are amending the Bank of Canada Act and the Bank Act to make the cash reserve requirement of the chartered banks variable all the way from 8 per cent to 12 per cent. If the occasion arose there is no reason why the cash reserves could not be increased above the 12 per cent level.

When I spoke on the Bank of Canada Act I suggested that the requirement should have been raised to at least 16 per cent and that as time went on it might be desirable to raise it to a higher level. At 12 per cent the government will only be able to issue money through the Bank of Canada up to $180 million without increasing the cash reserves of the chartered banks above the 12 per cent limit. On the other hand, if the requirement were increased to 16 per cent the government could finance to the extent of $540 million without increasing the cash reserves of the chartered banks above the 16 per cent limit.

However, we find a different argument being used today so far as the officials of the Bank of Canada are concerned. They now argue on a different basis. They argue that if you finance through the Bank of Canada you are not playing fair with the chartered banks. In other words, it is a form of hidden tax against the chartered banks because when the money is issued in that way it will increase the deposit liabilities of the chartered banks and they will then have to service these deposit accounts without receiving any payment or compensation for that service.

It is interesting to remember, Mr. Speaker, that the amount of those deposits would only represent a small percentage of the total deposits, and on the balance of all their deposits, which would be the balance made up of loans and investments, they would be receiving interest payments which would return a fair profit to them. However, I would agree that if the chartered banks were in what might be called a depressed condition there might be some justification for an argument of that kind. I do not think anybody would seriously suggest for one minute that the banks of Canada are in a depressed condition. They are in a very healthy and substantial condition. According to the annual returns of earnings and operating expenditures of the chartered banks, which are carried in the Canada Gazette yearly, we find that the balance of earnings over operating expenditures is two and a half times greater in 1953 than in 1943. They are up from $29·6 million to $72·7 million.

Again, according to the answers given to questions that I asked, which can be found at page 2614 of Hansard for March 3, we find that the profits of the chartered banks are at a very substantial figure. A table gives the net profits of the chartered banks for the year 1953, and the figures of net profits are after appropriations to contingency reserves, provision for depreciation and for income taxes. In column 3 of the table is given the percentage of profits in column 1 to paid-up capital, and we find the percentage of profit to be very substantial. Taking the chartered banks as listed in the table we find that the Bank of Montreal had a percentage of profit of 19·56, the Bank of Nova Scotia 20·08, the Bank of Toronto 21·72, the Provincial Bank of Canada 8·52, the Canadian Bank of Commerce 19·30, the Royal Bank of Canada 24·67, the Dominion Bank 19·91, Banque Canadienne Nationale 19·50, Imperial Bank of Canada 20·03, and Barclays Bank 0·60, which bank is operated on a very different basis of course from the other chartered banks in Canada.

Another interesting figure is found on page 2615 of Hansard for the same date. It shows the rate of dividends on paid-up capital for the years 1950, 1951, 1952 and 1953. Similar figures have been published for former years. During these four years we find that dividends were at a very high level, and that in 1953 they reached an all-time high. The figures are as follows:

Rate of Dividends on Paid-up Capital

Bank	1950 per cent	1951 per cent	1952 per cent	1953 per cent
Montreal	10	12	12½	14
Nova Scotia	16	16	16	18
Toronto	16	16	16	17
Provincial	7	7	7	7
Commerce	10	10	12	12
Royal	10	12	12¼	14
Dominion	12	12	12	13
Nationale	8	10	10	12
Imperial	14	14	14	15
Barclays	nil	nil	nil	nil

I think it can be safely argued, from that, that the banks now are making very substantial profits.

There is another interesting point, that the general reserves of the chartered banks have risen from $136,755,000 in 1943 to $246,400,000 in 1953. In addition to their general reserves the banks have their contingent reserves, reserves that are often referred to as hidden reserves. On page 2615 of Hansard for March 3, 1954, we find that during the past ten years they have been transferring substantial amounts to those contingent reserves. The purpose of the contingent reserves is to provide for the difference between the published value of their assets and what might be considered the market value. This table reads as follows:

Fiscal years	Transfers to contingency reserves, net
1945	$22,244
1946	6,902
1947	17,243
1948	15,524
1949	20,993
1950	20,600
1951	27,965
1952	27,069
1953	24,834

Note
(a) Amounts are expressed in thousands of dollars.

It is quite evident that they have substantial amounts in their reserves at the present time, and we can rest assured that the contingent reserves are adequate to take care of the writing down of any of their published assets. It is interesting to note also that they do not have to pay any income tax when they transfer earnings to that inner reserve.

I believe the figures I have quoted are enough to show that the banks are in a very prosperous condition. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), referring to the banks, said that they were drowning in liquidity. I think that was a poor analogy. I would say that the banks are floating luxuriously on that liquidity. Moreover, they are supported by the government in that floating because there are a number of measures under which the losses of the chartered banks are guaranteed by the government up to a certain percentage. As I say, from the figures I have quoted it is quite evident the chartered banks are doing very well. I feel we would all agree it is highly desirable that they should be doing well, and that they should be in a sound position.

Just so long as economic activity continues at a high level, there is every reason to believe that the banks of this country will continue to prosper. Therefore, I see no reason why the chartered banks should not be required to service additional deposits arising from government expenditures that are made to maintain a high level of economic activity without any additional compensation for that service. After all, those deposits would only represent a small percentage of the total deposits which are represented by loans and investments that bear interest. I would say that such a service could well be regarded as a premium paid by the chartered banks to help assure a high level of economic activity in the country, which would assure them a continued prosperous condition.

The chartered banks in Canada today are in a very preferred position. Many of their risks are safeguarded by the government and their profits practically assured. Therefore, the argument by the Bank of Canada that financing through the Bank of Canada would be too hard upon the chartered banks does not, I think, hold water.

In closing I should like to say a few words about the C.C.F. amendment. The leader of this group has already spoken on it. I would agree that if the chartered banks refused to co-operate fully in carrying out government policy, if they were in an unsound position or if they were operating inefficiently, then there might be justification for nationalization. It has been argued that the chartered banks have operated inefficiently at times in the past from the point of view of the borrower. Reference has been made to what happened in the thirties. The chartered banks refused to make loans to farmers and other organizations. As I pointed out in my speech yesterday, the chartered banks at that time were in reality the victims of circumstances. It was the result of the failure of the government of the day to maintain the economic activity of this country at a high level that few loans were made to industry to extend their production. What use is it to make loans to industry to expand production when they were not able to sell their present level of production? A lot of the criticism levelled against the chartered banks should rightfully have been made against the government's economic and financial policies.

On the other hand, if it is argued that profits are too great, there are many ways in which parliament can take action to limit those profits. I have shown one method by which the chartered banks could provide a greater service to the people of Canada, and of course to the extent that they did that their profits would be reduced.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said yesterday in opening the debate on second reading, Mr. Speaker, Bill No. 338 is a measure that is important but not controversial. One might have expected that a measure of this kind being largely technical would give rise to only a short debate. The amendments that the minister catalogued in his speech yesterday are not far-reaching. There are a half a dozen of them that merit mention, but broadly speaking there is no far-reaching revision of the Bank Act contemplated this year.

The amendments will have the effect of increasing the minimum cash reserve required on the part of the banks from 5 per cent to 8 per cent of their Canadian dollar deposit liabilities; the banks will be for the first time in Canadian banking history given the power to lend on the security of mortgages on real estate, through the medium of insured loans provided for in the new housing act which was passed through this chamber and given third reading yesterday. The other amendments are not of an extensive nature. Provision is made for facilitating loans on the part of banks for the development of the oil reserves of this country. There is a slight amendment to the important section 88 in relation to loans in the case of seed potatoes. There is a prohibition which has been expected for a long time against the issuance of notes in circulation and a provision for doubling the capital requirement on the part of new banks, both as to subscribed and issued capital.

There is nothing in amendments of this kind, Mr. Speaker, that would give rise to an extensive debate on second reading. However, the leader of the C.C.F., on behalf of his party, yesterday introduced an amendment that I think should engage the serious attention of the house. The amendment, as it is recorded on page 2778 of Hansard for March 8, 1954, reads as follows:

> That Bill No. 338 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the national ownership and public control of the chartered banks.

I welcome the introduction of this amendment. I do not welcome it because I am prepared to give any support to it or because it finds any degree of favour in my eyes. I welcome it, Mr. Speaker, for several reasons.

It may help to relieve something of the tedium of dull debate in a session that has, as a whole, been rather dull—although I do not pretend to confound contention with constructiveness, or to say that dullness is always the test of constructiveness. But I do welcome it, principally because there is revealed in this amendment an element of self-exposure on the part of the socialist party which, I think, is timely.

We have seen over a period of years a change of doctrine on the part of the C.C.F. from time to time. Perhaps some of them will think that is a harsh way of putting it. I think it has gone much beyond mere changes in emphasis. Those of us who have watched them in the house over a period of years have seen very pronounced changes in the doctrines espoused by the socialist party in the House of Commons. Some of these changes have been attributable, of course, to changes in personnel of that party in the house. For instance we recall that after certain by-elections in June of 1948, with the entry of several—two in particular—new members of the socialist party into this house, there was a definite leftist turn in the flavour of C.C.F. speeches. After the rebuke administered by the electorate to that party in 1949 we find them rather shrinking away from the tendencies which had been evident previously, and becoming more cautious and moderate. Indeed it reached the point where one hon. member of that party, then representing the riding of Moose Jaw, began to make speeches which by no stretch of the imagination could possibly be reconciled with the doctrines which had been espoused by the party to which he gave outward adherence.

Mr. Sinclair: You are so right.

Mr. Fleming: And, coming to the present parliament, we have seen some evidence again of a tendency to shift left, with the accession to the C.C.F. membership in the house of some whose views appear to be considerably to the left of those who sat as representatives of that party in the twenty-first parliament of Canada.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Would you like to tell us who they are?

Mr. Hodgson: You know who they are; why ask that?

Mr. Fleming: If the hon. member does not know, then I suggest he has not been spending his time to very good advantage.

Mr. Speaker, in this amendment we see the C.C.F. back at Regina. The leopard has not changed his spots. Notwithstanding the shifts of emphasis and the shifts of policy we have seen in the socialist party in recent years, they are right back at Regina. And we have waited—I think some of us with interest—for evidence that the C.C.F. stands firmly where it stood when its Regina manifesto was written in 1933.

Now, may I ask the house to put side by side the amendment introduced in this house yesterday with this extract from the Regina manifesto of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation adopted in July of 1933. Under the heading "Socialization of Finance" we find this subheading:

> Socialization of all financial machinery—banking, currency, credit, and insurance, to make possible the effective control of currency, credit and prices, and the supplying of new productive equipment for socially desirable purposes.

And then this paragraph proceeds:

> Planning by itself will be of little use if the public authority has not the power to carry its plans into effect. Such power will require the control of finance and of all those vital industries and services, which, if they remain in private hands, can be used to thwart or corrupt the will of the public authority. Control of finance is the first step in the control of the whole economy. The chartered banks must be socialized and removed from the control of private profit-seeking interests; and the national banking system thus established must have at its head a central bank to control the flow of credit and the general price level, and to regulate foreign exchange operations. A national investment board must also be set up, working in co-operation with the socialized banking system to mobilize and direct the unused surpluses of production for socially desired purposes as determined by the planning commission.

Insurance companies, which provide one of the main channels for the investment of individual savings and which, under their present competitive organization, charge needlessly high premiums for the social services that they render, must also be socialized.

Mr. Speaker, the C.C.F. has marched now, for all to see, right back to Regina. There had been suggestions previously that the C.C.F. had turned its back on Regina. Indeed, Mr. Donald C. MacDonald, then national director of organization for the C.C.F. party, and now the provincial leader for that party in Ontario, on March 8, 1951, had occasion to object to interpretations placed upon decisions taken by the C.C.F. national council in that month of March 1951, and which had been widely commented upon by the press and public of this country. He was trying to reassure the public in a letter to the press, in which he said:

In the second place the C.C.F. national convention did not reject the Regina manifesto.

Well, on that occasion, if it refrained from rejecting it, it certainly did not say anything about the nationalization of the banks. Indeed, in other pronouncements from the C.C.F. it has been extraordinary that such a degree of silence has been observed on what was regarded in 1933 by the C.C.F. as something of such high importance that it found second place in the list of far-reaching planks written by that party into its platform.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I welcome this self-exposure on the part of the C.C.F. as to its true designs on the Canadian economy.

There is one sentence in the Regina manifesto, in the paragraph from which I have just read, which is absolutely correct. And it is so correct that I hope all members of the house, and the Canadian public, will realize its significance. That sentence is:

Control of finance is the first step in the control of the whole economy.

And, Mr. Speaker, the C.C.F. in proposing, as they are in this present amendment, the national ownership and public control of the chartered banks in Canada, is inviting the House of Commons to take what they regard as the first step toward the control of the whole economy. Well, for my part, I wish to record as emphatic opposition as any I am capable of to this proposal.

[Mr. Fleming.]

It was a weak case, indeed, that the leader of the C.C.F. offered yesterday in support of this radical and sweeping proposal, such a case that it is not to be justified by expressions such as he used yesterday in describing the banking system as "an instrument of monetary policy". Mr. Speaker, to say that is a far cry from a proposal for the nationalization of the chartered banks of Canada. Indeed, if they are looking for avenues for undertaking whatever monetary and fiscal controls are necessary over the banking system of Canada, then what is the Bank of Canada for? A case could rarely have been weaker than the one put forward yesterday by the leader of the C.C.F.

Now, I wish to make this observation about the Canadian banking system in general. The Canadian banking system is unique in all the world. It is not just like any other banking system in the world. There are some who trace some aspects of it to Scottish sources and others to American sources. The fact is that the Canadian banking system has elements which are absolutely unique the world over. It is a system that has been tested. It is a system that has been submitted to very severe testing—and indeed probably the most severe within the lifetime of every member in the house. And no banking system in the world emerged from the acid test of the depression of the 1930's with a better record, or in a stronger or more healthy position, than the Canadian banking system. Much of that health of course is attributable to the fact that it is a system built upon branches. In that respect it has differed so much from the system in vogue in the United States. That branch system has drawn its strength from the whole far-flung economy of Canada.

It is so easy for hon. members to the left to picture the banks as if they were the enemies of the economy, as though all the ills in the economy were to be attributed to the banks. Mr. Speaker, anyone who knows anything about the banking system, or has studied the history of the Canadian banking system, well knows that in general what is good for business in Canada—and that goes for all aspects of the Canadian economy, our primary industries as well as secondary industries—is good also for the banks. The banks cannot prosper when the Canadian economy is stagnant or receding.

Sir, this banking system is such that there has been no failure of a chartered bank now for more than 30 years. We do not want any more bank failures; we do not want such tinkering by theorists with the Canadian banking system as in any measure to jeopardize the soundness of that system, because the effects of the failure of a chartered bank extend far beyond the interests of its depositors, its creditors and its shareholders. That was so in connection with the last bank failure in Canada, the Home Bank. The effects of that failure extended very far into the Canadian economy. And, Mr. Speaker, we do not want in this house, I believe, to do anything that is going to subtract from the strength of this system. It is a system that has grown in strength and in public confidence.

Those factors do not occur by accident, Mr. Speaker. You cannot find any more effective tribute to the soundness of the Canadian banking system, or to the way in which it has served the banking needs of the Canadian people, than the fact that the system has grown stronger and that with it has grown the public's confidence in it. Indeed the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) felt called upon to recognize the service and what he called the impressive record of the Canadian banking system. At page 2772 of Hansard he is reported as saying:

> I am going to say at once that the Canadian banks have a very impressive record of efficient management, of safety—

And then of course he added:

> —and of profit to their shareholders.

Well, let us take that statement as we find it. It is at least a recognition of the banks' impressive record, in the way in which they have served the needs of the Canadian economy. Sir, yesterday the Minister of Finance, in opening his speech, used these words, at page 2761 of Hansard:

> . . . there is general agreement that within the framework of our accepted economic structure our banking system is an excellent system; that it is efficient; it gives good service; it commands the confidence of the Canadian people; and it is highly regarded abroad.

Let me say at once that in so gauging the opinion of this house he certainly spoke for me, because those sentiments I do most heartily echo.

Let it not be forgotten, sir, that the Canadian banking system is a competitive one. That is one of the reasons for the strength of the Canadian banking system. It has been a system based upon keen competition. And in the last analysis, sir, its strength rests upon the way in which it has served the Canadian people; for businesses and individuals in this country from one end of it to the other have owed so much to the advice and guidance they have received at the hands of their bankers.

But we have attacks made, sir, on the Canadian banks. We have attempts on the part of socialists in this house to blame the banking system for all the ills of the country. Everything that is wrong can be laid at the door of the banks: such is their reasoning. Well, let us be fair about this. Let us recognize in the first place that limitations are imposed upon the business of banking; they are imposed by statute of this parliament of Canada and they are imposed also by sound common sense.

Banking is important; it is a factor of the highest importance in relation to our own economy; but it is not the only factor in the Canadian economy. And I cannot agree with those in this house who say that the regulation of the volume of bank deposits is the dominant factor in determining the strength of the Canadian economy. Sir, those who think along that line would do well to recall what Mr. Graham Towers, the governor of the Bank of Canada, has had to say before some of the committees in this house in recent years in commenting upon the preamble to the Bank of Canada Act. Let me remind the house of the provisions of the preamble:

> Whereas it is desirable to establish a central bank in Canada to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation, to control and protect the external value of the national monetary unit and to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action, and generally to promote the economic and financial welfare of the dominion.

Mr. Graham Towers has had occasion more than once to shake his head before committees of this house when faced with that preamble and to question how the Bank of Canada could be expected to fulfil all the objects set forth therein. It is perhaps time that the house measured a little more realistically the possible scope within which even the central banking facilities of this country may operate.

And the second limitation, Mr. Speaker, is the sound and legitimate limitation against the taking of unhealthy risks. It seems that when anybody has some pet project, if the banks do not lend money upon it, that is fair occasion for denunciation of the banks. Let us remember, Mr. Speaker, that the powers of the banks are limited by law and many risks the banks and others are called upon to take are unwise, and in shrinking from those risks the banks are following the sound practice of protecting the deposits that are placed in their hands.

We heard criticism in this house yesterday of the fact that parliament had intervened in such measures as the setting up of the industrial development bank, in the provision of farm improvement loans, home improvement and extension loans and in the insuring of loans under the National Housing Act, and has underwritten risks which private enterprise and the chartered banks ought to be accepting.

Well, Mr. Speaker, who says that the banks ought to be accepting those risks? Surely, Mr. Speaker, those who are charged with the responsibility of administering funds placed in their hands, funds largely emanating in the first place from deposits in their hands, must be very calculating in their assumption of risks with money that after all, in the last analysis, does not strictly belong to them.

In reference to all these measures, why do the socialists in this house not be fair and say that the banks were pushed into loans of these kinds, were urged to embark upon fields which were foreign to their experience because it was public policy on the part of this parliament to encourage the banks to enter those fields? We had evidence just the other day—I am not going to comment on this at length—of the position of the banks in reference to the extension of their powers into new investment in insured loans on the security of real estate.

This is a new field, brand new to the banks. They say they do not know anything about it, and they would not have chosen to be in it. They did not ask to go into it. They are put in that field today only because it becomes public policy on the part of parliament to give them powers to go into that field.

In all these measures, Mr. Speaker, whether it is insured loans, home improvement and extension loans or the industrial development bank, it was the decision on the part of parliament that the banks go into a field which was largely at that time beyond the range of banking policy. It is quite proper in these cases, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, when parliament is prodding the banks to take risks in new fields, and where substantial risks are involved, that parliament, if it takes the course of following what is considered to be sound public policy, should be prepared to facilitate those steps.

Let us look at experience elsewhere. The experience of other nations in this respect is interesting but we do not have to go beyond the experience of the United Kingdom. When the socialists came into power in the United Kingdom in 1945 they had ample opportunity —no government ever had more—to take every step they wished in the direction of nationalization of the joint stock banks of that country; but when Labour went out of power at the end of 1951 they had not nationalized a single joint stock bank in the United Kingdom—not one. What more proof do you need that nationalization of banks is an imprudent and reckless course? The Labour party today in Britain is not making any proposals along the lines the C.C.F. party in this parliament has undertaken to put forward and espouse in this amendment.

I wish to examine, in the time that remains, what I consider to be the certain effects of nationalization of the Canadian banking system, if such a course were ever undertaken.

The first result would be to drive confidence away. Sir, you cannot have capital available for needed investment unless there is confidence. It was Lenin who said that all you needed to destroy the political system of the west, or democracy, was to have a series of recurring depressions. I am not sure he was altogether right, Mr. Speaker, but at any rate it remains a fact that if you destroy confidence then you certainly can destroy an economy, because a free economy depends upon confidence.

What are the sources of capital in an economy such as ours? The first source is profits, that much-maligned word, that word which is thrown around as though there was something inherently wicked about profits. I am not going to condone profits which are improperly made or are excessive. I am here to say, however, without fear of contradiction, that profits are absolutely essential to our free economy, and if there are not going to be profits there is not going to be national development, nor will there be the capital for the development of these great resources of Canada.

When our friends to the left decry the profits which the banks made in recent years, let us not forget the years when the banks, like other institutions, were not making profits, and when business was finding it difficult to succeed. Let us not forget also that in this prosperity the exchequer of the Canadian government is the principal shareholder.

The second source of capital is from abroad. One reason for the strength of the Canadian economy has been that it has given rise to confidence abroad, and no one factor has contributed more to the feeling of confidence abroad in the Canadian economy than has the Canadian banking system. Indeed, that was recognized only last week in a speech made by President Gordon R. Ball of the Bank of Montreal when he said that the increasing foreign investment at stake in Canadian industry is an accumulating benefit to the nation. I would like to quote from a BUP dispatch of the speech made by Mr. Ball at Montreal on March 2. The report states:

> The foreign stake in Canada has increased by $3 billion since 1945 to more than $10 billion at the end of 1952, Mr. Ball said. The increase, compared with $30 billion of new Canadian capital expenditure in eight years, represents less than 8 per cent of Canada's post-war spending of a capital nature.
> Mr. Ball referred to Canada's oil industry as "a world industry," and he said it was to be expected that much of the stimulus to explore and develop the potentialities of the Canadian west should come from United States companies.
> Of all United States foreign investment, Mr. Ball said, close to one-third is in Canada, and a considerable part of that came from the re-investment of profits, which made the investment "not a drain but an accumulating benefit."

Of this widening area of United States participation in investment in Canada, Mr. Ball said, "it was a natural development and it should be understood before it is criticized."

If you want to put a stop to the assistance given by foreign capital to the development of Canadian resources, and thereby to the provision of expanding opportunities for Canadian youth and workmen, then all you need to do is to support measures of the kind envisaged in this C.C.F. amendment. There can be no surer way of destroying confidence abroad in Canada's economy than to carry out the proposal made for the nationalization of the Canadian chartered banks.

Even the effect of speeches such as the kind which have been made by C.C.F. members in this debate has been harmful on this occasion, as on past occasions, when they affect that confidence.

The second result of nationalization would be a breakdown. There is not enough wisdom in any government to operate a banking monopoly in Canada. A year or so ago I heard the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in the United Kingdom, Mr. R. A. Butler, make this comment in the House of Commons at Westminster in reference to a measure taken by the government. He said: "The view of the government is that businessmen best know how to run business." By the same token, may I express my view that the bankers of this country, reputable, competent and highly respectable, best know how to operate the banking system of this country. One would imagine, listening to some of the speeches made in this house, that anyone without the slightest experience in banking, or even in managing a business—with one sole exception in a certain party—could step in and manage not just a branch of a bank, not just one entire chartered bank, but all the banks in Canada. To reduce the position to terms such as that, Mr. Speaker, is to expose its utter absurdity. I do not know how many hon. members in this house have had personal experience in relation to banking in Canada. I doubt very much if there are many. Perhaps you could count them on the fingers of both hands. But I am perfectly certain, sir, that they are not to be found among those who are advocating nationalization of the Canadian banks. It seems to me that the less experience they have of the banking business the more freely they talk of taking the banks over and running them through some little cabal here in Ottawa.

The third result of nationalization would be an end of competition in our Canadian banking system, and with the end of competition would come the end of a factor which has been one of the greatest contributing factors to the strength of the Canadian banking system.

The next result would be regimentation. That is quite clear, and all one requires to do is to refer to that clear-cut and accurately expressed sentence in the Regina manifesto to which I alluded earlier, namely: "Control of finance is the first step in the control of the whole economy."

If those who are advocating nationalization of the banks had the right and the power to plunge this country into that course, you know perfectly well, Mr. Speaker, it would be the first step to complete socialization and the foisting upon the Canadian economy of socialistic regimentation—the inevitable accompaniment of socialism.

The fifth result, sir, would be centralization of power over the entire Canadian economy right here in Ottawa. Centralization of economic and political power has been the inevitable and invariable accompaniment of socialism. We have seen it in the United Kingdom. We have seen it in other countries where nations have plunged into a socialistic course. For a country like Canada, so widespread in geographical extent, so diversified in its nature, a nation that has every reason to avoid centralization by reason of the duality of cultures, the danger of centralization here at Ottawa of vast powers is an especially threatening peril and one that we must avoid at all risks. Do we wish to see all the bank employees of this country made civil servants? What bank manager, under those circumstances, is going to feel free to impart advice to those who are seeking loans from the bank? Being a civil servant, do you think he is going to set himself up to advise the public? That is not the role that is usually chosen by civil servants of their own volition.

When you examine in detail what this proposal would mean, Mr. Speaker, I think it serves to show how little serious thought and serious experience have entered into it. What man is going to go to a civil servant and discuss, in the intimate and confidential way that is customary today between bank customers and bank managers, his pressing private affairs? Under those conditions, I submit that the proposal smacks of absurdity.

The sixth result would be opening the door to political influences. Mr. Speaker, I ask you to think of the function of the branch manager of a socialized bank in dealing with an application for a loan, if political pressure through the local member of parliament or through the local political organization associated with the party to which the government in power belongs were exerted upon him. I contend that you are opening the door to the wrecking of any pretence of soundness in the Canadian banking system. Go further, Mr. Speaker, if you will, and think of the recovery of loans or security on the part of the banks in case of default. Think of the intrusion of political pressures into a situation of that kind. Again you are opening the door, by proposals of this kind, to a complete bedevilling of the whole Canadian economy and any pretence of sound business methods in the Canadian economy.

The seventh result would be to place depositors' funds at the mercy of political pressures and the whims of an oligarchy here at Ottawa. Put this up to the average Canadian. How many of them would wish to entrust their precious savings to the management of those who would be dominated here at Ottawa, if this proposal ever were carried into effect, by long-haired theorists who know jolly little about the operation of the banking system?

I have referred already to the matter of confidence abroad. I say that as an eighth inevitable result, the nationalization of the Canadian banking system would lead at once to the loss of confidence abroad and an end of investment of foreign capital in the development of our Canadian resources.

I submit to this house that the proposal contained in this amendment is just as unsound as any proposal could possibly be. Indeed it is difficult to understand how hon. members of this house could really seriously put forward such a proposal. It is dressed up. It is given, as best that could be done by those who have espoused it, a seductive attraction. But, Mr. Speaker, those who have put forward this proposal and have urged nationalization of the Canadian banking system are simply singing the siren song of socialism.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) for the last 30 or 40 minutes I have come to the conclusion that he is going to vote against our amendment.

Mr. Knowles: He refuses to be seduced.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): As usual, he waxed eloquent, he waxed wrathy and he waxed indignant. I know of nothing in this house against which he does not pour out his indignation. In judging between the various types of indignation, I find great difficulty in ascertaining which is the greater and which is the lesser. I find it difficult to ascertain whether he is more indignant at times against the government for its budgetary policy or its housing policy or against us for introducing into this chamber the subject of nationalization of the banks. However, I should really congratulate him. We appreciate what he did. Yesterday we dangled the bait in front of the supporters of the capitalist system—I refer to the bait of nationalization of the banks—hoping that somebody would gulp it and that we could then have a debate on our own terms. The hon. member for Eglinton has obliged us. I extend an invitation to other members to do exactly the same thing. This is particularly what we want.

The hon. member for Eglinton suddenly found out that we in the C.C.F. had exposed ourselves, that we had become socialists. Here we are coming to the Canadian House of Commons and saying that we want nationalization of the banks. A great light apparently has descended upon my hon. friend. But had he read the amendment we made ten years ago, he would have found that it was much similar in terms. I suppose one could say that being ten years out of date is not too much to expect from a Tory. But he is really twenty years out of date, on his own admission, when he reads to us the Regina manifesto and says, "Here is the C.C.F. actually proposing once again the socialization of the banks". Of course we are. We are doing it, we think, for a good reason. Some of his other arguments I shall take up during the course of my remarks.

Mr. Knowles: And take apart.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): And perhaps take apart too. Apart from our own amendment, I think one of the most significant amendments was that moved by the government, namely that dealing with the lifting of the prohibition of loans upon real estate. There has been a distinct change of mind on the part of the government over the last few years. It was just ten years ago when Mr. Ilsley said in parliament that ours has been a banking system of unusual strength, and that this is owing, in part to other causes, but in part to the prohibition of loans upon real estate. So ten years ago this government would have looked askance at such loans. Ten years ago this government would apparently have frowned upon such loans. They appeared to regard them as unsafe. But belatedly there has been a change of opinion on the part of the government and now they regard them as quite acceptable.

Of course it is a dramatic change in policy which the banks themselves do not want. One might perhaps ask this question. Is the government chipping and chiselling away at the foundation of security which these great banking edifices have built? Is the government deliberately trying to weaken the banking system by introducing this legislation? Obviously the answer is no. I would say that the government has come to the conclusion—and again a belated one—that the banks of Canada are not playing their full part in the economy of Canada and so the government is determined to try to induce them to do so. It will be difficult. Banks and bankers, in this country especially, are cautious and conservative. The banks do not like change. They do not want change. They will resist it. They do not desire change. They will oppose it. When change comes along, they oppose changing even change. They are thorough conservatives, to the extent that they are quite prepared to die defending that which their predecessors died opposing.

But why then should there be this amendment? I have a reason with which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) may not altogether agree. I think it is because, to some extent, the banks are being made instruments of government fiscal policy. It is a change which we appreciate because as we see it it is another socialist nail in the coffin of capitalism.

I said that the banks were conservative and cautious. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) raised all sorts of bogeys as to what other people thought about the banks. As far as we are concerned, we do not underrate or underestimate the part they play in our society and in our economy. The banks perform functions of tremendous importance. In other days I know that the banks were maligned and blamed because they were creators of credit. But I maintain that the creation of credit is a necessary business. I maintain that the creation of credit is an honourable business as well as being necessary, and if the creation of credit were to stop then the economic system under which we are living would grind to a sudden and dismal end.

Nevertheless there are certain anomalies in the situation. For instance, the government insists, and rightly so, that the profits from the issue of money, that is, coinage, notes and so on, should revert to the state, and yet it agrees that the profit from the expansion of credit should not. We are told that the creation of money is the prerogative of the state. If the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) found somebody else creating money I imagine he would not rest until he had locked up that person for a certain number of years. It is a serious offence for individuals to create money in that sense, and yet it seems to be right and proper for the banks to do it by creating credit.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance is going to bring down the budget at some indeterminate time, and in view of the fact that he may be looking for a little extra money with which to satisfy the pressures that bear upon him, I suggest that here is an avenue of taxation. There could be an element of taxation upon this profit arising out of coinage, at the expense of the nation. I do not say these profits are fantastic, far from it, but there is an element of profit there which could well revert to the public treasury.

If the banks are as conservative as I believe them to be, what place is there for them in what is really a young and dynamic society? We are living in a free-enterprise world. It is one in which risks are allegedly taken, one in which we take various chances to achieve our ends. But the banks are not prepared to take risks. The hon. member for Eglinton said that my leader made out a weak case yesterday. He made out a case the purport of which was that the banks today were taking no risks whatsoever. I think it is a case which to some extent is worth repeating. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) mentioned yesterday the Farm Improvement Loans Act of 1944. The purpose of that measure was to provide short and intermediate credit for the improvement and development of farms. The banks were not coming across. They were not prepared to take any risks whatsoever to give farmers the credit they wanted, and so the government had to step into the picture and introduce the legislation.

As the act says, the purpose of the measure was to assist the average farmer who ordinarily would not be able to obtain bank credit for such proposals. The banks by themselves were unwilling to do it. The banks consented to do it only when the resources of the people of Canada were mobilized through the government and when the banks were told that they would be guaranteed against any possible loss up to 10 per cent of the total loan. Why should the banks not have accepted that risk? The hon. member for Eglinton asked that. Was there any great loss associated with it? History says no. Indeed, I believe the loss was in the neighbourhood of 1/100th of 1 per cent up to 1952. Surely this was a risk which private enterprise could have taken, but the capitalist banks refused to undertake it until they were guaranteed by the resources of the people against loss.

There was a suggestion ten years ago that fishermen should receive the same sort of treatment as farmers. At that time the government was prepared to introduce legislation. For its own good reasons it did not do so, but it would be very interesting to find how much money was advanced by the banks to fishermen without the guarantee of the government which was given in the case of the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

In 1937 we had the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act under which the government hoped to create employment to some extent by means of loans issued through the banks to individuals who would use the loans to improve their homes. The banks were not prepared to go ahead with the scheme. Pressure was brought to bear on them by the government, but until the House of Commons again guaranteed the banks against loss, they would risk nothing. What was the measure of risk anyway? I am told that losses under the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act were less than 1 per cent, but before the banks would take the chance of losing 1 per cent they had to be guaranteed up to a total of 10 per cent of the total loans made.

What about the industrial development bank? That was a bank which we started ten years ago because we were told that it would harm the banks' liquidity if they were to undertake loans such as were envisaged under the industrial development bank. What happened? In the last ten years approximately $76 million net in loans has been advanced. That is an average of between $7 million and $8 million a year. Is there any member in the house who would suggest for a moment that $7 million or $8 million so invested each year by the banks would have harmed their liquidity by one iota? Of course not. The banks were not prepared to go ahead and so the government did so. What about the losses under this particular scheme? According to the last balance sheet I saw losses totalled about $163,000, $\frac{1}{8}$ of 1 per cent of the net loans or 3 per cent of the entire profit made over the period the industrial development bank was in operation up until last year.

Was this 3 per cent too great a risk for the private banks to undertake? Apparently it was. They did not want to go into the field. Now they are being asked to go into the field of lending money on mortgages. They do not like it. They have told us they do not like it, and I suspect that they feel like sacrificial goats upon the altar of capitalism. But no matter how much or how little blood they exude, the fact remains that they are going to be guaranteed against loss up to 98 per cent. The fact also remains that they are going to be given a very attractive rate of interest—we do not know what yet. I suspect it may be as high as $5\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, but if it is $5\frac{3}{4}$ per cent then that is akin to usury for what is a gilt-edged investment.

We are told about the liquidity of the banks. In the past that liquidity has been a fetish, but it is now a fetish which is losing some of its sanctity because the government is suggesting that the banks decrease some of their liquidity and put funds into mortgages. Of course the argument of the banks is that they must always be able to meet the demands of their depositors. That is true, but very frequently the banks do not look on the banking situation in Canada as a system. They are inclined to look upon it only from the point of view of their own particular bank. However, when a cheque is withdrawn from one bank then under the system it becomes a deposit in another bank and the system as a whole is not affected.

The deposits of the people of Canada are safe. Let there be no doubt about that. But why do the people know that their deposits are safe? The simple reason is that in the event of any calamity overwhelming a bank the collective resources of the people of Canada through their government would come to the rescue of that bank and the deposits would be more than adequately safeguarded. Their deposits would be secure and are as secure today as government of Canada bonds. The reason is that the government is behind the banks. Of course the government is behind them. The government protects, secures, guarantees and on occasion bails out the banks, as it did in 1931. The banks can pawn, pledge and mortgage without loss; the banks can lend, advance and invest without loss. The banks are protected in making profits. The banks have been guaranteed against losses. Was there ever a welfare state like this? Is there any group in Canada that is so well protected? Is there any group in Canada that is so well off as this little empire which has been carved out of the Canadian economy? I doubt it.

Obviously, all the banks want is the cream. They are not prepared to take the skim milk. Others can take the risks, but the cream is for them. I do not deny for a moment that skim milk may be nutritive, but one gets tired of it, and perhaps one may aspire to a little cream. The fact is, however, when cream is the sole diet then one becomes fat, lazy and lethargic, a situation in which our banks are already. They are adamant for a riskless industry. So long as the banks are not prepared to play their part in a free enterprise system, the part they are expected to play, I can see no reason for their existence as members of a free enterprise system. Not for a moment do I deny there is competition. I know there is competition between banks, because I have seen it. But I submit that that competition is for business that involves loans, investments and securities which are as riskless as possible.

As I see it, the reason advanced for the existence of free enterprise is the willingness to take risks. The banks are far beyond that stage. They have graduated. They are looking now upon the Canadian economy from a much higher point of view—I will not say from an avuncular point of view, I leave that for the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent)—but from a paternal point of view. It is not fatherly in the sense that we usually associate with fatherhood, but from a patriarchal point of view. They look upon the Canadian scene through cold, unfeeling eyes. They are against the rashness and wickedness of risk-taking. They must be secure in everything they do. For all practical purposes they have immobilized themselves.

We, in the C.C.F., argue that the banks have a far more vital part to play in this country. We argue, from the evidence that has been submitted, that the banks are not prepared to play that part. One of the functions of a banking system is to help to maintain full employment. I do not say for a moment that the banking system can avert depression, but the banking system is ancillary to fiscal policies carried out by the government. It is conceivable that there could be situations in which our bank treasuries were brimming over with money to lend and nobody would want a loan. The demand for loans can only come through the fiscal measures instituted by the government of the country. The demand must be inspired.

There is one matter which has to be remembered, one figure I think which has to be remembered, even in a free enterprise system. It is an index figure which should be emblazoned on the minds of the cabinet. It is the index figure of unemployment, because that is the index of the health of the society in which we are living. We do not believe that we can get full employment consistently in a free enterprise system without the ownership and control of the banks.

The government disagrees. The government believes that control can be achieved through the Bank of Canada. Yet, if we are to call history as a witness, the fact remains that in the years from 1935 to 1939, when we had the Bank of Canada and when we can assume it had the powers it needed, nevertheless there was a steady half million of unemployed. Some 25 per cent of our resources were not used. The government had the control. The government had the power, but the government did not give Canada full employment. We have those controls which the government today insists are still adequate.

How adequate would those controls be in a time of declining prices; in a time of pessimism in the market; in a time of financial stringency? It is at that time credit should be expanded. Does the government believe, through the controls it has, it has sufficient power to compel the banks to expand credit at that particular time? Will the banks not be confronted, as they have told us so often in the past, with their obligations to depositors and their obligation to their shareholders? We say that we do not believe those controls will work in such a period of declining prices and pessimistic outlook, therefore the banks have to be nationally owned.

Today the banks in Canada are not only economic factors. They are social factors. They are not only social factors, but they are public utilities. They are to be used for the good of the whole economy. I noticed that the member for Eglinton became very worried today at the idea of nationalization of the banks. He felt there would be political control of the banks. He declares, along with other members, that the banks would not be independent of politics.

What worries me more, and what affects me more, is that politics is not independent of the banks. Whenever the banks are in trouble, whenever they want some security, whenever they want a guarantee, they come to the representatives of the people to bail them out of trouble or get guarantees. The banks are continually interfering with politics so I believe it is high time politics started interfering with the banks and telling them what they have to do.

I said earlier one of the functions of the banks is to help maintain full employment. I am not suggesting that the banks should suddenly go in for a rash, unwise expansion of credit. It is not always needed. I believe that even in the capitalist system there is always enough money to buy that which is being produced. In other words, I argue there is no inherent deficiency of purchasing power within the capitalist system. I say that for this reason. Every element of cost in industry, whether it be raw materials, wages, rent, interest or profits, must of necessity be an element in somebody's income. This means that at some stage in the game there is always equilibrium. At some or all stages in the game, the total income must equal the total costs.

The mistake which has been made in the past was the assumption that when that equilibrium was arrived at, it automatically meant there was full employment. It means nothing of the sort, because one could have that type of equilibrium with 10 per cent of our resources used, 50 per cent or 90 per cent. Only at one particular point could we have equilibrium where there is full employment, and that particular point can only be arrived at by conscious planning by the government. This government, which supports free enterprise, opposes conscious planning. Indeed, conscious planning would be the very antithesis of free enterprise. The government can argue that they have, in recent years, achieved a state of full employment, but it was not by conscious planning. It was, perhaps, due in part to preparing for war; but as a normal, steady situation under a capitalist system full employment can only occur by the most amazing fluke.

Let me go further and assume that equilibrium with full employment and with a total effective demand for 100 units. This would imply total costs would be 100 units. In society as we have it today, 80 of those units might be spent on consumption goods, leaving 20 for savings. Out of that saving, 10 would be expended on capital goods and 10 would be hoarded. This means that there are 90 units available to buy that which costs 100. I need not enlarge upon the economic effects. It means there would be a downward trend in prices. It would mean we were headed to some extent for a depression unless the government were to take remedial action. This analogy does not mean there is insufficient purchasing power within the community. The purchasing power is there, but it is not being used. It is lying dormant, probably in the banks.

The way in which this dormant purchasing power should be taken up is by fiscal measures undertaken by the government. The government can increase consumption, it can increase investments; or it can do both. But if the government wishes to maintain full employment it has got to take active and remedial steps.

As I said, this means conscious planning. We do not say there is insufficient purchasing power at that stage, but that there is maldistribution of purchasing power. And it is there in part where you find the basis of the socialist case. The money is there, but too few are getting too much of it, while too many are getting too little of it. There is only one way that situation can be alleviated, and that is by taxation and fiscal measures. If we want to make the poor richer, then we have to make the rich poorer. There is no secret way of achieving equality in society except by that sort of redistribution.

An hon. Member: They have done that in Russia.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): No, they have not; and you do not know much about Russian economics if you believe that. There is more class distinction in Russia today than there is in Canada.

Our complaint is this. The banking system ought to be prepared to lend, to invest and to take risks, but our banking system is not always prepared to do those things. The commercial banking system ought to be prepared to play a more vital part in the economy of the country, if we are to have full employment and if we are to achieve something which I have no doubt all of us have in mind, the abolition of poverty. And yet recent history gives no guarantee whatsoever that the commercial banks are prepared in any way to take risks. They will not do so without guarantees. Well, if we are going to guarantee the banks in this way would it not be better and quicker just to take them over and do the job ourselves?

We argue that the government must plan consciously for the full use of our resources, and that can be done only, in part, by owning as well as controlling the machinery of credit. After all, the fundamental case for socialism rests on a policy of removing economic privation and poverty. We maintain that poverty is probably the greatest evil in the world today, the evil from which all other evils spring. Poverty is the impassable barrier to things that give value to human life. Poverty is the lot of far too many in this country. I am not suggesting that nationalization of the banking system will remove it, but I do maintain that nationalization of the banks will be a substantial step forward to this end.

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in this debate, but after listening for two days to a debate in which members of the C.C.F. party have been expounding their socialist views I have thought it necessary to say just a word or two, so that the people in my riding will know that I do not agree with their views.

First, I think the banks have done an exceptionally fine job. Any responsible person in a community can go to a bank and borrow money at a reasonable rate of interest. Far more people could and would borrow money from banks at this reasonable rate of interest, if it were not for the propaganda that has been spread across the country by people who have made speeches very similar to those we have heard in this House of Commons in the last two days.

The banks are good institutions: they are not bad institutions. They are good places from which to get money and with which to do business. They are good places from which to borrow money when it is found necessary to borrow money. And I just cannot understand the lack of consistency in the arguments offered by hon. members in the C.C.F. when at one time they condemn the banks and at another they say they are such great sources of revenue that the government should take them over. I think that is an inconsistency. If they are doing such a bad job, then surely the government should not be expected to take part in that bad job. If they are doing a good job, then why not allow the men who have done this good job to continue to do it.

Let me draw some comparisons between the banks and other institutions that lend money. I do not believe the average person should be encouraged to borrow money. That is not the policy my father taught me. In our house it was always considered dangerous to get into debt. And I think before the next ten or twenty years have passed it will be considered an unfortunate situation when a person is in debt. And when we hear it suggested loosely that we should borrow this, borrow that or borrow something else, I say it is very bad propaganda to be spread across the country from this House of Commons. But if a person does have to borrow money, surely the banks should not be criticized.

We have lending institutions in this country that charge as much as 24 per cent on many of their loans. And many of our citizens—far too many of them—are buying goods under those conditions. They will buy refrigerators and television sets in which they would have an investment of some $500 or $600, and on this investment they would borrow as much as $500. In one year they will pay as much as $60 in interest charges on an average loan of $250. And when we find a rate of interest as high as 24 per cent, then I would highly recommend to the people who borrow at such a high rate that they consult their bankers, state what they are going to buy, and borrow the money at 6 per cent. Most of them could do this. There are not many people buying pieces of equipment of this kind who would be required to pay 24 per cent interest. Maybe our schools should educate our children to realize what their parents pay when they are confronted with the carrying charges demanded by finance companies in this country.

Some hon. members might be interested to know that many people who buy automobiles pay a higher rate of interest in carrying charges than they pay in the tax on those automobiles levied by the dominion government. On an automobile selling currently at around $3,000 the purchaser must pay at least $1,000 down. This means that he has to borrow $2,000, and usually this is spread over a period of 18 months. If this is done, the dealer would calculate his interest at 7½ per cent on the $2,000 for a period of a year and a half. The interest that he would pay on the $2,000 would be $225. Thus the interest rate is 15 per cent. The tax he pays to the government on that same automobile is $469.

I suggest to people right across this country that they should stop and think before borrowing money at 15 or 20 per cent. We see the C.C.F. party, these socialists, coming out in condemnation of the banks. My recommendation to purchasers would be that they go to their banks and discuss the situation with bank managers. They will receive good advice and will be much farther ahead by getting the money through their bankers at a reasonable rate of interest than if they were to get it through finance companies.

This is one of the weaknesses of our day and age. People think it is quite all right to go out and pay rates of interest running up to 15 or 24 per cent on the articles they buy. My point is that if you borrow $2,000 you compute the interest at a rate of 7½ per cent for the whole $2,000, and at the end of the year and a half there is nothing left of the amount borrowed, except perhaps one payment of $50. But he is still paying the interest computed on the $2,000 which he borrowed at first, and on the average amount borrowed the rate is 15 per cent. He pays 15 per cent on the actual money borrowed. I said he pays 7½ per cent; that is a quick computation. It is actually 15 per cent that he pays when you consider he borrows $2,000 to start with and has nothing borrowed at the end of the year and a half. Therefore it is 15 per cent on the average amount of money borrowed. That is how it works out.

The only criticism I would make of the banks is of the service they offer to the people of this country. It is very difficult to go to most of our banks on Saturday in any of our large cities and borrow money. The only criticism I can find is that when they sell a service to the people of this country it is unfortunate that on Saturday, the one day when most people are free and should have access to the banks, the banks are not open. I do not think they should be criticized in the manner in which they have been, in this house in the past few days, because of that one weakness.

I would not want to suggest for one moment that I believe the people should borrow money. It is all right for businesses to borrow money because they intend to make more money with the money they have borrowed. But when a person borrows money in order to procure goods before he is in a position to pay for them, then he is paying far too much for those goods that he wishes to buy. If those individuals had the opportunity of approaching their bank managers and talking the situation over with them on Saturdays when they are off work they would find that the bank manager would generally give them the best advice that they could get. The banks could give a better service if they were open the whole week. But we realize that the bank employees should not have to work more days in the week than other people. Therefore we really cannot find much fault with them for closing one day in the week, which unfortunately happens to be Saturday, the same day that everyone else has off. We really cannot find too much fault with that.

We should encourage all the citizens of this country to deal with the banks, more particularly when they want to borrow money, because they will find that they will get a much better rate of interest from the bank than they will get from any other lending institution anywhere in the country.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hosking). In his opening remarks he said he did not think that the people should be borrowing money; that he was raised in a school where he was taught that he should pay cash on the line. Then he went on to say that the thing that worried him was that the people were paying too high interest rates, and that they should borrow money from the banks. Therefore I really do not know whether he is for borrowing, against borrowing or just where he does stand. The ordinary consumer of this country will not gain much from the advice given him by the hon. member for Wellington South. He said he thought it was a mistake for people to go into debt to buy consumer goods. I do not think it is a mistake at all. It could be a mistake in given individual cases, but by going into debt for durable consumer goods people are able to make real savings by that means that they would not otherwise be able to make if they were endeavouring to put away a little cash from day to day until they got $400, shall we say, for a refrigerator.

I was astounded by the information he gave to the house that a great many people who buy automobiles pay more in interest charges than the automobile cost, and that happened under the regulations of the dominion government of which the hon. member is a part. Apparently thousands of people across Canada are allowed to buy automobiles, so the hon. member says, and the companies are allowed to charge such high interest rates that the charge for interest exceeds the price of the automobile. Perhaps that is so. If it is so, something should be done, and done immediately, to cut down the high interest rates.

Mr. Hosking: I said a higher rate of interest was paid for the borrowed money than the government charges in taxes.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member said a lot of things. I was not trying to quote the speech back to him in toto. The point I was making was that the hon. member was amazed that often people were paying more in interest charges in the purchase of automobiles than the total cost of the automobile—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member is deaf and blind.

Mr. Argue: If I heard the hon. member incorrectly I withdraw the statement that those were his words. I wrote them down. If that is not his statement I shall let it go right here.

He went on to say that certain people were paying interest rates as high as 24 per cent. That is a shame, and the hon. member should be trying to influence the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to do something about it and to reduce the maximum interest rate that can be charged in Canada and stop the loan sharks charging legal interest rates up to 24 per cent a year. It is not just the little finance company often off in the corner somewhere that charges high interest rates. The big retail companies, like Simpsons-Sears in Canada, charge interest rates of 15 per cent on what they call their budget plan. Those high interest rates demonstrate very clearly that today the banking system of Canada is falling down on the job, because if people could go to the banks and get the kinds of loans they want to buy durable consumer goods at 5 per cent or 6 per cent interest I am sure not one of them would be paying a rate of 15 or 20 or 24 per cent.

I read the speech of the Minister of Finance in introducing this measure, and the greatest weakness of the present proposal is the fact that the government, through its legislation in regard to chartered banks, has no program to prevent a recession, no program that I know of to increase the money in the hands of the consumers in Canada when we are facing a recession. Probably the Minister of Finance does not think we are facing a recession. I say we are in a recession now, and unless something is done about that recession very soon it may turn into a full-scale depression.

I am indebted to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) for having suggested to me that the speech from the throne in 1929 would make very interesting reading, the speech from the throne by a Liberal government. This is what the second paragraph says, as recorded at page 2 of Hansard of February 7, 1929:

> The unprecedented prosperity which is apparent throughout the dominion affords cause for the deepest satisfaction.

That was in 1929. I continue:

> Never in the history of Canada has there been such industrial and commercial expansion as that which has taken place during the past twelve months.

We have already heard that during this session. I continue:

> The industry and enterprise of our people have been rewarded under Providence with an abundant harvest.

That's for sure right now.

> In the production of agricultural and other basic industries all previous records have been surpassed. New records have also been established in the volume of construction and in the volume of foreign trade. Employment has been maintained at a high level and all indications point to a continuance throughout the country of the present favourable conditions.

Back in 1929 the government of the day, of the same political complexion as the present government, told the people of Canada that everything was fine, that production was high, that employment was high, that we had a wonderful crop; yet a few months later we were in the depths of a depression. I hope we do not have anything like that again. But you will not prevent a depression by failing to recognize the signs that are very evident now that point to depression.

During the discussion on the resolution I expressed the belief that the banks usually followed the wrong practice in making loans as far as the interests of the country were concerned. In periods of inflation loans are usually easy to obtain, but in a period of declining prices the banks start to tighten their purse strings and the public find it very difficult to obtain loans. The banks, in spite of their assistance in averting a recession, by their action, assisted in bringing on a full-scale depression.

When we moved our amendment we did not expect to receive the support of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) or members of the Conservative party. We believe the banks should be nationalized, not because we think it is good to have more things being operated by the government, but because we say the history of the banks and banking practice in Canada demonstrates that the time has now arrived when, if certain objectives are to be achieved, the banks must be nationalized.

The government has used various methods of control but it is impossible, even with the best type of controls, to make the banks issue the type of loans which are in the best interests of the nation. Members of the Conservative party are in favour of leaving the banks under private enterprise because they say the banks should be in a position to take risks. But the banks are becoming less and less inclined to carry out that useful function, and the government very often has to give ironclad guarantees to the banks against loss. When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), with the assistance of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and other members of the cabinet, have to guarantee the banks against the loss even of a single dollar, then I believe it is time they acquired the right to take some direct responsibility for the lending policies of the chartered banks.

The government has given the banks certain guarantees which have induced the banks to make loans. One outstanding example is the guarantee to the chartered banks under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. That guarantee has certainly resulted in the banks making very substantial loans. In 1952 total loans made by the chartered banks under the Farm Improvement Loans Act amounted to $98 million. In other words the guarantee by the government against loss to the banks amounted to a total of almost $10 million. The total loss incurred by the banks and paid by the government for that year amounted to just a little over $12,000. To put it simply, the total loss for that year paid by the national treasury amounted to 1/100 of 1 per cent. Very little loss was entailed in making these loans, yet before the chartered banks would make loans available they had to have a guarantee that amounted to $10 million for the year 1952.

One could make the same type of comparison in regard to the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act, and also in regard to the legislation approved the other day concerning housing.

We in this group would like to see the banks nationalized. We know perfectly well that this government will have nothing to do with the nationalization of the chartered banks. But members of the Liberal party have always professed support for co-operatives and claim that they believe in the co-operative principle. If that is the case they should be prepared to extend to the co-operative movement and to the credit unions the same kind of guarantee on farm improvement loans that is now given to the chartered banks in Canada. Our credit union movement is growing at a truly phenomenal rate. Credit unions now pay exactly the same kind of tax rate as any other corporation in Canada.

Mr. Trainor: The same as every corporation?

Mr. Argue: If the kind of corporation my hon. friend is associated with wishes to pay exactly the same tax that is paid by the credit union, then that corporation can adopt different principles of management and their taxes will be precisely the same. If some of the private grain companies wish to pay dividends to farmers on the basis of patronage, as of course is done now, they can do that also.

The credit unions and other co-operatives pay exactly the same tax as any other business organization in Canada. I would like to refer, Mr. Speaker, to a report on the credit unions in Canada for 1952 published by the marketing service of the Canadian Department of Agriculture. That report demonstrates the really tremendous growth of credit unions in Canada over the past ten years. In 1942 there were just under 300,000 members of the credit unions in Canada. By 1952 the membership had risen to 1,250,000, and in that year more than one out of every ten adult Canadians was a member of a credit union. The total assets of the credit unions in 1942 amounted to just under $44 million. This figure had increased by 1952 to a total of $424 million. In ten years their assets have increased tenfold, and their membership by 300 per cent.

I believe the history of loans made by the credit unions in that ten-year period will compare favourably with the loans made by any of the chartered banks, with reference to losses sustained. I believe the government should give the credit unions exactly the same kind of guarantee it now gives the chartered banks. The government should not discriminate against the credit unions by giving the chartered banks a 10 per cent guarantee on farm improvement loans and no guarantee whatsoever to the credit unions who are engaged in a great many instances in exactly the same type of loan business.

The banks in Canada do not wish to take any risk in making loans. There are tens of thousands of Canadians who have gone to their bank, spoken to the bank manager, asked for loans, been turned down, gone to a credit union and obtained loans. In spite of the fact that many of the people dealing with credit unions are considered by the banks not to be good credit risks, nevertheless the history of the credit unions compares favourably with that of the banks in regard to losses sustained.

I wonder why the government has not given to the credit unions the same kind of guarantee it gives to the banks? Is it that the government does not want the credit union movement to expand at an increased rate over the years? Why are the banks any more deserving of guarantee by the government against loss than are the credit unions in Canada? I cannot understand why the government is not providing credit unions with exactly the same type of guarantee.

I notice that in the legislation before us this afternoon, as in the previous act, the banks are given the right to lend money to farmers on threshed grain. That is all very nice. The banks have the right to lend money on threshed grain, but the farmer has the problem of convincing the bank manager that he should be given a loan. If a farmer goes to a bank and asks for a loan on threshed grain, the banker will look to see if he owes any money in town, or if the farmer has a farm improvement loan from that bank. Unless the farmer can prove to the banker that he really does need a loan on his threshed grain, he will not get a loan.

The average farmer in Canada today—certainly that is so in western Canada—cannot get a loan on threshed grain. If he is a well-to-do farmer, with a huge quantity of grain on his farm, if he is out of debt, and if he has not delivered his quota he may get a loan. But this section of the Bank Act is not being adequately utilized by the banks and for all practical purposes is not in operation at the present time.

When I began speaking I said that to my mind there was every indication that we are in a recession right now. Certainly the economy of western Canada is slowly grinding to a standstill. More and more businessmen are being forced to go on a cash basis. In this morning's Montreal Gazette there is a news report headed "Drake, Sask. Town Votes Out Credit". It reads as follows:

> Drake, Sask., March 8.—Businessmen in this town 75 miles northwest of Regina have voted to stop giving credit. The order is effective April 1.
> R. E. Walker, a representative of the retail merchants association of Saskatoon, who addressed a meeting of merchants, said grain delivery quotas set by the Canadian wheat board are not large enough to take care of outstanding credit accounts. Merchants gave long-term credit to patrons but received only short-term credit from wholesalers.

From communications I have had from the retail merchants association and from businessmen in Saskatchewan it is fairly clear that this spring merchants will be going on a strictly cash basis. Anyone who is acquainted with farming operations in western Canada will realize just what a serious hardship that will mean to prairie agriculture.

I should like to see something done under this act, or some other appropriate steps taken, to put some cash in the pockets of farmers. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), members of parliament and everyone else who works likes to get paid. We all like to get paid, and to get paid on time. So does the wheat producer. He likes to produce wheat. That is what he is in business for. When he produces a crop, he thinks he should be able to get some money as a result of his efforts in producing that crop.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is always good at giving the farmers advice. On previous occasions he said to them, "Build granaries and store your wheat. Wheat on the farm is as good as cash in the bank". I have not yet met a farmer who would not like to get rid of the wheat he has and get some of the cash in the bank. The merchants in our towns would also like to get a little cash. I feel sorry for a farmer when he cannot sell his grain; but I think a merchant is even worse off, because he can get into trouble with his creditors very quickly when he has on his books a great many customers with outstanding accounts.

For financing this crop in western Canada I should like to see a method by which the farmer would not have to pay interest. I do not think doing it through the banks is the best way. But if the only way by which the government will provide the farmers with money is through the chartered banks, I say it is better to be done in that way than not at all.

I should like to see the interest rate kept at the very minimum. I think interest rates in Canada are too high today. I believe the government's policy of strengthening interest rates is wrong. I believe that policy should be reversed, and that steps should be taken to lower interest rates. I should like to see banks giving farmers loans at a nominal rate of interest. I believe they could do that if given a guarantee by the government. We had such guarantees at one time in the past, for the 1951 crop. The darkest picture the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) could paint—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Leave me out of it, this is not my bill.

Mr. Argue: I am just referring to the minister's statement at page 128 of Hansard. I cannot make a speech without bringing the minister into it somewhere, and probably this is as good a point as any at which to bring him in. At page 128 of Hansard he gave us some information as to the losses under that program. The minister's point was that the government's experience had not been good. I think the government's experience was good. The total amount the government can be liable for, as a result of that experience, is an amount not over 3 per cent of the aggregate loans. Most of those loans were made not for threshed grain but for grain out under the snow. If farmers will pay 97 per cent of their loans when obtained under those circumstances I believe they will pay, for all practical purposes, 100 per cent of any loans they may obtain for grain that has been threshed and is in storage.

We have in the act a section which allows the banks to lend money on farm-stored grain; but anyone from western Canada knows that very little money is being lent under that section. I therefore suggest that other steps must now be taken by the government or the economy of western Canada, going into a recession, will drag down the whole Canadian economy. We are losing markets—and we have lost a great many of them—for some of our most important grains. The farmer is looking for some money this spring. The merchants in western Canada need such a policy so the farmers can pay for the commodities they must obtain in order to continue their farming operations. Under this legislation I believe the government should be giving to the credit unions exactly the same type of guarantee it is now giving to the banks.

In another statement this session the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that it was his belief that now was the time for the government to loosen the purse strings. I agree with that statement. I think the government should loosen the purse strings at this time. As long as there are unemployed resources in the nation I do not agree that it is bad for the government to be spending large sums of money, more money than it collects through taxation. When there are half a million unemployed, when farmers are finding that their incomes are going down, that is the time for the government to adopt fiscal and monetary policies that will result in increased expenditures, an expansion of credit and an increase in the money supply so that our unemployed resources may be re-employed for the improvement of the standard of living of the Canadian people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is the house ready for the question? The question is the following—

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak now because my subject matter has to do with the amendment, and if the amendment is disposed of my subject matter will become more or less obsolete. Maybe I can finish in five minutes if I am not interrupted and if I can talk fast enough.

I have listened to the members of the C.C.F. group who have spoken on this matter, but I have failed to hear them suggest how they propose to nationalize the banking system. Therefore I want to ask them a question or two. I should like to ask them if they propose expropriation. If they do, that may follow the socialist line. I do not know. But if they do propose expropriation I am quite satisfied that the banks would contest it in the courts.

If it were contested what would the C.C.F. do? Would they dare tell the courts what decision they must make? If they did not dare to do that, then the courts would have to make the decision. If the courts decided to grant the petition of expropriation, then the decision would be appealed. If they failed to grant expropriation then the C.C.F. as a government would appeal the case.

We will suppose that the decision was in favour of expropriation. I fancy the matter would then be submitted to arbitration. Having been submitted to arbitration, the authorities who had to arbitrate would then have to determine a valuation. That valuation would involve the taking over of assets and capital stock, and I quite suppose it would also involve the taking over of the banks' cash reserves.

What would our socialist friends use with which to purchase all this? The cash reserves of the banks amount to about $900 million. The assets and capital stock of the banks amount to somewhere between $3 billion and $4 billion. They could not pay cash for them because the cash reserves of the banks constitute the only cash there is in the country. Therefore they could not pay cash. They could not get any cash in order to pay the banks under the settlement arrived at by arbitration. If they resorted to taxation they would have to tax the people to the extent of almost $1 billion to compensate for cash reserves alone.

Furthermore, here is one thing they would have to recognize. They would have to take over the liabilities of the banks. It is not generally recognized that every deposit that people have in the banks today is a liability against the banks. I should like to ask the C.C.F. whether they would take over the liabilities too, because if they did they would be taking over about $9 billion in liabilities. If they started this, what guarantee would they have against a run on the banks? This is a serious thing. They have not told us how they propose to do it.

In the minute I have left may I suggest that there is not a socialist country among the free nations of the world that has yet favoured nationalizing its banking system. Great Britain had a socialist government, but they did not venture it. Australia had a socialist government, but they did not venture it. New Zealand had a socialist government, but they did not venture it. Over the years we have heard a lot about the virtues of the government of Sweden. They did not venture it. Even the extreme national socialist government of Germany did not venture it. Our C.C.F. friends are proposing to do something that no socialist government has ever done. Why have they not done so? I believe these governments have recognized all that is involved, and have found that for all practical purposes it was impossible to do it. Someone behind me said something about McCarthyism. I do not know what that jab was for.

Mr. Blackmore: They cannot think of anything else to say.

Mr. Hansell: But there is something they should answer if we are going to vote on this amendment. How do they propose to nationalize the banking system? Are they going to propose following the socialist line of outright expropriation? I do not believe they would. But that is the only way it could be done, because if they attempted to buy the banking system outright there is not enough money in cash in Canada to do it.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Is he aware of the fact that he voted for this amendment—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

NIAGARA GAS TRANSMISSION LIMITED

The house resumed, from Friday, March 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hunter for the second reading of Bill No. 325, to authorize Niagara Gas Transmission Limited to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipe line.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, before I adjourned the debate when this measure was last before the house I pointed out that the government is unable to give the guarantee sought by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) that the interests of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines will be protected. I pointed out that this measure is a private member's bill. The bill will be examined in the appropriate committee. It will then be returned here for third reading, and after the bill becomes law, all the decisions having to do with the project covered by this bill as well as the project covered by the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines bill will be in the hands of the board of transport commissioners, whose decision will be final.

I stated at that time I had not had the pleasure of meeting an officer of the company. Since this bill has been under discussion I have had that pleasure. This afternoon I had a call from the general manager of Consumers' Gas Company, and as a result of our conversation, my information as to the intentions of the company is more complete. I now appreciate the fact that Consumers' Gas have realized that the Trans-Canada pipe line will be built, and that it has contemplated that an agreement must be made so that the two projects can work together.

The only reason any question is being raised about the bill before us is the thought that it may interfere seriously with the financing and construction of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. In introducing the bill the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter) stated that Consumers' Gas Company wishes to bring United States gas into the Toronto area. He stated that Consumers', through its subsidiary Niagara, now has a 20-year contract with the Tennessee Transmission Company covering the importation of some 23 billion cubic feet of gas annually. He also stated that subsequent arrangements have been made for Tennessee to repurchase all or any of this gas at any time for sale within the United States, should Consumers' Gas Company be in a position to purchase Canadian gas, without any loss to Consumers' Gas Company.

Assuming these arrangements are carried into effect, the Consumers' Gas Company will be able to supply the greater Toronto area with United States natural gas before the end of this year. Then the hon. member for Parkdale said that if and when Canadian natural gas becomes available the company will be in a position, without loss to themselves, to switch to Canadian natural gas. Obviously these are rather vague intentions vaguely stated. I feel we must have something more definite than the statement contained in the remarks of the hon. member for Parkdale before we can agree to the passing of this bill.

I think all hon. members realize that the Trans-Canada pipe line is a great conception. I suggest that this discussion should be entirely removed from politics. In the first place, a private member's bill should be considered apart from politics. If it were not I would be tempted to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) for having adopted Liberal policies with reference to oil and gas pipe lines. Since we are not talking politics, I shall refrain from doing so.

Mr. Fulton: You know just the opposite is true. You have adopted ours.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Again we hear a peep from another quarter.

Mr. Knowles: Who taught the both of you?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I point out that the government of Alberta is interested in the Trans-Canada pipe line, which will afford a badly needed outlet for the surplus gas of that province. The government of that province is co-operating with this government, and co-operating I think with the management of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines.

Saskatchewan is interested, of course, because the Trans-Canada pipe line will provide an outlet for gas which is already becoming surplus in that province, and which surplus is expected to grow in volume month by month. Manitoba is interested because it would mean another competitive fuel in the province, which should greatly stimulate the growth of industry. Ontario is intensely interested in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited for the reason that it promises an ample natural gas supply for all parts of the province as a competitive fuel. I would remind hon. members that Ontario now depends entirely on imported fuels for its energy other than hydroelectric energy. Quebec is interested for the same reason as Ontario. Therefore the great industrial areas of this country are vitally concerned with the building of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited project and with the additional energy that will be provided from that source.

It is a great project in another way. It is probably the greatest pipe-line project ever undertaken anywhere in the world. It is expected to cost around $300 million for the building of the pipe line. There will be gathering lines required in Alberta which will cost perhaps $50 million. Then chemical plants are required in Alberta to purify the gas before it goes through the pipe line. They will cost perhaps $100 million, and will provide an adequate supply of chemicals for industrial use in Alberta and throughout western Canada. In all the provinces concerned, there will be distributing systems and new apparatus for consuming gas. If everything is added up, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines represents a project running around $1 billion, all of which is to be spent before the year 1960.

The application for gas that is presently before the conservation board of the province of Alberta calls for a supply up to 540 million cubic feet of gas per day, whereas the bill before us calls for a supply of 23 million cubic feet of gas per day. Obviously the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines project is very much greater in concept than the project we are discussing. It is vital therefore to the interests of Canada, I believe, that there be no conflict between the two proposals. It would be tragic if the smaller proposal were permitted to interfere with the financing of the larger proposal. I believe, therefore, that this parliament must make sure that steps are taken so that interference will not occur.

There is a good deal of advantage to the larger project in undertaking the smaller project coupled with the proper safeguards. There are no very considerable markets for gas in eastern Canada built up at present, and such markets as there are have been built up to use manufactured gas. It would be very useful indeed if natural gas could be introduced into the Toronto area in volume so that build-up could occur immediately and be well under way when western gas reaches Toronto. For that reason I think we must give sympathetic consideration to this bill.

Some will say there are other ways of effecting the build-up. We could perhaps draw on the natural gas reserves of western Ontario, which are considerable. But investigation has shown that the availability from that source would not be sufficient to accomplish the purpose. There is also a gas pipe line from the Detroit area bringing natural gas into the Windsor area at a very reasonable price. It is possible that that source of gas could be enlarged. But that would involve application to the federal power commission, and probably months of delay. I think that if the building of this proposed pipe line can be worked out on a basis that will protect the larger project, it may be a desirable step to take at this time.

Obviously, bringing gas in from Buffalo through a pipe line involves considerable investment, and one wonders what is to become of that investment if the line goes out of use in a matter of three years. I believe ways can be worked out so that investment can be assumed by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited; and I believe we should know, before this bill becomes law, that such an arrangement is being worked out to the mutual satisfaction of the Consumers' Gas Company and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

Therefore I suggest that when this bill is before the committee, the committee will wish to examine the intentions of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited as well as the intentions of the Consumers' Gas Company Limited. And I believe it would be appropriate at that time to add another clause to the bill, a coming into force clause, which would provide that the bill would come into force at such time as a mutually satisfactory agreement between Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and Consumers' Gas Company can be deposited with the board of transport commissioners. This agreement would then be considered by the board of transport commissioners, and the date of coming into force would be the date of its approval by the board of transport commissioners. I believe this procedure would allow us to obtain the benefit that would be incidental to the building of this pipe line from Buffalo, and at the same time protect both the financial and the sales position of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. I believe that this would represent a workable procedure for all concerned.

That is only my suggestion; there may be others. But I do think that to meet the requirement laid down by the Leader of the Opposition—that the government should assure the house that the interests of the larger project will be protected—this may be as good a means as any for bringing about the protection asked for.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, the project envisaged by the bill has had a great deal of advertisement. I am surprised to find that the Consumers' Gas Company, which apparently has been in the red for so many years, should suddenly put on such an expensive advertising scheme, and apparently do it solely for the benefit of the people of Toronto. In all the advertisements I have read and received I note that the sole concern of Consumers' Gas Company is the welfare of its customers in Toronto. They point out that they are very anxious to get cheaper gas into that city before Trans-Canada Pipe Lines bring western gas to that community.

The sponsor of the bill tells us that this pipe line will probably be completed by the end of the year, and that gas from the United States will be delivered to Toronto customers by that time. I doubt this very much. I also note that the fuel controller in Ontario has said that we may possibly have western gas in Toronto via Trans-Canada pipe lines in about two years' time. If these statements are correct I fail to see where Toronto customers are going to receive such enormous benefits from the delivery of United States gas for one year; because, according to these statements, that will be the time between the delivery of United States gas and that delivered by Trans-Canada pipe lines.

I suspect that behind this movement there is an attempt on the part of Consumers' Gas Company to be in the distribution field when western gas arrives. There has been some comment in Ontario to the effect that the Ontario hydro might undertake the distribution of western gas in that province. The bill now before us would certainly place Consumers' Gas Company in a position where it would have facilities available for the distribution of gas not only in the metropolitan Toronto area but also in Hamilton and other points in the Niagara peninsula.

I may be wrong in my supposition, but I do say there should be some authority in Ontario in a position to tell us how western gas is to be distributed when it arrives, and the agency through which such distribution is to be made. If there is any possibility of the Ontario hydro becoming the distributing agency, I would be inclined to oppose the granting of this right to Consumers' Gas Company. I do not think advantages would be gained by Toronto consumers that would warrant our handing over this public utility even to a limited dividend utility company, to the exclusion of the possibility of having the Ontario hydro or some other publicly-owned utility handling the distribution of this gas.

Certain it is that the necessary safeguards mentioned by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) must be taken before final approval is given to the bill. It is not enough, as the sponsor of this bill says, that there be an agreement between Consumers' Gas Company and the United States company to the effect that the United States company will undertake to buy all the gas Consumers' Gas Company may have contracted for when the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited line is completed. That is not sufficient. Before this bill receives final approval in this house I suggest that there must be a hard and fast agreement made and shown to the committee or made public to the effect that on the arrival of western gas via the Trans-Canada pipe line, that gas will be distributed in Toronto in lieu of the United States gas that will be brought in prior to the arrival of that pipe line.

I might say that more than the Progressive Conservative party is interested in this Canada-first policy as it applies to an all-Canada pipe line, notwithstanding the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) on Friday to the effect that that policy was advocated by his party—and it was; there is no question of that. I simply want to add that other parties, including the C.C.F. and others, and members of the Liberal party as well, were just as ardent in their support of an all-Canadian pipe line as was the leader of the official opposition or the Conservative party. Certainly no steps must be taken at this time that will in any way interfere with or impede the progress of that Trans-Canada pipe line.

I would approve the suggestion made by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) that a clause be added to the bill which would enable the government or the board of transport commissioners to prevent this legislation from coming into operation until such time as satisfactory safeguards were provided to ensure that western gas would be distributed once the pipe line was completed into the Toronto metropolitan area. We should also add some understanding as to just what use is to be made of this pipe line from the Niagara boundary to Toronto when the Trans-Canada pipe line is built. Will this pipe line be used to transport Canadian gas from the main trunk lines to Hamilton, Welland and the Niagara peninsula, or is there a hope that it might be used to export Canadian gas across the boundary at the Niagara frontier? Certainly one does not suppose for a minute that this company proposes to build a pipe line from Niagara to Toronto, use it for two or even three years, and then scrap it. The use that is to be made of this pipe line, once Canadian gas has arrived, should be made clear to us before the bill receives final approval.

I am in agreement with both the leader of the official opposition and the Acting Prime Minister in their desire to see that nothing is done in this bill or in any other bill that will interfere in any way with the building of that Trans-Canada pipe line and the bringing of Alberta gas to eastern Canada.

We shall not oppose the passage of the bill at this stage, but we do reserve our right to oppose or support third reading after it comes back from the committee. What we do then will depend upon what safeguards or agreements can be reached before the bill comes before the house for third reading.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I should like to say just a word or two. To me the greatest hurdle in the Trans-Canada pipe line is the raising of the money to pay the bills. We have to be very careful about anything that would discourage that. Therefore as a member of this committee I am going to oppose the passage of this bill until we are assured that this company will have to pull out of Toronto and out of Ontario when western gas is available.

I know there has been a good deal of work done and a good deal of trouble taken in getting these companies together so this hurdle of raising enough money to build this pipe line can be overcome. Nothing should be done to discourage it. I am not particularly concerned about who distributes gas in Toronto, but I want to see that when Alberta gas comes to Toronto there will be no opposition from any other company from the south. That seems clear to me. If the company that is behind this bill is told decidedly that it will have only three or four years to distribute gas, then I doubt whether they will want to build the line. Who would put a new pipe line into Ontario and be permitted to sell gas for only two or three years?

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is wise in suggesting that an additional clause be put in the bill. But even at that I would oppose it here and in committee, because I do not want there to be any danger to the principle of a great trans-Canada pipe line.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the comments made today by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) and other hon. members. I may say that as a member from Alberta I am vitally concerned in seeing that Alberta and other western Canadian natural gas is sold as soon as possible and in as large a volume as possible; nevertheless I am strongly supporting this particular bill. My reasons for that I shall outline very briefly.

I believe that my community and my home province, like myself, are more vitally interested than any other part of Canada in getting markets for western Canadian natural gas as soon as possible and on the soundest possible economic basis. I realize, perhaps better than some of the proponents in this house of a strictly all-Canadian gas policy, that the policy they support must be substantially modified by the adoption of continental features in addition to purely national or nationalistic features.

That is, sir, this policy must be modified if Canada wants to achieve four things: First, the capture by Canadian gas of markets both here and in the United States big enough to absorb the expanding gas surplus in western Canada. For too long, both in my home province and in Ottawa, there have been expressions of fear concerning a gas shortage. The fear is of gas shortage for Canada's future needs, when our primary concern should be in blazing our way into markets, and with the much more serious problem of disposing of rapidly expanding gas surpluses.

Evidence was submitted by the Alberta conservation board a few months ago which dealt with the gas reserves proved up during the 18-month period to June 30 last, and in that province alone the increase in gas reserves over the period amounted to 4,700 billion cubic feet. In the meantime in British Columbia and Saskatchewan we have had other gas discoveries which bring gas reserve increases in western Canada to a rate exceeding 4,000 billion cubic feet in each 12-month period. This means that the gas found in each single year is adequate to supply one major pipe line for a period of 20 years. In other words, one year's discoveries in western Canada will provide eastern Canada, Ontario and Quebec, for a period of 20 years, and by the time we have the Trans-Canada pipe line in operation three years hence we will have enough natural gas resources in surplus to supply another two or three major pipe lines.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that in our gas pipe-line planning we should deal with this project on a continental basis instead of piecemeal, as we have been doing by means of private bills in this house for the last three or four years. We should have been concerning ourselves with what we were going to do with the continuing surpluses which are being built up in the west. I believe in a modification of this government's gas policy. If we are to achieve the capture of the nearest markets, first and fastest, regardless of the flag they wave, then that modification must be carried out in order that job and prosperity-creating gas field development and pipe-line construction can get under way as soon as possible in western Canada.

May I point out that during 1953 we had something of a recession in the gas exploration and development industry. Again, in connection with the modification of Canada's gas policy I feel certain this government and parliament will eventually approve an extension of natural gas supplies, regardless of their source, to as many Canadians as possible, as quickly as possible.

The fourth point in regard to the modification of Canada's gas policy, which I feel sure this parliament will accept, is that the policy should be so designed as to do the other things I have mentioned at a minimum of subsidy cost to the Canadian taxpayer. I feel, sir, that in our debates over the last two or three years on an all-Canadian pipe-line policy—and the blame for this must fall directly upon the minister in charge—we have argued about an all-Canadian gas system without any regard whatsoever to the economics involved. As regards the Trans-Canada bill which follows this one, let us argue it out against a background of public and parliamentary recognition that an all-Canadian gas pipe line means accepting the principle of a subsidized pipe line.

I pointed out, sir, that we could, by redrafting our policy along correct lines, achieve the desired goal for Canada at a minimum cost to Canadian taxpayers. That is the major reason I am supporting this Niagara Transmission bill.

As a matter of fact, I believe that by immediately piping Louisiana gas by way of the Tennessee Transmission Company to the Consumers' Gas Company to service the people of greater Toronto, we will achieve four things. First of all, it will be the fastest method of getting natural gas to Toronto. It will mean the delivery of gas much sooner, providing parliament and the board of transport commissioners do not delay the implementation of this measure. It will mean the delivery of natural gas to Toronto at least two full years ahead of the earliest possible date of delivery of natural gas from western Canada.

Second, approval of this Niagara Transmission project would provide lower cost gas to the people of Toronto than could be supplied two years later from western Canada under a strictly all-Canadian policy. In addition, the approval of the Niagara project would cut the cost to Canada's taxpayers, the subsidy on an all-Canadian pipe line, by several million dollars.

Again, and this is perhaps most important at this time when we are faced with an unemployment problem in this country, the approval of this Niagara Transmission bill would create many hundreds of new jobs this spring in Ontario in the construction of the transmission pipe line and the construction of a distribution system through Toronto. It would also create many hundreds of jobs this year in the industries which manufacture the appliances through which the people would use the natural gas. All these jobs would be provided this year instead of in 1956 or 1957, when the all-Canadian pipe line comes through. Approval of this bill will provide jobs for those who will distribute these appliances throughout the Toronto area and in the east generally. It will provide an immediate means of creating jobs without government handouts.

Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that there are some phases of the all-Canadian gas policy with which I do not agree. The house is well aware of my views in this matter. I am not going to belabour them now, because when the Trans-Canada pipe-line bill comes before the house that will be the proper time to discuss and debate the broader aspects of a Canadian gas policy. However, I would leave with the minister and the house—

Mr. Macdonnell: He is greatly interested, though he does not appear to be listening.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Talking about me again?

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes.

Mr. Nickle: —the suggestion that when we do discuss the Trans-Canada pipe line we should do so against the background of a recognition of the need for subsidies; of the need for natural gas at competitive pricing in Ontario and Quebec; of the minimum possible price that can be paid in western Canada in order to obtain the gas which will fill that pipe line. There should also be full recognition on the part of this government that natural gas supply alone is only part of this problem. We will have to face the additional grave problem in the west of disposing of the by-products such as propane, butane gasoline and sulphur.

When we deal with a national gas policy we cannot, as this government is attempting to do, simply by-pass the whole problem of by-product disposal and say it is something for the industry to solve. We cannot do that, simply because the degree of success in selling these by-products, no matter how great the difficulties, will determine the price at which gas can be sold to this Trans-Canada pipe line. It will determine the availability of gas to that pipe line and also the expansion of the western Canadian oil, gas and petrochemical industries. In other words, tremendous developments can come through the development of natural gas if the policy is based upon sound principles.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that, as I indicated earlier, this Niagara Gas Transmission bill has some measure of urgency. I have no interest in Consumers' Gas Company, Toronto consumers, Niagara Gas Transmission Limited or the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company. However I recognize this fact. Unless a firm order for the necessary pipe for the construction of this line can be placed in the next few weeks, this whole project will be held up at least one year because of the impossibility of getting the steel to do the job, and of getting the financing done and construction under way this spring. I trust that the house and the committee will do all in their power to facilitate this measure, recognizing of course that this importation of United States gas must be cut off when Canadian gas becomes available, as Consumers' Gas is quite prepared to do, and recognizing also that this pipe line between Buffalo and Toronto which we have heard discussed today is not going to go into disuse.

As I mentioned earlier, we have discoveries in western Canada of 4,000 billion cubic feet of gas a year. Where is that gas to go? Tennessee Gas Transmission Company will take back 50 billion cubic feet a year. Over 20 years they will use up three months' discoveries in western Canada. Surely we can keep in operation that short pipe line from Toronto down to Buffalo, finding an additional small market for part of the steadily growing surplus of gas that we shall have in western Canada.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, this pipe line and the many others on which this house has passed legislation in the past couple of years have been referred to by many hon. members as national pipe lines. I want to say that the statement made by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) a few moments ago on this bill proves that they are not national pipe lines. Of course that is merely a repetition of what I have heard a good many times in this house, namely that Canada extends from Vancouver to Montreal and ends there.

In reference to this bill, the minister set out the fact that there were safeguards and that a clause would be placed in it which would prevent the operation of the legislation until all the evidence was taken. But going on a little bit further, he said that Manitoba was interested in this bill as were Ontario, Quebec and Alberta; and that ended Canada.

May I say that there are four provinces east of Quebec that are greatly interested in these pipe-line bills, but for a different reason. They are not going to make any money out of them, and they are not going to get any cheap fuel out of them. The whole objective of this and the other bills, as far as Ontario and Quebec are concerned, is directed toward one thing, namely to get cheap fuel regardless of the repercussions in any other part of the country. I expected the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) to be on his feet objecting to this bill because it, as well as others like it, are creating headaches for the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys at the present time.

Only last evening the minister had a delegation from Nova Scotia wait on him in reference to a mine closing for lack of markets. Of course he told them he could not do anything about it. He sent them on to Montreal to meet with the heads of the Canadian National Railways. On the 12th of this month the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys again will be meeting a delegation from Nova Scotia consisting of representatives of the mine workers' union and the heads of the operating coal industry in that province. Their purpose in going to see the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is to determine the future of the coal industry of that province. The problem in the province is what? It is that of markets. Why are they afraid of expanding the industry or developing it? Because there is a threat from natural gas and oil.

While I have no objection to Ontario getting cheap fuel, I am blaming the government for not having a national fuel policy that is all-embracing, whereby a study would be made of the whole question of fuels. Then gas or oil would be piped into the areas where it was most economic to do so, having due regard to the provincial economies that are based on other fuels and are going to be wiped out when these gas and oil developments are fully implemented.

The thing that irks me is this. Every time a member gets to his feet in the house he figures that if you can serve Quebec and Ontario from the western provinces, that is a national project.

Mr. Enfield: Nonsense.

Mr. Gillis: That is what has been said; and if it went over the hon. member's head, that is not my responsibility. If he cannot absorb what he hears in this chamber I suggest that he do not interrupt somebody who has been listening to the discussion.

Mr. Enfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Gillis: I have the floor.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Enfield: I should like to rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Gillis: There is no question of privilege at all. The hon. member interjected, where he should not have done so, a remark that indicated that he was not even listening to the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Enfield: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Gillis: I am not taking any suggestion of a question of privilege from the hon. member at all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gillis: There is not any question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand that the hon. member has risen on a question of privilege. I think I must hear him state his question of privilege.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, let me make this observation with regard to your ruling—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gillis: I have the floor. This hon. gentleman interjected a remark; that is all there is to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As I said before, since the hon. member has risen and announced that he wishes to raise a question of privilege, I think I must hear him. Then I must determine whether or not he has a question of privilege.

Mr. Enfield: Mr. Speaker, if it will make the hon. member opposite feel any better, I shall withdraw my previous interjection that he managed to provoke. However, on the question of the relevance of his remarks, are we discussing—

Mr. Gillis: That is not a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. It is a matter of argument.

Mr. Enfield: I submit that what the hon. member has been saying is not relevant to the bill before the house at the present time. He is discussing a whole national fuel policy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. To date the hon. member's remarks do not indicate that he is discussing a question of privilege but rather that he is discussing a point of order. I think perhaps the hon. member for Cape Breton South should be allowed to proceed.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, I want you to know that I did not start that incident.

An hon. Member: But you helped it along.

Mr. Gillis: When the hon. member says that the discussion of a national fuel policy is not relevant to this bill, I suggest that he had better do a little bit of studying on the problem; and if he does so, I think he will find that it is relevant.

As I was pointing out, in all these discussions I have never yet heard any member of this house suggest that there was any problem east of Quebec in connection with this natural gas question. I was a member of the committee that considered the first natural gas bill to be introduced in the house. At that time I asked the witnesses who appeared before the committee whether they had made any survey east of Quebec, and they admitted they had not. No consideration whatsoever had been given. As I was pointing out when I was interrupted, there are four provinces east of Montreal, and the threat of natural gas and oil is creating the problem so far as coal is concerned. Delegations are coming to Ottawa to meet with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to determine whether there is any solution to the problem.

This bill is to be sent to a committee, and I suggest to the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) that when it goes there an examination should also be made of the repercussions on the whole maritime economy by virtue of the fact that in this house we are passing bills—with very little consideration, in my judgment—to provide for the piping of natural gas and oil from western Canada. It is not a question of considering natural gas or oil alone; but rather it is one that is related to the matter of other fuels. Unless an examination is made from the point of view of a national fuel policy, one of these days we are going to find ourselves with an emergency on our hands. We will find that fuels going into certain areas are needed somewhere else and for some other purpose. Mines are being closed indiscriminately across Canada today, and we are not going to be able to open them up the moment we need that fuel.

I think it is almost time someone took a look at the question. The statement was made that this gas development is a billion dollar project which will bear full fruit about 1960. That is a lot of money. It is a big investment, and I should think those who are investing that money would sit down and take a look at the whole fuel question before that amount of money is invested. Only last night in Montreal the president of Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, one of the biggest organizations in Canada, said that in the maritime provinces coal, steel and textile areas were depressed today. It is getting pretty bad when he will make such a statement, because he has always taken the other view.

We are asked to pass a bill that will make natural gas available to the province of Ontario and ultimately to the province of Quebec. Natural gas will replace coal for all domestic purposes and also in industry in Canada, with the exception of basic steel. When it is said that by 1960 this billion dollar program will be fully developed it means that natural gas will be supplying the whole area of Quebec and Ontario. It also means that the whole coal industry of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is going to be a casualty in the path of technological advance.

The government has some responsibility to the four maritime provinces that depend to a large extent on coal. We also have some responsibility to them. What is going to happen then? Are no benefits to accrue to that part of the country as the result of this investment in gas and oil, and the money the federal government is going to spend in these projects?

Mr. Trainor: Who said they are going to spend any money?

Mr. Gillis: They are spending plenty of it. Sometime we shall go into it and show you. Perhaps we will before the debate is over.

Mr. Trainor: I should like to know.

Mr. Gillis: I think the province of Saskatchewan has set an example in the field of natural gas. Private industry is developing the wells but the Saskatchewan government has set up a crown company to distribute the gas. The crown company there that is doing this job is also the company that is concerned with hydroelectric power. They are in the field of fuel, and are planning natural gas development in the Saskatchewan area in the way that will be most economic. It is not being done haphazardly as we are doing here by granting franchises for pipe lines all over the country, to pipe Canadian gas across the border into the United States and to pipe United States gas across the border into Canada. If we are going to break down trade barriers on this continent in order to supply the province of Ontario with natural gas it is pretty nearly time we began to wipe out trade barriers all along the line.

If Ontario thinks it is good business to bring in cheap natural gas from across the line, then it is just as good business for Ontario and the four maritime provinces to be able to get cheap automobiles and not have to pay a tariff of 25 per cent on them. About 35 per cent is added to the cost of everything imported from the United States that the maritime consumer eats and wears, by the time it is hauled across the country to him. If we are going to start knocking down barriers in order to have cheap fuel, let us start knocking them down for everything else right down the line. You cannot retain trade barriers in order to protect central Ontario manufacturers for certain purposes, and knock them down for another purpose because benefits will accrue to the central provinces. If Ontario is going to take natural gas and distribute it, then in my opinion the body already in the field of fuel, the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission, is the organization that should control the distribution, because I believe they can plan it in a much better way than some pipe-line company which merely wants to pipe it in there for the purpose of making money.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that you are looking at me. It is six o'clock. May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BANK ACT

PROVISION FOR DECENNIAL REVISION, EXTENSION OF CHARTERS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for the second reading of Bill No. 338, respecting banks and banking, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I should like to propose one specific change in the Bank Act tonight, Mr. Speaker, a change that has to do with agriculture. It seems to me that one of the major gaps or major weaknesses in our banking system over the past few years has been its failure to provide adequate long-term credit facilities for farmers. The banks seem to feel, and I admit with some justification, that marginal farmers, because of climatic conditions, because of uncertainties of price and markets, are perhaps not good credit risks. As a result Canadian farmers, no matter in what province they live, seem to have difficulty today in obtaining long-term credit.

A few days ago this particular problem was discussed in the Saskatchewan legislature during the debate on a private member's resolution. According to a Canadian Press dispatch of last Thursday, the resolution, and I quote—

> . . . asked the federal government to set up a lending agency to provide loans to young farmers starting out or extend limitations of present lending agencies.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that resolution pinpointed the problem which should be considered by the banking and commerce committee when this particular act is being reviewed. The lack of long-term agriculture credit facilities in my opinion is having a harmful effect on our economy and is causing unnecessary trouble for farmers. As every hon. member knows, no matter from what province he comes, in recent years there has been a steady and persistent drift of farmers into the cities. I think one of the reasons for this trend is to be found in the fact that they are finding it ever more difficult to become established on the farms. The price of land today has skyrocketed. The price of machinery is becoming ever higher, and it is very costly for a young farmer to purchase a basic herd of cattle or of livestock.

In western Canada today if a young farmer wants to start out on a half section of good land, with all the equipment to farm it, it costs him roughly $20,000. Such a figure, of course, is out of reach of about 90 per cent of our farmers. There is no place where they can obtain adequate credit to purchase such a farm. As a result, I say again that many of these young farmers have left the rural areas and drifted into the city. It is quite true, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) pointed out the other day, that the federal government has within the past few years set up the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

I want to say at once that both of these acts have been extremely beneficial. However, I believe most hon. members will admit that the provisions of these acts have been found to be too limited in scope. Trying to qualify for loans, most farmers either find the down payment required under these acts too high, or the proposed security required too severe, or the amount which could be borrowed too small. For instance, if my memory serves me correctly the ceiling in the farm improvement act is $4,000. When you realize that today in western Canada a tractor alone costs perhaps $3,000 and a combine about $6,000, most hon. members will realize that the ceiling is too low.

Thus I say that experience has shown the provisions of both the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act are completely inadequate to provide farmers with the type of credit which they need today. It seems to me the time has come for this parliament to remedy that weakness while we are discussing the banking system.

I suggest there are several methods which could be used. In the first place, the provisions of the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act could be extended, the ceilings could be elevated and so on. Parliament might also consider a second alternative. In this Bank Act, if I understand it correctly, the minister is proposing that the banks should be guaranteed by the government against losses on 20 to 30-year loans which they make to urban dwellers on the construction of new homes. Why would it not be feasible, under this act, to give the banks similar guarantees against losses which they might have in making 20 to 30-year loans to farmers for the purpose of purchasing new farms or new equipment?

As I see it the principle would be the same in both cases. In that way the farmer could obtain the long-term credit which he so badly needs in Canada today without undue expense being placed upon the taxpayers. If the banks are prepared to accept long-term mortgages on houses under a government guarantee, I believe they should be prepared also to accept long-term farm mortgages under the same type of guarantee.

I may say that I have discussed this matter with bankers I know, and they cannot see any particular flaw in the argument. I realize, of course, that certain safeguards would have to be established so the banks' liquid position would not be jeopardized. I say again, Mr. Speaker, I think the time has come for this parliament to do something to provide the kind of credit facilities that our agriculture needs. I have suggested these two methods, and if there is something wrong with them I hope the Minister of Finance will tell me precisely what it is.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Friday, February 26, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose previously we were discussing clause 431. Shall the clause carry?

On clause 431—Seizure of things not specified.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the minister recalls the discussion we were having in respect of clause 431 the last time the committee dealt with the Criminal Code. Is the minister awaiting his assistants?

Mr. Garson: No; go right ahead.

Mr. Knowles: As he may recall, some of us were concerned as to this clause. It is a new one and it seemed to me on the previous occasion we discussed it, and still seems to me, that its provisions grant rather wide authority. It makes it possible for one who is armed with a warrant for the seizure of certain things to seize other articles in addition to those set out in the warrant if, in the opinion of the peace officer who has the warrant, there are grounds for so doing.

I listened with interest to what the minister had to say on this matter on February 26, but I must say I was more impressed by what the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings had to say, particularly when he pointed out that the wording of a warrant can usually be made wide enough to embrace any of the articles involved in a particular offence. As the minister knows, it has been my concern and the concern of some other hon. members in this house in going through the code that we do not go too far in the direction of providing peace officers with too much authority without a warrant being properly drawn.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, may I amplify what I said in committee the other night when we were dealing with this clause. I feel it is necessary because my hon. friend has merely summarized the discussion, and frankly I believe the minister will have some difficulty in providing justification for this clause. It will be observed that clause 431 contains within it reference to clause 429. Clause 431 reads:

> Every person who executes a warrant issued under section 429 may seize, in addition to the things mentioned in the warrant, anything that on reasonable grounds he believes has been obtained by or has been used in the commission of an offence, . . .

—and so on. But, Mr. Chairman, if you go back to clause 429 you will find provisions (a), (b) and (c) are so wide that they include almost everything under the sun. To use a colloquial expression, they include everything but the kitchen sink. Paragraph (a) of clause 429 reads:

> (a) anything upon or in respect of which any offence against this act has been or is suspected to have been committed.

And then paragraphs (b) and (c) read:

> (b) anything that there is reasonable ground to believe will afford evidence with respect to the commission of an offence against this act, or
> (c) anything that there is reasonable ground to believe is intended to be used for the purpose of committing any offence against the person for which a person may be arrested without warrant.

It must be remembered that the information will be preferred by a skilled officer, perhaps of the R.C.M.P. or other branch of the police, and that this is not a warrant for the arrest of an individual where the charge is limited specifically. In such cases a peace officer cannot go beyond that charge; otherwise he would be guilty of complicity and the warrant or the indictment would become void. This is information upon which a search warrant will be taken out and within which the officer responsible, I suggest with all due deference, can include everything which any reasonable person could anticipate.

Having done that, it is not necessary to use the provisions of clause 431, unless by any chance the officer has been lax or careless, in which case I frankly do not believe we should require in the Criminal Code a clause which is quite so wide as this. Under this provision, if the officer has forgotten or fails to include within the information everything from Dan to Beersheba, he can in addition to the one thing mentioned in the warrant seize anything be believes on reasonable grounds has been used in that offence.

For example, Mr. Chairman, I can imagine a husband or wife buying a washing machine and stating that they can pay $10 per month, when actually their earning power is considerably exaggerated. It would then be perfectly conceivable under this clause for the vendor to seize that washing machine, because he could claim that the buyers obtained it by falsely representing their income, and that in fact they lacked the purchasing power.

I certainly do not want a situation of that kind created, and I know the Minister of Justice would be the first to oppose such a development. But I am saying to him with all the force I can command that if this clause is permitted to stand as it now is, then it will be open to a great many abuses, and we will find the Criminal Code being used for the seizure of goods which should actually be recovered under civil procedure, if they are seized at all.

I would be the first to admit that we should not handicap an officer of the law, and that we should provide him with all necessary powers; but I do not like umbrella clauses, or general catch-alls such as we have here. I know the minister will give an explanation which will undoubtedly appeal to reason, but I would also suggest with all due deference that if he were sitting on this side of the house, I would hate to think how much time he would take in opposing the enactment of the clause we have before us now.

Mr. Garson: I think I should address myself to the last point made by my hon. friend, but first let me deny as emphatically as I can that in the improbable event of my sitting on the other side of the house I would oppose this clause. I am not supporting it merely because I am sitting on this side of the house. I am supporting it because I think it is a necessary provision to have in the bill.

I went to some considerable length in outlining the justification for this clause on the last occasion on which it was before the committee, and I do not believe it is necessary for me to cover the same ground tonight. However, I should deal with the points raised by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. He claims that if this clause is passed it will enable a creditor to seize, say, a washing machine.

Mr. Nowlan: It is possible.

Mr. Garson: Yes, but I would suggest that he look carefully at clause 429, under which the warrant has to be issued. When my hon. friend talks about subsection (a), covering anything upon or in respect of which any offence against this act has been or is suspected to have been committed—and the same sort of provision is in (b) and (c)—I think he will agree from his own experience that in order to get a search warrant under section 429 at all the informant has to satisfy the justice that he believes, upon reasonable grounds, that an offence has been committed.

When he establishes that by his information, then the information is issued only in respect of things which have to do with that offence. The warrant only applies to things under (a), (b) or (c) in relation to that offence. It does not make any difference how broad (a), (b) and (c) are. The restriction does not arise under these subsections. It arises from the fact that when the warrant is issued it is in respect of a certain offence which is disclosed in the information sworn before the justice. I see that my hon. friend from Digby-Annapolis-Kings is nodding his head in assent to that statement, and I am glad he agrees with what certainly is the case.

When the peace officer has this warrant, he goes to the place where he thinks he is going to find the property which was involved in that offence which was referred to in the information and in the warrant that is in his possession. When he gets there, he discovers that this particular thief has been active in more spheres than anyone had suspected, and that he not only has all of the swag from this particular offence but a lot of material from perhaps several other offences as well. This is not an imaginary situation. Time after time we see in the newspapers reports to the effect that when the police went to seize under a search warrant of this sort they found goods that had been stolen in a series of robberies in that community over a previous period of time.

What my hon. friends of the opposition are arguing is that under a set of circumstances such as that, the peace officer should solemnly seize the articles covered by the warrant he has, as being those that were connected with the offence in respect of which the warrant was issued; and then, so far as all the other ones are concerned, he says, "Well, I have not any authority to do that. I shall go back to the magistrate and see if I can get some more warrants to cover these other matters". Is that common sense?

I had perhaps better not ask my friend the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings the rhetorical question, "Is that common sense"; I shall merely say that it does not seem to me to be common sense. It is only after the peace officer has been armed with the warrant in respect of a particular offence disclosed in a sworn information before the justice, and he goes and finds other goods which upon reasonable grounds he believes to have been the subject matter of other offences, that he has any right to take them. To my mind this section is an improvement in this part of the code.

Mr. Nowlan: With all deference, may I say this. We are not going to involve the minister in rhetorical questions or otherwise. He was suggesting that perhaps I was not talking common sense. Perhaps I am not prepared to offer an opinion because I might be slightly prejudiced.

Nevertheless I suggest, with all deference, that the minister has not met the point I raised. In other words, he says that section 429 deals with a specific offence. It is certainly possible for any embryonic lawyer or any embryonic police officer to draw up an information under section 429 which would be wide enough to cover any possible eventuality that might occur.

I am not going to waste the time of the committee by stressing this point again, having done it once. My complaint is not that anything might be done under section 429; but having laid the information, we come back and find that it is any person who can do this. Mind you, it need not be a police officer; this can be anybody. You are not limited to a peace officer. You are not limited to a constable. And even some of these people, I am rather afraid, have fearful ways of dealing with matters. I am just thinking of a peace officer who was on traffic duty in a city not too far away from here when a horse dropped dead in what was known as Confederation square. It was not Confederation square in Ottawa, I may say. He could not spell "confederation" so he unharnessed the horse and dragged it till he came to Prince street, which was his own name and he could spell it. Then he filled in the traffic report saying that he found the horse on Prince street. That sort of thing sometimes happens with peace officers.

You are going beyond even that class now. You are saying that any person who executes a warrant may seize things in addition to the things mentioned in the warrant. I say again with all emphasis—and I am not stressing it further—that everything should be mentioned in the warrant that could possibly be included within the scope of any particular crime with which you were concerned. If you are going on a fishing expedition I think you should at least fish within the ambit of the law, and not under a general umbrella. You add that to the fact that any person can do that, that he can seize anything. It might be a bootlegging offence. As I say, it might be something resulting from credit.

The minister says this is an improvement in the law. Possibly it is, Mr. Chairman. But I simply point out that the criminal law of this country has been fairly well administered since confederation, and the Criminal Code has been a fairly effective instrument of legislation. There are hon. gentlemen in this house who have been connected with its enforcement. For instance, there is the hon. member for Cumberland sitting on my right, who for years has been a crown prosecutor in his own constituency, and there are many others in this house who have had similar experience. It seems to me rather strange that we now find this new section being drafted which in my opinion, at any rate, goes farther than the code went previously.

I always object to the law being stretched to the limit. I think we must, as far as possible, maintain the old concept of specific offences, specific crimes and specific informations. I am not going to urge the matter further but I do say that I think this is not an improvement. I say that with all respect to the minister. He can refer to section 429 as much as he likes, but I am sure that any officer who is retained by the Department of Justice and lays an information which does not bring the matters which the minister wants investigated within the scope of that section, will not be retained a second time, unless there is a great deal of pressure brought to bear upon the minister. It is only when they fail to do that that you are back within the provision of this section. I say it is unnecessary and I say it is unwise; and I at least want to register my own objection.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fulton: No. I think there is another objection to this clause, Mr. Chairman, on the ground that in none of these sections so far as I can see is any time limit laid down within which a warrant must be executed. That may be a non-essential. When you act under clause 431 and seize anything else in addition, that is one thing. When you read that in conjunction with clause 432 (3) (a), under which the magistrate or the justice is now to be the judge of whether or not the thing was lawfully in possession of the person from whom it was seized, you have three things. It is not included in the warrant. It is seized on the suspicion of some peace officer that it was obtained unlawfully. Yes; my friend the hon. member for London corrects me and says it may not be a peace officer, but may be seized by any person who fancies that it was obtained by the commission of an offence. Then after it has been seized and is before the justice, that justice, without any sort of trial, if he thinks it was obtained unlawfully orders it to be forfeited. Then added to all these considerations is the fact that no time limit is specified within which this extraordinary power may be exercised. I think it is going much too far, and I would certainly propose to vote against the section.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if, while we are on this section, I might bring to the attention of the members of the committee a representation which I have received from Mr. N. A. Munnoch, general counsel of the Bell Telephone Company. He had made representations before the special committee of the House of Commons last year in connection with this same question. Mr. Munnoch refers to section 171, subsection 6 of the bill, which hon. members will find on page 57. That is the section authorizing a search warrant in connection with gaming houses.

Mr. Knowles: We are back to the corner stores again.

Mr. Garson: No, not to the corner stores. This is a different kind of gaming house. This is a gaming house where a lot of telephone lines have been installed in order that those in charge may receive and place bets on race tracks. The complaint of the telephone companies, on the strength of which this subsection was placed in the code previously, was that when the police came in they took the telephones in the course of seizing exhibits and ripped them from the walls, and in doing so frequently damaged them severely. To meet that situation it was provided by subsection 6 of section 171 that—

> Nothing in this section authorizes the seizure, forfeiture or destruction of telephone, telegraph or other communication facilities or equipment owned by a person engaged in providing telephone, telegraph or other communication service to the public or forming part of the telephone, telegraph or other communication service or system of such a person.

Before the House of Commons committee Mr. Munnoch represented that clause 431, which we are now discussing, might have this effect of permitting and I think I had better use his words rather than paraphrase them—

> . . . "a person, armed with a search warrant pursuant to section 429, to seize telephone, telegraph and other communication facilities and equipment if, on reasonable grounds, he believed they had been used in the commission of an offence, despite the fact that they are exempt from seizure under section 171. This would seem to conflict with and nullify, or to a large extent impair, the protection given to communication companies by section 171.
> In order to remedy this situation and give such companies the protection to which they are, in my submission, entitled, I respectfully suggest that either section 431 be amended by adding a provision substantially similar to that contained in subsection 6 of section 171 or that subsection 6 of section 171 be amended by adding after the word "section" in the first line thereof, the words "or in section 431", so that the said subsection would read as follows:

"(6) Nothing in this section or in section 431 authorizes the seizure, forfeiture or destruction of telephone, telegraph or other communication facilities or equipment owned by a person engaged in providing telephone, telegraph or other communication service to the public or forming part of the telephone, telegraph or other communication service or system of such a person."

The House of Commons committee rejected that argument, and when we were considering introducing the code last fall I advised Mr. Munnoch that we were going to introduce it—with the few minor exceptions I have called to the attention of hon. members, typographical errors and the like—in substantially the same form as that in which it had emerged from the House of Commons committee of last year. He then asked me if, when we came to clause 431, I would be good enough to present to this committee and myself endorse these representations of his which I have just finished quoting. I said I could not endorse them, because my view was that we should adhere to the decision that had been made by the House of Commons committee, but that I would bring the matter to the attention of hon. members of this committee as I have now done.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fulton: On division.

Clause agreed to on division.

On clause 432—Detention of things seized.

Mr. Nowlan: What about the three months' provision in clause 432? I wonder whether the minister would comment on that. The note says that subsections 1 and 2 are the old section 631, but all section 631 says is that the thing shall be detained until the conclusion of the investigation or trial, and otherwise shall be returned. It seems to me that the period of three months during which the thing can be held while the investigation is being conducted, as provided in clause 432, is rather long. I wonder if the minister would comment on that briefly or comment —period.

Mr. Garson: I should bring to my hon. friend's attention that the entire clause in which the three months appears, that is, starting with the words "but nothing shall be detained", was added by the Senate to the section in its original form as a saving clause to limit the period during which things could be detained. In that form it passed the House of Commons committee, and I would think we might well approve of it here.

Mr. Fulton: What about subclause 3 (a) of clause 432? Is that the one the minister is saying is a saving clause?

Mr. Garson: No. I suggested that the last five lines of 432 (1) were added as a saving clause.

Mr. Fulton: I think there are strong grounds for objection to subclause 3 (a), which I notice is new, and so that the grounds of objection may appear on the record I had better read it. It reads as follows:

(3) Where a justice is satisfied that anything that has been seized under section 431 or under a warrant issued pursuant to section 429 will not be required for any purpose mentioned in subsection 1 or 2, he may

(a) if possession of it by the person from whom it was seized is unlawful, order it to be forfeited unless he is authorized or required by law to dispose of it in some other way, or

(b) order that it be returned to the person from whom it was seized.

There can be no objection to (b) because that is restoring it to the place whence it came, but under (a) nothing is laid down to indicate in any way what steps a justice has to take to satisfy himself whether or not it was unlawfully obtained by the person from whom it was seized. If there is any other provision in the code which applies here and makes it incumbent upon a justice to at least go through some form of judicial inquiry to come to a conclusion, I would be glad if the minister would direct our attention to it. As I see the section as it stands the thing can be disposed of on the merest whim of the justice.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at the following subsection 4 he will see that it indicates—

Mr. Fulton: That merely provides a time limit. It merely reads:

(4) Nothing shall be disposed of under subsection 3 pending any proceeding in which the right of seizure is questioned, or within 30 days after an order is made under that subsection.

The introductory words of subsection 3 emphasize the fact that this thing may have been seized although not named in the search warrant. The introductory words are:

Where a justice is satisfied that anything that has been seized under section 431 or under a warrant issued pursuant to section 429 . . .

This thing may have been seized although it was not included in the warrant. There has been no information laid with respect to it. A person enters to execute a warrant and he sees something else which in his belief—and he may believe it sincerely—has been acquired unlawfully by the person in whose possession it is found, so he seizes it. Then it comes before a justice. It is not wanted in the judicial proceedings brought against the person in whose possession it was found. It may lie there for any length of time. No maximum limit is laid down within which it has to be disposed of or returned. After six months or a year somebody suddenly notices it lying around a police corridor. Possibly they have forgotten where it came from, or cannot find the records, or it involves a little bit of trouble to look them up. It is decided that the fellow was up on a charge, was not a very good character and probably came by it unlawfully in any event. Heaven only knows what disposition may be made of it.

I must confess that this seems to me to be very loose draftsmanship, and a form of draftsmanship which means that no one can say what are the principles upon which a justice must proceed in determining how to dispose of this seized article.

Mr. Nowlan: In furtherance of that, may I point out to the minister that he has referred to subclause 4 as a saving subclause. I am prepared to admit that it has some saving value, but subclause 4 reads:

> Nothing shall be disposed of under subsection 3 pending any proceeding in which the right of seizure is questioned . . .

Now, just what is meant by the "right of seizure"? You are not dealing now with something which is unlawful. This is a new phrase, new terminology entirely, "the right of seizure." To be quite frank, I believe the provisions of clause 429 are wide enough; and being as wide as they are, for the life of me I do not know how anyone could ever question the right of seizure, whatever may be included within that term. It apparently means if you go beyond the scope of machinery which has been set in motion.

As I said earlier, if the section had been drafted properly the right of seizure could not be questioned. Then, going back to subclause 3, who determines if possession is unlawful? A justice is satisfied that something has been seized, and then paragraph (a) goes on to say.

> if possession of it by the person from whom it was seized is unlawful . . .

How is that determined? If one goes down to a later clause we find provision for some inquiry, I suppose, but I am not sure it is included in that. I want to emphasize what my hon. friend has said, that I believe it is loosely drafted, too widely drafted. For the life of me, which does not mean too much, I cannot understand what it means.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask one other question to indicate the difficulty. If the justice is satisfied that possession is unlawful, he may order it to be forfeited. To whom would it be forfeited? There is no provision in this clause. There is a provision in clause 433, covering explosives, which provides that the proceeds of sale will be forfeited. Under the existing code there is either committal or it is returned. Now there is this vague provision, and to whom is it forfeited? Would it be forfeited to the person who seized it, or what? The section is full of uncertainties and vagueness, and I would ask at least that it stand, if indeed it should not be dropped.

Mr. Garson: I have no objection to having any of these clauses stand if there is any substantial doubt entertained by any member of the committee. I shall now endeavour to dispel that doubt, and if I do not succeed I am quite prepared to let the matter stand. Subclause 3 says:

> Where a justice is satisfied that anything that has been seized under section 431 or under a warrant issued pursuant to section 429 will not be required for any purpose mentioned in subsection 1 or 2, . . .

My friend understands that is in connection with an investigation, preliminary hearing or trial. Then the clause continues:

> . . . he may
> (a) if possession of it by the person from whom it was seized is unlawful, order it to be forfeited . . .

Then if my hon. friend will look at clause 626 of the bill, he will see that fines, penalties, forfeitures and so on, go to Her Majesty in the right of the province as represented by the attorney general of the province. Suppose that the person from whom this article was seized was the lawful owner, and in lawful possession of it. Then the justice, presumably, would not issue an order of forfeiture because the possession of it by the person from whom it was seized would not appear to him to be unlawful. On the contrary it would appear to be quite lawful.

In the event, that he made a mistake—and judges are human and can make mistakes—it is provided in subclause 4 that:

> Nothing shall be disposed of under subsection 3 pending any proceeding in which the right of seizure is questioned, or within 30 days after an order is made under that subsection.

If the person from which the thing was seized were the owner of that thing, if he did lawfully own it, and was lawfully in possession of it and it was taken from him, I think my lawyer friends of the opposition will agree that the owner if necessary could take out a writ of replevin in the common law provinces to recover it. But I am also certain that under those circumstances the justice or the peace officer who was holding the article would never seek to retain it, so I do not entirely share my hon. friend's apprehension about the difficulties which he alleges.

Mr. Fulton: It would be rather difficult for him to bring an action for replevin if he were languishing in a jail 150 miles away. He has only 30 days to oppose the forfeiture.

Mr. Garson: I am taking the case my hon. friend seems to be exercised about, where the article has been improperly seized from Mr. John Doe. It really belongs to him and they should not have seized it in the first place. They exercised an unwise discretion. Supposing it is a refrigerator they have seized. They cannot do anything with it within that period of 30 days, and during that time the man from whom it was unwisely seized can assert his claim in relation to it and if necessary have a civil process issued to take it back.

On the other hand, if his possession is unlawful, if it was a stolen article, it could be returned to the owner. If the owner was not known it would be forfeited to the crown.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if I could get in for just a moment to make a suggestion that it seems to me might meet the point or at least might help to get across the point that the hon. members for Kamloops and Digby-Annapolis-Kings have been trying to make. What about putting in line 6 after the first "is" the words "to the satisfaction of the justice." This part of the clause would then read, "if possession of it by the person from whom it was seized is, to the satisfaction of the justice, unlawful . . ." The hon. member for Kamloops says that is already in there, but he now agrees that the words "is satisfied" are only in line 1. It is from that that I gathered this idea. The justice does have to be satisfied that something that has been seized will not be required for any purpose mentioned in subsection 1 or 2; that does impose upon the justice the obligation of being satisfied. Why not do the same in line 6?

Mr. Garson: The obligation is there anyhow.

Mr. Knowles: Why is it stated in one case and not stated in the other? I go along with the view being expressed by my friends to the right that it would be wise to state the obligation again and thus make it necessary for the justice to be satisfied, and have some way of showing it, that the article was seized unlawfully.

Mr. Garson: I think the reason the words "is satisfied" are used in one instance and not in the other is that in the first case the justice has to be satisfied these articles will not be required for any purpose mentioned in subsection 1 or 2, whereas in the second case it is really a point of law he is deciding—if possession of it by the person from whom it was seized was unlawful. But they have to prove that it was unlawful. He will not act unless it is proven to him that it is unlawful. So it seems to me that without inserting the words "to his satisfaction", or words to that effect, the clause indicates clearly that they have to establish, first of all, that the possession is unlawful before the justice has any jurisdiction to make an order under the clause.

Mr. Knowles: Where is that obligation set out?

Mr. Garson: In the words of the clause. It says that "he may"—he may do what? He may "order it to be forfeited". On what condition? If possession of it by the person from whom it was seized is unlawful. But they have to show him that it is unlawful before he can make an order for forfeiture.

Mr. Fulton: Who are "they"? Who has to show it? To what extent does it have to be shown?

Mr. Garson: Anyone who is seeking a forfeiture order. It might be a representative of the crown who wanted a forfeiture order. It might be a peace officer. But whoever it is he must show the justice that it is unlawful before the justice can make a forfeiture order.

Mr. Knowles: Does he have to do this only on a request for a forfeiture order, or could he do it on his own initiative?

Mr. Garson: It has to be established to his satisfaction, notwithstanding the fact that such satisfaction is not mentioned here.

Mr. Knowles: The minister is coming around to my point.

Mr. Garson: Oh, no; I have always agreed with my hon. friend that the justice must be convinced that the possession of the person from whom it was seized was unlawful. What I disagreed with was that it needed some particular words like "to his satisfaction" here to make this point clear. The justice may, if possession of it by the person from whom it was seized is unlawful, order it to be forfeited. The question he has to decide is this. Is the possession unlawful? And when he has decided that, but not before, he may order it to be forfeited.

Mr. Fulton: And then, when the question is raised, to what extent and by what process does he have to be satisfied that it is unlawful? A crown officer comes before him. Is it sufficient that he make a statutory declaration as to the circumstances under which it was obtained and his belief that the possession of it by the person from whom it was seized is unlawful, or is it necessary to have judicial or semi-judicial proceedings? What kind of process is necessary to satisfy the justice? Let us look at subsection 4, because the minister has said that is the saving clause. It reads:

> Nothing shall be disposed of under subsection 3 pending any proceeding in which the right of seizure is questioned—

—and so on. Mr. Chairman, there can be no question as to the right of seizure, because under section 431 it is provided that—

> Every person who executes a warrant issued under section 429 may seize, in addition to the things mentioned in the warrant, anything that on reasonable grounds he believes has been obtained by or has been used in the commission of an offence.

He may have had reasonable belief on those reasonable grounds, but his belief may have been entirely wrong. His judgment may have been entirely wrong. The thing may have been obtained in a perfectly lawful fashion by the person in whose possession it was found. But so long as the person executing the warrant believes, on reasonable grounds, that it was not so lawfully obtained, he has a perfect right to seize it. There will not, in fact, be any subsequent proceeding unless the right to seizure is questioned.

The right to seizure is absolutely unquestioned under the terms of section 431. If a form of words were used which suggested that what was in mind was a proceeding in which the correctness or soundness of a seizure was being questioned, then I think that would cover the purpose in mind. But when the words used are, "Any proceeding in which the right of seizure is questioned", then I do not think it covers the purpose in mind, because surely it is not the right to seize which is in question. It is whether the seizure was in fact correctly and soundly made that is going to be questioned.

Mr. Garson: May I go into a few elementary principles? Would my hon. friend not agree—

Mr. Fulton: You have to have more than that to justify this section.

Mr. Garson: Would not my friend agree that, first of all, the seizing officer has to have a warrant under section 429?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Knowles: Or section 431?

Mr. Garson: No, no. There is no warrant under section 431. He has a warrant under section 429. Please follow it carefully. He has a warrant and then, having the warrant, he comes along to this place where he has to seize goods which are covered by the warrant. When he gets there he finds a lot of other goods, and he seizes them too. But he does so only if he can justify that seizure by a belief on reasonable grounds that these other goods fall within the condition of this clause.

Mr. Fulton: Surely.

Mr. Garson: In the case posed by my hon. friend he has gone to this place and found there some goods covered by his warrant, and also another washing machine not covered by his warrant, a washing machine lawfully belonging to the person in whose possession it was. But the officer may think that because the goods he was seeking were stolen, the washing machine, too, was stolen. In those circumstances he might regard this as a reasonable ground for taking the washing machine away. Suppose then his right of seizure is challenged.

Under those circumstances, his right of seizure would be in question and it would be a very difficult thing indeed for any magistrate or justice to say that the man had reasonable grounds for seizing something that belonged to and was in the lawful possession of the person from whom it was taken. In this event he would issue an order releasing the washing machine to the lawful owner from whom it had been seized and the matter would be closed.

Mr. Fulton: But he does not have to have reasonable grounds to seize it; he only has to have reasonable grounds to believe that he has the right to seize it. Take the case the minister has mentioned, where a man is suspected of having stolen several washing machines. Washing machines are rather large; let us suppose that he is suspected of having stolen a number of automobile tires. A warrant is taken out for the seizure of those tires, or for their detention. At the home of the person presumed to have taken the tires the officer finds a number of tires the accused is suspected of having stolen, and in addition he finds three or four more tires which he believes, upon reasonable grounds, have been stolen by this man who has been stealing tires and disposing of them.

The officer has perfectly reasonable grounds for supposing that the other tires, too, were stolen, and with that in mind he seizes them. This seizure is not covered by the warrant at all. There can be no question of the officer's right to seize, because it is conferred upon him by section 431. He may seize so long as he has reasonable grounds for believing. To him the grounds are perfectly reasonable and, as a reasonable man, he attempts to exercise reasonable judgment when he exercises the right to seize.

Now, what I am pointing out is that in fact the seizure may not be reasonable. But when the seizure is perfectly lawful under clause 431, and the right to seize exists under that clause, how can you question the right to seize under those circumstances? Yet the proceeding envisaged here, and the words used—and it is the words of the law that the courts will have to interpret, not what the courts believe the intention of parliament might have been—the words used are, "any proceeding in which the right of seizure is questioned".

In the circumstances which I have outlined and which the minister outlined, I submit that the right to seize could not be questioned, because he has an unquestionable right to seize once the clause is enacted. That is another example of why we should be more careful in the drafting of this and other clauses which are concerned with the exercise of very wide powers almost otherwise completely undefined. What is in mind here is the question of whether or not a seizure was in fact well founded, and whether or not there was the right to seize.

I am not going to attempt here to suggest the form of words which will put into legal phraseology the idea which I think should be incorporated in the clause, but I am quite clear in my own mind that the words now in the clause do not cover the idea, do not put into legal phraseology the intent which was there when that particular subclause was drafted.

Mr. Garson: I suggest to my hon. friend that what he has just described as a very difficult problem could be quite simply resolved if he looked at 3 (a), which reads:

> Where a justice is satisfied——that this article is not required for any purpose mentioned in subclauses 1 and 2 of clause 432, he may:

> (b) order that it be returned to the person from whom it was seized.

So this great difficulty that my hon. friend has been explaining for the last two or three minutes could be resolved by a simple order under 3 (b). So far as his difficulty about the right of seizure is concerned, I am sure my hon. friend will agree that the right of seizure in this case is made up of two things. There must be a warrant, and there must be reasonable and probable grounds for the peace officer's belief under clause 431. If either of those ingredients is missing, then the right of seizure is not complete.

Mr. Fulton: Of course; that is the point. These ingredients may be there, yet a seizure may be effected which is perfectly proper and which in fact embraces things neither included in the warrant nor unlawfully in the possession of the person from whom they were seized.

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend look at 3 (b) and say that they cannot be ordered to be returned to the man?

Mr. Fulton: Of course they may be ordered to be returned.

Mr. Garson: That is the whole point.

Mr. Fulton: Under subclause 3 (a) or (b), as I say, it is going to be rather difficult, for the person from whom they were seized may have been found guilty of a crime with respect to other things and be incarcerated in a prison or possibly in a penitentiary. But he has to assert the right to have them returned, and how is he going to satisfy the magistrate of his right under those circumstances? That is putting all sorts of difficulties in the way; and yet, as I said earlier, there is no principle laid down for the guidance of the justice in determining whether or not the possession of the thing by the person from whom it was seized was lawful.

As I pointed out earlier, the minister has not said whether it can be done by statutory declaration on the part of the crown officer, whether it has to be by an affidavit, or whether there has to be some either quasi-criminal or fully criminal or even civil action, brought to determine the lawfulness of the possession on the part of the person from whom it was seized. When I couple that with subclause 4, and I see the incomplete and inadequate wording there, I say this thing is just going to create difficulties in interpretation and in enforcement. It will be impossible to resolve it without amending this clause. I am suggesting that it be amended now rather than later on.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid we are going to waste time over this clause if we discuss it at further length. I would suggest that we let it stand and, keeping my hon. friends' observations in mind, we shall see whether some method cannot be worked out to meet the point they have made, without spoiling the effectiveness of the clause itself.

The Deputy Chairman: Clause 432 stands.

Clauses 433 to 437 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 438—Delivery to peace officer.

Mr. Nowlan: This clause deals with the person after he has been arrested and delivered to the peace officer to be taken before a justice. The marginal note of clause 438 says:

Section 652 (in part) and new in part.

Well, now, section 652 of the code as it now stands says that a man who has been arrested may be detained, but must be brought before a magistrate or a justice before noon of the next day, as I recall it. Of course, that naturally does not include a Sunday or a holiday, but ordinarily he must be brought before a justice before noon of the next day. When you read clause 438 and get down to 2 (a) you find this:

Where a justice is available within a period of 24 hours—

Where a justice is available he shall be brought before him within a period of 24 hours. I wonder just what this question of availability means. Of course the minister can refer us to some actual situation which may exist in the Northwest Territories or somewhere in Baffin Land where a justice of the peace may be several hundred miles away, though even there probably the police officer has that power. I am not worrying about that; I am concerned about this clause which has abrogated the old law which says that he must be brought before the justice before noon the next day. It now says that where a justice is available he shall be brought before him within a period of 24 hours.

I think (b) is worse. It says:

Where a justice is not available within a period of 24 hours after the person has been delivered to or has been arrested by the peace officer, the person shall be taken before a justice as soon as possible.

Who is going to determine the "as soon as possible", Mr. Chairman, and just what does that phrase mean? We are dealing now with the liberty of the subject. We are amending a law which has been definite and conclusive heretofore as to timing. You will notice, Mr. Chairman, that the part we have before us, part XIV, has a subtitle which says "Arrest without warrant". This is not a case where you have laid an information, where you have arrested a man on a warrant pursuant to that information. This is a matter of an arrest without warrant; yet you have these, I suggest, rather vague provisions of either "if he is available" or "if he is not available". I have had some experience in trying to get people out on bail and the justice was not available because he had gone fishing. I wonder whether he is entitled to a 24-hour fishing trip, a 48-hour fishing trip or a 72-hour fishing trip?

Mr. Harris: That is in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Nowlan: That is in Nova Scotia, but probably the same thing would apply in Ontario and British Columbia. I think our administration of justice will compare very favourably with any; in fact it is better than most. I am not going to take that from the minister. And the fishing is just as good as anywhere else, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Knowles: Don't involve the chairman.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not. The thing is obvious. There is no point in labouring it. I simply raise the question with the minister. I can understand that there are technical difficulties. As I said, I have seen cases when the justice was away on a fishing trip. I can imagine a man being arrested somewhere in the woods where you could not bring him before a justice within 24 hours or by noon the next day. When you are dealing with a clause which authorizes an arrest without warrant, which in itself is quite an infringement of human liberty, one which we all realize is attended with risk and one which should be guarded very carefully, you should be very careful.

I want to ask the minister as to the necessity for these changes, and to say without prejudging the matter that unless he can submit a very substantial reason then I strongly protest against them.

Mr. Garson: First I think I should clear up one point made by my hon. friend. He said that under the code as it now stands—

Mr. Nowlan: Section 652.

Mr. Garson: —it is necessary for the person so apprehended to be brought before a justice before noon of the following day. The impression I got from my hon. friend's remarks, and if I am wrong I hope he will correct me, was that it applied to all persons who were arrested without a warrant. But that is not so. Section 652 is confined to one rather unusual offence. It states:

Any peace officer may, without a warrant, take into custody any person whom he finds lying or loitering in any highway, yard or other place during the night, and whom he has good cause to suspect of having committed or being about to commit, any indictable offence, and may detain such person until he can be brought before a justice to be dealt with according to law.

In other words he can detain such a person until he can be brought before a justice before noon of the following day. Besides the one offence under the present section 652 there are scores of other offences under the present code for which a person may be arrested without a warrant if he is found committing such offences. If a person is thus arrested he must be brought before a magistrate only within a reasonable time.

When my hon. friend makes the suggestion that the clause we are discussing here introduces a great change in law, his suggestion is quite without foundation. Section 652 is of extremely limited application.

As a matter of fact the first draft of Bill No. 7 contained the same sort of general provision with regard to bringing an accused before a magistrate within a reasonable time that was in the existing code, and without the saving clauses to which my hon. friend is now objecting.

Those hon. members who served on the House of Commons committee will remember that the particular point my hon. friend from Digby-Annapolis-Kings is now labouring was discussed at great length before that committee, with this difference; that the House of Commons committee had a genuine case to discuss because as the section was originally presented it referred to persons arrested without a warrant and there were none of the protective provisions we have here now. There was then no time specified within which the accused must be brought before a justice. It was the Commons committee which suggested this redrafting; and the principal effect of the alteration is that where a justice is available the accused must be brought before him within 24 hours. If the arrest takes place in some remote area and a justice is not available, then it would be an obvious absurdity to say that he must be brought before a justice within 24 hours, because there would be no justice to bring him before. In that case it is provided that he must be brought before a justice as soon as possible.

My hon. friend, as a lawyer, should not raise the question as to what "as soon as possible" means. It means what it says, namely that he should be brought before the nearest justice as soon as it is possible to do so, which is a question of fact. After extensive discussion in committee this provision was put in to meet the very point which my hon. friend has raised; and I believe, upon reflection, he will agree that it meets the point pretty well.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, apparently I made the fatal mistake of assuming that this code had been properly drafted. The minister now tells me that this matter has no reference to section 652 whatsoever, yet the explanatory section of the code opposite clause 438 states: "Section 652 (in part) and new in part." If section 652 has nothing to do with it, as the minister claims, why was this explanatory note put in? I believe there has been some very bad draftsmanship here and—

Mr. Garson: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I did not suggest that section 652 had nothing to do with this matter. What I said was that my hon. friend's claim that section 652 provided that the accused be brought before a magistrate by noon of the following day and applied to all offences was incorrect, and that actually it applied only to one exceptional offence seldom encountered.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 439 and 440 agreed to.

On clause 441—Summons.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I would like the minister to comment on paragraph 3 of this clause, as to the purpose behind the regulation under which summonses may be served not directly on a person but left at their place of abode. I know that is very convenient for the person who has to serve the summons and who cannot locate the person to whom it is addressed. But it can also be very inconvenient for the person concerned if he does not receive that summons and learns nothing about it. Although he may not know anything about it and therefore does not answer the summons, a warrant may be issued for his arrest.

I know this very often occurs. As a matter of fact I had a rather unfortunate experience myself in this regard about two years ago. I arrived home one evening, to be told by my wife that there was a summons for me on my desk. I went to look for that summons and it had disappeared. Somehow or other it had been destroyed. I had not the faintest idea why I should receive a summons or where it could possibly come from, and it took me hours to find out. It so happened that it was a summons for jury duty, but it could have been something else and if I had not answered there would have been a warrant issued for my arrest. Why are summonses handled in this fashion?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, this particular provision has been in the code for a long time and there has been no change made in the law by Bill No. 7. The words in this clause are the same as the words in the existing code. As to the point raised about serving a summons upon some irresponsible person, or as to the circumstances under which a summons can be served, it was held in the case of re Musial, 51 C.C.C., that the service on a person other than the accused is permitted only if the accused "cannot be conveniently met with". This accordingly must be established before that type of service will be accepted. The mere proof that the accused was away from home when the constable called will not be sufficient to justify this substitutional service, as it is called, which cannot be used unless there has been a foundation established for its use.

If my hon. friend from Vancouver East were the gentleman in question, the mere fact that he did not happen to be home at that time in itself would not be sufficient foundation for serving the summons upon someone else in his household. If on the other hand it was left with some person in the household at least 16 years of age, after the peace officer had made other attempts to serve my hon. friend personally, and it could be shown that he could not conveniently be found within the meaning of clause 442 (3), then that substitutional service would be sufficient.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, according to paragraph 3 of this clause if a person is not home when a summons is served it can be left with a person who appears to be at least 16 years of age. I would like to know whether there is an obligation upon the person with whom that summons is left to serve that summons, and if he does not do so whether he is liable under this clause?

Mr. Garson: I do not think he or she would be liable. In most cases substitutional service works quite satisfactorily. The fact that so many of those who were involved in the drafting had a great deal of experience in criminal law administration—some of them on the prosecuting side, it is true—and that they adopted the existing provision that had served for so many years, I think indicates that the existing provision must have appeared to them to have been reasonably workable or they would have made some change in it.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 442 to 444 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 445—Execution of warrant.

Mr. Knowles: Whenever anyone rises with a question as to why a clause is worded in a certain way, if there has been no change the minister tells us that those who went into the matter must have been satisfied that it was all right. I would be interested in hearing what the minister has to say when a change is pointed out. I believe that a change has been made here. Formerly there was a reference to a seven-mile limit. Now that limit has been extended from coast to coast. Will the minister comment and explain?

Mr. Garson: Section 661—that is the existing section—authorizes an arrest, in the case of fresh pursuit, at any place in an adjoining territorial division that is within seven miles of the boundary of the territorial division in which the warrant was issued. This is changed in the bill.

Mr. Knowles: That is what I pointed out.

Mr. Garson: It is to permit arrest, in the case of fresh pursuit, at any place in Canada, in view of the present much speedier means of transportation as compared with what they had in the early days.

Mr. Nowlan: There is one other point I should like to have clarified. It was probably covered in the committee, but I was wondering whether the minister would explain the fact that the subsection of the existing section dealing with arrest on Sundays and on holidays has been dropped. As I understand it there are statutory provisions which the present code recognizes—it is subsection 3 of the section, as a matter of fact—by saying that any arrest may be made on a Sunday or holiday. It says:

> Every warrant authorized by this act may be issued and executed on a Sunday or statutory holiday.

That subsection is dropped from this section. I was wondering whether the dropping of it was owing to judicial decisions?

Mr. Garson: No. It is in another part of the bill. If my hon. friend will look at clause 20, in the earlier part of the bill, he will see it.

Mr. Nowlan: I understand.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have one further question on this clause. The minister mentioned that, as the result of modern transportation facilities, this provision was extended from the seven miles to anywhere in Canada, on fresh pursuit. As to this question of fresh pursuit would the minister care to comment on how far that would go? Would it mean that the constable referred to could have a rest overnight or something of that nature?

Mr. Garson: I should not like to attempt to answer a question of that sort in the abstract. I think the facts of any particular case that arose would have to be examined in order to see whether it could be maintained that these facts constituted fresh pursuit. But I have in my notes, under this subsection, reference to a recent case in which the actual fresh pursuit covered three provinces. It started out in Swan River in northern Manitoba and went to Banff, Alberta, and the pursuit was fresh all the way. I suppose it might just as well have gone to Vancouver or, if it had started in the other direction, clean to the Atlantic ocean. Under modern conditions that is not at all impossible. If we continued to limit it to the seven miles, under modern conditions it would be quite an anachronism.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 446—Procedure to procure attendance of a prisoner.

Mr. Knowles: Although the notes on the righthand page do not suggest that there is anything new in this clause, I believe there is something new in subclause 2. If that is correct, will the minister explain?

Mr. Garson: I wonder if my hon. friend would allow that matter to stand.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 446 stand?

Mr. Garson: Clause 446, subsection 2 stands.

Clauses 447 to 450 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 451—Powers of justice.

Mr. Knowles: In clause 451 is there anything that bears on the reference of the question of insanity to a commission? I believe that paragraph (b) down the page a bit is new.

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes; paragraph (b) is new. The only reference there that might possibly come under the royal commission that has been set up would be paragraph (a) which provides that a justice may remand an accused when in his opinion "the accused is mentally ill."

Clause agreed to.

On clause 452—Corporation.

Mr. Knowles: Clause 452 is new. It is a brief one and I might read it. It states as follows:

> Where an accused is a corporation, subsections (1) and (2) of section 470 apply, mutatis mutandis.

Can the minister explain the effect of this new clause?

Mr. Garson: It is legislation by reference. Section 452 refers to subsections 1 and 2 of section 470. If my hon. friend will turn to page 163 he will find that subsection 1 of section 470 reads as follows:

> An accused that is a corporation shall appear by its counsel or agent.

And subsection 2 reads as follows:

> Where an accused corporation does not appear pursuant to a summons and service of the summons upon the corporation in accordance with subsection (4) of section 441 is proved, the magistrate
> (a) may, if the charge is one over which he has absolute jurisdiction, proceed with the trial of the charge in the absence of the accused corporation and
> (b) shall, if the charge is not one over which he has absolute jurisdiction, hold a preliminary inquiry in accordance with part XV.

All that section 452 does is make those two subsections of section 470 applicable to preliminary inquiries under this part that is under discussion.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 453—Taking evidence of witnesses.

Mr. Lusby: There is one little point on which I should like to ask the minister a question. Is there in the existing code or in the draft any provision whereby a witness who has given his evidence which has been taken down by way of a deposition—that is by the magistrate in writing—is required to sign it if he does not wish to do so?

Mr. Garson: As to the witness himself signing it?

Mr. Lusby: Yes; where the magistrate has taken it down in his own handwriting, not by way of stenographic transcription. It is provided here that he shall cause the deposition to be read to the witness and shall cause the deposition to be signed by the witness. Suppose the witness refuses to sign it. What happens then?

Mr. Garson: I do not think I have ever heard of a witness having refused to sign in a case of that sort.

Mr. Lusby: It seems to me that some years ago I had a case where the witness would not sign it, even though the magistrate offered to make any corrections that the witness said should be made. He just did not wish to sign it. My recollection is that there was no way by which he could be compelled to sign it.

Mr. Garson: I must say I am rather nonplussed to know what the justice would do in those circumstances, but I suppose if the witness absolutely and resolutely refused to sign, the only course open to the justice under such circumstances would be to make and sign a statement himself certifying to the fact that the witness refused to sign it.

Mr. Lusby: I think that was about what was done in the case I was thinking of.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 454 to 456 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 457—Witness refusing to be examined.

Mr. Winch: Is there any protection under this clause for a witness who refuses to give evidence because by so doing he may be implicating himself?

Mr. Garson: No. That comes under another law, the Canada Evidence Act. This is just a straight case of the witness obdurately refusing to testify. There is no change here. This is the existing law.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 458 to 464 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 465—Judge of superior court may vary.

Mr. Knowles: I believe subclause 2 of 465 is new. Would the minister explain the significance of this addition?

Mr. Garson: Subclause 2 reads:

No application shall be made by way of habeas corpus for the purpose of fixing, reviewing or varying bail.

The purpose of this provision to which my hon. friend refers is to provide a simple method for obtaining bail in the certain cases to which it has reference, and it does away with the necessity of applying for habeas corpus. But for this section that would be necessary. The effect of the section is to simplify the obtaining of the bail without the necessity of securing a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. Knowles: I was confused when I read it, and I am more confused now. The minister says it does away with the necessity, but as my legal counsel to the right are pointing out it does away with the possibility of applying for this under habeas corpus.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend must read the section as a whole. Is it not perfectly clear?

Mr. Knowles: I did, and I listened to the minister.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member asked me a question on subsection 2 and I gave him an answer to his question. The clause reads from the beginning:

(1) A judge of, or a judge presiding in a superior court of criminal jurisdiction may, upon application—

In this connection there is no writ of habeas corpus or anything like that.

—(a) before an accused is committed for trial,

(i) admit the accused to bail if a justice has no power to grant bail or if bail has been refused by a justice, or

(ii) vary the amount of bail fixed by a justice, or

(b) where an accused is committed for trial, vary an order for bail fixed under subsection 3 of section 463 by a judge of a county or district court or a magistrate.

That is what he may do. Then subsection 2 goes on to provide:

(2) No application shall be made by way of habeas corpus for the purpose of fixing, reviewing or varying bail.

In other words, an accused or his counsel no longer has to go through the form of applying for a writ of habeas corpus before a judge in order to get an order for bail.

Mr. Fulton: Is the effect of this possibly to do away with the second chance which a prisoner might otherwise have had? I do not know, but—

Mr. Garson: That comes under the habeas corpus sections in another part of the code.

Mr. Fulton: Let me put the point. Suppose a person applies for bail or an application is made on his behalf by his counsel and the judge acts without jurisdiction in refusing bail, or there is some error made. Perhaps it is a technical error in the application itself, and bail is refused. Would it then be possible for the applicant to have a second go at it by way of habeas corpus, and is that right now being taken away from him? I am asking a question to which I do not know the answer. Is it possible that a right of appeal or second chance is being taken away?

Mr. Garson: I think what my hon. friend has in mind—I hope he will correct me if I am wrong—is the practice under the existing code whereby an accused may make an application for a writ of habeas corpus to a judge of a superior court, and if turned down may go and make another application to another judge. If he is turned down by him he may make a third or fourth application until he has exhausted the whole bench of judges. Quite seriously, that is within his privilege. That is a different provision altogether from this one we are discussing. We shall come to that in due course. The provision now before us has to do with the fixing of bail without the necessity for an accompanying habeas corpus application.

Mr. Ellis: As a matter of information with respect to the whole process of granting bail, what is the general method by which the amount of bail is set? What I have in mind is that we believe in the principle of equality before the law, and I am wondering whether the minister has considered the fact that an accused in one case may have a certain bail set which to him may not seem a large amount of money, whereas in another similar case the same amount of bail would be almost prohibitive. What powers does a judge have with respect to varying the amount of bail in order to make some provision for the principle of equality before the law?

Mr. Garson: As I understand the practice of applying for and securing a bail order, it is that counsel for the accused would make an application under the clause we are now considering, of course after it is passed. The nature of the offence with which the accused is charged would be disclosed to the court, and the accused's counsel would urge the judge to admit his client to bail of so much. Perhaps crown counsel might agree with that sum. In many cases they do. But if the offence was a particularly serious one crown counsel might oppose the amount suggested by the accused's counsel, and then as between the two contending viewpoints the judge, exercising his judicial discretion in the matter, would have to make up his mind as to what he thought was a fair amount at which to set bail under all the circumstances, one of which could be the accused's financial resources.

Mr. Ellis: That was the point I had in mind.

This was the policy followed in the case of the national defence buildings at Carling Heights, Wolseley barracks, London, Ontario.

Questions

CANADIAN INDUSTRIAL PREPAREDNESS ASSOCIATION

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

Who are the members of the Canadian industrial preparedness association?

Mr. Dickey: If I may, I should like to answer this question orally. It relates to the Canadian industrial preparedness association. This association is a private organization, and the government is not in a position to provide the names of its members. However, the Department of Defence Production has been advised by the association that its current membership includes 284 firms and 58 individuals.

This organization was formed in 1947 by a group of individuals most of whom had been on loan from industry to the department of munitions and supply during the last war. It received letters patent in November, 1947.

The association directly, and through its individual industry committees advises the department on technical and other matters.

ARMED FORCES—ENLISTMENTS AND DISCHARGES

Mr. Harkness:

What were the number of enlistments and discharges for the Royal Canadian Navy, Royal Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force for each month during the year 1953?

Mr. Blanchette:

	Navy		Army		R.C.A.F.
	Enrol.	Releases	Enrol.	Releases	Enrol.	Releases
January 1953. . . .	297	128	1,006	764	1,102	304
February 1953. . .	350	176	908	708	976	319
March 1953. . . .	325	164	827	672	958	403
April 1953.	253	158	624	484	680	320
May 1953.	237	203	508	489	588	430
June 1953.	221	185	509	337	606	440
July 1953.	201	122	520	370	717	361
August 1953. . . .	336	138	507	588	695	447
September 1953. . .	289	138	585	715	862	496
October 1953. . . .	249	141	710	674	866	445
November 1953. . .	302	206	961	513	934	435
December 1953. . .	240	160	1,182	502	803	421
Total.	3,300	1,919	8,847	6,816	9,787	4,821

The present expansion of the Canadian armed forces has been in progress for just over three years and will continue until target strengths have been reached. As the minimum term of enlistment for men in both the army and the air force is three years, fairly substantial numbers of men will continue to become eligible for release. Moreover, as the armed forces approach maximum strength, figures for releases will tend more and more to approximate those for enrolments until enrolments and releases are actually in balance.

ARMED FORCES—OFFICERS COMMISSIONED AND DISCHARGED

Mr. Pearkes:

1. How many officers have been commissioned in the Royal Canadian Navy, active force, during the past year?

[Mr. Dickey.]

4. How many officers have been discharged, or have been permitted to retire, during the past year from each of the following services: (a) Royal Canadian Navy, active force; (b) Canadian army, active force; (c) Royal Canadian Air Force?

Mr. Blanchette:

The following figures are for the calendar year 1953 and include officer cadets.

1. 348.

2. 515.

3. 1,355.

4. (a) 93; (b) 243; (c) 359*.

*This figure does not include cease training releases as it is not the practice in either the United Kingdom, the United States or Canada to make public cease training figures for aircrew.

2. The purchase was negotiated through the services of the agent of the Minister of Justice, appointed by him to act on behalf of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The purchase is being made from Lloyd E. Inman at a total cost of $25,000.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—RIFLES TESTED

Mr. Churchill:

What rifles or weapons, other than the Belgian FN and the British EM2, have been examined and tested by the Department of National Defence as possible substitutes for the Lee-Enfield?

Mr. Blanchette:

The Department of National Defence has either tested, or has participated in and has full data on, tests of the M1 (Garand) rifle, the T44 and the T47, all of which were designed in the United States of America.

RUSSIA AND CANADA—DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Fulton:

1. How many diplomatic representatives and and members of staff does Canada maintain in Russia, including military, etc., attachés?

2. What are the restrictions on their freedom of movement and freedom of access to sources of information in Russia?

Questions

3. How many diplomatic representatives and members of staff does Russia maintain in Canada, including military, etc., attachés?

4. What are the restrictions on their freedom of movement and freedom of access to sources of information in Canada?

Mr. Pinard:

1. Diplomatic representatives: Ambassador; Two foreign service officers; Military attaché; Air attaché.

Administrative staff: Five (four external affairs, one national defence).

Locally engaged staff: Nine.

2. The Canadian embassy is required to notify the Soviet foreign ministry in advance, in writing, of any trip to be taken by a Canadian member of the staff beyond a 40 kilometre radius from Moscow. In addition to this general requirement of notification, there are still substantial areas of the U.S.S.R. which foreigners are not allowed to visit at all. These areas include most border zones of the U.S.S.R., much of the Ural industrial area, the western area of the Ukraine, and some districts in the immediate vicinity of Moscow.

The total out of bounds area, although still large, is very much smaller than it was before June, 1953, when the number of prohibitions was greatly reduced. For example, foreigners may now visit many parts of the central Asian republics of the U.S.S.R. which were prohibited territory before June, 1953.

The Canadian embassy has access to those sources of information which are available to the general public, and the opportunity for discussions with Soviet officials.

3. Fifteen diplomatic representatives and fifteen non-diplomatic members of the staff.

4. The Soviet embassy must notify the Canadian government of any trip more than 75 miles from the city limits of Ottawa to be taken by any Soviet personnel connected with the embassy. This notification must be received by the Department of External Affairs (or the Department of National Defence in the case of trips by service attachés) at least 48 hours before the proposed time of departure from Ottawa. The notification is submitted on a special form calling for full details of the proposed trip.

The Soviet embassy has access to those sources of information which are available to the general public, and the opportunity for discussions with Canadian officials.

GRAIN MARKETINGS BY PRODUCERS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many bushels of (a) wheat; (b) oats; (c) barley, were marketed by producers in the prairie provinces through line elevators or through other facilities of the wheat board, in each of the months of June and July and the first nine days of August, in each of the years 1951, 1952 and 1953?

Mr. Dickey: Producers' marketings of grain are compiled on a weekly basis by the board of grain commissioners for Canada. According to the records of the board, and for the periods of time that most closely correspond with the periods referred to in the question, producers marketed the following quantities of wheat, oats and barley:

RUSSIA AND CANADA—TRADE REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Fulton:

1. How many trade representatives does Canada maintain in Russia, including Canadian members of staff?

2. What are the restrictions on their freedom of movement and freedom of access to sources of information in Russia?

3. How many trade representatives does Russia maintain in Canada, including Russian members of staff?

4. What are the restrictions on their freedom of movement and freedom of access to sources of information in Canada?

Mr. Pinard:

1. None.

2. Not applicable.

3. None. However, one of the clerical staff members of the Soviet embassy is described as clerk of the commercial counsellor's office, although at present there is no commercial counsellor.

4. Not applicable.

2. If so, (a) what types of aircraft were employed and how many hours on each type; (b) what departments and how many passengers, pounds of cargo and pounds of mail were carried for each department?

3. During 1953, did the Royal Canadian Air Force engage in any flying within Canada except for the Department of National Defence or other government departments?

4. If so, (a) for whom; (b) what types of aircraft were employed, and how many hours on each type; (c) how many passengers and pounds of cargo were carried in each case?

5. Was any remuneration received for such flying?

6. If so, (a) from whom and how much in each case; (b) what was the rate charged per mile, per nour or per ton mile?

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMMUNIST PUBLICATIONS

Mr. Hansell:

1. Does the government consider there are any publications in Canada which are communist, or follow the communist line?
2. If so, how many are there?
3. What is the name of each, and what is the address of each one published?

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN WEDGE CAP INSIGNIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, some days ago I was asked by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) a question regarding the cap badge in use in certain headgear of the R.C.A.F. I should now like to reply to that question.

There are five designs of cap badge in use in the R.C.A.F.—one for officers of air rank, two for other officers and first-class warrant officers, and two for other personnel.

The cap badges for officers and W.O.1's are a crown, eagle and laurels for use on general service caps and a brass crown and eagle for use on field service—that is, wedge-caps. Subject to minor changes in design and material, these remain the same as they have been since before the second world war.

For other personnel the badge on general service caps continues to be the initials of the R.C.A.F. in the centre of a laurel wreath, surmounted by a small crown. On the field service—that is wedge-cap—and the winter cap the badge is an eagle.

The recent interest in R.C.A.F. cap badges relates solely to the badge on the field service —that is wedge-cap. It may be observed that, in addition to this badge which is an eagle, there are two small brass buttons on the front of this cap which display a crown, an eagle and the letters "R.C.A.F."

The eagle was introduced for use on these two types of caps because the badge with the initials "R.C.A.F." in the laurel wreath was considered too large and too heavy in appearance for use on these caps.

The new badge was differentiated from that of the officers and W.O.1's, as has been the practice in the R.C.A.F. since 1925. Cap badges for officers and men are also different in the R.A.F., R.A.A.F., R.N.Z.A.F., R.C.N. and R.N. The badge in question was introduced by revised dress orders of the R.C.A.F. which were approved on July 7, 1952, on the authority of the chief of air staff, as provided for by paragraph 36.01 of Queen's regulations and orders for the air force. Though the revised dress orders for the R.C.A.F. were adopted in 1952, the badge only came into general use on this type of headgear early in 1953.

There is, of course, nothing in the suggestion that this in any way affects the traditions or sentimental associations of the R.C.A.F.

The eagle is generally in use by the air forces of many nations. All members of the R.C.A.F. wear the crown, the eagle and the initials R.C.A.F. on all buttons on their jackets and caps. All members of the R.C.A.F. wear the word "Canada" on their shoulders.

As has been stated, a particular type of badge was adopted by the R.C.A.F. for use by certain personnel on two out of several types of headgear. The change was made by the chief of staff and the other air members, acting within the authority given to them, and it would appear that they are the people who could be relied on to do nothing which would adversely affect the traditions or sentimental attachment of their own service in which they had spent many years of their lives.

Mr. Ferguson: Can any branch of the services on orders from the head of the particular branch—for example, the chief of the air staff—design and approve of a badge with a crown upon it without the consent of Her Majesty?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Ferguson: May I ask a supplementary question? When such a badge is approved, can it be discarded without the approval of Her Majesty?

Mr. Claxton: I think the position regarding that is rather obscure, but I believe that could be done. However, that was not done in this case. A new badge was approved in accordance with the authority, which did not have a crown and which did not require the sovereign's consent.

Mr. Ferguson: According to the minister, approval was received for the crown and then the badge was changed.

Mr. Claxton: I never said that.

Mr. Ferguson: I want to ask this question. Was it changed with the approval of Her Majesty?

Mr. Claxton: I did not say this badge was approved by Her Majesty or by the crown. A badge which had been in use in the R.A.F. was adopted by the R.C.A.F. about 1923, and no approval was then considered necessary or was obtained. In addition to that badge, a new badge without the crown was adopted by the air force in 1952. No approval was necessary.

Mr. Ferguson: The minister apparently misunderstood one of my questions. I asked him if a badge with the crown on it could be used without the approval of Her Majesty. His answer was no, that it could not be used without the approval of Her Majesty. It was a straight question and a straight answer. Having given the answer that the badge could not be used without Her Majesty's authority or that of the reigning sovereign of the country at the time, the minister now says that approval was not received for that badge and it was changed. One of his answers must be wrong. I will ask the question again. Was permission received to use a badge with the crown on it? Was approval received from Her Majesty?

Mr. Claxton: Approval, Mr. Speaker, I would assume was given to the Royal Canadian Air Force for the use of a practically identical badge by the Royal Air Force. When the R.C.A.F. came into existence in 1923 I am informed that with the consent of the Royal Air Force its badge was adopted for use in Canada with the additional insertion of the initial "C". That has remained the situation. In 1928 an order in council was passed requiring the armed forces to secure approval of badges using the crown.

Mr. Dinsdale: Is the bird on the new badge an eagle, an albatross or an "albatreagle"?

Mr. Claxton: Oh, unquestionably an eagle.

Mr. Drew: I think the Minister of National Defence does need to clear up one point. Is it not correct that permission to use any badge with the crown is obtained not from a corresponding branch of the services in the United Kingdom but from the sovereign or representative of the sovereign? Surely the minister is not suggesting that the Royal Canadian Air Force, the Canadian artillery or any other branch of the services obtained permission from a corresponding branch of the services of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Claxton: I think I have already dealt with this matter. Whatever was done in approving a badge was done in 1923. A very careful search has been made of the records, and so far as we on this side of the Atlantic can ascertain the matter was handled in the way I have described. Whether or not that was right is another question, but that is the way it was dealt with.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, there is—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I have perhaps given more latitude than I am accustomed to because I hoped that by doing so this subject might be cleared up once and for all. However, it appears that hon. members wish to continue asking supplementary questions requiring long supplementary answers. I am afraid we will get into a position where other members who have questions on other subjects may not have a chance to ask them. I think we have had sufficient questions and answers on this subject, and I would ask the hon. members to let others carry on who have other questions on other subjects.

Mr. Ferguson: May I just say this—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ferguson: May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence? Now that a grave mistake has been discovered and the minister is aware of it, in the removal of the cap badge, will the old cap badge be restored?

Mr. Claxton: That is the kind of thing about which an announcement is made if and when it is done.

POST OFFICE

LETTER CARRIERS—CHANGE IN BASIS FOR ANNUAL HOLIDAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General, supplementary to a question I asked him on the orders of the day on March 1. Have protests now been received from letter carriers' associations against the Post Office Department's order of February 26 altering the long standing practice of the annual holidays of letter carriers being arranged strictly on the basis of seniority? Will this order—I refer to circular order No. 299D—be reviewed in the light of these protests?

Mr. Speaker: It would seem to me this question could be answered if it were put on the order paper. I think it should be.

Mr. Knowles: I believe there is an element of time in this matter because—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: —when the order was posted in the post offices employees were given a limited length of time in which to apply for the positions involved in this whole question.

I think it is of sufficient urgency to those concerned that the Postmaster General should be permitted to answer the question.

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I just received notice of the question my hon. friend has asked a few seconds ago. We have received some protests. I do not know what has been the result of the consideration given the question in the meetings held in the department with my officials, but I will be glad to look into the matter. I may say immediately to my hon. friend that the whole question has been given careful consideration in the best interests of the carriers' associations as well as the public.

An hon. Member: They do not think so.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RECOGNITION OF RED CHINA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he is prepared to make a statement today as to the words used by the Prime Minister, to which reference has already been made.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The statement to which my hon. friend refers was reported in the press the other day as being made by the Prime Minister in landing in Korea. It was in reply to a question addressed to him by representatives of the press when he landed. There was no text, so there is no formal record of what he said. The press reports of what he said on that occasion differ, and therefore we have been getting in touch with the Prime Minister to ascertain, if possible, the facts about what he said on this occasion.

The Prime Minister has stated that, as accurately as he can recollect, and this corresponds with notes that were taken at the time, the immediate recognition of the communist government of China, as a government which had been committing aggression against the United Nations, was not under consideration. The Prime Minister then went on to state that, however, it was necessary to be realistic in regard to this matter and that no doubt in due course we would have to recognize any government of China which the Chinese people themselves recognized as their government, regardless of whether we liked the government or not. He added that if there was to be any solution to problems in which China was directly involved, and which could not be settled without co-operation from the Chinese government in control of that country, it seemed clear we would have to deal with that government. That, concluded the Prime Minister, was merely common sense and did not mean in any way the acceptance of responsibility for or the giving of endorsation to the actions or views of any particular regime.

Mr. Drew: I would point out—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Ferguson: The crows are back with us again.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I presume the Leader of the Opposition is merely prefacing his question by a few words, and he will not debate the answer of the minister.

Mr. Drew: That is precisely what I am doing. I had just started to say I would point out that the press report by a very reliable reporter chosen by the government used the words, "that we would be bound to recognize the government that the people want." Those words are a travesty of the facts. I think we should know whether words that conveyed that meaning were used.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Pearson: In the first place, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Press would be interested to know that their representative was a man chosen by the government to accompany the Prime Minister on his trip. He was not chosen by the government, nor did he represent the government. The words to which my hon. friend refers were in another reported statement made by the Prime Minister on arriving at the Philippines, and I am not questioning the accuracy of that particular report. As my hon. friend has stated, it was to the effect that sooner or later we are bound to recognize the government that the people want in China. Of course, Mr. Speaker, we do not know whether the people of China now have the government they want, because it is a communist government and a communist government, or indeed any totalitarian government, does not give the people an opportunity to express their views freely on the form of government they have.

Mr. Coldwell: Nor does Franco in Spain.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Since the Prime Minister will be home on March 17, would it not be wise to allow him to answer this question on that date?

[Later:]

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege and with no desire in any way to extend the debate, may I say that I recognize that one of the comments I made might be open to misinterpretation. When I spoke of a very reliable reporter chosen by the government I should have used the words, "a very reliable reporter representing the agency chosen by the government".

PRIVILEGE

MR. NESBITT—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF REMARKS IN DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, concerning remarks made by me on February 25 last, reported on page 2547 of Hansard for that date, I am informed that I have been somewhat misquoted by a Canadian Press dispatch which stated I had said there should be a minimum penalty of three months for impaired driving. That was not what I said at all. I would have brought this matter to your attention sooner, but I was not aware of the situation until informed by a letter.

WHEAT

REPORTED SHIPMENT TO SPAIN BY UNITED STATES —ATTITUDE OF WHEAT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with a dispatch from the United States to the effect that that government is endeavouring to dispose of some $20 million worth of wheat to Spain by providing funds for defence projects. In addition to that, in order to secure markets the United States government has under consideration the selling of surplus farm products to other countries in return for local currencies. Would the minister be able to say what attitude the Canadian wheat board is taking against this apparently strong competition, and what stand is going to be taken in connection with securing markets for wheat?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I find it difficult to reply to extracts from newspapers. The United States has a billion dollars allocated for the purpose of disposing of surplus products. To date, whenever wheat or barley or any of the staples have been concerned, the United States has communicated with Canada and asked our views before undertaking the disposal operations. I think we have only discussed two projects with them, one for Formosa and another for Yugoslavia. In both cases we took the view a gift of wheat was a proper use of such funds.

We have had no communication from the United States regarding Spain or any other country. I should not say any other country because we are discussing transactions with one or two other countries, but I can say that to date no disposal of wheat agreements have been made by the United States without prior consultation with Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Following up what the minister has said, has there been any consultation by the United States concerning this potential transaction with Spain? Also, will the minister say whether Canada is giving consideration to selling Canadian wheat for local currencies in a manner similar to that suggested in the United States?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I said in my earlier statement, Mr. Speaker, there has been no consultation concerning wheat for Spain. With regard to the second part of the question, the answer is no.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Will the minister please indicate how soon he intends to take action on the motion standing on the order paper in connection with setting up the committee on veterans affairs?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The motion has been on the order paper for some time, Mr. Speaker. When I first introduced legislation in the house, I told the house there would be further legislation pertaining to veterans affairs that would be introduced during the course of this session.

I have held the motion on the order paper until this further legislation was brought before the house. It is also my understanding that many of the members who have been chosen by their respective parties to sit on the special committee on veterans affairs are also sitting on the banking and commerce committee, which is very busy these days. I hope that it will be possible to wait until the work of the banking and commerce committee is finished before we begin our work. However, I would think that at an early date we will set up the committee.

DUMPING

POTATOES—ALLEGED SHIPMENTS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister aware that during the past two weeks there have been upward of 150 carloads of potatoes dumped into the British Columbia market, thereby virtually wiping out the grading and price stabilization controls of the British Columbia marketing board?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I received a copy of the hon. member's question since coming to the chamber. The answer is no, that I am not aware of the condition he has stated. However, I shall look into the matter and ascertain the facts.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, inquiries have been made about the timing of the Easter recess. I wish to advise hon. members that I propose shortly to place a motion before the house suggesting that this year the house stand adjourned from six o'clock p.m. on Wednesday, April 14 next, to 2.30 p.m. on Monday, April 26 next.

As a fair amount of business may yet remain to be dealt with when the house reconvenes after the Easter recess, we have been given to understand that most hon. members, more particularly those whose homes are a considerable distance from Ottawa, would prefer the longer adjournment.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last night we were considering clause 466. Shall the clause carry?

On clause 466—Interpretation.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if the minister would be good enough to say a word to the committee respecting the position of magistrates under this part of the bill. I do not have reference to the problems involved in clauses 467 and 468 which, I understand, are to be allowed to stand, or to any controversy there may be in connection with enlarging the absolute jurisdiction of magistrates. In my inquiry I am referring to the position of magistrates generally, and I have in mind particularly the matter of stipendiary magistrates.

[Mr. Hahn.]

The Chairman: Order. I am sure the minister will be utterly unable to hear what is being said unless hon. members will observe silence.

Mr. Fulton: I have a pretty loud voice but I doubt if it could compete with the conversation going on in the chamber.

I notice that in the definition section of this part there is no reference to stipendiary magistrates. I also note that in many provinces a former practice, under which the remuneration of magistrates was dependent upon the imposition and collection of fines, has been eliminated. I understand however that there are still some jurisdictions in which that practice prevails.

I realize that this is a matter for the determination of the provinces, because they appoint the magistrates. Where the practice has been abolished, it has been done by provincial statute. But as the federal parliament has an interest in the administration of criminal justice, although no responsibility for it, I wonder if the minister would tell us to what extent the practice of remunerating magistrates through the imposition and collection of fines has been eliminated, and what steps are being taken toward the complete elimination of that practice.

Mr. Garson: As my hon. friend has correctly stated, the appointment of magistrates is entirely a provincial function, with which we have to be careful not to interfere. I think we have gone as far as we can go in meeting the point he has now raised, through the definition of "magistrate" as it appears in this part under clause 466 (b). In this clause a magistrate means—

A person appointed under the law of a province, by whatever title he may be designated—

That is, whether it be a stipendiary magistrate, or whatever title he may have.

—who is specially authorized by the terms of his appointment to exercise the jurisdiction conferred upon a magistrate by this part but does not include two or more justices of the peace sitting together.

I think my hon. friend would agree that that is about as far as we can go in our law in directing a province as to the kind of magistrate it should appoint to discharge the jurisdiction under this part. There is a very clear intimation in the clause that he has to be specially authorized, under the terms of his provincial appointment, to exercise the jurisdiction conferred by this part.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the effect of the provision, and I am sure it is one everyone welcomes. But would the minister indicate whether there are any conditions, conversations or representations being made, or that have been held, which might encourage the hope that it will have the effect it is hoped it will have.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, as my hon. friend is aware, all the provisions in the code now before the committee, which in any way involve provincial jurisdiction, were submitted to and approved by the provinces. By implication, I believe they undertook to appoint persons who would be competent to discharge these responsibilities.

Mr. Fulton: That might be called a leading answer. Then, it will be no longer necessary to make a division between cities of 25,000 population and those having less than 25,000, and towns with 5,000 population, and so on? It will be up to the provinces to appoint magistrates as rapidly as they can, no matter what the population of a city or territory might be, for the purpose of exercising the jurisdiction set out here?

Mr. Garson: That is right. And some provinces have already done this.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 467—Absolute jurisdiction.

Mr. Knowles: I realize that while this government has been in power there has been a quite marked degree of inflation. I suppose inevitably that would reflect itself even in the Criminal Code. I still wonder whether it was really expedient to raise the ceiling from $25 as it was before to $50 as it is set out in line 11 on page 162. Would the minister care to comment?

Mr. Garson: I think it is entirely reasonable that that should be done. After all, we are here dealing with a code which applied a limit of $25 for many years past, and I should think that upon a test of purchasing value the draftsmen of this code should have gone much higher than the $50 from the $25 level at which this figure formerly stood.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister give us an estimate of what would be the proper amount?

Mr. Knowles: What is the significance of the monetary value referred to in this clause?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at clause 467 paragraph (a) on page 162 of the bill he will see the answer to that question.

Mr. Fulton: I understood that clauses 467 and 468 were to be allowed to stand in the light of the fact that a number of members have some comments and some criticisms to make on these clauses.

Mr. Garson: I have no objection to their standing, but will my hon. friend give us some clue as to why they are being stood in order that we may be able to deal with his points when he makes them on another occasion. There is really not a great deal of difference between these clauses 467 and 468 in the new code, Bill No. 7, and their counterparts in the present code.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister say what the difference is?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That might clear up the trouble.

Mr. Garson: The following are the changes. A magistrate, as has been indicated by the exchange which has just taken place between the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself, will under Bill No. 7 have jurisdiction in all cases of theft where the value of the property is $50 instead of $25; in obtaining or attempting to obtain by false pretences and receiving or retaining property where the value does not exceed $50 instead of $25; and in all cases of receiving or retaining any property obtained by the commission of an indictable offence, instead of only stolen property.

Another change is that the magistrate is given jurisdiction under this present bill in lottery cases. It was considered warranted that this jurisdiction should be given to him because he now has jurisdiction and will continue to have it over gaming and betting houses, bookmaking and pool selling.

Another change is that the magistrate is given jurisdiction over the offence of cheating at play.

Another change in the opposite direction is that the following offences have been excluded from the absolute jurisdiction of magistrates: Indecent assault of males under 14 years; indecent assault on females.

Another change is that the special provisions relating to punishment have been dropped in cases over which a magistrate exercises absolute jurisdiction. This will remove the anomaly of different sentences being imposed for the same offence.

These are changes brought about by clause 467 and I am a bit nonplussed to know why the request is being made to have the clause stand. It would be helpful if my hon. friend could give me some clue as to what the basis for the request is.

Mr. Fulton: If the minister had asked the question when we had the conference on it two nights ago I could have indicated it and saved the time of the committee at this time.

Mr. Garson: That is all right, if my hon. friend does not want to state it now.

Mr. Fulton: I will tell him. Obviously it is the fact that it was being doubled with respect to the monetary value of the articles referred to in subparagraph (a) of clause 467. The other enlargements are very seriously questioned by some of our members who have had considerable experience with proceedings in magistrates' courts. Then, technical questions are to be asked under 468 as to the adequacy of the wording, which I need not enlarge upon here.

Mr. Garson: That is all right.

The Chairman: Clauses 467 and 468 stand.

Clauses 469 to 473 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 474—Duty of judge.

Mr. Knowles: I believe there has been a change in line 33 of this clause. Formerly the time of the trial was to be as soon as possible; whereas now it is changed to read that the judge shall fix the time and place of the trial of the accused. Can the minister state the effective result of that change?

Mr. Garson: There would not be very much difference in effect at all. I would think that the judge to whom application was made to fix the time of the trial would, as they always do, fix it as soon as possible, taking all circumstances in account.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 475 to 480 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 481—Continuance of proceedings when judge or magistrate unable to act.

Mr. Garson: In line 31 of clause 481 there is a typographical error. "Jurisdiction" is spelled improperly. I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, to move that it be changed to the correct spelling. Then, in line 47 the word "respect" should be "respects", plural. I would ask my hon. colleague to move that that change be made.

Mr. Winters: I so move, Mr. Chairman.

Amendments agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 482 to 485 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 486—Prosecutor may prefer indictment.

Mr. Knowles: It has been suggested to me that British Columbia and some other provinces have no grand jury. If that is correct, what happens?

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at clause 489, at the bottom of the page, he will see that Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories do not have the grand jury.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 487 to 498 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 499—Count for murder to stand alone.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask that this clause stand, Mr. Chairman? What I have here is a quite technical legal point, which the minister might dispose of quite rapidly if it were raised, but it seems to me this is not the appropriate time. It will take some time to advance it and it is entirely technical. It might be disposed of very shortly, and I shall try to see the minister between now and the time we come back to it.

Mr. Garson: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Clauses 500 to 507 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 508—Application, how made.

Mr. Nesbitt: This clause is a combination of a number of clauses in the present code. It says in part:

—order the trial to be held in a territorial division in the same province other than that in which the offence would otherwise be tried.

In these modern days with the press, radio and that sort of thing, it very often may happen that in a province with a small area, such as Prince Edward Island, a situation may arise similar to that which arose recently in Cornwall where there was a lot of publicity in the magazines and one thing and another in connection with a trial. I refer to Prince Edward Island as being a province with a small area, and that area is shortened even more by the advent of radio, press and modern communications, and it is quite conceivable that if there was a lot of adverse publicity before the trial a person would not be able to receive a fair trial in any part of the territorial jurisdiction.

It is quite different in a large province such as Ontario where the venue could be changed from Toronto to Port Arthur or Fort William, but in a place such as Prince Edward Island or even New Brunswick it would not be possible to change the venue by such a distance that a person would obtain a fairer trial than he would in his own locality. Would the minister care to comment on that?

Mr. Garson: Do I gather from my hon. friend that he is suggesting that the clause should be amended to provide for a change of venue from one province to another?

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes.

Mr. Garson: I must say that it was not thought by the men who had to do with the preparation of the present bill, some of whom had had long experience in criminal work, that there was any necessity for a change of venue from one province to another. I cannot recall myself any such necessity ever having arisen in a single case. I would think that at least one case should arise where a change of that sort seemed desirable before the existing law should be amended. As I think my hon. friend knows, applications for a change of venue from even one territorial division to another are infrequent. It might be better to let the law stand as it is.

Mr. Nesbitt: I quite realize what the minister has said, that the commission went into this matter very carefully, but it is just possible that this might not have occurred to them. I was just making the suggestion because I know there have been several trials in Ontario which received a great deal of notoriety. While it may not have been felt at the time on behalf of the accused that a change of venue was necessary, there have been cases in Ontario where the venue has been changed from one part of the province to another. I am not familiar of course with Prince Edward Island, and I was using that province as an example of a small territorial division where news would travel around by word of mouth and it would be quite conceivable that the public could get worked up and the accused might conceivably not receive a fair trial in the area. I just suggested that possibly the commission which went into this matter did not examine that one little point. It may not have occurred to them and I think it might be well if the minister took that into consideration.

Mr. Garson: I would be glad to take it under consideration. Perhaps I could write to the attorney general of Prince Edward Island. I think my hon. friend will agree that most of the other provinces are sufficiently large and therefore that question would not arise. So if I may, I shall take the course of writing to the attorney general of Prince Edward Island to get his views upon the matter.

Mr. MacNaught: I did not hear all that the hon. member said but I must go on record as opposing any suggestion that a person does not get a fair trial in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Nesbitt: On a question of privilege, I can assure my hon. friend that any such implication was far from my mind. I was merely saying that in a small territorial area it would be possible for the public to get worked up. For instance, the whole southern end of Ontario, which is many times the area of Prince Edward Island, was worked up over a case recently tried in Cornwall. I think in that case counsel for the accused could very well have asked the court to ask a change in venue because the public was emotionally disturbed. I made no reference to any personalities in Prince Edward Island, I assure you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no appeal from the discretionary rights or authority exercised by a judge, either on application at the trial or to a judge who could sit in the court in question prior to the trial. Am I right in that regard?

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to go into the details of this case in Cornwall, but I use it as an illustration of what I have in mind. In that case a number of articles were published which would lead to the conclusion on the part of any person reading them that the accused was guilty. No application was made prior to the trial for a change of venue or, as far as I remember, at any time at all. I am not criticizing in any way what was done there, but certainly no one could complain about the penalties that were imposed upon those who actually and detrimentally affected the free trial of an individual charged with a capital offence. I have raised this question on a number of occasions and perhaps the minister will allow me to make one reference.

I do feel that the local dealer in that case received a penalty which stigmatizes him. Having regard to the circumstances, I feel that too great an onus was placed on that local dealer. Without having communicated with him either directly or indirectly, I believe that it would be in the interests of dealers across Canada and in the interests of that person if consideration were given by the minister to granting a pardon under the circumstances.

Having said that, and returning once more to the question of venue, I had occasion once to be counsel for the prosecution in a jury case where references were made in the press which were most detrimental to the prosecution. There was no possibility, if the people as a whole followed the suggestions in the press, of a verdict other than not guilty being returned. A change of venue was not granted on the application which, as I remember it, was made before the trial.

Mr. Garson: By the crown counsel?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Which was my hon. friend?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I had something to do with it. I have always felt that consideration should be given to allowing an appeal from a decision made before trial denying a change of venue. I am not asking that an appeal be allowed to an accused or crown counsel asking for a change of venue at the trial, where they have waited until the last moment. If such an appeal were allowed it would simply be an invitation to an accused who wished to postpone the date of trial to secure a postponement by an indirect method. But I believe that justice would be done if consideration were given by the minister to granting the right of appeal where an application for change of venue is made before a trial.

That appeal could be heard almost immediately. It would assure that no case of injustice would arise because of incidents prejudicial to a fair trial, from the point of view either of the crown or of the accused. Certainly—and again I am making no mention of the case at Cornwall—there is nothing more detrimental to the course of justice than articles with regard to a case written before trial which can only have the effect of poisoning the minds of the jury, however desirous the members of the jury may be to disabuse their minds or to free them from the effect of the articles they have read. Human nature being what it is, and all of us being subject to extraneous influences, there is a necessity for the strictest application of the laws against the publication of injurious matter before trial. But at the same time, in the case to which I have alluded, I feel that the local distributor or dealer should not have imposed upon him the onus of reading everything that comes into his place of business in order to determine whether there is in it anything that might be detrimental to the course of justice. I make this suggestion to the minister and I would think it would be favourably received. This gentleman with a fine reputation, having innocently, as he said, and unwittingly committed an offence and having offered an apology for whatever wrong was inadvertently caused by him, I suggest that consideration should be given by the crown and by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to a pardon that would remove from him any suggestion of his being a criminal, a stigma that now remains upon him.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend's suggestion that there might be an appeal from an application for change of venue which has been refused is one that I think possesses distinct merit. I would make a counter-suggestion to my hon. friend, namely that I should send to the commissioners on uniformity of legislation, criminal section, the Hansard of today's debate containing my hon. friend's suggestion in order that they might take the matter up at their next meeting. I make that suggestion for this reason. While in the course of enacting criminal law here our primary aim of course is to draft a law which is as just as possible, we must also bear in mind the fact that no law is any better than its enforcement. As far as possible therefore we must pass laws which the provincial authorities, whose responsibility it is to enforce our criminal law, will do so without reluctance and with zeal. On that account, in a matter of this kind, I think it would be the better course to submit my hon. friend's suggestion to the commissioners on uniformity of legislation, criminal section, for their consideration.

With regard to the matter of a pardon which my hon. friend has raised, while I would not wish to contradict or to gainsay any remarks made by him concerning the merits of the order for commitment on contempt which was made by Chief Justice McRuer, I myself would hesitate to put an opinion which I had reached on the basis of a perusal of newspaper accounts against the judgment of the judge who was presiding at the trial. But if any application for such a pardon were made, I am sure that it would be disposed of on its merits in the ordinary course by the Solicitor General of Canada.

Clauses 509 to 522 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 523—Defence of insanity.

Mr. Fulton: The subject matter of insanity has been referred to the royal commission. I therefore do not intend to discuss from the point of view of the law the defence of insanity, because the commission is to make recommendations to us in that matter. However, there is a point that has been brought to my attention. I admit that it is not in the old code in this section, but I think it would be appropriate to suggest that the form of oath to be administered to the jury for the trial of an issue of insanity might be included here or that some reference might be made to it. In my limited experience it so happens that in one case with which I was connected this defence was raised and it seemed probable that the trial of the issue would be directed before arraignment. We scratched our heads a little bit as to where we were going to get the form of oath to administer to the jury for the trial of that issue. Would it not be appropriate to have in this section a reference to that special form of oath?

Mr. Garson: My impression is that the departments of the various attorneys general of the provinces have a form of oath that has been established by practice, and I think it might be better to leave out of the code any references to a form that we might prescribe. The probabilities are that the result of our prescribing a form of oath would mean that the provincial authorities in seven or eight different provinces would have to change the form which they had been using for a long period of time.

Mr. Fulton: I did not appreciate the fact that that is the case. Then the form of oath would be in the possession of the clerks of the various courts?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: Under instruction from the attorneys general?

Mr. Garson: That is right. These forms of oath are probably not exactly the same, and it might mean that some of the provinces would have to make a change.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 524—Insanity at time of trial.

Mr. Fulton: There is a small point I wish to make with regard to this clause. I notice that in the section of the present code which this clause replaces, namely section 967, subsection 2 reads as follows:

> If such issue is directed before the accused is given in charge to a jury for trial on the indictment, such issue shall be tried by any twelve jurors, or in the provinces of Saskatchewan or Manitoba by any six jurors—

—whereas in subsection 2 (a) (1) it reads as follows:

> If such issue is directed before the accused is given in charge to a jury for trial on the indictment, such issue shall be tried by any twelve jurors, or in the province of Alberta, by any six jurors.

What is the reason for the change?

Mr. Garson: There is no change. In the present code there is a reference to the six-man jury in Alberta.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In section 541.

Mr. Garson: The only changes which have been made in sections 523, 524 and 525 of this Bill No. 7 are that these clauses have been worded so as to make them applicable to all trials of indictable offences whether with or without a jury.

Mr. Fulton: I apologize to the minister and to the committee. I was looking at my Tremeear and had not consulted the supplement.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 525 and 526 agreed to.

On clause 527—Prisoner mentally ill.

Mr. Nesbitt: I wish to raise a point in connection with the third line of this clause which refers to "a person who is insane, mentally ill, mentally deficient or feeble-minded". I wonder whether the minister would care to comment on why the four words are used there. It has always been my understanding that the terms "insane" and "mentally ill" were synonymous, although "insane" is a more archaic word. I have also assumed that "mentally deficient" and "feeble-minded" are equally synonymous except that "feeble-minded" is also somewhat of an archaic expression.

Mr. Garson: The immediate point my hon. friend makes is correct. Some of this language is a bit archaic, but the problem with which a draftsman is confronted when he is trying to simplify the law is to get rid of as many archaic terms and as much surplusage as he can, without by so doing making inapplicable case law which has been decided on these phrases which he is thinking to discard.

Mr. Knowles: In this case you add a phrase.

Mr. Garson: In this case the language which is used, and which my hon. friend sees here, has been deliberately left there for that purpose. It is a case of two evils and choosing the lesser.

Mr. Nesbitt: I take it from the minister's remarks that the reason the word "insane" is retained is in order to make reference to decisions on the subject in the past.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: This is a small point, but perhaps it might be pointed out that in the old section 970 there were only three phrases, "insane", "mentally ill" or "mentally deficient". In the new clause 527 we have four, "insane", "mentally ill", "mentally deficient" or "feeble-minded". The minister says that he is retaining the wording because of the case law but I submit that he is extending the wording.

Mr. Garson: I said that sometimes archaic phrases are retained in order to retain the case law. I did not say that that fact was a reason why the coverage of the language could not be somewhat extended, as it is extended here, by adding the word "feeble-minded" to the phrase in the present section.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 528—Appearance by attorney.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister comment on any significance there is in the change of wording here? It is really quite enjoyable to us on this side of the house to hear the minister tell us sometimes that the words in a new clause are good because they represent no change and at other times that they are good because they have been changed. In the old section 916 the reference was to 'attorney". Now the reference is to "counsel or agent". Does that mean that from now on a corporation can be represented by some agent who is not an attorney?

Mr. Garson: Yes, the corporation for the purpose of appearing before the court can be represented by an agent. The clause reads:

Every corporation against which an indictment is found shall appear and plead by counsel or agent.

A corporation, not being a human being, has to appear by a human being. The purpose of this clause is to establish what relationship shall exist between the corporation and the human being who appears for the corporation. That human being may be an agent or counsel.

Mr. Knowles: It is not restricted to an attorney? In other words, it is not restricted to a practising lawyer?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at page 2 of the bill he will see the definition of "counsel" in subclause 7 of clause 2. It reads:

"Counsel" means a barrister or solicitor, in respect of the matters or things that barristers and solicitors, respectively, are authorized by the law of the province to do or perform in relation to legal proceedings.

Mr. Knowles: But what is the definition of agent?

Mr. Garson: "Agent" would be an agent in the ordinary sense. But it would not follow, because an agent appears and does that for the accused corporation which an accused human being would do for himself, namely make an appearance and plead, that the agent would also act as counsel in the case. If the agent were wise he would have counsel there acting for the accused corporation.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 529 to 533 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 534—Qualification of juror.

Mr. Barnett: I rise more for the purpose of obtaining information than anything else. Am I correct from a reading of this clause that all laws with reference to qualification as a juror, compelling attendance as a juror and so on are provincial in scope and that there is no place in this legislation where such matters are defined?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Garson: That is right. Speaking generally, provincial legislation provides the machinery whereby jurymen, as a class of court officials, are made available. Once they have been made available the code states the manner in which they perform their duties in the trial of cases arising under the code.

Mr. Barnett: What about the matter of penalties for non-attendance when an individual has been summoned to attend as a juror?

Mr. Garson: Penalties for the breach of any duty imposed upon jurymen by the code are provided in the code. The penalty for the failure of a citizen to comply with any of the provisions of the provincial statutes relating to jurymen will be the penalty provided by the provincial statute.

Mr. Barnett: I really would like to get this point clear. I have in the back of my mind an incident that occurred a number of years ago. As I understand it, a number of people were summoned as part of a panel of jurors under circumstances which would have forced them to travel over fifty miles at their own expense and to provide their own accommodation at the place. A number of them did not go because they just did not have the money to travel or the money to maintain themselves away from home. Is there a provision in the code under which they would be liable, and under what circumstances would they be liable for non-compliance of that kind? I have not noted any provision, and I thought this clause would be a good place to raise the question.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I could not possibly express an opinion on the case my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni speaks of without having a full and correct statement of the facts of the case. In addition, it would be necessary to examine the law of the province concerned, relevant to those facts. One cannot give legal opinions when one has neither the facts nor the law. That is the position in which I find myself in relation to the question at the present time. The old section 921 has been held to adopt the provincial laws to the extent that it is necessary for our purposes under the code in order to provide jurymen to try offences under the code. I might cite the case of Rex v. O'Rourke, 32 Upper Canada Common Pleas, 388. The citation reads as follows:

Provincial legislation also fixes the number of jurors to be summoned as the panel from which the petit juries are selected.

I think that was the point my hon. friend was making.

What parliament has done, by what is now section 921, is not to delegate to the provinces its powers in this respect, but to adopt provincial laws as its own, and this is clearly within its powers.

Mr. Barnett: In other words, there is no place within the Criminal Code itself which provides that non-compliance with an order of attendance would be an offence. It is purely a matter of a proceeding within the province; is that the conclusion I am to draw?

Mr. Garson: No, the conclusion my hon. friend is to draw is this. Whatever a juryman does which is contrary to law will be an offence against that law to which it is contrary, whether that law be provincial or federal.

Mr. Stick: Is not the jury the law in this case?

Mr. Garson: No, not in the sense the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was referring to it. What he was referring to was the manner in which citizens are called up, and by following certain procedures, are made into jurymen. Then, when these jurymen attend to perform their functions in a court of criminal law, they are still not the law, but are the sole judges of the facts. The presiding judge is the judge on all points of law.

Mr. Stick: The reason I asked that question was that some time ago the grand jury had a contentious case. We did not know what to do with it. We consulted the chief justice, and he gave us an indifferent answer. Then, we consulted one of the other judges of the supreme court, and the reply we got from him was, "Gentlemen, you are the law, and you decide." We decided it.

Mr. Knowles: What does the minister say to that?

Mr. Deschatelets: If a change were contemplated in the qualifications of jurors in order to permit women to sit as jurors, would that be decided by the provincial or the federal government?

Mr. Garson: It would be decided by the provincial government. I might say to my hon. friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont that in a number of provinces they now have lady jurors.

Mr. Ellis: Do I understand, then, that this parliament has no control over determining the qualifications of jurors who sit on cases covering offences committed in contravention of this code?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend from Regina City said to me, if I understood him correctly, do I understand that this parliament has not the jurisdiction to determine the qualification of jurors? Answering my hon. friend in the terms of his question, I should say parliament has the jurisdiction to do this. But parliament, I think wisely, has thought it preferable to leave to the provincial legislatures the enactment of legislation to determine those persons whom the provincial authorities regard as qualified to be jurors. In that way varying provincial views upon the subject are met.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 535 to 540 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 541—Challenges by accused in Alberta and territories.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We had a six-man jury in Saskatchewan for a number of years, and found that we wanted to return to the twelve-man jury, because counsel on each side, however the case turned out, felt that the judge was able to exercise a greater degree of control over the jury when there were only six than when there were twelve. Has any request been made at any time by Alberta to return to the twelve-man jury?

Mr. Garson: No, Mr. Chairman; the government of Alberta has not made any such request.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 542 agreed to.

On clause 543—Challenge by prosecutor.

Mr. Knowles: This is perhaps a minor point, or a point of language. Can the minister say whether there is any significance in the fact that the words "the crown" have been changed to the words "the prosecutor"? I notice in the code as it now stands the crown, the prosecutor and the prosecution run through the comparable sections.

Mr. Garson: There is not any change in effect. As between the two terms, I believe "the prosecutor", which my hon. friend will see defined in clause 2, subclause 33 of the bill, is the more precise. It is the representative of the crown or the personal prosecutor in the court who actually does the challenging. Perhaps I had better read into the record subclause 33 of clause 2:

"prosecutor" means the attorney general or, where the attorney general does not intervene, means the person who institutes proceedings to which this act applies, and includes counsel acting on behalf of either of them;

Mr. Stick: I notice that the prosecutor is entitled to challenge four jurors. How many is the defence allowed to challenge?

Mr. Garson: In capital cases they may challenge 20, and in lesser indictable offences

12. If my hon. friend will look at the preceding clause, 542—perhaps I had better read that clause into the record:

An accused who is charged with an offence punishable with death is entitled to challenge twenty jurors peremptorily.

(2) An accused who is charged with an offence other than an offence punishable with death, for which he may be sentenced to imprisonment for more than five years, is entitled to challenge twelve jurors peremptorily.

Then, in addition to that, in the case of a capital offence the defence counsel has an unlimited number of challenges for cause.

Mr. Stick: If there is an unlimited number of challenges—what is a panel, 48?

Mr. Garson: The panels may vary from province to province, but it may be somewhere in that neighbourhood.

Mr. Stick: If defence counsel challenges an unlimited number and the panel is exhausted, what happens then? Do you call a new jury panel?

Mr. Garson: No, the first thing that happens is they go out into the courtroom or wherever they can find citizens and call up some additional jurymen in that way. But it is not very often that the jury panel is exhausted in that way; for while defence counsel can challenge any number of jurymen for cause there will not be a large number of jurymen on the panel in relation to whom defence counsel will be able to show cause. For that reason it is most infrequent that a panel is exhausted by challenges for cause.

Mr. Stick: I do not like this idea of going out and bringing in this man or that man to serve unless he has been properly served with a notice. I do not think you should go into the highways and byways to bring them in to serve on this jury. I may have the wrong impression, but if that is done I think it is entirely wrong and they should be served with a proper notice.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 544 to 556 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 557—Accused to be present.

Mr. Knowles: I notice that clause 557 is slightly changed from section 943. As a matter of fact there may be several sections involved. The main change is that formerly the wording was that every accused person "shall be entitled to be present in court during the whole of his trial, unless he misconducts himself by so interrupting proceedings as to render their continuance in his presence impracticable." The words "shall be entitled to be present" have been altered to read "shall be present".

Then another change has been made in that, if I understand section 943 correctly, it refers only to individuals, whereas there is a reference in clause 557 which says, "an accused other than a corporation". My question is this. If an accused individual is required to be present during the whole of his trial, why should not a corporation, through the agent or counsel we were speaking about a while ago, also be required to be present?

Mr. Garson: If there were any doubt on the score, perhaps it should be resolved. I am referring now to the second point made by my hon. friend. The intention here was that a corporation should appear to the same extent as an individual accused. But that cannot be stated quite so simply as that; for a corporation makes its appearance by counsel or agent. If it were thought necessary to make such a provision—and I myself do not think it is—it would have to read that—

An accused, other than a corporation, and the agent or counsel of an accused corporation shall be present in court during the whole of the trial.

But I do not think that is really necessary.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the minister would let it stand and take a look at it.

Mr. Garson: All right; there is no objection to that.

Clause stands.

On clause 558—Summing up by prosecutor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, in what I say I shall refer particularly to subsections 3 and 4. Subsection 4 entitles the attorney general, or counsel acting on behalf of the attorney general, to reply, even though an accused does not offer evidence in his own defence. I know of only one or two cases in which this power has been used by counsel acting on behalf of an attorney general. It is a survival of the English common law, and is based upon the legal fiction of the supremacy of the crown. I am wondering where it has any application today.

Certainly those in the commission who redrafted or reshuffled the sections of the Criminal Code did away with common law offences. I feel that subsection 4 is a survival of the common law and is no longer applicable, having regard to present-day conditions. It was a power exercised by the crown, chiefly in treason and analogous cases. I think it is unfair to the accused. Today under our law the crown and the individual are equal, as a result of the changes brought about two years ago in connection with proceedings in the courts. In view of the fact that today the crown and the citizen are equal I can see no justification for continuing this principle under which the crown, in our courts, occupies a superior position.

This provision has been in effect throughout the years. As I say, I know of only one or two cases in which it has been used. This was not in my own province but rather, I believe, in Manitoba in the year 1912, at a time when certain prosecutions were taking place in that province in connection with contracting work on the legislative buildings. The crown in that instance demanded the right of reply. I believe, too, the right was exercised in one case in British Columbia. I suggest this right should now be abrogated.

Subsection 5 is a new subsection which states:

> Where two or more accused are tried jointly and witnesses are examined for any of them, all the accused or their respective counsel are required to address the jury before it is addressed by the prosecutor.

I believe this is a necessary change in the law, where there is a joint trial. Otherwise such trial becomes all mixed up, with counsel addressing the jury with respect to one charge, and waiting for other counsel to address the jury on another charge. I believe subsection 5 will go a long way toward meeting the difficulty in those cases in which there are two or more accused. It will remove the anomalous situation that does prevail when there are two accused, one of whom gives evidence on his own behalf and the other who fails to do so.

However, in connection with subsection 4, I would ask the Minister of Justice whether he does not consider the time has come to remove from the criminal law this survival of the old decision that the crown occupied a position superior to the individual, and where the citizen was second to the crown in the courts of the land.

Mr. Garson: This is another case in which, in all candour, I must admit that the point raised by the hon. member for Prince Albert has some merit. It does, however, seem a bit extraordinary that this bill should have been in course of preparation and consideration for some five years now, and that during all this time, in its progress through the commission and through my own department, during its consideration by the commissioners on the uniformity of legislation, criminal division, and by the attorneys general of the provinces, as well as the special committee of the House of Commons and of the other place, this is the first occasion upon which representations to the effect of those just advanced by the hon. member for Prince Albert have been made by anyone.

I agree that this present provision merely continues in effect the substance of section 944, subsection 3 of the present code which has been the law of Canada for a great many years. It has not been necessary on very many occasions to invoke this provision, yet I think it would be wise, before discarding it, to examine those occasions on which it has been invoked to see whether it would not be a good provision to retain to cover these exceptional cases when they arise. I would accordingly suggest that my hon. friend's suggestion might be submitted, like the one he made previously this afternoon, to the commissioners on uniformity, criminal section, for consideration at their next meeting. In that way we would get the views of those who will have some connection with the administration of the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Prince Albert, if it were passed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have no objection to that. What I was trying to do was assure some degree of consistency, for I remember two years ago, when the crown and the citizen were given equal standing in the courts, the Minister of Justice as Attorney General of Canada saying that now we had arrived at a point where no longer does the crown occupy a superior position. It was because of that statement that I raise this point.

Mr. Stick: I am just seeking information, since I am a layman. In most criminal cases the crown opens the case and closes it by means of the crown prosecutor addressing the jury last. I do not understand why the crown prosecutor should have the last word to the jury before the judge sums up the case. Why is the sequence not maintained, so that if the crown prosecutor opens he should address the jury first and counsel for the defence last? Is there any special reason for that? I was always curious about it.

Mr. Garson: The explanation of the point which my hon. friend has raised arises out of the necessities of the trial. Because the accused is innocent until he is proven guilty, the prosecutor opens the case, and he has to adduce evidence to prove the accused's guilt before there is any case for the accused to answer at all. The accused's counsel then puts in his evidence to establish the best defence he can. When the accused's counsel has got all his evidence in, he gets up and explains to the jury what a wonderful defence it is that he has made. Next the crown prosecutor attempts by argument to show that the defence has not answered the crown's case. When, however, defence counsel puts in no evidence it is the crown prosecutor who first has to argue that the crown's case is well proven, and defence counsel then closes the argument.

The question we are now discussing is as to whether in exceptional cases the crown would have a further right of reply. Now, as I understand it, this reply to which the hon. member for Prince Albert strongly objects will be strictly confined by the judge to the answering of any new points that were brought out in the defence counsel's address. The crown prosecutor would not be permitted to go over his case again; his closing argument would have to be a reply in the strict sense.

Mr. Stick: It has always struck me as unfair. If the accused is innocent until he is proven guilty, then it has always struck me that this procedure gave the crown an advantage in that it had the last word with the jury. I grant you that the judge is there to sum up the case, but I could never understand it from that standpoint.

Mr. Gillis: I have heard some young lawyers make exactly the same criticism, that the crown attorney, who is usually an old, experienced lawyer, will come in and make his case. After all, it is a debate as to who is right or wrong. After he finishes his case the defence lawyer gets up and puts in his evidence. Then the crown attorney has the right of rebuttal. He has the right to get up and tear the defence to pieces and close the case. That is the last impression that is left in the minds of the jury. During that time the defence lawyer sits there. The crown attorney may have left himself wide open, but the defence lawyer is prevented from answering at all. Most young lawyers at least consider it very unfair and say that it places them at a great disadvantage.

Mr. Garson: There is just one footnote that I should add to the remarks made by my hon. friend. The last thing that happens in a case is the judge's charge to the jury. The jury does not retire with the words of counsel ringing in their ears; they retire reflecting upon the words of the presiding judge.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And the court of appeal has the last say.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 559 to 561 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 562—Admissions at trial.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This section has to do with evidence on trial. I should be very much interested in learning from the Minister of Justice whether or not the commissioners gave consideration to the promulgation under law of rules respecting the admission of so-called confessions on the part of accused persons. Clause 562 says:

Where an accused is on trial for an indictable offence he or his counsel may admit any fact—

That is of course at the trial. As the minister knows, the whole subject of admissibility of confessions is one of the most difficult that the courts have to deal with. All want to see a guilty man punished, but all who confess are not guilty. Everyone in the active practice of law in the courts knows of cases in which the accused for one reason or another have signed very complete and all-embracing confessions. Later on those confessions have been established to have no relationship to the facts. I think of one case in the province of Saskatchewan. Back in 1933 a little girl was murdered at Naicam, in that province. I think the minister knows of the case, because the prosecution of the alleged murderer took place about three years ago; incidentally, he was acquitted. This little girl had been ravished and murdered. A man was picked up in Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, and he made a complete confession in detail. As he was examined by the police officers more and more facts came to his mind. He was finally brought back to Naicam and there he re-enacted the offence.

Some months later, when all hope of his acquittal had disappeared so far as his relatives were concerned, although believing in his innocence, a farmer living some 300 miles from Naicam read of this man's confession of having committed this murder on a certain day. He realized that this was the man who had worked for him throughout the summer, and that he could not have been at Naicam on the date in question. This farmer communicated with the attorney general's department. When the accused was faced with the fact that he could not have committed the offence he still clung stubbornly to his confession, because apparently he had stolen some money from his employer before he left for Manitoba. Under ordinary circumstances that confession would have been admitted, if the circumstances between the time he was committed for trial and the actual trial had not come to light.

I ask the minister whether he does not believe the time has come when there should be a declaration similar to that made in Great Britain in 1911 by a commission of judges relative to the safeguards that must be built up against the possibility of a false confession being made or being exacted, or whether he believes that the present rather haphazard system, in which the whole question is in a doubtful state, is sufficient to assure justice.

I should like to see him give consideration not to having an amendment made to the Criminal Code but to a declaration by representative judges which could be delivered to officers of the mounted police bringing the law up to date, so that the whole field of confessions would be generally similar in interpretation in every part of this country. I think it would be a worth-while undertaking, and one that would add lustre to the tenure of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that there has been a great demand for the reform to which my hon. friend from Prince Albert refers. I would be inclined to think there are quite a number of judges and counsel who are of the view that our laws of evidence relative to the admissibility of confessions are in good condition as they now stand. I think, moreover, my hon. friend will agree that no amendment to our existing laws of evidence could be devised for practical application to the great majority of cases, which would exclude such a confession as the one he has just described.

Would my hon. friend not agree that the difficulty in connection with this confession which he described arose from the fact that the confessor, quite inexplicably and irrationally but also quite voluntarily, without any inducement being held out to him by persons in authority, made his confession?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Without any illegal inducement.

Mr. Garson: Yes; as I understand my hon. friend's recitation of the facts, without any inducement, but prompted by some irrational impulse of his own he constructed a completely false confession that perhaps would have resulted in his being found guilty of a crime which he did not actually commit. I do suggest to my hon. friend that such a confession is not an example of a defect in our existing laws of evidence with regard to the admissibility of confessions. I suggest further to him that there is no law of general application regarding the admissibility of confessions in criminal trials that the human mind could devise that could exclude the explicit, voluntary false confession to which he referred.

However, that is not to say that my hon. friend's suggestion does not have merit. We are always anxious to consider any improvement in the law that can be made. We never cease to be anxious to do so. I shall be glad to take my hon. friend's suggestion into account. I think he will agree, as he has properly said himself, that the amendment which he suggests would not be to the Criminal Code. If made at all it should probably be made to the Canada Evidence Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact I did not intend that it should be an amendment to anything. What I suggested was a declaration similar to that which the judges of the court of king's bench in Great Britain made in 1911. The minister knows that the mounted police often use that declaration as a guide by which to determine the admissibility of confessions, and also to determine the course they should follow in securing admissions of guilt.

I feel that we should not be relying so much on a declaration made in Great Britain in 1911, but that we should have for our police officers a declaration of principles indicative of the course to be followed in order to be sure that confessions shall indeed be admissions of guilt rather than statements containing admissions that are not truthful. That is the reason I make the suggestion.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think that there is much to add to what the hon. member for Prince Albert has said, except to say that I agree with him that it might be worth while to ask the judges of the respective provinces if they could either appoint representatives or perhaps meet together for such a purpose. I recall comments being made on the matter by one of the judges of our own court in British Columbia, who made a suggestion in the course of the trial which received some attention.

This judge had had experience in police court work, as he had been a police court magistrate before his appointment to the supreme court bench. He referred to admissions of guilt given to the police without due distinction being made—what he was saying was applicable to his own court, and another judge might not require the same distinction—as to whether the statement was voluntary or volunteered. He said that in order to satisfy him on its admissibility a statement not only must be voluntary, but it should be volunteered. He said, "I have heard of too many voluntary statements, that is to say where no illegal inducements or promises of advantage were held out, which I know were not volunteered. After all," he said, "if I keep on asking you if you would not care to say such and such, finally you may build up the idea in your mind that it would be a good idea to say such and such a thing. The statement you make is voluntary, but you certainly have not volunteered it."

There is a distinction to be drawn between the two types of confessions or admissions which I think is of importance, and which has in it elements which should be carefully considered. I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Prince Albert is a good one.

I should like to make another comment at this stage, and I do so with due respect for the commissioners who have redrafted this code and for the actual draftsmen who put it into legal language. I have not been able to avoid making a mental note, and here I am making an oral note, of the apparent temptation presented to the commissioners to change the wording for the sake of changing it. If you compare this clause with section 978, which it replaces, you will see what I mean. Section 978 reads as follows:

> Any accused person on his trial for any indictable offence, or his counsel or solicitor, may admit any fact alleged against the accused so as to dispense with proof thereof.

Then we find clause 562 reads as follows:

> Where an accused is on trial for an indictable offence he or his counsel may admit any fact alleged against him for the purpose of dispensing with proof thereof.

That is practically the same wording with just two or three words changed, as though the commissioners or the draftsmen had said to themselves, "Well, I can do it better, and I am just going to show that I can by changing a word here or a word there." I cannot see the purpose of such a change. It occurs over and over again. In some cases obviously the change does not alter the meaning of the section in such a way as to raise even a question that the case law might no longer be applicable. But I suggest that in some cases this change for the sake of change has the effect of raising the question whether the case law under the previous section will continue to be applicable. I am not going to repeat that comment. I hope I can resist the temptation to repeat it. But I think it is one that should be made, and this is a place where it seems to me to be particularly appropriate to make it.

There is one change which I think I should ask the minister about. While making the slight changes in wording they have dropped the word "solicitor". Previously it provided that an accused or his counsel or solicitor could make an admission. Now, however, it is to be confined to the accused or his counsel. Is there not possibly some result of that change which goes beyond a mere change of words?

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Garson: No, there is not. If my hon. friend will look at clause 2, subsection 7 of the bill he will see that "counsel" is defined as including solicitor.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 563 to 565 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 566—Unsworn evidence of child.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the minister would make a few comments on clause 566. I note that the reference on the right-hand page tells us that this clause is drawn from section 1003, subsection 2, of the present code. When I look up section 1003 of the present code, which has three subsections, I find that it seems to be related exclusively to offences having to do with carnal knowledge. As I read clause 566 in the new bill, it seems to have a wider import. I have no objection to that. In fact, if that is the case it seems to me that it is all to the good. However, I should like to have the minister's comment on it.

At the same time, when I look back to section 1003 of the present code in order to make this comparison, I find that the preceding section, namely section 1002, deals with certain other offences for which a person cannot be sentenced on the evidence of only one witness. I should like to know whether all the cases referred to in parts (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) of section 1002 are covered.

I realize that I am introducing two or perhaps three questions here. Clause 566 refers to the unsworn evidence of a child, which has to be corroborated. To me it looks as if that is going farther than section 1003 went. In the other case I am talking about the necessity for corroboration of the evidence of one person in respect of certain specific charges.

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend can certainly be forgiven for being a bit confused here. The clause we are considering is the analogue of the present section 1003, subsection 2. Subsection 1 of section 1003 was dropped as being covered by section 16, subsection 1 of the Canada Evidence Act. In view of the difference between section 1003 (2) of the present code, which relates to certain sexual offences, and section 16, subsection 2 of the Canada Evidence Act, which is of general application, this section 1003 (2) was retained as clause 566 of this bill, although it could perhaps be argued that it was not absolutely necessary. If my hon. friend has the Criminal Code volume there, he will find the Canada Evidence Act at the back. He will see section 16, subsection 2 at page 436. If my hon. friend wants section 566 to stand, I have no objection to allowing it to do so. Then he can examine it at his leisure. He will find that it takes quite a bit of checking to reconcile these various provisions.

Mr. Knowles: Before the minister suggests that it stand—in fact that might not be necessary—I wonder if this is the situation. I take it that my statement was correct, namely that subsection 2 of section 1003 was, in the context of section 1003, related only to the offence set out in section 1003. The minister tells me now, however, that the new clause 566 is not really new because it is simply carrying forward what is in the Canada Evidence Act.

Mr. Garson: Oh, no. What I said was that it was carrying forward what is in section 1003, subsection 2, of the existing code.

Mr. Knowles: Section 1003, subsection 2, of the existing code relates to only one offence. It reads as follows:

> No person shall be liable to be convicted of the offence unless the testimony admitted by virtue of this section and given on behalf of the prosecution, is corroborated by some other material evidence in support thereof implicating the accused.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: This section is section 1003, which had to do with carnal knowledge.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: I am pointing out that clause 566 of the new bill is much wider than that. As I said earlier, I have no objection. I just wanted to get that point straight. The new clause 566 says:

> No person shall be convicted of an offence upon the unsworn evidence of a child unless the evidence of the child is corroborated in a material particular by evidence that implicates the accused.

I am suggesting that that is carrying the necessity for the corroboration of a child's evidence much further than was the case with section 1003, subsection 2. I take it the minister now tells me that this is in order to put it in line with the Canada Evidence Act.

Mr. Garson: The purpose of the provision which my hon. friend now sees before him, the one we are discussing in the bill itself, is to eliminate, as related to the analogous sections of the existing code, any overlapping and at the same time bring the provision in Bill No. 7 into harmony with the existing sections of the Canada Evidence Act. If my hon. friend has his Canada Evidence Act before him I would ask him to look at section 16 on page 436 which reads as follows:

> 16. (1) In any legal proceeding where a child of tender years is offered as a witness, and such child does not, in the opinion of the judge, justice or other presiding officer, understand the nature of an oath, the evidence of such child may be received, though not given upon oath, if, in the opinion of the judge, justice or other presiding officer, as the case may be, the child is possessed of sufficient intelligence to justify the reception of the evidence, and understands the duty of speaking the truth.

That is not confined to carnal knowledge but is of general application. If my hon. friend will look at subsection 2 he will see that it reads:

> No case shall be decided upon such evidence alone, and it must be corroborated by some other material evidence.

As I indicated to my hon. friend a few moments ago, in view of this section in the Canada Evidence Act it might perhaps be argued that clause 566 of Bill No. 7 is unnecessary, but it gives one reading the code notice that no person shall be convicted of an offence upon the unsworn evidence of a child unless the evidence of the child is corroborated in a material particular by evidence which implicates the accused.

If my hon. friend wanted to argue that we do not need this provision because of the Canada Evidence Act I would not contest that view too strongly, but it does give a person reading the whole code notice that no person can be convicted upon the uncorroborated evidence of a child.

Mr. Knowles: I think the picture is fairly clear as far as this aspect of the matter is concerned. If I may say so, the confusion arises from the note on the righthand page. Clause 566 of the bill does not really carry forward subsection 2 of section 1003 of the code. It is putting into the Criminal Code what is in section 16, subsections 1 and 2, of the Canada Evidence Act. I see the minister moving his head up and down.

Mr. Garson: Yes, I was moving my head up and down in agreement with my hon. friend. He is quite right.

Mr. Knowles: What about the other question I asked the minister? I confess that it may not be strictly related to this clause, but I will put the blame on the note on the righthand page which made me look at section 1003 (2), whereupon I looked at section 1002 and discovered there were five different charges in connection with which one could not be found guilty on the evidence of only one witness. Can the minister assure us that all those cases are covered somewhere in the new bill?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Well, I shall take the minister's word for it. I meant that with respect.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 567 to 569 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 570—No acquittal unless act or omission not wilful.

Mr. Knowles: The minister will recall that I raised some questions about infanticide when we were discussing an earlier clause, namely 208. When these clauses are written in double negatives it takes quite a while to sort them out, and this one is not without its double negatives. I ask the minister to bear in mind that under clause 204 infanticide is defined as an offence in connection with which there may be special circumstances. As I read clause 570 it looks to me as though the necessity of proving innocence is on the accused. As I say, double negatives are confusing, but when one reads the clause through one finds at the end that a person may be convicted unless the evidence establishes that the act or omission was not wilful. In other words, it appears that the prosecution does not have to establish that the act was wilful. The defence has to establish that it was not wilful.

I ask the minister to note that special circumstances are suggested in the clause itself, but even after allowance is made for the fact that such a person might not be fully recovered or that the balance of her mind might be disturbed, the clause ends up by saying that she may be convicted unless the evidence establishes that the act or omission was not wilful. If we refer to the note on the righthand page we see that it is just the one word "new". In other words we have a new clause, and it does seem to me to be a case where the burden of proof of innocence is put upon the accused.

As a matter of fact, the marginal note at the left seems to support my analysis of the clause. It says "No acquittal unless act or omission not wilful". What has the minister to say about that?

Mr. Garson: If I have the hon. member's point correctly, it is that the double negative in this clause has the effect of casting upon the accused an onus which she should not have to discharge. Let us examine the language. The clause reads:

> Where a female person is charged with infanticide and the evidence establishes that she caused the death of her child but does not establish that, at the time of the act or omission by which she caused the death of the child,
> (a) she was not fully recovered from the effects of giving birth to the child or from the effect of lactation consequent on the birth of the child, and
> (b) the balance of her mind was, at that time, disturbed by reason of the effect of giving birth to the child or of the effect of lactation consequent on the birth of the child, she may be convicted unless the evidence establishes that the act or omission was not wilful.

Mr. Knowles: Take it slowly.

Mr. Garson: The problem that is bothering my hon. friend—

Mr. Knowles: And my hon. friend too.

Mr. Garson: Yes, quite right—that is bothering both of us, to which we mutually wish the answer, is assisted in some degree, I think, by the sidenote. It states in language that is more brief, more lucid than the provisions of the section itself that there is no acquittal unless the act or omission is not wilful.

Mr. Knowles: That says the same thing.

Mr. Garson: Does that assist my hon. friend at all?

Mr. Knowles: No. I think it underlines what I was saying. When you read the marginal note and try to resolve the double negative I suggest that "no acquittal" would have to be interpreted as conviction. A conviction will be registered unless the act or omission is not wilful. The more one goes through this the clearer it becomes that the necessity for proving innocence has been placed upon the accused. The only thing that can be said in favour of the clause is a remark made by my good friend and my legal counsel, the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. I hope it was not intended to be kept off the record, but perhaps I may take the liberty of quoting him in any event. He says this language is so balled up that no jury would ever understand it anyway. That being the case, there would never be a conviction under it. Seriously, I do not think the minister, the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings or I want to leave obscure language like that on the statute books.

Mr. Garson: In fairness to those who are responsible for the language of this clause, which should be read in conjunction with clause 204, defining infanticide, it should be said that they are faced with considerable difficulty in most cases of this kind. This difficulty arises from the fact that under a given set of circumstances the question may be whether the accused should be convicted of infanticide or murder, or should be acquitted. Perhaps it might be helpful if I were to read from the judgment by Chief Justice McRuer in a decided case, Rex v. Marchello, 1951 Ontario Weekly Notes, 316.

Mr. Knowles: Under what section of the code was this?

Mr. Garson: This was the corresponding section.

Mr. Knowles: But we are told this is a new clause.

Mr. Garson: This case deals with the question whether an accused, under a given set of circumstances, is guilty of murder or infanticide. In that connection I should say that one of the first questions the crown has to decide is whether the charge laid against the lady in the case is a charge of murder or a charge of infanticide. Bearing upon that, the language of Chief Justice McRuer I think is relevant. He said:

> The onus resting on the crown to prove all these combined elements in the crime would appear to be so heavy as to make it almost impossible to convict an accused person on a charge of infanticide if laid as single count in the indictment.

That is to say, if the indictment just had the single charge of infanticide in it.

> On the one hand, the crown must prove a negative—

We get into this difficulty my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre was describing.

> —by showing that the accused "had not fully recovered from the effects of giving birth to the child", and an affirmative that by reason of giving birth to the child the balance of her mind was at the time of the offence disturbed—

The crown has to prove that as well.

> —while, on the other hand, on such a charge it would be a good defence to show that the accused had, at the time of causing the death of the child by wilful act or omission, fully recovered from giving birth to the child or that the balance of her mind was not then disturbed. In such case, even if a reasonable doubt was raised in the mind of the jury she would be entitled to be acquitted on the charge of infanticide, and thereafter she could not be charged with murder or manslaughter as an accused person cannot be put in jeopardy twice for the same homicide.

There is a principle in law that if one commits an act, and if a charge is laid in respect of the commission of that act, and the accused is tried on that charge and is acquitted, then no further charge could be laid based upon that act. Under all such circumstances the accused is "home free".

I believe my hon. friend can see from this carefully considered language of Chief Justice McRuer that the subject matter we are discussing here bristles with great difficulties. The problem which arises in every one of these cases from the very beginning is as to whether, upon the set of facts, the charge should be infanticide or murder. Then, as Chief Justice McRuer makes very clear, when you get into the actual case the crown is up against a very difficult position because it has to prove a negative of one proposition and a positive of another in order to secure a conviction for infanticide.

I think my hon. friend can see from this inadequate, and perhaps from his standpoint unsatisfactory discussion of the subject that the drafting of the clause he criticizes is a task of no inconsiderable difficulty.

Mr. Knowles: With great respect, I submit the minister has proved my point. I listened with interest to the case he cited from Chief Justice McRuer, and I think it is fair to say the minister gave that citation to show that the law as it now stands affords considerable protection to the accused. But, Mr. Chairman, this clause that is now before us, clause 570, is a new clause which puts an additional barrier in front of the accused, or conversely makes it easier for the prosecution. My whole point is that this clause 570 is new. When the minister stands up and gives us the case law I think he is making a good case for the proposition that the law should stay as it is. This addition changes the situation, and as I have already said makes it just that much easier for the prosecution to win or just that much more difficult for the accused to be declared innocent.

Mr. Stick: Lately we have seen some interesting newspaper reports stating that changes of sex have taken place. I wonder how Chief Justice McRuer would handle the case if such a person were charged with infanticide.

Mr. Nowlan: Without digressing to the interesting subject which has been raised by my hon. friend to the right, I do not think it is a matter that occurs so frequently that the code has to deal with it at the moment. I think the minister will admit that the saving clause at the bottom of clause 570 is really superfluous, and does not affect the situation in any way. It says:

> . . . she may be convicted unless the evidence establishes that the act or omission was not wilful.

That is elementary, because if it was not wilful it would not be a crime. I do not think that is really of much help to us in analysing what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has elaborated upon. He has presented it much more cogently than I could, so I am not going to repeat what he has said. According to the explanatory note, this is a new section and certainly it is going to shift the burden of this thing so far as the defence is concerned. It is not relieved at all by the last part of the clause, because if it is not wilful it is not a crime; it is not homicide. If a mother rolls over on her baby at night and the baby smothers, that would not be a wilful act and she could not be prosecuted for infanticide.

Frankly I am not too much concerned about it, as I told my hon. friend a little while ago in an aside, because those of us who have had any experience in these matters know how difficult it is to get a jury to convict in a case of infanticide. So often there is sympathy for the mother, and often the mother is unmarried in such cases. Ordinarily the jury will lean over backward to avoid a conviction for this offence, and very often properly so. With this other factor in there, when you charge a jury very learnedly on the law they are going to throw up their hands and say, "I did not know what he was talking about, I do not believe the judge understood it, so I will go out and acquit her".

The Chairman: Is the clause agreed to?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 571 agreed to.

On clause 572—Previous conviction.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to ask the minister if he would comment briefly. I note that clause 571 is new, and I think it is a good thing to have it in here. To me this new clause represents an advance. Heretofore, when an indictment has gone to a jury, and when a second indictment has set forth in detail that an accused was being charged with a second offence, such accused was obviously prejudiced.

We now come to clause 572 (1). Frankly I do not like this one. Possibly the minister can explain it. We see that it refers to sections 851 and 963, and I do not think it helps at all. The explanatory note goes on to say that section 572 is new, in part. Section 572 (1) says, in effect, that where an accused is convicted of an offence for which a greater punishment may be imposed by reason of previous convictions—that is, when he is convicted of a second offence and has a previous conviction—no greater punishment shall be imposed upon him by reason thereof unless the prosecutor satisfies the court that the accused, before making his plea, was notified that a greater punishment would be sought by reason thereof.

As I read the clause it would seem to open up a dangerous situation. An accused person may have a perfectly good defence to a crime with which he is about to be charged. This accused person has committed a previous offence. If he pleads guilty the crown prosecutor, or the prosecuting officer, can say that he will treat it as a first offence. But then he may say, "If you plead not guilty, we are going to treat it as a second offence."

I think a situation is being created here where, with all due respect for the many competent prosecution officers throughout the country, accused persons are going to be laid open to blackmail. For the life of me I do not know why we should have this clause in there. What good does it do a man, before he is convicted, to be told, "If you are convicted you will get more than you would get if you plead guilty."

As I read the section this is an invitation to police officers to hold a club over a man's head and to say, "Plead guilty, or else. And here is a law which says so. Here is a law which says that the judge can convict you of a second offence, and you will get a lot more. I am warning you that if you plead not guilty to this you are going to get the works." Without the knowledge of the minister, or without the knowledge of a responsible prosecuting officer, I can see that sort of thing happening. I am sure the minister will know instinctively that it will happen. I am wondering just what value the clause might have. The minister may say that the commissioners recommended it, or there may have been a recommendation from somewhere else. I have not gone into the history of it. But when I read it, it does seem to me to give too great opportunity for blackmail, and I suggest the minister should consider it carefully.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I am in complete disagreement with my hon. friend in what I consider is his misconstruction of the purpose of this clause. Let us suppose that an accused is convicted of a certain offence, and has served his penalty. Then he commits the offence a second time, and is again charged. Let us suppose further that it is one of those offences for which, upon being convicted a second time, he can receive a heavier penalty. Now, once we grant that our prosecutors are blackmailers, which I do not admit—

Mr. Nowlan: I said they were not.

Mr. Garson: The suggestion is that this offers a temptation to them to indulge in blackmail. I suggest that once a man has been convicted of an offence and has committed that same offence a second time, he thereby exposes himself to the possibility of being found guilty a second time and receiving a heavier penalty. I would say that if anyone wants to blackmail him in respect of that situation, all the ingredients of blackmail are there without this clause at all. For, in the terms of my hon. friend's approach to the matter—and I see him nodding his head in assent—all that would be necessary would be for the prosecuting counsel to say to the accused's counsel, "If your client pleads guilty to this charge we will charge it only as a first offence, and not as a second offence." In those circumstances what my hon. friend calls the act of blackmail would be complete whether or not the clause now under discussion is passed.

Now, I share with my hon. friend the very greatest distaste for any such tactics as that, but it is not this clause that makes such tactics possible. Indeed, the purpose of the clause is the very opposite. If a man has been convicted once of an offence and commits the same offence a second time, for which second offence he can receive a heavier penalty, does it not seem the most elementary justice that someone should let him know before proceeding with the second case, and before he decides to plead either guilty or not guilty, that it is going to be charged as a second offence? And that is just what this clause says.

It seems to me that, instead of being prejudicial to the accused, it is all in his favour. Under this clause he knows what he is up against. On the other hand if he is given no such notice at all and pleads guilty, or does not make an effort to defend himself and is found guilty, and if in those circumstances the crown comes along and says to the court, "Now, this is a second offence and we are going to ask for the increased penalty"—I say in those circumstances my hon. friend would have a right to say that such an accused was being unfairly treated.

The reason for this clause is that it was felt that, where the crown intended to seek higher punishment because of a previous conviction, an accused person should have notice, before pleading either guilty or not guilty, that greater punishment would be sought. This change received the support of the provinces at a joint meeting with the commissioners. The departments of the provincial attorneys general thought this was just a matter of elementary fairness, and that if the crown were making a charge of a second offence an accused should be told before his case was tried, not after.

Mr. Nowlan: In the first place I thought I made it clear, in any suggestion I made with respect to blackmail, that I was not referring to prosecuting officers. I said I did not think any responsible prosecuting officer would indulge in such practice. But I did say that some police officers would, and I say that without any hesitation. It would not arise through the action of any responsible prosecuting officer who was carrying out instructions either of the attorney general or of the minister of justice.

Mr. Garson: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Is it the crown prosecutor or the peace officer who decides as to what charge should be laid?

Mr. Nowlan: That is just where the beautiful theory advanced by the Minister of Justice comes in. It does not stand up in practice, because I suggest the police officer knows very well what charge will be laid, although he may not know the technical phrasing of it in all cases. But if he picks up a man who has been convicted before, the police officer may know there has been a former conviction, while the prosecuting officer may not even know that he had been arrested.

What I am objecting to is the fact that you now have it spelled out in black and white right in this Criminal Code, this massive document. Mind you, when I say "a police officer" I am not saying all police officers; but human nature being what it is, it is a fair statement to make that many of these police officers feel that they should get convictions. They probably feel that the man is guilty. They do not want to waste too much time in court. I am sure the Minister of Justice has to admit the logic of that. Although he cannot admit it officially, the minister knows it. I have seen scores and scores and hundreds of cases where police officers have urged, encouraged and sometimes threatened men with what would happen to them if they wasted time fighting the case. "Go and plead guilty, and we shall see that you get off easy".

That is the usual approach. Perhaps I should not say "usual", but it is an all too frequent one; I shall put it that way. Here you have spelled it out in black and white, so that any prisoner who can read can have it pointed out to him. Can you not hear—

Mr. Garson: Not "imposed upon him"; "would be sought".

Mr. Nowlan: I know, "would be sought"; but you know the effect these words would have in a cell at night. The prisoner is not going to get the fine nuances of that phrase which the Minister of Justice can put before us this afternoon in this chamber. The Minister of Justice of course quite properly cannot envisage himself in a cell at half-past two or three o'clock in the morning, because that would not happen to him, but it would happen and does happen to lots of people in this country.

My hon. friend says that in fairness to the accused it should be set forth. After all,

Mr. Chairman, there will be the odd individual, the odd accused, who through poverty and desperation will not have a lawyer to advise him; but in 99 per cent of the cases, in 999 out of 1,000 major crimes or major punishments—and that is the only thing with which we are concerned; we are not concerned with trifling things here—the accused will have retained a lawyer.

I say to you, sir, with all due respect to the superficial—and I am not saying this unkindly—or the apparent logic presented by the Minister of Justice, that it falls down under the harsh realities of the circumstances in which this section will be applied and that it is unnecessary, if you simply anticipate the fact that the accused will have a lawyer. If he cannot afford one, and it is a serious offence, the court will appoint a lawyer for him anyway. It is much better for his lawyer to advise him privately as to his rights and liabilities in making a plea than to have it printed and set forth here in the Criminal Code where I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, it will be used as I have suggested today.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 573 to 591 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 592—Allowance of appeal against conviction.

Mr. Nesbitt: I should like to say a word on paragraph (d), and I should also like to go back to the remarks the minister made earlier this afternoon. Paragraph (d) says:

—may quash a sentence and order the appellant to be kept in safe custody to await the pleasure of the lieutenant-governor where it is of the opinion that, although the appellant committed the act or made the omission charged against him, he was insane at the time the act was committed or the omission was made—

I wonder whether the minister would comment on whether it might be a good idea to use the same terms throughout the code with respect to mental illness, or insanity, or whatever it is called. I notice that the word "insane" is used further back, and the words "mentally ill" are also used. Then a little later on the word "insane" is used again. I was wondering whether the words "mentally ill" should not be added, because it is a more up-to-date term than "insane". The minister said earlier that the word "insane" should be retained to keep up with previous case law.

Mr. Garson: The decision as to the words that should be used in drafting a given clause of a bill obviously has to be based in part upon the cases or appeals to which it is to apply. And here clause 592 (1) (d) of the bill provides that the court of appeal upon hearing a criminal appeal may, amongst other things:

—quash a sentence and order the appellant to be kept in safe custody to await the pleasure of the lieutenant-governor where it is of the opinion that, although the appellant committed the act or made the omission charged against him, he was insane—

The condition that is being described here is not the kind of condition that my hon. friend has in mind in those other sections that we are dealing with. The insanity which is referred to here is insanity of that degree which constitutes a defence to a charge of criminal responsibility. I think myself that "insane" is the proper term to apply to the appellant in such a case. His is legal insanity.

In any event, this is one of the provisions that will come before the royal commission which is being set up. If the royal commission were to come to the view that there should be some change in this clause, then we can receive and consider its recommendations.

Mr. Nesbitt: One further question in that regard. I take it from the minister's remarks that at the present time he considers the terms "insane" and "mentally ill" are not synonymous.

Mr. Garson: I would think that would all depend upon what meaning was attached to "synonymous". If my hon. friend means that they are precisely synonymous I would say no, I do not think that they are precisely synonymous; but we shall have a better understanding when we get the royal commission's report as to whether the terms "mentally ill" and "insane" could be applied to that degree of insanity which should be recognized as a proper defence to a charge of criminal responsibility.

Mr. Ellis: When the royal commission brings in its reports may it be necessary to go back over some of these sections and make changes in view of the fact that we may get some new definition of the terms "insane" and "mentally ill"? In other words, is it not possible that the commission may give us an entirely different interpretation of the definition of the word "insane"?

Mr. Garson: We have set up this royal commission in order that it may examine insanity as a defence to a charge of criminal liability, and say whether the law relating to that subject should be amended and if so, to what extent and in what manner. In other words, we may expect from the report of the royal commission either an affirmation that the present law is satisfactory and sufficient, or a quite definite recommendation that the law should be changed; and the respects in which it should be changed will be indicated in the report.

As I have indicated on previous occasions in the discussion on Bill No. 7, we of the government have undertaken that when that report becomes available, we shall implement it if it commends itself to our judgment. If it does not commend itself to our judgment, then if any members of the opposition parties would like to bring in a bill implementing any portion of the report that we of the government might not see fit to implement, we shall expedite the consideration of the legislation which they bring in. In that way the House of Commons will have full opportunity to consider whether any amendment should be made to the criminal law arising out of the report of the royal commission.

Mr. Nesbitt: I do not like to labour this point, but there is just one thing more. In the event of nothing further happening as a result of the report of this commission, and no changes being made, I wonder if the minister would consider putting in the interpretation section of the act a definition of, first, insanity and, second, mental illness, since apparently they are not synonymous. I think it might save a lot of trouble at a later date.

Mr. Garson: If when the report has been received and perused by my hon. friend he finds that it recommends no change and he wants to press this suggestion, we will receive it with the same careful consideration we have always given all suggestions by the opposition.

Mr. Sinclair: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 600 to 622 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 623—Fines on corporations.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, perhaps we should stop once in a while so you can write your initials beside the clauses. Clause 623 is rewritten from certain sections of the old code in such a way as to put a limit upon the fine that may be imposed on a corporation where the offence is a summary conviction offence. Under the present section 1035 of the code the fine was in the discretion of the court, whether it was a summary conviction or indictable offence. The two types of offences seem now to have been separated. While it is still in the discretion of the court where it is an indictable offence, a limit of $1,000 has been provided where the offence is on summary conviction. Will the minister state why that limit was imposed. Does he think it is wise?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I think so. It hardly seems reasonable or fair in respect of a summary conviction matter, which may be a relatively trivial offence, the monetary penalty which can be imposed upon a corporation should be more than $1,000. It would not seem to me fair that on a summary conviction charge the judge or magistrate could impose a fine in the discretion of the court in excess of $1,000. That would be out of all proportion. It is only in those cases where a corporation is charged with an indictable offence that there is no limit upon the amount of fine which a court can impose when an accused corporation is found guilty.

Mr. Knowles: Have there been any instances in the past under the code as it now stands where a court has imposed an unreasonable fine on a corporation? It seems to me there have been cases the other way, particularly under the Combines Investigation Act, where some of the fines imposed have been little more than licence fees to carry on, although there may have been some changes made recently with respect to that act.

Mr. Garson: When my hon. friend refers to the fines imposed upon corporations in the combines cases he is illustrating the case in point. The reason the fines were, as he puts it, little more than licence fees was that at that time the limit which the court had jurisdiction to impose was the amount which was imposed. They imposed the largest amount they could.

As my hon. friend will remember, apart from the clause we are considering now we took the limit off the penalties under the combines act and provided that they should be in the discretion of the court. The clause we are considering here is the same sort of provision in respect to indictable offences against corporations under the code. When this bill is passed a corporation convicted of an indictable offence can be fined any amount, without restriction, which the court sees fit.

Mr. Knowles: The point I tried to make before was that under section 1035, subsection 3, of the code as it now stands there was no limit as to the fine to be imposed in respect of either summary conviction or indictable offences. The minister says that in respect of the Combines Investigation Act the limit which was there before has by amendment been taken off. In other words, it has been established that fines imposed in connection with monopolistic practices shall be in the discretion of the court. So far as the Criminal Code is concerned it has been in the discretion of the court until now. Section 1035 of the code reads:

> Any corporation, convicted of an indictable or other offence punishable with imprisonment, may in lieu of the prescribed punishment be fined in the discretion of the court before which it is convicted.

I do not see a limitation anywhere else in section 1035 or section 1035A. As the minister says, since he has been Minister of Justice a change has been made in the Combines Investigation Act moving in the other direction and taking off the limit. I ask again why in this instance a move is made in this direction, namely putting on a limit. The minister says that a matter dealt with on summary conviction may be trifling. He pointed out to me when I complained about the severity of certain sentences that had been imposed on individuals that those were maximum sentences and the court could have imposed a lesser sentence. Surely the same point applies here, except that here we have a maximum of $1,000.

Mr. Garson: I am sure my hon. friend will agree at once that if in relation to summary conviction offences the ceiling of $1,000 was removed, which is what he seems to advocate, it would still be open to the court to impose the most trifling of penalties. The $1,000 is the maximum fine for summary conviction offences. The $1,000 he sees in this clause now is the maximum. The court can impose less than that, and it could impose less than that if there were no limit on the maximum. But the basis for setting a maximum of $1,000 is that this is a proper penalty for a summary conviction offence. The limit for a person under that heading is $500. We believe that a corporation should be charged more, that it should be charged double, but that there should be some limit to it.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask this question. Have there been any instances under the code as it now stands where, for summary conviction offences, fines have been imposed which were thought to be excessive?

Mr. Garson: Which were thought to be . . . ?

Mr. Knowles: Which were thought to be excessive; that is, were thought by the minister to be excessive, not by the corporation.

Mr. Garson: I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not know of any fines imposed for summary conviction offences upon corporations. None have come to my attention. This present provision I think justifies itself in these terms. As I am sure my hon. friends of the opposition would agree, there is a great difference indeed between summary conviction offences on the one hand and indictable offences upon the other, and there should be a correspondingly wide difference in penalty. There is and there always has been a wide difference in the penalty imposed upon individual citizens for summary conviction offences on the one hand and indictable offences on the other. All that is being done in this clause is to continue that same distinction in the case of penalties upon convicted corporations. When one looks at many of the summary conviction offences he will find that $1,000 is quite a lot of money to pay for them. If there is any offence that is of a really serious character that can be charged as an indictable offence against a corporation, and is so charged, the corporation can be fined without any limit at all.

Mr. Ellis: The minister pointed out that the maximum fine for individuals, I believe, was $500 and for corporations $1,000.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Ellis: Does the minister feel that is a fair relationship, having regard to an offence committed by an individual on the one hand and an offence committed by a corporation on the other? Does he feel that twice the maximum would be a fair difference between the maximum fine on an individual and the maximum fine on a corporation?

Mr. Garson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I certainly think that is a fair basis in respect of summary conviction offences; and it applies only to summary conviction offences. Not only that, but the magistrate or judge who is imposing the fine, in fixing the amount, can take into account the resources of the corporation on the one hand or the resources of the individual upon the other. The only question is as to whether, for a relatively trifling or summary conviction offence, there should be a fine of more than $1,000. This clause affirms that there should not be. The real point under this penalty section, so far as corporations are concerned, is the penalty that should be imposed upon them for serious offences, indictable offences; and as far as that is concerned, there is no limit whatever.

Mr. Knowles: And there was before.

Mr. Ellis: What is the purpose of a fine, Mr. Chairman? The purpose of fining an individual or corporation is in order to impose some measure of punishment for an offence which has been committed, irrespective of the type of offence. The fine levied against a corporation, which might be a multimillion-dollar corporation, if it is set at $1,000, does not constitute any appreciable measure of punishment, no matter what the offence is. What I am trying to get at is the principle behind a fine. For an individual, a maximum of $500 might be something quite serious; but I do not think the minister would suggest that even for a summary conviction a maximum fine of $1,000 is going to make much difference to a large corporation.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have just one further comment to make on this matter of a maximum fine of $1,000. It would seem to me that it is a little bit low, for this reason. In the first place, while the minister said the more serious offences in the code were indictable offences—and I go along with that statement—nevertheless there is in the code one section at least as to which I can certainly envisage a situation arising where a corporation could commit an offence which could be most serious. I refer to clause 163, which states as follows:

> Every one other than a peace officer engaged in the discharge of his duty who has in his possession in a public place or who deposits, throws or injects or causes to be deposited, thrown or injected in, into or near any place, > (a) an offensive volatile substance . . .

—and so on. Situations arise where large factories—and I am not referring again to the Saskatchewan river—make products which give off extremely volatile substances causing unpleasant odours. There has been complaint about them and nothing is done. They may be fined. I see that clause 163 deals with an offence that is punishable on summary conviction. It is quite possible that a corporation could cause a terrific amount of damage. Some large chemical plant or feed manufacturing plant could cause a great deal of damage and discomfort to a community; and a fine such as $1,000 would be, to use the vernacular, just peanuts.

I was just wondering whether the minister had considered that possibility. It is also a fact that many acts other than the Criminal Code say that if certain offences are committed, they are punishable on summary conviction. I cannot think of an appropriate example at the moment, not having them before me, but there are dozens of other statutes and acts which provide penalties on summary conviction which, when applied to a corporation, might be relatively small but when applied to a person might be very serious indeed. I cite this clause 163 merely as an example of what could happen.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister not consider that possibly such clauses as 163 might be exempted? Surely it is possible that a corporation might be guilty of a very serious offence under clause 163. As is pointed out, the maximum fine of $1,000 does not seem to be appropriate in that case.

Mr. Garson: The point which has been raised by the hon. member for Oxford is one with a great deal of merit. But I would think that the better way of dealing with it would be to provide in clause 163, "is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction or by indictment"—

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes.

Mr. Garson: —leaving it to the prosecutor to decide, upon the facts of the case, whether it was serious enough to proceed by indictment. I do not think it is a wise policy to have a serious offence punishable on summary conviction and then by setting a heavy penalty for that serious offence thereby, on the basis of that one serious offence, establish an exorbitant maximum penalty for all summary conviction offences committed by corporations. If one examines carefully either the present code or this new bill for those summary conviction offences which a corporation can commit, and which are a great deal more limited than those which an individual can commit, I think he will see that, in relation to those offences, the maximum fine of $1,000 is not out of line. It certainly would be out of line with regard to the nuisance although, as I think my hon. friend would agree from his experience as a crown prosecutor, every time that act was committed, it would be a new offence; and $1,000 an offence would run into quite a bit of money.

Mr. Nesbitt: In answer to the remarks of the minister may I say that I had a plant in mind whose name I hesitate to give for various reasons. But I can well envisage a plant producing such a product that only when they were using certain substances, which substances might only be used for a day or so at a time, would something like this be produced. If the plant is sufficiently large it might be well worth paying $1,000 each time that took place. Therefore I think the minister's suggestion of an indictable as well as a summary conviction offence under 163 is excellent.

Mr. Fulton: They might save up all their noxious materials and discharge them once a year.

On clause 626—Fines and penalties go to provincial treasury.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister a question under this section. I think it is the correct one. I was informed by a person I consider to be quite responsible that when the R.C.M.P. lay a charge for an offence involving the operation of sweepstakes, particularly the Irish sweepstakes, the case is heard in Ottawa and the fine or any moneys seized are paid to the city of Ottawa rather than to the municipality in which the offence occurred.

Mr. Knowles: No wonder Ottawa's taxes are going down.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid, in all candour, that I cannot explain that. I would have to make inquiries, find out if that is the case and raise the matter when we next meet.

Mr. Fulton: Is that not under some postal regulation?

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 627 to 629 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 630—Order for restitution of property.

Mr. Fulton: I am not very happy about subsection 2 of 630. It reads as follows:

> Where an accused is tried for an indictable offence but is not convicted, and the court finds that an indictable offence has been committed, the court may order that any property obtained by the commission of the offence shall be restored to the person entitled to it, if at the time of the trial the property is before the court . . .

What bothers me here is that an accused may be convicted of an offence for which he is indicted and charged, yet the court may order that property obtained by the commission of some other indictable offence, which it can only imagine has been committed because the accused has not been found guilty of it, be restored to some other person. The section seems to me to be full of difficulties. I think it is a new provision. I have been comparing it with the section noted on the righthand page, section 1050. It seems to me that the relevant part of 1050 is subsection 3 which provides in part:

> . . . if the jury declares, as it may do, or if, in case the offender is tried without a jury, it is proved to the satisfaction of the court or tribunal by whom he is tried, that such property belongs to such prosecutor or witness . . .

—then the property may be restored to such prosecutor or witness. In other words, under section 1050 you have to prove before the court in which the accused is actually tried that the property belongs to a specific person before it may be restored. On the other hand, under clause 630 you do not have to prove that it belongs to anybody. It just depends upon whether the court is of opinion that some offence has been committed, even although the accused has not been convicted of that offence. The court may then order restitution of the property to the person entitled to it. There is no necessity for that degree of proof which is necessary under section 1050.

In view of the fact that under the new clause the accused will have been charged and found not guilty of the offence for which he was charged, I think it opens up too wide and too vague a possibility that incorrect orders may be made with regard to the ownership of property. The mind of the court may somehow or other be prejudiced against the accused, perhaps by his conduct in court or some such thing, and I am sure the minister will agree that there is a very wide possibility there of making unfair orders with regard to property found in the possession of an accused who has nevertheless been found not guilty of the offence with which he was charged.

Mr. Garson: I do not think I can agree with my hon. friend. I do not think we can apply ourselves to the problem of providing a criminal law for Canada upon the assumption that all the courts are incompetent and not fit to exercise discretion. Once that reasonable degree of judgment and wisdom is conceded to the courts, then surely it is not unreasonable, where there has been an indictable offence involving property that belongs, from the clear evidence before the court, to Mr. John Doe, for the court to make an order restoring that property to its rightful owner. Even though the accused, who has taken this property, may get off because the crown cannot prove the case against him beyond a reasonable doubt; yet if the court is satisfied that the property belongs to Mr. John Doe and that he is lawfully entitled to it then the court can, by order at that time in summary manner, give him his property and not leave him in the position where, when some person has committed an offence in respect of property belonging to him, he is going to be put to considerable legal costs to get his own property back.

Mr. Fulton: I quite agree with the minister that it is not fair that a person unlawfully deprived of property should have to go to unnecessary expense to get it back. We could not be more closely in agreement there. But I do think the wording of subsection 3 of section 1050 is safer than the wording of the new clause. Let us read the whole section. It reads:

> The court or tribunal may also, if it sees fit, award restitution of the property taken from the prosecutor, or any witness for the prosecution, by such offence, although the person indicted is not convicted thereof, if the jury declares, as it may do, or if, in case the offender is tried without a jury, it is proved to the satisfaction of the court or tribunal by whom he is tried, that such property belongs to such prosecutor or witness . . .

There it is very definite and very closely tied down to the person whose property it was. It has to be proved to the satisfaction of the court that such property belongs to such prosecutor or witness. I think that is an excellent provision, and I do not believe any such person should be put to the necessity of bringing a civil action to recover his property. But I think the principle should be preserved in the former words rather than in the new words. Perhaps it is just another case where I quarrel with the draftsmanship. I am sorry, but I cannot help doing it.

Mr. Garson: I am glad to hear my hon. friend say that he agrees with the idea that a man who has already been prejudiced by the fact that his property has been stolen should not be put to the expense of taking civil action to get it back.

Mr. Fulton: There is no question about that.

Mr. Garson: I thought my hon. friend was perhaps questioning the propriety of that idea.

Mr. Fulton: No, not the principle.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend agrees with that point, then the only objection he is taking to the clause is that it does not provide a proper means of accomplishing that end.

Mr. Fulton: I question whether it requires the proper degree of proof which it seems to me the old section clearly requires.

Mr. Garson: All right. Let us see the degree of proof it does require. It says:

> Where an accused is tried for an indictable offence but is not convicted, and the court finds that an indictable offence has been committed—

They may have got the wrong man, but the property has been stolen. They are not sure of the man, but they are sure of the property.

> —the court may order that any property obtained by the commission of the offence—

—without identifying any accused with that offence—

> —shall be restored to the person—

To what person?

> —to the person entitled to it—

To whom should it be restored except the person who is entitled to it? How will the court decide whether a man is entitled to it except on the evidence that the owner has brought before them? How could the court decide under the old section as to the proper possession of property except by evidence? And if the owner can show he is entitled to it, then why should he not have an order from the court saying he can take it away without any more formalities or expense?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 631—Costs to defendant in case of libel.

Mr. Fulton: I have a question to ask here. I notice that under this clause the accused or the defendant in a prosecution for defamatory libel, if judgment is given for him, may recover his costs. I have no quarrel with that at all, but it raises a question with regard to the right of a prosecutor or informant under certain cases to recover costs by having an order made by the court for the payment of those costs by the accused. This right was given under section 1044 of the code, and I notice on consulting the concordance that section 1044 has been dropped. Would the minister say why it was dropped and why the prosecutor or informant, previously entitled to have an order made for the payment of his costs in certain cases, appears no longer to have that right? I might say I have consulted one of my colleagues who was a member of the house committee last year, and he cannot recall that there was any discussion on that point.

Mr. Garson: In dropping the section the commission considered first the difficulty in arriving at a proper amount without turning a criminal prosecution into a trial of an issue of damages, second the existence of a civil remedy, and third the duty of citizens to assist in the prosecution of offenders. As the result of such changes, costs in criminal cases will not be awarded, except on summary conviction matters and to a successful defendant in a prosecution for libel.

Mr. Fulton: It seems to me the minister has made an argument just exactly the opposite of the argument he made on the previous section. I fully agree that a person deprived of his property by a criminal offence should be entitled to have it restored to him by the court without being put to the further expense of a civil case. I agree with that. Now the minister is using the reverse argument and stating because of the existence of a civil remedy in many cases, there should be no order in criminal proceedings for the payment of costs to an aggrieved person. The argument does not seem to me to apply, as I pointed out, under section 1044 which, it is true, is for limited cases.

Mr. Garson: Section 1044; what subsection?

Mr. Fulton: I shall read subsection 1:

> Any court by which and any judge under part XVIII, or magistrate under part XVI, by whom judgment is pronounced or recorded, upon the conviction of any person for treason or any indictable offence, in addition to such sentence as may otherwise by law be passed, may condemn such person to the payment of the whole or any part of the costs or expenses incurred in and about the prosecution and conviction for the offence of which he is convicted, if to such court or judge it seems fit so to do.
> 2. Such court or judge may include in the amount to be paid such moderate allowance for a loss of time as the court or judge, by affidavits or other inquiry and examination, ascertains to be reasonable.
> 2A. Such magistrate may also include in the amount to be paid the fees, for the appropriate items, as mentioned in the tariff set out in section seven hundred and seventy of this act.

Expenses and allowances for loss of time and so on could have been ordered to be paid by convicted persons under section 1044. That right appears to have been discontinued. I bring it up here because the clause now under consideration, 631, gives an accused person in certain cases, where judgment is given for him, a right to his costs. Yet as I point out the right to recover expenses which was previously there for an informant or prosecutor for whom judgment was given or on whose information or prosecution judgment was given is taken away.

Mr. Garson: Is this not the distinction that can properly be drawn between the two cases to which my hon. friend referred, namely the act of our not carrying forward clause 1044 allowing costs against the accused in criminal proceedings, on the one hand, and yet allowing the successful defendant in prosecution for defamatory libel to get costs against the prosecutor? I have already stated the commission's reasons for dropping section 1044 of the present code.

I suggest that the distinction between these two cases is this. Where A libels B, B has the choice of two courses of action. One is to take a civil suit for damages against A. The other is to lay an information against A for defamatory libel. If the proceedings which ensue are a civil action the defendant A, if he succeeds, will get costs. If the proceedings are a prosecution for defamatory libel he would not get costs against the unsuccessful plaintiff but for the clause we are discussing. Thus it will be seen that the basis for the present clause is that where a person has been libelled and chooses the method of laying an information for defamatory libel, if he does not succeed in proving his case, he should reimburse the accused for the expense to which this prosecution for defamatory libel has put the accused. I think this is a proper provision.

Mr. Fulton: So do I. I am sorry that I have not made myself clear. I agree with this provision, but why should a successful prosecutor not get his costs as he used to be able to do under section 1044? A successful accused may recover costs under clause 631, but a successful prosecutor may not recover costs because section 1044 has been dropped.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with this bill tomorrow in the hope that we can complete it.

Mr. Knowles: On that point, Mr. Speaker, does the minister mean complete the entire consideration of the code, or complete the first run through it?

Mr. Harris: I was not quite as optimistic as my hon. friend, but if he will co-operate we can do it all in one day.

Mr. Knowles: I think the minister should be more communicative as to what the intention is. There have been some discussions between the Minister of Justice and representatives of parties on this side of the house as to the order in which we might deal with the contentious subjects, and I think we should know what the plan is.

Mr. Fulton: I think the leader of the house is just having his little joke.

Mr. Harris: Sometimes I am prompted to do so by the actions of the hon. member opposite. But, seriously, if it takes until let us say this time tomorrow evening to complete the first run-through, and if hon. members do not choose then to go back and start over again, we would accommodate them by going on with public works. But I would prefer that we go right back and take the sections which are standing over.

Mr. Knowles: Could final settlement of that be left until tomorrow?

Mr. Harris: Yes, certainly.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

REPORT ON ALLEGED COMBINE RESPECTING GASOLINE, VANCOUVER

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling the report of the restrictive trade practices commission concerning an alleged combine in the distribution and sale of gasoline at retail in the Vancouver area. The usual consideration will be given to what further steps should be taken in this matter.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPROVAL OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION REPORT

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house, I move:

That the report of the civil service commission respecting the permanent appointment of certain employees of the House of Commons, laid upon the table on March 9, 1954, be now approved.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN PETITIONS TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved:

That the petition of Hazel Irene McKay Puttee and of Albert Thornton for bills of divorce, presented on March 9, 1954, together with the report made thereon by the clerk of petitions on March 10, 1954, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

FARM LOANS TO MARKET GARDENERS

Mr. Knowles:

1. By provinces, how many market gardeners have received loans from the Canadian farm loan board during each of the past five years?

2. What is (a) the lowest; (b) the highest; (c) the average amount of such loans?

3. What is the total amount involved in such loans?

Mr. Benidickson: I have spoken to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and explained that the record of loans made by the Canadian farm loan board is not classified by type of farm. Accordingly, it would be impossible to answer his question with any exactitude without an examination of more than 8,000 files. I understand it is not his desire that this work be undertaken. I assure him and the house, however, that market gardeners as such are not disqualified for loans under the farm loan act. Under the circumstances I understand that the hon. member is prepared to withdraw his question.

Mr. Knowles: I guess I have to accept that as an answer, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

FEDERAL HEALTH GRANTS

Mr. Holowach:

1. What amount in grants have been made to each of the provinces of Canada for each of the years 1949 to 1953, in hospital construction, tuberculosis control, cancer control, mental health control, crippled children and other health services?

2. What is the total amount of the above grants during this period?

3. Were agreements made with the provincial governments in this connection?

4. If so, with what provinces and on what basis of contribution?

5. Were any of the above grants given outright and unconditionally?

6. If so, to what provinces and in what amounts?

Mr. Robertson:

1 and 2. See table below.

3 and 4. As a result of the announcement made by the prime minister on May 14, 1948, regarding the national health grants program various orders in council have been passed covering the details of the program.

Copies of these orders in council have been submitted to the provinces and each province has taken advantage of the provisions of the orders in council by submitting projects for financial assistance under the program, on the terms and conditions set down in the orders in council.

5. No. All grants have been made under the terms and conditions laid down in the orders in council.

6. See answer to No. 5 above.

Questions

COMMUNITY MENTAL HEALTH CLINICS

Mrs. Shipley:

What progress has been made in the establishment of community mental health clinics since the national health grants program was inaugurated?

Mr. Robertson:

In 1948 there were 17 community mental health clinics in Canada. At the end of the first five years of the health grants program there were 77 such clinics most of which were supported wholly or in part by federal health grants funds.

MENTAL HEALTH PERSONNEL

Mrs. Shipley:

How many and what types of mental health personnel have been trained since the national health grants program started?

Mr. Robertson:

Psychiatrists	139
Psychologists	137
Psychiatric nurses	119
Psychiatric social workers	90
Other	54
Total	539

FAMILY ALLOWANCE PAYMENTS, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Balcom:

What family allowance payments were paid in Nova Scotia, during the last fiscal or calendar year, whichever is convenient, showing (a) districts, if available; (b) number of families receiving this allowance?

Mr. Robertson:

During the fiscal year 1952-53—$16,309,875.

(a) A breakdown of this amount by districts is not available;

(b) As at March 31, 1953—94,414.

WARM AIR FURNACES—SALES TAX REFUNDS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. In view of the decision of the tariff board on January 20, 1954 in the appeal launched by Furnace-Aire Limited, does the Department of National Revenue intend to refund the sales tax paid on warm air furnaces, including fuel burning devices and the necessary control, when sold or shipped by the manufacturer as a complete unit after September 26, 1951?

2. If so, what is the estimate of the department as to the total amount of refund to which manufacturers will be entitled?

3. What is the estimated number of consumers who would be entitled to the refund?

4. What procedure is required on the part of a consumer to secure such refund?

5. What regulations have been made requiring manufacturers to pass on the refund to the consumer?

Mr. McCann:

1. The department has and is still refunding the sales tax paid on fuel burning and other devices forming a component part of a "packaged unit" furnace from September 26, 1951, where applications have been made. Warm air furnaces themselves have been exempted since 1945 and no sales tax was collected on them nor on that portion of the "packaged unit" representing the furnace.

2. No breakdown is kept according to commodities either for sales tax collected or refunds paid, so it is not possible to supply this information.

3. No information.

4. The customer applies to his supplier who in turn applies to the manufacturer or importer who supplied the equipment, the latter in turn makes application to the department for refund.

5. None.

MARGARINE AND BUTTER—IMPORTS AND PRODUCTION

Mr. Pommer:

1. What amount of margarine was imported into Canada in 1953, and what was the value of same?

2. What amount of margarine was manufactured in Canada in 1953, and what was the value of same?

SECURITY SCREENING—APPEAL PROCEDURE

Mr. Fulton:

With reference to suggestions for an appeal procedure to be made available to government employees released or transferred on security grounds, as outlined at page 4004 of Hansard for 1950, and any other such suggestions, has the government worked out any appeal procedure, public or private, on these or other lines?

Mr. Dickey: The government continually has its security measures under review and the appeal procedure set forth on page 4004 of Hansard for 1950, together with other possible measures, has from time to time been considered.

While such appeal procedures would have the appearance of equity and would seem to absolve ministers of some measure of unpleasant responsibility, the impossibility of disclosing to the persons concerned the evidence about them has so far prevented any really satisfactory appeal procedure being devised.

When difficult security cases arise departments may and do consult the security panel for advice on the evidence before making a decision. This consultation in a number of cases provides at an earlier stage the kind of safeguard envisaged by an appeal procedure.

2. What are the dimensions of the building?
3. For how many years has it been leased?
4. Who is the owner of the building?
5. Did the owner of this building receive any payments over and above the rental?
6. If so, in what amount and what are the details of such payment?

Mr. Bourget:

SECURITY SCREENING—SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. Fulton:

1. Was the present Secretary of State a member of, or secretary of, or did he have any responsibility to or for, the security panel at any time while he was a civil servant?
2. If so, is he now at liberty to answer officially any questions with relation to the work of the security panel, past or present?

Mr. Dickey:

1 and 2. It is the established and general practice to preserve the anonymity of civil servants serving on interdepartmental committees. It has already been indicated that this panel is made up of senior officers of those government departments and offices most concerned with security matters.

SECURITY SCREENING—SECRETARIAT

Mr. Fulton:

Does the government security panel have a secretariat?

Mr. Dickey: Yes.

UNION STATION, TORONTO, MAIL BOX

Mr. Knowles:

1. Is there a mail box of the size that will take parcels, etc., in or at the Union station, in Toronto?
2. If not, for what reason?
3. Will consideration be given to placing such a parcel post mail box in or at the Toronto Union station?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare):

1. No.

2. No public demand, as complete mailing privileges and postal information available 250 feet east of station.

3. Yes. Parcel box has now been installed experimentally to determine what public use will be made of it.

COAL—PRODUCTION AND SUBSIDIES

Mr. Balcom:

1. How much coal is produced per man, per shift, in (a) Nova Scotia; (b) New Brunswick; (c) Alberta?
2. What subsidies for coal are provided, or what assistance is given each province?
3. What is the average production per man, per shift, in the mines of the United States?

Mr. Prudham:

1. (a) Nova Scotia, 1952, 2·00 net tons; (b) New Brunswick, 1952, 3·04 net tons; (c) Alberta, 1952, 4·79 net tons.

2. Assistance is provided in respect of the Canadian coal mining industry by transportation subventions under regulations established by various orders in council, by loans under the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act and by payments under the Canadian Coal Equality Act. Details regarding these forms of assistance are given in the annual report of the dominion coal board for the fiscal year 1952-53.

3. U.S. bituminous mines 1951, 7·04 net tons.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

VEGETABLE OIL IMPORTS

Mr. Pommer:

1. What amount of vegetable oils was imported into Canada in 1953?
2. What was the value of such imports?
3. From what countries did such imports come, and in what amounts from each country?

Mr. Dickey: Return tabled.

INCOME TAX

USE OF RECEIPTS FOR HOSPITAL BILLS BY BRITISH COLUMBIA RESIDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Will residents of British Columbia be able to use receipts for hospital bills for income tax purposes now that they are to pay hospital insurance premiums by way of a 2 per cent increase in the provincial retail sales tax plus $1 a day co-insurance charge payable by the individual?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I am not in a position to give a definite answer until such time as details of the bill are known to the department.

INQUIRY AS TO PROTESTS FROM WESTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister or his department received any protests from the farmers of western Canada about the methods employed or the attitudes taken by income tax inspectors? If so, is any action being taken?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Well, Mr. Speaker, as might naturally be expected, we do receive protests from farmers with reference to the methods and attitudes of income tax inspectors.

I may say that these cases are looked into as they come along, and they are dealt with on their merits.

COMMUNICATIONS

SALE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH SYSTEM—PROVISION FOR EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): In the absence of the Minister of Transport I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary assistant. Is the government going through with its plan to transfer the government operated telephone and telegraph system in British Columbia to private companies on April 1? If so, is the minister now able to comment on what provision is being made for those in the employ of the government at the present time?

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): The minister is unavoidably absent from the city today on official business. I received a copy of my hon. friend's question only a few minutes before I entered the house, and did not have sufficient time to look into the matter. Therefore I shall take his question as notice.

Mr. Winch: May I just add that the question was filed at 9.30 this morning.

[Later:]

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to make a request of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport, arising out of a question asked by the member for Vancouver East and the answer given. When the parliamentary assistant brings the matter to the attention of the Minister of Transport would he ask him at the same time to please make a full report on the present state of negotiations between the government and the private concerns, particularly the telephone company, with regard to the sale of the government-owned assets and the measures being taken to protect the employees of the government concerned.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the parliamentary assistant. Will he ask the Minister of Transport to table in this house a copy of the survey report which the minister told us several weeks ago was being made by the British Columbia Telephone Company and the Canadian National Telegraphs into the matter of taking over the government-operated system in British Columbia?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): May I take that as notice, also?

TEXTILES

CLOSING OF PLANTS—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the statement made by the minister on March 9 to a delegation from the textile workers' union of America to the effect that the Canadian textile industry is overexpanded, may I ask if the government is prepared to take any measures to deal with a situation under which so many textile plants are closing and others are operating on short time?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The government has already taken such measures as it deems fit up to the present time to deal with the situation, and the matter is continuously under consideration.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister if it is the intention of the government to take any steps toward the reduction of the sales tax on textile products with a view to assisting this industry in its difficulties and the workers employed in that industry?

Mr. McCann: This is a matter of government policy, and I have no doubt any changes that are made will be announced by the Minister of Finance when he brings down his budget.

GRAIN

WHEAT AND BARLEY—PROPOSED GIFT BY UNITED STATES TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce supplementary to my question of Monday last. Can the minister say what quantity of grain is involved in the current negotiations with Japan? What assurances have been given that would safeguard our Japanese market for the next two years?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it has been well established that questions are not answered having to do with sales of wheat and negotiations for sales of wheat in the current crop year. Therefore I cannot answer the question.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Have any representations or any protests been made to the United States government with regard to the circumstances of the gift of 500,000 tons of wheat to Japan?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that it is intended to give 500,000 tons of wheat to Japan. In the second place, that would seem to be the business of the United States government regarding which that government would not welcome protests from other countries.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR DEBATE BEFORE REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would he, on behalf of the government, give consideration to having a debate on external affairs before having the estimates submitted to a committee of the house? Would he also say when it is expected that the house committee will begin to consider those estimates?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the house knows, we have already had an opportunity to discuss external affairs. However, shortly after we get into supply on external affairs it is my intention to move that the estimates be referred to the committee and that will, as usual, provide an opportunity for debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Can the minister give any indication when that might be expected, so plans can be made accordingly?

Mr. Pearson: I hope it will be shortly, but that depends on the progress made in the house on other business.

INQUIRY AS TO REASON FOR PRIME MINISTER NOT VISITING FORMOSA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): I desire to ask a question of the government, through the minister of external affairs, notice of which I have not sent him. Was it the result of accident or deliberate planning that our Prime Minister's itinerary did not include vitally strategic Formosa and Canada's loyal world war II ally, Chiang Kai-shek?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No political significance of any kind should be read into the fact that the Prime Minister was not able to visit Formosa on this tour.

ARMED FORCES

CANADIAN ACTIVE ARMY REGIMENTS—QUESTION OF SENIORITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence with reference to a question answered yesterday. Are the regiments of the Canadian active army forces shown on page 2844 of Hansard for March 10, 1954, listed in order of precedence or seniority?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have neither the list of units as I gave them yesterday nor the order of precedence. This is not a particularly urgent matter, so I could look it up and write the hon. member.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask a supplementary question of the minister. I refer the minister to the question he answered yesterday. The answer to that question showed the most recently formed regiment in the Canadian active army, the Regiment of Canadian Guards—

Some hon. Members: Order. Question.

Mr. Churchill: —as being first in seniority.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will come to his question.

Mr. Churchill: I have just asked it.

Mr. Claxton: I never heard a thing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: It was your own followers who were so noisy.

Mr. Churchill: I shall be glad to repeat it because I think it is a matter of some importance. I am asking the minister if, in the list of regiments shown in the answer given to me yesterday, the most recently formed regiment, the Regiment of Canadian Guards, is listed in order of seniority.

Mr. Claxton: I assured the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, that I did not have with me, and I do not regularly carry, the list of regiments according to seniority.

Mr. Churchill: Is it not normal practice, in giving a list of regiments in the army, to list them in order of seniority?

Mr. Claxton: I must say again that I could not hear the question. Does the hon. member ask me if we printed the list in Hansard in order of seniority? I have no information on that. He did not ask for the list in order of seniority, and I do not know whether or not they were printed in that order but I shall look into it.

ESKIMOS

REGISTERED TRAP LINES—RIGHTS OF CANADIAN ESKIMOS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources arising out of a press dispatch appearing in last night's Ottawa Journal concerning Alaskan Eskimos. Is it true that Alaskan Eskimos living in the Mackenzie river delta hold registered trap lines, while there are a number of Canadian Eskimos who are without trap lines? If so, is the minister's department giving consideration to the prior right of Canadian Eskimos in this regard?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I just came back in Ottawa a few minutes ago, and I should like to take the question as notice. I shall be in a position to give an answer tomorrow.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—REQUEST FOR FURTHER INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Would the Minister of National Health and Welfare say what has been found as a result of the tests to ascertain the causes of pollution of the North Saskatchewan river, that were made some miles east of Edmonton? What is the present position of the co-operative efforts between the provinces and the federal government in connection with this matter; and would the minister give a general report on the situation?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend will be pleased to learn that the government of Alberta and the technical officers of my own department have advised that the pollution concerning taste and odour in the North Saskatchewan river has been brought under control at the source. This was due to a diversion of wastes that was made effective on March 4. I must say, however, to my hon. friend—and he will not be pleased with this, although he will realize that this is not the fault of anyone—that his own city of Prince Albert will not get the benefit of this control for three weeks, until the waters will have passed that distinguished city.

FRED ROSE

REPORTED RUMOURS OF RETURN TO CANADA—SECURITY MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. Is the government taking precautions or security measures regarding the re-entry of Fred Rose into Canada, if Fred Rose is not already in Montreal.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the government is at all times maintaining security measures in respect to matters such as that to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. Fleming: That is no answer.

Mr. Dufresne: May I ask a supplementary question. I should like to have a definite statement regarding the re-entry of Fred Rose into Canada.

Mr. Garson: I believe it was the day before yesterday that the hon. member, without notice, asked me if I had heard of the rumours which he said were prevalent around Montreal with regard to the possible re-entry into Canada of Fred Rose. My answer was no. I still have not heard any such rumours. Therefore when my hon. friend asks me another question, again without notice, the only thing I can say to him is that no rumours of Fred Rose's re-entry into Canada have reached my ear, and that we are maintaining the customary security precautions.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, March 10, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose we were discussing clause 631. Shall the clause carry?

On clause 631—Costs to defendant in case of libel.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed to the discussion of clause 631, I wonder if it would not be useful and helpful to all members if the minister could outline his plans for the further consideration of the remaining clauses of the Criminal Code. As the minister is aware, I am asking this question on the basis of certain information of which two or three of us are in possession. However, it occurs to me that it might be well for the entire committee to have that information.

I believe it is understood that today we shall continue with the bill, dealing with the clauses remaining to be dealt with; but that so far as today's program is concerned, we will just make the first run-through. This would then leave quite a number of clauses, something of the order of 50 or 60, that have been stood over, some because they were highly contentious and some for other reasons.

As the minister is aware, there has been an unofficial meeting of the minister with representatives of the opposition parties; and as a result of that unofficial meeting the clauses allowed to stand have been placed in certain groups. I have that list, thanks to the minister who sent it to me; but it occurs to me that it might be helpful to the committee as a whole if the minister were to place that list on Hansard. The whole list might be put on, placing the various clauses in their respective groups. If this is done, then when we come to those days when we are to continue discussion of the Criminal Code, announcement could be made that on a certain day we would take the clauses in group 1, group 2, group 3, group 4 or group 5, as the case may be. Perhaps the minister would consider the suggestion I have made.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend has already covered a lot of the ground he has asked me to cover. I wish to express my appreciation to him for having done so.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I cannot hear a word the minister is saying; and it is not the minister's fault, either.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Garson: As I was saying, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has already covered a good deal of the ground which—

The Chairman: Order. I cannot hear what the minister is saying, and I must ask hon. members to maintain silence.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, as I have already said on two occasions the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has already covered a good deal of the ground that he has suggested I should cover. He is quite right when he says that a few days ago the hon. member himself, representing his party, the hon. member for Kamloops, representing the official opposition, and the hon. member for Red Deer, representing the Social Credit Party, met with me to discuss the manner in which we might expedite the consideration of those clauses in the bill which, in our preliminary consideration of it in this committee of the whole, we have set aside for further attention.

In order to do this we had thought we might continue with the consideration of those clauses in the bill which thus far we have not considered, and that when that was completed we would return to a consideration of those clauses set to one side, dealing first of all with those which seemed to us to be of a less contentious nature, reserving until the end those matters of major importance which we thought were worthy of arrangements as to time for debate, and perhaps also as to length of time to be taken in debate. Carrying out that idea, we divided into six groups the clauses set aside. Perhaps, for the convenience of hon. members I should place those groups on record.

Group No. 1 deals with unrelated clauses which are not considered of primary importance. In each instance I shall indicate the name of the hon. member who asked to have the matter stood aside. They are as follows: clause 16, subject matter insanity, the hon. member for Kamloops; clause 102, subject matter, frauds upon the government, the hon. member for Vancouver South; clause 116, subject matter, witness giving contradictory evidence, the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; clause 119, subject matter, obstructing justice, the hon. member for Vancouver East; clause 120, public mischief—in respect of which I understand an amendment will be offered—the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; clause 164, no apparent means of support, or vagrancy, the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—and again, an amendment will be offered; clause 206, punishment for murder, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I might point out that I understand this is stood over as a matter of form in the hope that by some miracle the report of the special parliamentary committee on capital punishment might be received before we have completed dealing with the bill here.

Then, to continue: clause 221 (2), failing to stop at the scene of an accident, the hon. member for Kamloops—and I understand there is to be an amendment; clause 289, punishment by whipping, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and again this is just a formal standover; clause 374, dealing with arson, a matter concerning which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wished to discuss with me certain matters relating to the composition of cigarettes. I think we might pass that clause and he and I can deal with that subject for him outside of this bill altogether; clause 413, jurisdiction of the courts, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; clause 417—

Mr. Knowles: The minister forgot clause 389.

Mr. Garson: I understand that the request to stand had been withdrawn. The hon. gentleman who asked to have it stood over does not wish to press it.

Mr. Fulton: You still have to pass it.

Mr. Garson: Yes. Then we come to clause 417, trial without jury in Alberta, the hon. member for Kamloops. That was disposed of yesterday by the reply which I gave to the hon. member for Prince Albert. That comprises the whole of group 1.

Group 2 is made up of clauses of major but not primary importance. The first group of clauses is: clauses 222 to 225 inclusive, drunken and impaired driving, the hon. member for Kamloops; clauses 150 to 153 inclusive, crime comics and obscene literature, the hon. member for Kamloops; clauses 247, 248 and 253, defamatory libel, the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Oxford; clauses 163 and 165, nuisance, the hon. member for Prince Albert. That comprises group No. 2.

Group No. 3: clause 134, instruction to jury re sexual offences, the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings; clause 141, indecent assault on female, the hon. member for Prince Albert; clause 142, incest, the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. That comprises the whole of group No. 3.

We now come to those matters which we think are of major importance. Group No. 4: clauses 46 to 48 inclusive, treason, the hon. member for Prince Albert; clause 50, assisting the enemy, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; clause 57, offences in relation to Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; clauses 60 to 62 inclusive, sedition, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Next is group 5, which deals with a number of clauses all related to one another, in that they directly or indirectly deal with labour matters: clauses 32, 33, and 64 to 69, riots; clause 52, sabotage; clauses 372 and 373, mischief. In connection with all these clauses the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is given, and in connection with clauses 372 and 373 the name of the hon. member for Kamloops is also associated with that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; clauses 365 to 367, criminal breach of contract, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Group 6 is made up of clauses which have been stood over since March 9, 1954: clause 432, detention of things seized, the hon. members for Kamloops and Digby-Annapolis-Kings; clause 446 (2), procedure to procure attendance of prisoner, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; clauses 467 and 468, jurisdiction of magistrates, the hon. member for Kamloops; clause 499, count for murder to stand alone, the hon. member for Kamloops; clause 557, accused other than corporation to be present at the trial, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. That comprises the entire list.

I think the idea is that we shall continue with our work this afternoon on the code itself, and if we are able to finish it we shall go back and start at the beginning of that list.

Mr. Knowles: On that point we were left in an indecisive position last night, but I discussed the matter by telephone today with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and he agreed to our request that if we finished the first run-through today, we should not try to go back to any of these clauses that have been stood over, but that they should be left until some other sitting of the house. My reason for asking the minister to do what he has now done is clear, I think. It means that from here on when an announcement is made as to what we shall deal with when we take up the Criminal Code, it can be done by announcing that consideration will be given to the clauses in group 1, group 2 or one of the other groups recorded in today's Hansard.

While I am on my feet may I draw to the minister's attention the fact that two clauses which were allowed to stand over seem to have been omitted from this list. I did this checking just before we came down at 2.30, and I did not have time to call them to the minister's attention. I refer to clause 88 and clause 289. I believe clause 88 was stood over at the request of the hon. member for Vancouver East, and clause 289 stood at my request. If I might presume to say so, I think both could be included in group 1.

Mr. Garson: I mentioned clause 289; it is on record.

Mr. Knowles: I am sorry; I was looking at an earlier list.

Mr. Garson: With regard to the first point raised by my hon. friend, I was suggesting only that we might go back to these matters of lesser importance which have been stood over in the rather improbable event that before six o'clock this afternoon we shall have finished all of the remaining sections of the code. I do not think we need to waste time debating that question, it is rather academic at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: We can deal with it if and when it arises.

Mr. Garson: Before we enter into consideration of the clauses before us, perhaps I can clear up this point as I go along.

The Chairman: Order. I have listened with some interest to the suggestion as to procedure presented by the Minister of Justice, which appears to have been agreed to by the various groups; but of course I am in the hands of the committee. May I ask the committee whether the suggested procedure is agreeable to it?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall we deal with clause 631?

Mr. Garson: I wonder whether I might have unanimous consent to clear up a very simple matter as we go along, which does not come under the heading of clause 631 but under clause 626, which has been passed.

The Chairman: Has the minister leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 626—Fines and penalties go to provincial treasury.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member for Kootenay West asked me a question yesterday and perhaps I had better read it. It was as follows, as reported at page 2872 of Hansard:

> I was informed by a person I consider to be quite responsible that when the R.C.M.P. lay a charge for an offence involving the operation of sweepstakes, particularly the Irish sweepstakes, the case is heard in Ottawa and the fine or any moneys seized are paid to the city of Ottawa rather than to the municipality in which the offence occurred.

I did not have the information on hand when he asked the question. I have since checked with the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who informs me as follows. The R.C.M.P. has not laid any charge in respect to sweepstakes in Ottawa, nor seized any money relating to that offence, as cases of this sort do not come within this jurisdiction. In the province of Ontario any information on cases of this nature which might come to the R.C.M.P. in any way would simply be passed on to the municipal or provincial force having jurisdiction at the point where the matter was reported.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow one question there? Is it a fact that in the city of Ottawa searches are made—

Mr. Winch: If I may rise on a question of privilege, we can never hear my hon. friend here on the back benches. Would he speak up?

Mr. Herridge: On a question of privilege, the loud-speaker system is not working very well this afternoon. We have had difficulty with it ever since we commenced the sitting today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought the reason for the installation of this appliance was to permit an informal discussion to take place in committee, particularly, so each of us would not be yelling at the top of his voice in order to make himself heard. I thank my hon. friend very much, as I did not know I was speaking in such subdued tones. Is it not a fact that during the last year seizures have been made by municipal officials of money being forwarded by operators of lotteries, which seizures took place as trains were passing through the municipality in question? What right has a city to make such seizure? I understand that has been done.

Mr. Garson: I am sorry, but I cannot accommodate my hon. friend. The seizures to which he refers would be made by municipal police forces. I have no knowledge concerning them and therefore cannot answer his question. The individuals who made the seizures would be the ones who should answer for the authority under which they were made.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 631—Costs to defendant in case of libel.

Mr. Garson: Yesterday at six o'clock we were debating this clause and the hon. member for Kamloops was contending, as I understood him, that while he had no objection to the successful defendant in a prosecution for defamatory libel being given his costs, he thought it was rather inconsistent that in the same bill we were proposing to delete the provision for the prosecutor getting costs in those cases in which the prosecutor was successful. The hon. member thought that was an anomaly which should be cured.

We always give careful consideration to worth-while suggestions made by members of the house. But we did not think it would be proper to restore the allowance of costs to a prosecutor for in the great majority of cases the prosecutor is the crown itself. While there have always been these clauses in the Criminal Code which permitted the awarding of costs, the crown has not claimed such costs but has charged them up to the administration of justice. I do not think any of us would regard it as desirable that the crown should collect these costs. Hence I think the hon. member for Kamloops will agree that in the great majority of cases it would not be desirable to restore this section.

But so far as the offence of defamatory libel is concerned, I think there is good warrant for allowing the prosecutor his costs if he succeeds, in the same manner we propose under the provisions of this clause as it now reads to allow costs to a successful defendant. I hope this will in part meet the viewpoint expressed by the hon. member for Kamloops, and I would therefore propose to amend the bill by striking out clause 631 as it is now in the bill and substituting the following:

631. The person in whose favour judgment is given in proceedings by indictment for defamatory libel is entitled to recover from the opposite party costs in a reasonable amount to be fixed by order of the court.

I would ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to move that amendment.

Mr. Harris: I move accordingly.

Mr. Garson: I would also suggest that clause 632 at it is now in the bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

632. Where costs that are fixed under section 631 are not paid forthwith the party in whose favour judgment is given may enter judgment for the amount of the costs by filing the order in the superior court of the province in which the trial was held, and that judgment is enforceable against the opposite party in the same manner as if it were a judgment rendered against him in that court in civil proceedings.

Mr. Harris: I move accordingly.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that we deal with clauses 631 and 632 at the same time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: I wish to express to the minister my appreciation for the consideration which he and his department have given to the point I raised last evening, and to say that the amendment is perfectly satisfactory. The point I made last evening had relation to the whole field of costs for the prosecution or for the crown in criminal proceedings. As I pointed out, section 1044 gave the right to the crown to recover costs and expenses incidental to the proceedings if it desired to do so. I can see some reason for retaining that section because I can imagine that in particularly aggravating or irritating cases it might be desirable to take advantage of it. Yet I can appreciate what the minister has indicated to me privately and also in the house, that the section has never been used in past years, that the crown in the right of the provinces has tended to regard it as being incidental to the administration of justice that they have to bear the costs of criminal prosecutions. Therefore the section has never been used.

I understand it is felt, and I must say that it seems to be generally acceptable, that a section which is never used should not continue to be part of the law. While I have some minor reservations regarding the deletion of the general right on the part of the crown to recover its costs, I certainly could not insist with any vigour on its retention. Since the minister has met me with respect to the rights of a person launching a prosecution for defamatory libel, that is where an individual rather than the crown is concerned, I have no further objection to the dropping of section 1044. I thank the minister for having continued that particular right by virtue of the amendments which he has just suggested.

On clause 634—Imprisonment for life or more than two years.

Mr. Dinsdale: I understand that when a person is serving time for a specific charge and another province prefers a similar charge against him, it is necessary upon discharge for that man to go to that other province to stand trial. If that is so it seems to me that time and money might be saved if the province in which the prisoner was convicted could be given sole responsibility for trying that prisoner on charges of a similar nature, relating to other provinces.

Mr. Garson: Has my hon. friend Bill No. 7 with him?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes.

Mr. Garson: If he will look at clause 421 (3) he will see that is designed to cover the case he has in mind. I do not believe it goes quite as far as he wishes, but it does provide a means whereby the accused can have all his offences cleared up so he can start serving his sentence on them all. I think that is what my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, that is so.

Mr. Garson: I believe he will find that covers the point.

Mr. Dinsdale: But if it was discovered after conviction in one province that there were offences of a similar nature committed in another province, would the accused have to face charges in that other province?

Mr. Garson: No, I believe if my hon. friend reads that clause he will see that it is designed to cover that point.

Mr. Dinsdale: Then this is new?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 635—Sentence served according to regulations.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, this clause reads:

> A sentence of imprisonment shall be served in accordance with the enactments and rules that govern the institution to which the prisoner is sentenced, and a reference to hard labour in a conviction or sentence shall be deemed to be a reference to the employment of prisoners that is provided for in the enactments or rules.

From a practical point of view certain difficulties occasionally arise with regard to this matter of hard labour. I wonder if the minister would take into consideration the possibility under various parts of the code of having people sentenced to, say, labour instead of hard labour? The practical difficulty that arises is this, that we have people sentenced for traffic offences such as impaired driving, and they are sent to a county jail. It very often happens a prisoner in that position in a county jail would like to get out and work on the lawn or shovel snow or do something of that nature. But because the sentence does not call for hard labour they are not allowed to do so, and prison officials will not permit them to undertake such work on the ground that it would be breaking the law.

It is my belief there might well be two divisions in respect to sentences. For example, there might be hard labour, which involves heavy work such as on the old fashioned rock pile or something of that nature, and another division of labour which would enable prisoners in a county jail, not a penitentiary, serving sentences for some of these traffic offences, to be employed on lawns and so on. Very often these people would be glad to get out to do such work.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I believe the time has arrived for the elimination of these words altogether.

Mr. Garson: They are eliminated.

Mr. MacInnis: Perhaps the minister wishes to say something? If so I shall gladly give way to him.

Mr. Garson: The addition to the penalty of a provision for hard labour has been removed under the new code. The purpose of this present provision is to enact that a reference to hard labour in any conviction under this clause will always be used for the employment of prisoners provided for in the enactments or rules. As my hon. friend from Oxford knows, prisoners who are convicted of an offence under the code and sentenced to a prison term of less than two years do not go into a federal penitentiary. They go into certain provincial institutions, which are recognized as the proper places to incarcerate them under the provisions of the federal Prisons and Reformatories Act.

While a careful check is kept by the Department of Justice as to the practices which prevail there, each one of these prisons will have its own rules. Clause 635 (1) is for the purpose of making clear that when they go in there they will work in accordance with the rules, and it will be up to the provincial jail superintendent, if that is the proper term, who is in charge of that institution to regulate the conduct of the prisoners there.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, after taking a second look at this clause I see it is not quite what I thought it was, and I wish to thank the minister. I was not suggesting that prisoners who are sent to jail should remain in idleness. I believe that if reasonable work can be provided, then these men should be permitted to work. As far as British Columbia is concerned my information is that for a great many years the addition of the words "hard labour" simply meant that a man would have better medical attention while in jail.

Mr. Nesbitt: I wonder if the minister would clarify what he said. When a person is sentenced to jail for an offence such as impaired driving and he goes to a county jail, not a penitentiary, can one draw the inference that under this clause he could not do simple work such as raking leaves or shovelling snow even if he wished to do so, unless the term "hard labour" was attached to his sentence? Is that correct?

Mr. Garson: No, it is not correct to draw that inference.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 636 agreed to.

On clause 637—Binding over person convicted.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the minister would care to comment on a point which strikes me under this clause. Clause 637 is in part a revision of section 1059 of the Criminal Code as it now stands, and I notice under that section it states that:

> Whenever any person . . . has . . . remained imprisoned for two weeks, the sheriff, gaoler or warden shall give notice, in writing, of the facts to a judge of a superior court, or to a judge of the county court of the county or district in which said gaol or prison is situate . . .

—and so on. That has been changed in the clause now before us to provide that the prisoner himself may apply to a judge for a review of the order of committal. There might be a very simple answer to this, but it strikes me that a prisoner in jail is in a rather helpless position in this regard. My colleague for Vancouver-Kingsway points out to me that a prisoner might not have a copy of the Criminal Code with him in his cell and he may not know of this right. It appears to me as a layman that there is something lost in the new clause. Formerly the sheriff, jailer or warden had to make a report, and now he is not required to make that report. In other words, the prisoner has a right of which he may not be aware. Can the minister explain?

Mr. Garson: While I am not, thank goodness, familiar with the procedure inside a jail I would not think the fact that the report was made in a routine fashion would necessarily produce a review, and for that reason it seems to me that if the prisoner has the right to ask to be taken before a judge under this clause to have his position reviewed, then that might well be more valuable to him than the previous provision was.

Mr. Knowles: I can see the point the minister is making, in that there is a deficiency in both wordings. He says that under the former wording the sheriff, jailer or warden might make a report and the judge do nothing about it. I agree with that criticism of the weakness in the former wording. However, under the present wording he has the right to apply but he may not know of it. Would it not be possible to include some wording to make sure that this information is communicated to the prisoner? The advantage of the former wording was that a report had to be made. Is the point not worth looking at?

Mr. Garson: Well, perhaps it is; but I think the prison officials, who are pretty humane and intelligent men nowadays, would in all likelihood bring this provision to the attention of the prisoner. Did my hon. friend have in mind putting a provision in the section that the warden of the prison should bring this to the attention of the prisoner? I think that could be achieved better by having an understanding among ourselves and the provincial authorities that this might be done, rather than writing it into the Criminal Code. The important thing here is that the prisoner is given the right to go before a judge and have his case reviewed. The next subclause, as my hon. friend can see, provides that the judge shall review it and shall make up his mind as to what disposition should be made of the case.

Mr. Knowles: It is not quite that certain in the next subclause. However, that is not the point of the debate. The next subclause reads:

> A judge who receives an application under subsection 3 may order the discharge of the person referred to . . .

The word "shall" does not appear. I do not like to take the time of the committee to pursue this point. It has been our experience on some of these other points that if the minister consents to the clause standing sometimes a change is the result. I wonder whether he would let this clause stand and take a look at it. If after he has done so he thinks it should go the way it is, I shall not take any time on the matter at a later stage.

Mr. Garson: Would my hon. friend agree to pass it on my undertaking that I will look at it? I think it is in quite good shape the way it is.

Mr. Knowles: I do not mind, if the undertaking also means that the minister will introduce an amendment at this session if he thinks one should be made after looking at the clause.

Mr. Garson: Oh, certainly. I do not think we have given any indication throughout the consideration of the bill that we were not prepared to amend where good cause was shown.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 638—Suspension of sentence.

Mr. Nesbitt: Clause 638 deals with a case where an accused is convicted of an offence and there is no previous conviction against him. Reference is then made to having regard to the age, character and so on of the accused, and provision is made that sentence may be suspended. The special committee on reform institutions of the Ontario legislature has made a carefully prepared, revealing and detailed report on many matters, and I could not help noticing, as I have no doubt the minister has seen, that they recommended that sentence should be suspended in the case of persons who are first offenders unless it is felt by the court, in view of certain particular circumstances, that this should not be done.

Possibly I am speaking in a circle, but under this clause as it reads now the court may, if it sees fit, suspend sentence. I wonder whether the minister would agree to let the clause stand in order to permit members a chance to read the report made by this committee. It might be that it would then seem advisable to alter the clause so it would read that the court shall suspend sentence unless there are particular circumstances which make the court feel that sentence should not be suspended.

Mr. Garson: When a judge or magistrate is appointed to judge cases it seems to me to be of the first order of importance that you should not surround him with too many statutory directions which give him no scope to exercise his own judgment. I would think that in this clause we have an instrument by which a system of probation, which I think my hon. friend has in mind, could quite easily be made operative. But would my hon. friend not agree that a judge in dealing with a series of cases coming before him has to decide in each case upon the facts of the particular case whether or not he will grant what is popularly referred to as suspended sentence? If we provide that, if two or three conditions are met, the judge must grant suspended sentence, the judge may have before him a few exceptional cases in which it would not be proper for him to grant suspended sentence at all, even although these conditions had been met.

If he is a competent judge, as we must assume they all are, it seems to me to be far better to leave that discretion with him. I do not think there would be any purpose in standing the clause over until further consideration is given to the report to which the hon. member has referred. The only thing that can happen to that report is for it to be implemented or not implemented, and it is not until it is implemented that the point the hon. member now raises has any particular relevancy.

The whole question of probation comes under the heading of the administration of justice, which is entirely provincial in character. It is a part of the general administration of justice policy which depends for its success upon the co-operation of the crown prosecutors and the departments of the provincial attorneys general. I think the position is that in clause 638 there is ample provision for the implementation of a more extensive probation policy in any province in Canada if the province concerned wishes to put such a policy into effect.

Mr. Nesbitt: I fear that possibly the minister may have misunderstood me. First of all, I realize full well that the report of this committee of the Ontario legislature is provincial in nature. However, it touches on many subjects dealt with in Bill No. 7, and I am quite sure those of us who are interested in commenting on the clauses as we go through the bill might be able to gain a great deal of valuable information if given a chance to study the report of this particular committee. One of the clauses of the bill now before us which would be involved is this one dealing with suspension of sentence and probation.

I quite agree with the minister that it is a very bad thing to hamper judges or magistrates with too many statutory rules. No one would be more ready to agree with that than I. But in the past, as I think the minister well knows, the imposition of what is popularly called suspended sentence has been the exception rather than the rule, although lately social thinking has possibly resulted in sentences being suspended more frequently.

What I really had in mind was that this clause might be rephrased to impress upon magistrates and judges the desirability of imposing suspended sentences. The emphasis could be shifted so that suspended sentences would be imposed more often, though there would have to be a saving clause so the judge would be at perfect liberty not to suspend sentence if the circumstances were such that he thought that should not be done. In the past suspended sentences have been the exception rather than the rule, and I think the emphasis might be shifted so that suspended sentences for first offenders would be the rule rather than the exception.

Clauses 639 and 640 agreed to.

On clause 641—Execution of sentence by whipping.

Mr. Winch: May I ask that this clause stand, because it deals with whipping.

Mr. Garson: Yes, it could stand. Before we do so, in line 37 there is a typographical error. The word—if it is a word; I think it is just a jumble of letters—"practioner" should read "practitioner".

Mr. Martin: I shall be happy to move that amendment to correct my colleague's language.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the clause stand?

Mr. Knowles: It could be associated with clause 289 in group 1 for later consideration.

Mr. Garson: I suppose we all realize that we will stand it now, but we shall likely have to pass it before receiving the report of the committee.

The Chairman: Shall the clause as amended stand?

Clause as amended stands.

On clause 642—Form of sentence.

Mr. Winch: Could we do the same with clauses 642 and 643?

Mr. Knowles: Would you stand the entire group from clause 642 through to and including clause 653? They could be stood and considered later in association with clause 206 in group 1.

Mr. Garson: All right, but before we do that might I suggest another amendment in clause 643, lines 16 and 31? The expression "Secretary of State" should be deleted and the expression "Minister of Justice" substituted therefor. If my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare would move that?

Mr. Martin: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Clauses 642 to 648 inclusive stand.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

On clause 649—Documents to be sent to Secretary of State.

Mr. Garson: In clause 649 the words "Secretary of State" in line 45 should be deleted and the words "Minister of Justice" substituted therefor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister say why the change is made?

Mr. Garson: Yes. It has to do with certain functions in connection with the matter of capital punishment. Until the present time the practice has been that the advice and documents passed through the Secretary of State to the Minister of Justice. We have made arrangements to have them go to the Minister of Justice directly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On that point, would the minister say where the Solicitor General comes in on the question of the procedure to be followed after a capital sentence has been imposed. Has he any function today?

Mr. Garson: Yes, the Solicitor General is connected with the Department of Justice, and at the present time he actually discharges all of these functions relating to remissions and commutations, but he does so as a colleague in the Department of Justice. The Minister of Justice is the responsible official who answers for all these matters in the House of Commons and always has been.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was that always in effect, or is that a recent innovation?

Mr. Garson: No, that has been in effect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought a change was made a couple of years ago.

Mr. Garson: Yes, the situation has always been that the Minister of Justice was answerable in the Commons for the department, including the actions of the Solicitor General therein. Up until, as my hon. friend says, about two or three years ago the Solicitor General looked after all cases of remission except those involving commutation of the death sentence. At that time the Solicitor General took over all cases of remission, including the commutation of death sentences, and the Solicitor General is handling that work now.

Mr. Knowles: Do I understand that when an official review is made by the cabinet of a death sentence, the preparation and presentation of that material is made by the Solicitor General rather than by the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Garson: That is right.

The Chairman: May I point out that since a request has been made for the clauses to stand, the amendment can only be made by leave. Does the committee grant leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lapointe: I would move that line 45 of clause 649 be amended by deleting the words "Secretary of State" and substituting therefor "Minister of Justice."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause stands.

Clauses 650 to 653 inclusive stand.

Clause 654 agreed to.

On clause 655—To whom pardons may be granted.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister explain whether there is any significance in the distinction between mercy granted by Her Majesty and a pardon granted by the governor in council?

Mr. Garson: There is not any practical difference. The royal prerogative of mercy is a prerogative which has always been attached to the British crown, regardless of any statute. As my hon. friend can see, clause 658 reads:

Nothing in this act in any manner limits or affects Her Majesty's royal prerogative of mercy.

The exercise of that royal prerogative is carried on in accordance with the other provisions which are in the Criminal Code.

Mr. Knowles: Then is subclause 1 of clause 655 really necessary in view of what is in clause 658?

Mr. Garson: Well, I would think so; because if my hon. friend will look at clause 655 he will see that it spells out the different kinds of acts the governor in council may do in the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy. I think it is desirable to have these things set out in the Canadian statutes rather than leave the subject to conduct a research in the law library to ascertain of what the royal prerogative of mercy consists.

Mr. Winch: The only question which comes to my mind is this. When, on Her Majesty's birthday or on the coronation, she announced remission of sentences for those in jail, is that carried through as a prerogative of the crown or do we in Canada then take the necessary steps to promulgate her announcement?

Mr. Garson: We pass an order in council which gives effect to Her Majesty's amnesty in Canada.

Mr. Nesbitt: I should like to ask a question of the minister for which no doubt there is a very simple explanation. Clause 655 (1) states:

Her Majesty may extend the royal mercy to a person who is sentenced to imprisonment under the authority of an act of the parliament of Canada, even if the person is imprisoned for failure to pay money to another person.

Would the minister explain the necessity for the words "even if the person is imprisoned for failure to pay money to another person." Why is an exception made in that way?

Mr. Knowles: It sounds in the same category as witchcraft.

Mr. Garson: No, it is not witchcraft.

Mr. Winch: Is that the most serious crime that can happen?

Mr. Garson: The prisoner in question may be in prison because he has failed to pay penalties which have been levied against him, or moneys which he has been directed to pay. This subsection makes it clear that the royal prerogative of mercy may be extended to him even in cases of that kind.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 656—Commutation of sentence.

Mr. Garson: I would ask my colleague to move an amendment to this clause.

Mr. Lapointe: I move:

That in clause 656 the words "Secretary of State or under-secretary of state" be deleted from line 19 and that the words "Minister of Justice or deputy minister of justice" be substituted therefor.

Mr. Knowles: Where is the written provision by which these functions, which by law are assigned to the Minister of Justice, are actually handled by the Solicitor General?

Mr. Garson: That would be by order in council, under the Department of Justice Act.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 657 to 659 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 660—Application for preventive detention.

Mr. Winch: What I shall have to say on this clause may tie in, in part, with clause 666. It is a matter which has come to my attention as a result of being elected to the House of Commons and having had the opportunity to visit penitentiaries. According to my understanding of the law as set out in clauses 660 and 666, when a man is apprehended on a criminal charge he is first of all tried and sentenced on that charge. Under clause 660 he can then be charged as an habitual criminal. Any sentence on that charge does not become effective until he has served the sentence on the charge for which he was arrested. I believe I am correct in my understanding of the law in this respect.

I have in mind a case in point which I do not understand, and for which I am asking an explanation from the minister. When, before coming to this session, I visited the penitentiary in British Columbia I met two young men who, first of all, had been sentenced on the charge on which they had been arrested, and were then sentenced under this clause. In order to make my point clear, these men were arrested on a charge of robbery and received sentences of three years. Then they were further sentenced as habitual criminals. Under the existing act, and in the clause now before us, it is my understanding that the Minister of Justice must review every three years the case of a criminal sentenced under clause 660, to see whether or not there are circumstances under which he should receive parole. But the minister cannot do that until the prisoner has served three years under the second sentence.

To my mind it is strange that a man can serve his sentence of three years, six years or ten years, as the case may be, on a charge for which he has been arrested, subject to review under the program of rehabilitation, which I hope is to be continued—and I believe it is being carried out in the British Columbia penitentiary—but after serving his sentence of three, six or ten years, as the case may be, the Minister of Justice is not permitted to consider the case until three years have been served under the provisions of this clause. That is my reading of the law, and definitely my understanding from the authorities in the British Columbia penitentiary. My information is that the cases of these men cannot be considered by the minister until three years after they have served the sentences resulting from their convictions.

I believe this is a wrong procedure. I say the proper time to consider whether or not mercy should be exercised would be at the completion of the first term.

Mr. Garson: I should like to compliment the hon. member upon his lucid explanation. Most of what he has said is quite correct. However, notwithstanding the impression he may have received from the prison authorities in British Columbia, I am afraid he is mistaken on one point. I am sure my hon. friend himself can see that he is wrong by reading clause 666, which says:

> Where a person is in custody under a sentence of preventive detention, the Minister of Justice shall—

"Shall"—I must do it.

> —at least once in every three years, review the condition, history and circumstances of that person for the purpose of determining whether he should be permitted to be at large on licence, and if so, on what conditions.

Mr. Winch: That is the very point I have made. The minister must review the case when the prisoner has been under preventive detention. I am informed that he is not under preventive detention on that charge until he has fulfilled the sentence on the charge for which he was arrested.

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend is right in that. But the fact that clause 666 says the minister shall at least once in every three years review the conditions, history and the like, does not mean that he cannot do it on other occasions, if he wishes. There is nothing in clause 666 which purports to abridge in any way the royal prerogative of mercy. And if it were not possible to do it in any other way it could be done by royal prerogative.

What this clause says is that whether the minister wishes to do it or not, he shall—he is specifically directed—do it once every three years. But it does not say that even during the determinate sentence of a prisoner, the initial sentence of three years, or during the indeterminate sentence, the Minister of Justice, in the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy under this part of the code, may not at any time commute or remit some portion of either of those sentences. That is not taken away. If my hon. friend has misunderstood the information which he got in British Columbia, or if it was given to him and he did not misunderstand it, then all I can say is that it was wrong. I agree entirely with my hon. friend that we should have that power. We do have it; we do not want to give it up.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 661—Evidence.

Mr. Nesbitt: I should like to request the minister to stand this clause over. I discussed it with my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops. In view of the same report of the Ontario legislature committee on reform institutions, the fact that a number of hon. members wish to go at some length into this matter, and that I have some comments and suggestions I wish to make to the minister with respect to a royal commission to go into this matter, I request that the clause stand.

Mr. Garson: That is quite all right.

The Chairman: Clause 661 stands.

Clause stands.

On clause 662—Notice of application.

Mr. Nesbitt: Clause 662 (2) reads:

An application under this part shall be heard and determined before sentence is passed for the offence of which the accused is convicted and shall be heard by the court without a jury.

Will the minister tell us why this paragraph is inserted and why there should be no jury? It would seem to me that when a person is liable to be put away for a long, indefinite period he should be entitled to trial by jury.

Mr. Garson: The logic of this clause is based upon the premise that the issue of whether an accused is a criminal sexual psychopath is one which the average judge will be more competent to try than the average jury. Perhaps we shall be better able to judge of the merits of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Oxford after we have received a report on this subject from the royal commission.

I may say that we have discussed with Chief Justice McRuer the question of having this matter of the criminal sexual psychopath considered by the royal commission which has been set up to consider the subject matter of insanity as a defence to a charge of criminal responsibility. The chief justice is of the view, in which we concur, that it would be a mistake to combine these two subjects, both of which are technical and difficult, in the one inquiry. He thinks and we agree that it would be preferable to set up another smaller commission, of which the chief justice is prepared to accept the chairmanship, to deal with this question of criminal sexual psychopaths alone.

My suggestion would be that we pass the clause in its present form upon the understanding that it and the other clauses under this heading will be reviewed when we shall have received the report of that second commission.

I am sure my hon. friend, or anyone else who has had to do with this problem, will agree that it is an extremely difficult matter. We think that by far the best way to deal with it is to get a small body of really expert advisers to consider it, and then give the most careful consideration to the report they bring in. I should be glad to know from my hon. friend, with his long experience in this field, whether he does not agree with that view.

Mr. Nesbitt: I most heartily agree with the minister's answer that a royal commission is to be set up to study this matter of criminal sexual psychopaths. I made the suggestion some time ago in the house, and I am delighted to hear that the minister has taken it up.

There is one other comment I should like to make in regard to this matter. Regardless of what the report of this commission may be, I still think it is very dangerous to depart from the old, time-honoured principle of criminal law that a man should be tried by a jury, particularly when it may result in his being put away, possibly for life. While I agree with the minister that in certain circumstances a judge may be more competent to deal with the facts, particularly technical facts, nevertheless when a person's liberty for the rest of his life is endangered I cannot help feeling that a jury ought to have at least some say in the matter; otherwise it may be the thin edge of the wedge. If we do it in one case we are apt to start doing it in another; and before long trial by jury, which we have had for generations and generations, and which is one of the cornerstones of British justice, may begin to slip away from us. I just thought I should make those comments. I agree in principle with the minister's remarks.

Mr. Garson: There is a point that I should clear up as we go along. I am in complete agreement with my hon. friend as to the vital importance of maintaining the jury system in general. I am entirely in agreement with all the efforts that are made to protect those civil liberties and rights of the individual citizen, even of the worst criminal. But while still retaining a quite open mind on this subject and being quite prepared to review this matter in the light of any report upon it that might be brought in by a royal commission, I would be inclined to think that this type of prisoner would get at least as favourable a chance from a judge who having dealt with other cases of this nature might have perhaps a better understanding of the nature of the man's troubles and the disease that was afflicting him. The facts of these cases are not very pleasant as a rule. The judge could and likely would be at least as fair to the prisoner as a jury might be.

Mr. Nesbitt: Will the minister permit one question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Nesbitt: I was not thinking particularly of criminal sexual psychopaths but of people who are habitual criminals, and who would come under this clause as well, I believe.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is right. Perhaps a distinction could be made. The ultimate decision might be to draw a distinction between the two groups; but in the meantime I cannot see any objection, and I do not think my hon. friend can either, to letting this section go through in its present form upon our undertaking, which I have given before now, to give the most careful consideration to the report when we receive it.

Mr. Nesbitt: I agree with the minister, but I would just like to illustrate what I mean, particularly with respect to the habitual criminal. Clause 660 (2) (a) reads:

> He has previously, since attaining the age of 18 years, on at least three separate and independent occasions been convicted of an indictable offence for which he was liable to imprisonment for five years or more and is leading persistently a criminal life—

Then he is liable to this sentence of preventive detention. There might conceivably be a case where somebody made an application under this section, and there might very well be three separate convictions on indictable offences but they might not be serious. I think in that case a jury would be better, because we all know that some judges are more severe than others. Perhaps the minister would take into consideration some change in the future with respect to the habitual criminal part, having that done by a jury, whereas probably the other part could be done by a judge because in a sense we are dealing with an illness rather than crime.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 663—Evidence of character and repute.

Mr. Enfield: The words "persistently leading a criminal life" appear in this clause, as they do in clause 660 which deals with habitual criminals. I should like to know the legal effect of those words. Do they not boil down to this. If a man is convicted of three offences he may be considered to be an habitual criminal, but I am wondering if it means something more than that. It seems to me that you should not be held to be leading a criminal life unless you have first been convicted of some sort of crime. It seems a little confusing the way it is worded and I should like to know the history of this particular wording and its legal effect.

Mr. Garson: To begin with, I think it should be emphasized that the purpose of this clause is to indicate that evidence as to character and repute may, where the court thinks fit, be admitted on the question whether the accused is or is not persistently leading a criminal life or is or is not a criminal sexual psychopath, as the case may be. That provision for evidence is made available both to the crown and to the accused. When an accused is charged under this section he may take the position, "That is not so. I am going to bring evidence to indicate that this charge is unfounded." Clause 663 provides that either the accused or the crown may bring evidence on that point. But the charge that has to be proved is still the charge under clause 660. The crown has to bring the case within the provisions of clause 660 before it can establish a case against the accused.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 664—Commencement of sentence.

Mr. Winch: I should like to speak on this clause. When I was speaking on clause 660 I mentioned 666, but I deliberately left out any reference to 664 because I was afraid if I brought it in at that moment it might be confusing. Now that we are on clause 664 I hope that I can convey to the minister just what I have in mind.

Under this clause when a man is convicted and sentenced for a criminal offence and then following that is sentenced as an habitual criminal, the governor in council may commute the sentence for which the man was arrested and start the sentence on the habitual criminal charge from the day he goes to jail. That brings me to my first point.

The actual administration of justice comes under the provincial authorities, as do the jails. When a man is found guilty on a charge and then also found guilty under the habitual criminal section of the code, is the Minister of Justice notified immediately so he can consider the case and recommend as to whether or not the provisions of 664 should be applied and the preventive custody start from the commencement? If that is not done —I hope the minister will point that out, because I understand it is not—then this section does not mean anything.

Unless the man who is convicted has money, has a lawyer, or has friends who understand the Criminal Code and can make the necessary application, this provision means nothing. I would appreciate information as to how often this section has been used. At the end of three years the Minister of Justice shall review the situation. May I just follow up from that and say—

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend wants me to answer some of these questions he had better give me a chance or I will forget what they are. I take it that his question is whether we are advised when a prisoner goes to prison to serve a certain definite period with an indeterminate period thereafter. We are certainly advised if he goes into a penitentiary, because the penitentiaries are operated by the Department of Justice. So far as the provincial jails are concerned, when a prisoner goes into custody in them we receive advice in due course, and are in a position to exercise the provisions. Moreover, in most cases, if there is any desire on the part of the prisoner to apply for that privilege or that commutation his counsel will see to it, or he himself will write and ask that his case be considered.

Mr. Winch: As the minister says, the penitentiaries come under the Department of Justice and the minister or his officials would automatically hear about it. Just suppose the officials hear that a man somewhere in Canada has been sentenced on an arresting charge and also under the habitual criminal section. Do you then automatically make that review to see whether you should exercise the provisions of section 664? It seems to me that ought to be done automatically. I think that information should be available.

Mr. Garson: First I should like to make a correction. I said a moment ago that if the accused went to a provincial institution we would be informed. The fact is that he never does go to a provincial institution because all of these cases go only to the penitentiary. My information from my assistant, who is head of the remissions branch along with his many other duties, is that when the prisoner goes to a penitentiary we open a file at once. We get about ten thousand applications for pardon a year, and a file is opened in every case. The decisions reached in connection with these cases are based upon reports by the trial judges or magistrates, by the police, and by the wardens of the penitentiaries or jails.

Mr. Winch: I have one other question on this point, Mr. Chairman. When clemency —and I believe I use that term correctly— under clause 664 is not exercised, and the arresting sentence is served, does the justice department or the remission branch, to which I presume the application goes, automatically know that the sentence has been served and that the criminal is starting on a sentence as an habitual criminal, and therefore submit to the Minister of Justice that the prerogative as to clemency should now be exercised? Is that automatic, or does the person in jail have to rely upon his counsel or a friend to handle this matter?

Mr. Garson: The answer is yes, it is automatic.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Winch: Before this clause is carried, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask through you—though I do not want to hold up the committee—if the Minister of Justice will check on his statement and investigate this question in regard to habitual criminals. I know in British Columbia—

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I rather resent my hon. friend's suggestion. I told my hon. friend that I had with me the head of that department and I was able to check that statement. He assures me that it is automatic. Cases of this sort, and there are not very many, are dealt with automatically. I have no objection to checking, but I think my hon. friend in the meantime at least should take my word for it.

Clause 665 agreed to.

On clause 666—Review by Minister of Justice.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, this clause states that:

> . . . the Minister of Justice shall, at least once in every three years, review the condition, history and circumstances of that person . . .

—and so on. That refers to the habitual criminal, and I would like to know what information and advice the minister receives in reviewing these cases. For example, is there a parole group within the penitentiary which supplies information on the progress made by an habitual criminal? In addition, what sort of remedial work takes place with regard to the habitual criminal?

Mr. Garson: I have no objection in the world to going into this question, but these really are matters which might more properly be raised on the estimates of the Department of Justice. This debate relates to the wording of Bill No. 7, to which we should be addressing our remarks. However, though I have no objection to answering any hon. friend's question, I might add that it would take me 15 to 20 minutes to cover the ground at all comprehensively and would involve an explanation of the whole of the rather elaborate system we have in our penitentiaries to take care of persons from the time they enter.

We have classification officers in our penitentiaries who are trained psychologists—university men. When the prisoner comes into a penitentiary a file is opened up for him and a card index folder is maintained. Full particulars of his background, family life and everything of that nature is filed in the same way quite a number of enlightened industries check upon their employees as to their aptitude, and so on. A classification officer is in constant contact with the prisoners who are under his care. When we come to consider the question of the prisoner's release these particulars which the classification officer has of the prisoner form some of the more important material which we consider.

We check as to how the reformation which we have tried to achieve in the penitentiary has progressed, and whether it would be safe in the prisoner's own interests to release him. We have on his file the report of the convicting judge, the police report, and a report from the superintendent of the penitentiary as to the record of this prisoner as a prisoner. In addition we have a report of the psychologist who is his classification officer as to developments in the prisoner's character in the penitentiary and the prospects of his making good if released. It is only after full consideration of all these factors that we reach our decision as to whether to remit any portion of the prisoner's sentence. It is also in relation to that record and to his aptitude or interest that he is permitted to take up various training courses within the penitentiary.

We have found that we have now reached the point where those who have taken training courses in the penitentiary have upon release established themselves, in 80 per cent of the cases, as good citizens. That is a very high rate indeed. My hon. friend can see when he asks a question of this sort that in order to give any adequate answer at all we would have to cover subjects which should not really be discussed while we are on this bill.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think the minister was discussing remission in general terms, but I would like to know whether the habitual criminal constitutes a special case, and whether he is subjected to the program which the minister just outlined.

Mr. Garson: Those who go in as criminal sexual psychopaths or as habitual criminals are a most difficult type and obviously constitute special cases. They are given special attention, but their reformation is not any easy task. It is not always possible to achieve the results for which one would hope. But a really sincere effort is made.

Mr. Nesbitt: I would like to ask the minister two questions. I will ask the first one and dependent upon the answer there may be no necessity for the second.

Mr. Knowles: There is nothing like being hopeful.

Mr. Nesbitt: Under this clause the Minister of Justice shall at least once in every three years review the circumstances of the case. That might be suitable at the present time, but the Criminal Code may not be reviewed again for many years, and looking into the future I can envisage a situation when this provision might not be quite so suitable. Is there a provision under the code under which a person who is in prison for a sexual offence might through his counsel make application to a judge of the supreme court for a review of his case?

Mr. Garson: He cannot make application to the supreme court.

Mr. Nesbitt: Or to the minister of justice?

Mr. Garson: The foot of the throne is always accessible to any person who is seeking mercy. Any of these prisoners can at any time make application for a review. Of course if he made an application every two weeks then it would not receive a great deal of consideration. But this provision in this section of the code which we are discussing is mandatory. No matter how busy or preoccupied we may be we must make a review of the case every three years. But in addition to this mandatory consideration the prisoner can write a letter in longhand himself at reasonable intervals and say, "I feel I am making progress, and I would like you to consider letting me out." In this form of application he would get the same kind of consideration as if he had the most expensive lawyer available.

Mr. Nesbitt: I wonder if the minister would consider the very special circumstances which come under part XXI, and in addition to the normal review which takes place every two years under this clause introduce another form of application of which the prisoner could take advantage. In other words, the section might be widened. As it is now, there is a review once every three years, but in addition the section might be widened so that the person could make an application to a judge of a superior court. Then his case would be reviewed by a judge as well as by the minister of justice. It is just an extra precautionary method.

Mr. Ellis: Can the minister give us some information with respect to the review provided for under this section? Can he tell us how many prisoners were permitted to go free as a result of the consideration given under this section? Has he any figures to indicate to what extent the section is used?

Mr. Garson: We have in the whole penal system of Canada twenty-seven habitual criminals and sixteen criminal sexual psychopaths. Therefore you can see that the volume of applications, from that comparatively small number of prisoners in a nation of some 14,500,000 or 15 million people, is not large. With respect to applications for remission that have been made in relation to this small group, we have not seen fit so far to release any of them.

On clause 682—Where conviction or order not reviewable.

Mr. Knowles: When one compares clause 682 with the corresponding part of section 1129 one sees that there seems to have been a slight change. That change turns up in these words in subclause (a) —"whether or not the appeal has been carried to a conclusion". What is the significance of those words, and does that addition subtract anything from the rights of a convicted person?

Mr. Garson: The effect of the words to which my hon. friend refers is that where an accused has taken an appeal and the appeal is pending he may not apply for certiorari. In other words, if he chooses the appeal method and launches his appeal, then clause 682 provides that the appeal must be completed before he can apply for certiorari. To that limited extent it deprives him of the privilege of making an application for a writ of certiorari while his appeal is still pending.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact it goes further than that. I know the case upon which this amendment must be based. It is the case of Rex v. Irons. In that case counsel for the accused launched an appeal. The appeal was to the wrong court and therefore was withdrawn. Certiorari proceedings were taken which resulted in the quashing of the conviction. The court in that case expressed the view that once notice of intention had been shown by the appellant that he wished to proceed by way of appeal he could not afterwards have a second bite at the apple and determine that he might be more successful if he went ahead by certiorari. It covers not only the case the minister mentions but also the case of an appellant who launches an appeal and then decides that he might be better off not to have the case reviewed by the court of appeal and that he might very well rely on some technical objection. He then decides to take a second chance.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is quite right. His supplementary answer is very helpful.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 683 to 689 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 690—Successive applications for habeas corpus not to be made.

Mr. Knowles: I want to say a word on this clause which has to do with habeas corpus. If I may be pardoned for making a personal reference, every time habeas corpus is mentioned I am reminded of a discussion we had on the matter in the house one time when the late Humphrey Mitchell was with us. He greatly enjoyed making the suggestion that I was the best example of habeas corpus he had ever seen. Of course all of us who remember Humphrey Mitchell will know that he said it in a very kindly way.

I note that clause 690 is new. As I understand the situation, formerly it was possible under the common law for a person to go from one judge to another making successive applications for a writ of habeas corpus. Am I correct in understanding that the purpose of the new clause is to do away with that? If so, why has it been changed?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is right in saying that there was a practice in some of the provinces of Canada and in Great Britain whereby an applicant for a writ of habeas corpus could apply to one judge and if he did not succeed he could, upon the same set of facts and law, apply to another judge. If he was again refused he could apply to a third judge and so on until he had applied to every judge of the court. However, this privilege was not uniform in all the provinces. In the province of British Columbia they had what I think is a more rational system, and the one that we are proposing to adopt here. In British Columbia they had a provision for an appeal from the decision of the judge refusing a writ of habeas corpus. The prisoner could take an appeal to the court of appeal in that province, and there the appeal would be heard in the same way that appeals from other judgments of the trial court are heard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Most provinces do not have any right of appeal with respect to habeas corpus. That is why you can go from one court to another, is it not?

Mr. Garson: That is right. I thank my hon. friend for his interjection. The privilege of going from one judge to another was not confined only to provinces of Canada but applied to Great Britain as well. In those jurisdictions where persons could go from one trial judge to another they did not have the right of appeal. In British Columbia, where they had the right of appeal, that was the remedy they had to pursue. The case of In re Fred Storgoff (1945) S.C.R. 526 was decided in 1945. The Supreme Court of Canada held in that case that where a writ of habeas corpus is applied for, as a civil remedy which the British Columbia statute purported to regulate, but applied for in connection with a criminal proceeding, the fact that it was applied for as a step in criminal proceedings gave the application for the writ of habeas corpus a criminal character. Since such a habeas corpus was of a criminal character, only the parliament of Canada could legislate with regard to it under its power to deal with matters relating to the criminal law. Therefore this right of appeal which the British Columbia statutes purported to give in relation to a habeas corpus judgment in a criminal matter was beyond the power of the British Columbia legislature to give, and the right of appeal was inoperative and void.

Now the Storgoff judgment put British Columbia back in the same position as those provinces of Canada in which there was no appeal from the judgment of a trial court judge in a habeas corpus application. The thought behind the present section is that it is wiser to provide for the prisoner the right to apply to a trial judge, and if he is refused a writ of habeas corpus then he can take his appeal to the appeal court where a panel of appeal court judges will consider his appeal on its merits. It was felt this procedure was preferable to having the prisoner apply to trial judge A, then to judge B, then to judge C, then to judge D, all equal in status as trial judges, and perhaps arriving at the conclusion that after three or four judges have rejected his application for habeas corpus, the last one will grant it and thereby in effect overrule the majority of his colleagues who had refused the application.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not to overrule them.

Mr. Garson: Not to overrule them perhaps in a strict sense, but he grants an application on the same material upon which his brother judges have rejected it. From the standpoint of creating respect for the administration of justice, this present clause provides for a much more orderly procedure. For if what in effect are appeals are going to be taken, it is more orderly and proper to have those appeals considered by the court of appeal which is set up for that purpose and in which they are considered by a group of judges, than it is to have them considered by a succession of brother trial judges of the judge of the trial court who turned the habeas corpus application down in the first place. That is the reason for this new provision. We think it is a better provision in the interests of everyone, including the accused, than the present system.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Nesbitt: This clause 690 is rather related to clause 691, in view of the minister's explanation. It seems to me that throughout the latter part of the code there has been an increasing tendency on the part of the framers to use expediency rather than some of the older principles of the code. I go along with what the minister has said about an appeal going to the court of appeal; that is fine. But writ of habeas corpus proceedings under this clause are very unusual and extraordinary remedies. Usually the time element is one of the most important factors in considering this remedy. It is all very well to give the right of appeal to the court of appeal, but by the time the appeal is heard the importance of the time element may have been completely sacrificed.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at clause 691 (3) he will see that the point he now raises is fully covered.

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes, there is mention of it being heard in seven days. Even seven days sometimes is too long when it is a matter of urgency; two or three days might be of importance. I agree with the minister that the old practice of going from judge to judge might be embarrassing to some of the judges who had been visited and who had not granted the relief, but this is an extraordinary remedy that is only used in unusual cases where the time element may be of the utmost importance. I feel that no useful purpose would be served by eliminating the right of a person to go from one judge to another if it is necessary. If the circumstances did not merit the writ of habeas corpus being issued, the judges would keep on refusing. In these borderline cases, one or two judges may refuse and the third one might say yes.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Does my hon. friend, as a crown prosecutor, think it is a good plan to give the last of five judges the power, in effect, to overrule the decision of the four judges who have preceded him in refusing the application?

Mr. Nesbitt: My experience as a crown prosecutor was limited to a period of about two years some little time ago. I agree with the minister that in some cases it might not be a very good policy to have to go to the fifth judge, who would be the one to grant the writ. It may very well be that it would not be the fifth judge but it might be the second judge who would grant the writ. It is an unusual and extraordinary situation, and one judge can say yes or no. The time element is an important factor in these cases, and I doubt very much if seven days would be of much help. These applications are not so usual that any real harm is going to be done by leaving the Criminal Code as it was so that you could go from judge to judge. I do not feel I can agree with this section.

Mr. Knowles: There is one point which might be mentioned before we leave this clause. I am sorry, the point I want to comment upon deals with clause 691. Perhaps I should wait.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 691—Appeal in habeas corpus, etc.

Mr. Knowles: The point I want to make is that I think a bouquet should be extended to our own House of Commons committee at the last session for having added subclause 3. I believe it was not there when the bill came from the Senate. The minister a moment ago cited subclause 3 as making the change more palatable than it otherwise was. I am sure he is glad to have the credit given where it is due.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is entirely correct. The difficulty of the time element mentioned by the hon. member for Oxford was threshed out in the committee and the seven days inserted in this clause. It provides summary justice.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 692 and 693 agreed to.

On clause 694—General penalty.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to speak on clause 694, to which I made reference the other day. This clause provides in part:

> Except where otherwise expressly provided by law, every one who is convicted of an offence punishable on summary conviction is liable to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for six months or to both.

I am rather surprised that a considerable change was not made in this clause to follow the practice in other jurisdictions and also to follow the recommendations that were made by the Archambault commission. In other words, we have still retained in our law, in effect, imprisonment for debt. It is on that matter I wish to speak at some length and to refer to the report of the Archambault commission as well as the practice of the United Kingdom. I brought this matter up some years ago, I think it was in 1947, and referred to the same question again two or three weeks ago.

In various newspapers in the country on those occasions widespread support was given to the argument I advanced that, where an offence has been committed that merits only the imposition of a fine, no one should be imprisoned because of his inability to pay that fine, and that the onus should be upon the crown not to stigmatize that person by an alternative in jail simply because of the fact that his financial condition denied him what was available to those in a better financial position, namely the payment of the fine and by this means avoiding imprisonment.

This clause is one that has been with us for many years. It used to be regarded as normal that if a person could not pay a fine he should be imprisoned. But for many years that has not been the view either in Great Britain or in most jurisdictions in the United States.

In other words, in my opinion it is an essential part of our system of justice that every person, regardless of his financial capacity, shall have equality before the law. And I feel that this clause, which makes provision for an alternative of imprisonment in lieu of payment of a fine, is simply a relic of the past, and denies that humane administration of the law that is characteristic of all legal systems today that follow the British doctrine of punishment and reformation.

In 1914 the parliament of the United Kingdom in effect abolished this practice. If anyone reads the debates of that time—and it is now forty years ago—he will find that the law lords, the legal authorities in the House of Lords, as well as some of the outstanding lawyers in Britain, pointed out how unjust and unfair a continuance of that relic of the past actually was, whereby inability to pay a fine had as its consequence an unfortunate period of imprisonment for the individual.

Chapter 58 of the British statutes of 1914 made provision whereby any person against whom a fine was imposed was permitted, in the event of his inability to pay such fine at the moment, to pay it by instalments.

This was the law until 1934-35, when a further change was made. I am not going to read the sections. I shall merely designate their numbers so that hon. members may be able to find them. In 1935 this further provision was made:

> Where a court of summary jurisdiction adjudges a person to pay a sum by a conviction and allows time for payment, the court shall not on that occasion impose on the defendant a period of imprisonment in default of payment of that sum: Provided that this subsection shall not have effect where the court on that occasion and in the presence of the defendant determines that for special reason, whether having regard to the gravity of the offence, to the character of the defendant or to other special circumstances, it is expedient that he should be imprisoned without further inquiry in default of payment.

In other words, anyone who was in the position of having the ability to pay, or belonged to that parasitical class who endeavour to live by their wits and at the expense of others, must pay; but, with the exception of those classes, imprisonment should not be imposed in default of payment of the fine, unless upon inquiry it is shown and proof is provided that the person in question is able to pay his fine.

I am sure all of us who have read Dickens' story about Little Dorrit will realize that, actually, what we are doing in this twentieth century, by imposing imprisonment in default of payment of a fine, is in effect a continuation of that to which Dickens had reference when he dealt with the deplorable situation then prevailing in the prisons.

Mr. Macdonnell: And from which his own family had suffered.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As the hon. member says, there was a personal feeling in what he wrote. It was based on experience.

The result of the changes that have taken place in the United Kingdom has been to reduce the prison population of Britain, as compared to ours, to an extent almost beyond comprehension. While I have not the exact figures here, I believe I am speaking with reasonable certainty when I say that the number imprisoned in Canada today is almost three times that in Britain, despite the fact that our population is only one-third of Britain's.

It is most interesting to see what happened after the British parliament abolished this practice, iniquitous in its results and detrimental to good citizenship in that many a person whose only offence was that of poverty suffered the indignity of imprisonment.

What happened in Britain was this. In 1913 the number imprisoned for default in payment of fines was 79,583. By 1923 that had fallen to 15,261. Then came the amendments of 1935, as a result of which the number in prison in 1938 stood at 7,936.

One of the briefs presented to the special committee was to the following effect:

We believe that it is time a similar provision were made in Canada for payment of fines on time. Everyone in Canada is supposed to enjoy equal rights under the law. It can hardly be said that this is so when people have to serve jail sentences because they are not financially able to pay fines, except on instalments.

The Archambault commission in 1938 went into this matter in detail. I shall quote from page 167, so that the record will be reasonably complete. It states:

The attention of your commissioners has frequently been drawn to the large number of persons who are annually committed to jail for non-payment of fines. The number shown by the Canadian criminal statistics for 1936, to have been sentenced to jail with the option of a fine was 9,593, but statistics are not available to show how many of these served sentences in jail.

Under the provisions of the Criminal Justice Administration Act passed in England in 1914, the court is obliged to allow time for payment of fines and for investigation of inability to pay.

Farther on, we get this quotation:

The matter was the subject of an extensive investigation and report by a departmental committee in England in 1934. The report resulted in the enactment of the Money Payments Act (Justices Procedure Act) of 1935.

I made reference to that act a moment ago. I continue:

The act makes further provision for the investigation of the means of the defaulter before imprisonment . . . The statute provides that no one is to be sent to jail for non-payment of a fine unless it can be shown that he might reasonably be expected to pay such fine. This act came into force on January 1, 1936, and the results of its first year of operation are shown by a substantial reduction in imprisonments for non-payment.

Then it sets forth the statement that was placed on the records of the House of Commons in the United Kingdom by the then home secretary, Sir John Simon, afterwards Lord Chancellor. He pointed out that the number of persons imprisoned in 1935 in default of payment of fines was 16,567. In 1936 it fell to 11,623. This change would bring about some of the penological advances that have been made in other countries. It is no encouragement to crime. I am speaking of the person who is fined $5 and costs. May I give an example. Many years ago I happened to go into a police court where a number of men who had no work were charged with an offence. They were each fined $5 and costs or in default thirty days. They were respectable men, unable to work because no work was available. They were willing to work. In addition to the thirty days, they were fingerprinted, and because of the social attitude of all of us toward those who have been convicted for offences and sentenced, the futures of these men were undermined. Their only offence was that they could not pay a picayune $5 fine. What did the Archambault commissioners recommend? This is what they recommended:

Your commissioners recommend that the principle embodied in these English statutes should be introduced into Canada.

Imprisonment for non-payment, when the convicted person has not the means or ability to pay, is, in fact, imprisonment for poverty. The injustice of such a law is patent. The poverty-stricken man is punished more severely for the commission of the same offence than the man with means. Your commissioners are of the opinion that many recidivist criminals often receive their first education in crime upon being committed to prison for non-payment of fines.

Mr. Chairman, that conclusion of a commission composed of learned and able men is a terrible indictment of our system of imposing imprisonment because of inability to pay fines. Let me repeat it:

Your commissioners are of the opinion that many recidivist criminals often receive their first education in crime upon being committed to prison for non-payment of fines.

I simply place that before the minister. I feel that many of the recommendations and changes made in the Criminal Code are worthy and necessary, but I do believe that this is one responsibility that the commissioners could not accept; for in reality they were not to establish substantive law. That is the manner in which they interpreted the commission that they had. In large measure the changes that they made neither create nor diminish responsibility.

The committee should give most earnest consideration to this matter. I know there are some magistrates who, when an accused comes before them, on occasion grant time to pay, but they have no authority to do that. They are but the few compared to the many. The reductions in the numbers of those who were imprisoned in the United Kingdom, when this provision came into effect, have not only had a beneficial effect on the individual but they have also had a material effect in reducing the prison population and the expense of maintaining prisons.

That is another argument I advance. By permitting people to pay fines on time the population of our prisons would be considerably reduced. By "prisons" I mean "jails"; and public funds would be saved in the process. With all the power I possess I place this matter before the committee and ask support on behalf of the proposition I advance, that we bring our criminal law up to date and that in this country we do not imprison individuals, against whom a fine of $5 or $10 would be sufficient, simply because they are unable to pay that fine.

Mr. Knowles: I wish to support wholeheartedly the plea that the hon. member for Prince Albert has made. He has stated the case so well that one does not need to repeat his arguments. He himself indicated that perhaps the strongest argument is the one contained in the report of the Archambault commission, and I hope that the minister will yet give consideration to altering the law so that we do not in fact send people to jail because they cannot afford to pay a debt—in this case the debt being a fine.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the case which the hon. member for Prince Albert has made is strengthened by a change which is included in subclause 1 of clause 694, which is now before us. I had something to say yesterday about the apparent effects of inflation, Liberal inflation, on the Criminal Code. Yesterday we had an instance where, because of inflation, the monetary figure had been doubled, but in this instance the former ceiling of $50 has been increased to $500. In other words, Mr. Chairman, under clause 694, subclause 1, there is even more chance that a person may be unable to pay a fine levied against him on summary conviction than was the case before. Previously such a fine could not exceed $50, but now this type of fine may go as high as $500. Thus I can see an even greater possibility of people being in the situation of not being able to pay the fine and having to go to jail.

Yesterday afternoon when we were discussing clause 623 I complained because a limitation was being imposed with regard to fines levied against corporations in respect to summary conviction offences. In defence of the limitation of $1,000 the minister suggested that summary conviction offences might in some cases be trifling and therefore it was proper to fix that limit. We are dealing now with cases that come under summary conviction having to do with individuals rather than corporations, and yet here the ceiling is being raised from $50 to $500 with the additional phrase, or six months' imprisonment, or both.

I support as strongly as I can the plea made by the hon. member for Prince Albert and I suggest that this tremendous increase in the amount of fine that may be levied under summary conviction strengthens the case made by the hon. member. I think that there is something to be said for the point that this would be a substantive change and therefore the commissioners can be pardoned for not having implemented the Archambault recommendation in this respect. But it does seem to me that the responsibility rests with the government, and in turn with parliament, to give more serious consideration to that recommendation.

Mr. Shaw: My colleagues are united in their request to the minister to give serious consideration to this matter. We feel that the hon. member for Prince Albert has put the case clearly and forcibly and therefore it is unnecessary to add to the arguments he has advanced. I repeat that we are absolutely united in our view that the minister should grant this matter favourable consideration.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, this seems to me to be a case where it is not necessary to have any experience in the administration of criminal law in order to feel entitled to express an opinion. I have listened to what has been said by the hon. member for Prince Albert and it does seem to me that the case he has made is really inescapable on the grounds of humanity and decency.

Mr. MacInnis: I can only say here what I said in the parliamentary committee when we were dealing with this matter, that it seems to me wrong that a person should be penalized with a term in jail if he has not the money to pay a fine. It really means that he is not going to jail for his crime; he is going to jail for not having the money to pay his fine. Surely this parliament ought to make a decision that the time has arrived when we will not allow a thing of that kind to exist.

Mr. Cannon: The hon. member for Prince Albert may have mentioned in his speech the point I have in mind, since I heard only the end of it. If subsection 2 is amended to take away the sanction for not paying a fine, judges may be more likely to condemn to jail immediately under subsection 1 rather than impose a fine.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would not think that those charged with the administration of justice would be imprisoning when a fine would be sufficient.

Mr. Cannon: If there is no sanction for not paying a fine?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say at the outset that I agree with the views which have been expressed in regard to sending people to jail simply because they are not able through poverty to pay a fine, but after listening to the various speakers who have dealt with this subject I feel that there are one or two other aspects which have to be considered. To me at least that is where the conundrum exists in drafting a section of this kind.

I feel that in dealing with cases under summary conviction you have to consider, not only the class of people who through poverty are unable to pay a fine but those who are obstinate or careless or shiftless and who, unless there is some compulsion, will simply refuse to pay a fine. I think we have to consider the position of the magistrate dealing with that kind of person.

In respect to the raising of the maximum fine which a magistrate can impose, I have had some conversations with people who have experience in this sort of thing. I believe that we have to acknowledge that the inflation my colleague referred to does exist and also that the total in effect may prevent a magistrate from sending a man to jail. I know that there was a tendency when the ceiling was set at $50 for magistrates to feel that the maximum was merely a trifle to the person convicted, that he would simply pull a roll out of his pocket, hand over $50 and go out and commit the same offence again the following Saturday night.

Personally I feel that the raising of the ceiling under present conditions will tend to reduce the number of jail sentences which magistrates will impose. I do not profess to have a solution to this conundrum but I do feel we must consider the obdurate individual who without some proper form of compulsion may get around the paying of the fine.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat says that there would have to be some compulsion. I would point out that there is provision for compulsion in the act in the United Kingdom. There is an immediate investigation for the purpose of determining ability to pay, the circumstances as to the enormity of the offence, the seriousness of it and evidence of repetition such as the hon. gentleman mentioned. In other words, the jail sentence is not mandatory upon failure to pay the fine. An investigation takes place immediately into the ability to pay and into the other circumstances referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. Garson: I should like to compliment the hon. member for Comox-Alberni upon his short but excellent contribution to this debate. We are dealing here with a matter in which the reforms we are introducing if they are going to be of any value must be realistic. As the hon. member pointed out, unless we have some method whereby some form of discipline can be imposed upon those who, not having too much in the way of worldly goods, break the law, the result would be that we would have no sanctions with which to compel observance of the law by that kind of person. My hon. friend from Prince Albert has painted a very interesting picture of the condition of Canadian law, and of the experience under, and condition of, the English law. I am sure that as far as he went it was most accurate. It was the truth, but it was not the whole truth by any manner of means—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was the Archambault commission untruthful?

Mr. Garson: I listened with interest to my hon. friend's speech. Will the hon. member now please listen to mine.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Do not make the suggestion that the Archambault commission recommended that.

Mr. Garson: I am referring to the comparisons my hon. friend made between Canada and Great Britain. It is quite true that in Great Britain they have reduced their prison population by a very substantial percentage over the last 40 or 50 years. But I am sure my hon. friend from Prince Albert, upon reflection, would not wish to leave the impression with this committee that that reduction was in any sense solely attributable to the payment of fines by instalment in that country. I am quite sure he knows, though I regret he did not tell us, that the main contributing factor to the reduction of the prison population in Great Britain is a very thoroughgoing probation system under which they have the facilities to supervise, as he indicated a few moments ago, the arrangement and collection of these fine instalments. My hon. friend was then speaking in reply to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. The British probation officers must examine the ability of persons to pay a fine. The only alternative to that is to say that if a man's income is below a certain figure he need not bother observing the law at all. He cannot pay a fine, you do not want to put him in jail, and so you allow him to be a privileged person.

The point I wish to make so far as Canada is concerned is that we propose under this present bill to continue the provision in our existing law under which magistrates are given wide latitude and can give time for the payment of a fine. One of the main reasons why that practice is not followed in this country is that we have no elaborate probation system such as exists in Great Britain and which provides the supervision necessary to administer the payment of fines by instalment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The magistrate does it there.

Mr. Garson: They do it there upon the basis of information supplied by probation officers of whom there are large numbers, but we do not have anything even remotely approaching the same number here. One of the difficulties we have in this country to which my hon. friend pays no apparent attention at all is that under the unitary government of England the legislative body which passes the law largely enforces it, with the assistance of municipal law officers. In Canada the law we pass in this parliament has to be enforced by ten provincial administrations over a widely scattered area under conditions which are totally dissimilar to those of Great Britain. Comparisons between the two are not fairly drawn, especially when all the facts on each side are not placed before the members of this committee who are asked to make that comparison.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You should have read that lecture upon the findings of the Archambault commission.

Mr. Garson: Clause 625, paragraph 1, reads:

> Where a term of imprisonment is imposed in default of payment of a penalty, the term shall, upon payment of a part of the penalty, be reduced by the number of days that bears the same proportion to the number of days in the term as the part paid bears to the total penalty.

This clause should be examined in relation to clause 694, paragraph 3, which we are now discussing which provides that "a summary conviction court may direct that any fine, pecuniary penalty or sum of money adjudged to be paid shall be paid forthwith or at a time to be fixed by the summary conviction court".

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in any cases in which a fine or penalty has been adjudged to be paid by a magistrate under this summary conviction clause there is nothing in law which prevents him saying that the total amount of this fine shall be paid by the prisoner, "at a time which I hereby fix for a certain date in future." The accused then may pay part on account if he wishes, and if he has not paid the whole amount in full then he will be entitled to credit under clause 625, paragraph 1, which I quoted a moment ago, and for the amount that has been paid on account and there will be a corresponding reduction in the imprisonment that would otherwise have been served.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like to ask the minister a question. Suppose a person is fined $10 and he is able to pay only $5 and the failure to pay the initial $10 carried the alternative of 20 days in jail. Would he then serve 10 days in jail because of his inability to pay the remaining $5?

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is still imprisonment for debt.

Mr. Garson: If it is a fine of $10 will my hon. friend say that under this clause time may not be fixed which will enable the accused to pay that fine? The clause reads in part:

> . . . shall be paid forthwith or at a time to be fixed by the summary conviction court.

I know that the corresponding section of the present law is not invoked very often, and I suggest one of the reasons for that is that summary conviction courts do not like to take the trouble to make an order under this section. I see my hon. friend nodding his head in agreement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it not a very good argument to have the clause say that, so they will not be able to evade the issue?

Mr. Garson: I would like to remind my hon. friend that, as I have stated on previous occasions in this house, where you have jurisdiction over the criminal law divided between a legislature which enacts that law and other authorities which administer it, all we can do here is to provide them with a law under which they will have a discretion. It is up to them to exercise that discretion. Not only is it true that the time can be extended and any money paid applied in reduction of the penalty of imprisonment, but under the heading of suspended sentence—this has no reference to fines—payment of costs or compensation, where those are applicable, can be made by instalments as a condition to the suspended sentence. In other words, in the absence of a thoroughgoing probation system in the provincial administration of justice in Canada, I think we have provided in this section all of the discretion which summary conviction courts are prepared to exercise with the facilities they now have at hand. If there is a real desire to give some time for payment, I think they could certainly do so under the law as it stands and as we propose to continue it in the new act.

That being so, it seems to me, under Canadian conditions and in view of our divided jurisdiction, that we have gone as far as practical conditions make possible. When it is represented to us by those who are responsible for the enforcement of the law that they want greater discretion than they now have we will certainly be very glad to consider it. But until that is done we have no reason to suppose, on the basis of the manner in which the present law is invoked, that any further discretion would be exercised to any extent.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Am I not right that the Canadian Bar Association, representative of the bar of every province in Canada, has recommended this change?

Mr. Garson: Well, if my hon. friend is right, that proves that the Canadian Bar Association is in favour of it.

Mr. Ellis: The hon. member for Prince Albert gave a very interesting example of a convicted person paying part of a fine and in lieu of payment of the balance serving a portion of the jail term. To my mind this brings out a very important principle, the question of the maximum fine of $500 or maximum imprisonment of six months. This implies that $500 cash is equal to spending six months in jail. If we believe in the principle of equality before the law, I think it is the height of absurdity, when a man is accused of an offence and convicted, to offer him the choice of paying $500 or spending six months in jail. Many a man can walk into a courtroom, be tried and convicted, take out a cheque book and write a cheque for $500 and walk out of court a free man. Other men who lack money go to jail for six months. In view of the quotation read by the minister a few moments ago, I should like him to tell the committee whether in his opinion the payment of $500 in cash bears any fair relationship to spending six months in jail.

Mr. Garson: Personally I do not think that it does. I certainly would not want to trade the one for the other. But I would point out to my hon. friend that his question has no element of reality to it. If he will read the section carefully he will see that it says:

> . . . every one who is convicted of an offence punishable on summary conviction is liable to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for six months or to both.

There is no suggestion in that section that, as the hon. member would have us believe, $500 is balanced against six months' imprisonment. All that the section says is that the top limit of the monetary penalty is $500 and the top limit of imprisonment is six months. But if a well-to-do person is in the dock and is convicted and the magistrate takes a dark view of the crime he has committed and the circumstances connected with it, it does not by any means necessarily follow that the magistrate is going to impose a penalty of $500 on him. He knows that would be no penalty at all, and under this section he can quite readily send him to jail for six months and on top of a $500 fine, which will be a very different thing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They certainly would not be exercising very much discretion if they followed that system.

Mr. Garson: On the other hand, if the circumstances of the offence had elements about them which seemed to entitle the accused to some consideration and the accused did not appear to be well off the magistrate could impose a money penalty of anything from $500 down to $5 or less and not a prison term at all. After having imposed that penalty he could under this law give the accused time in which to pay it. If during that time the accused pays something on account of the penalty another section of the code says that any penalty of imprisonment imposed in lieu of payment of the balance of the fine will be reduced proportionately.

What I wish to emphasize is that until we instal a system of probation in this country under which a provision of this sort will be administered in the way in which I agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert that they do it successfully in Great Britain, the idea that we are going to accomplish a great reform by amending the existing provision for the giving of time to pay is quite illusory for the cogent reasons which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has stated.

So far as we in the department are concerned, we have an entirely open mind on the matter and are quite prepared to consider any amendment that will actually produce a real reform. But I suggest that if the law-enforcing authorities are going to keep track of a large number of people making payments of instalments on account of fines it is a very different thing to do it in the city of Manchester than it is, for example, in the town of Russell in my constituency, surrounded by a large rural area. Who are going to collect these instalments? If we can answer that question satisfactorily, have we not in the law as it is now a practical provision for time payment that can be applied in a practical manner? Can we not apply the law that we have now in a much greater number of cases if we really want to do it?

Mr. Ellis: The minister says that the magistrate may take certain factors into consideration, but that depends on the interpretation of the law by the particular magistrate sitting on a particular case. So far as Bill No. 7 is concerned, the law with which this parliament is concerned, irrespective of the various difficulties the minister has suggested would arise in collecting fines on the instalment plan, I suggest that much more serious consequences are involved on the other side of the picture in people going to jail. I suggest that for a great many Canadian citizens to be sent to jail under such circumstances in the next few years will be a far more serious matter than any difficulties that might arise in the collection of fines. I suggest that what the minister has said in no way upsets the validity of the statement I made previously, that while it is true a magistrate may impose a jail sentence and a fine—

Mr. Garson: Or both.

Mr. Ellis: Yes—"a fine of not more than $500 or to imprisonment for six months or to both." In other words, it is left wide open. The fact remains that under the law as it is proposed now persons in Canada will be brought before magistrates and tried and if convicted will be faced with the alternative of either paying a certain sum of money or going to jail.

I believe the comparison made with Great Britain might be all very well, but even if the question of what is being done in Great Britain had not been brought up at all, the validity of the argument presented here this afternoon would not be any less. When a man is tried and convicted of an offence he may be given the alternative of paying a definite sum of money or going to jail for a definite amount of time. If he goes to jail, he is going to jail not because he has committed the offence in the first place but because he was unable to pay the fine imposed by the court.

Mr. McIvor: The prisoner is not given any choice in the matter, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Garson: In relation to the remarks just made by the hon. member for Regina City, I would point out that if he would examine the British legislation I am sure he would find that the court is given a discretion in those cases to decide whether the accused is able to pay, and should therefore pay forthwith, or whether he is not able to pay and, as the hon. member for Prince Albert said, should pay by instalments over a period of time. We have the same discretion in Canada. He can pay forthwith or he can pay at a time to be fixed by the summary conviction court. The only difference is that it is not spelled out that it can be paid by instalments. If the time is fixed far enough ahead, there is nothing in the world to prevent the accused from accumulating, at the same rate he would pay the instalments, the moneys that are necessary to meet that fine. Therefore I say that, while I respect the motives for the speeches that we have heard this afternoon, I do not think they take sufficiently into account that under our present Canadian law the courts can give time to pay the fine. Not only that, but after they have given the time, if the accused quite honestly has not paid up the full amount, then he gets full credit for everything he has paid on that amount.

I am not saying that this is perfect. If the administrative authority wanted to go to the trouble of collecting instalments and that sort of thing and had the officers to do it, I am not saying it might not be better to so provide; but the time to provide that will be when much greater advantage shall have been taken of the present provision than has been taken so far by the administrative authorities.

Mr. Ellis: Would the minister assure the committee, then, that the practice to be followed in the future will be that in summary convictions, in all cases magistrates will give the convicted person time to pay his fine.

Mr. Garson: I am very greatly indebted to my hon. friend for having asked that question because he has illuminated this whole matter with a great light. The reason, sir, I cannot give that assurance, and the reason for much of the difficulty that we have in connection with this matter, is that all we can do here is to enact the criminal law and make provision for the payment of these fines on time. But these magistrates are not appointed by this government; the prosecutors who act in these courts are not appointed by this government; we have nothing whatever to do with the administration of justice in these courts. We have no influence whatever over them. We can pass laws here until we are black in the face about the desirability of the instalment plan, but we could not, by the mere fact of passing these laws, give a guarantee that the objectives my hon. friends think are so desirable would be reached; that is the point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is no point at all.

Mr. Ellis: Then, this parliament can change the law.

Mr. Garson: I would be most delighted if I could give an assurance to my hon. friend that these acts would be done by those over whom I have no authority whatever. Constitutionally it is beyond my power to give such an undertaking.

Mr. Ellis: It is not beyond the power of this parliament to enact a section of the Criminal Code which will take away from magistrates the power to send a man to jail because he cannot pay a fine. That is within the power of this parliament. The arguments that the minister has used in the last couple of minutes are the best arguments given this afternoon for changing this code in the manner pointed out by hon. members on this side.

Mr. Croll: I was going to ask the minister a constitutional question, and one which he is able to deal with. It does lie within the minister's authority to set up a system of probation. Would he give us the approximate date when that might be set up?

Mr. Garson: I dislike disagreeing with the hon. member for Spadina, but I think he is confusing the system of probation with the system of parole. The system of probation is a system under which, when the accused is before the magistrate, the magistrate, instead of sentencing him to any penalty whatever, releases him on probation. Now, at that point in the accused's appearance before the court he has not come within any of our federal fields of authority at all. He is the subject of the administration of justice, a purely provincial function. It is only when he has had a sentence imposed upon him and he becomes either an inmate of the federal penitentiary system, which of course is under our authority, or the object of the royal mercy in the matter of the remission of his sentence, that he comes under federal jurisdiction.

At the present time, we have in our penitentiaries something which my hon. friend from Toronto Spadina seems to think of as a probation system. But our federal system is not a probation system; it is a parole system. We have had it in effect for some considerable time. Under a ticket-of-leave we release prisoners from our penitentiaries on the recommendation of the parole board to the John Howard Society, the Salvation Army, and other similar organizations. But these are prisoners who have been sentenced to prison and have thus come under our federal constitutional authority. They are released by us under that same authority.

But so far as the probation system is concerned, as I am sure the hon. member for Prince Albert would agree, it is a system under which instead of having a conviction registered or a sentence imposed upon the accused the magistrate binds him over under the probation officers to behave himself from that time on. All of this happens as part of the provincial administration of justice. Such a provincial probation system in Canada is the analogous body to that which in England has been responsible, as the member for Prince Albert has rightly said, for the great reduction in the prison population of Great Britain, and the great reduction in cost to the taxpayer. That is the body that looks after the collection of these fines on instalments and so on. I suggest that in order to make effective a law that we pass here for the payment of fines by instalments, it will be necessary to provide for it some such type of administration set-up.

Mr. Nesbitt: I was wondering if the minister would care to comment on the suggestion I should like to make with regard to subclause 3. The whole discussion might be obviated if subclause 3 were amended somewhat along the following lines:

A summary conviction court may direct that any fine, pecuniary penalty or sum of money adjudged to be paid shall be paid forthwith or if the accused is unable to pay forthwith, at such time and on such terms as may be fixed by the summary conviction court.

Mr. Garson: I would be quite willing to accept that suggestion. I doubt whether it will make much difference in practice, but in the light of what I have said this afternoon, there is no reason why we should not extend the discretion of the summary conviction court in the manner which has been suggested. And we can see what effect that will have.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then, Mr. Chairman, mention was made by the minister that the system in effect in the United Kingdom could not be applied here because they had probation officers, and the like. The system of probation officers was not established in its present form until after the original statute passed in 1914. The British act reads as follows:

(1) A warrant committing a person to prison in respect of non-payment of a sum adjudged to be paid by a conviction of a court of summary jurisdiction shall not be issued forthwith unless the court which passed the sentence is satisfied that he is possessed of sufficient means to enable him to pay the sum forthwith, or unless, upon being asked by the court whether he desires that time should be allowed for payment, he does not express any such desire, or fails to satisfy the court that he has a fixed abode within its jurisdiction, or unless the court for any other special reason expressly directs that no time shall be allowed.

(2) Where any such person desires to be allowed time for payment the court in deciding what time shall be allowed shall consider any representation made by him, but the time allowed shall not be less than seven clear days.

That is the 1914 act. I had the 1935 act here, but I lent it to Hansard. I suggest that this clause be allowed to stand so that consideration might be given to the drafting of an amendment, as a first step toward a very necessary reform in our country. The long discussion regarding the distribution of authority between the dominion and the provinces was, to say the least, quite inappropriate, and inapplicable to the arguments I have advanced.

The discussion this afternoon has at least brought about a review of the situation. I suggest this is one of the most important clauses to come before us. The clauses dealing with murder and other serious offences will not have such general application. In other words, comparatively there will be very few of those serious offences. The large body of offences in this country is that body in respect of which a fine is regarded as sufficient penalty.

In so far as the criminal law is concerned, when a fine is sufficient, I was glad to hear the minister say that imprisonment should not be enforced. He referred to the subclause as it now stands:

A summary conviction court may direct that any fine, pecuniary penalty or sum of money adjudged to be paid shall be paid forthwith or at a time to be fixed by the summary conviction court.

That clause as it now stands is honoured more in the breach than in the observance, simply because it is general and is not given ad hoc application, and in its present general form it has no actual mandatory application. Under the law in England, and particularly the 1935 amendment, the mandatory principle is applied. The minister has said that if a person were fined $10 with an alternative of twenty days, and could pay only $5, he would have to serve only ten days. Well, I do not think there is anybody in our country who wants to serve a jail term on instalments, or that the minister's suggestion helps the situation at all.

I cannot understand why my observations engendered such heat on the part of the minister because, after all, the generation of heat does not always bring light. I was glad the hon. member to my left, by his references, gave some illumination to the minister. I have tried to discuss the matter objectively. What I have placed before the committee represents a general demand with which I am sure the minister is in agreement. For this reason I suggest that this very important clause, applying as it does each year to more than 10,000 people in our dominion, deserves to be stood aside for the time being, to the end that, through a community of counsel, we may be able to arrive at some arrangement that would be satisfactory to the minister.

Mr. Garson: Did the hon. member hear the suggestion of the hon. member for Oxford?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not considered it.

Mr. Garson: Does my hon. friend agree with it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know, because I cannot say how far it went. I suggest that the terms of the English act be made applicable, to the extent that our conditions permit. The amendments in the United Kingdom were brought about through a committee of parliament with the assistance of Sir John Simon, one of the jurists of his time, who was at the time Home Secretary and who subsequently became Lord Chancellor. And with that community of effort in the British House of Commons, with outstanding members of the department of the Home Secretary and of the British parliament, amendments were made that, after the experience of nineteen years, have been found to be effective and to have greatly reduced the prison population in the United Kingdom.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. At six o'clock the committee was considering clause 694. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of the fact that the suggested amendment I gave to the minister for consideration might stand more careful study, I request that this clause stand.

Mr. Garson: What I suggest we might do is to take my hon. friend's clause and perhaps revise it slightly without changing its principle and bring it in when we meet on the next occasion.

The Deputy Chairman: Does clause 694 stand?

Mr. Barnett: Just before the clause is allowed to stand I should like to say a few words on two points. Perhaps the points I have in mind could be considered by the minister while the clause is standing. Earlier in the discussion, I believe, the minister himself suggested that one of the difficulties in regard to clauses such as this was that while this parliament can enact certain things we have no jurisdiction in enforcing the procedure. However, the point I should like to make revolves around the idea that by power of our suggestion, if by nothing more, we may have a certain effect on how these clauses are carried out and administered.

The first suggestion I have in mind is in relation to this matter of allowing payments to be made over an extended period, or to be delayed. It does seem to me that one reason which might deter a magistrate from entering into any arrangement for delayed payments is the trouble and the difficulty involved in making the necessary collections. What I am wondering is whether under subclause 3 of clause 694 there could be included some specific plan whereby the person on whom the fine had been imposed could assign more or less in the way garnishee orders are made for the deduction from wages or by an assignment that would be collectible from his bank account, or some such arrangement as that. If a plan of action were suggested in the subclause, a magistrate on reading it might be more disposed to follow through with that idea. I think he would be influenced in that regard if the clause contained a concrete suggestion that the magistrate could arrange with a person who had been fined to assign a portion of his wages, if he were regularly employed, or a deduction from his bank account, if he were self-employed, or something along that line. Could something like that be considered in any drafting that is done on this clause?

Mr. Garson: I question very much whether we would be warranted, in a law of general application of this character, in going into details of that sort. After all, that is part of the magisterial discretion. A magistrate is quite at liberty to make arrangements of this sort; that is a sensible arrangement. If he wishes to he can enter into those arrangements. But it is not customary to give direction of that sort in a law of general application such as this Bill No. 7.

Mr. Barnett: I have another point that I feel I should bring up here on behalf of one irate citizen of this country. I will explain it, and the minister can say whether or not this could be worked. This has to do with the fact that under this clause, when the person pays his fine, no provision is made for him to get a receipt for the money that he has paid in. As I say, I know of an instance where a certain irate citizen went so far as to go to the attorney general of the province about this, and he was informed that there was no provision. I believe it was something on the theory that his freedom was his receipt; but this particular citizen was not satisfied with that provision. He felt that if any agent of the crown was collecting money, no matter what he might be collecting it for, he should give the person who had paid that money a receipt. My question to the minister is: Could that be included, and if not, why not?

Mr. Garson: I do not think it should be included, and the reason is this. Both of these matters that my hon. friend has raised are pretty largely questions of administration. If the province concerned does not see fit to have a system under which its magistrates or clerks of court, and the like, give official receipts for all the moneys that they receive officially in the discharge of their duties, then it would be most unusual for us to direct in the criminal law of Canada that they should give receipts and the like. That is purely a matter of provincial administration.

Mr. Barnett: In other words, the minister thinks that it comes within the province of the attorney general?

Mr. Garson: Quite, and that distinction goes all through the piece.

Mr. Boisvert: Before this clause stands I should like to say a few words about it. I listened this afternoon to the many good suggestions from the other side of the house. I have been studying these suggestions, and in my humble opinion they will not help the administration of justice in this country. I have been practising law in the province of Quebec for twenty-five years and I have always found that the judges and magistrates had quite a lot of discretion in cases such as we were dealing with this afternoon. I have also found that in the exercise of their discretionary power the judges and magistrates have postponed their sentences to give the poor people a chance to pay their fines. Sometimes they have postponed them for one month, for two months or three months so that the poor people were able to pay their fines and had not to go to jail. Therefore I do not think that the suggestions made this afternoon would improve the administration of justice in this country, as I said before. I say that from the bottom of my heart because I have always been on the side of the poor people, the weak and the miserable. But when we are dealing with justice in a country like Canada I think we should respect the discretion of the judges and magistrates and retain the system we have been enjoying up to date and which after all has not destroyed the framework of our community.

Mr. Enfield: Mr. Chairman, there is something I should like to get clear regarding this procedure of allowing clauses to stand. I was under the impression that if we came to a clause on which it was expected there would be a great deal of discussion it was to stand in order that we might make progress with what we are doing. We spent a great part of this afternoon discussing clause 694 only to find when we returned this evening that it is going to stand anyway. My own view is that hon. members have had the utmost opportunity to express themselves concerning clause 694 and if it is allowed to stand we will only be repeating the process all over again at a later date. I would move that clause 694 pass as it stands.

The Deputy Chairman: My understanding is that the committee agreed that this clause should stand although not on exactly the same terms as those which have stood up to date. The Minister of Justice suggested that this clause stand until next time in order that a change in the wording might be considered and submitted to the committee.

Mr. Enfield: I think it was at the suggestion of the hon. member for Oxford that it stood, and I as a member of the committee certainly did not consent.

Clause stands.

Clauses 695 to 709 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 710—Adjournment.

Mr. Knowles: If I read this clause correctly it has the effect of doing away with a change which was made in 1948. Subparagraph (a) of subclause 3 of this clause provides that in certain circumstances:

—the summary conviction court

(a) may proceed ex parte to hear and determine the proceedings in the absence of the defendant as fully and effectually as if the defendant had appeared.

Section 718 of the former code was amended by section 20 of chapter 39 of the statutes of 1948 which provided in part:

—as if the defendant had personally appeared in obedience to such summons and had pleaded "not guilty".

Can the minister tell us the significance of those words "and had pleaded not guilty". Will he tell us why they were put in in 1948 and why they are being taken out now?

Mr. Garson: Both the existing section in the code and the proposed clause in the bill provide for summary conviction hearings proceeding in the absence of the defendant. When it so proceeds the crown will have to prove a case against the defendant and the provision that it should proceed as if he had pleaded not guilty is surplusage; for the crown certainly could not proceed as if he had pleaded guilty. The onus is always upon the crown to prove the case when it proceeds in the absence of the defendant.

Mr. Knowles: I realize that the minister was not here in 1948 when those words were put in. Does he know why they were inserted, in view of the comment he has now made?

Mr. Garson: No, I do not.

Mr. MacInnis: The sense is pretty much the same, whether they use the one set of words or the other.

Criminal Code

On clause 717—Where injury or damage feared.

Mr. Nesbitt: This clause is not greatly different from what it used to be but I cannot help feeling that this clause and the similar section in the code have omitted to correct a situation which has arisen not infrequently. Perhaps I could illustrate my point by giving an example. On one occasion the children's aid society in the city in which I live received a telephone call around midnight from a man who told them they had better come to get his children as he was going to shoot his wife and then commit suicide. There were several young children who had to be looked after.

The police were informed quickly and when they arrived there they found that fortunately the man's wife had not arrived home so he had not had a chance to shoot her, nor had he shot himself. But he appeared to have every intention of doing this, for a loaded gun was standing by the door. Apparently the wife was out committing some indiscretion. They were unable to do very much about it as the man in question had not threatened his wife directly. He had simply told somebody else that he was going to shoot her and they could not do anything about it.

He was held for a few days and I suppose actually the magistrate had no authority to do that. However, he was afraid to let the man out for fear he would carry out his threat. There have been several similar situations that have occurred and with which I have been confronted. This question of putting up a surety of $100, $200 or $500 to keep the peace means nothing to a person who has every intention of carrying out a serious offence like that.

In Ontario the administration of justice is helped somewhat by the provisions of the Ontario mental hospitals act, under which a person may be held for observation for sixty days when there is suggestion of mental illness. It rather cools them off. But where there is no question of mental illness and a person threatens to commit a crime, the situation is quite different. Another example would be line fence disputes out in the country where sometimes people get quite acrimonious.

I should like to see this clause stand and possibly the minister might consider an amendment which would permit a magistrate or a justice, upon evidence being presented that a person was likely to commit an indictable offence, to hold such person in jail for from seven to ten days, a sort of cooling-off period. It is quite difficult to administer the law as it stands, because a magistrate does not feel he can hold a man, while on the other hand he hates to let him go if he may possibly kill someone.

Mr. Garson: I suggest we let the clause stand and we will consider the matter.

Clause stands.

Clauses 718 to 742 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 743—On question of law.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to move that clause 743 be amended by adding thereto subclause 5, reading as follows:

The attorney-general of Canada has the same rights of appeal in proceedings instituted at the instance of the government of Canada and conducted by and on behalf of that government as the attorney-general of a province has under this part.

Mr. Winters: I so move.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee has heard the amendment proposed by Mr. Garson. Is it agreed by the committee that the amendment be carried?

Amendment agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause as amended carry?

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 744—Fees and allowances.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, on the matter of fees and allowances there are a few observations I would like to make. These are matters which previous committees have possibly considered, but I believe they are worthy of further consideration.

The Deputy Chairman: I wonder if the hon. member would agree to the committee carrying clause 744? That clause and the schedule thereto are treated as two separate items and if we carried clause 744 the hon. member could then perhaps address his remarks to the schedule.

Mr. Nesbitt: That is agreeable to me, Mr. Chairman.

Clause agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be easier if we referred to this in terms of page numbers, since that would enable members to find more easily the items to which I wish to refer. On page 260 of Bill No. 7 item 25 deals with fees and allowances payable to witnesses. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that a $4 fee per day for a witness is not commensurate with the present cost of living. If a person is a witness at a trial then it is my feeling that such a person should receive no fee at all, or they should be paid a fee which is commensurate with the loss of wages they would incur through their attendance at such a trial. I would like to suggest that that figure be doubled or set at the amount of, say, $7.50. Personally I would like to see it doubled.

Item 26 on this page deals with the mileage travelled to attend a trial and the fee covers the distance travelled each way. For each mile travelled there is an allowance of 10 cents. It strikes me there might be an additional provision there covering the full train fare of people who travel by rail.

Item 27 on the same page deals with interpreters and schedules an allowance of $2.50 for each half day attendance at a trial. That amount is ridiculous. This problem of interpreters is becoming increasingly grave all over Canada at the present time owing to the great number of new Canadians, particularly those who seem to be involved frequently in traffic accidents. Perhaps it is because they are not accustomed to driving according to our highway rules, or possibly it is because they are not accustomed to driving or having a car at all. However, that can be brought up at some other time. The fact remains that even in parts of Canada where interpreters were hardly ever necessary before they have now become necessary and in order to get an interpreter who can properly interpret the questions usually put at such trials we require people of some considerable education who are usually possessed of a fairly good job. They come into a court room and have to sit around for half the day before the case is called and—

Mr. Garson: Is the hon. member aware that he is discussing a summary conviction trial and not a trial in a high court?

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes, but nevertheless these people have to wait around and $2.50 for half a day of their services is I think ridiculously low. I believe an interpreter should certainly be paid a rate of $10 per day at the very least for attending these trials. I would suggest that item 27 be increased from $2.50 to $5.00 per half day.

These are the only items to which I wish to refer but I would like to say that before making these suggestions I did take the opportunity of discussing these fees with a number of people who are responsible for enforcing the law in the province of Ontario and the suggestions I have made met very largely with their approval.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, supposing a man who is a mechanic is called as a witness or for jury duty and he is earning $2.17 an hour. Is it fair to ask such a person to attend court for eight hours for $4 per day when he could earn in the same time $16? I do not believe the hon. member's suggestion goes far enough and if it is to be raised at all a witness should get as much as he would earn if he were following his normal occupation.

Mr. Nesbitt: I quite agree with the hon. member for Fort William. I did not expect the minister would consider a suggestion quite as generous as that put forward by the hon. member, and in the belief that half a loaf was better than no loaf at all I suggested the lower figure.

Mr. Garson: I would like to address a few remarks now to those hon. members who this afternoon were so concerned about the position of a needy accused in a summary conviction court. These fees we are discussing here relate to summary conviction proceedings where the matters being adjudicated upon are often pretty trivial and no large amounts of money or very serious crimes are involved. These fees we are throwing around in our discussion are fees which will have to be paid by the accused if he is found guilty—the same man the payment of whose fine by instalments we were discussing for some time this afternoon. The fees which are set out in this list were not arrived at by accident or carelessly. They received lengthy and very careful discussion before the special House of Commons committee on the Criminal Code last year. This committee took into account the fact that in very many cases it would be quite poor people who will have to pay these fees on top of any fine which may be levied. It was fully realized that the allowance to a witness would not be as high as he himself could otherwise earn in his ordinary work, as my hon. friend from Fort William has pointed out. But in view of the fact that most of these summary conviction cases concerned humble and needy people, we thought it was not unreasonable to expect these citizens who come in as witnesses to make their attendance part of their contribution as citizens to the administration of justice at this level. Unless the provincial authorities are prepared to shoulder the great bulk of these costs rather than the parties to these summary conviction matters, it means that the parties to summary conviction trials, who for the most part are people in pretty humble circumstances, will have to pay a burden of court costs altogether out of proportion to the issues in these summary conviction cases. To discuss the matter of the interpreter, for example, if this interpreter appears in a rural district he certainly will not be a person who is imported from any great distance for I agree that the fee that is indicated is certainly not exorbitant. On the other hand, if the costs are to be kept down that is about the amount that the traffic will bear. If he is in a city this amount can be charged in a case and there may be quite a number of cases in the police court in which he will appear as an interpreter in one day.

It was only after the most careful consideration by the committee that these fees were arrived at and although they do represent disadvantages in some respects, we think that upon balance it is better to leave them as they are. As a matter of fact, there is a typographical error in the amount at the bottom of page 260. I refer to item No. 29, "mileage travelled to attend trial, each way, for each trial, 20 cents". That should be 10 cents. I was going to move that the "20" be reduced to "10" in order to correct that typographical error. I would ask my colleague to so move.

Mr. Harris: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Nesbitt: I should like to make one brief observation. I would be quite willing to go along with the minister on the matter of witnesses because, as I have mentioned before, there has always been a fairly strong feeling that to appear as a witness is in the same category as jury duty. It is a matter of public duty. I can see the minister's point very well there, but with respect to the interpreter I feel that the amount for interpreters should be raised somewhat.

Mr. Barnett: Some of the remarks made by the minister may change slightly some of the things I had it in mind to say about this schedule. Like the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I am quite concerned about the fee of $4 a day for a witness. It would not even cover his out-of-pocket expenses if he had to be away from home, let alone reimburse him for his loss of pay. When I looked at the schedule I actually wondered whether or not it had been considered carefully by the committee. It struck me that the schedule was something that had been carried over from a different form of society than the one in which we live today, a rural type of society where to be absent for a day from one's normal activity on the farm, or whatever it might be, did not matter very much.

[Mr. Garson]

But I do know that there is a different attitude today, particularly in industrial centres. Wherever possible a man is going to try to avoid becoming a witness or being placed in the position where he will have to be a witness because he knows if he is called he is going to have to forfeit his normal income for that day. His pay cheque is going to be that much smaller at the end of the week. I know from my own observation that in a good many instances citizens will take pains to avoid having to be a witness. Whether that is because of a lack of appreciation of the responsibilities of citizenship, and is something to be frowned upon, I do not know, but at the same time we have to be concerned with the effective administration of the law. That leads me to refer to the first part of the schedule. I am not very familiar with all the phrasing and I hope the minister will correct me if I am on the wrong track, but I take it that the fees and allowances that may be charged by summary conviction courts under the first part of the schedule are the type of fees and allowances which accrue to the magistrate.

Here again it strikes me that the concept is a carryover from the days when the magistrate was the country squire and a man of independent means. I think that is not altogether true today. I think the discussion we had earlier today on summary conviction revealed how important it is that the offices of magistrates and justices throughout the country be filled by men of high calibre. Let me refer to items 9 and 10 in the schedule. Item 9 is "hearing and determining proceeding, $1." Item 10 is "where hearing lasts more than two hours, $2." I take it from that that the magistrate is being paid at the rate of 50 cents an hour for the time he spends on a preliminary hearing in determining whether or not the man should be committed for trial.

People have observed to me that there are cases where the magistrate has received the allowance of $1 and at the same time the accused is paying his lawyer $100 to defend him and get him off. Perhaps there are two lawyers each getting $100, and the magistrate who has to determine between the arguments of this high-paid talent is in the position where his take-home pay is $1.

In view of the importance of attracting men of experience and judgment to these positions, I think there is a very strong case for establishing a more suitable scale of reward for these men for the time they spend on these matters. Perhaps I am on the wrong track. If I am, the minister will correct me, but I think he will recognize the importance of what I am trying to get at.

Mr. Garson: Whether my hon. friend is on the wrong track depends upon the attitude that society takes towards the administration of justice in a local community. In England they have excellent justices of the peace, first-rate men in every way, who serve year in and year out for nothing at all and count it a great honour to do so. No person pretends that the fees allowed to magistrates of that type in any way compensate them in a manner which would appeal to a more mercenary man. But if the magistrate is appointed by a government that uses good discretion in its appointments, I have not the slightest doubt that in most communities it will be quite possible to find first-class men and women who will count it an honour to discharge with great competence the important function of the administration of justice in their community even if their fees are only nominal.

When it comes to magistrates who are professional, those, for example, who sit in the larger cities, and who try indictable offences without a jury with the consent of the accused, they of course handle a large volume of that type of work, and in all the cases I know of are paid quite substantial salaries because that is their only source of livelihood. But so far as these summary conviction matters are concerned, the whole philosophy of their disposition is that the people who act as judges will be substantial citizens in the community who will count it an honour, as they do in England and as they do in many places in Canada, to have the privilege of administering justice amongst people who in many cases cannot afford to pay high court fees. So far as my hon. friend's suggestion that the parties in cases of that sort are paying $100 a day to opposing lawyers is concerned, I am sure he will not resent my saying that his remarks disclose an unfamiliarity with the practice of law at that level.

The problem that we have here is a very difficult one. Everybody knows that these witness' fees and magistrates' fees are not adequate compensation for the time lost or work done. If they are made adequate, then it simply means that the disputes of humble people cannot be determined at all except at a cost which would be completely exorbitant for them to pay. This afternoon we discussed for an hour and a half how much time we are going to give a man to pay a $10 fine, yet we could easily enough run up to $40 or $50 in costs in connection with the same matters if we adopt an attitude that anyone who has anything to do with it has to get paid for the full amount of the time spent at his union wages.

There is no way of handling this matter, except by the method I have suggested or by the provincial governments, if they choose to do so, coming forward with a plan to pay fees to witnesses and magistrates that are two or three times as great as these we are discussing and make up the difference by a provincial subsidy. This would leave the parties in summary conviction matters with about one-third of the costs actually incurred that they would have to pay.

Mr. Lusby: On that question of witness fees, I wonder if the minister or some member of the bar of Ontario could tell me what the witness fees are in the superior courts of Ontario in criminal matters? They are only $3 per day in Nova Scotia, and it would be rather an anomaly to pay $8 in summary conviction matters.

Schedule agreed to.

On clause 745—Repeal.

Mr. Knowles: I take it the reference to the Criminal Code, chapter 36 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, would include all the amendments made to it from that time down to the present?

Mr. Garson: By the Interpretation Act; it includes that.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 746 and 747 agreed to.

On clause 748—Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.

Mr. Garson: May I suggest an amendment to clause 748. The Opium and Narcotic Drug Act should be amended by deleting lines 39, 40 and 41 on page 261 and lines 1, 2 and 3 on page 262, and substituting the following therefor—the sidenote will read:

Except in cases tried before two justices no appeals in cases taken under section 4 (1) or (2).

The body of the section will read as follows:

25. Except in cases tried before two justices of the peace sections 719 to 732, inclusive, and subsection (2) of section 742 of the Criminal Code do not apply to any conviction, order, or proceedings in respect of any offence under subsection (1) or (2) of section 4 of this act.

Mr. Winters: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 749—Canada Evidence Act.

Mr. Garson: There is a typographical error here I should like to clear up if I may. I would move:

that the figure 159 in line 10 on page 262 should be deleted and the figure 158 substituted therefor.

This is to correct a typographical error.

Mr. Winters: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 750—Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister state by what process the information as to the changes being made with respect to these other acts will be appended to these other acts? In the case of clause 749 which we have just passed, I can see that an office consolidation of the Canada Evidence Act would, of course, include the amendment that will be made to that act by clause 749 of this bill. In the case of clause 750 the wording there does not seem to call for an amendment to the Combines Investigation Act, but rather we have here an interpretation with respect to that act. Could the minister state how this is handled so as to make the reference available?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is aware of the purpose of these, and that they are consequential amendments.

Mr. Knowles: Quite.

Mr. Garson: I think, in connection with the Combines Investigation Act, those could be picked up in the office consolidation.

Mr. Knowles: Either that or as footnotes.

Mr. Garson: My assistant tells me that the amendment will be seen in the index of the annual statutes; it will be noted there.

Mr. Knowles: There will be a note there in relation to the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Garson: Yes, in the index of the annual statutes under the heading of the Combines Investigation Act.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 751 and 752 agreed to.

On clause 753—Forms.

The Deputy Chairman: I am advised that the forty-five forms in part XXVI, and which follow clause 753, are to be considered as coming under clause 753.

Clause agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: I am now in the hands of the committee as to what further procedure the committee wishes to take.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest we move on to the film board.

Mr. Garson: I think that is a good suggestion. We have made good progress today.

Mr. Philpott: Could we take clause 102 now?

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Knowles: No; film board.

Mr. Philpott: I am sure we have one or two non-contentious clauses that we could certainly dispose of tonight, whereas the other thing will take a good deal of time.

The Deputy Chairman: I should like to suggest to the committee that, perhaps not too formally at the moment, we might come to a decision as to what we are going to do with the Criminal Code in the immediate future. I do not feel it would be fair to hon. members present or absent for me to call haphazardly chosen clauses. Perhaps the Minister of Justice or the leader of the house has a word to say.

Mr. Harris: I have only this to say, Mr. Chairman. I believe it was clearly understood that when we had come to the end of the Criminal Code we would stop there and go on with the film board. While I appreciate that there are probably sections on which hon. members feel there might be complete agreement, with all respect I think we ought to go through with the arrangements as we made them last night.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

368. Quebec, $10,890,000.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I think the ministers who have spoken in the debate established the fact that parliament had been given a fair warning. However, when an hon. member who attends as regularly as the hon. member for Ottawa West, and who was then parliamentary assistant to the Acting Prime Minister, was not aware of what was happening, there is some excuse for other members of parliament being unaware that this very important change was taking place. I do not wish to accuse either the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration or the Minister of Public Works of bad faith, but I think they are displaying very bad judgment. I think their remarks indicate, too, that the government is not likely to change its mind.

I believe the indication given by the Prime Minister earlier in the session, that this matter should stand until members in all sections of the house had a chance to discuss it in committee and decide whether the arguments in favour of moving to Montreal overweighed the very serious objections to the proposals, should be kept in mind. The hon. member for Ottawa West made a very careful speech, at the beginning of which he said, as reported at page 2578 of Hansard:

> May I preface my remarks with the statement that in a general way I approve of the work of the national film board. I think it is very good, and has been well conducted.

I go a good deal further in my enthusiasm about the work of the national film board. Then on the following page the hon. member said:

> In the main it has been very good work.

And then on the next page he said:

> My criticism centres on the one point. I do not think sufficient preliminary matters were decided to warrant any decision as to whether or not the film board should be moved.

That point should be carefully considered.

I am sure all hon. members have read the submission to the Prime Minister by the mayor and controllers of Ottawa. While normally I am not greatly impressed by the opinions of people who have tax revenue to consider, I think that the Ottawa city council, who have offered the taxpayers of Canada the equivalent of a quarter of a million dollars, have made a gesture which should not be ignored. When so many people in the country are complaining about the burden of taxation I believe this gesture should receive favourable consideration.

As I suggested earlier, I think the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Minister of Public Works have had some bad advice in the matter, and that this evening it would be appropriate for me to say a few words with respect to the departure of this particular institution from the city of Ottawa.

I feel somewhat as if I were present at a funeral. I had a great deal of hope for the child, not yet fifteen years old. During the child's life the country was at war, and I think all hon. members will agree that the national film board did an outstanding job in helping Canadians at home and abroad to understand better the tremendous contributions being made by our Canadians in the army, the air force and the navy, as well as those on the home front—the factories, the mines and the farms. Without that contribution the Canadian war effort would have been less effective.

I realize that during that time the government received criticism for using this department to build up the prestige of the government. However, those criticisms were not taken too seriously; and the general effect was that Canadians were able to understand better what we were able to do collectively.

Speaking in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I intimated that at a later date I would say something about what it means to the people I represent to have this branch of government. I would like to tell hon. members that my constituency extends nearly 600 miles north and south and 100 miles east and west. In it there are only seven communities large enough to support banks. And if a community is not large enough to warrant a bank, the prospects for having a theatre are not too bright. Had it not been for the films produced and distributed by the national film board there are many people in that area who would not have had the pleasure of knowing what modern films are like.

I am afraid this move is going to make it more difficult for the people on our frontiers to have access to films, both as to the quality and the quantity, that they had in the past.

I was interested in seeing what the Canadian Chamber of Commerce had to say about the national film board. I find the chamber endorses the minority report with respect to the national film board presented by the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences. The chamber of commerce—> —recommends that the government instruct the national film board to place a larger proportion of federal government film production with outside film producers, and appoint to the board of the national film board two or three members as moderators with the duty of examining objectively the operations of the board and all plans for expansion.

> The chamber recommends that the national film board should not extend its operations into fields adequately served by private enterprise.
> The film act should be amended so that it is no longer necessary for departments of the federal government to secure their films through the national film board.

I cannot prove it, but I venture to say succeeding events will show that the movement of the national film board from Ottawa to Montreal will result in a much larger volume of government business being channelled through private film companies, rather than through our own national film board.

This reference by the chamber of commerce prompted me to see just what had been said by the commission. The membership of this commission would command the respect of all Canadians, and consisted of His Excellency the Governor General, Mr. Arthur Surveyer of Montreal, Norman A. M. MacKenzie, president of the University of British Columbia, the Most Reverend Georges-Henri Levesque, dean of the faculty of social sciences, Laval University, and Dr. Hilda Neatby, professor of history at the University of Saskatchewan.

I find that four of these very outstanding Canadians were able to agree on a report on the film board, while the fifth, Mr. Surveyer, who was not known to me, brought in a minority report. Before looking at the minority report it might be well to read what was said about films in Canada:

> About 120 organizations in briefs and evidence discussed the work of the national film board, some at considerable length. Most of them approved of its work, and asked that this work be extended. They went further. Many Canadians expressed pride in the work of the film board considering that, like our national radio service, it is a valuable and distinctive Canadian achievement. We have heard much of the film board's Canadianism.

And further on:

> The board is also praised for its services to distant communities: its films reach ". . . in a dramatic way many who would not otherwise come into touch with the culture of the nation". There is a corresponding regret and even resentment at the reduction of the board's estimates. "The present policy of restricting (the) budget can only lead to a cultural impoverishment of the people of this country".

In their recommendations they say:

> We therefore recommend:
> That the national film board be granted funds adequate for the necessary expansion of its field staff and of its distribution activities, and that the present policy of stimulating and complementing voluntary effort be continued.

And further on:

> That the national film board continue its present functions as defined in the Film Act and that it continue to produce such documentary films as will serve the public interest. That the national film board continue its policy of commissioning films from private producers when this is in the public interest; that it continue and increase its efforts to co-operate with private producers and to encourage private film production in Canada.

And then finally:

> We have observed with anxious concern that the various premises in which the film board conducts its operations are cramped, scattered, inconvenient and hazardous. In the interests of economy and efficiency, and in justice to film board employees, this deplorable situation should be changed.
> That safe and efficient premises be provided without delay for the operations of the national film board.

That brings me to the so-called minority report, the reservations and observations made by Mr. Arthur Surveyer. His section on radio broadcasting that I am going to mention bears a great similarity to the briefs which come to hon. members from time to time regarding the plight of the privately owned radio stations in the country. But there is a section here on the national film board, and in view of the very moderate opinions expressed by the other four distinguished members of the commission I think it significant that the fifth member should find it necessary to present a minority report. He does not call it a minority report; he calls it reservations and observations, but the Canadian Chamber of Commerce describes it as a minority report. He sums up his suggestions in this way:

> I recommend, therefore, that the national film board should be required to give, each year, to outside film producers or to outside photographers, work to the value of half its yearly sales or of half the value of its annual production of films or of photographs.

This is the line that we have heard, ever since the national film board was started, from those who have argued that the government had no business getting into the field of film production; that they should leave it to the private producers.

When the first act was passed in 1939 one of the well-known members of the Conservative party, as it was then, Mr. Earl Lawson, expressed his objection. He of course made his position quite clear. He said:

> I have in my legal activities represented many phases of the motion picture industry.

I am quoting from "Food for Thought" of March, 1950:

> Having thus presented his credentials, Mr. Lawson advised the government to have its films "produced by Associated Screen News (of Montreal), or the other film concern, the name of which I don't remember."

An hon. Member: Crawley Films.

Mr. Nicholson: No, that was before Crawley Films came into being.

I was quoting Mr. Lawson, who suggested that instead of the government going into film production they should employ Associated Screen News of Montreal or some other film corporation whose name he could not remember at the moment. And ever since that time the people with large investments in the film industry have been jealous of the job that is being done by our national film board. I have the list of films produced—

Mr. Philpott: On a point of order, we are discussing an amendment to the construction of a new building for the national film board in Montreal. The hon. member is discussing now the whole policy of the national film board.

The Chairman: Order. I am glad that the hon. member has raised this point of order. This debate has covered a very wide field, and in view of the nature of the debate that took place previously I do not feel that I can call the hon. member's remarks irrelevant. Since the debate has now proceeded at some length, I do think however that we should try to devote ourselves more particularly to the item under discussion, namely, the proposed move to Montreal.

Mr. Nicholson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I shall try to act on your suggestion, but I think it is quite relevant. I suggest that if the opinions expressed by Mr. Surveyer are acted on by the government, and the national film board is moved to Montreal and at least half of the production is to go to firms outside the film board, that will be a matter that will affect very directly the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order, has anybody on behalf of the government ever said that they were going to do what my hon. friend has just suggested? I do not recall any statement of that kind having been made, and he should not assume that because there is a minority report about the national film board we are going to follow it.

Mr. Nicholson: The earlier implication was that the national film board was being moved to Montreal at the suggestion of the Massey commission.

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Nicholson: It was not said directly.

Mr. Winters: It was never suggested.

Mr. Nicholson: The implication was that the government was acting on very good advice, on the advice of the Massey commission.

Mr. Winters: No.

Mr. Nicholson: They did recommend new quarters.

Mr. Harris: Nobody ever said that.

Mr. Nicholson: I know that no minister has said it, but the implication is there.

Mr. Winters: It was made clear that that was not the case.

Mr. Nicholson: But the film board is being moved, and when the national film board headquarters are in Montreal and Crawley Films are in Ottawa and a minister wants to get production immediately, it will be much easier to contact Crawley Films and to get action at once than it will be to get in touch with the national film board first in Ottawa and then send to Montreal and have people come up by plane or train. I want to suggest that ever since the film board started, organizations in Canada have been constantly sniping and trying to discredit the national film board.

The last annual report that I have lists some of the achievements for the previous years. It mentions that the national film board has won thirty honours in Canada and international competitions; the board produced "Royal Journey", its full-length feature film, using a new colour process. The board's technicians perfected a new dual-language sound-track process. The non-theatrical audiences for the national film board films in Canada totalled 11 million and some odd, an increase of 14·8 per cent; the non-theatrical audiences for the national film board films in foreign countries totalled 11 million odd also, an increase of 15 per cent. With this enviable record, in the face of very serious handicaps, the national film board has done great things for the Canadian people and it is unfortunate that the government is insisting on this move.

An hon. member for one of the York ridings referred to Crawley Films. It is well known that the national film board has been very generous to Crawley Films. F. R. Crawley started on a shoestring and was able to—

The Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member will agree that I have been more than generous. The point of order raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South was well taken. I do not wish to limit the discussion in view of the debate that has taken place previously. But at the same time I really think the hon. member should limit his remarks more particularly to the resolution.

Mr. Nicholson: I shall conclude my remarks with that, but I think it is quite in order, in view of the remarkable growth of Crawley Films in this city, largely at government expense, to know that if the national film board is moved and five years from now we find a privately-operated film-producing organization in the city of Ottawa continuing to grow, it will be a matter of public concern. I shall not press it any more since you have objected.

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Chairman, during this debate we have heard many speeches, some in favour and some against moving the national film board to Ville St. Laurent on the island of Montreal. So far we have not heard any speaker in the opposition give any good reason why the national film board should not be moved to Ville St. Laurent. I think all have evaded the question. I have noticed with pleasure that all those who have spoken have been unanimous in commending the work of the national film board. So did the special committee formed in 1952 to study the work of the national film board.

As has been said during this debate, under the National Film Act of 1950 the purposes of the board are defined as the initiation, promotion and distribution of films in the national interest, and in particular films designed to interpret Canada to Canadians and to other nations. I notice that it is designated as the representative of the government and of government departments in their relations with persons engaged in the commercial motion picture field.

Since we all realize the necessity of the national film board for Canada and Canadians, the question is how and where the national film board can best achieve its purposes. From what I have heard during this debate I gather that we agree with the report of the special committee on the national film board that the headquarters work of the board be centralized in one building designed and constructed especially to meet the production, technical and distribution needs of the board. The only point where there seems to be disagreement is the location of the building.

As we have seen, the purposes of the film board are to initiate, produce and distribute films showing the image of Canada to Canadians and foreign countries. To achieve these purposes, not only do we need a suitable building, but also we need the film board to be located where it can accomplish more.

During the committee proceedings in May, 1952, the location was discussed and the committee members of all parties were aware then that Montreal was the intended location.

To my mind, the national film board has to be located in a large cultural city, not too far from the capital city, where transportation facilities are available either by plane, train, truck or car and, having in mind the bilingual status of Canada, in a place where cultural and creative talent is easily available in the two official languages of Canada.

Even if Ottawa, our capital city, is a beautiful place, unfortunately it does not have the size to suit an institution of the character of the film board.

As to the very progressive city of Toronto, it surely has much to offer. It is a large city where talent is available, it is a cultural centre, but it has not the strictly bilingual characteristics that Montreal has. Montreal is a centre of both French and English culture. At the same time it is near Ottawa. It is a large city which attracts talent, artists, musicians, technicians of both cultures, because there they find more opportunities than they could find elsewhere.

With its seven radio stations in operation and another one coming in a few weeks; with its two television stations, one French, one English; with the C.B.C. international services, Montreal attracts both English and French-speaking artists, musicians, actors, script writers, technicians, translators, narrators and so forth.

Montreal also has almost 500 schools both English and French. It has two large universities, McGill University and l'Universite de Montreal, 20 liberal arts colleges and many high schools. It has the benefit of 25 large libraries, 35 university and college libraries and 39 others. It has seven large museums. Eight newspapers, French and English, are published daily as well as many hundreds of weekly newspapers and magazines. There are also approximately 200 clubs where entertainment is found and which attract comedians as well as artists. There are 83 theatres, at least 20 cine-clubs.

Besides that there are about 300 active cultural and artistic societies among which are the Montreal repertory theatre, the Montreal women's symphony orchestra, les concerts symphoniques de Montreal, the Montreal festivals, the Montreal summer theatre, les variétés lyriques, the Canadian concerts and artists, les amis de l'art, the opera guild, the composers, authors and publishers association of Canada, etc.

Also you will find in Montreal many motion picture producers and studios such as the Associated Screen News, the M.C.R. Historia Film Production, the Quebec Productions Corporation, the Crawley Films Limited, and so forth.

These are only examples of how the board's creative workers would be in contact with people interested in the same field in both English and French. It would stimulate and facilitate their work in the initiation and promotion of films of truly national interest.

Since Montreal is not only the air-line capital of Canada, but also an important seaport as well as an important railway centre in Canada, distribution of films would be well taken care of.

Montreal has all that is required to help the national film board achieve well its purposes and it has been the one and only reason why it has been suggested to move it there. There were no other reasons. Much less the one mentioned in October, 1953, by the mayor of Ottawa, Miss Charlotte Whitton, who happens to be a good friend of the Leader of the Opposition and of the Conservative party. As a matter of fact she stated, as reported in the Evening Citizen of October 22, 1953, that the moving of the national film board to Montreal was:

> All too high a price for Canada, the capital, and these families to pay for assuring the election, as the member from Ville St. Laurent, of Mr. Guy Rouleau, president of the National Young Liberal Federation."

Well, if Miss Whitton has the right to defend the interests of the city of Ottawa, she should do it as some other members in this house did it, on fair grounds. If her sources of information are always as good, I am not surprised at some of her statements against each and all, and I do not think that the people can take them at their face value.

Like the people of Ville St. Laurent, as well as the constituency of Dollard, I was shocked to learn of such unfair and untrue remarks made by a person holding public office. Nothing is farther from the truth. The people from my riding do not sell their votes; they are good and honest people who, when the time comes, vote according to their conscience for the party and the man they consider best fitted to administer the affairs of the country, and they have shown by their vote that they do not have much trust in Miss Whitton's best friends, the Conservatives.

Furthermore, I do not think that the Prime Minister of Canada and the members of his cabinet can be accused of having tried to buy the votes of my constituents. Their integrity is high above reproach, and that is why, even if only one national film board building should be built, 171 Liberal candidates, including the Prime Minister and the cabinet ministers, were elected on August 10 last.

And speaking of Miss Charlotte Whitton, I find it strange that the official opposition to the construction of the national film board building in Montreal started after the mayor of Ottawa spoke about the matter. Much stranger is the fact that during this debate they used many of her arguments. For example, one Conservative member, after hearing Mayor Whitton hint at bribery, said, and I quote:

> The only talent that seems to exist in abundance in the city of Montreal is a superabundance of Liberal members.

Later, it was amazing to hear another Conservative member echo a statement made the previous day by the mayor of Ottawa to the effect that the moving of the film board, and I quote:

> . . . would be the largest forced migration of persons in this part of the world since the expulsion of the Acadians.

But to be fair to the hon. member I must add that he realized that his political friend, Mayor Whitton, went a little too far and he was careful to add, "I think that is putting it rather strongly".

For a while during the debate, Mr. Chairman, I wondered who was the real leader of the opposition, the Leader of the Opposition sitting in this house, or the "never-stop-talking" mayor of Ottawa. If the matter were not so serious it would be very funny. However, these irresponsible declarations have misled some people in regard to the real question at stake, and troubled others such as the person who sent a letter to the editor of the Ottawa Citizen under the signature "A film board wife", stating that it must be awful to live in the slums of Ville St. Laurent, in a place where there was no culture, art and so forth.

The moving in itself must not trouble that person very much because she and her husband have moved many times. Besides, the majority of those now working for the national film board have moved to Ottawa from places as far away as British Columbia. Furthermore, is it not part of the job of a producer of films to travel from place to place?

All that discussion is nonsense. The only reason for the moving of the national film board from Ottawa to Montreal is that Montreal is the best location in which that national institution can work in the best interests of the Canadian people and of Canada.

As to Ville St. Laurent, it does not take a back seat to any other city. The town of St. Laurent is very progressive and is now enjoying the most prosperous year in its existence. The town is divided into three distinct sections, industrial, commercial and residential, each completely independent of the others. This is an important factor which contributes to the satisfaction of all. The health-giving air, the easy means of transportation, such as buses, street cars and trains, the different schools, primary and secondary, and the low taxes all help the town of St. Laurent to expand continuously.

The Canadian National Railways line goes through the town, as do also two highways known as the Laurentian, and the Ottawa and Toronto, all of which run very close to the Montreal business centre, which is about three miles from Dorval airport.

The town of St. Laurent is also an up-to-date centre for recreation, and the new air-conditioned theatre, the auditorium with its capacity of 1,000 seats, the artificial ice arena, and its many public parks, all add to the enjoyment of the people residing there.

St. Laurent has a population of 30,000. About 75 per cent of the people are English-speaking, and 90 per cent of the French-speaking people are bilingual. St. Laurent has beautiful residential districts with beautiful homes, and thanks to a good administration and to the efforts of this government through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation there are no slums in St. Laurent. It has modern schools and churches of all denominations. The understanding which exists between Canadians of all religions in St. Laurent is the best possible example of Canadian unity. There are many nice social clubs, and there is friendliness among the people. It is a really nice city.

In that environment the film board will do a good job and I shall be glad to welcome all those who will be moving there. I am sure they will not only enjoy the surroundings but also the spirit of St. Laurent because of the fact that we do not have a mayor like Charlotte Whitton. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate the minister and the government most heartily on undertaking this move.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question.

Mr. Holowach: Mr. Chairman, we have all followed with a great deal of interest the present and past debate on this important matter. I believe it would have been helpful if we had received from the minister his interpretation of the purpose, policy and production objectives of the national film board, as well as his views on the desirable features of the proposed location of the administrative offices of the film board.

I believe most of us are basically in agreement that the national film board should be maintained, encouraged and assisted financially to achieve greater and improved production. But it does seem strange that so much significance has been attached to the location of the film board, and with other hon. members I fail to realize what remarkable features can be attached to the proposed location. The location of the administration body of the national film board is relatively incidental, because most films made by the board are made on location in various parts of Canada, and when interior shooting is required that is usually done in rented studios.

Personally I am very interested in the activities of the national film board, as I am in its big brother, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I believe that this agency, supervised by the government, is perhaps the most important one for the reason that it carries with it an extraordinary means of influencing men's minds and, together with radio, constitutes perhaps the most effective medium of mass communications.

To substantiate that statement there appears a very interesting index on page 16 of the annual report of the national film board for 1951-52. That index contains the non-theatrical distribution figures for 1951-52 as regards domestic showings, and gives the total audience which saw the productions of the national film board. It is pointed out that during 1951-52 there were 151,196 shows seen by a total audience of 11,610,232. A little further on in the same page we have the information that national film board productions are distributed abroad theatrically, non-theatrically, through television, and through the sale of prints.

On page 17 we have a further tabulation of the distribution of national film board films abroad which indicates that there were 123,485 showings with an audience of 11,111,976 persons. In other words, if the last figures are used and added to the domestic audience during the year 1951-52 over 22 million persons received the message of the national film board.

Technically speaking, I believe that the national film board was initiated for the purpose of manufacturing and distributing informative and educational pictures, but I believe that there were other noble purposes in the minds of those people who initiated the founding of the national film board. I believe that the national film board was designed not only to help to unify the two ethnic groups that have been repeatedly mentioned in the house but all the ethnic segments of our Canadian people into one family, with each segment proud of the others. I believe it was founded to help Canadians of all racial origins adjust themselves to our society with the ultimate aim of making each of them believe that we value their contribution and that they as individuals are important in our democratic way of life.

I think that the national film board was also originated to quicken the appreciation of the Canadian people of the fine things of life, of the arts, music, drama, literature, in order to bring those things in greater abundance to our people. Surely these things are desirable when we consider the rapid pace of our everyday life where we seem to find so much accent on material things and sadly neglect our own cultural development. Fundamentally, certainly, it must have been the intent and purpose of those who initiated the national film board to use it to awaken the Canadian people to the great possibilities that exist to create a truly dynamic and individualistic Canadian culture. I do not think there is another place on this earth that has the ingredients to do so that exist in Canada.

Where else is there the deposit of human materials which exist here, the various racial and ethnic groups with their rich heritage of music, songs and customs, their various characteristics and emotional features which are indispensable if we are to have creative work? Where else is there the natural beauty, and the landscapes which are also essential if we are to have inspiration and background material for significant works? But more important than this, Canada is one land that has freedom which is an indispensable ingredient if we are to achieve a new insight in the field of aesthetics and of culture, a word which is often used rather glibly and without caution. I know of no great work that was ever created unless it was a product of a free mind.

We Social Crediters are very interested in these things I have mentioned and in the activities of the national film board. We are more than just a monetary reform movement. We attach a great deal of significance to the film board because the ultimate aim of our philosophy of life and government is to create those very conditions which are conducive to gracious living, when men and women shall have the leisure to enjoy and partake of cultural pursuits and other worth-while human accomplishments.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member will recall that I was forced to interrupt the hon. member for Dauphin when he wandered a little from the item under discussion. I hope the hon. member who has the floor will devote himself to the item under discussion.

Mr. Knowles: He is no farther away than the hon. member for Dollard was.

Mr. Holowach: I certainly appreciate your adjudication, Mr. Chairman, but may I point out that it is very difficult to talk about such a matter without also involving its implications. It is hardly fair for me to talk of the Stradivarius, for example, unless I am also allowed to say something about its tonal qualities. Therefore the question arises whether the move that is contemplated will bring about the objectives which we all consider as very desirable and possible. But in considering these things, I think we should remember that it was never the intent or purpose of those who initiated the national film board that it should ever become a political plum or a football. If that is to happen, I think irreparable damage will be done.

I mention these things because I have received many letters and questions with respect to whether this move by the government is intended to erase the indifference which our government seems to show toward all things "cultural" in our land. Is it a move that will correct that situation? I think these things should be considered because we are not dealing merely with pennies but with $5¼ million of the taxpayers' money. I think we should remember this when we are considering this appropriation. We should also remember that as one travels from one end of the country to the other one finds a deplorable lack of auditoriums and recital halls. Those that do exist, with few exceptions, are of the stock pavilion variety where one is often obliged to listen to a beautiful piece of music, Beethoven, let us say, and is constantly reminded that just a few days before it was the scene of the exhibiting of a prize bull.

I think we should also remember when we are considering spending $20,000 per acre for a new site for the board that there are hundreds of amateur drama groups throughout the country—I say "amateur drama groups" because the professionals cannot afford to remain here—and symphony orchestras, which were mentioned a few moments ago, that perform significant works of art. Yet I do not know of one of them that is not financially embarrassed and few can afford to acquire new scores or materials.

At this time we should also remember that while we consider it manly to visit art exhibits and fashionable to listen to opera, this wealthy country cannot point with pride to one national theatre or opera. At this time, we should also remember the very sensible and valuable recommendations made by the royal commission on the development of the arts in this country. Its recommendations have not been heeded. In considering this terrific amount of money that we are contemplating spending on the construction of a film board, I think we should also remember that hundreds of our young people are in exodus from this land to other places in order to find fame and recognition and, more important, appreciation of their talents. These young people are leaving our country to enrich the culture of other places because we show so much indifference to them. Therefore I ask in good faith whether it might not be advisable for the government to use this money to implement the production of the national film board or for scholarships and those things which are very necessary if we are to have worth-while cultural activity.

It seems to me that from the very beginning there has been a smokescreen about this whole issue. It would appear from private conversation with the various members that the government is intent on moving the national film board. I was just wondering, sir, whether it would not be advisable for the government, if they have decided on moving the national film board, to move it to a place which would be, for all time, an appropriate centre. I am quite objective about this. I do not refer to my own constituency, as other members have done in the past.

I believe that the government would be doing a good stroke of business if they moved the national film board to a site which is associated with visual beauty, and is symbolic of Canada. I refer to Jasper national park or Banff national park. When the giants of the cinema industry decide to make a colourful picture or when Hollywood intends to make a top-notch picture, those are the places to which they go and not to some city. At this time I also believe we should consider the point of view of the various responsible bodies in our community, which are not interested in political motives but the best interests of the country.

In this respect I have in my hand a letter from the Edmonton chamber of commerce, which is affiliated with the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. I understand that this letter has been forwarded to the other members, in common with whom I have the honour of representing the city of Edmonton. I quote:

> . . . the Edmonton chamber of commerce deplores the action of the federal government in extending the activities of the national film board in competition with private enterprise; and, further, that it is opposed to this large expenditure of public moneys, creating more jobs for civil servants which could be absorbed in private industry; and, further, that this opinion be conveyed to the Ottawa board of trade, the three Edmonton members of parliament and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

I have received other communications which point out that, at a time when the people of Canada are requested to continue carrying the heavy burden of taxation, and at a time when the veterans, the disabled and the aged citizens of this land have little hope of having their allowances increased, this government move is neither prudent nor an example of frugality. The national film board, as the name implies, is a national body that was designed to serve the best interests of all the people of Canada. Since we have to believe the move is made from political considerations, I think every member in this house would be wise to vote against this particular expenditure.

Mr. Macdonnell: I shall not detain the house for more than a moment or two, but there is one point I want to make in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Dollard. We had a somewhat unusual and I thought unnecessary experience in listening to those remarks. It seemed to me he went out of his way to drag into his speech and to criticize the mayor of Ottawa, whose name we all know and whose activities we all know. I feel that as a friend of hers, and a graduate of the same university, I should make some comment upon that.

I doubt very much if the member would have ventured to make those comments if Miss Whitton had a seat in this house. In any event, I know I would not, and I doubt if any other member in this house would have the courage either. I say, therefore, that I regret very much that it was done. It seemed to me in very doubtful taste and judgment. I should like to say that I feel we should all remember that in whatever the lady did or said, it was pursuant to her duties as mayor of this city. I think, as such, they might have been kept out of this committee.

Mr. Dupuis: May I ask the hon. member a question? Did the mayor of Ottawa keep out of this debate by attacking the member for Dollard?

Amendment (Mr. Thatcher) negatived: Yeas, 33; nays, 80.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps it would only be fair to remind the committee that item 368 which is now before the committee contains the whole of the expenditure for this branch in the province of Quebec. Shall item 368 carry?

Item agreed to.

360. Departmental administration, $820,821,732.

Mr. Green: Is the minister making a statement? This is his first session as Minister of Public Works, and I think it would be very helpful if he would make a statement on his department.

Mr. Winters: No, Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to make a statement. I think we can convey all the information hon. members require in the course of answering their questions.

Mr. Shaw: The first thing I had intended doing, Mr. Chairman, was to ask the minister if he was prepared to make a statement concerning policy and administrative changes in the Department of Public Works since he assumed the position of Minister of Public Works. From time to time during the past several months we have learned from the newspapers of certain rather important changes in the field of policy and also in the field of administration. I was hoping that the minister would at this time confirm, and probably elaborate upon, those reports. Such a statement would have assisted, I am sure, in giving us a clear and probably concise picture of the proposed method of operation of his department during the years ahead. Now, there has been one very important change in policy, apparently. It is about that change in policy that I desire to make a few comments tonight.

However, I am going to have to ask a question first; and if the minister's answer to that question is satisfactory, then, so far as I am concerned, it may not be necessary for me to say all I had intended to say. My question is this: Do the proposed changes in policy which have taken place within the minister's department involve the abandonment of certain projects which have already been approved by the parliament of Canada?

Possibly before asking the minister if he would care to answer that question, I might be permitted to elaborate. I recall that last year the estimates of the Department of Public Works contained provisions for certain projects. Perhaps I should be even more explicit and say that such proposals were contained in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1954. Today we find no mention of a number of those projects.

An hon. Member: Politics.

Mr. Shaw: I would like to keep politics out of it—and I am saying that in answer to an interjection. I realize that, according to a press report, one change of policy the minister has brought into being, or intends to introduce, is that of asking for a lump-sum appropriation to be used for the purpose of acquiring sites and preparing plans and blueprints for certain projects.

Upon examination of the estimates of his department I find what I believe may be a figure designed for that purpose. However, I cannot be sure of this; and I am not prepared to wait until we get to that point, because if I do I may be ruled out of order and have no opportunity whatsoever to go into further detail with respect to matters of vital concern to so many people in Canada.

My question is this: Does the change in policy in the Department of Public Works involve the complete abandonment of certain projects for which provision was made in the main estimates last year, or in the supplementary estimates? Does it involve the complete abandonment of those projects?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, obviously the hon. member refers to the policy, to which reference has been made, of carrying in the estimates for a particular fiscal year amounts to cover the volume of work that it is expected can be carried out with respect to various projects in that fiscal year.

I do not think there is any great departure in that respect from the policy followed in the past. But, in reviewing the estimates, I did find that there were a great many votes that had been carried from year to year as revotes, without sites being acquired, or planning going forward, or any work being done. I thought it would make for more orderly presentation of the estimates and allow for a better scheduling of work if we included in the estimates and asked parliament to vote funds only for those projects the department thought it could implement during the coming year, and to the extent that the work could be carried out. In order to enable the department to acquire sites, particularly in the smaller communities, and to advance planning, we are now carrying an item of $500,000 for the oncoming fiscal year, in vote 401.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, I think I shall have to be more explicit in what I have to say. In an examination of the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1954, I find in connection with the province of Alberta that five projects are listed. These projects were approved by parliament on May 9, to be exact. Then, upon examination of the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955, I find no reference whatsoever to those five projects.

I am concerned as a matter of principle and, secondly, I am vitally concerned in another sense, because one of those projects was for my own home town. At page 26 of the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1954, we find this:

Acquisition of sites and preparation of plans for public buildings at Claresholm, Coleman—

I understand those two are in the constituency of the hon. member for Macleod.

—Innisfail—

Which is in my own constituency, and happens to be my own home town.

—Lac la Biche—

Which is in the constituency of Athabaska, represented by a Liberal member.

—and Vermilion.

Which is located in the constituency of Battle River-Camrose.

I should like to stress this fact, and I am speaking specifically of my home town, that the town council and board of trade, realizing the situation prevailing in that town with respect to postal facilities—this is no reflection upon the staff, for we have an excellent staff there, and I want to pay tribute to them—in view of the lack of facilities in the nature of a building, believe it their duty on behalf of the people in that community to take appropriate steps in pressing for favourable consideration for a new public building in that town.

I had the privilege of working with the board of trade and the town council and of accompanying their delegation to Calgary to confer with the postal authorities in the district office. I believe it is safe for me to conclude that post office officials at Calgary felt that a new building for that community was essential, if the patrons of that office were to enjoy the high type of service to which they are entitled.

Representations were made to the Post Office Department in Ottawa by officials of the Calgary office. Obviously the Post Office Department in Ottawa came to the conclusion that if adequate postal facilities are to be made available to our people, consideration would have to be given to suitable quarters in that town. In fact, I am informed by the Post Office Department here that the project was put in "A" category. I am also convinced—and this is just normal procedure as between departments—that the Post Office Department must have been able to convince the Department of Public Works that the building was necessary for that community.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would not wish to interrupt the hon. member if he could finish his remarks in perhaps thirty or sixty seconds. I am sure that would be agreeable to hon. members. Otherwise I would have to call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, it would be physically impossible to finish in sixty seconds what I am going to say.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Tomorrow?

Mr. Harris: My hon. friend does not need to prompt me to do what I consider to be my duty this evening. Tomorrow we shall continue with this and, when it is concluded, take agriculture.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following item was passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

368. Quebec, $10,890,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 12, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): I should like to move:

That the second report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented on Wednesday, March 10, 1954, be now concurred in.

Notice of this motion was given in Votes and Proceedings last Wednesday.

Motion agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITIES

PROVISION FOR EXTENSION TO COMMONWEALTH REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 373, to extend diplomatic immunities.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Roch Pinard (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): The purpose of this bill is to extend to diplomatic representatives of commonwealth countries the traditional immunities already enjoyed by representatives of foreign states.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE FUND

ESTABLISHMENT OF ACCOUNT FOR REPLACEMENT OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish in the consolidated revenue fund an account for the replacement of government property lost, destroyed or damaged through fire and for the said purposes to authorize advances from the account, with the approval of the treasury board, up to a maximum of five million dollars.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

WATER POLLUTION

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware that Canadian Chemical Company of Edmonton has again polluted the North Saskatchewan river, and will the government now consider bringing down legislation which will protect for all time the health and welfare of Canadians against the pollution of interprovincial rivers?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his question, Mr. Speaker. No, I am not aware of the facts as alleged. I might state to the hon. gentleman that his statement is incorrect. Undoubtedly what my hon. friend is referring to is the fact that wastes which were diverted to a burning pit contained a gummy substance which blocked up the pipe line and caused a temporary resumption of the discharge of these particular substances into the river. This state of affairs was discovered and was corrected by the government of Alberta within a very short time.

ST. JOHNS ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE

QUESTION AS TO STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question of which I have given him notice. The minister—

Mr. Dupuis: Read in Le Devoir of this morning.

Mr. Dufresne: Would the Minister of National Defence give me the date of appointment of the five following professors at St. Johns Military College: Messrs. Stallard, Tilley, Thumm, Mendel and Smith?

Mr. Speaker: I do not believe that this question is so urgent that it should be put at this stage of the proceedings. The hon. member could have his question placed on the order paper and the minister would reply to it.

In my opinion the question should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Dufresne: Here is what I was coming to, Mr. Speaker. You undoubtedly recall—

Mr. Dupuis: Ah!

Mr. Dufresne: I beg the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) to be more charitable—

Mr. Speaker: Order! I am listening to the hon. member's explanation.

Mr. Dufresne: You will certainly recall that last December I again drew the attention of the Minister of National Defence to the fact that St. Johns Military College seemed to be losing its bilingual character. I simply want to ask whether or not the five persons concerned are bilingual professors.

Mr. Speaker: I must say to the hon. member that if that was the question he intended to ask, he had only to ask it.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with your permission and that of the house, I must say to the hon. member for Quebec West that there is no truth in his general statement.

(Text):

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

EXTENSION OF BASE AT STEVENSON FIELD—SALE OF HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Will the government consider selling to the public the thirty houses on Whytewold road in St. James, Manitoba, which were bought to make room for the extension of the air force base at Stevenson field at Winnipeg? Will something be done about this matter before these houses suffer further deterioration?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I shall be glad to look into the question and answer later.

MUNICIPAL FINANCE

REQUESTS FOR FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL-MUNICIPAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance. Has the government received requests from the Saskatchewan government for a federal-provincial-municipal conference on problems of municipal finance? If so, when is it proposed to call such a conference?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): So far as I know requests of that nature have not been received. However, I shall make inquiries, and if I am wrong I shall make a statement later.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT CONCERNING CONTINUATION OF MEASURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. With the approach of the Easter recess, is he in a position to say whether or not it is the intention of the government to allow the Emergency Powers Act to lapse, or will legislation be introduced to continue it?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no decision on that point has been taken as yet. It will depend upon events between now and the end of the session.

ESKIMOS

REGISTERED TRAP LINES—RIGHTS OF CANADIAN ESKIMOS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie) asked me the following question:

> Is it true that Alaskan Eskimos living in the Mackenzie river delta hold registered trap lines, while there are a number of Canadian Eskimos who are without trap lines. If so, is the minister's department giving consideration to the prior right of Canadian Eskimos in this regard?

In answer I would say that the provisions with regard to the registration of trap lines are established by the council of the Northwest Territories and are set forth in the game ordinance, which became effective on June 30, 1949. They are not determined by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. The ordinance does not provide for any priority as between Alaskan Eskimos resident in Canada and Canadian Eskimos. However, under its provisions no Alaskan Eskimo who has entered Canada since June 30, 1949, or who may in future enter, can obtain a certificate of registration for a trapping area. No change in the position is contemplated at the present time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO RE-EMPLOYMENT OF TEXTILE WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Is he in a position to answer the question I asked a week ago?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I was not hoping that my hon. friend would forget the question, but it was perhaps that I was not prepared to give an answer in exactly the way he might expect it.

However, in answer to the question he raised, I would say that the principal activity of the government in assisting workers in the areas referred to by the hon. member to secure alternative employment is the work of the national employment service, which comes under my jurisdiction.

When any worker applies to his nearest employment service office for employment, a full record is taken of his work experience, and this information is available in matching men with jobs not only in the immediate locality, but in Canada as a whole. This means that when employment opportunities develop in other industries and those applying for work have suitable qualifications, the applicants are referred to them. This applies to alternative employment opportunities which develop in their own immediate areas or to those which become available in other areas, if suitable workers are not available locally.

The hon. member will understand that there are many factors involved in the development of alternative employment opportunities in textile centres. I am sure the hon. member and I know some of those difficulties at quite close range. Aside from the work of the national employment service and other activities of the federal government, the government of Ontario has announced its intention to explore the possibilities of attracting new industries to centres in this part of the province. And I might tell my hon. friend that my department has expressed its desire to work in the closest possible co-operation with that project.

DUMPING

POTATOES—ALLEGED SHIPMENTS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Has he received word regarding the dumping of potatoes into British Columbia, as he said he would in reply to my question of March 10.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I cannot report at this time that we have received the information we have requested from our officials in western Canada with respect to this matter. I expect however that we will have that information on Monday.

ARMED FORCES

CANADIAN ACTIVE ARMY REGIMENTS—QUESTION OF SENIORITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he has for the record in Hansard an answer to my question of yesterday, to which he said he would send me an answer by letter.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Churchill: A supplementary question—

[Later:]

Mr. Churchill: I have a question, supplementary to the one I asked yesterday, to put to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister amplify his reply to me in order that the record in Hansard will make sense, or will the minister answer this question in a monosyllable? Are the regiments of the Canadian army active forces, as shown on page 2844 of Hansard, listed in order of precedence?

Mr. Claxton: I have already answered, but I shall be very happy to do so again. The answer is again yes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SOUND AMPLIFICATION SYSTEM—AUDIBILITY OF DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question but not of any member of the cabinet in particular, and I am not sure that it can be asked as a question of privilege. Therefore I shall address my question to you, sir. May I say that within the last week it has been most difficult to hear questions and answers in the house. I would ask that this sound amplification system be examined to see whether something can be done to improve it.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might offer some comment on the request of the hon. member. It would seem that in order to test the system experts of the corporation in charge of the operation of the system would have to sit in the house while the house is sitting. This involves a matter of privilege. Would hon. members be prepared to assent to having one—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: —who is not a member of the house—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: —sit in one of the chairs provided for members on the floor of the house, in order to test the system as it now operates, from various corners of the chamber? That has been the question that was before us. And I wish to inform the house that I told officials of the company that in my view it was not possible, and that we would have to arrange for other means. Perhaps, when the house is not in session, some morning we could have some members come to the house and co-operate to the extent of reading documents in order to permit these gentlemen to make tests.

However, we are looking into the matter, and I am glad to have had the general sense of the house as to the view I have just expressed—that we do not want to transgress upon the age-old privileges whereby only members of the House of Commons can sit at their desks when the house is in session.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): May I suggest to the corporation, when they are consulted, that these loudspeakers would be much better if they were at the back of the listener than in his face, as they are now.

Mr. Speaker: That has also been suggested. I believe the Minister of Public Works and his officials are looking into the matter.

Mr. McIvor: On a question of privilege, there is one thing we do not want, and that is to go back to the old system.

COMMUNICATIONS

SALE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH SYSTEM—PROVISION FOR EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, while we are on the subject of microphones, perhaps I might deal with a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) having to do with the proposed purchase by two private companies of the government telephone and telegraph facilities in the province of British Columbia.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The target date for the transfer of the British Columbia Telephone Company to the Canadian National Telegraph Company is April 1, 1954. Unless there is some difficulty over which we have no control, I hope it will be possible to conclude the agreement by that date.

On the matter of transfer, there has been thus far satisfactory progress, and the maximum effort is being made by both these companies, the British Columbia Telephone Company and the Canadian National Telegraph Company, to work out means of absorbing the personnel employed at the present time. I am not in a position now to make a complete statement, but I shall make a full statement when the matter of the transfer is ready.

On the question of the survey that my hon. friend referred to, if he had in mind the appraisal which was made jointly by the British Columbia Telephone Company and the Canadian National Telegraph Company and the officers of the government, then I have no objection to his seeing it. I may say to him, however, that it is a voluminous and highly technical document. If he insists on seeing it, I shall instruct one of the officers of the department to place the document at his disposal.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask a supplementary question? I was informed by the government employees that their contributions to the unemployment insurance fund were discontinued as from January 1 of this year. Is that correct?

Mr. Chevrier: I would not be able to comment on that; I will have to inquire from the officers, and in so far as unemployment insurance is concerned I do not know what the position is; but it would apply only in the case of those employees who are not being absorbed, and so far as the information in my possession is concerned it is my understanding that all those who meet their employment requirements will be taken on by either company. I say that, but it is of course subject to correction when the agreement has been concluded.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask another supplementary question? What struck me as strange was that whether or not they were to be absorbed by the two companies taking over the business, they should be deprived of the protection of unemployment insurance before their employment with the government was terminated.

Mr. Winch: In view of the minister's answer may I ask a supplementary question? Can the minister inform us when the present employees of these two services will be taken into the confidence of the government and the companies as to what provision is being made? They do not know now.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I will have to answer that even the minister does not know now because the matter is under negotiation, and until the negotiations are completed it is not possible for me to make any statement, let alone inform the employees.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

360. Departmental administration, $821,732.

The Chairman: Hon. members will find the item on page 51 and the details on page 430.

Mr. Shaw: Just prior to the adjournment of the house last night I was commenting upon certain administrative and policy changes in the Department of Public Works which would at this stage seem to suggest that five public works projects for Alberta which were approved by parliament on May 9, 1953, have now been abandoned. These projects were at Claresholm, Coleman, Innisfail, Lac la Biche and Vermilion. Being a confirmed optimist, and having complete faith in people, I had expressed the hope that under vote No. 401, which provides an appropriation of half a million dollars for advanced planning of projects including acquisition of sites, the aforementioned projects would be proceeded with. Either that, sir, or that provision has already been made to include those five projects in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955. Whether or not I am to continue to be a confirmed optimist will depend entirely upon the information which the minister is able to give to me.

Last night I indicated that one of those proposed projects was in my constituency, in fact in my home town of Innisfail. Last night I indicated the various steps and procedures which had been followed in an effort to secure an appropriation for that public building in the town of Innisfail. I indicated that first the town council and the board of trade took an active part. It was my privilege to accompany them to Calgary to confer with the post office officials in the district office at that point. I have reason to believe, as indicated yesterday, that Calgary must have reported favourably upon this project, because the next information which I received was that the Post Office Department had placed the project in "A" category and were extremely hopeful that it would be proceeded with.

The Post Office Department obviously convinced public works that this was a desirable and necessary project, and in convincing public works they must have been able to convince the then minister of public works because, as indicated before, these five projects, more specifically the one that I am primarily interested in, were included in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1954.

May I just make brief reference to that appropriation because it may be misleading to some hon. members. On page 26 of the supplementary estimates which were tabled in this house one year ago, under "Alberta" reference is made to "Vegreville public building, additions and alterations, $50,000". Then it says:

> Acquisition of sites and preparation of plans for public buildings at Claresholm, Coleman, Innisfail, Lac la Biche and Vermilion, $80,000.

Then the total of $130,000 is given. Then it says:

> Less estimated amount by which actual expenditure on all projects listed in these supplementary estimates and the main estimates will fall short of the total of amounts that may be required for each, $129,999.

Then there is a line under that and then the figure "$1". Really what this house voted was $1. If we were to leave it at that point the answer to my problem would be completely obvious. However, I must take the committee back to last May 9, at page 5053 of Hansard. On that date the hon. member for Macleod was discussing this matter. He and I had previously discussed this appropriation because, as I indicated before, two of these projects were to be located in his constituency. The hon. member for Macleod is reported as having said:

> When does the minister expect that the work of acquiring sites and the preparation of plans for these buildings will be started? In asking that question there is one other point I should like to raise. In reality this is a vote of $1, but the items in the details show an expenditure of $50,000 for the building at Vegreville and the acquisition of sites and preparation of plans for several other buildings to the amount of $80,000, making $130,000 in all. Then there is a footnote indicating that this amount is less the estimated amount by which actual expenditure on all projects listed falls short of the total of amounts that may be required for such.
> Therefore my understanding is that all we are voting is $1 and that in voting the $1 we are also voting approval of the projects listed to the amount of $130,000. It is also my understanding that the projects will be proceeded with if there is money to spare from other projects or if other projects do not cost the amount of money we have voted for them. Is that correct?

Then the hon. member for Macleod went on to say that he hoped the inclusion of these items in the estimates was not merely dangling carrots before the people. Then the minister of public works went on to say this:

I can put the hon. member right. First of all, the explanation of the $1 item is that it is to authorize the department to draw on the main estimates for the province of Alberta in the construction of buildings or acquisition of sites. We expect that the main vote will be sufficient to cover some of these projects, if not all of them.

Then further down the hon. member for Macleod in referring to the minister had this to say:

He explained to me on one occasion that he has a whole list of projects and that they go from the top to the bottom. There is a certain formula that they follow and I take it that the time has now come when these projects will be carried out. I do trust that the work of at least acquiring sites and making plans and preparations will go forward this year. Does the minister think they will go forward this year?

The minister of public works replied as follows:

I just wanted to say to the hon. gentleman that it is not the minister who approves of these; it is parliament as a whole which is asked whether we shall go ahead with these projects. Now, parliament has great confidence in the Minister of Public Works and if they give him that authority I will see that my officials, although not perfect, will proceed as hastily as possible with the different projects.

I realize that that was a former minister of public works who was speaking but let me emphasize that what he said was that parliament had approved of these projects when it voted that particular vote in the estimates. Parliament did that, Mr. Chairman. When the minister of public works said that parliament had great confidence in the minister of public works, he was referring to himself maybe, or maybe he was referring to the office. I would say that we have great confidence in the present Minister of Public Works and we trust that he will adopt exactly the same attitude as his predecessor adopted with respect to this matter.

Let me remind the committee again that no matter what has transpired in the interval, parliament did approve of these five projects. I trust that the minister has not considered this whole matter so lightly that he found it easy to relegate the decision of parliament to the garbage heap. I am not suggesting that that has been done; I certainly hope that it has not been done.

It could be argued that perhaps the board of trade of the town of Innisfail, that perhaps the town council, that perhaps the member of parliament who lives in that town could have erred in assuming that we required a new public building. Perhaps the district post office officials in Calgary erred; perhaps the Post Office Department here in Ottawa erred; perhaps the minister of public works erred; perhaps parliament erred. But if that is true what a formidable array of errors there were.

I am going to suggest to you that none of them erred. If an error was committed I am afraid we would have to charge the present Minister of Public Works with having committed it, because we would have to conclude that if these projects have been deleted he looks upon the decisions of all those groups that have been mentioned as being wrong, as being unjustified, as being unwarranted, et cetera, et cetera.

Maybe the Minister of Public Works would be interested in something. I had occasion to go back to my home town just about a year ago today. When I arrived there I heard a song being chanted by some people. I never could make out the exact words, but it seemed to go like this:

Shaw, no public building;
No Shaw, a public building.

That little ditty was being chanted by some of my friends who have never wished me evil except that they would like to see me defeated as a candidate. Otherwise they would not want to harm me at all. Nevertheless that is the ditty that was being chanted. Let me tell the minister and the government that I found myself in one of the most peculiar positions that a member of parliament could find himself in just a year ago. Those people who were chanting that ditty—

An hon. Member: Swan song.

Mr. Shaw: —were trying to convince certain people, in fact what they were saying was that as long as Shaw was their member of parliament they would never get a public building in Innisfail. Do you know what I told the people. I said that in the 13 years I had been a member of parliament I had never had cause to believe that the government at Ottawa had discriminated against me or against my constituency because I happened to be a member of the opposition. I said that because I thought it was true.

At that time we had Liberals, by inference at least, actually charging their own government with discrimination while I, facing a Liberal as my most formidable opponent, was defending the government and defying them to produce one iota of evidence to prove their charge. After all, Red Deer constituency has had an opposition member for 32 years. I am not unmindful of the fact that when they needed a public building at Red Deer, $500,000 was spent. I was then, as now, the member.

What is my position today after having defended the Liberals, after having asserted that I was convinced that the Liberals believed in democracy, in the democratic right of people to choose whomsoever they desired to represent them? What am I to say after having stated to these people that the charge of the local Liberals was absolutely false, that the preparations had been made, that the minister had given absolute assurance that the project would be proceeded with and that parliament had passed it. There was not a dissenting voice in this House of Commons. Now I will be going back for the Easter holidays and I trust that the minister will have this in the supplementary estimates before I go home, because then I will not have to say, "I thought I knew them, but I do not."

This is not a matter that I want to drag around in the political sense at all. The members of the board of trade, the members of the town council, do not look upon themselves as being Liberals, Conservatives, Social Crediters or anything else, when dealing with community problems. They are interested in their community, they built up a case for a building and that case was carried through to this parliament. It was approved by this parliament and I am asking the minister to honour what parliament committed itself to. Otherwise perhaps he can indicate to me an item hidden somewhere in the supplementary estimates covering an appropriation to carry out that commitment by parliament. It is not just a question of a post office, it is a question of adequate quarters sorely needed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and adequate quarters for the V.L.A. in that community.

I shall not take up any more time of the committee, Mr. Chairman. I shall wait for explanations before I come to any final decision so far as my next action is concerned, but I would urge the minister to give me some indication—

Mr. Byrne: The same old song.

Mr. Shaw: Let me say to the hon. member that no matter what the song might have to be it will not worry me personally. In fact it may enable me to go back later and say, "Well, I guess you were right. I could not properly assess Liberals even after 13 years."

Certainly this is more than a joking matter; it is a very serious matter of principle. I have great confidence in the Minister of Public Works. I feel we can rely on him to honour commitments made by his predecessor in this respect and carry out the unanimous decision of this parliament as far as that project is concerned.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this is the administration item of the Department of Public Works and as hon. members know it has been customary to deal with the broad problems of the department upon this administration item. That is what I propose to do on behalf of the official opposition. There are several points to which I wish to refer and I would like the minister to take each of them into consideration when he makes his general reply. I hope he will deal with all of these questions I am about to raise.

The first one has to do with the annual report of the department. I do not know whether it is a coincidence, Mr. Chairman, but you will have noticed that earlier in the proceedings today the minister's parliamentary assistant tabled a loose-leaf typed copy of the annual report of the Department of Public Works for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1953. For all practical purposes we are asked to consider the estimates of his department on the basis of a report for the year ended March 31, 1952, almost two years ago. That, of course, is a most inefficient way for the department to do business. It is contrary to the laws of the land and I can only express the hope that this will not happen again.

The statute which governs his department is known as the Public Works Act. Chapter 228 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, section 34, reads as follows under the heading, "Report":

> The minister shall make and submit to the Governor General an annual report on all the works under his control, which shall be laid before both houses of parliament, within twenty-one days after the commencement of the session, showing the state of each work and the amounts received and expended in respect thereof, with such further information as is requisite.

All too frequently ministers of the present government have ignored provisions for the tabling of reports which, in effect, means belittling parliament and handicapping hon. members of the house in their work.

Mr. Winters: Might I just say that that provision, while it is worded as the hon. member has correctly quoted, was put on the statute book at a time when it was contemplated that sessions of parliament would start after the new year rather than in the fall as at the present time.

Mr. Green: That may be so, but even if this session had started about the middle of January the report would have been due early in February. This practice of ignoring the provisions for tabling reports is unfair to parliament, unfair to hon. members and unfair to the Canadian people. I realize the minister is new in his department so it would not be right to place all the blame on his shoulders, but may I repeat in all kindness that I hope it will not happen again.

Mr. Winters: So do I.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a pious hope.

Mr. Green: The second point to which I wish to refer is that there is no indication whatever in the estimates of the Department of Public Works that it is adopting recommendations which have been put forward for many years to the effect that this department should no longer be by-passed by other departments in the construction of public works. The practice has grown up under this government whereby practically every other department of government constructs public works of various kinds. As I understand it, the intention right down from confederation has been that construction work done by the government should remain under the supervision of the Department of Public Works except under extraordinary conditions. The official opposition, and I believe hon. members of other opposition parties, have pointed out time and time again that this new practice is wrong and have urged that something be done about it. I hope that under the new minister a stop will be put to this practice.

I would like to refer the minister to the report of the Senate committee on finance which sat in 1952 under the chairmanship of my very good friend Hon. Thomas A. Crerar, who served in the House of Commons with great distinction for so many years. With regard to this practice of by-passing the Department of Public Works by other departments, I quote from page 342 of the proceedings of this committee which sat in 1952, two years ago. The proceedings are reported as follows:

> We draw attention to the items in the civilian estimates that have to do with the construction or acquisition of buildings and works, their repairs, and their upkeep, and rentals for buildings which different government departments require. The total amount under these three items found in the public works department estimates is slightly in excess of 80 million dollars.

I point out that that is for the fiscal year 1952-53. The report continues:

> The total for all departments of government under these items is in excess of 163 millions. Under the Public Works Act, the public works department of Canada has the responsibility of providing and maintaining all the public buildings and works required by the other civilian departments. It is true part II of the Public Works Act makes an exception to the effect that the governor in council "may at any time transfer the management, charge and direction of any public work, or any power, duty or function with respect to any class of works, whether public or private, which is assigned to or vested by statute in any minister or department, to any other minister or department." But surely this was only intended to meet special circumstances, and was never intended to be used in the broad sense in which it is used today.

Senator Crerar's report continues:

> From the figures just quoted, it would appear that other departments of government combined are directly spending more for these purposes than the public works department which is primarily charged with this responsibility. For example, the Post Office Department, which requires public buildings all over Canada, either through building or rental for post office purposes, and requires to have them repaired and maintained, has all this work done by the public works department, as was intended under the act.

That is one good mark at least for the Post Office Department which has been under such heavy fire during the present session. The report continues:

> The question naturally arises, why should this not be done for other civilian departments of government? When, for example, the Department of Agriculture, or national revenue, or national health and welfare—

Fortunately all three ministers are in the house at the moment.

> —directly provides for their own needs by building, or rental or both, they have to provide their own architects, their own engineers, and their own servicing establishment generally. It certainly appears that this can have no other effect than duplication and overlapping and the inevitable general increase in costs that is bound to result from this practice.

And the report concludes on this particular matter—

Mr. Martin: What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. Green: If the Minister of National Health and Welfare had not been gossiping, he would know what I am reading from.

Mr. Martin: I was gossiping about some extremely important things. The hon. member happened to mention my department, and I am asking him as a matter of courtesy what he is reading from. If he does not want to tell me that is all right.

Mr. Green: I am only too glad to do so. I am reading from a report of the Senate committee on finance which sat in 1952.

Mr. Martin: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: The minister may laugh it off but I think this report is fairly sensible. This report concludes as follows:

> There are exceptions in the case of departments which have services abroad. The office space and maintenance which they require abroad will be secured more economically by such a department directly. But practically all of these expenditures, to which attention is drawn, are within Canada and, with very few exceptions, as for example the maintenance of buildings and roads in national parks, we do feel that this part of the administration of our public business should be under public works.

That was two years ago. Let us look and see what attention the government has paid to that report. I have here the figures for the fiscal year 1953-54, which was the first year after the report. We also have, of course, the figures for the current fiscal year 1954-55. Both those sets of figures will be found in the "summary of standard objects of expenditure and special categories" which is in the little pocket at the back of the book of estimates we are considering.

For the year 1953-54 the Department of Public Works was voted approximately $81,700,000 for the building of public works. By the way, this item is known as "Construction or acquisition of buildings and works, including land". For the other civilian departments—that is excluding the defence departments—the amount was practically as much for buildings and works, $79,300,000, and for the defence department, including defence production, $286,400,000.

Mr. Winters: I wonder if my hon. friend would allow an interruption. I shall deal with this matter at greater length later but I would say that in many of these instances in which other departments carry the moneys in their estimates, the Department of Public Works actually carries out the project.

Mr. Green: I had that view too, Mr. Chairman, but in this latest departmental report which covered the period ending nearly two years ago, we find that the amount of money spent by the public works department for works and buildings but voted for other departments was only $10,500,000. It is a long way from that figure to the figure of $80 million.

Then in the current year, this present year, if hon. members will refer to their estimates they will find that the Department of Public Works is being voted for works and buildings $79,200,000, approximately, and that other civilian departments are being voted for the very same objects $78,500,000. Again practically as much is being voted to the other departments as to the Department of Public Works. The defence departments are getting less than in the preceding year, namely $214 million.

Let us take a look at the departments that are the worst culprits in this regard for this year, the year 1954-55. Here they are. First there is the transport department, $33,700,000; and mind you there is some excuse for much of the amount spent by the Department of Transport for public works. Then the Department of Agriculture, the second worst offender, $10,700,000; national research council, $6,100,000; the fourth culprit, Department of Citizenship and Immigration, $5,100,000; national harbours board, $5 million; Department of Veterans Affairs, $4,900,000; Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, $3,700,000; Royal Canadian Mounted Police, $3,600,000; Department of External Affairs, $1,500,000; Department of National Health and Welfare, also $1,500,000.

Mr. Martin: Be careful what you say about us.

Mr. Green: Surely the minister would like to have a few suggestions for improving his department?

Mr. Martin: They are always welcome.

Mr. Green: Then there is penitentiaries, $1 million. Those are only the worst offenders. Practically every department in this estimates book is spending a great deal of money on works and buildings. I suggest that the time has come to stop this sort of business and for the Department of Public Works to do the building for this country. The result would be a reduction in the number of architects and professional men; in fact I am sure there would be a great saving to the country.

Now I should like to say a word about the works and buildings for defence. The defence departments get away with quite a lot. They can always say, "We are defending the country; leave us alone". They get away with that in the House of Commons as well as outside of it, and I think the time has come to have a look at what they are doing with regard to expenditures for works and buildings.

I find that, according to the public accounts—I cannot get the figures from the report of the Department of Public Works because we have not yet received that report—for the year 1952-53, shown at page 43, the Department of Public Works spent $81·8 million on works and buildings. Then going to the report of Defence Construction (1951) Limited, or rather to the report of the Minister of Defence Production, who is the minister responsible for that crown company, I find at page 2 that during the fiscal year 1952-53 payments made by Defence Construction (1951) Limited amounted to $220,120,000 for public works. In other words, they spent about three times as much as the Department of Public Works.

Before the war most of the construction for the Department of National Defence was done by the Department of Public Works. I know it was the Department of Public Works that put up the forts around Vancouver. I suggest that the time has come when the Department of Public Works should at least do a lot of this construction that is now being done under the Department of Defence Production. In any event this crown company, Defence Construction (1951) Limited, should report to the Minister of Public Works rather than to the Minister of Defence Production so that we would get as much responsibility as possible for works and buildings in Canada where it belongs, that is under the direction of the Department of Public Works.

The third point I wish to place before the minister is this. There appears to be no longer any pretence that his department or any agency of government has a shelf of employment projects. We have been led to believe down through the years that the department had, in a pigeonhole somewhere, a lot of plans for public works that were to be used to give employment. I believe that idea started with the dominion's proposals in August, 1945, known as "Proposals of the Government of Canada", and contained in the green book. On page 26 I find this:

To follow the program proposed, the dominion is making provision that:

(i) all basic survey and research work on which an expended resources program depends be gone ahead with as rapidly as possible;

I stress this second paragraph.

(ii) advanced planning of projects be carried out on a sufficiently large scale to have an adequate reserve at all times for the timing purposes of the dominion public investment program.

That was a fairly clear-cut statement of policy, and I think members of the opposition and the Canadian people were entitled to take from it that the department actually had or would set up a shelf of employment projects. Now, with the new minister, we find that is a will-o'-the-wisp. He made a speech in Montreal three days ago, and I am reading from the report appearing in the Gazette on March 10. The heading is, "Public Works aim not to relieve unemployment".

Montreal; works minister Winters last night rejected the idea that public works be used specifically to relieve unemployment.

A public project, to be of real value, should carry with it the prospect of contributing to the long-term growth and development of an area, he said in a speech to the Montreal amateur athletic association.

This dispatch goes on:

Public works themselves did not necessarily provide many jobs. An example was the $23 million Canso causeway linking Cape Breton island and the mainland of Nova Scotia. Less than 200 men were required to keep the project up to schedule.

The minister may be right or wrong in taking that stand, but I believe the Canadian people are entitled to know whether or not it is still the policy of this government to organize a shelf of employment projects or whether that plan has been dropped.

[Mr. Green.]

The fourth point has to do with the expenditures for the Department of Public Works contained in these estimates. Hon. members will notice that there has been an increase of about $6·5 million over the last fiscal year. In effect, there will be a far greater increase because the department has adopted this new policy of trying to put in the estimates only those projects which are to be constructed, and as I understand, it is only asking for enough money to pay for the portion of the projects that will be done during the fiscal year. In effect, therefore, there is a very large increase in the amount of money being spent by the department during this fiscal year. There are some items which I believe require an explanation from the minister.

Hon. members will note, on looking at this summary of standard objects of expenditure and special categories, the main increases under these items. First of all civil salaries and wages show an increase. I do not believe anyone can quarrel with that, because I presume the increase is largely due to the increases in salary which have been given to civil servants generally. I go on to refer to eight other items, and I should like the minister to explain why the increases are necessary in each one of these items.

First of all is professional and special services, which item is going up this year by approximately $100,000. Secondly, freight, express and cartage is going up $70,000. Office stationery, supplies and equipment and furnishings is going up $125,000. Materials and supplies is going up $250,000; repairs and upkeep of buildings is going up by $1,100,000. Rentals of land is going up by $340,000. I am giving the round figures. Repairs and upkeep of equipment is going up $125,000. Municipal or public utilities services is going up $300,000.

Now, these are all substantial increases, and I would ask for an explanation as to why it is necessary to come to parliament and ask for these additional amounts for these particular services.

My fifth point has been well illustrated by the hon. member for Red Deer. It is this. The estimates for the last fiscal year appear to have been padded and, I can only think, were padded for election purposes. I would refer hon. members, for example, to page 439 of the estimates book, where we find the estimates for the architectural branch of the Department of Public Works for Newfoundland. We find there that the estimate for 1953-54 for Newfoundland was $717,000. From that there was deducted the estimated amount by which the actual expenditure on all listed projects would fall short of the total amount that might be required for each, $67,000. This left $650,000 which the government said was going to be spent in Newfoundland in 1953-54. We find that what was actually spent was $61,000. Mind you, a portion of that amount for the period, from the end of December 1953 to March 31, is an estimate but the figure there for the estimated total expenditure for Newfoundland is $61,000. This is less than one-tenth of the vote after there had been deducted from that vote an amount which it was calculated might not be spent.

Now, to say the least, that looks suspicious. I may be wrong, but it certainly looks as though that estimate was padded. I do not know why it should have been padded unless it was for election purposes so that government candidates could hold out to the voters in these different constituencies the prospect that public works were to be built. They could say, "There is a vote for a building for so much, and will you please vote for the Liberal candidate.". The Nova Scotia vote will be found on page 440. The figures there are not as bad, with about 50 per cent of the amount estimated being spent. The figures for New Brunswick are bad too, and they will be found on page 441. The figures for Ontario are found on page 445, and there again they are bad, the amount spent being about half of the amount voted.

Next to Newfoundland, Alberta was the worst. Perhaps the government had to promise more there than it did in other parts of the country. The figure for Alberta is found at page 447. The vote was $2,680,000 and the amount deducted that they would not be able to spend was $379,999, leaving a balance of $2,300,001. They spent $460,000, or in other words about a fifth of what they voted. The figures for British Columbia, my home province, are much the same. The vote there, after making allowance for what could not be spent, was $4,050,000, and the amount actually spent was $2,056,000.

Those are the figures only for the architectural branch of the Department of Public Works. The same picture, although perhaps not quite so bad, is found in the engineering branch.

Then the sixth point I shall place before the minister—and he will be glad to hear that I have only nine—has to do with what are known as government contract regulations. These are regulations which were passed under the provisions of the Financial Administration Act. I would ask the minister to explain some of these provisions.

In the first place, when the full regulations were last passed—and this was on December 29, 1953—there was a provision with regard to construction contracts. The provision covered only works to which section 36 of the Public Works Act did not apply. Section 36 of the Public Works Act is the section which requires the calling of tenders. Apparently when these regulations were first drawn up they did not interfere with what was done under the Public Works Act. However, now we find that on February 25, 1954, an order in council was passed deleting from these regulations reference to the Public Works Act. This would appear to be a case of by-passing that act. So that now all construction contracts, including public works contracts, can be let under these government contract regulations instead of under the Public Works Act.

I may be wrong in this, but I suggest it calls for an explanation by the minister. In connection with these government contract regulations we find that "tender" is defined in a peculiar way. Section 1 (i) of the regulations is as follows:

> "Tender" means (i) in respect of a construction contract, a tender invited by public advertisement and (ii) in respect of a purchase or service contract, a tender invited by public advertisement or from a representative list or lists of suppliers.

That would seem to be a pretty broad definition of a tender when it can mean purchase merely from a list of suppliers, without any tender being called. Yet it is considered a tender. When the minister explains this I would ask him to tell us how these lists are made up.

For example, in Ottawa how has it been the practice to make up the lists? We hear rumours of certain firms being able to get on the list and of other firms not being able to get on. I think probably that system has existed in a good many other parts of Canada. I would like to know from the minister whether a stop will be put to that sort of business.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Green: Perhaps they do not do that sort of thing in Fort William or, if they do, the hon. member does not know about it.

Mr. McIvor: I know Fort William.

Mr. Green: The seventh point is much the same. Is there to be any change in the method of buying and renting property by the Department of Public Works? On some occasions there seems to be a kind of mental telepathy between the department and some of its good friends around the country, when it comes to buying or renting buildings. We had a case in Vancouver a few years ago of a building called the Alvin building, which was built by friends of the government, under an agreement with the government, then rented by the government and bought by the government at a price far higher than should have been paid. But those friends were sitting there in a position to be able to put up that building. It is true that it was done through a company; but of course they were all members of the company.

Then we have postal stations and letter-carrier depots in Vancouver in respect of which a similar situation prevails. That is, people who are actively engaged in Liberal party work have at least been able to rent buildings to the government—perhaps not personally, but through companies they control. Is there to be any change in that sort of business? We have a new look, supposedly, in the Department of Public Works—a new minister and a new deputy minister. Is there to be any change made in the method by which property is bought or rented?

The eighth point is this. Will the minister explain complaints contained, concerning his department, in the public accounts. These are complaints made by the Auditor General in respect of the public accounts for the year ended March 31, 1953, and the particular part to which I refer is found at pages 12 and 13 at the back of the book. I shall not go into them in detail, but I would point out that the first complaint refers to the department's having cancelled an account receivable without obtaining what the Auditor General considered a proper authority. The second complaint has to do with the return of a deposit which had been put up by a contractor. This seems to be the more serious, and the Auditor General has this to say:

> During the spring of 1951 a firm was awarded six contracts for the supply of post office lock boxes. Delivery dates were stipulated, but the contractor failed to deliver on time. As a result, two contracts, involving $24,125, were cancelled in May, 1952, and the work awarded to another contractor whose price was $3,796 higher. Nevertheless, the security deposits of $2,412 given for due performance of the two contracts were, with the approval of treasury board, returned to the contractor. Parliament having directed that "good and sufficient security" be given for "due performance of the work within the amount and time specified for its completion", it would appear to follow that, when a contractor defaults in performance, the deposit becomes revenue and any adjustment, as an act of grace, should be recorded as a charge to a vote.

That seems to be a very reasonable complaint by the Auditor General, and I hope the minister will be able to assure us that this sort of short-cut is not now being followed by his department.

Finally, I would ask the minister to explain what is going on in British Columbia about the power development on the big bend of the Columbia river. I ask that because in the last few days statements have been made, both in the British Columbia press and in the Ottawa press, to the effect that General A. G. L. McNaughton, who is, as hon. members know, Canadian head of the international joint commission, had been in British Columbia interviewing the minister of lands and forests there, Mr. Sommers. As a result of those interviews the people of our province have been told that there is to be a $400 million 600-foot high dam constructed on Mica creek on the big bend of the mighty Columbia river. It is to start within eighteen months, and it is said that it will give British Columbia an estimated one million horsepower and will take seven years to complete and open up vast development possibilities in the interior. There is a similar dispatch in the Ottawa paper.

These dispatches read as though this plan is all set to go. I am not criticizing the plan; I think the development of the Columbia power is a very worth-while project; but what I should like to know from the minister is just what truth is in these reports and what plan is under consideration.

It is of vital importance to him, not only from the angle of construction of public works but because this plan will flood quite a few miles of the trans-Canada highway. When we asked the minister last year whether the route of the trans-Canada highway was going to be changed he said no, it was to be around the big bend of the Columbia river. If his department is involved in it for no other reason, it is because he has charge of the trans-Canada highway development in the dominion. Therefore, when he answers the various questions placed before him this afternoon I hope he will deal with this particular question.

Those are all the points I have to place before the minister. I hope that this new look which the papers have been trying to give to the minister and his department in the last few weeks will turn out to be substance, not just fiction.

Mr. McIvor: Just a brief word; I was one of those who were greatly pleased when the Prime Minister thought it wise to appoint the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg as the Minister of Public Works. I knew he would be quite fit to take care of himself physically or mentally for anything that the opposition had to throw at him, and I have not been disappointed. I can see him kneeling behind the base and catching every baseball that came, and that is what he has been doing. He has been catching everything and delivering it in such a way that the team, which is the people of Canada, can appreciate his deliveries. It is seen in the way that he handles the housing question. He answered all questions, and he delivered the goods in such a way that it will be a credit to Canada.

I must say that I was greatly pleased when I had a delegation from Fort William come down and interview the minister in connection with projects in Fort William that we think we need and have been trying to get for some time. He received that delegation from the city council and the chamber of commerce courteously, and he answered them intelligently. He sent them away feeling rather comfortable, believing that they would get what they asked for. I would remind him and his officials that those two projects are, first, the breakwater in front of Island No. 2 that we have been after for 16 years. I am going to tell the minister now that I hope that I shall be long enough in this house to see that project carried on, and I do not feel like quitting for a while yet. But the sooner it comes the better.

The other project has to do with a public building. We are paying out over $30,000 a year in rent for dominion offices. We think that we should have those offices in one building which up to now would be tax free. I am just reminding the minister of these things. We do not want to push unduly at Fort William, but when the place is growing and growing and showing rather a progressive spirit but still not very conservative, we think we should get a start on those things, and I am looking for them.

There is just one project that I should place before the minister. Since he is an outstanding athlete himself and knows how to keep his body in shape, he knows he cannot keep his body in shape unless he has the means to do so. Anybody will admit that surplus fat is a deadweight on any individual, and it does tend to mental obscurity and lack of clearness. There should be some place around this House of Commons where one could do physical exercises. I would prefer it to be underground. Since there is lots of rock around here, a place should be blasted out for a gymnasium and swimming pool. In time of war it could be turned into a shelter. I know the minister will consider this favourably. I have been after it for a while. I know that hon. members who have got something on their chests would like to get it off. If they could go and punch a bag for a while instead of punching the opposition or the government it would do them good and it would keep their minds clear.

I should like to congratulate the minister on the way he handled the housing question and the ticklish question of the film board. I am sure that, before he is through, not only will hon. members from British Columbia, who were doubters, change their minds, but other hon. members will congratulate him.

Mr. Winters: Before I start my remarks in reply to several hon. members who spoke, I should like to thank the hon. member for Fort William for his very kind references and to express the hope that I shall be able to measure up in some small respect to the high aims he has set for me.

In reply to the hon. member for Red Deer, who apparently has left the chamber, I would do no more therefore at this stage than remind hon. members that the vote for the architectural branch, which was the branch in question, in the estimates for the coming year, 1954-55, is an amount of $3,600,000; whereas the corresponding vote last year was $2,300,000. There is an increase of $1,299,999 for the province of Alberta alone, thereby indicating that there is no attempt whatever to discriminate on any grounds that might possibly have been in the mind of the hon. member. What we are trying to do is to apportion the money we have in such a way that we shall get projects in a place rather than simply notations in the estimates book that hon. members are dealing with now.

Mr. Low: Would the minister at this time put on record the reason the change was made in these particular votes to which the hon. member for Red Deer made reference? Why was the change made after the house had voted them? It would be a good thing if that were on the record.

Mr. Winters: I dealt with that generally last night. The whole reason is that we are trying to evolve a system of including in the estimates just those projects that we are in a position to go forward with in the fiscal year in question. Some projects were not planned to the stage where we could go forward with them. Rather than put an amount in the estimates that did not mean anything and would just prevent us voting money for some other project that was ready to go forward, we had to consider the whole over-all program and just include this year those projects which we thought there was a good likelihood of doing something about. That does not mean that any project has been abandoned, but it does mean that each one must be considered on its merits and in relation to the relative urgency for having something done about the various projects in particular areas.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is the breakwater at Fort William all right?

Mr. Winters: That is another matter that will have to be dealt with on its merits, just as all other projects that are so dear to the hearts of hon. members.

I should like to deal now with the very good speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and compliment him upon the very thorough way in which he has studied the Department of Public Works, its estimates and also the role which he has in mind for this department. I am not in position to disagree with him in his remarks about the annual report except to make the qualification that when the statute placed a limitation as to the date parliament then had in mind that for the most part the sessions would be commencing after the new year rather than in the fall, as we have been doing recently. Therefore, the date pushes everybody pretty hard, but most of all the queen's printer. There has been a bottleneck there. Because of the statistical nature of the department's report it is difficult to assemble all the information. We did think that it might be helpful if we could put the report before hon. members today, even though it was in unbound form and even though it was not available to everybody. I thought it was better to do that than not to have it available at all. The printed bound copies I hope will be available to all in another two weeks. I hope in this respect we will be able to do better next year and we certainly intend to try to meet the requirements imposed on us by parliament.

For some years the hon. member has dealt with what he believes to be the proper role of the Department of Public Works in the general program of government construction. Here again let me hasten to say that I am not one to disagree with him. I think the general attitude of the government is that the time has come for the Department of Public Works to be re-established as the government's agency in the field of public works. The hon. member probably will recall that at the time the Prime Minister made the rearrangement of portfolios recently he transferred to the Minister of Public Works federal responsibility for the trans-Canada highway and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, both of which enter largely into the field of construction, as well as certain other responsibilities formerly carried out by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

We have been discussing with the Department of National Revenue, the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Transport and other departments the extent to which we can get the Department of Public Works in shape organizationally and administratively to take on a larger volume of public works. As an example, recently the Post Office Department applied for an additional architect and we told them that we thought we could provide the architectural services they required. They agreed not to take on the architect but to leave that work with the Department of Public Works. The Department of Transport is another department that is considering transferring some of its construction operations to the Department of Public Works.

Speaking on behalf of the Department of Public Works, I know hon. members would expect me to say that I would not want to take on a volume of work that the department was not capable of coping with. We have had the organization of this department under close scrutiny for the past five months. Hon. members are probably familiar with some of the changes that have been made. In the first place, the former deputy minister, Mr. Emmett Murphy, a very competent engineer, reached retirement age and subsequently took his retirement. He has been replaced by the former deputy minister of the Department of Resources and Development, and previously the vice-president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I have worked closely with this gentleman when he was in those two capacities. He was asked to accept the position of deputy minister of public works, which he did. Hon. members know the fine record of accomplishment of Major General H. A. Young in the service of his country, in war and in peace. I am very happy that he has seen fit to come to this department.

Just prior to the rearrangement of portfolios the chief architect, Mr. Gustave Brault, took his retirement and was replaced by Mr. E. A. Gardner, who is the present chief of the architect's branch. Shortly after I came to the department the then chief engineer, Mr. Robert Blais, reached retirement age and retired. We promoted to that position the assistant chief engineer, Mr. A. A. Anderson, who is now doing a very fine job of work. But he also is reaching that inevitable period of life when retirement seems to loom just over the horizon.

We are endeavouring to rearrange both the architect's and engineering branches of the department. We have applied to the civil service commission for and they have approved the establishment of a new position in the architect's branch to be termed director of property management and maintenance. That position has been established, a competition has been held, and we hope shortly that the successful candidate will be designated. We are endeavouring to set up in the Department of Public Works another position of chief engineer. Having regard to the fact that we have undertaken the trans-Canada highway and additional construction operations we need this new position. We hope in due course to have the organization in shape where we can expand and take on additional public works which we believe are the proper function of the federal government.

When the department is able to assume these additional works, then I have no doubt that other departments of government will be quite prepared to have the Department of Public Works do them. No department wishes to undertake work of a nature, particularly if it duplicates functions being performed by some other department which on the face of it is more appropriately designed to carry out the functions. The hon. member spoke of a shelf of public works.

Mr. Green: Before the minister goes on, may I point out also that I referred to Defence Construction (1951) Limited and suggested that that corporation should also come under the Department of Public Works and that the department should do some of the work now done by that corporation.

Mr. Winters: I think that is a suggestion that must be considered. I am sure that the hon. member knows that Defence Construction Limited has been having its construction contracts handled by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. While that corporation is not part of the Department of Public Works, it does report to the same minister. There is a close-knit arrangement of construction activities under the Department of Public Works and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. However, the suggestion made by the hon. member is well worth thinking about.

I recall discussing a shelf of public works with the hon. member on previous occasions. There are great difficulties in endeavouring to build up a shelf of public works. I do not think a shelf was too good a concept right from the start. Planning for public works is not something that is static in a country which has been growing and expanding the way this one has. We have been very hard pressed to keep up with current planning, let alone get ahead far enough to put anything in such a dormant state as to have it rest on a shelf.

It does not seem a concept with which one can comply in an expanding economy under such buoyant conditions as we have been experiencing when considering at the same time the shortage of engineers, architects, and other technical assistants. We believe in the principle of planning ahead, and my hon. friend will see in the estimates that vote 401, to which I referred last night, asks parliament to make available to the Department of Public Works the relatively small sum of $500,000 this year to enable the department to acquire sites in the many small communities where we are obliged to operate from time to time, and to do some planning with respect to these sites without actually committing ourselves at that stage to carrying forward a public work. That is something I hope we can develop as time goes on because I believe it will make for more orderly planning, more orderly budgeting, and more orderly scheduling of work.

My hon. friend asks why expenditure had increased in a number of categories as set forth in this summary of standard objectives and expenditures and special categories of service charges, and more especially with regard to maintenance charges. I am sure if my hon. friend were in the position in which I am he would be struck by the increased costs which follow the construction of every new building. There are increases in maintenance, service charges, cleaning supplies, janitor services, window cleaning, general run of the mill maintenance and in all those other requirements which are a necessary part of our expanding program of public works. To the extent that we are going to be asked by parliament to build new buildings, then we must be prepared to meet increased costs annually for servicing these new buildings. It is true that we save on rentals. But when we acquire a property to be owned by the crown, then the crown must be prepared to pay the charges necessary for servicing it.

My hon. friend dealt with government contract regulations and stated that there were some changes in them with which I must confess I am not entirely familiar because I did not quite get the point he was making. I believe it had to do with the calling of public tenders and I would like to tell him that it is the policy of the department to call for public tenders wherever that is feasible. I am a very strong believer in that myself. I believe it is a fair way in which to do business in almost every instance and it is the best way to do business wherever it is practicable. My hon. friend will find that we do as a general practice call for public tenders for public projects.

He referred to purchases from a representative list of suppliers. There are instances where it is not feasible to call for public tenders for relatively small amounts of supplies, and it has been the practice in the past, and I presume it will continue to be the the practice regardless of what government might happen to be in office, to establish lists of reliable and competent suppliers and to invite tenders from them when it is not feasible to call for public tenders. In my experience that policy has been administered fairly and, I believe, in such a way as to protect the public interest.

My hon. friend asked if there was to be any change in the method of buying and renting property. At the same time he said he knew of many occasions on which properties owned by friends of the government were ultimately bought by the government. I would like to think that all citizens of Canada are friends of the government. If my hon. friend were to occupy the position in which I am, and he heard the comments of his own supporters in the house, I think perhaps he would not attach too much importance to the rumours he hears to the effect that it is only supporters of the government who can sell property to the crown. Hon. members on this side of the house have on many occasions held exactly contrary views, but it is the policy of the department to buy on merit, and my hon. friend well knows that people these days do not get rich by selling property to the crown.

Mr. Green: There is to be no change, then?

Mr. Winters: I do not know of anything which would warrant a change in government policy and I am therefore not in a position to tell my hon. friend there will be a change. The policies which have been adopted and implemented by the government have been framed with the public interest in mind. But if my hon. friend knows of any instance where that is not true I would be glad if he would bring it to my attention.

My hon. friend's next point had to do with the Auditor General's report, and the hon. member mentioned two items in particular which evoked comment from the Auditor General. One had to do with the cancellation of a debt as an act of grace. I have quite a long answer in justification of that, but perhaps if I read the last paragraph it might satisfy my hon. friend.

The department took the stand (a) that it had not carried out its agreement; (b) that no service was performed and no value received by the contractor and that no debt to the crown was incurred by the contractor. For that reason the crown took the action it did.

The other point in the Auditor General's report dealt with by my hon. friend had to do with the return of a security deposit to a contractor in default. In reply to that I would say the officials of the department did not feel that security deposits could be considered as revenue unless and until they had been forfeited. Forfeiture was considered too drastic in this case and the treasury board approved the charges made by the contractor in view of the fact that the practice followed was approved by the treasury board under section 36 (a) of the Public Works Act, as the cost was in respect of calling for tenders. That was an act approved by the treasury board.

The last point dealt with by my hon. friend was the proposed development of a large hydroelectric dam at Mica creek on the northwest corner of the Big Bend highway. That whole project is still under investigation by my colleague the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, who is responsible for the water resources division. My present concern is with the trans-Canada highway; and my hon. friend from Vancouver-Quadra quite rightly stated that if this dam, which I understand will be some 600 feet high, is built, then a substantial portion of the existing Big Bend highway will be flooded. The appropriate minister of the government of British Columbia, for some years before the present government took office and since, has been in communication with me in respect to this possibility. I told him that if he cares to go ahead with the construction of the Big Bend highway, and should it then be flooded out in whole or in part in that section, then his government would be completely indemnified for damages resulting from the flood.

I read with interest the report to which my hon. friend referred to the effect that the construction of this dam is more imminent than we imagined. I was somewhat surprised at the 18-month period mentioned. I would be inclined to think that it would be a little longer. However, studies are still continuing and there is a distinct possibility that a dam will some day be built there.

Mr. Barnett: At the outset, Mr. Chairman, as a native son of the Red Deer district and a nephew of the man who put Red Deer constituency in the opposition camp some 32 years ago, I should like to say that my soul was somewhat stirred by the plea made by the hon. member for Red Deer a short time ago and I wish him well in it.

I am glad that we have heard the Minister of Public Works make his statement. From various sources since the appointment of the present minister to the position he now holds we have been hearing that changes were afoot in respect of the Department of Public Works. I was rather disappointed when, at the outset of the debate, he apparently did not see fit to make a statement as to what his thinking was about the future of his department. I am extremely glad to note that he was able to overcome his natural modesty and to give us some outline of what he has in mind. I think I can speak for other members in this group as well as myself and say that, in the organization and the planning of that department, we will welcome any change which makes it a more effective instrument of national development rather than, as at times in the past it appeared to be, something of a chore boy for other departments of government.

In this connection, may I say I was interested to note that in this year's estimates the amount allocated for the trans-Canada highway had been increased from $15 million, as it was in last year's estimates, to $20 million and that the amount to be spent in the national parks had been doubled. To me that was an indication that the kind of development that I should like to see taking place within the public works department has some reality to it. I feel that in many ways that is one of the most important aspects of our national development which now come within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works. In that connection I came across one or two statements which I found represented very closely my own thinking on the matter. These statements were contained in an address by Mr. William A. Wecker, president of General Motors of Canada, Limited. I should like to quote briefly one or two of his remarks in this connection, partly because I imagine that no hon. member would consider that he is simply a wild-eyed socialist visionary as some people might be inclined to consider me to be. In connection with the project of highway development his remarks in part were as follows:

> . . . when confederation came into being . . . it was quite properly believed that the railway would be the prime instrument of the country's development, that roads would be of limited local concern and should, therefore, be left entirely to the provinces to build and maintain. The fathers of confederation acted quite properly for their day and age. They were deliberating just about 35 years prior to the appearance of the first motor car in Canada. And so roads have been principally the responsibility of small local governments and the provinces.

Then he goes on to say this, and I certainly agree with his sentiments in this regard:

> . . . Roads have become a matter of national importance. Most major traffic routes connect cities in different provinces and carry traffic of two or more provinces. Eventually they will be largely interrelated and interconnected in a national pattern of highways.
>
> . . . Roads are more than a provincial or municipal matter. They have become a national problem and must be treated nationally.
> . . . We must have a broader area of co-operation and understanding among road building authorities.

He then mentioned what to me was an extremely interesting fact, namely that the tonnage of freight carried annually by motor transport in Canada exceeds the combined total of that carried by rail, water and air. He also mentioned that there are 14,000 communities in this nation which are chiefly dependent upon highway transportation for their very existence. He also pointed out that between 1915 and 1933 the number of motor vehicles in Canada rose from 60,000 to one million, that it took another 15 years for the second million vehicles to be added to the roads, but that in only 4 years prior to the time at which he gave this address—and that was on October 20, 1952—another million motor vehicles had been added. The point of that statement, I believe, is that it indicates the accelerating rate of increase in the number of vehicles, as a result of which highways are becoming of ever greater importance from the national point of view. Then he goes on to say this:

> The Hon. Robert H. Winters, Minister of Resources, in a speech not so many weeks ago, probably touched the reason why the road builders are losing ground when he said that the volume of traffic on new highways is always greater than had been estimated.
> So rapid has been the increase in Canada's motor vehicle fleet—we have added 50 per cent to it in the last four years, as I explained earlier—that neither Mr. Winters nor any other highway planner could be expected to forecast exactly the physical expansion required.

That may be perfectly true. In addition to that, I was much interested in the remark made by the minister to the effect that they are making provision for a certain amount of advance planning. As a result of their initial venture into this field, I hope they may be able to pursue that particular idea on a larger scale as time goes on. In relation to highway development, particularly in connection with the matter of planning, an example that occurred to me as an indication of how planning, if it was carried on in advance, could be of benefit, exists in my own riding where at the present time we have a great many excellent highways being built by some of the larger logging corporations. As their understanding and knowledge of forest management has increased, they have more and more planned their highway building in advance of their current needs so that they are able to conduct a much more flexible and economic operation, viewed in larger terms. I feel that is one of the major problems facing us today. One of the ways in which a revitalized public works department can be of real national service is if the minister and also parliament can translate into a national concept some of the energy, initiative and imagination that a great many able executives today are able to put into their planning in connection with private corporations. I have long felt that this is going to be the secret of the future growth of Canada, that it is going to be the way we are going to avoid some of the problems we were discussing not long ago in connection with unemployment. If, somehow, the members of this parliament and the citizens of this country can achieve a method of making use of the type of initiative which you find in many great organizations today on a national scale, then we shall be successful. In my opinion that is the crux of the problem with which we are faced. Actually that is why I find myself sitting politically where I do in this parliament.

Perhaps I might have pursued this subject at greater length if the minister had not made the statement he did, which has given us some of his thinking and some indication that he does intend to pursue a policy of expanding and developing the department. Perhaps this will be not altogether along the lines I have suggested but at least some steps in that direction are going to be taken. I shall conclude this part of my remarks simply by saying I wish him well in that aspect of his work.

I believe there is a rather formidable roadblock in the way of developing his department along the lines he has suggested. and along the lines for which we are hoping. I would illustrate that by saying that in the minds of the citizens of Canada, and I might go so far as to say in the minds of some of the members of this house, there is an unhealthy atmosphere surrounding the Department of Public Works. In my opinion that is one of the biggest problems facing the minister if he is going to carry out the kind of development he envisages for this department.

May I give an illustration of what I mean. I am going to read from a column which appeared in the Campbell River Courier on Wednesday, August 12, 1953. This column is written from week to week by the editor of that publication, and on that date he had this to say:

> Election of C.C.F.'er Tom Barnett as member of parliament for Comox-Alberni came as no surprise to those who saw the anti-socialist vote split umpteen different ways . . .

I might just point out in passing that even the editors of newspapers in British Columbia who are not of my political persuasion recognize the essential unity between the various non-socialist groups. It is not quite as apparent in other parts of the country as yet.

Mr. Sinclair: And between the two socialist groups, too.

Mr. Knowles: The minister is fishing.

Mr. Barnett: I am sorry, but I could not quite catch the interjection the minister made.

Mr. Sinclair: They recognize the same essential unity between the two socialist groups, the socialists and the communist party, as demonstrated by the recent speech of Mr. Rod Young.

Mr. Barnett: I did not hear the recent speech by Mr. Rod Young to which the minister refers. I might point out to him from my own experience that I have not found any great love was bestowed upon me so far as a certain communist group he mentioned was concerned. Any question of unity, as he well knows, has never been a very prominent aspect of the relationship between those two political organizations in British Columbia.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Young told the students of the C.C.F. club at the University of British Columbia that there was no difference between socialism and communism.

Mr. Barnett: I am sure the minister is acquainted with the gentleman to whom he refers, and I suggest he might discuss the matter with him the next time he is in British Columbia and find out what the gentleman really did say or what his views are on that subject.

Mr. Sinclair: He was a former C.C.F. M.P., and should know what he was talking about.

Mr. Barnett: Getting back to editor McCusker's article in the Campbell River paper, he goes on to say this:

> Thus, in a predominantly Liberal House of Commons, we of this riding will be represented by a member of an opposition party and, things being the way they are in politics, we can look forward to a four-year drought in the matter of public works expenditures in this constituency.

Mr. Barnett, we have no doubt, will do a good job of representing us. He will doubtless present our cases (as they come up) with earnestness and eloquence . . . but not persuasion. For he is not on the government side.

Mr. Martin: That is the way the Liberals find it in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Knowles: Check with Austin Cross.

Mr. Barnett: I have taken the liberty of using that quotation to demonstrate that in the minds of many people there is what I have already termed an unhealthy attitude in respect of the Department of Public Works. As long as that attitude persists, as long as a lot of people consider that the public works department is supposed to be the Santa Claus of government, then I would suggest the hopes the minister has expressed for the development of his department are not going to come to fruition.

I recognize that he has a big job, and I recognize also it is not a job he can do alone. In fact I would say that the success of the job he might be able to do depends as much on the members of this house as it does upon the minister himself. I believe it will be necessary for members who are sitting on the same side of the house as the minister to exercise a great deal of restraint in making requests of the minister for special consideration for their particular constituencies. On the other hand, I would say that to succeed in changing the public attitude in regard to this department may mean that members on the opposition side will perhaps have to exercise some patience at times when they might be disposed to consider that there was discrimination against their constituencies.

I suppose my remarks expressing the hope that the minister will bring about a change in the atmosphere surrounding the Department of Public Works will be considered by some people as an example of political naiveté. All I can say is that I hope I shall be able to retain a certain amount of naiveté, and I would be quite happy to discover that the minister also has been able to retain a certain amount.

I do not intend to go into a long discussion of the details of the public works estimates at this time, particularly as they relate to the constituency of Comox-Alberni. I know there are occasions when such matters will be discussed between the minister and myself. However, I have attempted at, I hope, not too great length to set out the attitude and the viewpoints the minister can expect from this corner of the house in relation to the plans he has for his department.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the statement by the minister, and felt he did everything he could to answer the questions raised. I have a question to raise; it was brought up last year and still remains in the category of uncompleted business. My question has to do with the construction work done by the Lunam Construction Company, operating for the Department of Public Works and other departments of government.

It will be recalled that when this matter was brought up last year there was a very lengthy discussion on the subject and, in particular, as to what could or should be done in order to protect subcontractors and suppliers of materials and commodities to contractors with government contracts. That problem still remains.

I want to ascertain from the minister what changes have taken place in that policy, for I find subcontractors in all parts of Canada who are very much concerned over the fact that, in accepting subcontracts from contractors with government contracts, in reality they assume a risk that is not assumed when they deal with private contractors. When they deal with private contractors they have the right to file mechanics' liens against properties within the limitations of the mechanics' liens acts of the several provinces. In this way they are able to protect themselves to the extent provided by those acts.

It is otherwise, however—and it has been so held on a number of occasions—with subcontractors who supply commodities or supplies of any kind to contractors having government contracts. In connection with the Lunam Construction Company of Regina the total of accounts of creditors of that company, which held a number of contracts with the Department of Public Works as well as with other departments of government, when it ceased operations amounted to $256,652. Comparatively small companies were involved to the extent of amounts such as $12,500, $10,000, $17,000, $6,000 and $14,700. Then there is one for $27,800 for heating supplies, and another of $37,500 for an electrical company.

I am not going over the story of the Lunam Construction Company. We all know what happened in consequence of certain revelations that were made. But I do think the problem still remains, and it is this. How can subcontractors in this country undertake, with a reasonable degree of safety, to make the necessary supplies available to contractors when those contractors have government contracts? In the case of the Lunam Construction Company I think anyone who is frank will admit that that company was allowed by the department to place itself in a position detrimental to the interests of subcontractors who supplied the materials that went into the completion of that contract.

Under the regulations set out by the Department of Public Works this provision is made:

During the prosecution of any contract, as a progress estimate then being rendered shall show a gross total accomplished equal to or in excess of 30 per cent of the whole amount of the work contracted for, the contractor shall be required to furnish to the department a statutory declaration signed by himself, or some one of his employees who has personal knowledge of his business arrangements and accounts by which the department shall be assured that all his liabilities in connection with work under the contract up to and including the last previous progress estimate have been paid by him.

And this further provision:

As soon as the work under the contract shall be shown to have reached the point indicated in section 2—

That is the one I have just referred to.

—the contractor shall obtain from each of his subcontractors a receipt for payment of amount due under the terms of the said contract up to a date not more than one month earlier than the date of the then present progress estimate.

A form is provided for this purpose. I find upon examination of the records that this latter precautionary measure was not observed, with the result that subcontractors lost a tremendous amount of money because they dared trust that the government of Canada, in its contractual relationships with subcontractors, would live up to the provisions of its own regulations.

The minister says that changes in personnel have been made in the last year. I hope and trust that changes will be made that will not permit a similar state of affairs to exist again. And this is not a solitary incident; it is happening in other departments of government. It is happening in connection with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In one case in Vancouver creditors find themselves out of pocket to the extent of $225,000, with the hope of recovering only 20 per cent of that amount. And there are cases in other parts of Canada involving lesser amounts where subcontractors—local dealers, merchants, hardware men, lumber dealers, suppliers of pipe, brick, and the like—having trusted that the federal government would carry out its own provisions, have found themselves suffering tremendous losses.

Last year suggestions were made as to some things that might be done in order to remove this danger. It is unfair that the government of Canada should be able to take advantage of the small businessmen of this country by having their supplies used in the buildings that are being erected by contractors for the government, and at the same time failing to protect the suppliers even within the limitations provided by the present regulations. After the discussion in the house last year in regard to the Lunam Construction Company I had correspondence from subcontractors in every part of the country, asking whether or not something could be done.

One of the suggestions is that a performance bond should be required on federal work in the same way it is required in connection with private industry. What changes have been made to provide protection to the subcontractors for payment of materials supplied on federal jobs, protection in lieu of the mechanics' liens that are available to contractors on other than government contracts? This is a matter that deserves serious attention, as the minister has pointed out, because of the expansion that is taking place in his department and the works that are to be carried out during the coming year. I feel that the subcontractors of our country have a right to know what is going to be done to protect them at least to the extent that protection would be available if they were dealing with private contractors on private business.

In connection with the Lunam Construction Company, was any arrangement entered into with any of those subcontractors whereby they have been given to understand that on any future tenders that they may make on other contracts, consideration will be given to them for part of the losses they suffered?

Mr. Winters: Is my hon. friend stating that as a fact?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am asking whether it is so, because that is the rumour.

Mr. Winters: Can my hon. friend give me any basis for those rumours?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say the rumour is quite widespread that something similar to what took place in connection with the Milk river project in Alberta is going to be done.

Mr. Winters: I was wondering whether my hon. friend has any substantiation for that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister can say whether there is any foundation for it, whether it is a fact. He is the one with the information.

Mr. Winters: I say it is not a fact. I was asking if the hon. member had any substantiation for it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the question I am asking. What is the position of those subcontractors? Are they to be taken for a ride to the extent of almost $200,000 because they dared trust that the government of Canada would give them the same consideration they would be entitled to were they dealing with a private principal? After what took place last year, and the revelations in connection with the Lunam Construction Company, I ask the minister what changes have been made in his department and what alterations have been made in the regulations? In connection with the Lunam Construction Company, I should like to know why no prosecution of Mr. Lunam was ever instituted for the false declaration in which he swore that the various suppliers had in fact been paid by him? What has taken place during the last year in that regard?

The minister will recall that his predecessor found a great deal of difficulty in finding Lunam. The search went on for two or three months; then a reporter, Miss Judith Robinson, went to Regina and was able to find him on her arrival. What is the present position in that regard? Have any proceedings been taken on the declarations which the minister's predecessor said were false? If not, is any action contemplated at the present time? I ask those questions because in this case, as in the case of the Vancouver Associated Contractors Limited, good citizens, local merchants, suppliers of all kinds, are being placed in a position where they have a perilous future if they dare to trust any contractor who has a contract with the Department of Public Works or with any other department of government, for the supplying of goods, wares and merchandise. This is a matter which I believe requires the utmost consideration by the officials of the department.

The minister has taken over this department. He has brought with him a deputy minister who enjoys the respect of all who know of the work he has done in the past. I feel that this is a most important matter and requires action, because a repetition of the Lunam Construction Company case, though on a smaller scale, has taken place in two or three instances in connection with government contracts.

I ask the minister to give consideration to a provision in contracts after this date so that subcontractors will be protected against unnecessary losses. When they enter into private contracts they all expect some risk, but they at least know what the risk is and they know there is one way in which they can protect themselves, namely by the provisions of the mechanics' liens acts in the several provinces.

The Chairman: Since it is five o'clock the committee will rise and report progress.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN NURSES' ASSOCIATION

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception) moved the second reading of Bill No. 340, respecting Canadian Nurses' Association.

Mr. Green: May we have an explanation?

Mr. Stick: In sponsoring this amendment to the Canadian Nurses' Association Act, which was passed by this house in 1947, I should like to say first that the objects of the association as set forth in the act are:

(a) to dignify the profession of nursing by maintaining and improving the ethical and professional standards of nursing education and service;

(b) to encourage its members to participate in affairs promoting the public welfare;

(c) to promote the best interests of the nurses of Canada and to maintain national unity among them;

(d) to encourage an attitude of mutual understanding with the nurses of other countries; and

(e) such other lawful acts and things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects.

The purpose of the amendment is to include the association of registered nurses of Newfoundland in the Canadian Nurses' Association. There is no change in the act at all except in section 6, which reads:

The following associations or their respective successors and assigns shall be association members:

Then follows a list of the different provincial nursing associations throughout Canada. As I say, the main object of the amendment is to incorporate the association of registered nurses of Newfoundland into the Canadian Nurses' Association, and to do that it is necessary to amend section 6 of the act to include that provincial association.

There is another small change in connection with the association of nurses of Prince Edward Island, whose name has recently been changed from the registered nurses' association of Prince Edward Island. Also the association wishes that the provincial associations which make up the Canadian Nurses' Association be in alphabetical order. That is the only change.

I think the bill is non-controversial. I am sure the house does not want me to make a speech on the work of the Canadian Nurses' Association in alleviating suffering and so on. It is a pleasure for me to sponsor this bill, because it is one more evidence of the desirability of the association in Newfoundland being affiliated with the Canadian Nurses' Association and thereby, perhaps in a small way, giving evidence of a continuation of the cementing of union which took place in 1949.

I have nothing further to say on the matter. I have endeavoured to explain the purpose of the bill, and I leave it to the sympathetic consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

NIAGARA GAS TRANSMISSION LIMITED

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hunter for the second reading of Bill No. 325, to authorize Niagara Gas Transmission Limited to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipe line.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was last before the house I was making a few observations and pointing out that it was hard for me to understand the unplanned manner in which franchises in connection with the transmission of natural gas were being handled by the government. The bill now before the house would grant permission to pipe natural gas from the Niagara peninsula to Toronto, and in my judgment it would be detrimental to the best interests of the all-Canadian pipe line for which a franchise has already been granted.

There are main lines already in the embryo stage, and if they are to justify their existence they will have to have markets for the gas to be transmitted. In my opinion the branch line covered by this bill to pipe gas into Toronto will interfere with the function of the main line. In view of the development that has taken place, I look upon a bill such as this as merely a method of blackmail. If this franchise is granted it will place the people who hold it in the position where they can sell stock and then offer to sell out. I cannot see the justification for this bill in view of the fact that a franchise has already been granted for the construction of a main line which will need the market in Toronto if it is going to be a paying proposition and not be a development which will have to be heavily subsidized by the Canadian people.

My main objection to the whole development in the use of natural gas is that it is an advance in the use of fuel which should have been more carefully planned. It is all right to get up in the house, as some hon. members do, and say that you cannot stop progress, that with this technological advance other fuels are going to fall by the wayside. That statement is most unrealistic when you consider that there are sections of this country which are going to be hurt by the development of natural gas.

I pointed that out when the proposal was made to pipe Alberta gas to the cities of Montreal and Quebec. I asked the committee which was considering the bill and the witnesses who were appearing at that time if any survey had been made east of Montreal into the repercussions from the use of natural gas in that area. I was told that no survey had been made. I asked the committee and the witnesses if they were aware of the fact that at least two of the provinces east of Montreal depended to a large extent upon the coal industry, one almost completely.

I do not consider that a national project is in the best interests of this country if certain sections are going to be injured or thrown into complete economic chaos without consideration being given as to what compensations are going to be made in that area for the acceptance of what is loosely termed a technological advance.

An hon. Member: What about the rest of the country?

Mr. Gillis: The rest of the country is being taken care of—that is what I am objecting to—without any consideration being given to the parts of the country that will be affected. I am sure if my hon. friend who has just interjected was living in a part of the country where he had investments in property, in schools, in homes and industry, he would be the first to get up and protest against a development which would wipe out his investments.

An hon. Member: I have the utmost sympathy.

Mr. Gillis: I am sure he is capitalist enough to take that attitude, that he is Conservative enough not to consider the rest of the country if it affected his own individual interests. I would remind the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who is piloting this bill through the house—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

Mr. Gillis: I thought he was, because he made a speech on it the other night which indicated that he had forgotten his geography.

Mr. Knowles: They are trying to take him on board as pilot.

Mr. Gillis: I would like to remind hon. members that while we are considering the bill, over in the Copeland building in this city the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) is meeting with representatives of the mine workers' union from Nova Scotia and the coal operators from Nova Scotia, in addition to representatives of the provincial government. They are discussing the future of the coal industry in the maritime provinces, because they realize that within a few years the Quebec and Montreal areas will be served with natural gas. That will mean displacing the only economic market for maritime coal in existence at the present time. It also means the wiping out of not only the Dosco shareholders' investment in the coal industry but also of the economies of the communities which are based on coal, and to a large extent disrupting the economic future of these provinces. I would also like to remind hon. members that Nova Scotia is the province which brought the rest of Canada into confederation, and it should be shown more consideration than it has received up to the present time.

An hon. Member: Was it not Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Gillis: They held a meeting on Prince Edward Island, but the leadership came from Nova Scotia.

Mr. Knowles: Prince Edward Island was only the cradle.

Mr. Gillis: I cannot see how this kind of development can be termed technological advance. I would ask the members of the committee, when this bill comes before them, to give very careful consideration not only to the benefits which certain sections of Ontario and Quebec may enjoy through the provision of cheaper fuel, but also the hazards which are inherent in that development. I would remind hon. members who represent Montreal and Quebec that the provision of a 3,000-mile pipe line for the supply of natural gas will also mean adapting all your heating equipment to that type of fuel. That alone presents many hazards. Any number of difficulties might arise; the development of available supplies is merely guesswork at the present time, and no one can estimate how long these supplies will last. No one can say immediately with any degree of accuracy that we have sufficient fuel to supply all of Canada and parts of the United States adjacent to Alberta. That angle has to be taken into consideration.

I would also ask the committee to consider the statement made by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys as reported in a recent issue of an Ottawa newspaper. In that statement he warned those interested in the future supply of fuel not to be in too great a rush to close down the coal industry of Canada. He pointed out, and rightly so, that if you close down mines in which the people of Canada have a huge investment it will be impossible to open them up again very quickly. My experience has been that if you close a mine for six months, then it is almost impossible to open it again.

The minister also pointed out, quite rightly, that we are living in a disturbed and uncertain world. No one can predict how long we will continue to live in peace and security, and in that uncertain future anything might happen. The minister also pointed out that in the event of this country or this continent facing a war, coal would be needed almost as badly as it was needed during the last war, when the government had people running around this country digging gopher holes in order to obtain the necessary fuel to keep the war effort going.

The minister in that statement took a thoroughly realistic position on this subject. For the information of those hon. members who may be on the committee which will consider this bill, I would point out that the whole development of natural gas, oil, coal and hydroelectricity should in the past have been welded into one national fuel policy administered by a board capable of analysing the subject and determining which fuels are most economical. That has been done to a limited extent, although haphazardly, and I would like to point out to members of that committee, if they do not already know, that after pondering that question for some years some of us in this house believe that is the only policy which can cope with the situation. There is already an interdepartmental committee composed of experts on fuel considering this entire question of a national policy, so we should not be in too much of a hurry in passing bills of this kind.

We have a national pipe-line act already in existence under which the government has certain obligations, and it is my belief that any more bills of this nature would be unrealistic until such time as that committee has had an opportunity of examining the whole question and advising the government as to what is required.

Another matter which should be given consideration in relation to this fuel question is the development of atomic energy. The rush to spend millions of dollars and uproot communities in the fuel field is rather short-sighted, particularly when one considers what is going on in Britain. They are at present using pilot plants in certain industries to obtain the necessary data as to how well particular types of fuel operate under given conditions. Submarines have been powered with certain types of fuel. In fact one was launched quite recently.

An hon. Member: What would that do to the maritimes?

Mr. Gillis: I am coming to that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hunter: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member's speech or prevent him developing the broader aspects of his argument, but we are talking on the general subject of pipe lines, and I suggest that he is going rather far afield when he starts discussing atomic energy and matters of that nature. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member confine himself a little more closely to the bill.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's point, and I am quite willing to co-operate with him. What is wrong with our whole approach to this problem is that in the past, rather than considering the picture as a whole, we have considered the interests of a few people who wished to promote a pipe line. I am sure the average citizen in Ontario did not ask for this pipe line. It took a few promoters to start the ball rolling.

I do not believe you can discuss the development of natural gas, oil, or hydro-electricity without considering the entire fuel picture, and I suggest that we should be a little bit cautious in this regard because it appears to me that the time is not far distant when the money we are now spending on fuel may prove to have been wasted, and that it would have been better used in a government-sponsored atomic energy project.

My hon. friend asked what it would do to the maritimes. That is exactly the point I was leading up to in this whole discussion. The one place in Canada where a test should be made with atomic energy is in the maritimes, where there is a shortage of power and where, because of that shortage, it is difficult to establish subsidiary industry. The government is now making an examination of the possibilities of thermal power. That is a long-term process. I think, however, that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and others in the cabinet should now consider the possibility of establishing a pilot plant based on some industry in the maritimes in order to determine the possibilities for atomic energy in that field, as is being done in the United States and in Britain.

Mr. Speaker, I merely wanted to say this. My main plea is that when this committee meet to study the terms of this bill, they should look at it in its relationship to the national pipe line that we have already decided upon. Is this duplication? Is it stock promotion? Is it an attempt to grab a field which is lucrative and which might be sold to the main line when it comes through? Do not forget that a government interdepartmental committee today is studying the whole question of fuel with the end in view of a national fuel policy.

Let us not do anything in a hurry. Let us at least wait until some pronouncement is made by that committee as to the economic possibilities of fuels in all fields across this country. I am sorry if I wandered a little bit off the path, but in order to discuss the matter properly I think it was necessary to put the whole thing in its proper perspective.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a word or two on this bill. It seems to me that it raises several important points. First of all, the onus is on the sponsors of this bill to show clearly—much more clearly than they have yet shown—that if they are successful, this project will not prejudice the national pipe line which is already under way. I did not read this bill as carefully as I might have, but I have not understood it yet. I personally have no objection at all to the general proposition behind this bill, provided it can be clearly shown that it is not going to prejudice the national pipe line on which we are all depending so much.

There is one point I should like to make. We in British Columbia are hoping for a pipe line of our own before too long. It just might happen that unless favourable consideration is given to this particular bill our friends in the United States would not be so disposed to give favourable consideration to the application which we shall soon make to have gas piped down to Vancouver and then on into the state of Washington. We cannot have a practical proposition in British Columbia unless we also have that state of Washington market.

There are one or two remarks I should like to make with regard to the statement of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). I do not believe we can consider pipe lines in Canada intelligently unless right from the beginning we face the fact that they will have a most vital effect on the future of the coal industry of this country. I think it is impossible to discuss this or any other pipe-line bill without admitting that fact right from the very beginning. I believe the welfare of the coal industry in Canada is of vital concern not only to the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the people of Nova Scotia but also to us in the west. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) is certainly going to be affected by the growth of pipe lines and their competition with the coal mines in his riding. My hon. friend who sits to my right is also going to be affected with regard to the coal mines in Fernie.

In this house not so long ago we heard about the way the coal industry is now coming back and facing up to the competition it has been getting from the dieselized railways. It seems to me that it would surely be in the national interest if everybody in Canada began seriously to consider just how coal can hold its own in competition with the new fuels such as natural gas and oil.

I for one do not agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South on this one particular point only. I believe it is absolutely in the interests of Canada to bring the coal industry back and keep it back. But surely there is a responsibility upon the coal interests themselves. The natural gas interests are coming here, but they are not asking the government to do everything. Surely the coal interests themselves could begin to set their own house in order. Surely the coal interests of Canada, perhaps assisted by the national research council, the dominion fuel board or something like that, could undertake the development of such things as the gas turbine. I should like to see the coal industry and/or the national fuel board or the national research council take into consideration such things as central heating plants for whole municipalities. There is a successful one—and it has been operating for many years—in Lockport, New York. From my friends in Winnipeg I know they have one that I believe is partially successful. As far as I could find out, the chief kick is that it is turned off too soon in the spring, and then the people who are dependent upon it have no heat.

It seems to me that if we had intelligent research into how to bring back coal on a large-scale basis, perhaps coal could hold its own in competition with these new fuels. Why do we use these new fuels like oil and natural gas? Certainly it is not entirely because the new fuels are cheaper than coal, because in a good many cases oil and natural gas are much more expensive than coal. In my own home in Vancouver I burn artificial gas and have done so for 12 years. It is much more expensive than coal or sawdust would be, but of course we burn it because of the extra convenience.

My point is that you cannot separate such things as an application for a particular pipe line for Ontario from the pipe-line picture in Canada as a whole; and in my opinion you cannot separate the pipe-line picture in Canada as a whole from the whole question of fuel and coal.

My hon. friend from Cape Breton South is 100 per cent right on that matter. It is in the interests of the whole economy that we should keep the coal industry healthy and vital; but I think the main onus is on the coal industry itself. It is facing modern competition in a modern age, and it must get busy and fight for its own interests. It must not, for instance, wait for the railways to be dieselized and then, ten years later, begin to come back with things like the gas turbine. If the coal industry would get on its toes like these oil and natural gas boys, perhaps the coal industry would not have so much to fear.

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): The Social Credit members of this parliament, Mr. Speaker, have followed very closely the statements which have been made with respect to this bill concerning the Niagara Gas Transmission Company. Reference has been made also to the desirability of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited project. We do not think it is necessary for us to be long-winded in making our position clear. We were pleased to hear the views expressed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), as well as those of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). They stated that the building of this line would have a tremendous and positive economic impact on Canadian life.

We believe it is relevant to this debate to restate that the Social Credit government of Alberta, acting as guardians of the people's resources, has consistently stated their willingness to share their great gift, this natural gas, with the other parts of Canada provided the present and future requirements of the people of Alberta be fully protected at all times, both in the economic and supply sense. When an amount of gas has been established over and above the requirements of the province, then and only then would the Social Credit government approve the export of gas if it was evident that this would be in the best interests of the people of Alberta and the people of Canada.

We have been very consistent in our gas and oil policies. We advanced them many years ago, long before the other political parties realized their value and it became expedient for them to also adopt those policies. As a matter of fact we were constantly abused and criticized by the remnants of the old parties operating in Alberta for the stand we took. I should like to remind this house that in the last provincial election the entire Liberal attack was based on opposition to the export of surplus gas. I believe we should have no more of this political nonsense as to the fatherhood of a sensible oil and gas policy. The truth of the matter is that it was originated by the Social Credit government of Alberta, certainly not by those who now appear so eager to be given credit.

On page 2725 of Hansard for March 5, 1954, the Acting Prime Minister stated that if parliament passed this private bill the government would cease to have jurisdiction over the situation. In view of this fact, and since it is important not to interfere with the proposed pipe line from Alberta, the building of which depends upon its economic feasibility both from the standpoint of the consumer and the producer in the west, I feel it would be a wise and profitable move for the federal authorities to secure the views of the Alberta government on this matter, as well as those of the principals of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

The sponsors of this bill have signified their willingness to switch to natural gas from Alberta when it becomes available. If that is so, then I think more than just a verbal assurance is required. This is a matter which deals with the national interests of the people of Canada, and I believe we should take every precaution to see that nothing is done in this parliament or by any pressure groups which would jeopardize the building of what is presently considered most desirable, namely the trans-Canada pipe line.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): This is the sixth year, Mr. Speaker, in which the members of this house have listened to a pipe-line debate. As I sat here during this debate it seemed to me there was something missing. Of course that "something" is my old and distinguished friend George A. Cruickshank, the former member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. Byrne: He talked himself out, too.

Mr. Green: He, more than anyone else, made the pipe-line debate a popular thing. I think they drew larger crowds than any other debates, except the budget debate. In addition, right from the start he had the vision of what could be done for this nation by an all-Canadian pipe line. He had the courage to fight for that project, even against the members of his own party, showing the same courage which he showed to such a wonderful degree in the 29th battalion with which he served during the first world war.

With regard to the question of who is to have credit for the all-Canadian gas policy, I was somewhat surprised to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) stake out a claim to that distinction when he spoke on March 9.

Mr. Low: A lot of people are trying to get on the bandwagon.

Mr. Green: His remarks will be found on page 2817 of Hansard for that date. I am not anxious to start a political fight, and I merely bring this up by way of setting the record straight. The right hon. minister said this:

> In the first place, a private member's bill should be considered apart from politics. If it were not I would be tempted to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) for having adopted Liberal policies with reference to oil and gas pipe lines.

Well, of all the nerve; I think that takes the medal.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Your leader agreed with me on oil pipe lines.

Mr. Green: I do not believe he did, and we are speaking of natural gas pipe lines. I have here an extract from the Vancouver News-Herald of May 10, 1950, which is headed "Exclusive Interview; Howe gives facts on coast pipe line". Then there is a picture of Erwin Kreutzweiser, a reporter for the News-Herald, and underneath that picture there are the words, "He dared". There is a picture, too, of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and underneath his picture appear the words, "He talked". Then the article goes on to say:

By earlier reports Tuesday, trade and commerce minister Howe had either 'dodged' or snubbed newsmen seeking to interview him on his visit to Vancouver. The News-Herald's political writer, Erwin Kreutzweiser, however, calmly dared to beard the outspoken minister in his suite Tuesday night, found him willing to talk. Here is his exclusive interview.

Mr. Knowles: Now he is working for the government.

Mr. Green: Then we find this statement by the minister, which shows where he stood in 1950:

The determined filibuster which has been staged by Conservative and C.C.F., and a few Liberal M.P.'s on the issue of an "all-Canadian route" is a "phony angle", he said.

"It is so fantastic I could not take it seriously at first," he declared.

Mr. Knowles: Those who came to scoff remained to pray.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): He is talking about oil.

Mr. Green: We have had a great conversion. Then on March 13, 1953, the minister came right over to our side. We find him saying this on page 2930 of Hansard for that date:

I am convinced, after thorough study of the matter, that the only reliable supply of natural gas for the provinces of Ontario and Quebec must be from western Canada by means of an all-Canadian pipe line.

Mr. Knowles: Some day you will both come to our policy of public ownership.

Mr. Green: That remains to be seen. In any event the minister and I are now in agreement on an all-Canadian natural gas policy.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am worried about that.

Mr. Green: So am I. Under this plan Alberta gas is to be piped through Saskatchewan and Manitoba to Ontario and Quebec, with great benefit not only to the western provinces but also to all parts of Ontario and to the Montreal area of Quebec, as well as possibly the Quebec city area.

As the minister said the other day, this development will mean the expenditure in Canada of up to a billion dollars, and of course it cannot help bringing work for many thousands of our people. In central Canada the Alberta gas will partially replace United States coal. I suggest to the house that one of the weakest spots in the Canadian economy down through the years has been the fact that the heavily populated provinces of Ontario and Quebec have been largely dependent upon United States coal. I believe this bringing of Canadian natural gas into Ontario and Quebec will strengthen the nation as no other development in recent years has done.

But as the minister pointed out, and as is generally agreed by all members, the Toronto market for natural gas is essential to this development. If that market is taken by United States gas, other than for a year or two, I suggest such action may be fatal to the whole plan for an all-Canadian gas line policy. Hence the great importance of this bill, because it is this Niagara Gas Transmission Limited which is proposing to bring United States gas into the Toronto market.

I realize, of course, that Niagara Gas Transmission Limited is only a subsidiary of Consumers' Gas Company of Toronto, and of Tennessee Gas Transmission Company of the United States. The plan of this company will mean that United States gas will reach the Toronto market. In my view, at the same time there would be some benefit to an all-Canadian line, because such action would help to build up in the Toronto area a market for natural gas from the west. But as the minister has intimated, the house must try to prevent any action which will kill the trans-Canada plan.

I do not agree with him when he suggests that the responsibility rests entirely with the house. I believe there is a far heavier responsibility on the government because, after all, the government is in a position to make absolutely certain that nothing will be done by Niagara Gas Transmission Limited which will interfere with the all-Canadian plan. And, as in respect of other measures, the government cannot escape final responsibility.

It is worth while to take a look at the plan of Consumers' Gas Company of Toronto, as it is set out at page 2720 of Hansard by the hon. member for Parkdale, who is sponsoring the bill. He has stated that Consumers' Gas made contracts with suppliers of gas in the United States, and in addition made a contract with Tennessee Gas Transmission Company for the piping of that gas to the middle of the Niagara river. The hon. member will correct me if I am wrong in any of these statements. Apparently the contract is for a 20-year period, not just a year or two.

After obtaining that contract Consumers' Gas or Niagara Gas Transmission Limited, I am not sure which, went to the federal power commission of the United States and obtained permission for the export from that country of a certain quantity of natural gas on a 20-year basis. Again this was not on the basis of only a year or two. I believe this permission was obtained at prices set by the federal power commission, prices which were higher than those in the adjacent area of New York state.

Mr. Hunter: Not "set"; approved.

Mr. Green: All right; "approved". And now I believe there is an application before the federal power commission in the United States for an increase in that price. My information is that no decision has yet been reached.

The permission is for the Toronto area only. In other words it does not extend to Hamilton, Niagara Falls or St. Catharines; only the Toronto area. That is the only area, of course, in which Consumers' Gas has a franchise. And we must remember that any order made by the federal power commission is subject to further order, depending always upon demands in the United States. Down through the years their decisions have been to this effect, that where anyone residing in the United States can prove a need for gas being exported, such person shall have the right to obtain that gas, and in those circumstances exports to Canada can be cut down accordingly. I believe this has happened in respect of exports to western Ontario. In that area Canadians had the experience of having their gas supply reduced by order of the federal power commission, because some people in the United States were able to prove they needed extra gas.

Apparently, after obtaining this approval from the federal power commission, and because of the insistence that the plan of Consumers' Gas must fit into the all-Canadian plan, Consumers' Gas made a subsequent contract with the Tennessee company. This was referred to by the hon. member for Parkdale when he said, as reported at page 2720 of Hansard:

> However, a contract has now been made between Tennessee Gas Transmission Company and Consumers' Gas Company of Toronto whereby over the period of the twenty-year contract between Consumers' Gas and the United States suppliers, Tennessee Gas Transmission Company will purchase all or any of this gas at any time. This latter contract was made so that if—

And I draw attention to that word "if"

—Canadian natural gas is brought to Toronto the Consumers' Gas Company can—

And I draw attention to the word "can", and suggest it can be fairly interpreted as meaning "can, if they wish"— —purchase Canadian gas and dispose of the United States gas for which they have contracted, without any loss to Consumers' Gas.

On the next page the hon. member says:

—if and when Canadian natural gas becomes available—

[Mr. Green.]

So there is nothing binding upon Consumers' Gas or Niagara Gas Transmission Limited to take Alberta gas.

Mr. Hunter: There will be.

Mr. Green: That may be, but there is not at the present time. The result is that if this bill is passed, Consumers' Gas or Niagara Gas Transmission Limited can probably block an all-Canadian route. They have already tried to do that. I think the minister knows that last year Consumers' Gas published a number of advertisements about natural gas, some of which I have here from which I propose to quote. From the first I read this paragraph:

> The only logical and economical source of natural gas for Toronto is the United States. What always has been true of coal is also true of gas.

Then from another:

> It is the opinion of this company and of outside experts that the attempt to bring Alberta natural gas to Toronto is at present uneconomic and therefore not in the public interest.

And another:

> Tentative suggestions about natural gas from elsewhere, in the opinion of the company and of outside experts, are for such a high price that the gas could not be sold in sufficient quantity to justify the cost of the pipe line.

There is another which is quite touching, in that they base their argument on their desire to help British Columbia and Alberta. It says:

> To help Alberta
>
> Plan of Consumers' Gas to bring natural gas from the United States will help, not hurt Alberta's problem in selling its surplus natural gas and in developing it oil resources.
>
> Careful and expert study indicates that Ontario cannot get Alberta natural gas at prices likely to promote large sale. At the same time if import of Texas gas is prevented by government, it is highly probable that U.S. authorities would be disinclined to permit Alberta gas to enter the northwestern states, the most populous market nearest to Alberta.
> All authorities agree that the Vancouver market is not large enough to support a trans-mountain pipe line. So a decree preventing Consumers' Gas from getting United States gas can result in Vancouver not having any natural gas.

That was a pretty far-fetched argument but it does show the attitude of this company just a few months ago. However, on December 4, we had a statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I am reading from the Ottawa Journal, in which he had this to say:

> Mr. Howe said the government was undertaking to bring the two western pipe-line companies together to put through the one 30-inch trans-Canada main to central Canada.

By the way, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been successful in bringing about a shotgun marriage between Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and Western Pipe Lines. The dispatch goes on:

"The all-Canada line is going to be built, let's have everybody understand that", said Mr. Howe.

And further:

"If Consumer's gas can fit into the Canadian picture all right; if not, then no good", said Mr. Howe.

I find that a similar statement was made by the minister, as reported in the Vancouver Province, on January 5 of this year. The report says:

On the controversial subject of whether Consumers' Gas Company Toronto should be allowed to bring in United States gas before completion of the cross-Canada pipe line, Mr. Howe said the government still holds the view that Consumers' would have to fit into the over-all Canadian plans.

Mr. Howe said the Consumers' import plan has not been ruled out, but he expressed doubt about two points concerning the Toronto company's plans.

These are two points which should be kept in mind by hon. members:

1. He did not think it could bring gas into Canada more economically than western Canadian gas.

2. He was not sure of the economics of using the proposed Consumers' line to send Canadian gas southward once the cross-Canada line was built.

In any event, as a result of that stand taken by the minister Consumers' Gas Company now say they will take Alberta gas when it comes east, and will reverse the flow through their pipe lines to the United States.

Mr. Hunter: I do not think that at any time Consumers' Gas said they would reverse the flow of gas through their pipe lines to the United States. They simply said they would change from importing United States gas and take the Canadian gas.

Mr. Green: Yes; perhaps I did not put it as clearly as I should have. They say now that they will take Alberta gas. They want the United States gas for the first year or two; then when the Canadian gas comes through they will take it, and their pipe line can be used to pipe the Canadian gas down into the United States.

When the minister spoke in the house on this bill he made it very clear that he was unable to give a guarantee that that result would be brought about. For example, at page 2725 of Hansard he said:

However, this is a private member's bill asking for the incorporation of a company to build a pipe line.

Incidentally, I point out to the minister that they are not asking for incorporation. The company has already been incorporated under the Ontario company law. I continue:

No import permit is required to do so and if parliament passes this bill the government as such would have no control over the situation. It is true that the bill must go to the board of transport commissioners, which, as hon. members know, is a judicial board. I sincerely hope the board of transport commissioners will be seized with the long-range problem of bringing gas to Ontario and Quebec and will measure the effect of the application made under this bill with regard to the over-all results.

I would emphasize, however, that once this bill is passed the machinery operates as set out in the Pipe Lines Act, and no further federal government authority of any kind is required. If the board of transport commissioners should decide that no regard should be paid to the situation brought about by plans to bring gas from western Canada, the government would be powerless to intervene.

He said the same thing when he spoke on March 9, at page 2817 of Hansard, in opening his speech that evening:

Mr. Speaker, before I adjourned the debate when this measure was last before the house I pointed out that the government is unable to give the guarantee sought by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) that the interests of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines will be protected. I pointed out that this measure is a private member's bill. The bill will be examined in the appropriate committee. It will then be returned here for third reading, and after the bill becomes law, all the decisions having to do with the project covered by this bill as well as the project covered by the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines bill will be in the hands of the board of transport commissioners, whose decision will be final.

Then he suggested, as reported at page 2818 of Hansard, that as a remedy there should be what he called a "coming into force" clause which, if I understood him correctly, meant that this private act should not come into force until an agreement between Consumers' Gas and Niagara Gas Transmission Limited, or both, and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited had been duly executed and deposited with and approved by the board of transport commissioners. Obviously the minister was, and I presume still is, uncertain about the effectiveness of that proposal. I think the objective he had was to see that the trans-Canada line was not interfered with, but he is not yet sure of the best method of realizing that intention. He said:

That is only my suggestion; there may be others.

I propose to make one or two suggestions as to what could be done to bring about the result which is desired by the minister and myself, and I think by nearly everyone in this house.

On motion of Mr. Green the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind hon. members that at eight o'clock we shall resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

360. Departmental administration, $821,732.

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to make some comments on this item. During the years I have been in this house I have found the public works estimates to be somewhat unique. The predecessor of the present minister, of whom we were all very fond, seemed a creature so far remote from bricks, mortar and such things that one really felt the public works estimates were more in the realm of poetry and romance. So this afternoon when the minister told us he had nothing to say I began to fear that we were again going to be in that delightful world where we were treated with the greatest courtesy but where we found at the end that we had got very little information. I have never quite understood how the minister was able to carry us along so gently and deposit us at the end of the course not much wiser than we were before.

Certain tributes have been paid to the new minister today which interested me a good deal. I would not say for a moment that they were not fully justified, but I think we must be careful that we do not allow the new minister to deal with us in the same way as his predecessor. We have had the minister pictured to us this afternoon in baseball terms as being a man who catches everything, and then there was also a suggestion about delivery. I noticed that while the hon. member for Fort William paid a high tribute to the minister, which I am quite sure was genuine and might have been taken to be disinterested, he did murmur something about a breakwater and other more mundane things which I think he hoped the minister would also be interested in.

There was one thing the hon. member for Fort William said which interested me a good deal. He spoke about the great advantage of not having too much weight, and I mean physical weight. He seemed to think that was an advantage, and indeed I would like very much to agree with him and hope he is right.

When the minister was speaking to us I was interested in some of the phrases he used, and which I took down carefully. I gather that the department he now heads is being "re-established as the government's agency in the field of public works." The word "re-established" of course raises certain thoughts in one's mind. One wonders what the Department of Public Works had been doing these last several years, but at any rate it is nice to think it is being re-established. It is also nice to think that the Department of Transport is considering—only "considering"—transferring some of the construction it carries on to public works. At any rate that is a beginning, and one hopes the minister will be able to continue it and that some day the Department of Public Works will really be the agency of the government in the field of public works, which some of us were naive to believe it always should have been.

I want to make one or two general remarks about the estimates, because after all these are part of the total estimates which we have had put before us. It is with regard to those total estimates that I want to make some observations at the outset. I want to point out a fact which everybody knows, that government expenditures have gone up. The only reason for this that I can imagine is that the government really does not believe the people are much worried about expenditures. Indeed, I have heard it put much more strongly than that, that the ordinary taxpayer likes to have lots of money spent and that you do not win elections by economy. Indeed, I heard a man say the other day that no election had even been won by economy or by an argument for economy. I do not like to believe that, but I quote it as the opinion of a man who has had some experience with elections. He expressed that with great vehemence.

Having said that; having said that I think the government must hold that view when it brings us estimates so much larger than they have been except in the realm of defence, I am going to make reference to two or three expressions which I hope represent public opinion more accurately than this attitude which, rightly or wrongly, I have attributed to the government. I have here the Edmonton Journal of February 8, which contains an article entitled "Where's the Economy Axe?" I read briefly from it as follows:

> Hopes for any federal tax reduction in the 1954-55 fiscal year have faded with the publication of the estimates Friday. The government is apparently committed to the highest program of spending in Canada's peacetime history—a total of $4,491,751,000. We are left also with the unpleasant thought that, with supplementary estimates, the eventual total may be much larger, perhaps up to the highest level of the war years.

Then I read further from the same editorial.

Mr. Winters: May I rise on a point of order and ask you, Mr. Chairman, whether it is in order to discuss the whole field of the estimates on vote 360, which is the administration vote of the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Macdonnell: I was a little afraid the minister might raise some question of that kind. However, I submit that this is the first item, on which we always have liberty to range pretty far.

Mr. Winters: Related to the department.

Mr. Macdonnell: The departmental expenditures are part of all expenditures, and I submit that in surveying the expenditures of the Department of Public Works we are entitled to survey them against the background of the total expenditures. I quite realize that it would not be proper for me to start going into details of the Department of National Defence in remarks on public works, but I do submit that it is perfectly proper to bring to the attention of the minister, who I am sure would like to keep down his estimates to the lowest point and who needs every assistance to that end, what I intend to say. I feel confident that it is relevant to bring to his attention some remarks which have been made about his estimates along with all other estimates.

Mr. Winters: As long as it is this department's estimates.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister will appreciate that I am putting it in that way; the estimate is included in the total figure, and I am referring to that. I would hope, Mr. Chairman, that you will take another view; otherwise you will miss a good deal of a very interesting speech.

The Chairman: After all, we are discussing item 360, which is the administration or first item of the Department of Public Works. The minister has raised a point of order which perhaps I should deal with at this time. As hon. members know, the usual practice has been to allow a very general discussion on the first item of the department, but at the same time speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I do not want to prevent the hon. member for Greenwood laying a proper basis for his argument or discussion on item 360, but at the same time I hope he will co-operate with the Chair in confining his remarks as closely as possible to the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am very glad you used the phrase "laying a proper basis", Mr. Chairman, because that puts better than I could what I have in mind. What I am attempting to do is draw attention to the broad situation we find in relation to the figures of the Department of Public Works, and what I said was by way of laying a foundation. I want to read quite briefly from a statement by this independent newspaper which in no way supports our views. He states:

> Our government's indifference to economy is all the more unfortunate because the general economic outlook in 1954 is more uncertain than it has been for several years.

I shall not read all of it, Mr. Chairman, because I wish to defer to your ruling, but I would like to read briefly from an editorial in the Financial Post which has this to say:

> . . . if the defence department estimates are lower, why shouldn't total spending also be lower?

That of course is relevant to the Department of Public Works, because it is one of the departments which has higher expenditures. The quotation continues:

> Isn't the high cost of defence the principal reason for high taxes?

Then the Post goes on to give a very interesting illustration. It states:

> It's exactly like the housewife who, having saved seven dollars on the family's groceries, turns around and spends nine dollars on a hat she does not need or cannot afford.

That is a very good illustration of the kind of thing we are talking about. I now want to refer to a well known Liberal paper in western Canada, the Leader-Post, from which I shall read very briefly. Under the heading of "Ottawa Spending Spree Continues"—

Mr. Winters: Does that refer to the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Macdonnell: It refers to the Department of Public Works as included among those spending departments, and it refers to total expenditure. I want it to be clearly understood—

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps the hon. member misunderstood me. I requested his co-operation. I can, of course, go further and declare this general discussion out of order.

Mr. Macdonnell: I must defer again to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I now come to a situation which I believe will be more strictly in order because it deals specifically with an important matter in relation to the Department of Public Works. I wish to refer later on to the substantial additions to the staff of the Department of Public Works, and there are several questions I would like to put to the minister. However, by way of laying a foundation for that, Mr. Chairman,

I would like to quote briefly from the Winnipeg Free Press which points out the different situation which we have in the government service when compared with crown corporations. In one case the staff has been increased and in the other there has been a decrease. This is the quotation from the Winnipeg Free Press dated March 5, 1954:

> Federal government figures, just published for November, 1953, by the dominion bureau of statistics, illustrate the difference in employee and money management of government departments compared to some crown corporations.

That includes the Department of Public Works. The quotation continues:

> In the current downward business "readjustment" in Canada, government departments indicate little or no intention to cut their staffs and wage and salary costs. On the other hand, crown corporations, such as the Canadian National Railways, compelled by competition with private enterprise of another railway, trucks and aircraft, markedly reduced expenditures between October and November, 1953.

Continuing the same argument with reference to the Department of Public Works, the same editorial continues:

> Employees of government departments increased in numbers by 10,273 between November, 1952 and October, 1953—from 161,846 employees to 172,119. Their wage and salary bills rose in the same period by over $3,000,000—from $36,495,543 to $39,520,152. Between October and November, 1953, when the "readjustment" became noticeable, there was a slight decrease of—

The Chairman: Order. I must ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks to a general discussion of the Department of Public Works. Surely he is not suggesting that the Canadian National Railways come under the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Macdonnell: No, Mr. Chairman. I agree with you, and I was simply pointing out the comparison between government departments where the number employed is going up, and crown corporations where the number employed is going down. I submit that since I am leading up to questions regarding the increase in staff, it was quite proper to illustrate the condition which exists in relation to which I wish to ask the minister some questions. In any event I had almost completed the quotation.

> The government crown corporations showed a different record. Their employees had also increased by 10,553 between November, 1952 and October, 1953—

The Chairman: Order. I really cannot allow the hon. member to transgress the rules of the house. I am in the hands of the committee, but I cannot allow him to deal with questions which are not strictly relevant to item 360.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Macdonnell: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I thought you were conceding the relevancy of what I was doing, but I certainly shall not attempt to disregard your ruling in any way.

You have rather cramped my style, Mr. Chairman, but I shall now come to the questions I wish to ask the minister. I shall attempt to be strictly relevant from now on. The minister told us this afternoon in a very interesting fashion of certain changes in method which had been followed. I would like to recall, though, that in the department he previously headed the minister had occasion to call in expert assistance. That is one of the things I wish to ask him about. But first of all I wish to draw attention to some of the increases in staff. On page 431 of the estimates under "Department Administration" it is noted that staff increased from 203 to 228, and agricultural branch employees increased from 128 to 158. I need not read the other details. That is the point I wished to underline, Mr. Chairman, and it is unfortunate that you felt I was out of order in my method of doing so because there are some very interesting figures which I did wish to draw to the attention of the minister, and which I believe he would have liked to hear about.

Mr. Low: Let us have them.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am not going to run the risk of incurring your displeasure again, Mr. Chairman, but I would like to put it to the minister in this fashion. As the Acting Prime Minister has said, we are in a rather unusual business situation, and we are not quite certain how things will develop. Some of these newspaper quotations I was not allowed to read indicated that they also thought this was the time for economy on the part of the government.

It will be recalled that the Department of Public Works estimates, if my memory serves me right, are up by some $7 million. It will be seen that one of the chief expenses is salaries, which bulk very large in the department's expenditures. The minister has come in as what might be termed the head of a large new business which he has taken over. He finds that his staff is increasing substantially. I want to ask the minister this. What steps has he taken to scrutinize that position? I suggest to him—and I think he will agree because he, like myself, is a reformed businessman—that in a business, if a general manager comes along with a substantial increase in staff, he will be cross-examined by his directors as to what these are for and as to whether he has done everything possible to keep the number down. I suggest to the minister that this theoretical general manager I am talking about will have to prepare himself for a strict cross-examination as to why his staff is up in number, as I have already indicated.

I want to ask the minister just what steps he has taken. Has he obtained any outside assistance? Has he had any efficiency experts? Or has he just said to himself, "Oh, this is my first year; we will just let things ride along as they are. Then I will have a look at it and I may be able to satisfy myself as time goes on"? Those are the first questions that came to my mind as I read the estimates. Those are the first things that stuck in my mind for answering.

I say again, do we apply one test in private business and an entirely different test in public business? I repeat that I think any executive head of a corporation—especially if times were not too good—who brought in a substantial increase to his staff would be under the strictest cross-examination. I should like to ask the minister if he would just tell us what steps he took before he presented to us these figures which call for substantial additional salary payments.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I just want to speak for a few minutes in this interesting debate. I might say that I enjoyed listening to the discussion this afternoon, because we all look at public works rather from our own experience within our own ridings. I enjoyed the careful analysis of the Department of Public Works administration given by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

I was also interested in the information given to the house by the minister. I think it indicates that we are going to have some improvement in the administration of the Department of Public Works. The minister is a competent engineer, and with his qualifications and experience I think he is well suited to head this department assisted by his deputy, who has had a wide experience in military and civilian life. I join with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and other members who have expressed their respect for and appreciation of the qualifications and ability of the minister and deputy minister. I sincerely trust that this combination will cure the administrative constipation from which the department has suffered since about 1945.

I have always had a soft spot in my heart for the Department of Public Works. I have known a good many of the officials in British Columbia over a period of 45 years, and the local officials constantly throughout that period. I want to say this. While the work of the senior officials is what comes to the attention of the House of Commons and the public in general, it is the good work of the hundreds of minor officials in the constituencies that also enables the department to do the work it has done.

I want to refer to two in my own constituency. The first is the clerk of works since shortly after the first world war, Mr. Douglas Male. He happened to be a comrade of mine in A company of the 54th Kootenay battalion. We were wounded on the same day. A lot of good men were knocked out that day. I want to commend the interest he has taken in his work and the effort he has made to satisfy the requirements of the service and yet be courteous to the people, and to meet a lot of unusual circumstances which arise in a constituency and which I am quite sure many of the senior officials know little about.

The other one is Mr. Lomax, whom the hon. member for Skeena knows quite well. He is one of those highly respected Englishmen who never become well off, and throughout the years has acted as inspector of wharves, buildings and various projects. It is the integrity of people like these which has made it possible for the department to do the good work it has done in Kootenay West. He would not allow a contractor to get away with not putting a lock washer on a wharf, or to miss a spike, to put in some poor lumber, or to fail to drive a pile to its required depth.

To do that sort of thing a man has to have some strength of character. He often runs up against people who think that because they have certain political affiliations, certain things can be skipped or overlooked. But here is a man I have known for many years —he retired just recently—and who served the department and the public very well. I mention this matter because the efficiency of the department is to a great extent based on the loyalty and integrity of the junior officials and employees throughout the constituencies. I wish to pay a tribute to the work of these people, who work without recognition.

I recall two or three occasions, because my ranch was adjacent to certain wharves that were being built, where the department took pity on me and realized that I was in a mighty poverty-stricken condition. As a result on a few occasions I was called upon to relieve the supervising inspector when he had to leave a job because of sickness; and on some occasions I met contractors who thought that political affiliations should influence the depth to which a pile was driven, and things of that sort, or just how work should be done. I want to pay tribute to the district engineers we have had in British Columbia. On all occasions, on which a stand has had to be taken against attempted political influence—and I am not suggesting it was official; there is often some selfish person who thinks he has political influence and who wants something improper done on the strength of his political affiliations—I always found the engineers in British Columbia stood solidly against that sort of thing. I think that is a matter of great credit to them, because it is easy to give in to local pressure and permit a little bit of unfairness and scrimping in order to remain popular with some local people. I mention this question because I have had that experience and I think it should be mentioned to indicate the quality of the department's officials.

I was pleased with what the minister had to say with regard to certain reorganization in the department. I have often suggested—and I am speaking with at least some knowledge of the administration of the department in the constituencies—that the public works department was too centralized in its administration. I think the minister will recall that year after year I have suggested that we should have more regional and district administration for the efficient operation of the department. I have often said that, because of local conditions, the local officials should be allowed more latitude to make decisions and meet local conditions. As I say, I have personal knowledge of this matter. I know of several projects that were unnecessarily delayed because certain decisions had to be referred to Ottawa, to the engineering branch, the architectural branch or the legal branch. I believe there should be a regional or district administration of the department, and that the administration should be more decentralized.

I want to illustrate my contention in this respect, and I shall give three or four instances. I know in the last four or five years of the failure of a contractor who had signed a contract to deliver certain lumber and timbers for the building of a wharf. I am now speaking of the Beaton wharf. The failure of the contractor to deliver the lumber in the quantity the local officials required meant that the matter had to be referred to Ottawa, and a new tender called for the delivery of this lumber. The reason for the failure of the contractor to deliver it was that lumber had gone up $10 per thousand after his tender had been accepted. Here we had the public works crew, the piledrivers and other equipment waiting for weeks and weeks, which meant lost time and extra expense. All this occurred because the district officers did not have the power to act in a situation like that. It meant delay and it meant unnecessary expense in the building of that wharf because the district engineer and his officials were not empowered to meet this unforeseen situation. They should have been empowered to immediately purchase lumber at some other point and carry on with the job, rather than have the piledrivers and a crew of men tied up for several weeks while a decision was awaited from Ottawa.

I recall several occasions when the construction of wharves was delayed for months and months because it was necessary for the administration to call for tenders for float logs under wharves. They are difficult to obtain because they are large diameter cedar logs and scarce. Particularly since the war, the lumber operators have not been particularly keen to tender for these logs. The department seems to try to secure a bid for the total number of float logs for the whole wharf, which is almost impossible. The local officials know the small operators, and if a contract called for 200 logs for a wharf they could get 50 from this man and 50 from that man, provided there was authority within the district office of British Columbia to meet a situation like that. This would overcome the delays that have frequently occurred in the past, and on some occasions would have lessened the cost.

Then there is another thing I want to mention. I understand that the department calls for tenders for the construction of wharves, rip-rap, mattress work and works of that sort. Naturally the lowest tenderer is usually given the contract. It often happens that the local officials know that the lowest tenderer has not the capacity or the financial ability or the experience to properly do the job. I know of one wharf that was built in my riding less than three years ago in which the department ran into that situation. In fact I do not think the situation is cleared up yet.

I know of half a dozen men who have lost anywhere from $300 up to $2,000 through supplying goods to these contractors. I feel that in such cases it might be better to let the tender to someone at a higher figure and make sure the work can be completed satisfactorily. In these cases the advice and knowledge of the district officials should be given some consideration, because sometimes the lowest tender does not always mean the job is completed at the lowest cost.

Before I conclude there is one other matter I should like to mention. On one occasion I had to write to the chief architect about holidays for the janitor of the federal building in the city of Nelson. A comparison arose between the holidays of the janitor in Nelson those of the janitor of the federal building in Trail. Naturally these people get together and sometimes they think they are not getting identical treatment, from their point of view.

I was amazed that the matter had to be referred to the chief architect in Ottawa. I feel that the chief architect is too valuable a man to be looking after janitors' hours, cleaners' hours, and things of that sort. I presume the situation is going to be corrected. If I correctly understood what the minister said this afternoon, a division of property maintenance is to be established, and I presume that division will be in charge of janitors, cleaners, and details of that sort. I think that is a necessary improvement in administration.

I believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra gave certain figures which indicated that only about 55 per cent of the total money voted for public works in British Columbia last year was spent. That is clear evidence that the department's administration has been pretty well bogged down. There is no question about that from the evidence. I know there have been a number of revotes in Kootenay West. In fact for three years there was a revote for a wharf at Waneta, which is only a small dock and quite easy to construct. Then we have had delays with the construction of the proposed federal buildings in Nelson and Trail. I shall have more to say on this question at the proper point; I am not going to be out of order now. I do say it indicates that the administration of the department has been slowing down. I believe that condition is general since the war. I know the department has been under tremendous pressure, and I am not criticizing the officials. I blame it on centralization.

I was glad to read in the Ottawa Citizen of February 6 a statement, apparently by one of the senior officials, that this year the government was going to start all projects provided for in the estimates. When the minister replied to the member for Vancouver-Quadra I believe he said something similar, that only those projects were placed in the estimates that the department felt fairly certain of carrying on with this year. I think that is a sound policy, because otherwise you are just fooling the people by putting through estimates year after year and not proceeding with the work.

In conclusion I do urge consideration of my suggestion which I have mentioned for three or four sessions, that there should be a decentralization of the administration of the Department of Public Works. There should be a greater use of the regional or district offices than there is today, and the local officials should be given the opportunity of meeting unforeseen circumstances of which many senior officials at Ottawa are unaware. I do hope the minister will give consideration to the suggestions I have made, and before the debate concludes I should like to get the minister's opinion regarding them.

Mr. Stick: I hope you will not call me out of order, Mr. Chairman, because I have to lay a basis for some of the remarks I am about to make. I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member for Greenwood refer to the free spending by the government. In my personal experience, so far as the Department of Public Works is concerned, it is like trying to draw their eyeteeth to get anything out of them. I have not seen any evidence of free spending in my riding, and certainly not in my province.

Be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, there are one or two things I should like to draw to the attention of the minister. As you know, four years ago we joined with Canada and certain terms of union were negotiated at that time in good faith on both sides. Some of us feel that it is about time some of these terms were put into effect. Our people are under the impression that the federal government is rather dilatory in carrying out its duties in that regard. Under the terms of union, section 33, paragraph (d), public harbours, wharves, breakwaters, and aids to navigation came under federal jurisdiction.

Section 36 reads as follows:

> Without prejudice to the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada under the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, any works, property, or services taken over by Canada pursuant to these terms shall thereupon be subject to the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada.

Then on page 35 of the terms of union, under the heading "public harbours"—I think that is public works—we find the following:

> It is the policy of the Canadian government to construct and maintain public wharves where and when such action is considered necessary in the public interest. The construction and maintenance of public wharves throughout Canada is within the jurisdiction of the Canadian government and the responsibility for deciding whether or not a public wharf or a breakwater is necessary in any given locality rests with the federal authorities, who take local requirements into consideration.
>
> The Canadian government will, at the request of the province of Newfoundland, and having regard to the best interests of the province, investigate the desirability of establishing one or more harbours in the province as "national harbours" under the national harbours board.

Mr. Chairman, to date there is no sign of establishing any national harbour in Newfoundland; neither do I know of any survey which has taken place there or that is about to take place in connection with this matter.

In this debate reference has been made to revotes, and I know that revotes have taken place so far as Newfoundland is concerned. The hon. member for Greenwood was concerned about the extra staff required. Well, I can say right here and now that the staff we have in Newfoundland is not sufficient to carry out the work, and I think the minister knows it. I want to bring it to his attention again. I do not want to have revotes come before parliament year after year, with nothing done about it. We need in Newfoundland more public servants, and it is the impression of the people in that province that our public services should be brought up at least to the standard of those in the maritime provinces. That is not in the terms of union, but it was understood when the exchange of conversations took place. We are far from that, very far from it.

An hon. Member: A low standard.

Mr. Stick: A very low standard, too low for us. We want to see it improved.

Mr. Winters: Who said it was a low standard?

Mr. Stick: One of my friends to my left. We want to see our services improved, and we want to live within the terms of union. We would like to see a greater effort being made to carry out those terms of union. The Minister of Public Works, or whoever might hold that portfolio, has to listen to many complaints. But I think the complaints I am making, or the remarks I have been addressing to the committee, are quite justified in the light of circumstances which have developed within the last four years.

The minister paid us a short visit last fall and received a royal welcome. May I say to him, or to his staff, that he should make an extended visit to Newfoundland this summer so he could study the whole public works situation down there. I think he will find that some of the remarks I make tonight will be substantiated. If he were to come we would feel that we are not being neglected, and that an effort is being made to bring our public works at least up to the standard of those in the maritime provinces. If this happens, then under the terms of union our people will feel that they are getting somewhere at last. We are not ungrateful for what has been done, but we feel more should be done. We feel, too, that we are justified in asking for it, under the terms of union.

I do hope the minister will take these remarks into consideration. They are offered in good spirit, in the hope that the situation in the city of St. John's and other places, so far as federal government agencies are concerned, will be rectified and that we will get the services we desire and which some of us think we deserve.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon the minister, in commenting on the speech of the hon. member for Red Deer—

The Chairman: Do I understand that the hon. member for Kootenay East is rising on a point of order?

Mr. Byrne: Yes. It appears to me that with the Liberal party, the government party, having a majority in the house, if the practice is followed of allowing three speakers from that side of the house before one is allowed from this side, the situation becomes very difficult.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Harkness: I had better start over again so my remarks will be intelligible. This afternoon, commenting on the speech of the hon. member for Red Deer, the minister assured him that there had been no discrimination in the matter of erecting public buildings throughout the country generally, and particularly in Alberta. Unfortunately the figures showing the number of buildings erected out there hardly bear out the minister's contention.

I took the trouble to jot down the amount of money appropriated in the estimates for the past nine years so far as the cities of Calgary and Edmonton are concerned. I find that from 1947 to the present date the amount allocated for public buildings in the city of Calgary is $699,500 while the amount for the city of Edmonton is $6,485,000, a proportion of about ten to one.

Mr. Prudham: A bigger city.

Mr. Harkness: However, that does not by any means tell the whole story, because you have to subtract from the amount of the estimates the amount of the revotes, and those have been very considerable. We have heard a good deal about them. So far as Calgary is concerned revotes amounted to $316,500, while for Edmonton they amounted to $2,218,000. If you subtract those figures from the amount of the original estimates you find that for Calgary the amount provided was $383,000 while for Edmonton it was $4,267,000.

An hon. Member: Your story.

Mr. Harkness: Somebody says that is just my story. Well, if you don't believe it, all you have to do is take the book of estimates, which I did this afternoon, and jot down the figures, then add them up.

But that is not the whole story, because the total of $383,000 includes the $150,000 in this year's estimates. None of that has been spent up to this time. Then there is a further $100,000 which appeared just before the election in 1949, but which was dropped immediately afterward. So that the total amount spent in Calgary comes to $133,000. That is the total amount for public buildings in that city in the last nine years. I do not know the total amount spent in Edmonton, but from the fact that these sums were being revoted, showing that work was being done, I would judge that most of the amount voted for Edmonton has been actually spent.

These two cities are comparable in size, Edmonton having about 40,000 more population than Calgary. On the other hand Calgary pays considerably more in taxes than Edmonton, and its bank clearances are much higher. In other words a great deal more business is done in Calgary, and probably for that reason there is more need for government offices, particularly income tax offices and the like, which we would be very pleased to get rid of.

Nevertheless, as I have pointed out $133,000 is all that has been spent on public buildings in Calgary in the last nine years, while during the same period of time about $4 million was spent in Edmonton. This, of course, is subject to whatever deductions there may be for some of the items which were not spent. It is clear, however, that no comparison can be made between the amounts spent in these two cities.

Like the hon. member for Red Deer, I have been loath to think that the political complexion of any constituency would cause any difference in the amount of public building that might be carried on. However, the figures I have just placed before the committee indicate that there is something very smelly behind some woodshed, so far as federal buildings in Alberta are concerned. There has not been a fair distribution. The suspicions that I, in company with other people in Calgary, have had in connection with the erection of public buildings, and the possibility of political influence, were not at all allayed by the fact that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys came down to Calgary before the election and intimated to the people of that city that it would be very much in their own interests to elect Liberal members from Calgary, if they expected to get in on the pork barrel.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I at no time made such a statement in Calgary or anywhere else.

Mr. Harkness: Of course—

Mr. Dickey: Were you at the meeting?

Mr. Harkness: —I am not quoting the exact words of the minister, but that was the gist of what he had to say. Naturally he did not go out and say to the people of Calgary, "If you want to get in on the pork barrel, vote Liberal"; but his remarks meant that, and as a matter of fact—

Mr. Prudham: Were you there?

Mr. Harkness: —they resulted in two or three editorials being written, as I recall, in both Calgary papers, although one of them is Liberal, upbraiding the minister for trying to bribe the people of Calgary in this manner with their own money. I may say that this statement of the minister in Calgary in regard to this matter probably contributed materially to my returning here at this time.

Mr. Dickey: Why complain about it, then?

Mr. Harkness: I complain about it because the thing is morally wrong.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Brooks: You would not understand that.

Mr. Harkness: The very mention of morality causes the Minister of Fisheries to break into loud roars of laughter.

Mr. Dickey: He looks at the source.

Mr. Harkness: His attitude in regard to politics apparently does not take morality into consideration from the word "go". However, a certain number of people in this country both in and out of politics think it is important.

Now, in addition to the fact that this sort of thing is wrong from that point of view, it is also completely unfair. It is unfair as far as the unemployment picture is concerned; it is unfair to the departments of the government which have not adequate or proper space to work in. In 1948 there was an estimate of $100,000 in the public works estimates to make a start on putting up a Department of Veterans Affairs building in Calgary. After the election of 1949, that estimate, having been there for two years, was dropped, or it disappeared, and nothing was ever done about putting up the building. The building has not yet been put up, and the Department of Veterans Affairs offices in Calgary are in three separate buildings. They are scattered about the city, which makes it extremely difficult for them to carry on business, and extremely awkward for people who have business to do with them, trotting from one building to another to see Department of Veterans Affairs officials. Nothing was done in regard to the matter after that election.

There is another vote of $150,000 which came up last year, and I see there is a revote of $150,000 this year. I am hoping the same thing will not happen to that $150,000 that happened to the $100,000 which was put in before the 1949 election; in other words, that after this year it will not be quietly dropped and we shall hear no more about it.

Mr. Rowe: Until before another election.

Mr. Harkness: Of course the minister is not responsible for what has gone on over the past nine years, but the government to which he belongs are responsible. They are the people who have been guilty of the discrimination which has taken place out there in regard to the erection of the building; they are the people who are guilty of not putting up this Department of Veterans Affairs building, and as a result inflicting inconvenience on the residents of Calgary and the people of all southern Alberta for many years.

The same thing applies to other government offices. A large number of them in the city of Calgary are scattered about in very inappropriate places, and nothing is ever done about erecting another building. The only building erected there in recent years was between the two elections, and that was a $20,000 weights and measures building, a little bit of a thing. That is all right in its own way, but that is all that has been erected there while those millions were being put into the constituency of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Prudham: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Prudham: Can the hon. gentleman tell me where that money has been spent in the city of Edmonton?

Mr. Knowles: That is what we would like to know.

Mr. Harkness: If the minister does not know where the money has been spent I do not know why he should ask me, because I do not live in Edmonton. All I know is that it was voted and apparently it has been spent there, from what one can make out, on these various projects. One would need to go over the estimates, because there was a revote of a certain proportion of the original vote in the next year, which indicated that part of the work was done and a certain amount more was needed to complete it.

Mr. Prudham: All we have is a hole for our public building.

Mr. Harkness: Well, then, it is one of the most expensive holes in history, I would say.

Mr. Dickey: Next joke, please.

Mr. Harkness: It has had the sum of $4 million poured into it.

Mr. Rowe: They will leave the hole for another election.

Mr. Harkness: They must be trying to dig a hole to sink the city of Edmonton in. In any event, I join with several other hon. members who have spoken in the hope that things will be better in the Department of Public Works from now on. I trust the present minister will go ahead with this particular vote I have mentioned, and also that in deciding where future buildings are to be erected in the province of Alberta he will decide on the basis of the needs of the people there rather than, as apparently has been the case in the past, on the political complexion of the constituencies in the province.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I have three reasons for taking the floor at this time. My first reason is to express on behalf of the people I represent, as well as on my own behalf, our thanks to the minister and his staff for the public works that have been carried out in our province and in my own riding in particular in the past four years.

In this connection I should like to express my own personal appreciation of the sympathetic appreciation and co-operation which I have always received from his officials here in Ottawa, and particularly from his district architect, district engineer and their staffs at St. John's. These people in Newfoundland, as my colleague the hon. member for Trinity-Conception pointed out, are working under very great difficulties, under conditions that do not obtain elsewhere on the mainland, and very often they are working with insufficient staff. I am sure the minister is aware of these difficulties and that everything possible will be done to alleviate them.

My second reason arises out of some remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra earlier this afternoon. My hon. friend drew attention to the small proportion of the vote for Newfoundland that had been spent by the architectural branch, and he suggested that it looked as though some padding had been done in that vote for electioneering purposes. I can assure my hon. friend that such is not the case. If my hon. friend will look at page 439 of the estimates he will see that out of the 11 items listed under the architect's branch in Newfoundland, seven are revotes. Two of these are in my own riding, and I can assure my hon. friend that one of these revotes is necessary because some unexpected difficulties were encountered in the selection of a suitable site. The other revote was necessary because the plans for the building had not been completed in time to get the work started before winter conditions set in.

We cannot do very much with respect to choosing sites, but the bottleneck with respect to the drawing of plans is the result of the policy of the department of having all those plans drawn here in the head office at Ottawa. This bottleneck could be overcome if the district engineers were permitted to initiate plans and submit them for approval, and then go on and complete them in their own local offices. If this were done I know it would greatly expedite the completion of many of the public works which otherwise have to be carried over. I strongly recommend that for the minister's consideration.

I next would like to draw the attention of the minister to the need for more dredging equipment in Newfoundland. We have only one small dredge which is unsuitable for many of the dredging operations, and which cannot possibly cope with all those for which it is suitable. We really need a second larger and more powerful dredge, as well as some drag-line equipment for small harbours which the dredge cannot enter. I hope the minister will give consideration to these needs as soon as he can find it convenient to do so.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I rise to follow the general argument which was presented this afternoon by my colleague the hon. member for Red Deer, because the particular projects which he brought to the attention of the minister as not being in this year's estimates are located partially in my constituency. We are greatly incensed over the fact that these particular projects were in last year's estimates and now, a year later, have disappeared. The minister gave as a reason for this that he did not feel it was right to place items in the estimates which they were not prepared to proceed with, and then went on to inform us in his amiable way that because they did not appear in the present estimates did not mean that they had been abandoned.

That sounds nice; that sounds lovely, to be told they have not been abandoned, but when they do not appear you can hardly tell people they have not been abandoned. That phrase can mean anything. We might ask if they are going to be gone ahead with and be told that they have not been abandoned, they may be in there next year or they may be in there five years from now. We are told that they have not been abandoned, and they may be in there 50 years from now or 100 years from now. To be told they have not been abandoned just does not mean anything. What it does mean is that it has been abandoned for this year, and that is what we do not like.

I can understand the desire of the minister to cut out a lot of deadwood from the estimates and not have items there just for the sake of putting them in. However, I would like to ask if there are any projects in the estimates this year which were not approved last year. Are there any public works to be erected in Alberta this year, which are in the estimates this year, which are new items and which were not previously approved? If so, then I think there is something wrong somewhere. I contend that the department is duty-bound to go ahead with projects which this parliament has approved before they enter upon any new projects. If they are going to do that we are just not going to know where we stand at all in respect to these things.

The hon. member for Red Deer pointed out that in last year's estimates there was a group of projects with which the minister was going forward to the extent of acquiring sites if money was available after the other work had been done.

I bring to the minister's attention one particular project in that group, the public building for the town of Claresholm. I met with representatives of the service clubs, the board of trade, the mayor and other responsible citizens, who called me by telephone and asked me to come and look over the situation. They said, "Mr. Hansell, as far as the site is concerned, we have one already". They showed me an admirable site, a corner lot on one of the main streets just a stone's throw from the busiest section of the town. There could not be a better site. They said, "We are prepared to give this to the federal government so they can get started". They offered it to the government, and the last I heard from the minister the papers were being drawn up by the legal branch and the government was taking over the site.

That was real progress, but what is the position now? The position is that the town has handed over a beautiful site to the dominion government, and there is nothing in the estimates to show that they are going forward with the building. They are put back a year, and this government has the property. That is the situation now.

I think the minister should answer that question. While he is thinking about the answer to that I am going to ask him another one. I would like to know if he can give to this house, particularly for the benefit of some of the newer members, particulars of the procedure followed by the government in arriving at projects which they seem to think should have priority. I understand that in the case of public buildings which, generally speaking, involve the housing of post offices, the R.C.M.P. and other governmental agencies, the Post Office Department will submit a number of requests which are then blocked off into groups according to their importance, group A, group B, group C and so on. If that is not right, the minister can tell me.

If there is a priority list of that kind I should like to know if that list remains unchanged or do they say something like this. "Here is one item in group A. We will have to put that back in group B and take something from group C and put it up at the top." Does that ever happen? I cannot see that the situation would change so quickly as to cause that to happen, because these various communities are not changing as rapidly as that.

It seems to me that if there is a priority list, that list should not change very much. It might vary slightly, but not too much. Therefore if there is something in the estimates one year it is reasonable to suppose that if they do not go forward with it that year it will reappear the next year, because it would be that much further on toward the top of the list. I should like the minister to answer those questions for me.

I am not going to say too much about the political significance of these things. I think the government has acted pretty fairly with me and with my constituents except in the case of the group of projects we are now bringing to the minister's attention. They constitute a sore spot. What happened is simply this. They appeared in the estimates, they were approved by parliament, the community said they had a site which they would give to the government. Then there was an election. I am not going to say what happened, but they returned a Social Credit member and the following year the project was missing from the estimates.

That does not look good. We cannot very well go back to our constituents and say, "We hope you get it the year before the next election." That presents a rather embarrassing situation for some of us, and I do not think it can do anyone any good. In addition it is embarrassing for the government, though I cannot say the government has been unfair as regards my own constituency. Even this year Edmonton received $2 million, which is quite a chunk out of the total of $3,600,000 which goes to Alberta as a whole. The remainder of that money has to be divided up among the other constituencies, and it is obvious my constituency gets a fair share, so I have no complaints to make.

I do not know anything about what the hon. member for Edmonton West did in the last election. I did not follow him around or listen to all he said. I had something else to do. My leader points out that I could not stand it in any case. Nevertheless, in a general election campaign we know something of what is said, because people are going around the different political meetings. I do know for a fact that my opponent said, 'The reason you have not got a public building in this community"—this does not apply to Claresholm but it does apply to two or three other places—"is because you have not been voting Liberal." That was said, but it did not go down with the people. They do not swallow that sort of thing, because it will be noted that I am here and the poor old gentleman who said that lost his deposit. But that sort of thing is pretty low campaigning. I do not believe the minister would agree with that sort of thing, and I would like to think that the Liberal party would not stoop to that low form of campaigning.

I believe the minister should close those mouths tonight and say, "No, sir, we do not agree with that", so that the next time that sort of thing is said we will have the minister's word to the effect that these public works projects are not going to be administered on the basis of whether the government gets support from here, there or somewhere else. If he will make a declaration to that effect it will settle the problem.

Once again I wish to emphasize that I personally have no complaints to make, but I do believe some of these two-by-four politicians going around should raise their sights a little bit and carry on their campaigns not on the basis of pork barrel politics or handouts, but on the basis of great principles. Of course if they have no principles they cannot talk about them, and perhaps that is the reason. Perhaps they do not know of any, but surely we can raise our sights in political campaigns and tell what we stand for and what we propose to do.

I do not wish to say any more, Mr. Chairman, except to ask the minister this question, and I hope we will get a straightforward answer and not the reply that some of these projects are merely being held over. My question is this. Will he tell us whether there are any new projects which are taking priority over projects which have already been approved by parliament?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Kootenay East.

Mr. Winters: I wonder if the hon. member for Kootenay East would permit me to answer the specific question asked by the hon. member for Macleod. I can give a specific answer. There are no new projects in the estimates for this year concerning the province of Alberta which have taken priority over projects which were approved in the estimates for last year.

As to the charge, implied or direct, that these projects are determined on the basis of politics, I wonder if the hon. member has, for example, consulted the hon. member for Bow River, or the hon. member for Lethbridge, and asked them if they are in agreement as to whether we have ever determined these projects on the basis of the local candidate's ability to get votes. I believe it will be concluded that we have been fair in our approach to this problem. The hon. member for Red Deer, speaking last night, reminded the house that one of the projects which was dropped was in the constituency of my good friend the hon. member for Athabaska.

As a matter of fact I might tell the committee that my colleague the Minister of Agriculture has just reminded me that one project in his constituency has been dropped.

An hon. Member: Is that the post office at Lemberg?

Mr. Winters: I have forgotten the name. We have been trying to work in conformity with the general policy enunciated. Many hon. members this afternoon and this evening have said that this is a good policy. I believe every hon. member in this house believes it is a good policy, and it will doubtless be regarded as a good policy as long as it does not adversely affect any particular hon. member. But when it does affect a particular hon. member adversely he feels it is not a good policy but rather is based on political partisanship. That is not the way these projects are administered, and all hon. members will realize that once we have an opportunity of dealing with some of these revotes, and actually starting the construction of these buildings and clarifying the estimates, then we can deal with new votes for new projects.

The hon. member for Greenwood spoke about the organization of the department, and asked what I had done about looking into this situation, and whether I was satisfied with the increase in personnel. He had several other questions relating to administration. I am sure he knows that most of the increases shown in the estimates were authorized before I came to the Department of Public Works. Indeed, very few have been authorized since that date. The only substantial recent increases are caused by the transfer of personnel from the Department of Resources and Development in the trans-Canada highway division, and personnel related to some of the other functions which were transferred.

The senior officials of the department and I have been going over various sections of the department very carefully. I have endeavoured to get around the department and speak to all individuals myself. I know the deputy minister has done more than I in that particular field. We recently assembled in Ottawa the chief district personnel of the department—engineers and architects—to discuss with them the whole range of problems with respect to the operation of the department within the scope of their jurisdiction to see how we can make the department more effective, and to what extent we can delegate operations from the headquarters here at Ottawa so as to clear bottlenecks.

As regards the question of whether we have brought in outside management consultants to survey the activities of the department, my answer to that is no. We are endeavouring to get this department into the condition we want it, and that will take us some time. At the moment I have no plans for seeking that sort of outside help.

The hon. member for Kootenay West made his usual good suggestions about decentralization, and I must say I have some of these very points in mind. I believe there should be some decentralization of the operations of the Department of Public Works, and we have already taken some steps in that direction. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo also dealt with the same point. I thank him for his suggestions. I think that covers the points I have before me at the moment. If there are any others I shall deal with them later.

Mr. Green: Before the minister takes his seat, may I ask him to deal with the point raised by the hon. member for Prince Albert? I refer to the Lunam Construction Company matter.

Mr. Winters: As to the Lunam Construction Company, I may say that we have been engaged in trying to satisfy the claims of the subcontractors in so far as there is money available for that purpose, and depending upon whether or not they themselves can get together and determine the quantum and validity of their own claims in relation to each other. That is being done at the present moment, and I hope that before too long we will be able to pay to the valid subcontractors the moneys remaining in the hands of the crown for that purpose.

Mr. Byrne: I must apologize to the Chair for my impetuousness, but I wanted to follow my colleague the hon. member for Kootenay West. I wanted to do so, first, because I want to say how highly pleased I am to see him so fit after his serious illness. As he will realize, he is my neighbour. My second reason was that I wished to associate myself with his high praise of the departmental officials and the ministry in general for the efficient manner in which they have handled public works affairs.

There is another matter, however, that I feel is important at this time, having regard to the objections of the other provinces, particularly Alberta, to the absence of large appropriations for their various projects. There is one thing I should like to point out in regard to the matter of unemployment at the present time. It is my opinion—perhaps it is not shared by everyone—that public works at this time in the form of necessary projects would do a great deal to alleviate the bad situation that exists in British Columbia. I have formed the opinion recently that, in relation to all of Canada, the figure in British Columbia in the matter of unemployment is 65 per cent higher than that of the over-all picture.

With that fact in mind, while there is a substantial appropriation for public works in the matter of acquisition and construction of public buildings and so forth, for the trans-Canada highway and other projects, nevertheless I would hope that before the supplementary estimates come down the cabinet would give this matter serious consideration, and that certainly the estimates of the Minister of Public Works would be given careful consideration. I am sure Alberta is not suffering as greatly as is British Columbia in the unemployment situation. Alberta is predominantly a farming and oil province, and there is no recession in that regard.

This afternoon something extremely interesting was raised with regard to the question of whether or not there is favouritism in the matter of public works. I do not think there is, even if the province of Alberta does fall $1 million below British Columbia—I believe the figure is about $800,000—in this one item that I am looking at, namely the acquisition and construction of public buildings. In that one item they lack only about $800,000 in order to equal the appropriation for British Columbia. On the other hand the hon. member for Macleod, in an earlier address, pointed out that British Columbia pays to the federal treasury $239 million in round figures, or $45 million more than the total collected from the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. With that fact in mind it is not a large figure by which we exceed their appropriation.

The hon. member indicated that there was some favouritism, or that he felt there was going to be favouritism, because of the fact that when he went home for the election they were singing some sort of song there. I have not the exact words but I believe they went something like this—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Do you want some music?

Mr. Byrne: —"With Shaw, no public buildings; without Shaw, a federal building". I do not know what the tune was. Perhaps "Home on the Range" would work in nicely. Perhaps it would have had more effect had they been using that tune. On the other hand, I had a highly interesting experience in British Columbia. For some unknown reason my supporters felt that I was not too much needed in my riding, and they sent me into the interior to support a Liberal in another riding. It happened to be a riding held by a member of the C.C.F. party. This, by the way, is in relation to whether or not there is favouritism, or whether the members on either side of the house should feel there is favouritism.

I had made what I thought was a good speech. I do not know whether the audience thought so or not. However, I had given a good account of what the Liberal party had done in the past number of years. I did not say in any way that they had constructed buildings here or there; I gave the over-all picture and did not become parochial in any way. After I sat down one of the gentlemen in the back of the hall stood up and said, "Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the speaker a question". I said, "Yes?" He said, "The C.C.F. candidate has been going about this riding saying, 'Don't be foolish; don't send a Liberal down there; send one from the opposition'. He had in mind the C.C.F. He said they are the only ones who can really get anything out of the government".

That is the other side of the picture. Whether it is politics or not, certainly I felt that he hit well below the belt. My answer was that that certainly was not so, and that when a really progressive member of parliament put his case before the government he received the same treatment regardless of whether he belonged to one party or the other. I think it is pretty generally the feeling on the other side of the house that this government is treating all projects with reference to public works, transport or anything else, absolutely on a non-political basis and only on their worth.

Mr. Prudham: Some of the hon. members from Alberta have insinuated that there is not fair treatment in the allocation of public works. The Minister of Public Works has effectively answered that charge. They also made some insinuations. The hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for Macleod suggested that during the recent campaign questionable methods were used to get political support.

In that inference I completely agree with the hon. member for Macleod. I would say that there were some extravagant statements made in Peace River by the hon. member who presently represents that constituency. I did not take hearsay for it but procured from the radio station a copy of the script of one of his speeches. I am sorry I do not have it with me tonight, but part of his speech was to this effect. "You do not have to send a Liberal to Ottawa to get public works. Look at your constituency. I got you a new public building. I got you $600,000 for the airport. Look at the two Liberal constituencies, one on either side. They got nothing. If you want public works, send me to Ottawa."

Now, if that is what the hon. member for Macleod means when he says two-by-four politicians go around using questionable means to win political support, I completely agree with him.

Mr. Nicholson: After listening to the interesting remarks just made by the minister I probably will not have very much to say. I should like to express my appreciation of the vote in the estimates which will enable Mackenzie to have our first federal public building in the near future. I am sure there are very few members in this house who have not within their constituencies at least one public federal building. My remarks last night might have conveyed the impression that Mackenzie is a God-forsaken part of the world, but it is not. It so happens the constituency is spread over a large area, and about 50,000 people live there. We produce large quantities of grain, timber, minerals and fur.

Mackenzie did have a public building at one time, back in 1874. The first government buildings in the Northwest Territories were built at Fort Livingstone in my constituency. Then, as now, there were people who were critical of the government's extravagance. "The buildings were erected at a huge cost, but were of flimsy and unsubstantial character, built of lumber and hewn logs." Hon. members might be interested in the huge costs—$5,600. There was to have been a divisional point at Fort Livingstone on the C.P.R. running from Winnipeg to Edmonton over the northern route, which would have been a much better route for the first transcontinental railway, in my opinion.

For some reason or other the Canadian Pacific's plans were changed and the railway went miles to the south, through a much more desolate part of the country. Consequently the government buildings were moved from Fort Livingstone. At that time Mackenzie did boast a public building, but now there is not a single federal public building in the constituency.

I must thank the minister for looking after Kelvington. I hope it was an oversight that resulted in Carrot River, which I understand had been included a year ago, being overlooked this year. I hope that when the supplementary estimates are brought down the minister will take care of that oversight. I might say that I have had several letters from the town clerk, and also I have had some photographs sent along which I shall send to the minister. I would appreciate it if he would keep them until the new public building is erected. Then we shall be able to compare the pictures of the old with the new. I have letters from the secretary of the Carrot River board of trade, and from the minister's colleague, the Postmaster General. The latter wrote me on February 5 as follows:

> We have reason to believe that the Department of Public Works may be considering the erection of a public building in which the post office and other government departments would be located.
> The present accommodation is not satisfactory, and is being leased by the Department of Public Works only on a monthly basis.
> As a result of previous representations and the evident need for improvement, this department is urging the Department of Public Works to provide improved postal accommodation in accordance with our policy for offices in this class.

I might say that Carrot River is the end of steel. If the Minister of Agriculture were here I am sure he would agree with me that it is a very important centre in one of the last frontiers of prairie settlement.

I have been interested to note that there has been a change in government policy since I was here from 1940 to 1949. At that time there were a great many requests from communities for public buildings, and naturally I referred those requests to the proper departments. The replies were that because of the war and the necessity for channelling all our efforts into the war effort, we could not build public buildings. Later the policy seemed to be that if the total revenue of the post office was less than $10,000, neither the Post Office Department nor the Department of Public Works would recommend a public building.

This afternoon, while waiting to make these remarks, I have gone through the annual reports of the Minister of Public Works for the years 1951 and 1952. I have noticed that for Yorkton there has been a very large appropriation of $800,000 for an addition to the very fine post office. Centres like Regina and Saskatoon have been getting generous consideration. I think there should be something said for these rural communities that have not any finer type of architecture than the country elevator. I feel that under the new concept of the minister, some of these small communities should have an example of what can be done by a little imagination.

I notice some progress has been made. I was checking over the constituency of Melville, where the minister indicated they are passing up one building. All these places I am about to mention are much smaller than Carrot River. The revenue from the Carrot River post office is $8,508. These places I am going to mention have had public buildings, according to the minister's reports. Lemberg, with a post office revenue of $4,810, has had a new building. Ituna, with a revenue of $5,354, had a new building costing something over $30,000. Fort Qu'Appelle with a revenue of $8,000 had several buildings, the contracts for which were awarded to the Lunam Construction Company. There was a contract for the construction of a public building, $129,000; an Indian hospital for $318,000; a sewage disposal plant for $19,000. Then Balcarres, with a post office revenue of $7,005, apparently had a new building. Langenburg, with a revenue of $8,277, had a new public building constructed by the Lunam Construction Company at a cost of $84,000. Saltcoats, with a revenue of $5,676, must have a very modest building because the cost is shown at $75.74.

I would suggest that since the constituency of Melville has been able to get public buildings for centres like Lemberg, Ituna, Fort Qu'Appelle, Balcarres and Langenburg, it is not unreasonable to expect a building in Carrot River. It is not unreasonable to expect that the commitment made a year ago for a new office building should be proceeded with, and that when the supplementary estimates come down before Easter this oversight will have been corrected.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

These public buildings serve two purposes. They handle Her Majesty's mail, and they house the representatives of the R.C.M.P. I submit that if Her Majesty should visit the post offices in Mackenzie constituency she would decide that they must have been built in keeping with the times of her great-great-grandmother, Queen Victoria, because there have not been appropriations that would make it possible for the people in these rural communities to have the public buildings which are taken for granted in the larger cities. I know the Post Office Department has taken the position that the large cities provide the revenue, but in the final analysis the taxpayers of all Canada provide the money for these wonderful public buildings that are being erected in nearly all Canadian cities.

I hope the minister and his staff will give a new look to this department. I want to endorse what has been said by hon. members in all parts of the house, that we have a great deal of confidence in the imagination and the ability of the minister and his staff. And so I hope in the years to come there will be worth-while appropriations for rural constituencies such as Mackenzie where, in the past, we have not been able to get many public buildings.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, for the first time since I have the honour of sitting in this house, I have before me the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955. When I saw that the Department of Public Works intended to spend $130 million and a few hundred thousand dollars during the coming year, I asked myself for what purpose the government was requesting parliament to vote such a large amount. I came to the conclusion that the government had the duty of providing the Canadian nation with the numerous public services needed to ensure its expansion, development and progress. And secondly—this seems quite important to me—a public works program gives work to those who must provide for a wife and children.

Mr. Chairman, I note with regret that the amount earmarked for public works in Quebec city—I have the honour of representing one of its constituencies—is but $225,000. When I say $225,000 I am being generous because that amount includes $125,000 which is a revote from last year, the money not having been spent.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw to the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) and of the government the fact that the citizens of Quebec city are probably those who are most affected by the unemployment situation now prevailing in Canada.

On November 23 last, I had the honour of making the first speech of my political career in this house. At that time, as will be seen from page 231 of Hansard for that day, I spoke of the working classes I represent in this house. Mr. Chairman, may I quote to the hon. members a few excerpts from that speech which, in my opinion, are quite relevant to the remarks I wish to make tonight. I stated, Mr. Chairman, that:

> However honest and generous they may be, our working people must not nevertheless consider themselves as forming an inferior class. It is as honourable as any other class of society. Our workingmen are legitimately proud of what they are. They rely upon their elected representatives to give voice to their legitimate representations.

(Text):

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I think the hon. member is talking about unemployment, and in the circumstances he is out of order.

Mr. Dufresne: If the hon. member for Levis—

Mr. Bourget: I am speaking to a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand the hon. member is discussing the question of unemployment in its relationship to the public works program of this country. In so far as he refers to it with a direct relationship to public works, undoubtedly he is in order. But perhaps he will do his best to see that his remarks are strictly applicable to the Department of Public Works, because he will realize that unemployment has been discussed, and a decision made by the house. I would thank the hon. member to keep in mind that it is not possible for me to check too closely because of the language in which he speaks. So I know I can depend upon his help.

Mr. Dufresne: I thank you for your observations, Mr. Chairman. I want to discuss public works, and in doing so I wish to claim public works for the city of Quebec. I would point out at the same time that I am asking for public works in that city because there is unemployment. In speaking in my mother tongue, Mr. Chairman, I shall do my best to have you understand me by speaking as slowly as possible.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I was saying that there is at present acute unemployment in the city of Quebec and that it is the duty of the state to put an end to it by undertaking the necessary public works.

In the speech I delivered on November 23 last and to which I again refer, I added:

> The workingman, Mr. Speaker, is entitled to the gratitude of the government. To his ability, competence and love of work we owe almost everything that strikes our eye. His rugged hands are evidence and confirmation of the long hours he has toiled in his shop or in the yard, under the burden of his tools. The honest and conscientious worker—and those traits are typical of the worker living in the constituency of Quebec West—is the builder of the nation and it is our duty to recognize that fact.

Mr. Chairman, on the same occasion, and I intend to do it again tonight, I asked the government to undertake in Quebec urgent and necessary public works that were needed and that the government may not disregard any longer today. I ask and I demand as strongly as I can that the St. Charles river be dredged and that the pollution of the Lairet river be eliminated. That is a knotty problem, not for the constituency I represent, but more particularly for the constituency of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) since these two rivers happen to be in his constituency where, I repeat, they are not only a disgrace for the city of Quebec, the capital of the province of Quebec, but they are also a source of infection for its citizens. I am at a loss to understand why a self-styled Liberal government should not pay more attention to these people. After all they have regularly obtained from them expressions of what I might make so bold as to call blind confidence. If my hon. friends now find themselves sitting on the opposite side of the house, the citizens of Quebec are the ones primarily responsible. Is that the way in which the Liberal government chose to show its gratitude? In that case may I ask them quite simply to stop this joking at the expense of the people of Quebec and to proceed with those works which are needed to cure this unemployment situation.

When the public works estimates are considered, I shall have the opportunity of referring again to the same subject. Tonight I merely wanted to speak on behalf of the province of Quebec and ask what I already asked on November 23 last, when the Right Hon. the Prime Minister was here, that the people of the province of Quebec should get what is needed in that province. This has become a necessity. Both rivers to which I referred a moment ago are a danger to public safety, especially to public health, and I feel that our human resources must be protected if we want Canada to remain great and continue along the path to prosperity.

I read in the newspapers this week a statement which seems to me utterly fanciful; it was reportedly made by the Right Hon. the Prime Minister in Seoul, Korea, while addressing Canadian troops. He said: "Just wait for maple syrup time, spring is just around the corner. You will then be able to come back to Canada and find all the work you need".

Well, Mr. Chairman, I believe that statement by the Right Hon. the Prime Minister is quite untimely for the good reason that, as we know, there are at present in Canada and more particularly in the province of Quebec, works that should be undertaken and which the government refuses to give us although they are needed. Well, Mr. Chairman . . . I see that my hon. friend from Saguenay (Mr. Brisson) seems to be having fun behind the curtains.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is rather funny.

Mr. Dufresne: I know that work has been done in Saguenay county. I have asked some questions and requested documents which I obtained. I shall say a word about them to the hon. member later on. I know that there have been a few little scandals when certain public works were undertaken in Saguenay county—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Dufresne: One is always out of order when speaking about the scandals of our hon. friends opposite.

Does the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) wish to say something? He seems to want to rise.

(Text):

Mr. Boisvert: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Quebec West—

Mr. Dufresne: Is this a point of order?

Mr. Boisvert: —has been out of order for the last five minutes. He is talking about a declaration made by the Prime Minister in Korea, and he has just been speaking about some development in the lake St. John district. It has nothing to do with the item under discussion.

Mr. Dufresne: If it is not a point of order—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. As the committee knows, the Clerk of the House is conversant with the language in which the hon. member for Quebec West is speaking, and I have been kept advised as to the tenor of his remarks. It is my opinion that while under a strict application of the rules of order one might say that at times he strayed into other fields, I feel bound to say that I believe the hon. member is as strictly on the subject we are discussing as have been many of the allusions made in various addresses from both sides of the house during the day. I suggest that the hon. member, who knows the rules, continue his remarks and keep the rules in mind.

Mr. Dufresne: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

I do not want to delay the proceedings of the house any longer. I know that the house will have to adjourn in three or four minutes from now.

However, I would like to ask once more the government and the minister, for whom I have much respect—and I think he does everything possible to run his department properly—to act as spokesman for the people of Quebec in order to obtain for the families of the city of Quebec the work they need. I ask the minister to urge the cabinet and, more particularly, the Right Hon. the Prime Minister, when he returns, to undertake for the benefit of the people of the city of Quebec certain projects which not only are necessary but urgently needed. The carrying out of these projects will contribute to the development of the city of Quebec and, especially, to the conservation of its human resources.

It is difficult for me to understand, as I said before, why the city of Quebec, which has always been blind in its trust of the party opposite, gets so little from the government. They vote Liberal in Quebec and the government knows that the people of Quebec will continue voting Liberal, yet the representations made by the people of Quebec are laughed at. Well, there is an old English saying that goes like this:

(Text):

We can fool some of the people some of the time but we cannot fool all of the people all of the time.

An hon. Member: You will find out.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: The people of Quebec will surely remember that.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Think of that at the next election.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend asks me to think of that when the next election comes. Mr. Chairman, I am not thinking of the next election but only of my duty here. I ask all of my hon. friends opposite to visit my riding during the next election. The people of Quebec West will let them know if their representative has done his duty or not.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): With pleasure.

GRAIN

BOARD OF GRAIN COMMISSIONERS—CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—REFERENCE OF REPORTS TO COMMITTEE

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wish to table the annual report of the board of grain commissioners for the year 1953. If I may have the consent of the house, I now move:

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave of the house to move such a motion at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

EXTENSION OF CONTROL OF STRATEGIC MATERIALS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 374, to control export and import of strategic materials.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The Export and Import Permits Act expires July 31 of this year, Mr. Speaker. The purpose of this bill is to extend the act for a further period of three years, and to modify it and amend it in the light of changed conditions.

When the act was originally passed in 1947 our primary concern was to control the movement of scarce commodities in order to ensure adequate supplies on the domestic market. We also controlled the movement of strategic materials. Over the years the need to control supplies for the domestic market has decreased, but the need for strategic controls has actually increased, in view of the co-operation now existing between NATO countries to control the movement of strategic commodities to soviet bloc countries.

The main new section of this bill has to do with this control of strategic materials. These changes are listed on the attached statement.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RESEARCH COUNCIL ACT

AMENDMENTS TO ENABLE COUNCIL TO ACQUIRE FUNDS, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 375, to amend the Research Council Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The purpose of the amendment is to clarify the authority of the council as a corporate body to acquire funds from the conduct of its operations and to spend them. This is in line with the procedure of the past 27 years. It is, however, considered advisable to grant specific authority for these practices.

In addition, there are minor amendments concerning frequency of council meetings, signing authority, and the distribution of publications.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

6. Is the procedure for determining living costs on a net worth statement uniform in all offices? If not, for what reason?

Questions

2. An assessment is regarded as having been made on a "net worth" basis in any instance where, in order to determine the income of a taxpayer in a taxation year, it has been necessary to ascertain the monetary increase in his net assets in that year (i.e., after eliminating capital gains and losses, gifts, bequests, etc.) and to add thereto the amount of his personal expenditures or "cost of living" in the period.

NATIONAL REVENUE—CUSTOMS CHECK BRANCH

Mr. Knowles:

4. In equalizing such rates, in how many cases since January 1, 1952, has this branch recommended an increase in the rate of duty to be charged?
5. In how many cases in the same period has it recommended a decrease in the rate of duty to be charged?

Mr. McCann:

1. One copy of each customs import entry and also one copy of the relative invoice are forwarded from the customs ports to the department. The duties of the check branch are:

To compare invoices with relative customs import entries; to check the values for duty, rates of duty, application of special or dumping duty on goods ruled to be of a class or kind made in Canada, and application or non-application of sales tax and excise tax; to conduct correspondence with the collectors of customs and excise relative to these import entries; to act as custodian of the import entries for the current fiscal year and the three previous fiscal years.

The correspondence between the customs check branch and collectors of customs and excise at the customs ports is largely on standard inquiry forms designated as Forms E-7. If further correspondence is required, letters are written. The comments on these Forms E-7 can be divided into the following general categories:

(a) Advising the collector that a higher rate of duty, sales tax or excise tax is required and requesting an amending entry, i.e., the payment of more duty, sales tax, or excise tax.

(b) Advising the collector that a lower rate of duty or the exemption from sales tax or excise tax is applicable, and instructing him to advise the importer and his customs house broker, if any, that a refund is due.

(c) Drawing attention to mathematical or typographical errors.

(d) Inquiries as to the "end use", which information determines the tariff status of certain importations or the application or non-application of sales tax or excise tax.

(e) Requesting samples or illustrations in order to determine the tariff status.

(f) Requesting reports as to value appraisal of secondhand or used machinery or other goods.

(g) Requesting information as to the certification or required statements on port documents.

2. Yes.

5. Same as No. 4 above.

3. What grades of beef?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ALLUMETTE ISLAND-PEMBROKE BRIDGE

Mr. Forgie:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents, dated from December 7, 1953, in the possession of the Department of Public Works, exchanged between the provincial governments of Ontario and Quebec, relative to the proposed Allumette Island-Pembroke bridge.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, the permission of both provincial governments has been obtained, and I beg leave to table the correspondence forthwith.

FLIN FLON-NIPAWIN HIGHWAY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters and telegrams which have passed between the provincial governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and the dominion government since the 1st day of January 1951, regarding a contribution for or assistance in the building and completion of the highway between Flin Flon, Manitoba and Nipawin, Saskatchewan.

Mr. Lesage: I wish to make the usual reservation regarding the consent of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, subject to the remarks of the minister.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—CONTINUING COMMITTEE

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of any correspondence, telegrams and memoranda of telephone conversations exchanged between the dominion government or Minister of Justice as dominion representative on the continuing committee and any provincial government or provincial representative on the continuing committee, relative to the dominion-provincial constitutional conference, since December 7, 1950.

Mr. Garson: This is subject to the usual reservation.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, subject to the statement by the minister.

CUSTOMS ACT, SECTION 35—IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all directives, memoranda, etc., issued by the Department of National Revenue or any official or division or branch thereof, since December 8, 1953, with reference to the interpretation, implementation or enforcement of section 35 of the Customs Act, as amended by Bill 29 of this session.

CUSTOMS ACT, SECTION 35—INTERPRETATION

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all correspondence dated since December 8, 1953, exchanged between prospective importers and the Department of National Revenue, or any official or division or branch thereof, with reference to the interpretation, implementation or enforcement of section 35 of the Customs Act as amended by Bill 29 of this session.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, I shall have to oppose this motion on the ground that it is contrary to practice to make returns of correspondence of private business people with the department. It tends to disclose the private business of the individual or of the corporation.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the statement of the minister I should like the consent of the house to withdraw the motion, subject to my right to put some other question or motion on the order paper later.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Motion withdrawn.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence that passed between any department of the government of the United States and any department of the government of Canada, and a copy of all agreements entered into, since the first day of January 1952, in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway and power project.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This is a very difficult motion, as several departments are concerned. If my hon. friend will agree to let it stand for a few days, we shall study the situation.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

HAROLD C. BANKS

Mr. Hamilton:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, recorded telephone conversations or any other communications or documents, from January 1, 1947 to date, relating to the case of Harold C. Mr. Harris: Perhaps this might stand for about two days.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

WHEAT

ALLEGED PRICE DIFFERENTIAL—INQUIRY RESPECTING CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of his recent statement at Saskatoon that 20 million bushels of wheat might soon be shipped annually through Churchill. Will the minister state how this result can be achieved in view of the newly announced 9-cent price differential as between Churchill and Fort William?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for having sent me notice of his question. In the first place, I should remind him that the statement I made in Saskatoon is not exactly as he paraphrased it. It had to do with the extension of grain facilities at that port from 2,500,000 bushels to 5 million bushels. This is what I said:

Without any increase in grain handling and loading facilities this additional capacity should enable the port to clear as much as 20 million bushels in a season——which is not quite the statement which the hon. member attributes to me.

[Mr. Speaker.]

With reference to the second part of his statement, I am not aware of a 9-cent differential; but I am informed that the forwarding rate from the lakehead to the seaboard is 20 cents, and Churchill is already on the seaboard. The price of wheat at Churchill is the same as at the lakehead, so that I am not aware of anything that would change the position at Churchill.

[Later:]

Mr. Knight: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that at page 2198 of Hansard of February 18 the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) gave the price of class II domestic wheat in store at Churchill as $1.88, and at Port Arthur as $1.79 on that day's market?

Mr. Chevrier: I have not before me the statement that was made, but my hon. friend's statement was directed to me because of my remarks at Saskatoon dealing with the elevator facilities. The hon. gentleman's question might well have been directed to the Acting Prime Minister, who is responsible for wheat problems. What my hon. friend had in mind was to couple the two and try to embarrass me, but he was not successful in that attempt.

ALLEGED UNITED STATES OFFERINGS OUTSIDE OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Are press reports to the effect that the United States is offering wheat outside of the international agreement at prices considerably below those provided under the international wheat agreement true? Has that taken place, and what attitude is Canada taking, and what attitude will the ministers who are about to visit Washington take with regard to the difficult situation prevailing in wheat marketing?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): I know of no instance in which the United States has offered wheat below international wheat agreement prices. It is the view of all countries in the international wheat agreement that no country outside the agreement will be treated better than those inside the agreement. While there have been instances of wheat being given by the United States government, or an agency thereof, to countries in exceptional difficulties, Canada has been consulted in every instance that has occurred, and we have no particular criticism of the situation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Acting Prime Minister look into the question and ascertain whether or not it is a fact that Mr. Benson, the secretary of agriculture of the United States, ever made reference to the difficulty of marketing even at a price below the prices provided for in the international agreement?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I shall be glad to look into the matter. I may say that I anticipate the disposal program of agricultural commodities of the United States will be discussed when we are in Washington.

COAL

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONFERENCE TO CONSIDER INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): May I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys? Is the minister in a position to give the house a report on what decisions were arrived at in the conference held on March 12 between representatives of his department, the mine workers and coal operators of the maritime provinces?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. A meeting was held on Friday last as scheduled and there was present a large delegation from the coal-mining industry, including representatives from the two provincial governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Several members of parliament were also in attendance.

I would say that it was a very useful and worth-while meeting as the problems of the industry were discussed fully and frankly. I believe that the delegates from the various sections of the industry went away with a better understanding of the need for co-operative action on the part of all concerned to meet the present crisis in the industry. Certain recommendations were made which the government will consider.

I should like to say also that I think the delegates took back several worth-while suggestions as to how the industry could help itself. No concise report was made of the proceedings, although a representative committee issued a press release. I shall probably have some more comments to make when my estimates are before the committee.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION WITH REGARD TO UNITED STATES BREACHES OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister what efforts he and his colleagues who are accompanying him to the conference in Washington tomorrow are going to make with reference to breaches by the United States of the general agreement on tariffs and trade and what action precisely they intend to urge upon the American government representatives at that conference in that regard.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The purpose of the meeting tomorrow is to explore a number of matters. I think no particular representations are going to be made, but a number of matters are going to be discussed.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask if the matter of United States breaches of the general agreement on tariffs and trade will be one of the matters to be discussed at the conference and what views will be put forward on that subject by the Canadian representatives?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I anticipate that the matter will be discussed, and I may say that the delegation will be strongly against such action.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

EXTENSION OF BASE AT STEVENSON FIELD—SALE OF HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he is now prepared to answer the question I asked on Friday as to whether the government will consider selling to the public the thirty houses on Whytewold road in St. James, Manitoba, which were bought to make room for the extension of the air force base at Stevenson field?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): That matter is receiving consideration. I shall not be able to give an answer to the hon. member for several days yet.

COLUMBIA RIVER

REPORTED CONSTRUCTION OF DAM AT MICA CREEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question of which I have not given notice. Possibly he or the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) might take the question as notice and give an answer at a later date. Would the Acting Prime Minister or anyone on behalf of the government be able to make a statement with respect to press reports over the last week or so regarding a proposal for the construction of a dam at Mica creek on the Columbia river, which we are told has been discussed by the international joint commission?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): To the best of my knowledge the international joint commission has made no report to the government on that subject. The government would not be in a position to make a statement until such a report was received.

INCOME TAX

NORANDA MINES—DEDUCTIBILITY OF ADVERTISING EXPENSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I should like to direct to the Minister of National Revenue a question based on advertisements appearing in today's Globe and Mail and the Montreal Gazette, copy of which I have sent to the minister. Will Noranda Mines Limited be able to include the cost of the advertisements in today's Globe and Mail and Gazette in their deductions for corporation income tax purposes?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. That matter will be given consideration at the time the department makes an assessment of the corporation's returns and if and when they make any claim for this expense as a deduction.

NATURAL GAS AND PETROLEUM

INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENT OF MARKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Does the minister, who will head the Canadian delegation to the joint economic committee meeting in Washington, intend to discuss joint Canadian-United States co-operation in regard to the development of markets for Canadian petroleum and natural gas products and the economic supply of those products to Canadian—

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): A number of matters will be discussed. The purpose of the meeting is to permit discussion of matters affecting the economies of the two countries. I am afraid I cannot say more than that.

DUMPING

DAFFODILS—REPORTED UNITED STATES IMPORTATIONS INTO VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister received any communication from the British Columbia bulb growers' federation with respect to the flooding of the Vancouver daffodil market by United States growers? If so, will he consider using anti-dumping regulations to remedy the situation?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have received notice of the hon. gentleman's question and I received a telegram from the president of the British Columbia bulb growers' federation. I have been able to ascertain that, because of the fact that cut flowers of all kinds are held to be of a class or kind produced in Canada, regular guidance has been given to customs ports on the value for duty of daffodils and other cut flowers entering Canada. This guidance is provided officers to enable them to check import values and apply any dumping duties where justified.

POTATOES—ALLEGED SHIPMENTS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA MARKET

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): On Friday last I advised the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) that I expected to have more information today on the subject of importations of potatoes into British Columbia during the period February 24 to March 10. From inquiries sent to the British Columbia ports concerned it has been estimated that approximately 23 carloads of potatoes have been imported by rail and highway. I would draw to your attention the fact that, as hon. members know, the question stated 150 carloads, although there were three carloads beyond those estimated which came by truck. As hon. members know, potatoes are free of duty. However, a check is presently being made of relevant invoices to see that the declared value corresponds with the home market value in the country of export as required. Indeed, they are free of duty for ten and a half months of the year, from June 15 until the 1st of August, when there is an attempt to protect the home market for what is known as new potatoes. The duty is 37½ cents per 100 pounds.

NATIONAL FLAG

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT BY COMMITTEE OF LIBERAL MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct to the Secretary of State a question of which I was not able to give him notice, and therefore he may prefer to take this question as notice. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a press dispatch to the effect that a committee composed of Liberal members is now working on a design for a Canadian flag and, if so, will the report of this committee be made to parliament in due course?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have spent most of the last two days on the train and have not had much opportunity to read press reports. I have however been quite diligent as a member of the house, but I know of no committee having been set up by this house for that purpose. I assume that a committee would have to be set up before a report could be made.

[Later:]

PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION, NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State following the question asked by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny)? Is the Secretary of State aware of the fact that his province of Newfoundland has a national flag act specifying a national flag for that province. Does the government consider it appropriate for a province to legislate on the question of a national flag?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, that does not seem to be a question which has anything to do with this parliament.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFUSAL OF RESTAURANT TO HONOUR PERSONAL CHEQUES OF MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I rise on a most important question of privilege. My privilege is based on a completely unexpected humiliation and a growing righteous indignation. Will Your Honour inform the house who is responsible for issuing the order that personal cheques of members of parliament are not to be honoured in the parliamentary restaurant or the cafeteria?

[Later:]

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to support my colleague across the house. It has come to my attention lately that two hon. members, not belonging to my own party, required money at a week end in order to go home because of illness in their families and they were unable to obtain it. I believe the matter raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) should receive more attention than it has been given up to the present.

Mr. Speaker: If I may perhaps say a word, the only reason I did not deal with the matter raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West was not because I did not consider it deserved attention, but merely because, as hon. members know, the affairs of the parliamentary restaurant are in the hands of a committee and that committee when it meets will perhaps have a chance to look into this question further. As far as the administration of the affairs of the parliamentary restaurant is concerned, I know that this question of cashing cheques was at one time or other brought to my attention and that as a matter of regular routine the manager of the restaurant attempts to accommodate hon. members. However, it must be remembered that he is not a banker and need not necessarily keep large sums of money on hand in order to satisfy the requirements of hon. members. It may happen that at some time he may be able to accommodate hon. members but there are other times when he cannot do so. Hon. members will understand that if they must leave on a trip they will have to make provision to have their cheques cashed either at banks or through some other organization. It has never been the function of the manager of the parliamentary restaurant to keep a certain amount of cash on hand in order to satisfy the requirements of hon. members as regards cashing cheques.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I happen to be a member of that committee and I wonder when we are going to meet.

Mr. Speaker: It appears as though some of the matters which have been brought up since the opening of the session indicate that hon. members are anxious to have a meeting of that committee. Since the hon. member is a member of that committee he will no doubt signify his intention to hold a meeting and I will be glad to oblige him.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, apropos of the subject of cashing cheques, I have heard that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think we ought to debate this matter here. If the hon. member wishes to have a meeting of the committee he could bring the matter before the committee. I would ask him to wait until the committee meets.

POST OFFICE

RED DEER AND PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE—IMPLEMENTATION OF FIVE-DAY WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General and perhaps he will take this as notice. Will the Postmaster General review the position of the postal employees in the city of Red Deer relative to their not being included in the proposed five-day week plan according to the legislation?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to look into this matter but I must remind my hon. friend that the civil service commission is constantly reviewing the situation as regards the implementation of the five-day week in different parts of the country.

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, will the minister at the same time look into the situation as it affects the city of Portage la Prairie?

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION AND AMENDMENT OF EXISTING STATUTE

The house resumed, from Thursday, March 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. 7, respecting the criminal law—Mr. Garson—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Before the house proceeds to the consideration of Bill No. 7 there is a word of explanation which, I believe, might well be said from the chair. As hon. members of the committee know, a large number of clauses were permitted to stand with the consent of the committee as a whole for subsequent consideration. We have now reached the stage where they come up for consideration. They have been divided into five groups, but not necessarily in numerical order. Might I have order in the committee please?

I have the list concerning these five groups before me now but I believe the committee would not wish to have me read it entirely, as it is rather long. I would point out, however, that these groups are as follows: Group 1, clauses not considered of primary importance. Group 2 concerns drunken driving, defamatory libel, nuisances, etc. Group 3 concerns certain sections in connection with sexual offences. Group 4 concerns treason and sedition; and group 5, riots, sabotage, and criminal breach of contract. It is my understanding that, by agreement, these groups will be taken in the following order: We will take group 1, then 3, 2, 4, and finally 5. Therefore, we have now before us this afternoon clauses not of primary importance and the first clause in this group is clause 16 concerning insanity.

On clause 16—Insanity.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the committee was kind enough to stand this clause over at my request. The reason I asked that it be allowed to stand was for the purpose of placing on record some considerations which I believe should come before the royal commission which has now been appointed to consider the criminal law with respect to the defence of insanity.

Clause 16 is the clause in the new code which will carry the law for the future into the statute books and cover the defence of insanity. In this connection I wanted to suggest that there should be before the royal commission for its particular consideration and recommendation that particular phase of the law concerning the defence of insanity, the only legal basis for which appears to be found at the present time in a citation in Tremeear's criminal code.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps this might be the last time it will be necessary to remind the committee that, in the interests of those who are following the discussion of the Criminal Code, there should be sufficient silence to enable any hon. member who is speaking to be heard.

Mr. Fulton: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate your remarks. I have a fairly loud voice and I will try to be heard over any such interruptions as may in future be made.

The passage to which I had reference is found in Tremeear's criminal code, fifth edition, at page 297. It was referred to in a recent case of murder in British Columbia in which there were two defences, one being that of provocation and the other that of insanity. It so happened that the jury brought in a verdict of manslaughter, which verdict could only have been based upon the defence of provocation. But there was no question of drunkenness in that case. The only defence in connection with which a verdict of manslaughter could have been brought in was that of provocation. It was, however, related to the defence of insanity because the accused was suggested by his counsel to have been suffering from mental defect or instability. In other words, the defence of insanity was twofold: first, that the accused was suffering from mental defect or instability, and second, that in any event he was insane and therefore was not criminally responsible for his act. In order that I may bring the point specifically before this committee for the purpose of having it referred to the royal commission for its consideration and recommendation, I could perhaps just read from pages 296 and 297 of Tremeear. In dealing with the point that the jury should not be allowed to take into account the question whether or not the accused was drunk in establishing whether or not there was provocation, the text comments as follows:

> For similar reasons, the fact that accused was drunk at the time cannot enter into the consideration of the sufficiency of the provocation.

Then there are given a number of citations which I do not need to place on the record. Then the comment continues:

> But, when sufficient provocation is established, the jury must also find that accused acted "in the heat of passion caused" by it, and here the question of drunkenness may become important, and the judge should tell the jury that they may take into account the fact that a man in a condition of intoxication is more susceptible to passion than a sober man would be. In other words, though accused's drunkenness cannot be considered in determining whether or not provocation existed, it may and should be a factor in determining, once the existence of provocation is established, whether or not accused was put into a passion by it.

The authorities cited are R. v. Harms and R. v. Thomas.

Then the text continues—and there is no case cited in support of the proposition—as follows:

> There would seem to be no reason why the same rule should not apply in the case of mental defect or instability.

In the case in British Columbia to which I have referred—and perhaps I should cite it; it was Reg. v. Masuda—the defence went to some length to establish that the accused was of an alien race—he was of the Japanese race—and that with regard to marriage they had different views from those of Christians; that all the circumstances surrounding the commission of the crime had been such that the accused had been subjected to a form of mental pressure which amounted to provocation; and that not only had there been the provocation of certain incidents which were relied upon but that owing to the peculiar mental state of the accused with respect to the matter of the marriage of his daughter, he was suffering from a degree of mental instability even though it might not be found that he was actually insane.

Counsel for the defence submitted to the judge that he should instruct the jury along the lines of the citation I have just read, namely that "there would seem to be no reason why the same rule should not apply in the case of mental defect or instability". The trial judge—to which no objection could be taken—read the passage to the jury and it seems to me that the verdict of the jury must have been founded upon that passage. The point that I think it is important to establish is whether or not, in connection with the defence of provocation, that passage contained in Tremeear at page 297 should form part of our law.

I want to make it quite clear that in so far as those connected with the case were concerned—that is, the particular case that I have mentioned—there was no objection to the jury's verdict. There was no appeal by the crown. It might have been thought that perhaps a better verdict would have been not guilty by reason of insanity rather than a verdict of manslaughter, but the fact is that that was the verdict found by the jury. Yet that verdict was found on the basis of a statement in the text of Tremeear which is quite unsupported by any established case. It seems to me that perhaps it should not be left on that rather uncertain basis and that the royal commission might well take into consideration the question of whether or not, with respect to a defence of provocation, the condition of the accused, with respect to whether he is suffering from mental defect or instability, should be taken into account or whether in fact the defence of provocation should be left as it is now, officially, according to the statute, on the basis that it must be such provocation as would provoke a reasonable man—not a man suffering from mental defect or instability—to such an extent that he would commit the crime in the heat of passion. In the case of this crime, the crime was not committed until some eight hours after the last incident which could possibly have been relied upon as actual provocation. In normal circumstances, the lapse of that eight hours would preclude the defence of provocation. Yet the jury here, owing to the mental condition of the accused, obviously felt that they were entitled to render a verdict of manslaughter by virtue of the defence of provocation.

My whole point is this. It seems to me that the law should not be left in that rather vague and indefinite state. While the whole matter of insanity is before the royal commission I believe they should direct their minds to the question of the defence of provocation in relation to the mental condition of the accused, even although he may not be actually found to be suffering from insanity in the legal sense.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I listened with a great deal of interest to my hon. friend as he reviewed the situation respecting the law of provocation and referred to the case of R. v. Harms. In that case I was counsel for the appellant. A new trial was ordered by the court of appeal of Saskatchewan. That case made new law in that it decided that when the defence of provocation is raised, the crown must first establish that the acts or the words spoken were such as would cause a reasonable man to lose his sense of proportion or to dethrone his reason and that if the jury concluded that words or acts would in fact cause that condition to a reasonable man, then they were entitled to consider the state of his drunkenness with a view to determining how much greater would be the probability of his reason being dethroned in the event that he was intoxicated. I think my hon. friend has made out a very good argument in asking that a provision to a like effect should apply in the case of those who are insane within the meaning of the law.

I should like to go one step further. In recent years there have been a number of cases before the courts in which the accused, unable to establish insanity within the legal concept, has called witnesses to testify to the effect that the accused's mental age, by reason of birth or otherwise, was lower than his chronological age. In other words, there are many people in our country whose mental age, under tests such as the Stanford Binet test and the like, is 7 to 14 years of age, and under the law, based as it is on English common law, between 7 and 14 years there is a responsibility criminally provided the person is in a position to form an intent.

That, in general, is the law, and I should like the commission to give consideration to the advances that have been made in psychology in recent years, particularly in the making of tests to determine mental age, in order to bring the law in line with these scientific advances. The law today provides that a person between 7 and 14 years of age is responsible for his criminal acts only where the crown is able to establish that he in fact had the capacity to form an intent and did form an intent. Those rules were made when physical and mental age were believed to be coincidental. We know differently today. We know there are many persons of adult age with a mental age of from 7 to 14. I should like the commission to give consideration to making provision for responsibility dependent not on physical or chronological age alone, as is the case today, but also on the mental age of the individual based on present and recent psychological investigation.

The principles of our general law respecting insanity were enunciated 110 years ago and I feel that they are in very considerable measure out of line with modern research. When I say that, I realize that the committee in Great Britain that looked into the matter determined, after giving full consideration to this question, not to change the rules in M'Naghten's case. However, there is no reason why the commission here should in any way be bound by what the committee did in the United Kingdom. In my opinion it is very important that when the commission meets every opportunity be given, even to the extent of invitations being sent to leading psychologists across the country—

Mr. Garson: Psychiatrists.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And psychiatrists too—for the presentation of evidence so that when recommendations are made they will not only represent the experience of the courts and the judiciary but also will be somewhat in keeping with modern research.

Mr. Garson: If these are all the observations on clause 16 I might make a brief reply. I think my hon. friends will agree that although their discussions have been conducted under clause 16 of the bill they have actually been discussing section 261 of the present Criminal Code, being the section involved in the case cited by the hon. member for Kamloops. Clause 203 of the present Bill No. 7—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the section; not 261?

Mr. Garson: Section 261 is the one that was involved in the case of Rex v. Harms which was cited.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the old code.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is what I said, in the present code that is now in force. The analogue of section 261 of the present code which appears in Bill No. 7 is clause 203. The two are identical in substance. There is no change in the law.

I wish to thank my hon. friends for having raised these matters. I think their suggestions are very helpful, but for our present purposes would they not agree that the question with which this committee is concerned is whether the terms of reference to the royal commission are wide enough to cover an inquiry upon the point which they have raised? On that score I would point out that the following are the recommendations of last year's special committee of the House of Commons, considering this Criminal Code consolidation bill:

The committee shall consider further and report upon the substance and principles of these provisions of the law aforesaid—

That is the then existing provisions of the Criminal Code.

—and shall recommend whether any of those provisions should be amended—

In any respect.

—and, if so, shall recommend the nature of the amendments to be made.

That was the report of the special committee of the House of Commons and the report upon the strength of which the royal commission now is being set up. The terms of reference of this royal commission are as follows:

. . . to inquire into and report upon the question whether the criminal law of Canada relating to the defence of insanity should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the minister's opinion is that not wide enough to cover the points raised?

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes, I think so. It is a brief term of reference, but it is very wide.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Very comprehensive.

Mr. Garson: Once we have remitted a subject of this sort to a royal commission then, as I think my hon. friend will certainly agree, we are bound to await their report. In the meantime I think the debate that has taken place is very helpful indeed, and I will see to it that it is brought to the attention of the commission.

Mr. Fulton: That of course was the whole point. Nothing much more need be said. The point of embarking upon a debate of even this brief duration was that the case to which I have referred and certain of the facts brought to the attention of this committee by the hon. member for Prince Albert do not form part of the substantive law, the Criminal Code of Canada, with respect to the defence of insanity. That is the very reason why I referred to it. If it should be felt that the case to which I have referred was properly decided—and I am making no comment on that one way or the other—then that should be written into the criminal law as an element of a defence rather than being left on the tenuous basis of a case decided upon the strength of a textbook citation which in itself is not founded on any decided case.

It seems to me if that is to be our law—and I am expressing no opinion upon that at the moment—then it should rest upon some surer foundation than it appears to rest on at the present time. That was why I brought it before the committee, so that attention might be directed to it and so that it might be put before the royal commission in concrete form in their deliberations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. A few days ago, speaking in the house during consideration of the Criminal Code amendments, I referred to the Balcombe case, and to the question of a change of venue. It has now been brought to my attention by Mr. J. M. P. Kelly, who was counsel for the accused, that there are some who might interpret my words as criticism of him for his failure to ask for a change of venue. That was not in my mind. There was no criticism implied or expressed, and I realized, as he informed me, that it would have been impossible to have succeeded in getting any better trial had he asked for a change of venue because of the widespread distribution of the magazines in question, which would have had an equally harmful effect anywhere else in Ontario.

I rise, sir, merely for the purpose of saying there was no implied criticism of Mr. Kelly. If he feels or anyone feels that there was, I want to make it clear that there was no such criticism or intention to make any unfair reference to him or his conduct of the case.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 88—Delivering firearms to minors.

Mr. Garson: I have an amendment to this clause to take care of a point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East, who stated he thought there should be an express prohibition of the sale of spring or switch knives. I would suggest, therefore, that my colleague the Minister of Public Works might move:

That clause 88 be amended by adding thereto the following subsection (3):

Every one who without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him, has in his possession or sells, barters, gives, lends, transfers or delivers a spring knife or switch knife is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Mr. Winters: I so move.

Mr. Winch: I want to express to the minister my appreciation of the introduction of this amendment. In the intervening weeks since I drew this matter to the attention of the house, I have read in the press reports concerning a number of cases where these spring knives or switch knives have been used by irresponsible youths with injury to those attacked. I fully realize it might be a little difficult in enforcement, but I do think that if the amendment on the statute books is properly publicized it will definitely act as a deterrent to the use and possession of these knives. I want to thank the minister for having accepted the proposal I made some weeks ago.

Mr. Shaw: The minister may recall that during the deliberations of our committee I brought up a matter under this section which was of some concern to me. I take it that, under section 88, even if a parent were to permit a minor to be in possession of a firearm, that would be an offence and the parent could be accused.

The thing that does bother me is the matter of a minor being in possession of a firearm while in company with his parents. It is not uncommon at all for a parent to take a lad of 13 hunting with him, perhaps hunting rabbits. The parent may have a gun in his possession and the boy may have a gun in his possession. A good many people believe that is quite within the law. I should like to know whether or not it is within the law, and just what is involved. If they are within the law in doing that, just when is it deemed that a minor is under the control of the parent?

From time to time I have noticed cases where action has been taken, and there seems to be a good deal of variance in the enforcement of the law in relation to this matter. I do not know whether the minister can pin this down to the point where he can indicate when a minor may be in the control of his parents.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if it would not be a better practice for the parent, whose minor child is in possession of a firearm, to bring himself within subsection 1:

> Every one who sells, barters, gives, lends, transfers or delivers a firearm, air-gun or air-pistol or ammunition therefor to a person under the age of fourteen years who does not have a valid permit in form 45 is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

If he gets the permit, that takes him out of that section. Then, subclause 2 reads:

> Notwithstanding section 96, a peace officer who finds a person under the age of fourteen years in possession of a firearm, air-gun, air-pistol or ammunition therefor without a valid permit in form 45 relating to that firearm, air-gun, air-pistol or ammunition may seize it . . .

If they have a permit to have it in their possession, that protects them.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 102—Frauds upon the government.

Mr. Philpott: When this clause was before this committee a few weeks ago, Mr. Chairman, a good many of the hon. members, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, suggested that, shall we say, this clause was very largely obsolete, to state it mildly. At that time I tried to point out, in asking the minister to allow this clause to stand, that if this clause were literally enforced in Canada the prisons would not be one-tenth large enough to hold all the people who would be there under the penalty imposed by subclause 3, which makes him liable to imprisonment for five years.

Subclause 2 plainly reads:

> Every one commits an offence who, being a party to a contract with the government—

I point out it does not say which government.

> —directly or indirectly subscribes, gives, or agrees to subscribe or give, to any person any valuable consideration (a) for the purpose of promoting the election of a candidate or a class or party of candidates . . .

Then it goes on to make it very clear that it does not make any difference to which party he subscribes. In other words, under a literal interpretation of this clause as it now stands, a person who had a contract with the dominion government, the government of British Columbia, the government of Alberta or the government of Saskatchewan, and who subscribed even to a party that was not supporting that government in question, according to my reading of it, is liable to five years' imprisonment.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that whatever else we do or do not do we should not have in this code anything that overlaps or contradicts any other legislation which deals more especially with any matter. We all know quite well that the problem with which we are striving to deal is dealt with in the Canada Elections Act in great detail. The act deals with everything connected with elections and the subscription of election funds. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West:

> That section 102, subsection (2) be amended by deleting the words after the words "every one commits an offence who," and substituting therefor "in order to obtain."

The amended clause would read as follows:

> Every one commits an offence who, in order to obtain a contract with the government directly or indirectly subscribes, gives, or agrees to subscribe or give, to any person any valuable consideration . . .

It seems to me that is the plain intent of the framers of this original clause. Certainly the time has come in this country when we can see the whole question of subscriptions to campaign funds of different parties on an honest, open and aboveboard basis. Apart altogether from the fact that people certainly subscribe to the party to which I have the honour to belong, I would point out that I belong to a labour organization in Canada which subscribes to the party which happens to sit opposite. I would point out that a strict interpretation of the clause as it now stands on the statute books would have the absurd effect, for instance, that if, shall we say, the bus drivers of the provincially-owned bus system of Saskatchewan which has a contract with the government of that province, presumably, wished to make a political contribution, as a good many other unions have done, they would be liable to five years in jail. That is the kind of statute which should never have got onto the statute books of this country at all. It has got on, and it is time we should make it say exactly what we think it should mean.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the amendment?

Mr. Knight: I wish to ask the minister for a definition of the word "contract" in clause 102 on page 37. In asking that question I should like to follow up the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South. He made some reference to the province of Saskatchewan, and that is the reason I ask this question. What is the position of a civil servant? Is a civil servant who is working for the government one who has contracted with the government and therefore comes under this clause? If that is so, I object, as I think my hon. friend means to do, most violently, to this particular clause. In the province of Saskatchewan we—and when I saw "we" I mean the people—and certainly the party to which I belong, believe that no limitation should be placed on the freedom of the civil servants either to think, act or work for a political party provided they do their work day by day in their jobs. At night they can make speeches for the Liberal party, the Conservative party or anybody they like. We maintain that is their right and privilege. Furthermore, we encourage them to do so because while I cannot quote the definite act in the province of Saskatchewan I believe there is such an act which allows the civil servants to do so under certain circumstances. The circumstances are that a civil servant may be standing for an office or for a seat in the legislature. The legislature of Saskatchewan actually allows the civil servant two weeks from his work in order that he may go out to promote the interests of his party. Why in the world should he not—because he happens to work for the government instead of working for a hardware store—have the same right to express his opinion in regard to the things which regulate his everyday life in the form of government? That is why I am particularly opposed to this.

I am not thinking politically now. My hon. friend on the other side belongs to the Liberal party; I belong to the C.C.F. party. I think any civil servant working anywhere for any government should not be restricted by any tie so long as he is an efficient civil servant in the department in which he is working. What he does with his spare time and what he thinks and how he thinks are precisely his own business and no one else's.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member for Vancouver South who moved the amendment whether it is his intention to make it illegal for a person to subscribe to campaign funds in order to obtain a contract, but not illegal for a person who already has a contract with the government to subscribe to those campaign funds? As I read his amendment, that will be the result. A person who subscribes to a campaign fund in order to obtain a contract would be committing a crime, but the person who already has a contract with the government can subscribe as much as he wishes and will not be committing any crime.

Mr. Philpott: Yes, that is exactly what I had in mind, because it seems to me the probable intent of this original clause was to make it a crime to try to bribe anybody in the government in order to get some benefit out of it. Certainly there is nothing in the common-sense intention of the law of this country to stop any individual or any organization from making legitimate political contributions.

Since we have expenditures running to the extent of $4½ billion a year for the federal authority alone, not to mention the provincial authority, just about everybody in this country has some kind of a contract with some kind of a government. If we had a literal interpretation of this particular clause and we actually carried it out the whole thing would be just a farce and nonsense. Therefore my intention was to try to make it a crime for anybody deliberately to make a contribution to try to bribe the government.

Mr. Knight: Will the minister give an answer to my question?

Mr. Garson: I shall endeavour to give my hon. friend as good an answer as I can. To begin with, I think the word "contract" as it is used in this clause, not having been defined in any interpretation section of this Bill No. 7, means a contract in the ordinary sense in which that word is used. I think that in that ordinary sense the word "contract" would have a very broad application. Whether it would apply to every single civil servant of any government whatever is another question. It might be that under the legislation under which a given civil servant was acting for a given government he was appointed during pleasure, or that there was some similar provision in legislation under which he was acting which made the relationship of master and servant between himself and the government for which he worked a legal arrangement other than a contract. But I do think that once that broad meaning, the ordinary dictionary meaning, or ordinary meaning that we usually associate with the word "contract", is given to the word "contract" in this subsection, it does—and in this regard I am quite in agreement with the mover of the amendment—produce a result which is quite absurd. Because it seems to me to be a most extraordinary proposition that anyone who had a contract with the government should be deprived from, shall we say, making a contribution to the campaign funds of a party or a candidate, even one that was opposed to the government.

The theory of this clause, I suppose, is that if the holder of a contract with the government makes a contribution to the government party's campaign funds, the existence of the contract plus the contribution is an impropriety or indicates an improper relationship. But this clause goes much further than that. A strict application of this law would mean that those who had relationships with the government, whether as civil servants or otherwise, which would fall within the term "contract", would be thereby debarred from making any contribution to any political party or candidate whatsoever in Canada.

I think I should make an explanation to members of the house for this clause now before them. This clause or its substantial equivalent has been in the Criminal Code since Sir John Thompson introduced it originally in 1892. So far as I have been able to find out, this section has never been interpreted by the courts between 1892 and now.

The commission engaged in consolidating the code acted wholly within its terms of reference in dealing with this clause. It felt that it was not its duty to change the law, so it simplified its form and left the substance unchanged.

When the clause came to us from the commission it seemed to me that this was the kind of clause which neither the Minister of Justice nor the Department of Justice nor the government should undertake to change. We decided that we should bring it to parliament and let parliament decide whether it wished to approve of it. That is the reason it appears before the members in its present form. It does not carry any endorsement from us, I may say, because in some respects it is rather absurd.

For my part, and I may say that in this regard I am speaking for the government, we would have no objection to accepting the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver South. We think it will result in an enactment which will be more sensible than was this clause in the form in which we received it from the commission, and that the enactment resulting from such an amendment will stand examination.

Mr. MacInnis: I remember referring to this section during the sittings last year of the parliamentary committee. When I questioned the Minister of Justice he indicated an unusual readiness to accept the amendment and it made me a little suspicious. I did not offer the amendment; I let it drop. When I found that such an astute person as the minister was ready to amend a section of the Criminal Code it appeared better for me, who knew so little about it, to let things stand as they were.

I imagine that this section has never been used and I am not so sure that it will be very much more effective with the amendment. I am always leery of what my hon. friends opposite do in matters of this kind because they are the chief beneficiaries of contributions by and large. I brought this up at a meeting where we had the president of the Steel Company of Canada on the witness stand. He reluctantly admitted that they made contributions to political parties and when I asked which parties, he refused to answer. As far as I was concerned, it was not necessary for him to answer because I knew that none of their contributions came to the C.C.F. It was quite easy to know who the other parties were, merely by elimination.

Referring to what the hon. member for Saskatoon has said in regard to civil servants, personally I do not agree with him as to their being given freedom to engage in political activity. I think it would depend on whether the civil servant was in a minor position or whether he had access to confidential information. A deputy minister or an important secretary should not be allowed full freedom during an election and then be able to go back to his office when he had had access to all kinds of confidential information. I do not think that that should be allowed. It is one of the penalties that a person has to pay, I imagine, for having the honour of filling a high position in the civil service of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: I think the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra should be pursued a little further, particularly in view of the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver South accepts the interpretation placed upon his amendment by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. It seems to me that if the amendment is accepted the position will be that a firm which already has a contract with the government can make all the contributions it wishes and have no fear of this section of the Criminal Code being applied, whereas the firm which has not a contract cannot make such contributions without fear that that act will be suspect. I have no objection to the latter interpretation being the result, but I am concerned about the former, namely, those contractors who already have contracts with the government being in the clear so far as this section is concerned.

There is one other point I have in mind which I shall state briefly. I do not think this is of as much concern as the question I just raised about the amendment. I notice that in its very laudable objective of cutting down verbiage the wording in the code as it now stands has been reduced considerably at this point. We now have just the word "contract", whereas in the old section it read:

...having any contract with the government for the performance of any work, the doing of any thing, or the furnishing of any goods, effects, food or materials, and having or expecting to have any claim or demand against the government by reason of such contract, directly or indirectly . . .

While that wording may have been excessive in terms of the number of words, I think it made it a little more clear as to what was meant by a contract. That would appear to mean a contract between a person or firm for the supplying of certain goods or the doing of certain work for the government. I wonder if reducing it to the one word "contract" has not made it so broad that it will be difficult for the courts to interpret.

Mr. Philpott: I want to make it quite clear that in answering the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra I was trying to put it on a broader basis. What I was trying to do was to word it in such a way that no one could obtain any kind of benefit by political contributions, either to obtain a contract or, for that matter, to retain a contract. If it would make it any clearer, with the permission of my seconder I would have no objection to adding the words "in order to obtain, or retain a contract". Would that clarify the sense of it?

Mr. Green: What I had in mind was that it does not seem right to prohibit one action and not the other. I think that if you are going to prohibit a man from trying to get a contract, you should also prohibit a man who has already a contract trying to retain favour with the government by donating campaign funds. I do not see why one man should be made the goat and the other a sheep.

Mr. Fulton: I had an amendment which I had drafted which I think would deal with the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. Perhaps it should be moved at a later stage if and when the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver South is accepted. It would be to amend the clause by adding after the words "with the government" in the eighteenth line the words "or as a term of any such contract, whether expressed or implied". The clause then reads:

Every one commits an offence who, in order to obtain a contract with the government or as a term of any such contract whether expressed or implied, directly or indirectly—

—etc. It seems to me that the purpose of the clause is sufficiently clear. It was designed to prevent a person getting a contract by promising that if he got a contract he would make a contribution to party funds. My hon. friend from Vancouver South has tried to confine it more specifically to the attempt to obtain a contract by making such a promise. I believe, though, that the words he uses leave it open to the person who has a contract to say, "Well, if you give me another contract I will give you a kickback out of the one I have already obtained." I believe both possibilities should be covered and I think the second possibility might well be covered by the use of the words I have suggested.

Mr. Philpott: For my part I am quite willing to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kamloops if the words suggested appear all right to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Mang: Mr. Chairman, the expression "kickback" rings a bell with me, coming as I do from Saskatchewan. I would like to know how this would affect the Saskatchewan C.C.F. government as regards oil deals and contracts.

Mr. Garson: First, I would like to answer the question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with reference to this clause. In my view the fewer adequate words used in a statute, the better drawn the statute will generally be, and the clause in

Bill No. 7 covers no less ground than does section 158 (i) of the present code, which reads as follows:

(i) having any contract with the government for the performance of any work, the doing of any thing, or the furnishing of any goods, effects, food or materials—

—and so on. I believe the single word "contract" covers all that is covered by the larger number of words in this subsection. One point which I believe deserves consideration, especially by members of the committee, is that we do not necessarily cover a wider area of application by using a lot of words. We can cover a wider area by using fewer words, if they are the right ones. For example, if you wanted a charter of very broad application and applied to the Secretary of State, the widest kind of charter you could get would be one permitting you to carry on trade or to do business—if they ever gave it to you. The kind of charter which is not so good is one specifying exactly what you can or cannot do. The word "contract" as it is used in this bill is of very wide application, so wide indeed that it is a little difficult to say without knowing the facts whether it will apply to the arrangement that civil servant A has with the employing government, and to a quite different arrangement that civil servant B may have with his government, or to a union having a labour agreement. It would be covered in one case but not necessarily in the others. It is of quite wide application.

Mr. Knowles: But, Mr. Chairman, is that not just the point? That one word does cover a much wider territory than the longer wording will, but it is so wide that the court will not know what it means. The court will say, "Surely parliament did not mean that someone drawing a family allowance cheque has a contract with the government". Yet that may be the effect.

Mr. Garson: But surely no one can argue that a person drawing a family allowance cheque has a contract with the government. A person might draw a family allowance cheque but he is doing nothing in consideration of the payment he receives. He simply receives it. A contract between two parties contemplates that the parties agree that each will do certain things in relation to one another for certain payments or considerations passing between them. The only difference between these two references in the present code on the one hand, and in Bill No. 7 on the other, is that one specifies a contract covering goods, effects, food or materials, and the other simply specifies a contract. But it is no less a contract, and in order to cover all of the things a contract could cover you would require a much longer section than is contained in the present code.

While I am on my feet I would like to say with reference to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kamloops that, like the hon. member for Vancouver South, I have no objection to it whatsoever and I believe it would strengthen the clause.

Mr. Philpott: In that event, Mr. Chairman, I would like to move my amendment concerning the words "in order to obtain or retain".

Mr. Fulton: As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Vancouver South wishes to add the words "in order to obtain or retain" so that the clause will read:

(2) Every one commits an offence who, in order to obtain or retain a contract with the government directly or indirectly subscribes, etc. I understand we are generally agreed that his wording be accepted, and if so I will thereupon move my amendment.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister would explain how one can make a contract with the government indirectly.

Mr. Garson: I believe the words "directly or indirectly" modify "subscribes, gives or agrees". The clause without amendment reads as follows:

Every one commits an offence who, being a party to a contract with the government directly or indirectly subscribes, gives, or agrees to subscribe or give, to any person any valuable consideration.

There should be a comma after "government".

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I move that a comma be put in.

The Chairman: Do I understand the hon. member for Vancouver South is now moving an amendment in these terms, that the words "being a party to" be deleted from clause 102, subsection 2, and that the following words be substituted therefor: "in order to obtain or retain"?

Mr. Philpott: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Mang: I would like to know whether there is a way of getting at under-the-table deals. I am not making any accusation but some of us in Saskatchewan suspect that there are under-the-table deals with kickbacks and so forth. Will this amendment take care of that?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, might I then move that the clause as amended be amended by adding thereto after the words "with the government" in line 18 the words "or as a term of any such contract whether expressed or implied".

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt this amendment?

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether somewhere in this process we have got a comma in after "government"?

Mr. Garson: Yes. It was put in in the hon. member's motion.

Mr. Knowles: In this amendment which is now before us?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: It started with a comma.

Mr. Garson: It started with a comma and I believe it ended with a comma. I apprehend that the clause will read in this way:

> Every one commits an offence who in order to obtain or retain a contract with the government or as a term of any such contract whether expressed or implied, directly or indirectly subscribes, gives, or agrees to subscribe or give to any person any valuable consideration . . .

—et cetera.

The Chairman: Shall this amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 116—Witness giving contradictory evidence.

Mr. Fulton: I do not wish to debate the point at any length, but I must say that I am unable to agree to the clause as it now stands. I accept the fact that the house committee last year, after lengthy discussion, added what amounts to saving words when they inserted the words:

> . . . but no person shall be convicted under this section unless the court, judge or magistrate, as the case may be, is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused, in giving evidence in either of the judicial proceedings, intended to mislead.

Nevertheless, the effect of the section it seems to me will inevitably be to discourage a witness who made an error in his evidence on, let us say, the preliminary hearing. That error having been an error made in good faith, the section will discourage him from changing his evidence to what, on sober reflection, he decides is more in accordance with the facts so that the truth may come out and justice may be done at the trial if the accused has been committed for trial as a result of that preliminary hearing.

I have no cause with the man who deliberately gives wrong evidence or false evidence at one judicial proceeding, whether it be a preliminary hearing or whatever it may be, and who then, for some real or fancied personal advantage, changes his evidence at some subsequent proceeding. I have no sympathy with him whatsoever. But, as we all know, there are cases where, perhaps as a result of pressure or perhaps as a result of mistaken zeal to assist in the prosecution, a statement is made on the one occasion or in the one judicial proceeding. I am quite sure we all know of cases where people make statements and tend to stick to them. Perhaps even some of us here might be guilty. There is a certain stubbornness about people, who, once having made a statement, are going to stick by it. Hon. gentlemen opposite taunt us with lack of consistency if we change our statements. That is, of course, what would happen here. We are now referring to judicial proceedings. It is a well known fact that, once having made a statement, a person is inclined to stick by it; but occasionally he can be persuaded to change it if it is clearly proved to him that it was wrong in the first instance and if it is clearly proved to him that the cause of justice demands that he change his statement.

What is his position now? Having once made a statement at the first judicial proceeding, the mere fact of changing it at a subsequent proceeding exposes him to a charge of perjury. The crown does not have to prove which statement was right or which one was wrong. I should perhaps say that the crown has to prove that one of them was made with intent to mislead. Perhaps I should have read the whole thing to start with. The section contains these words. It states that the man who does this . . .

> . . . is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for fourteen years, whether or not the prior or the later evidence or either of them is true, . . .

The crown does not have to prove that either of them is true or that either of them is false. All it has to prove is that there has been a change.

Mr. Garson: It has to prove a great deal more than that.

Mr. Fulton: It has to prove that one of them was made with intent to mislead. The crown no longer has to decide which is the true one and which is the false one and lay the charge accordingly. All that has to happen is for the man to change his story or—perhaps I will put it this way and I think it is correct—to correct his story or to correct his statement—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the point.

Mr. Fulton: —between one judicial proceeding and the other, and he exposes himself to the liability of prosecution for perjury. Then we couple with that what I have already referred to as the innate desire of a person to appear consistent, the reluctance to change a statement. Suppose your counsel comes to him and says, "In the interests of justice, in order that this man may not be unfairly convicted, you must reconsider this matter and correct your statement." He says, "What is my position?" A conscientious counsel has to tell him, "I am sorry, but under section 116, the new section of the code, you are liable to a charge of perjury; but notwithstanding that, I beg of you to change your statement." What is he going to say? He is going to say, "You will have to find somebody else. I am sticking by my former statement." It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the interests of justice will be anything but furthered by enacting this new clause. I am sorry, but I must oppose it and my colleagues here feel the same way as I do about it.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, the note with regard to this clause says that it is new; that is, that it had not been in the old Criminal Code. We got along very well from 1892 until 1954, without any great harm coming to the country. We seem to have prospered. We are thought highly of by our neighbours and we think highly of ourselves; yet we have not had this section in the Criminal Code all these years. In the committee we had a long discussion on this matter. Those of us who are not lawyers saw clearly that here is a case where a person would not be punished for giving false evidence provided he insisted on giving false evidence. But if he gave false evidence and then, on consideration, feeling that it was false, decided to give true evidence, he would be punished; and he would also be punished if he did it in the reverse order. He would not be punished for lying, something which might have its effect on the freedom or the punishment that some other individual would get. He was punished for changing his evidence from true to false or false to true. We hammered away on that, and it is just as ridiculous as it sounds. The section was amended to the form in which it now appears. It reads:

> Every one who, being a witness in a judicial proceeding, gives evidence with respect to any matter of fact or knowledge and who subsequently, in a judicial proceeding, gives evidence that is contrary to his previous evidence is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for fourteen years, whether or not the prior or the later evidence or either of them is true, but no person shall be convicted under this section unless the court, judge or magistrate, as the case may be, is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused, in giving evidence in either of the judicial proceedings, intended to mislead.

Does a judge not have that power as the law stands at the present time? He can say that a man's evidence is false. I have heard judges make that kind of statement and subsequently the person has been prosecuted for perjury. Could we not get along without this clause at all? Lawyers know much better than a layman like myself whether it is necessary to have this clause in the code. There are other sections dealing with perjury. Why have this section at all?

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Shaw: We feel that we understand and fully appreciate what the minister is trying to cover in clause 116, but we are a bit afraid of it as it is now worded. It has a saving provision, but personally I am motivated in my thinking by an experience I had about sixteen years ago. The incident took place in a magistrate's court. An individual was charged under about four sections of the Criminal Code. I was not the accused and I was not a witness but I was an interested spectator because it so happened that I knew practically all the facts relative to the case. The accused came before the court. An R.C.M.P. constable prosecuted and I must confess, as I told the constable later, that I regretted very much that I was not the accused under those circumstances. The accused was browbeaten from the time the trial started until it finished. The accused was frightened to death. He had never been in court in his life before and he was frightened almost to the point where he could not talk. Words were put in his mouth.

I may say that the man had already pleaded guilty at the outset, but in an endeavour to have the heaviest penalty imposed, I believe, the R.C.M.P. constable put words in his mouth and actually browbeat the man until he was saying things and admitting things that I knew were absolutely false because I knew all the circumstances of the case. It so happened that the case was disposed of in that court and the chap was given the maximum penalty. I can well imagine that accused being a witness under similar circumstances. This may be an isolated case but I am a bit fearful of what could happen under clause 116.

Of course there is also the danger referred to by the hon. member who preceded me. Once a person has, for some reason or other, given false evidence, there is only one safe thing for him to do and that is to stick by it. I realize from what the minister said in the committee that an attempt must be made to do away with outright perjury but I wonder whether we are accomplishing the purpose safely under clause 116. I do not know how it could be worded to remove the possibilities of danger. Maybe there is no other way of doing it, but I cannot help thinking of the case to which I have referred and which, as I say, was an isolated case. If that man had been a witness in a preliminary hearing in a magistrate's court and the case had been sent to another court the authorities would have got him for perjury and yet there would have been no intent whatsoever in that man's mind to commit perjury. Possibly he would have calmed down by the time he appeared in the higher court. He might have been advised to tell the truth.

Of course, I realize too that it must be clearly established beyond doubt that the person did not intend to mislead. While that may sound all right, it is often a very hard thing to prove. As I say, we appreciate the purpose of trying to have some such provision in the code, but I and my colleagues shiver a wee bit when we think of what may happen.

Mr. Garson: I respect the views of those who have spoken against this provision, for I happen to know that they are the sincere views which have been expressed on previous occasions in the House of Commons committee. But I think the views which inspired the insertion of this clause in the bill are equally sincere and conscientious, and equally well informed.

Surely we are all agreed that one of the most indispensable ingredients of the rendering of justice is that witnesses who go into the witness box should tell the truth. If the majority of the witnesses do not tell the truth, the direct result is going to be grave injustices inflicted upon individual parties to prosecutions and lawsuits.

If the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway were on trial for his life, I am sure he would have a very profound interest in the witnesses who were testifying in that trial telling the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

Mr. MacInnis: Would he not have an equally profound interest in the witnesses correcting an untruth if they told it?

Mr. Garson: I shall deal with that in due course. First of all I want to emphasize the seriousness of the subject matter with which we are dealing. There is hardly any clause in the whole code the principle of which is more important to the administration of justice than this one. There is hardly any crime which has a worse effect upon the administration of justice and upon the question whether citizens are to receive justice than perjury, for if we have more than a certain amount of perjured testimony in the courts the administration of justice becomes impossible.

Against that sort of background, let me add this. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has said that this is a new clause. He has said that our employment has been maintained, that our production is high, that our prosperity has been great in the interval, and that we have got along very well without having this clause. I suggest that the economic phenomena to which he has referred have nothing to do with the administration of justice, and that even with more production and great prosperity we could still have people going to jail falsely accused and falsely proven to have been guilty.

The reason for this clause being inserted in the new Criminal Code was the growing practice of irresponsible witnesses making statements at different stages of a given trial which were quite inconsistent with one another and when it was quite obviously the fact that certainly one of these statements was false, and perhaps both.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister say whether there have been many miscarriages of justice arising out of such a practice?

Mr. Garson: No, I could not say, for my hon. friend knows that in order for anyone to make that statement, he would have to be able to trace the injustice back to the evidence which produced it; and he would have to know what I think only the Deity would know, what portions of the evidence produced the conviction, which portions of the evidence were correct, and which portions were incorrect.

In these cases the crown has been faced with an almost insuperable difficulty. I suppose the average layman would say, "If the witness swore to a statement on a certain occasion and swore to an entirely different statement on another occasion, ascertain which of those two is incorrect and lay a charge of perjury against him in respect of that incorrect statement". In some of these cases, however, I am informed it is impossible to know which of these two statements is false. In some cases both of them may be false, yet they are given under oath. I should like to know whether it is just, that one man makes a statement under oath, he makes it deliberately intending to commit perjury and he is prosecuted; whereas another man who, intending to commit perjury, makes two statements which are completely inconsistent with one another is not prosecuted. Why? Because the crown cannot prove which of the two is untrue.

Surely, therefore, there is a good moral foundation for this section. But I agree that the further question which arises is as to whether the means which we are proposing to provide in this section are practical, and whether they are likely to result in a just trial of an accused charged under this clause. I am free to confess, Mr. Chairman, and I have never disguised the fact when this clause has been under discussion, that in its original form it was open to serious objection.

Last year in the proceedings in the special committee of the House of Commons appointed to consider this bill, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway made an excellent contribution to the debate and to clearing up the point to which I shall now refer. He and other committee members took objection to the form in which the clause was at that time. It then read this way:

> Every one who, being a witness in a judicial proceeding, gives evidence with respect to any matter of fact or knowledge and who subsequently, in a judicial proceeding, gives evidence that is contrary to his previous evidence is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for fourteen years, whether or not the prior or the later evidence or either of them is true—

Now, this is the way the remainder of the clause read at that time.

> —unless he establishes that none of the evidence was given with intent to mislead.

As the clause was drawn at that time, all the crown needed to do was lay a charge under this clause, and prove that the accused on such and such a date testified upon oath that so and so was the case, and at a later date he testified upon oath that something very different was the case. The crown did not have to prove that either of those statements was true. At this point the crown will rest its case, and the effect of the original draft was to throw upon the accused the onus, which under the British law should always be upon the crown, to prove the case against the accused beyond all reasonable doubt. The accused thereupon would have to go into the box and establish that none of the false evidence proven against him had been sworn to by him with intent to mislead.

At that stage, all of the criticisms which have been offered by those who have taken part in this debate this afternoon would have been justified. It was for the purpose of meeting such criticisms as we have heard this afternoon that a very great change was effected in this clause in the committee. The change was effected in this way. We struck out the words:

> . . . unless he establishes that none of the evidence was given with intent to mislead.

And we substituted for those words the following:

> . . . but no person shall be convicted under this section unless the court, judge or magistrate, as the case may be, is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused, in giving evidence in either of the judicial proceedings, intended to mislead.

So that the crown not only has to prove those ingredients which I have mentioned already but has to go on, before the accused has any onus placed upon him whatever, and prove beyond a reasonable doubt that in giving evidence in either one of those proceedings, the accused deliberately intended to mislead the court. Sir, if they prove that, then they prove no more than the crown has to prove in any prosecution for perjury.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend can make his remarks later on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is something more. Previously the crown had to prove that one or the other statement was false.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is quite right but I have already covered that in my previous remarks. But the crown has to prove here that the accused intended to mislead.

In the case cited by the hon. member for Red Deer, I presume that the accused was not represented by counsel; is that not right? My hon. friend from Red Deer nods that is the case. If the accused had given different evidence on a subsequent occasion and was then prosecuted under this section, I presume his counsel would be able to show from the report of the proceedings, the nature of the cross-examination under which he had gone; the fact he had no counsel, and that here was a poor chap who had been bulldozed into confusion, so obviously he had not made these statements with intent to mislead. By the new wording this onus of proving intent to mislead is left entirely upon the crown, as it should be.

One of the results of the efforts of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, the hon. member for Red Deer and other members of the committee is that we have here a clause that is much better, I admit, than the one which came from the royal commission. But that is not the only protection which the committee provided for the accused. It was charged there was a possibility that this clause might be used improperly and irresponsibly for the purpose of bringing pressure to bear upon the accused and that unfair prosecution would be launched under this clause.

The committee accordingly provided in subclause 3:

> No proceedings shall be instituted under this section without the consent of the attorney general.

If a trivial case of this kind arose, under this clause, I am very sure no crown prosecutor would bother a busy attorney general to go through such a case before authorizing prosecution. He would not get too much consideration if he encroached on the time of the attorney general in that way. I would think that only serious cases would go before the attorney general, and in a serious case my personal opinion is that the crown should go on with it and stamp out this practice of giving irresponsible statements under oath, which may be the means of sending innocent people to prison.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With what my learned friend says, that everything that can be done should be done to stamp out perjury, which is rampant in our courts, I am in agreement. But I am somewhat concerned over this section, even in its revised form. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway caused a tremendous light to be thrown on this clause by the few words he uttered in this house today. He said he was only a layman. Well, after all, laymen are the individuals who created the common law of our country and the common law of Great Britain. His views clarified the situation, as no one but a layman could have done.

Every one of us wants to see perjury outlawed from our courts and punished where it takes place; but what impresses me about this section is that, if my understanding is correct, the Canadian Bar Association discussed it on several occasions and refused to recommend it. The Canadian Bar Association is composed of the best counsel and solicitors in our country. They meet year after year. On the committee on criminal law there are outstanding representatives of crown and defence counsel. As I remember it, this question was discussed at great length at the bar meeting at Vancouver some two or three years ago. The tremendous danger inherent in it was referred to counsel not only for the defence but for the crown.

Mr. Garson: May I ask a question? Was the view of the Canadian Bar Association not reached in relation to the clause in its original form?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was one of the strong objections; and this section, sir, is another of those that seem to indicate that the recommendations were made by crown prosecutors generally, or those who in the past have been members of prosecution staffs. There were some defence counsel, representative of the best in our country, on that commission. This is a clause which in its desire to punish perjury has put a premium on its continuance.

I mention one example; it is a case that was before the courts. After all, it is in practice that one sees the application of matters such as this. How often does the outcome of a case depend on identification? You, sir, as a member of the bar know how often identification is based on error; how often we return to our homes and say that we have seen a certain person on a certain day. We have known that person, and a few days later we find that the individual was not around.

Identification is easily made. An arrest takes place. A parade may take place, or often a parade does not take place, but the individual has seen a picture of the accused in the press. That individual goes on the stand at the preliminary hearing and says, "I identify this accused as the man." Later on, as he considers the matter and events are brought to his attention he begins to realize that he is not quite so certain. Finally at the trial, in the course of cross-examination, or in examination in chief, he says, "I have come to the conclusion that I cannot identify this person." Suppose he does that in cross-examination? As the law now is he stands in no jeopardy. As the law will be, if it is changed—

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend says "no". As the law will be if it is changed there will be a fear in his mind. He will say, "If I dare to admit the probability or the possibility of error in my earlier evidence I stand in jeopardy. I will be in a position where I can be prosecuted." The Minister of Justice says, "It must be established that he intended to mislead." Fine points such as these are not in the minds of witnesses.

Mr. Garson: May I ask another question? Is my hon. friend arguing that solely because a witness's evidence in chief does not stand up under cross-examination he thereby becomes liable under this clause? Because if he is I certainly would not agree with him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; it is a fact, if the man gives evidence on preliminary hearing and then changes it. Suppose there is no counsel. The matter comes to trial. The witness gives the same evidence in his examination in chief. In cross-examination he changes that, he waters it down, he decides that he may have been in error. Then his evidence at the trial will be in conflict with the evidence at the preliminary hearing, because all the evidence has to be considered and he has placed himself in jeopardy.

Mr. Garson: Does my hon. friend suggest that it would be possible to prove an intent to mislead under those circumstances?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, those fine distinctions are not in the mind of the witnesses.

Mr. Garson: But there has to be that distinction; it is an onus the crown must discharge before it can prove a case under this clause.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Witnesses know they are liable to be prosecuted if they alter their evidence in any particular. What this does, I repeat, Mr. Chairman, is to place the witness in a desperate position. He is in the position often described as between the devil and the deep blue sea. If he admits at the trial that he was in error at the preliminary hearing, then he is subject to prosecution. Whether there would be a conviction is another thing, because of the question of intent to which my hon. friend makes reference, but there is nothing to prevent him from being prosecuted and tried.

Mr. Garson: May I ask another question? Can my hon. friend imagine any provincial attorney general in Canada ever authorizing a prosecution under those circumstances? I certainly cannot.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I am not going to enter into an argument about what attorneys general would do, but I say this. Police officers would be awfully annoyed at the change of front on the part of the witness if it resulted in a verdict of acquittal. The police officers are under the direction of the attorney general. I have heard my hon. friend on many occasions endeavour to exculpate himself for failure to act in reference to criminal law on the ground that it is the responsibility of the attorney general of the province. The police officers are under the direction of the attorney general. The attorney general will have placed before him the evidence of the police officers. There is no discretion there, as I see it. Naturally the police officers will feel that they have been deprived of an advantage by the change of front.

Many of them, human beings as they are, would certainly feel disposed to recommend prosecution. Personally I cannot see why a section that is and has been for many years the law of Britain, and has been our law, should be changed. My hon. friend fairly admitted that he is not in a position to say there have been many miscarriages of justice by reason of the law being what it has been for the last hundred years. I can see no reason for a change which has the effect of placing an accused in jeopardy. It is not that we want to see the guilty escape, but we do not want an innocent man convicted because some witness of the crown, having given evidence, dared not change it.

This section, as I see it, after listening to my hon. friend—and I listened to his explanation with profound interest—has in it tremendous dangers to the administration of justice. In assuring that justice be done to the individual it places the crown in a position where it will be able to say, "We have a witness who gave certain evidence at the preliminary hearing."

Then they are in position to say, "Don't change that story, because there is a section that provides that under those circumstances you may be prosecuted." Whether or not he will be, the fact is that he will be in jeopardy. No one wants to see the administration of justice such that if the truth could be told an accused would be found innocent, but where those who would tell the truth are placed in the position of being awarded a premium for continuing to tell what is false.

Mr. Gillis: If a layman may butt in for a few minutes, the hon. member for Dauphin has just reminded me that the question we are discussing now is perjury, and that perjury is when you are lying and get caught at it. I think that is a pretty good definition. The hon. member for Prince Albert said the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway did not do a bad job as a layman. It is generally laymen who are tried under the Criminal Code. You do not generally find very many lawyers on the wrong side of the judge and that is why laymen should be interested.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was not implying or suggesting that laymen should not speak. I was simply commending my hon. friend on the clarity with which he placed the matter before the committee.

Mr. Gillis: I understood that perfectly well. I am just reminding my hon. friend that more laymen should be interested in the law. As far as I am concerned I do not see very much wrong with this clause. One good thing about this revision of the Criminal Code is that a lot of people are going to find out something about it. I have never had anyone who has written me when in jail or who has come to see me when about to go to jail who was not innocent. I have never yet met anyone who admitted he committed a crime. They always claim they are innocent, that they were framed. They contend that false evidence was given against them. I think that is an indication that there is some need for this kind of thing.

I believe the safeguards are pretty tight. A judge must be convinced that the evidence is intended to mislead. If he makes an error it may be corrected by the attorney general. In discussing this particular clause it is always assumed that some poor innocent person who is not in any position to defend himself is the culprit who is going to put in evidence that is intended to mislead. But I think this section works both ways, or I hope it will.

I sat in court listening to a trial in which I was interested for the same reason as the hon. member for Red Deer, because I was acquainted with the people concerned. The accused had counsel, and the case was tried before the local magistrate. The accused brought four or five reliable witnesses to give evidence, but then a member of the R.C.M.P. walked in to give evidence. That magistrate had a look in his eye like that of a bad horse, and I am convinced that the accused was convicted before it started. I had listened to several cases, and it seemed to me that the magistrate had a stock way of listening. There was no comment, just the same fine for everybody. I heard the mountie give evidence, and I heard the accused give evidence. By the way, it was a medical doctor who was concerned. I heard the four or five witnesses give evidence. The evidence given by those six people indicated that the mountie was lying all over the place. It was false evidence right along the line. Nevertheless, when the magistrate had to decide he simply said, "Guilty; $50. Next case."

I am assuming that an accused could appeal a case like that under this section and charge the mounted policeman with having given false evidence before that court to mislead the magistrate. I think it would work under this section of the Criminal Code. There is protection there. It is not unusual today in many sections of this world for a lawyer who practises criminal law to have in his locality or close by witnesses who can be hired—they make a living out of it—to swear to anything. After there has been a session of the court, if it is necessary to change the evidence they have given, they say they had a lapse of memory and they swing it around to suit the case the following day. That may not be done so much in the smaller sections, but it is definitely done in the larger sections of Canada and the United States.

We got along without this type of thing for a good many years, and none of us can say how many people have gone to jail because of false evidence. As I said before, everyone I have talked to claimed that he was framed, that the evidence was wrong. It might have been so in many cases. This is a big improvement over what was first proposed. As far as I am concerned I think there are many safeguards in it.

I am interested in this not only from the angle of having witnesses tell the truth, though I agree with the Minister of Justice that if people do not want to see justice administered fairly, if they are not prepared to go into court and tell the truth, then it will not be easy to administer justice. We must remember that prosecutors do not all sprout wings. They are the people who bring you into court and many of them are interested in getting convictions and will use any means at their disposal. If a man has money with which to hire counsel, and his counsel is not satisfied that the evidence put in by the prosecution is proper and was intended to mislead in order to get a conviction, he has redress in my opinion under this section. He can appeal and accuse the people who put in the false evidence. I would be prepared to take a chance on it.

Mr. Fulton: In view of what has been said by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, I think we should bear in mind that the possibility of prosecution for perjury under this section would apply not only to those who give evidence in criminal cases but to those who give evidence in civil cases.

Mr. Gillis: Fair enough.

Mr. Fulton: What my hon. friend has said would perhaps be applicable if we accepted as a principle that a person could never be mistaken. If he is prepared to say that a person should never make a mistake, that if he does make a mistake he should be prosecuted, then I think his case would be logical.

Mr. Gillis: The section provides for that.

Mr. Fulton: When we assume the possibility of mistake, when we assume that the result of a mistake may be to mislead, then I think we will see the danger of the section. I think the minister will agree with me that an examination for discovery is a judicial procedure. An examination for discovery is the first step in a civil case. A person who comes in for examination for discovery probably has not had a chance to talk over the matter with others who are concerned in the accident, if we assume it is a case for damages arising out of an accident. He may well make a statement on examination for discovery which is made purely as the result of a mistake. He repeats that statement before a jury, if there is a jury, or before a judge, if it happens to be a judge.

What is the effect of that statement? The effect of a statement as to the distance between the two automobiles will certainly be to mislead, that is if the statement is given credence. He has made a statement which is wrong or mistaken, and when he is cross-examined he begins to recall the facts. Now, what is he to do? Is he to stick by his statement knowing that if he changes it he may be prosecuted under section 116, or is he to admit, as my hon. friend from Vancouver-Kingsway suggests, what he now realizes to be the truth, knowing all the time he may be prosecuted under this statute, and that if he does not do so he will be free from prosecution? Would not justice be better served if he were free to correct his first erroneous statement? But if he does correct it he is liable to prosecution, and I suggest there will be many miscarriages of justice if such a situation is allowed to continue. I would urge hon. members to vote against this clause.

Mr. Garson: If the problem my hon. friend has just stated is the only thing which bothers him then I can—

Mr. Fulton: It is only one example.

Mr. Garson: I feel the answer to this is very simple and while my hon. friend may not be prepared to accept my answer I would point out that if a person makes a statement during the examination for discovery when he is under oath, and he makes it in good faith, it is not perjury. He does not intend to mislead anyone. If, afterwards, he finds he was in error all he has to do when the case comes up for trial is to say, "Your lordship, I am very sorry but on my examination for discovery I made a mistake. I made this mistake in perfect good faith. The distance between the two automobiles was not, as I stated, 75 feet. On checking up on the matter I now find that the proper distance was 50 feet." Not having made the statement in the first place with the intent to mislead, and having corrected it on the first occasion on which he could do so then no one could possibly say that he was guilty under this section.

My hon. friend from Cape Breton South, who is not a lawyer, appears to understand this, but my lawyer friends apparently do not understand it. Before there can be an offence under this clause these conflicting statements have to be made for the purpose of misleading. If they are not made to mislead, and if the person who makes them believed he made them truthfully at the time that he made them and then corrects them as soon as possible, then he could not be guilty under this clause. He might have made that statement truthfully, as he thought, and then he might discover he was wrong when he comes under cross-examination by a skilful cross-examiner with an analytical mind. But that still does not make him guilty of perjury. He only has to say on the first possible occasion, "Well, my lord, I am very sorry but certain questions which the learned counsel has asked me have made me clear now in my own mind that the evidence I gave before is incorrect".

Mr. Diefenbaker: What would happen to his credibility?

Mr. Garson: His credibility for the purpose of that case would be zero, as it should be. I believe my hon. friend has the bias of a defence counsel on these matters, but what is the alternative? This man's credibility would be zero because it is by that means that injustices are avoided in court proceedings.

When my hon. friend said in his remarks that I had not been able to point to any injustices having arisen because of the passing of this section, I believe he was incorrect. Hansard will show what I did say. I said there are an increasing number of cases—and I think he agreed with me in this regard when he said that perjury was rampant in the courts—in which people come into the witness box and impudently state on one occasion that so and so was the case, and on another occasion in the same case state something entirely different. There cannot be a more aggravated form of perjury.

I know of one case in my own province where a man was up on a charge of murder. His life was at stake, and the case hinged largely upon the evidence of a woman who had told a certain story to the police.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that the Deacon case?

Mr. Garson: Yes. Perhaps my hon. friend knows the case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is reported.

Mr. Garson: Yes; it went to trial two or three times. But this one case hinged largely on the evidence of a woman and because it changed the taxpayers were put to all that expense, and the man was tried, I believe, three times before finally being acquitted. Now, is it not proper—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister referring to the Deacon case?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was executed.

Mr. Knowles: There is quite a difference there.

Mr. Garson: I stand corrected. My hon. friend is right, he was acquitted on two occasions and on the third trial there was a verdict of guilty and he was finally executed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; there was one disagreement and then a conviction, and then the case went through to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Garson: That is right. I hope Hansard has that correctly.

Mr. Knowles: Or you will be up for perjury.

Mr. Garson: That is the very point my hon. friend made in this case. No man or woman can be charged with perjury under this section unless the crown is able to prove that he or she made a statement with intent to mislead, and this myth about a man not having an opportunity to change his evidence is nothing but a myth. If a man, being convinced when he first gave it that evidence was true and having given it then in good faith, later finds he was in error concerning it there is nothing in the world to prevent him coming along and saying, "I am sorry. I was wrong in the first evidence I gave, and I find upon checking the matter that the real facts are as follows". If he states these real facts, then no question of criminal responsibility will arise.

With regard to the additional protection which is given by the fact that no proceedings can be instituted under this clause except by the attorney general, I must say I do not share the opinion which my hon. friend from Prince Albert has concerning the relationship between peace officers and attorneys general. I know all the provincial attorneys general of Canada, and I do not know of a single one who in a case of this kind would not go into the matter with great care before he gave permission for a prosecution to be launched. With this precaution, and with the safeguards which have been put into the clause as a result of the efforts of the special committee of the House of Commons last year, I believe this is a clause which deserves the full support of the committee.

Mr. MacInnis: I am quite willing to agree with the minister that the clause as it now stands is a great improvement on the clause of a similar nature which appeared in the bill we discussed last year. I mentioned this before, but I believe there has been a greater willingness on the part of the parliamentary committee and the minister not to take it for granted that the experts in the law who drafted various clauses have said the last word. That attitude was carried right through the whole deliberations of the committee. As a matter of fact, because of the minister's willingness to discuss, to accept and to agree, I think we obtained a much better bill, of which this section forms a part.

My main objection to this section was that a person is not prosecuted for telling the truth or an untruth, as is set out quite clearly in the act; he is prosecuted for saying one thing on one occasion and then saying the opposite thing on another. That provision is still here, although it is modified by the opinion of the judge or the presiding magistrate in the case and also by subclause 3 which was added by the committee. As I said before, I do not know enough about technical legal matters of this kind to express an opinion as to whether or not this section should stand, but I think it is a great improvement over the way in which it appeared when it came before the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman. Will you put the question, please?

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 52; nays, 19.

On section 119—Obstructing justice.

Mr. Winch: The minister held clause 119 over. When it was up for consideration before I asked whether he could give the basis of interpretation or the definition of the term "the course of justice". As you will recall, Mr. Chairman, I asked that question because it may not be something opposed to the course of justice; it may be opposed to the course of statutory law. I have known several instances of that kind. The definition is therefore important.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will go back to part III which deals with offences relating to the administration of law and justice, and in which is included this clause 119, he will see that it is quite a different part from the preceding part which has to do with offences against public order. If he looks at clause 69 (a) he will see that the act he was afraid might come under this clause now under discussion is an act which really is one against public order. So far as this clause is concerned, if he compared it with the section in the present code, he will see that the present code reads:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who . . .

Then (a) is a duplicate of the present (a); (b) is a duplicate of the present (b); (c) is a duplicate of the present (c); and then (d) of existing code is:

> wilfully attempts in any other way to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice.

He will see that that is the equivalent of subclause 1 of the present clause 119. In other words, the language is the same in both cases. In all the decided cases in the courts which are recorded in Tremeear, all have to do with court proceedings either existing or proposed. I think that is really the answer to my hon. friend's question. He said he was apprehensive lest a person who remonstrated with an officer about to read the riot act would be interfering with the administration of justice. I think he clearly would not be.

Mr. Herridge: I do not want to question the clause, Mr. Chairman. I am just raising this matter under this clause because it deals with jurors. I have in my hand a pamphlet published by Robert H. Sloan, sheriff of the county of Carleton. Apparently this pamphlet is given to each person who is to act on a jury in this county. It deals with the functions of the jury, the grand jury, the petit jury, women jurors and hints to jurors. I think it is an excellent thing. I have never before seen anything like this pamphlet. I was wondering whether anything could be done to make this practice more general. Often people are chosen as jurors when they have little knowledge of their duties, functions and so on.

Mr. Garson: I am in complete agreement with my hon. friend. I think it is a wise move to get out pamphlets of this kind. It is with some embarrassment that I again raise the point that this pamphlet has to do with a provincial function, issued as it is by a provincial body. In a federal set-up such as that which we have in Canada, I have found that it is better not to interfere with the exercise of provincial jurisdiction. Most of the provincial authorities think they have the situation fairly well in hand without any suggestions from us.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 120—Public mischief.

Mr. Knowles: When we were discussing clause 120 some time ago, as the minister will recall, I said I felt there was a deficiency in it. As recorded in Hansard of February 12, page 2030, I suggested that an amendment might be made. For example, I suggested that subclause (c) might be made to read as follows:

> Every one who causes a peace officer to enter upon an investigation by wilfully
> (c) reporting that an offence has been committed when he knows that it has not been committed, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment . . .

I pointed out to the minister that in my view a similar change was necessary in subclause (b) as well. The minister agreed to look at the matter. I wonder what his view is now?

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend will recall that a considerable part of our previous discussion hinged around the question whether or not the use of the adverb "wilfully" would meet the various points my hon. friend raised with regard to this subclause.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Knowles: That is right.

Mr. Garson: With a view to meeting that point I would propose that we might amend the clause to read as follows:

> Every one who, with intent to mislead, causes a peace officer to enter upon an investigation by > (a) making a false statement . . .
> (b) doing anything . . .

And so on. The gravamen of the offence would then be what I think is obviously intended in the clause, that is, the intent to mislead a peace officer by doing these things. If that would meet my hon. friend's point I would be glad to have one of my colleagues move the amendment.

Mr. Winters: I move that clause 120 be amended as follows:

> Delete lines 36 and 37 on page 41 of Bill 7 and substitute therefor the following:
> "120. Every one who, with intent to mislead, causes a peace officer to enter upon an investigation by"

Mr. Knowles: I think that meets my point, Mr. Chairman.

On clause 164—No apparent means of support.

Mr. Fulton: When we were discussing this clause the last time there was considerable discussion regarding the question whether or not the words "of a loose, idle or disorderly character" should be carried over from the present code into the proposed new clause. Their application was argued, particularly with respect to subclause 1 (a) (i). We have had some discussion with the minister about it since, and I understand that he has an amendment. Perhaps he might care to indicate what it is.

Mr. Garson: The subcommittee consisting of the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Red Deer and myself got together to see if a wording could be agreed upon in this connection that would meet the views of the four members of that committee, who would then recommend it to the members of the house. The suggestion is that paragraph (a) of clause 164 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

> "(a) not having any apparent means of support is found wandering abroad or trespassing and does not, when required, justify his presence in the place where he is found."

The whole of that part of the clause would then read:

> (1) Every one commits vagrancy who (a) not having any apparent means of support is found wandering abroad or trespassing and does not, when required, justify his presence in the place where he is found.

Mr. Knowles: The amendment the minister is proposing meets the objection we raised when this clause was considered before. As I pointed out, what we objected to was a clause which seemed to say very baldly, "No money and no job; ipso facto you are a vagrant." The amendment which the minister now suggests—and I mention this so that Hansard will show its effect—would delete the words "lives without employment". The clause was offensive to us before, and I think offensive to a great many people, because a person who was without apparent means of support and without employment, or in other words unemployed, was declared by the clause to be a vagrant.

I want to express my thanks to the minister for having allowed this matter to stand so we could have this further consideration of it. I think he is probably aware of the fact that the publicity given to the discussions here resulted in a fair amount of editorial comment on the point, and I think this is one instance where the public good was served by letting the clause stand. If the minister is prepared to have one of his colleagues move the amendment he now suggests, we will be quite happy to accept it.

Mr. Prudham: I move that clause 164 be amended as follows:

Delete paragraph (a) of subclause (1) of clause 164 and substitute therefor the following:

"(a) not having any apparent means of support is found wandering abroad or trespassing and does not, when required, justify his presence in the place where he is found."

On clause 206—Punishment for murder.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the request I made previously might be acceded to again. My suggestion is that until such time as we have concluded this discussion clause 206 and also clauses 642 to 653 be allowed to stand.

Mr. Garson: I agree.

The Deputy Chairman: Clause 206 and clauses 642 to 653 inclusive are to stand again.

Mr. Garson: Clause 641?

Mr. Knowles: I was going to mention 641 when we got to clause 289.

Clause 206 stands.

Clauses 642 to 653 inclusive stand.

On clause 221—Criminal negligence in operation of motor vehicle.

Mr. Fulton: When this clause was discussed earlier I had some objections, as in the case of clause 164, to the deletion of words from this clause which appeared to me to change the effect. At a subsequent meeting with the minister he indicated that he was prepared to meet the points raised in this case, as he did in connection with clause 164. I understand that the minister has an amendment and I would appreciate it if he would announce it and explain its purport.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is quite right. The amendment reads as follows:

Delete lines 1, 2 and 3 on page 75 of Bill 7 and substitute therefor the following:

"(2) Every one who, having the care, charge or control of a vehicle that is involved in an accident with a person, vehicle or horse in charge of a person, with intent to escape civil or criminal liability . . .

Mr. McCann: I so move.

Mr. Fulton: Far be it from me to look a gift horse in the mouth, and I do not wish to embarrass the minister, but am I not correct in my understanding that when we discussed this clause earlier the suggestion was that the clause should read "or cattle in charge of a person" on the ground that "cattle" includes horse? I think it was the hon. member for Red Deer who suggested that a person who runs into some cows in charge of a person should also be under some liability. I have no particular objection to the present form, but I think I should be fair to my colleagues who took part in the same discussion.

Mr. Shaw: It was my understanding, although I have no written evidence to support my view, that I did raise the point that "horse" meant horse and that "cattle" meant horses and other animals. I understand it was agreed that the word "cattle" would be used.

Mr. Garson: I have no preference one way or the other. It is most unlikely that this question will ever arise anyhow, but I think one factor we will have to keep in mind is that "cattle" is defined in clause 2, subclause 5 as follows:

"cattle" means neat cattle or an animal of the bovine species by whatever technical or familiar name it is known, and includes a horse, mule, ass, pig, sheep or goat;

Now, if my hon. friend would like to give it that wide definition by having the word "cattle" put in there, that is all right.

Mr. Shaw: When I suggested "cattle" I had that definition in mind, and my argument was that so far as I am concerned, if cattle means cows, in those cases where they were not in charge of an individual and were struck and left to suffer that would be just as serious as though they were horses.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps my hon. friend had in mind ox-drawn vehicles.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the unanimous agreement of the committee that the word "horse" be struck out and the word "cattle" substituted?

Mr. Cardiff: Do we not need the word "horse" left in there?

Mr. Garson: No; cattle includes horses.

Mr. Lusby: I did not just catch the amendment, Mr. Chairman. Would you mind repeating it?

The Deputy Chairman: The amended clause reads:

> Every one who, having the care, charge or control of a vehicle that is involved in an accident with a person, vehicle or cattle in charge of a person, with intent to escape civil or criminal liability . . .

On clause 289—Punishment for robbery.

Mr. Knowles: May I suggest that clauses 289 and 641 be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that clause 289 shall stand?

Clause stands.

On clause 374—Arson.

Mr. Knowles: With respect to clause 374, Mr. Chairman, I asked the minister and the committee to let it stand the last time it was before us. Perhaps I might say a few words now to indicate why I made that request. As I pointed out to the minister, this was a matter which I had raised in the house on a number of occasions under another heading. The present Minister of Public Works will recall that when he was minister of resources and development he had some inquiries made in his department as to whether there had been any research into the extent to which tailor-made cigarettes are a fire hazard with respect to our forests. I have before me a memorandum which he had prepared in 1953 in connection with this question. I have quite a bit of other material as well.

The point I raise is whether it is not time something was done to cut down the number of fires that are caused by burning cigarettes. As the minister will recall, when I raised this the other day we both had in mind the incident in Winnipeg two or three days before, when a prominent citizen of our city lost his life in this manner. We all regard life as much more important than property, but it does come to my mind that over the week end there has been a statement from London to the effect that the fire which resulted in the loss of the Canadian Pacific liner Empress of Canada, which burned at her dock in the United Kingdom some time ago, may have been caused by a burning cigarette. We all agree that these tragic fires that cost a great deal in terms of property, and what is more significant take many lives in the course of a year, are something about which we should try to take preventive action.

The minister indicated the other day that perhaps this is a matter that calls for greater care on the part of the people who use cigarettes, and I fully agree. I suggested to him then that, just as in connection with driving a vehicle on the highway and its dangers we have to take steps to try to protect the public, even though it might hurt some people, so it is in this instance. I believe there is something that should be done by law. I was quite interested in certain views on this question in an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of June 7, 1952, after one of the debates we had on this matter. If I may read just a bit, I should like to point out that it arrives at the very point that is my reason for raising this question under the heading of "arson".

This editorial says:

> The proposition that cigarettes can be made less inflammable is generally accepted. Tests made several years ago in the California fire marshals' laboratory showed that paper in each of 55 different kinds of American cigarettes was treated with precipitate chalk to make it more porous, hence quicker-burning. Applying sodium-silicate bands of only one-eighth inch at intervals inside the paper, the researchers in the California lab produced a cigarette that would go out almost as soon as it was discarded. The United States bureau of standards also used sodium-silicate to coat the butt end of cigarettes and so seal the pores of the paper. The bureau discovered, too, that cigarettes tipped at the butt end with cardboard, cork or a filter to the length of at least an inch, seldom started a fire.
> The likelihood of cigarette manufacturers making use of these discoveries is slight. After all, the faster cigarettes burn, the more are sold. And the public has never protested against the quick-burning product.
> If cigarettes are to be made safer, clearly parliament must take the first step, as it did in the case of matches.

I recognize the point the minister made the other day, namely that manufacturers of cigarettes are interested in producing the kind of product that is most wanted by the public, and they would not regard it as a saleable product if it went out too easily when it was being smoked. I confess that I happen to be a non-user of these things, and I would not want to be regarded as advocating something in the nature of a blue law. But I may say that some of those who have supported me in raising this matter from time to time in the house are themselves users of cigarettes, and other members of the house who are users of them have backed me in this effort.

As I say, the paragraph I have just read from the editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen in 1952 does indicate my view that it is possible to manufacture the kind of cigarette that would burn as long as it was being smoked just as readily as those now on the market, but which would go out if laid down for any length of time at all. It is still true it would cost the cigarette manufacturers a great deal more to manufacture that kind of cigarette, speaking of the tailor-made variety, than the kind of cigarette manufactured now. My submission is that in view of the tremendous loss of life and property that does arise from fires caused by burning cigarettes, a reform of this kind is long overdue.

I want to say that I think truer words were never written than those in the Citizen editorial when this suggestion was made:

> If cigarettes are to me made safer, clearly parliament must take the first step, as it did in the case of matches.

I should like to point out also that, without commenting too much on many of the items I have before me, the fire marshals in Canada have been quite concerned about this matter. I have before me the resolution which was passed at the annual conference of the dominion association of fire chiefs in 1950. It is a lengthy resolution, and I shall not read it all. This is the paragraph that bears on this question:

> That we urge the dominion government to prohibit the manufacture of tailor-made or manufactured cigarettes which contain in the paper or tobacco, saltpetre or other ingredients which increase the burning.

That, by the way, is in a resolution over the signature of Allan H. Clark, secretary-treasurer of the dominion association of fire chiefs.

I must say that because I have raised this matter in the house on a number of times I have been the recipient of letters from the tobacco people. They always have an answer. For example, they point out to me that some of these chemicals which it is alleged are in the paper with which cigarettes are made are not there so far as their cigarettes are concerned. I submit that the dominion association of fire chiefs might have attacked the problem not knowing just what would be the best way to deal with it; but in my view it is no answer to their resolution for tobacco companies to say there is no saltpetre in the cigarettes that they manufacture. After it has been demonstrated by research in the California fire marshals' laboratory and in other places that there are things that can be done, such as including those bands every so often in the cigarette paper, I suggest that the sooner we come to something like that the better.

The possibility that the tobacco people will do anything of this nature on their own, let us admit, is very slim. They are in the business to make what they can out of it, although they do spend some money in the kind of advertising that encourages people to be careful with their cigarettes. They urge people to put out fires and so on. In my view we should take action to prevent fires, and there has not been a great deal of interest shown by them in this phase of the matter. As a matter of fact, an official of the federal government to whom I wrote about this question some years ago replied to my letter in such a way as to indicate that he thought I had something, but he felt obliged to tell me this:

> The national board of fire underwriters of New York, and similar organizations have, to my knowledge, been making representations along these lines in the United States for upwards of 25 years. To date they have accomplished exactly nothing.

That should not dissuade one from continuing the effort if the need is there. I submit with all the strength I can that in view of the tremendous number of fires which take place from this cause, with the loss of human life and property, common sense and a sense of responsibility demand that we do something about this matter.

As I say, I was able to enlist the interest of the Minister of Public Works in the days when he was minister of resources and development. Perhaps I did not get further than obtaining his interest. In any event, he gave me a very interesting memorandum, but I feel that this is something on which there should be a law. That was my reason for asking the matter to stand over. I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Justice agreed not only to let it stand but expressed considerable sympathy with my point of view. I wonder whether in the meantime he has had a chance to give any thought to it, and whether he sees the possibility of enacting a law that might take care of the situation.

Before I take my seat I might point out that another issue has been before the public recently in regard to cigarettes, namely the question of lung cancer. The Minister of National Health and Welfare was able to announce a few days ago that the tobacco industry of Canada has agreed to make a contribution of $100,000 toward research into that question. I have no doubt that this contribution will be allowed as a deductible item in relation to income tax, so a great deal of it will in effect be paid by the public treasury.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am not ruling anybody out of order at the moment; I am just drawing to the attention of the hon. member who has the floor the fact that the clause we are discussing deals with arson, that is, the wilful setting of fires. I know the heading of the section is, "Arson and other fires". Having that in view I have not interrupted the hon. gentleman while speaking of cigarettes in so far as they do cause fires. I think it was understood when the section was allowed to stand that this subject might be discussed, but I ask the hon. member not to take the cigarette discussion too far afield, because other hon. members may also have other aspects of cigarette smoking in mind, and if they discussed them all we would never get back to the Criminal Code.

Mr. Knowles: Your point, Mr. Chairman, in my view is well taken. I think you will recall that when this question came up the last time I suggested that all the clauses under the heading of arson might stand, but I agreed that one would be enough for the purpose of this discussion. Also, my reference to this other matter was merely for the purpose of suggesting that if the cigarette people have been persuaded to put up some money for research into that other question, which I shall not mention again at this time, I would hope that if necessary they could be persuaded to put up some money for research into this question of some really effective way in which to minimize the loss of life and property from fires started by cigarettes. Perhaps the minister will tell us the result of his thinking on this important question.

Mr. Garson: The point my hon. friend now raises is one not without embarrassment for me, because I understood when the section was stood over that my hon. friend was going to send me a memorandum. The following is credited to my hon. friend, at page 2514 of Hansard:

> I wonder if the minister would be willing to allow one of his clauses—any one under the heading of arson or fires—to stand, and I will submit to him for his own perusal some memoranda and other material I have on this question.

I have been rather busy lately. In the debate on this bill there were a number of other undertakings I gave where it was I who had to do something. In this particular one I was waiting for my hon. friend to send me his memoranda. I would be glad, as I said before, to give his memoranda careful consideration. But I suggest that it would hardly be necessary to have this clause or any of the other clauses dealing with arson or fires stand. I believe that if any amendments were required they would not take the form of amendments to these clauses we have been discussing. In fact I question very much whether they would come under the Criminal Code at all.

My suggestion to my hon. friend would be that he send me the memoranda he mentioned, and that we go on from there and consider it perhaps in another annual amendment.

Mr. Knowles: I am quite agreeable. I apologize to the minister for not having got that memorandum to him yet. Like the minister, some of the rest of us are rather busy, too. May I also make it clear that I am not against this clause. I am quite prepared to let this clause pass on the understanding that this matter can be pursued. As a matter of fact, having sent the memorandum to the minister, which I shall do in the next few days, I may raise the matter when we get to the minister's estimates. My hope is that in the meantime he will give this serious question the serious thought that I am sure he agrees it deserves.

Mr. Garson: I think this is a case where there was a typographical error. The clause is self-explanatory once that typographical error is cured. I would therefore suggest that the word "officer" in line five be deleted and the word "offence" substituted therefor.

On clause 417—Trial without jury in Alberta.

Mr. Fulton: I asked that this clause stand, as I thought it might be appropriate to draw attention to the fact that notwithstanding the efforts made to bring about complete uniformity as among the provinces in respect to the administration of criminal law, in Alberta it is provided by clause 417 that an accused charged with an indictable offence may with his consent be tried by a judge of the superior court without a jury. There is a further difference provided by a later section that in Alberta juries are still composed of six men.

The minister has explained that it is the desire of Alberta to continue in those two respects in which they are different from the other provinces. I suppose that if the law officers of Alberta wish that difference to be continued we cannot very well say that we know better than they what is good for their province.

I would hope that before too long it will be possible for them to give further consideration to accepting a change. I would point out that at the present time if I were driving through Alberta and was alleged to have committed an offence under the code, I would be tried by a jury of six men rather than a jury of twelve. I would prefer to be tried by a jury of twelve men. I suppose it might be said that would be my fault for having gotten into trouble in Alberta. I make that comment in order to bring this matter to the attention of the committee for what it is worth, and would hope that eventually we may achieve uniformity as among all the provinces in this country.

On clause 432—Detention of things seized.

Mr. Garson: When this clause was being debated before certain observations were made, to meet which we have redrafted the clause. I suggest the following change:

That paragraphs (a) and (b) of subclause (3) of clause 432 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(a) if possession of it by the person from whom it was seized is lawful, order it to be returned to that person, or

(b) if possession of it by the person from whom it was seized is unlawful,

(i) order it to be returned to the lawful owner or to the peron who is entitled to possession of it, or

(ii) order it to be forfeited or otherwise dealt with in accordance with law, where the lawful owner or the person who is entitled to possession of it is not known."

And also:

That clause 432 be amended by adding thereto, immediately after subclause (6), the following subclause:

"(7) A person who considers himself aggrieved by an order made under subsection (3) may appeal from the order to the appeal court, as defined in section 719, and for the purposes of the appeal the provisions of sections 721 to 732 apply, mutatis mutandis."

Mr. Fulton: I thank the minister for going as far as he has gone, although this amendment does not go as far as I should have liked in that it still does not indicate by what process justice is to be satisfied as to the ownership of the article in question. I would have preferred an amendment which made it clear that the process of satisfaction was to be carried out, but since it is provided by the second amendment that a person aggrieved by an order made has the right of appeal I shall be content with the amendment as it stands.

Clause 446 agreed to.

On clause 467—Absolute jurisdiction.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I believe I asked that this clause be allowed to stand. We did not have very much discussion on it when it was last before the committee, but I believe the effect of the change is that from now on a person cannot claim a jury trial in connection with a theft unless the value of the article alleged to have been stolen is in excess of $50. Previously a person could claim a jury trial if the value of the article was in excess of $25.

I realize this change is being made because of the inflation we have had under the present government, but I would ask the minister whether this matter was discussed at any length before the committee. As a layman it seems to me that even though there has been inflation the purpose of that cut-off point was to prevent the summoning of a jury on a trivial case. I wonder if these cases are trivial in all instances where the value of the article is in excess of $25 but not up to the value of $50?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, for a great many years now the limit has been $25. The limit in 1892 was $10, and I suppose the best test of the fixing of a limit of this sort is in relation to the purchasing value of the dollar. If all the statements we have heard from time to time from members of the opposition are to be taken seriously I am surprised it was not proposed to raise this limit beyond $50—

Mr. Fleming: I am glad to see the government is taking them seriously.

Mr. Garson: —because the article which would be worth $25 when the previous limit was applicable would certainly be worth $50 now. I went into that at great length when the clause dealing with the jurisdiction of magistrates to try indictable offences was before the committee last week.

On clause 557—Accused to be present.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, has the minister given any further thought to the point raised in connection with clause 557 when it was last before the committee? I believe the point was put to the minister in the form of a question. If an accused individual is required to be in court during the whole of his trial, why should not an accused corporation, through its agent or counsel, be required to be present throughout the whole of the corporation's trial?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will look at clauses 528 to 531, which spell out in considerable detail the manner in which the accused corporation is brought before the court for trial, I believe he will see a full answer to his question.

Mr. Knowles: Is an accused corporation under these other sections required to be present throughout its trial in the same way an individual is required to be present under clause 557?

Mr. Garson: Actually they cannot be present in the same sense because an accused corporation, not being an individual human being, cannot be present by itself. It can only be present through its counsel or agent. If my hon. friend will look at sections 528 to 531 he will see that they spell out the manner in which the accused corporation will appear and plead through its agent or counsel.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 637—Binding over person convicted.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, before we go on to the next clause I would like to ask the minister whether he took another look at clause 637. It was allowed to pass the last time it was before the committee but the minister agreed he would take another look at it, having in mind the point which I raised at that time.

Mr. Garson: I believe my hon. friend is referring to clause 637 (3), and as I recall his argument he stated that in these cases where a citizen had been ordered to enter into a recognizance to keep the peace and was in default, and because of such default had been committed to prison, the former provision required the jailer or sheriff to advise the judge that the citizen was there. My hon. friend thought that was a better method of protecting a man who was in custody than the method which is now suggested.

We have looked at that since my hon. friend raised the point, and we think the method outlined in clause 637 (3) is a much better method because this clause specifically spells out that the man in custody has the right to appear before the judge. The clause states:

(3) Where a person who has been ordered to enter into a recognizance under subsection (1) has remained in prison for two weeks because of his default, he may apply to a judge for review of the order of committal.

Under the old provision the jailer or the sheriff made this return to the judge, but whether the judge acted on it was another question. Under this present clause a man in custody can himself initiate and carry on the proceedings, and his right to do so is clearly stated.

Mr. Knowles: I realize that a prisoner's right is spelled out more clearly in this clause than it was in section 1059 of the original code, but I would like the minister to address himself to this question. What happens if a man does not know he has that right, and is allowed to remain in a cell for a period beyond the two weeks specified?

Mr. Garson: I covered that in my remarks on a previous occasion by stating it was incredible to me that with the type of prison wardens we have nowadays, this fact would not be brought to the attention of the accused. But in any case, whether it is brought to the attention of the accused is, I suggest, a matter for the management of the provincial jail in which he is lodged, for he would not be sent to a penitentiary. I do not think it is at all proper that the Criminal Code should spell out every last item of administration and procedure in a provincial jail. If there were any question about this matter it is one we could raise with the provincial attorneys general. We have certainly never received any complaints from them concerning these sections of the code.

Mr. Winch: Why should a man stay in jail for two weeks before he can make application to a judge?

Mr. Garson: Because in the first place—and if my hon. friend has read the section he will see this—the man is there because he has been ordered by the court to enter into a recognizance and has defaulted in so doing. He is only in prison in the first place because he has defaulted. He continues to stay in prison only because he continues to default. It is only where there are some special circumstances which excuse his continued default that he has any hope in making this application. If he wants to remedy the default he can get out in 24 hours. It is not like being in prison for an offence. He is in prison because he has defaulted in entering into a recognizance.

The Chairman: Clause 637 was carried previously. We now turn to clause 641.

Mr. Fulton: Provided that no one feels very strongly against it, Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask that the committee permit a reversion to clauses 467 and 468. The elevators in this building are not always quite as prompt as they might be. Neither I nor my colleague the hon. member for London was able to get down here before those two sections were carried.

Mr. Knowles: Does the hon. member mean that I did not talk long enough?

Mr. Fulton: I do not wish to press the matter, but those sections were allowed to stand at our request, and I should like permission to revert to them.

Mr. Garson: That is quite all right, Mr. Chairman. If there is any wisdom floating around we want to have the benefit of it.

The Chairman: Has the hon. gentleman leave to revert to clauses 467 and 468?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the generosity of the committee, and I shall not detain it long. My friend the hon. member for London has been making a study of those particulars in which the absolute jurisdiction of magistrates under those two sections exceeds the jurisdiction of magistrates under the old code. To the extent that the absolute jurisdiction of magistrates has been enlarged, it is a whittling down of the rights of an accused. It is that point—and I think that point alone —to which we take objection.

We start with the fact that under clause 467 the jurisdiction of a magistrate to try an accused is absolute and does not depend upon the consent of the accused where the accused is charged with theft and where the property is alleged to be of less than $50 in value. Previously the magistrate had no absolute jurisdiction to try—

Mr. Garson: I rise on a question of privilege. I wonder whether I might interrupt the hon. gentleman long enough to say that in his absence this same argument he is now presenting was presented very effectively by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: But not effectively enough to persuade the minister.

Mr. Fulton: I shall pass over that matter fairly rapidly, then, and will do no more than to point out that it is a doubling of the jurisdiction on grounds that do not seem to be thoroughly explained or established. Having abolished the former restriction whereby magistrates did not have absolute jurisdiction unless they were properly qualified and serving in cities of 25,000 and over, the act has, it is true, provided now in the definition section, namely section 466—or has attempted to do so—that the province will appoint only qualified magistrates.

I can see the desire of the minister and the government to ensure that all magistrates shall be properly qualified so they will be qualified to exercise their jurisdiction. But the fact is that the mere passage of this new Criminal Code will not ensure that all magistrates are properly qualified lawyers. Particularly in cities of less than 25,000 where they are now serving, where magistrates have been appointed who are not lawyers their appointments are not going to be changed just because this bill passes. Yet under the bill the absolute jurisdiction of the magistrates is automatically enlarged in the particulars which will be developed in a moment by my friend the hon. member for London. Hence you are going to have a number of complicated and technical cases which were formerly triable by the magistrate only with the consent of the accused but in which the accused now has no election as to whether he shall be tried by a magistrate or by a judge with a jury.

The situation represents a definite abridgement of the rights of an accused. I should think it would have been possible to put in the bill some provision that when the magistrate who would otherwise have jurisdiction to try the case is qualified as a barrister, then his jurisdiction shall be absolute but that in the absence of a magistrate who is qualified as a lawyer the election of the accused might remain.

Mr. Garson: While I share with my friend the hon. member for Kamloops the distinction of being a member of the legal profession, I am afraid I differ from his view that it is only magistrates who are members of the legal profession who are good magistrates.

Mr. Fulton: I never said that.

Mr. Garson: I happen to know some very good magistrates indeed who obtained their training in a practical way. But be that as it may, one of the difficulties in a divided jurisdiction such as that which we have in this country, and one which we simply cannot get over by any provisions in the Criminal Code, is that we cannot in the Criminal Code tell the provincial authorities whom they should appoint as magistrates. In the Criminal Code we can specify that the magistrates are to be specially qualified to deal with cases which arise under this part of the code. But beyond that, the person a provincial government appoints as a magistrate is the province's own business.

In approaching our responsibilities in this parliament I do not think we have the right to assume that the provincial governments are going to do these things badly. We must assume and do assume that they will use reasonable judgment. My experience has been—and I am sure my friend the hon. member for Kamloops will agree with this statement—that the appointment of magistrates has improved greatly indeed over the last 15 or 20 years. As to the magistrates in my province who exercise this jurisdiction, I would have the utmost confidence in them without exception. They are highly capable and competent people.

I do not know of any province in Canada where it could be said that there are incompetent magistrates exercising jurisdiction under this part. There may be the odd police magistrate in outlying sections of the province who does not have authority to deal with cases under this part, but I would not want to take, or even to share with my hon. friend from Kamloops the responsibility of alleging that there are magistrates exercising jurisdiction under this part who are unqualified and incompetent.

Mr. Fulton: I am not going to deal at any length with what the minister has said. As I indicated earlier, my colleague the hon. member for London has some remarks to make.

I want to take issue at once with what the minister said when he suggested it was implicit in my remarks that I felt that no magistrate who was not a qualified lawyer was a good magistrate. That was far from my suggestion. But I did suggest that until magistrates become qualified in the law as a matter of course, there is no justification for increasing their jurisdiction without the consent of the accused. After all, even a very good, conscientious and commonsensical man can become completely at sea when charged with the responsibility of administering the criminal law. Common sense does not always qualify a man in this respect, and it can work adversely the other way.

I think I can illustrate that point best, if I may, by telling a story of a magistrate —this was the application of common sense— who was appointed in one of the remote areas of British Columbia. One of the first cases he had before him was an infraction of the game act. The accused was represented by counsel.

Mr. Garson: I wanted to ask my hon. friend if the magistrate he is talking about is one who was appointed as being specially authorized within the meaning of this section, because if he was not his story will not prove anything.

Mr. Fulton: He was the magistrate who exercised all jurisdiction in the particular area where he had been appointed.

Mr. Garson: But was it under this part of the code?

Mr. Fulton: This is a new part of the code. Of course the definition section, subsection (b), provides the definition of "magistrate", but that is a new definition and provinces, where they do not have available persons with legal qualification, are obviously going to continue in office, with the jurisdiction conferred under part XVI, persons who are exercising the functions of magistrates in these districts at the present time, whether or not they happen to be qualified lawyers. As I say, the application of common sense does not always produce a result consonant with the interests of justice, whether that interest be from the point of view of the prosecution or the defence. That is illustrated in the case of this magistrate.

After the police officer, who was conducting the prosecution, had concluded the crown's case, defence counsel moved for dismissal on the grounds of lack of evidence, lack of a prima facie case. The magistrate said, "Well, this is a democracy. I have a motion before me. The motion is that the charge be dismissed. I am bound to put the motion. Those in favour will please vote yea." The poor unfortunate police officer had his mouth open rather wide. Counsel for the accused of course voted in favour of dismissal. The magistrate said: "Those opposed will vote nay." The police officer said "Nay". The magistrate said, "This is a democracy and we have to give the benefit of the doubt to the accused. Therefore I vote with the yeas and the case is dismissed."

That was the exercise of common sense, but it did not produce a result necessarily consonant with the justice of the case. That is why I say, without in any sense attacking those magistrates who are conscientiously trying to do their best in spite of their lack of qualifications, that it seems to me that before enlarging their automatic jurisdiction we should take greater care to ensure that properly qualified magistrates are going to be exercising that jurisdiction.

Mr. Knowles: Call in the members.

Mr. Winch: I have tried to follow very closely the arguments and presentations of learned counsel in the discussion of Bill No. 7, but as a layman I find myself up against a problem in understanding certain clauses.

I think I can raise what I have in mind under the clause now under discussion which when passed, amended or otherwise, will become the criminal law of Canada.

The sentencing of accused people is divided between various types of judges, one of which is magistrates, who are dealt with in the part of the code now under discussion. I know one is not supposed to get advice from the crown, but I also know it would help me, and I think it might help others if, through you, Mr. Chairman, I might ask the Minister of Justice this question. As Bill No. 7 will become the Criminal Code, and as sentencing will be done by magistrates and judges all the way up to the highest courts, does it follow automatically or by law that anyone charged under the Criminal Code has the right from the very beginning to ask for trial by jury?

Mr. Garson: In order to answer my hon. friend's question he would have to say first of all whether the offence with which the accused was charged was a summary conviction offence or an indictable offence. Summary conviction offences are the less serious ones. I understand that my hon. friend is not talking about them.

Mr. Winch: No.

Mr. Garson: I understand he is talking about indictable offences.

Mr. Winch: With which magistrates can deal under this section.

Mr. Garson: Yes; that is right. If the hon. member will look at clause 413 I think he will see the answer to his question in subclauses 1 and 2. Subclause 1 reads:

> Every superior court of criminal jurisdiction has jurisdiction to try any indictable offence.

The superior court of criminal jurisdiction named there is a judge of a superior court sitting with a jury. Therefore with regard to all indictable offences the accused has the right to be tried by a jury. That is the first point. There is one exception to this to which I shall refer later. With respect to a court of criminal jurisdiction, clause 413 (2) states:

> Every court of criminal jurisdiction has jurisdiction to try an indictable offence other than . . .

Then my hon. friend will see that a number of offences are cited. The easiest way to find out what they are is to look at the side-notes—treason, murder, and so on. What does that mean? It means that with regard to these indictable offences that are named in the second subclause 413 (2), the accused not only has to be tried by a judge and jury, that is, a superior court of criminal jurisdiction, but he cannot be tried without a jury. Even if he or his counsel would prefer trial by a court without a jury, he has no right to elect that. With regard to all indictable offences other than those stated in clause 413 (2) and those over which magistrates have absolute jurisdiction, he can elect to be tried by a judge and jury on the one hand, or by a judge or magistrate alone on the other.

When we come to the trial by magistrates of certain offences which are otherwise indictable, we find a very limited number of cases in which the magistrate has absolute jurisdiction over the accused. That is covered on page 161 of the bill, under the heading "Absolute jurisdiction". It is covered in clause 467.

With regard to the remainder of the indictable offences, the accused can elect to be tried by the magistrate before whom he comes in the first place, or he can elect a preliminary investigation and later on elect to be tried by a jury or elect to take a speedy trial before a court of criminal jurisdiction. I think that covers the whole field fairly well.

Mr. Mitchell (London): May I make one further remark about clause 467. Our objection to this clause is that while we have been having a great deal of difficulty in this house, both lay and so-called legally trained persons, in trying to understand the code, and we admit that untrained magistrates are going to face that same problem, at the same time we are extending the jurisdiction which those, if I may use the word, untrained magistrates are going to have in one respect. I refer to lotteries. This offence may be dealt with by the magistrate without consent, and the same provision is made for cheating under clause 181.

I suggest that before we extend that jurisdiction we must satisfy ourselves that it is being properly handled by the lay magistrates. I suggest to the minister that an examination of cases appealed will indicate that the great majority come from those who are doing the best that they can, and have done a miraculous job in many parts of the dominion, but who have not the training necessary.

Mr. Garson: With all deference to the hon. member for London, Mr. Chairman, and the hon. member for Kamloops, I cannot help but think they have a complete misapprehension as to the meaning of clause 466 (b), which says:

"magistrate"—

That is a magistrate under this part.

—means

(i) a person—

Now I ask the hon. member to watch this language carefully.

—appointed under the law of a province, by whatever title he may be designated, who is specially authorized by the terms of his appointment to exercise the jurisdiction conferred upon a magistrate by this part, but does not include two or more justices of the peace sitting together . . .

In other words, what is contemplated by "magistrate" under this part is not the type of chap in a district such as my hon. friend spoke about, who calls for the yeas and nays. I cannot think of any magistrate who would do that. I cannot help but think it is nothing but an example picked up from some book of jokes.

Mr. Fulton: No, it is not.

Mr. Garson: I do not know what province my hon. friend is speaking about. I must say that if that is the way things are handled, they must be at least 25 years behind Manitoba, because since that far back we have had competent magistrates exercising this type of jurisdiction. It is the same type of jurisdiction that is exercised by magistrates in the cities of Ottawa, Winnipeg, Brandon, and so on. They are trained men with long years of experience, and they will not experience one-quarter of the difficulty in understanding this that some of my hon. friends across the way seem to experience.

Mr. Fulton: They will not have had the benefit of the minister's explanation, so they might be able to appreciate it a little more easily.

Mr. Winch: I wanted to ask one more question. If it is an indictable offence that can be handled by the magistrate, is the accused automatically informed that he can elect to be tried by a jury?

Mr. Garson: In those cases set out in clause 467 over which the magistrate's jurisdiction is absolute, he is not so advised. In those cases where the magistrate can only try him by consent, he is so advised. My hon. friend will find the formula at the bottom of page 162, in these terms. We tried, in this construction, to use language that was plain and simple and that anyone could understand.

This is what the magistrate says to the accused:

You have the option to elect to be tried by a magistrate without a jury; or you may elect to be tried by a judge without a jury; or you may elect to be tried by a court composed of a judge and jury. How do you elect to be tried?

I do not think the issue could be put more clearly to the accused.

Mr. Winch: That is the very point that had me a little mixed up. In subclause 3 of clause 468, it says:

Where an accused does not elect to be tried by a magistrate, the magistrate shall hold a preliminary inquiry in accordance with part XV, and if the accused is committed for trial or, in the case of a corporation is ordered to stand trial, the magistrate shall—

That was rather confusing to me. As I read it, and if I am wrong I know the minister will correct me, the accused has to decide that he wants to be tried by a jury before the magistrate decides whether or not he shall go on for trial to a higher court.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if I could put it in these terms? Let us assume the accused is arraigned upon a charge which the magistrate would have jurisdiction to try provided the accused consented to be tried by him. Before the case could go on any further the first point that would have to be cleared up would be whether the accused wanted to be tried by the magistrate right then. The magistrate puts these questions to him: "How do you want to be tried? Do you want to be tried by me or by a judge without a jury or by a judge with a jury?"

Mr. Knowles: Supposing he moves an amendment?

Mr. Garson: The accused makes up his mind then, or usually his counsel has advised him and makes up his mind for him. If he wants to be tried by a magistrate he says, "Well, I will be tried now." The trial before the magistrate then takes place. The crown puts in its case, the accused puts in his defence, and they finish the case then and there.

But if the accused, when he is asked a question like that, does not happen to be represented by counsel he may be puzzled and not know what to answer, and may think the best thing is to say nothing. In that case, as the section indicates, the magistrate then proceeds to hold a preliminary hearing. Later the accused can be tried either by a judge without a jury or by a judge with a jury. When that time comes the accused not only has the right to make his choice between those two alternatives, but in this new code we have provided that after he has made one of these choices he may change his mind again and still choose the other one. It cannot be said that the accused is in any way lacking in choice as to the manner in which he wishes to be tried.

Mr. Fulton: Am I not right in suggesting to the minister that the absolute jurisdiction of the magistrate to try a charge of conducting a lottery is an extension of the jurisdiction over that contained in the present code?

Mr. Garson: Yes. I dealt with that at some length last week. I pointed out that Bill No. 7 does give the magistrate jurisdiction in lottery cases. It was considered that was warranted because the magistrates already have jurisdiction over gaming and betting houses, bookmaking and pool-selling; and if they had jurisdiction over those it was not much of an extension to apply it to lotteries.

The Chairman: Shall we now proceed with clause 641?

Mr. Knowles: I believe when we were on clause 289 this afternoon it was agreed to let clause 641 stand along with clause 289.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Winch: Otherwise I want to speak on it.

Mr. Garson: No, it stands.

The Chairman: Clause 641 stands. We shall now call clauses 642 to 653.

Mr. Knowles: These stood this afternoon as well.

The Chairman: Clauses 642 to 653 inclusive are to stand.

On clause 661—Evidence.

Mr. Fulton: I believe there was some discussion on this last Thursday. Did the minister indicate at that time that this subject matter would also be included in the reference to the royal commission on the law with respect to insanity?

Mr. Garson: I am sorry I did not hear my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Fulton: It was my impression last Thursday when clause 661 was under discussion that the minister agreed he would refer the subject matter of criminal sexual psychopaths to the royal commission.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is quite right. I believe my hon. friend was absent when I stated that I had discussed this subject with Chief Justice McRuer, who is chairman of the royal commission investigating the subject matter of insanity as a defence to a charge of criminal liability. The chief justice was of the view, with which we agreed, that it would be unwise to intermix consideration of criminal sexual psychopaths with that other subject matter. He agreed however to become the chairman of a smaller commission which would deal with the subject of criminal sexual psychopaths and bring in a report upon it.

Mr. Fulton: Was this clause not allowed to stand for the purpose of getting a report from the minister on the terms of the reference to that smaller commission, or is it considered not necessary to define those terms?

Mr. Garson: Yes, probably it could be said that was the reason. I took objection to having it stand. As a matter of fact I should have had the terms of reference settled before, but I have not found the time to consider them. I have no objection to standing this clause, and the next time we come to it I hope to have the terms of reference settled.

The Chairman: Clause stands.

On clause 694—General penalty.

Mr. Knowles: This is the clause on which we had considerable discussion last Thursday. It is also the clause with respect to which the hon. member for Oxford moved an amendment to subclause 3. Generally speaking, this is the clause under which we had the discussion about the way in which persons are, in some cases, as we see it, made to go to jail for debt, namely a debt to the crown with respect to a fine. I have looked very closely at the amendment moved by the hon. member for Oxford, which appears at pages 2908 and 2909 of Hansard of March 11, and I am reminded of something my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway said this afternoon. The Minister of Justice was prepared to accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for Oxford without a moment's hesitation.

The Chairman: Order. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, the Chair has no record of any amendment having been sent in.

Mr. Garson: It was a suggestion which the hon. member for Oxford put on Hansard of an amendment that he favoured.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps I might make the point clear, Mr. Chairman, by reading a few lines from Hansard at pages 2908 and 2909. The hon. member for Oxford said:

> I was wondering if the minister would care to comment on the suggestion I should like to make with regard to subclause 3. The whole discussion might be obviated if subclause 3 were amended somewhat along the following lines:
> "A summary conviction court may direct that any fine, pecuniary penalty or sum of money adjudged to be paid shall be paid forthwith or if the accused is unable to pay forthwith, at such time and on such terms as may be fixed by the summary conviction court."

Obviously, by referring to the terms of subclause 3 of the bill that is before us, the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Oxford involves writing in the words, "or if the accused is unable to pay forthwith, at such time and on such terms", and so on. As I was saying, Mr. Chairman—and you are perfectly correct that the amendment was not moved; it was merely put forward as an idea—the Minister of Justice without a moment's hesitation said, "I would be quite willing to accept that suggestion." That does not mean there is necessarily anything wrong with the suggestion; but I have come to the view myself that the suggestion does not amount to very much, and that is probably the reason the minister was prepared to accept it. I am prepared to vote for it, but I do not think it accomplishes the purpose that was being pressed from this side of the house in the debate last Thursday.

The minister says it would make very little difference to the practice that is now in vogue, as it is already possible for a court to fix a later day for the payment of a fine. All this suggested amendment does is provide for an instalment basis. The real nub of clause 694, as I see it, is in the first two subclauses, particularly in subclause 2 which almost makes it mandatory for a convicted person, not being able to pay the fine, to be sent to jail for a period of not more than six months.

I realize that there was quite a bit of discussion on this matter on Thursday; I realize that from this side of the house we did not make too much of an impression upon the mind of the Minister of Justice. But it does seem to me that the matter calls for further consideration, and that the proposal of the hon. member for Oxford, to which I take no exception, does not meet the point.

Has the minister given any further consideration to the larger point in the meantime?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I have, and this is not the first time I have given it consideration. I tried to be as clear as I could the other day in saying that we in this parliament are confined to the enactment of the criminal law. We can empower, as we did many years ago, magistrates to give time for the payment of fines; but we have no authority over the enforcement of the criminal law. Whether the magistrates in Canada will exercise the powers we confer on them by this particular clause we are discussing is a question over which we have no authority.

I was most frank with the members of the committee the other day in explaining what seemed to me to be the reason clauses of this sort were invoked to a much greater extent in Great Britain than they are in Canada. To me it is perfectly clear that one of the main reasons for this is that the United Kingdom has a very extensive and thorough-going system of probation, with probation officers in the large numbers that are necessary to supervise the granting of time for the payment of fines. Until such a system of probation is provided in the provinces of Canada, all we can do is provide in this clause that the magistrate shall have power to give time for the payment of fines, and hope that with his present facilities he will do this as frequently as possible. But so far as the power to do so is concerned, he has that power, and he has had it for a long time.

When the hon. member for Oxford made the suggestion that we should spell out this power and amplify it a little, I accepted this suggestion with alacrity, as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre pointed out. Of course we have no objection to spelling out what is part of the law now. But I do not want any person to think or say that our willingness to spell it out is an admission on our part that our present law is defective. I think what could be done under the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Oxford could be done under our present law. Having given consideration to his language, perhaps it would make it a little clearer if we adopted it. I have the necessary amendment here, and I shall ask one of my colleagues to move it in these terms:

That subclause (3) of clause 694 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(3) A summary conviction court may direct that any fine, pecuniary penalty or sum of money adjudged to be paid shall be paid forthwith or, if the accused is unable to pay forthwith, at such time and on such terms as the summary conviction court may fix."

With regard to the use of the word "time" in the singular, perhaps I should say that by the Interpretation Act a reference like that in the singular includes a reference in the plural. Therefore it would be at such time or times and on such terms as the summary conviction court may fix. I do not see how within the limits of the English language we can go any further than that in conveying power to the magistrate. The mere fact of our conveying it is no assurance that the magistrate is going to exercise this power. All we can do is to convey it. If it meets with the approval of hon. members I would be glad to suggest that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys move this amendment.

Mr. Prudham: I move accordingly.

Mr. MacInnis: I think what we are trying to do here is eliminate the impression that a person is being imprisoned not for the crime of which he was accused but because he could not pay the fine levied for that crime. I did not like to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre say the minister was accepting this because it did not amount to much. I have been associated with him for some considerable time in the committee and I do not think—

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member said worse this afternoon.

Mr. MacInnis: No. Certainly the words were not very appropriate. I agree that if a time can be set to pay a fine fixed by a summary conviction court it means that a time or times may be fixed. I do not think the long amendment proposed need be considered. All we need to say is "at a time or times." I think that meets the case by adding just two words and making it read, "at a time or times to be fixed by the summary conviction court."

Mr. Garson: That was the very suggestion I made. As I say, under the Interpretation Act "time" means "times", so from the draftsman's point of view it would be almost a summary conviction offence to put in "time or times". However, I have no objection. So far as having people understand it is concerned, I think if we put "or times" in the present subsection it might be more effective for at least the lay members of society. Whichever the committee prefer is quite agreeable to me.

Mr. Ellis: Do I understand that if this amendment carries in all cases the magistrate will give sufficient time to pay the fine?

Mr. Garson: It will be up to the magistrate. I suggest to my hon. friend that with all the good will in the world, if you are going to set up magistrates and judges whose job it is to exercise judgment on the facts, you cannot tell them what to do. We have to leave it to the judge or magistrate to decide on the facts of the case whether to give time or not. If the magistrate or judge is satisfied that an accused cannot pay forthwith, he may give time, but he has the right to decide in every one of these cases. He has to decide whether he will do it or not.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): The accused has to ask for that?

Mr. Garson: I would not say that; if the magistrate is satisfied.

Mr. Knowles: Before the clause as amended carries there is one other point on which I would like to say a few words. About an hour ago the minister relied on inflation as an argument in connection with another clause where the amount of $25 was being raised to $50. What he does here is raise $50 to $500. Is it the same inflation that is responsible for this? The code as it now stands under the analogous clause—

Mr. Garson: To what section is my hon. friend referring?

Mr. Knowles: To clause 691 (1). The cross-reference is to section 1052 (2) in the code as it now stands. The minister will note that in the section of the present code it is $50 while in the clause now before us it is $500.

Mr. Garson: The offences are quite different. If my hon. friend will look at section 1052 (2) he will see that it reads:

> Every one who is summarily convicted of any offence for which no punishment is specially provided, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars, or to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding six months, or to both.

Mr. Knowles: Clause 694 (1) reads:

> Except where otherwise expressly provided by law, every one who is convicted of an offence punishable on summary conviction is liable to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for six months or to both.

What is the difference? Not only does it say the same thing in a slightly different order of words, but the note on the right-hand page tells us that clause 694 (1) is an analogue of section 1052 (2). Unless I do not understand the English language it seems to me they are saying the same thing. It is on that basis that I still press the point as to why inflation results in $25 being raised to $50 in one case and in $50 being raised to $500 in another case.

May I point out that in this same revision of the code we made a change in the opposite direction in respect to penalties imposed upon corporations for summary conviction offences. As the old code stood, the penalty on a corporation for a summary conviction offence was in the discretion of the court; there was no ceiling, there was no limit. Under the new code a limit or ceiling of $1,000 has been fixed. In the case of the corporation it has been brought down from infinity to $1,000. In the case of the individual it has been raised from $50 to $500.

I would like to put two questions to the minister. First, why has the $50 been raised to $500 when in the other case the increase was from $25 to $50? Second, how does the minister justify this different treatment of individuals and corporations? In the case of the corporation the maximum penalty upon summary conviction has been reduced, but in the case of the individual the maximum penalty upon summary conviction has been increased.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, the answer to my hon. friend's question is this. If he will go through the present code he will see that with regard to a large number of offences punishable upon summary conviction it is provided in each case that everyone found guilty upon summary conviction shall be fined X dollars. The cases we are discussing here in Bill No. 7, however, correspond to the n.o.p. items in the tariff, namely, those not otherwise provided for; and in this bill there are few if any penalties specifically provided. My hon. friend might say, "suppose that is so; why should these cases go up from $50 to $500?" He will find other sections in the code which state that a certain offence is punishable upon summary conviction or by indictment; and in that case, dependent upon how heinous the circumstances are, the crown prosecutor has to decide whether to lay a summary conviction charge or a charge as an indictable offence.

I have no specific instructions upon this point because I do not recall any specific reference to it in the report of the commission. However, I believe a possible reason for this maximum penalty being increased to $500 in summary conviction cases which are not otherwise provided for is that it may give a greater discretion to the prosecuting officer in deciding upon the facts of a certain offence whether it will be a summary conviction charge or an indictable offence if there is a reasonably heavy penalty which can be imposed if tried summarily before a magistrate. In relation to these penalties in Bill 7, my hon. friend should keep in mind that they apply to a large number of offences that have no penalties of their own; that they are maximums, and that the magistrate can impose not more than that maximum but anything less than that if he so wishes.

So far as the limitation upon the penalty chargeable against a corporation convicted on a summary conviction offence is concerned, I believe the last time this matter was before the committee my hon. friend and I debated it at considerable length. I do not know if I convinced him on that occasion, but my thesis then was that for the limited number of summary conviction offences in the code that a corporation can commit, $1,000 was a reasonable figure as a maximum penalty; and that it was quite unreasonable, as it is under the present code, to say they could be fined an unlimited amount, because no magistrate would ever impose that sort of penalty, and a provision of that nature would simply be inoperative.

Mr. Knowles: But why does not the argument which the minister puts forward in respect of the individuals apply to corporations? He states that in respect of an individual the decision of the prosecutor as to whether to charge the individual with a summary conviction offence or an indictable offence may be influenced by the amount of the fine which can be levied under a summary conviction charge. Should not that same reasoning apply in respect of a corporation? I would remind the minister that a $500 fine may be pretty serious when applied to an individual, but a $1,000 fine might just be peanuts for a corporation. On the basis on which the minister is arguing you may by the same token make it necessary for the prosecution to charge a corporation with an indictable offence rather than a summary conviction offence because the fine upon summary conviction is too low.

Mr. Garson: On that score, Mr. Chairman, I would have thought that in most cases where we have a liability in excess of $1,000 the prosecutor would be inclined to charge it as an indictable offence against the corporation.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I believe there is an assumption that the fine levied on the individual would always be a low fine and not approach the maximum, whereas a fine levied on a corporation would be at the maximum. On March 10 I asked the minister whether he thought the maximum fine on an individual of $500 was quite fair when one considered that the maximum fine for a corporation was $1,000. The minister replied, as reported at page 2870 of Hansard:

> Yes, Mr. Chairman. I certainly think that is a fair basis in respect of summary conviction offences; and it applies only to summary conviction offences.

The amount of money is not important. What is important is this ratio of two to one. If the minister points out that a court might levy a fine of only $100 on an individual, then by the same token the court can levy a fine of one-fifth of the maximum on a corporation, namely $200. The minister's comparison between $500 and $1,000 misses the point altogether, and I fail to see how he can suggest that a $500 maximum for the individual is fair when we consider the maximum fine for a corporation is only $1,000.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if the hon. member is not basing his thinking upon the assumption that all corporations are wealthy and all individuals are poor. If a man were a millionaire and the magistrate wished to impose a fine upon him which would be somewhat painful I would think $500 would not be at all out of the way. I do not believe it is correct, however, to assume that because it is an individual on the one hand, and a corporation on the other, you may not have an exceptional group of individuals on whom you would have to impose a very stiff fine before they felt it at all. In cases of that sort I am sure my hon. friend, if he were a magistrate, would be glad to have that sort of discretion which the $500 limit would give him.

I do not believe if you were to examine the average of the penalties imposed under a clause of this kind they would go anywhere near the $500 mark, because most people are not too wealthy. Where the magistrate, on the other hand, feels he has to impose a penalty on an accused which the accused will really regard as a penalty he is provided under this clause with the proper authority to do so if he feels the facts are sufficiently serious.

Mr. Ellis: I should like to draw the minister's attention to the wording of the section we have just been discussing. Section 694, paragraph 1, reads as follows:

> Except where otherwise expressly provided by law, every one who is convicted of an offence punishable on summary conviction is liable to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for six months or to both.

I raised this point a day or two ago and the minister pointed out that in the event of a wealthy individual being brought before the court, the magistrate could not only fine him the maximum of $500 but could also impose a jail sentence.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Ellis: This evening the minister is saying that the maximum fine is $500. In other words it is suggested that a millionaire could be brought before a court, and the maximum fine provided under this code would be $500 on summary conviction. But as the minister will note, this section enables a magistrate to impose a jail sentence in addition to a fine. I do not think the comparison the minister has made is valid at all. A corporation cannot be sent to jail on summary conviction. A fine is all that can be levied against it. I think the minister should bear in mind the fact that in the event of a wealthy individual being convicted, on summary conviction, the magistrate can impose both a fine and a jail term up to a maximum of six months.

Mr. MacInnis: I think perhaps we are using wrong comparisons here when we are comparing the fine that can be levied on a corporation on summary conviction and the one that can be levied on an individual on summary conviction. I think we are also confusing the issue when we talk about millionaires being subject to this fine as well as ordinary individuals. For every millionaire who will be brought into court on a summary conviction charge there will be hundreds of thousands or a million brought in who are people with little means at all. It is really for these people that we are making the law. We are not necessarily going to punish the millionaire to a greater extent just because he happens to be a millionaire. We are punishing him for the offence, and not for what he possesses.

As I mentioned this afternoon in connection with another section with which we were then dealing, I do not know how long section 1052 (2) has been in the code, but I imagine it has been there for quite a long time. If we have got along all these years with a fine of $50 for a summary conviction offence I should like to hear what arguments were given by those who were revising the code for increasing it to $500 and, as has already been pointed out, six months' imprisonment. The maximum in both cases can be imposed.

I am sure the minister would be meeting the wishes of members in all sections of the House of Commons if he were to reduce this fine. We have had considerable inflation in the last few years. Let us say there should be a 100 per cent increase and make the fine $100. I wish the minister would give that matter some thought before we pass this clause.

Mr. Garson: My friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway wanted me to give an example of a penalty of $500 for a summary conviction offence. If he has the existing code in front of him I would refer him to section 537, which reads as follows:

> Every one is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars over and above the amount of injury done, or to three months' imprisonment with or without hard labour, who wilfully kills, maims, wounds, poisons or injures any dog, bird, beast, or other animal, not being cattle, but being either the subject of larceny at common law, or being ordinarily kept in a state of confinement, or kept for any lawful purpose.

That is a summary conviction offence. If I had the time tonight I could present other instances of summary conviction offences which under the existing code are punishable in the amount of a maximum of $500. This limit in Bill No. 7 that is being provided in those summary conviction cases in which no specific amount is stated is not providing any greater penalty now than that which is provided in a number of individual cases in the present existing code such as the one I have just named.

There is a point which I thought I might deal with while I am on my feet, which was raised by my friend the hon. member for Regina City, I think it was, as to the corporation only having to pay a fine and, since you could not imprison it, it was let off without any further penalty. If he will look at clause 623 he will see that it says:

> Notwithstanding subsection (2) of section 621, a corporation that is convicted of an offence is liable, in lieu of any imprisonment that is prescribed as punishment for that offence,
> (a) to be fined in an amount that is in the discretion of the court, where the offence is an indictable offence, or
> (b) to be fined in an amount not exceeding one thousand dollars, where the offence is a summary conviction offence.

Actually, if the court wished to do so it could impose a fine of $500 and then a further $1,000 in lieu of imprisonment, which would be $1,500. I only mention that matter in order to clear up the point. I am not saying it has any particular bearing on the argument we have been carrying on.

Mr. MacInnis: Section 537 spells out a crime that is punishable on summary conviction. I submit that section 537 is covered in the new code, the one that we are discussing now, in clause 386 which reads as follows:

> Every one who wilfully and without lawful excuse
> (a) kills, maims, wounds, poisons or injures dogs, birds or animals that are not cattle and are kept for a lawful purpose, or
> (b) places poison in such a position that it may easily be consumed by dogs, birds or animals that are not cattle and are kept for a lawful purpose, is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

What the minister is suggesting here is that we may bring a great many much lesser crimes under this, shall I say, same umbrella of summary convictions punishable by a fine not exceeding $500 and six months' imprisonment or both.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend uses the words "what we are doing here". One of the things we are doing here is taking section 537, which carries a penalty of $500 under the existing code, bringing it into the new Bill No. 7 and saying that every person who does that is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction. Then, not naming the penalty, we provide the general penalty clause for summary conviction generally, that the maximum fine shall be $500. We have not disturbed the $500 maximum penalty for this offence at all.

One of the purposes of this revision was to avoid the great, long sections with penalties in each. My hon. friend can see that this clause in Bill 7 is infinitely shorter and that it does not specify any penalty at all. But one of the consequences of doing that is that you must have a general penalty for all summary conviction offences which is sufficiently heavy that it can be applicable to all summary conviction offences including this one of maiming dogs, birds, beasts and so on. I think my hon. friend will agree that if the offence prescribed in section 537 of the existing code were brought into clause 386 of Bill No. 7 and the penalty for a summary conviction offence was $50, the effect would be that we would have reduced the penalty now attracted by that offence from $500 to $50.

Mr. Winch: That is the old section 537?

Mr. Garson: Yes, section 537 of the existing code.

Mr. Coldwell: The thing that strikes most of us is that you set a maximum penalty for all summary conviction offences of $500 or six months in jail, or both. Take a summary conviction offence under the new code such as vagrancy. There is a maximum penalty of $500 or six months in jail. Is it not out of line to have the same limit—I know it is a limit—for an offence such as the maiming of animals, the placing of poison for animals and so on?

The point we are making is that summary conviction offences that are relatively light are treated in exactly the same way, so far as maximum penalty is concerned, as offences that cannot be regarded as being at all light. I think that is a point which has to be made. It seems to me there should be some distinction. I am not a lawyer, and I hesitate to say this because I have never appeared in court and do not know anything about it—

Mr. Small: There is hope for you.

Mr. Coldwell: I hope I never shall appear in court. I do know that magistrates sometimes vary in their appraisal of an offence. You may find one magistrate who imposes a pretty stiff penalty for quite a minor offence. I think we are permitting a maximum penalty for summary conviction offences that is quite severe if the magistrate cares to impose such a penalty.

Mr. Garson: The whole plan of the present bill so far as summary conviction offences are concerned is to set one maximum limit on penalties for all summary conviction offences. No minimum penalties are set with the exception of one or two cases like drunken driving and impaired driving and theft from the mail. Apart from that there are no minimum penalties at all. It is left to the magistrate to use his own discretion. With respect to the charges the hon. member has cited, in the case of vagrancy the traditional fine for that is long established.

I therefore do not share my hon. friend's fears at all. I think the provisions will work out very well indeed. As my hon. friend can see, Bill No. 7 is a much simpler and more understandable piece of legislation. It does away with the necessity of spelling out for each individual section what the penalty shall be, which actually does not mean a great deal because the circumstances of cases can vary so enormously with respect to the same offence. The magistrate is the one who determines the penalty, and I do not think that in 2 per cent of cases he will have any difficulty in respect of the points my hon. friends have made.

Mr. MacInnis: Not only may the circumstances in each case differ, but the state of the magistrate's liver may differ from day to day and have quite an effect on what the punishment may be. We cannot get away from the fact that clause 694 sets out to do what subsection 2 of section 1052 does at the present time, namely provide a maximum punishment for summary conviction offences. Subsection 2 of section 1052 reads:

> Every one who is summarily convicted of any offence for which no punishment is specially provided, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars, or to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding six months, or to both.

We have taken the $50 and raised it to $500 and have maintained the term of imprisonment. The words "with or without hard labour" have been omitted, and I was interested to hear the other evening that they no longer mean anything. I thought we were getting more and not less law-abiding, and were beginning to feel that the imposition of harsh penalties was not the way to secure observance of the law. I just cannot understand it.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to make the point that we in this group have not agreed with the minister in the principle he has just stated, that there should be a broad general discretion left, that you prescribe a number of offences and then leave the penalty to be imposed as provided by clause 694. It has been our contention throughout that the practice followed in the present code, which has been the principle observed for the last 50 years, of spelling out a particular offence and prescribing the particular penalty to be imposed for the particular offence, is the proper principle to be followed in drafting a criminal code for Canada. You carry out that principle in so far as is possible in respect of each offence you create.

It is true that under the old code you did have section 1052, but it will be seen that the application of that section was very much more limited than will be the application of clause 694. Under the old code the principle was that particular offences were spelled out for which specific penalties were provided. Then there was the catch-all for those cases where you did not provide a particular penalty, namely that the maximum would be $50 or six months. The principle is reversed in the new code. By and large summary conviction offences are left without specific penalties provided, and then there is the catch-all of clause 694.

However, the fact is that it is too late now. In some cases we have tried to amend particular sections but it has not been possible. We are now brought up against the practical application of this principle, and it has been pointed out by my hon. friends that an offence obviously of a less serious nature than another may carry the same penalty simply because they are all left to be covered under clause 694. The question of enlarged jurisdiction does not apply here because these are summary conviction offences, but it is a part of the pattern to which we object, the lessening of the particularity of the Criminal Code of Canada.

We have maintained throughout that in drafting a criminal law you should be as particular as possible and not as general as possible, so it will still be proper to observe that other maxim of the law that ignorance of the law is no excuse. Under this clause a person does not know what penalty may be imposed as a result of the offence with which he is charged, because the whole thing is left to the discretion of the magistrate. I do not think it is a sound principle.

Mr. Barnett: I have listened to this discussion for some time, and finally decided I should more or less repeat the arguments I advanced the other day in connection with this clause. I know that we are living in a machine age, but listening to the hon. member for Kamloops I wondered whether we were going to try to create a situation whereby the administration of justice would be a sort of push-button affair. I think we have to recognize that the matter of human judgment is still going to be involved in the effective administration of the law. It is important to build up a group of magistrates across this country who have some degree of common sense. Possibly there may be times when a certain amount of legal knowledge would be an added advantage. I shall not go into that at the moment. I have to repeat, as I did the other day, that I do not altogether share the concern of a number of my colleagues in respect to the increase in this maximum. I feel that, in so far as they have expressed themselves, they have been missing the important point in connection with the working of this increase. I have discussed this point with a magistrate whom I consider to have considerable practical experience. He has told me it is one of the problems with which he is confronted from day to day. He felt that the old limitation of a $50 fine meant nothing to a great many of the people with whom he had to deal. He felt that in order to effectively deter them from committing that sort of crime again he was forced to impose a jail sentence.

His argument was that sending a man to jail did two things, with both of which he disagreed. In many cases it rendered the man open to association with more hardened criminals, which might start him on a life of crime. The other thing to which he objected was the fact that the taxpayers of the country were forced to support that man while he was serving his jail sentence. Time and time again he suggested that if he were free to impose a fine which would hurt a little bit it would be much more satisfactory. If the magistrate is a reasonable man with common sense judgment in respect to the gravity of the offence, in respect to the circumstances of the culprit's income and so on, in many cases the $500 maximum fine would not be at all unreasonable. In fact I can think of a number of people whom I know that it would take $500 to hurt. Certainly I would much rather see them pay a $500 fine than go to jail for six months.

In my opinion that is the practical effect of raising this ceiling. For this reason I feel that some of my colleagues are perhaps a little bit too concerned over the question of raising this ceiling. Personally I believe that if punishment is going to be effective it has to be something the individual concerned is going to remember. I am all for trying to keep people out of our jails. I think it is to the advantage of a person convicted of an offence, and it is also to the advantage of the country, that we should not have any larger criminal population in our jails than is essential.

Mr. Knowles: There is obvious merit in the point my colleague has made, but I am one of his colleagues who is still concerned about the increase in this amount. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has pointed out that under the law as it now stands there have been magistrates who wished they could levy greater fines. The Minister of Justice has pointed out that $50 has not been the maximum penalty for all summary conviction cases. He cited one case in which the possible fine upon summary conviction was $500. In the past this $50 ceiling has been there only in respect of summary conviction cases not otherwise expressly covered.

I should like to ask the minister whether there are any precise fines associated with summary conviction offences in other clauses in Bill No. 7. Clause 694 is written in the same general language as section 1052 (2) of the former code in that it says:

> Except where otherwise expressly provided by law—

Then it goes on to provide that in such cases the maximum is $500. Under the old code the ceiling on cases not otherwise provided for was $50. Other cases were provided for throughout the code. What is the situation with respect to Bill No. 7?

Mr. Garson: I do not think there is any case, Mr. Chairman, in Bill No. 7 for which there is specific provision. I may be wrong. There may be the exceptional case, but I cannot recall it. With regard to all the summary conviction offences that are tried before magistrates the thought was that we would have just one clause in the bill providing the penalty, and that is the one in clause 694.

Of course that arrangement would be impossible if the idea of my hon. friend were to be put into effect, because if he looks at the existing code he will find that a good many of the sections dealing with summary conviction offences give a long statement of the offence and then end up by stating that upon summary conviction the fine shall be $50 or $100 or $500 or whatever the case may be. This seemed to the commission, to the government and up until the present time, in connection with this bill, to everyone who has examined it—

Mr. Knowles: Were there representations on this point from the provincial attorneys general?

Mr. Garson: They have agreed to it. It was felt this provided a much simpler bill. My hon. friend must realize, and he will know this is a fact if he stops to reflect about it, that the huge majority of penalties imposed by magistrates or by courts at the present time are very much less than the maximum penalty. In all these fines there is just about as much relationship between these maximum penalties that are provided in the code as there is between the maximum authorized railway rates and the competitive rates that are actually imposed. The magistrates cannot go above a certain figure, but in practice they do not come anywhere near this maximum.

A lot of these arguments which have been skilfully presented tonight, and in an abstract way carry some weight, have no application to what actually happens in the court because in imposing penalties magistrates never come anywhere near the maximum in most cases. It is not as if we were creating a new country as of tomorrow and we were providing a criminal code having had no past experience. The magistrates who are administering the present code and who will be administering the new code have a long tradition behind them as to the range of the fines that should be charged for vagrancy, for disorderly conduct, for driving to the common danger, and so on. Moreover there is not such a tremendous spread between the minimum and the maximum. It is true that $500 is a good deal of money, but I do not think myself that the magistrates in Canada will have any difficulty whatsoever in carrying out the provisions of Bill No. 7. The provincial authorities, who are much closer to it than we are, do not think so either.

Mr. MacInnis: I suggest to the Minister of Justice that the Criminal Code is a very real thing and is being enacted for a very real purpose. To say that the maximum fines are rarely if ever applied is all the proof necessary for me to show that the maximum should be less. Why put a fine in the code as a target for a magistrate to see if he can hit? It just makes nonsense of the code, particularly at a time when not only we but the world are beginning to realize that we are not going to make people good and law-observing by the size of the penalty we impose.

In order to terminate this discussion I am going to move an amendment, as follows:

That subclause (1) of 694 be amended by deleting the word "$500", and substituting therefor the word "$100".

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Garson: I think I should say very briefly that one of the obvious effects of this amendment, if it were carried, would be that a large number of summary conviction offences, which under the present code carry penalties in excess of $100, would be reduced from the amount they carry at the present time down to $100. If this amendment were put into effect we should have to change our whole approach to this question. We would have to go back to the individual summary conviction offences and provide a separate penalty for each. This would be a huge task.

I mention these facts so we shall understand that we are not just voting upon the question of whether the penalty in a few cases will be reduced from $500 to $100. This will apply to all the summary conviction offences in Bill No. 7. As I say, there may be one or two exceptions, but I cannot recall what they are, and I do not think there are any.

Mr. Knowles: Surely the minister does not seriously advance the argument that it would be a huge task to make all these changes. Surely he should meet the point on its merits. If it is unfair to have the bill the way it now reads, and if it would be fairer to make that change even though it might be a huge task to go through the bill and make the amendments, I am sure he would be the first to agree that it should be done. Obviously he has admitted that it could be done. If the amendment of my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway carries and the minister feels that the summary conviction offences such as the one he cited a moment ago should carry a fine of a sum more than $100, he could go back to those clauses and have the necessary amendments made.

I would be interested in knowing, because I see the minister is going to get to his feet again, how many summary conviction offences there are at the present time that carry a penalty greater than $100.

Mr. Garson: I agree with my hon. friend that if it were considered desirable the mere fact that it would be a large task is not in itself any reason why we should reject the amendment. My purpose in making the remarks I did was simply to make it clear to hon. members just what the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway involved. To be specific, it would involve going back over all the clauses in Bill No. 7 defining summary conviction offences which we have already passed, and amending them one by one to provide what the penalty for each of these separate summary conviction offences should be.

Mr. Knowles: Only where you wanted them to be more than $100.

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes; only where we wanted them to be more than $100. But take the very case the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway cited just a few moments ago, that of wounding or maiming dogs, birds and so on. That carries a penalty of $500. Unless the committee thought the present code was wrong—and I gathered from the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that he thought it was right—we would have to go back and open up that section and open up all the other sections and provide specific penalties for them; whereas in the bill we have provided one penalty for all the summary conviction offences. That penalty is of general application, with no minimum, leaving to the magistrates discretion to exercise their own judgment within those limits.

Mr. Ellis: Can the minister tell us—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Clause 694 of Bill No. 7 has already been amended in committee of the whole this evening by adoption of a new subclause 3, as moved by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. I find in citation 669 of Beauchesne's third edition, at page 231, dealing with the committee stages of a bill, the following. I need not read all the long paragraph, but it says in part:

> Amendments must be made in the order of the lines of a clause. If the latter part of a clause is amended, it is not competent for a member to move to amend an earlier or antecedent part of the same clause.

I have no alternative but to rule the amendment out of order under the circumstances, and I so rule. Shall the clause as amended carry?

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 717—Where injury or damage feared.

Mr. Nesbitt: When we considered this clause at an earlier date I outlined to the minister certain views I had on the subject and did so, as I recall it, by means of an example which illustrates a situation that frequently occurs and which I do not feel is covered by the clause as it is set out at the present time. Has the minister Hansard of that date?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Nesbitt: Then I need not take the time of the committee to repeat the example. What I had in mind was that the minister might consider an amendment to subclause 3(a), substituting something of this nature: "or commit the defendant to prison for a time not exceeding fourteen days if he considers under the circumstances that the defendant is likely to commit an indictable offence."

If the magistrate feels that having the defendant enter into a recognizance to keep the peace would not be sufficient to prevent him from committing an indictable offence, he may consider that a short cooling-off period in jail might do it. He would be able to put the man in jail for a period up to 14 days to prevent the commission of some serious offence.

As I said, in Ontario under the Ontario mental hospitals act a magistrate can order that an individual be sent down for 60 days for observation. However, from a practical point of view it sometimes does not work out. This is no reflection upon the province of Ontario, but sometimes the mental hospitals are full and there is no room. You cannot keep a man in jail under circumstances as they are at the present time, and it leaves the magistrate in an awkward position.

I gave an example the other day, and I referred also to these line-fence disputes where people sometimes get quite acrimonious and something unpleasant is likely to happen. I feel that the magistrate should have it in his power to place a person in a position where he would be unable to commit an offence. I have discussed this with a number of law enforcement officers and others and they are of the same opinion. I would be glad to hear the opinion of other hon. members on this matter.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if I get the facts correctly as they have been cited by my hon. friend. In a matter of this kind a great deal depends upon getting the facts straight. On March 11, as reported on page 2912 of Hansard, my hon. friend said:

> On one occasion the children's aid society in the city in which I live received a telephone call around midnight from a man who told them they had better come to get his children as he was going to shoot his wife and then commit suicide. There were several young children who had to be looked after.

As I understand my hon. friend, he feels that the difficulty arose because this information had been given to the children's aid society and they had no status to appear before the magistrate to swear out the information required under clause 717, which reads:

> Any person who fears that another person will cause personal injury to him or his wife or child or will damage his property may lay an information before a justice.

My hon. friend suggests that as a solution we empower the magistrate to put the individual in jail for a week or ten days, as he says, to cool off. That would mean, would it not, that upon the information, not of the person threatened but of some person else, to the effect that there was danger of the man complained against shooting some person or doing violence to him, the court on the strength of that representation should make an order sending that other man to jail.

I should think that sort of thing would be an outrageous invasion of a man's civil liberty. I should think the way for my hon. friend to get around the difficulty of which he speaks would be for the wife who had been threatened to be approached by the children's aid society and asked to go to the magistrate and lay an information within the terms of clause 717, that her spouse was threatening to kill her and her children. That would be squarely within the clause, and the magistrate could order a recognizance.

As I understand my hon. friend's other point he says that the man complained against either would not enter into a recognizance or would not carry out its conditions. I suggest to my hon. friend that if under those circumstances the person complained against is so far gone in his aberration that he will not enter into a recognizance or obey it, the chances are that he would be certifiable.

Mr. Nesbitt: As the minister has stated, I certainly would be of the opinion that a person who would not enter into a recognizance would be certifiable, but I am not a psychiatrist. It may be that after an opinion has been received from the royal commission which is looking into the matter of insanity as a defence a little more light will be cast upon the question of what exactly constitutes insanity, whether it may be a temporary affair. At the present time I think the minister will agree that we do not consider a person temporarily emotionally disturbed as being not responsible for the nature and the quality of his acts. It may be advisable to wait and see what kind of recommendation is brought in by the royal commission, and stand this clause further.

There is one other thing I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. In Ontario we have a provision under the Ontario mental hospitals act to send a man to hospital for 60 days, but it may be that in the other provinces they cannot do that. As I say, from a practical point of view you occasionally run into the circumstance where there is no room in the hospital, and the person would have to stay in jail. I do not think that would be proper at all.

It would only be in extreme or unusual circumstances that a magistrate would have to invoke this provision, but there would be the unusual case where the magistrate might be afraid to let a man out for fear he would commit a dangerous offence, and he might want to keep tab on him, to use the vernacular. Possibly the minister would prefer to have it seven days instead of fourteen. You could keep your finger on the man during the cooling-off period. Perhaps it would be agreeable to wait and see what the report of the royal commission has to say.

Clause agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall begin with the resolution with respect to assistance to the gold mining industry; then second reading of Bill No. 326, to amend the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act; then the resolution having to do with the setting up of an account in the consolidated revenue fund with respect to losses in connection with government property. We shall then call the Export and Import Permits Act to hear a statement on behalf of the government, and then the debate will be adjourned. Should all that be completed before closing time we shall continue with the Criminal Code.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, March 16, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Fourth and fifth reports of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Croll.

PRIVATE BILL

REFERENCE OF PETITION TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved:

That the petition of Madeleine Roy Julien for a bill of divorce, presented on March 12, 1954, together with the report made thereon by the clerk of petitions on March 15, 1954, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MASS RETALIATORY POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES—CONSULTATION WITH CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. It arises out of a speech delivered a day or so ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). Was the government of Canada consulted by the United States department of state before the announcement of the mass retaliatory policy by Mr. Dulles in January?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Prime Minister): I did not have notice of the question, Mr. Speaker, and I did not have a chance therefore to communicate with the Secretary of State for External Affairs to find out what the facts are. He is in Washington, and will be back here tomorrow night. I think he had better answer the question on Thursday.

DISABLED PERSONS

AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL AND SASKATCHEWAN GOVERNMENTS RESPECTING REHABILITATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the agreement become effective between the Canadian government and the Saskatchewan government respecting rehabilitation of disabled and physically handicapped persons and respecting the appointment of a director? If so, what is the effective date?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The answer is yes. An agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Saskatchewan, providing for the co-ordination of rehabilitation activities in that province, and federal financial assistance in relation to it and relating to the appointment of a provincial co-ordinator, was signed on August 21, 1953. I am now advised that a provincial co-ordinator on rehabilitation, in the person of Mr. J. S. Probe, was appointed in February by the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): May I ask a supplementary question? How many other provinces have come under this agreement to date?

Mr. Gregg: The provinces of New Brunswick, Manitoba, Newfoundland and Alberta.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INCLUSION OF FISHERMEN UNDER UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the Department of Labour now studying the possibility of including fishermen under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The answer is yes, that question is now being studied.

COMMUNICATIONS

SALE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE SYSTEM—PROVISION FOR EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, arising out of a telegram which I received today from the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada in connection with the transfer of the physical assets of the government telegraph and telephone system of British Columbia. Can the minister say what progress is being made in negotiations with the purchasers regarding the question of seniority and superannuation rights of the employees of the government system, and other related matters?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I can add nothing to what I have already said in the house in answer to the question which was asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East and also by the hon. member himself. At that time I said that negotiations were proceeding and I hoped it would be possible to effect a transfer by April 1. Since then I have received no information to impart to the house.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask a supplementary question? Will the government give an opportunity to the house to discuss this matter prior to the effective date of transfer, namely April 1?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think that would be possible, particularly if the agreement between the government and the private companies has not yet been completed. In any event, there will be ample opportunity on one occasion, if not two, to discuss the matter fully.

DUMPING

DAFFODILS—REPORTED UNITED STATES IMPORTATIONS INTO VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of information received that customs officials have disclaimed knowledge of regulations governing the importation of great quantities of daffodils into Vancouver, will the minister give assurance that the protest of the British Columbia bulb growers' association is being given consideration and that steps will be taken to remedy the present unsatisfactory situation?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I have grave doubts that the customs officials have disclaimed knowledge of the regulations governing the importation of quantities of daffodils into Vancouver, because I have before me copy of order 42, supplement 11, dated December 18, 1953, which went to all appraisers and which gave directions with reference to the importation of flowers.

However, in view of the hon. gentleman's question I would say that the protest of the British Columbia bulb growers' association is being given consideration and steps are being taken to ensure that field daffodils are entered in accordance with the provisions of the Customs Tariff and the Customs Act.

[Mr. Fulton.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES IN TEXTILE INDUSTRY ON SHORT TIME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister as yet any figures available as to the number of those on short time in the textile industry?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Oxford asked a similar question some time ago and at that time I replied as follows, as reported on page 1489 of Hansard of January 27, 1954:

> There was no over-all estimate made based on the labour force survey of the number of people working on a short-time basis in the textile industry.

So that the answer to the hon. member's question is no, but perhaps the following information will bear upon his question. I have looked into this matter further and find that, while we do know the number of people who make claims for unemployment insurance because of short-time employment, this information is not available on an occupational or industry basis. As the hon. member will, I am sure, realize, it would be a large undertaking to maintain such detailed figures on a regular basis.

The best indication that I can give the hon. member of the change in the employment situation in the textile industry over the past year, along the lines he has in mind, is the average hours worked per week this winter compared with last winter. In December, 1952, the average number of hours worked by firms in this industry as reported to the dominion bureau of statistics was 43·7. A year later, in 1953, the average number of hours worked per week had fallen to 40·6. This represents a reduction of 7·1 per cent. The reduction was larger in the cottons branch of the primary textile industry than in the woollens and synthetic and silk sections. The reductions were 11·5 per cent for cottons, 6·3 per cent for woollens, and 5·0 per cent for synthetics and silk.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Has the Minister of Labour any further information as to the number of people involved in those hours of work?

Mr. Gregg: No. Our figures are not adapted to provide that.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE CLOSURE OF FRASER RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Will the minister state whether or not a decision has been reached with respect to the closure of the Fraser river above the New Westminster bridge to commercial fishing?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. The answer to his question is no. I hope to be able to announce a decision before I meet the fishermen's union in convention next week in Vancouver.

Mr. Patterson: May I ask a supplementary question. Before any such decision is made will the minister consider the possibility of giving the fishermen in that area one year's notice so they will have an opportunity to dispose of their equipment, if they so desire, and secure a livelihood in some other occupation?

Mr. Sinclair: That question is not quite applicable, because all we are considering is a little earlier closure on two species of salmon in that area.

THE PRIME MINISTER

WELCOME ON RETURN—FACILITIES AVAILABLE TO PUBLIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Will the Rockcliffe airport be open to the general public tomorrow night for the purpose of welcoming the return of the Prime Minister of Canada?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member asked this because quite a few hon. members have been asking for information on the subject.

Mr. Ferguson: I was afraid I might be kept out.

Mr. Claxton: Rockcliffe airport will be open to the public. Entrance will be by the Montreal road.

Mr. Ferguson: Oh, good.

Mr. Claxton: An attempt will be made to deal with motor vehicle traffic. It is expected that in addition to some senators and hon. members, and members of the diplomatic corps, there will be a considerable part of the general public who will wish to extend a welcome to the Prime Minister on his return from a tour which has made history.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO 1954

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to extend the application of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to the year 1954.

Mr. Adamson: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Speaker: That would be made in committee. As the hon. member knows, no statement is made at this stage of the proceedings. This is merely a motion that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole. See Journals, January 26, 1954.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Adamson: Is the minister going to make a statement now?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, with your permission I should like to make a statement concerning the resolution to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act which is before the house.

The intention of the government to introduce legislation to extend the application of the act to the year 1954 was announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to the press on October 7, 1953. Most hon. members are familiar with the objectives and provisions of the act from previous years, and I feel there is little additional information to be provided at this time.

The former legislation expired on December 31, 1953. The bill now before you provides for the extension of the act to 1954. This legislation proposes to continue the formula for calculating the assistance to individual mines in the same form as 1953.

As pointed out by the Prime Minister in his statement to the press, the special difficulties which have affected the gold-mining industry still continue. The proposed legislation will assist the industry and the gold mining communities to plan their operations for the coming year with a greater degree of certainty.

Some idea of the scope and importance of this emergency assistance measure can be seen from the number of mines which have applied for assistance. No less than 56 gold mines from widely separated regions of Canada have applied for assistance in respect of the calendar year 1953.

Gold mines in Canada have the choice of two main markets. First, they may sell their gold to the mint at a fixed price of the equivalent in Canadian dollars of 35 United States dollars per ounce. Secondly, they may elect to sell their products on the open market. However, a mine selling on the open market is not eligible for assistance under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. To this date only one mine has elected to sell on the free market during the year 1954, compared with five in 1953 and 13 in 1952. Mines, over the past few years, have been squeezed between rising costs of production and the fixed mint price for their products. Also, gold mines in this country were seriously affected by the appreciation of the Canadian dollar in terms of the American dollar. This meant that for the greater part of the period during which the Canadian dollar was at a premium, the mines received a steadily decreasing return for their product.

The increased assistance granted in 1953, and if continued through the present year, may therefore be regarded as a special measure designed to compensate for that factor. It is because the government is trying to preserve those modern communities dependent on gold production, Mr. Chairman, that the resolution is being placed before the house at this time.

The gold mines have made a real attempt to meet this challenge. Never before have gold mining operations in this country been more efficient. Tremendous strides have been made in mechanization and improvement of existing installations. I believe the management and workers who have striven to make the industry more efficient deserve a great deal of credit for their efforts.

Over the past year no new lode gold mines have commenced operations in Canada. Five mines in Ontario have closed down, four of them having exhausted their ore, and the fifth because its operations could no longer be carried out economically. In 1953 both volume and the value of gold production in Canada declined. The figures I am about to quote include gold produced from base metal mines which, of course, do not receive assistance on the gold they produce. Under the act a gold mine is defined as a mine whose value of gold production for a year is 70 per cent or more of the total value of the products derived therefrom.

[Mr. Prudham.]

The total value of gold production from all the mines in Canada for 1953 was $139,826,286 compared with $153,246,016 in 1952. Production in 1953 was 4,061,205 ounces compared with 4,471,725 ounces in 1952. Of the 1953 figure 467,356 ounces were produced in base metal mines and 3,593,849 ounces in gold mines.

An appreciable amount of this decrease in 1953 may be attributed to the loss of production from mines on strike, as well as decreased base metal production during the period of the strike at Noranda mines. It is encouraging to know that these labour disputes in the industry have now been settled.

On the basis of those mines receiving assistance for the calendar year 1953, the sum of $8,257,112.78 was paid out by the government in emergency assistance as at the end of December 1953. This figure, incidentally, does not include applications for the fourth quarter of 1953, holdbacks, or applications not yet received. These are now being received by the department and payments are still being made on applications for 1953. It is anticipated that the total payment for the calendar year 1953 will approximate about $15 million.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say that in presenting this resolution for an extension of assistance for the year 1954 it is the government's hope that this extension will enable the gold mines to continue their operations so that eventually they may be able to carry on without this emergency assistance. It has always been the government's intention that this assistance should be only of a temporary nature.

Mr. Nicholson: Could the minister tell the committee the total amount expended since this legislation was first passed?

Mr. Prudham: The amount paid since the commencement of the act up to December 31, 1953, was $61,362,672.93.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, this recurring bill which the minister has just introduced is, in my opinion, an unfortunate necessity. It is unfortunate because the necessity for it is based on actions which take place outside of Canada, and over which we have had very little control.

The only solution to the problem of gold production in Canada, and I speak solely of the question of gold production now, is an increase in the price of gold. This can be brought about by two methods, and by two methods only. The first method is by a unilateral increase in the price of gold by the United States treasury. The second method is an increase in the price of gold brought about by the operations of the free market. I shall deal with these two methods very briefly.

The United States treasury and the United States authorities, rightly or wrongly, have a set policy against increasing the price of gold. Since that is their policy I feel that we cannot and should not criticize it even though it may be wrong. They have two basic fears: first, that an increase in the American price of gold would be an inflationary measure. Secondly, they feel that if the statutory $35 price at which the United States government is prepared to buy gold were increased it would assist the Soviet union, which may or may not be the second gold producing country in the world. These are, I believe, their basic reasons and it is not for anyone in this parliament, I believe, to criticize them even though we may not agree.

The second possibility of increasing the price of gold is by action brought about by the free market. One of the most interesting economic phenomena in the world today has been the drop in the price of gold on the Paris market in terms of the French franc. I think it is difficult to understand that drop in terms of a currency such as the French franc, in a country where inflation is today rampant, where for six weeks of last year the country was completely without a government of any sort and where for the first time in the history of the third republic fourteen ballots had to be taken in order to elect a president. Nevertheless, despite what to those of us who are not in France would appear to be great instability in the internal economy of that country, the price of gold in terms of the French franc fell substantially during the past year. I say that fact is incomprehensible. Here you have a paper currency continuously inflated within a country whose government is anything but secure. However, the facts are as I have recorded them.

I now want to put on the record a simple statement from the report on the administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. I think it is important to quote the first sentence of that report for 1953. It states:

> The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act of 1948 was primarily designed to assist the high cost or marginal gold mines to continue operations throughout the difficult post-war period.

The original idea with regard to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was that it was definitely a temporary measure, as the report states, to overcome the difficulties of the immediate post-war period. Unfortunately the situation did not improve. Whereas the original intent of the act was merely to assist the marginal or high-cost producers, today we face the tragic situation that there is only one straight gold mine in Canada not accepting assistance from the government. I think that fact shows the sort of dangers we run into, right from the beginning, when we start bonusing any industry. I do not think that any of the straight gold mines really asked to be bonused.

One other thing has happened. In 1952 the bonus on our production per ounce was $3.14. In 1953 this figure had risen to $3.93 per ounce. It is estimated that in 1954 this figure will rise to approximately $4.20 for every ounce of gold produced. At the same time the production of gold fell from $150 million; I think our maximum production was slightly over $150 million.

Mr. Prudham: I know that my hon. friend wants to get the figures right. The figure quoted for 1952 was $3.93. That is not a complete figure. That is just—

Mr. Adamson: Just for the mines receiving assistance?

Mr. Prudham: No. It is not complete for the mines receiving assistance either. At the end of the year the returns are never complete. This is just a partial figure for that year.

Mr. Adamson: Yes. The report states that the figure was $3.14 in 1952 and that it was $3.93 for 1953.

Mr. Prudham: When the returns for 1953 are complete, that figure will be changed.

Mr. Adamson: It will be increased?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: The point is a minor one, Mr. Chairman, but I am glad the minister brings it to my attention. The real point that I am making is that the cost of assistance has been going up. I think the estimate for this year was $4.19 or about $4.20, if I remember it correctly from a previous debate in this chamber. In any event, the cost of bonusing the gold mines on a per-ounce basis is increasing, and the production of gold is decreasing. The labour disputes certainly had a fair amount to do with that decrease; but as your over-all costs of production go up, less of the basic rock in the Pre-Cambrian shield can be classed as ore. For every ten cents of increase in the cost of production of an ounce of gold, just so much more ore is turned into waste rock. The seriousness of that situation has been brought out many times in this chamber. It shows that one of the tragic things is that we are turning a great national asset into waste rock by the present procedure.

So much for the mines themselves, for what is happening to our production, and for what is happening to costs and to the national interests of the country. Since the act was originally introduced, there have been several amendments, including changes in the regulations. I think there have been eight amendments to the act. Straight bullion is allowed to be sold on the free market without having to be adulterated down to 22 carats. That is a good thing because it saves the producers that cost of adulteration.

According to the latest figure I have had for this month, the situation is that the gold mines of Canada are receiving $33.84 an ounce at the mint compared with $38.50 in 1939. It should be remembered that the Canadian dollar was at a discount of 10 per cent in 1939 whereas today it is at a premium of approximately 2¾ to 3 per cent. Therefore our gold mines are not only not receiving any more for their product in 1954 than in 1939 but are actually receiving about 12½ per cent less. The minister has very kindly sent me the figure of $33.79 as of the 6th of March. I was a little generous. I said $33.84. But the main point is that here we have an industry, which at one time was the greatest dollar producer of metals in Canada, exceeding even nickel, exceeding all our base metals, with a production of over $150 million a year, that is today receiving 12½ per cent less for its product than it did in 1939.

I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to think of any industry in Canada today, whether producing a basic or a manufactured commodity, that could even be in business if it were only receiving for its product not what it received in 1939 but 12½ per cent less. I venture to say that not a single producer of any other product in Canada could be in business today under such circumstances. I think that shows more than anything else the way that the gold mining industry has tackled this problem and its amazing efficiency. What has been done to pare costs, what has been done to make mining more efficient, what has been done just to keep the mines alive is a great triumph and a great credit to our gold industry in all its branches. I am glad the minister brought that out in his statement because I wish to reiterate it. So much for that point.

We say to ourselves: Can we do anything that will be effective? For a number of years it has been my criticism of the administration that we have not done as much ourselves in this regard as we should have done. I wish to quote a paragraph from the speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs last night in Washington. I think it is of considerable importance, and I shall paraphrase the first few words. Speaking to the Americans he said that it is essential that we work together—

> —if the great coalition which we have formed for peace is not to be replaced by an entrenched continentalism, which I can assure you makes no great appeal to your northern neighbour as the best way to prevent war or defeat aggression, and which is not likely to provide a solid basis for good United States-Canada relationships.

I say "amen" to that statement. To me that has been the great weakness of the attitude of our government toward the United States. As I have said, it is none of our business to criticize their actions, and I am not doing so now. But with respect to international matters involving exchange, convertibility, and particularly the question of gold, I feel that we could have established our own market irrespective of the attitude of the United States and that if we had taken resolute and courageous action we could have led the world.

There was a great deal of misgiving when many years ago I advocated the freeing of the Canadian dollar. The same arguments that were used against the freeing of the Canadian dollar are used against the establishment of a free gold market. It was said that we could not free the Canadian dollar because of the international financiers, the United States bankers and the terrific size of our southern neighbour. We did it, with the result that our currency has become, in terms of other currencies, the premier currency in the world. Having taken such action in the case of the Canadian dollar, I contend that we can follow the same course in the case of gold.

I do not agree with the general policy of Canada of waiting for the Americans to make up their minds about what they are going to do. We cannot be hostages to internal United States politics. We cannot stand idly by and wait for the present United States administration or the Republican party to make up their minds with respect to what they are going to do about trade. Gold of course is only useful as a monetary metal and as a medium by which convertibility can be brought about. That is its only real use. Trade is four times as important to the individual Canadian as it is to the individual American. Unless we can solve the problem of sterling convertibility, of which gold forms an essential part, then our future is, to say the least, in considerable jeopardy because our major markets are in the sterling countries.

I do not feel that we can wait to see whether or not the Republican party is going to be run by the isolationists. We cannot wait for the Republican party to decide whether it is going to revert to political and economic isolationism or whether it is going to embark upon a policy of enlightened world co-operation as set out in documents such as the Randall report. To me, such a policy of waiting is dangerous in the extreme.

It is for that reason that, in and out of this house, I have championed the use of gold as a monetary metal, championed the basic policy of Canada's standing on her own feet where international trade is concerned. In this country we must trade; otherwise we destroy ourselves. Trade figures are encouraging; but to a greater and greater extent, our trade is with one country —a country which, I grant, is our best market, our major market. We are doing this simply because we have been unable to solve the riddle of convertibility. And in my opinion we have been unable to solve the riddle of convertibility because we refuse to lead, and particularly in the matter of gold.

This is not something we can do easily; it is not something we can do without risks. But, to my mind, the Canadian economy and the Canadian people have always been leaders in international affairs. We were world traders long before the Americans knew anything about world trade. Today in our own right we are world traders probably to a greater extent than any other nation in the world. But unless we can solve this problem of convertibility, unless we can produce some mechanism by which convertibility can be free, our international trade can be cut off very quickly and drastically, and with great and increasing danger to our whole economy.

It is for that reason I am speaking here this afternoon. This bill is to keep the mines alive, and it has my support. It also is supported by this party. But I do wish the administration—this government—would take the lead, particularly in this regard, so that we may stand on our own feet in this matter of restoring gold as the medium of convertibility in which historically it has always been, just as we did with our own national currency, the Canadian dollar. By so doing I believe we can give a lead to the world to prevent economic isolationism in North America, should that be the policy of the present administration—which I hope it will not be.

I feel we cannot stand by and watch something happen, if we can possibly take the lead ourselves to see that this great evil of economic isolationism does not occur again in our lives.

Gold Mining

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak at length at this resolution stage, but shall reserve what I have to say in detail to the debate on second reading of the bill to be presented to the house.

There are just one or two comments I should like to make at this stage. The first is that, as we all know, the gold mining industry is in a very unsatisfactory condition at this time. There are great differences of opinion between those who work in the mines and the management of those mines on a number of vital questions. Delegations have appeared in Ottawa before members of the cabinet recommending that the situation in the gold mining industry requires a special commission or committee to make a complete investigation and study of existing conditions in the industry. The miners went back to work, after their long strike, on the explicit promise of the premier of Ontario that such a committee would be set up on a provincial basis, and that a study of this kind would be made. So far as I can discover, to date no move has been made in the direction of fulfilling that agreement.

In so far as the federal government is involved in the gold mining industry, by reason of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, and in so far as it is of interest to the economy of the country as a whole whether the gold mining industry continues to exist or not, many of us think that the federal government should participate in the work of any such committee or commission. There are a number of questions which should and could be clarified by such a commission. There is the whole question of the extent to which the gold mining industry is today a depressed industry, and there is the further question of the extent to which private enterprise has succeeded, so far as this industry is concerned.

Private industry and private operators have been exploiting our gold mines through the years, and have been accumulating fortunes for private individuals. But never at any time in the history of gold mining in this country have those who actually mine and mill the gold received their fair share of the wealth produced from the mines.

The question now arises: Are some of those mines expecting to continue the rate of profits they have been making in past years, or are they now receiving or earning profits equivalent to those earned by many other industries in this country? There was a day when very high profits were demanded in the gold mining industry in order to induce investment of so-called risk capital. Today a large part of the risk involved in gold mining has been shouldered by the federal government. A great deal of assistance, outside of the act now under consideration, is given to gold mining by the federal government, in various ways. Today there is nothing like the risk involved in gold mining that there was some twenty-five years ago, so far as capital is concerned. Consequently I suggest that the whole position of the gold mines should be investigated, and I would urge upon the minister at this time that the government give serious consideration to the setting up of some such committee or commission. The strike in the gold mines may be over; the trouble is not over, and unless some serious steps are taken to improve the position of workers in the gold mines we shall before very long have a repetition of the trouble which was experienced in that camp during this winter.

There is another question the minister should look into, the question I raised in the former debate, namely, the extent to which the government should assume responsibility for seeing that, so long as the federal government comes to the aid of the gold mines, the workers in the mines should receive a fair share of that assistance. To what extent does federal aid go almost exclusively to the profits of the operators rather than to improving the standard of living of the miners? That is a question which needs some study.

The third question I should like to suggest, and which I shall speak on at greater length on second reading of the bill, is whether the minister considers it fair that the mines should be able to collect this subsidy on the number of ounces that would be produced in a given year were the mines not on strike. I hold in my hand sessional paper No. 78, referring to correspondence and details pertaining to the Hollinger gold mines in 1951, during which year that mine was on strike for a considerable part of the year. I notice that in arriving at the number of ounces on which subsidies should be paid the assistance is estimated on the number of ounces the mine would have produced had mining operations not been suspended for a part of the year. Last winter the unions in the camp were very anxious to know if it would be possible for the mines to collect on their 1953 operations subsidies based on the number of ounces they would have produced had the mines not been closed. I think the act permits that, and it is one feature of the act that should be considered by the minister.

We have to make up our minds whether the gold mining industry is essential to our economy. There are a great many communities across this country that are solely dependent upon gold mining. If the gold mines were closed, many hundreds of thousands of people would have to be transferred to other employment. Many, many millions of dollars' worth of property value would be lost and the business of many towns destroyed. It becomes a question whether or not we are to keep those mines operating at a loss, apparently, if we may believe the statements of the gold mining operators. How long can the government go on subsidizing that industry in the interests of the communities affected by the industry?

What would happen to our gold mines should the United States some day decide to buy no more gold? We have to study the entire question of the gold mining industry and its relations to our over-all economy. As conditions exist at the present time, and with no provision and no government policy for any improvement in this field, we can only go on paying subsidies to those mines year after year, regardless of the fact that there may be other industries just as vital to this country. The textile industry, for instance, is just as essential to our economy; it is running into difficulty and may need to be subsidized.

May I suggest to the minister that he give consideration, as was requested by delegations from the north, to the setting up of a committee or commission to make a special study of this industry; and secondly, that he consider whether or not the gold mines are going to be paid for gold they would have produced in 1953 had there been no strike.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, when we spoke on this same measure in 1952 the minister concluded with this statement, as recorded at page 2448 of Hansard:

> The extension of the cost-aid for another two years will give the mining industry a chance to cope with their problems. We all hope, and I know that the industry hopes, that they will not have to ask for further aid. However, that can be reviewed when the time comes. As I said before, this is not intended to cure the ills, but merely as a temporary aid to assist the industry in working out their own problems.

It appears now, from what the minister has said this afternoon in his opening statement and from what I can gather from the annual report covering the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, that the special difficulties under which gold mines have had to operate for a number of years continue. I think the minister put it well this afternoon when he said that the mines find themselves in a squeeze between rising costs of production on the one hand and a fixed price on the other. In addition, of course, the mines also suffer adversely from the premium on the Canadian dollar.

There are quite a number of arguments that could be used, good arguments, for continuance of the emergency gold mining assistance that we are considering now. And it is because we recognize there are sound arguments for a further extension of this assistance that we are prepared to support the measure.

I do not intend to speak at any length because I do not think it is necessary at this stage, but I should like to run through quickly some of the arguments which have influenced me in favour of extending the measure for another year.

In the first place, there are a good many towns and cities in far-flung places in this country which have come to be completely dependent upon gold mines for their continued existence. These towns and cities have flourished for quite a long while. I recall a very pleasant visit I made to the constituency of the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Eyre) when I went down into some of the gold mines and saw what was being done. At that time I visited the Porcupine and Timmins areas. I have in mind also a visit which I made to Val d'Or and other centres in the constituency of the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas). Since those areas are being well served by the cities and towns which have grown up around the gold mining industry, I think we should do all we can to ensure their continued vitality.

My second good reason is that the hunt for gold has resulted in the discovery of other important metals, and I believe every effort should be made to continue the hunt for gold in this country. I think the country is richer and more self-sufficient as a consequence of the discovery of those metals.

It seems to me that the third good reason for supporting this measure is that the search for gold has often preceded permanent settlements in a number of areas in Canada. Long after the gold veins were depleted and exhausted those settlements have persisted. I am quite aware that there are also a good many ghost towns, but the fact remains that some settlements are still thriving on a permanent basis although the gold mining has been exhausted for some years.

Perhaps the best argument that can be advanced for a continuation of this measure is that gold is the one thing we are pretty certain the United States will always buy. It appears that they have to. This is most important to Canada, in that for some years our country has had an unfavourable trade balance with the United States which our gold production materially helps to settle. I imagine that in the foreseeable future we are going to have further gold production to help settle this unfavourable trade balance, because I see little indication that the United States will feel constrained to buy as much as we would like to have her buy here.

Our people continue year after year to spend comparatively large sums of money in the United States for things which they could buy at better prices right here at home or perhaps in other places. I have been interested in the fact that Canadian people often persist in buying across the border things which they could buy more cheaply right here at home.

For example, at this very time if anyone visits the grocery stores he will see all kinds of fresh vegetables, particularly carrots. These are very appealing to the eye and I imagine they are delicious to the taste. They are purchased largely in southern California and Texas and brought to Canada. Our people buy them in preference to the commodity produced here which is pitted and kept over the winter in good shape. I find those carrots just as delightful and I imagine they are just as healthful. Perhaps they do not have quite the eye appeal since you must wash them a little, but they are cheaper.

The interesting thing to me is that our people continue to buy the eye-appealing product from the United States and commit themselves to the extent of considerable quantities of Canadian dollars. What is the result? They push the Canadian product off the market and as a consequence our production is discouraged or it rots. That is the fact and we might just as well face it. Of course, in a free country we cannot tell our people that they must not spend their money in the United States. They do it and as long as they persist in this practice we will just have to go on having these adverse balances of trade.

Another point is that we could buy carrots, tomatoes, lettuce and various green vegetables in the British West Indies and bring them to Canada instead of buying them in the country to our south. If we did that we would be supplying the British West Indies with badly-needed Canadian dollars with which they could in turn buy from Canada. At the same time we would be encouraging intercommonwealth trade, which in my opinion is an urgent necessity. In addition we would be reducing the unfavourable trade balances between Canada and the United States. It seems to me that there is a three-pronged advantage all round.

However, as long as the Canadian people do persist in spending their money as they do in the United States, it seems to me that we will have to do all we can to encourage the optimum production of gold with which to pay these bills. This is the argument which appeals to me more strongly than any of the others I have mentioned.

I think the best argument for extending to the gold mines the assistance which we now propose to extend is that it provides us with the one commodity which we can feel pretty sure the American treasury will always accept and against which they are not likely to raise embargoes, import quotas or other restrictions, as we find them doing so often in the case of other Canadian products.

Consequently we support the measure on a temporary basis. But if we thought the measure was going to be used for the purpose of eventually restoring the gold standard for our internal money system we would oppose it with all our might. However, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the government have committed themselves to a managed currency, which in my judgment is infinitely superior to the gold standard. It fits our type of economy much better than any gold standard could. So far as I am concerned, I feel that every encouragement should be given to continuing that policy.

For just a moment I should like to take a look at the financial aspects of the measure which I suppose will be introduced today by the minister. I gathered from what he said this afternoon, and from the annual report for 1952-53, that the total assistance paid to the gold mines from 1948, since we started paying assistance, down to the end of 1952, was $51,053,061. If we added to that the expected payment for 1953, when all the applications are in, amounting to $15 million, as the minister said this afternoon, the total would be $66 million to the end of 1953. Strangely enough, that is almost exactly the amount of money that a few years ago the federal government offered to the western farmers in settlement of their wheat claim. It will be remembered that they were up against exactly the same situation; they were in a squeeze all during the war. Their production costs had been going up steadily and they have been caught in the squeeze between these increasing costs on the one hand, and the fixed price on the other.

The wheat producers of Canada during that period were asked to subsidize cheap bread for the whole Canadian economy, and they did it without complaining. But I recall the tremendous amount of opposition which developed in this house at the time it was proposed to give the western farmers $65 million as a final payment.

An hon. Member: Not from us.

Mr. Low: Fortunately we did not hear it from the hon. members who represent gold mining constituencies. They have learned to be somewhat more charitable, seeing that they have to depend in some measure upon similar assistance. At any rate, I merely mention this because there is an interesting similarity in the amount of money involved.

About two years ago, when a proposal was made in this house that some arrangement be made to establish a support price covering the internal consumption of wheat in this country, a price which would reflect the cost of production plus a reasonable margin of profit for the farmer, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I recall, at that time exclaimed with, I believe, some vehemence, "Never will I support the subsidization of wheat."

An hon. Member: Because of the expense to the taxpayer.

Mr. Low: Yes, because of that expense.

Mr. Blackmore: The Prime Minister took the same attitude.

Mr. Low: I draw that to the attention of hon. members to demonstrate that there is a difference in their attitude towards wheat, which is being produced in this country today by, I believe, ten times as many people as are employed in all of the gold mines in Canada. The figure is at least ten times greater, because I believe there are no less than 250,000 wheat farmers and only about 22,000 workers in the gold mines. Yet we are subsidizing the production of gold and we would not think of establishing something like a support price for wheat in order to stabilize the economy to a greater extent than has been done in the past.

I draw that to the attention of the hon. gentleman because I feel there ought to be some consistency in our policy. I am not doing this to rub it in or to indicate any opposition to this measure.

An hon. Member: It makes good rubbing, though.

Mr. Low: I make that statement merely because it indicates that those of us from the west are just a little bit more charitable than some of the fellows from the east. We are supporting this measure because we understand what it means and we are trying to keep in mind the welfare of the entire country. We believe that if, in the case of any of these important producing industries in our country, it becomes necessary to take unusual methods to encourage their production so that they will meet the need which exists, we ought not to jump to the conclusion that we are going to rule out support. I believe support prices have their place in any economy. That, Mr. Chairman, can very easily be proved, for you cannot possibly ensure that each group within the national economy shall obtain a fair share of the national income unless something in the nature of a support price is established. I do not mean permanently, but the principle generally has to be established, and I recognize the wisdom of that principle.

We are supporting this measure because we recognize that at the present time we must give encouragement to the production of gold because, in the first place, those who are dependent upon its production need that assistance, and secondly, because we need the gold, particularly for the settlement of the adverse trade balance which we have with the United States. That is our reason for supporting this measure, Mr. Chairman, and I do not think I need say any more at this stage.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, as I do not want to delay the passing of this resolution, my comments will be very brief. However, I reserve the right to speak at greater length on the motion for second reading of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, if there ever was a resolution which no one in this house should oppose and which should, on the contrary, be supported by every hon. member, it is the resolution now before us. I understand however that it is the duty and responsibility of all members to ask for information, to inquire as to the provisions contained in the bill and to make sure that the money our Canadian taxpayers have been called upon to pay because of the enactment of a measure such as this, has been well spent.

I have been puzzled, however, by the stand some hon. members have taken and I intend to make a few comments for the benefit of those who only look for shortcomings in this industry, as well as in the interest of those who might be tempted to do likewise because they fear our government is making a mistake or is giving too much assistance to our gold mining industry.

First of all, payments made under the gold mining assistance act are not so large compared to the over-all budget of our country. Neither are they large compared to the subsidies paid to other key industries to tide them over difficult periods. They are not large in comparison with the amounts the government obtains, through income tax, from the gold mining industry and the people it employs. They are not large in comparison with the total profits made by all those other industries which do business with the gold mining industry. Finally, they are not large compared to the cost of reopening those gold mines and of putting the mining centres on an active basis once they have been abandoned for want of assistance.

In all sincerity, I urge all those who are concerned about this matter to think it over before declaring themselves squarely against the passing of a bill to help an industry and a section of our population which is in dire need of such help.

Let us examine the matter calmly and unselfishly. Let us remember that the welfare of the nation as a whole always requires that citizens be satisfied with their lot.

Once the price of gold will have reached a proper level, the gold industry will occupy the place it deserves in our economy. Instead of constituting a burden for the Canadian taxpayer, it will contribute generously, as in the past, to the welfare of the nation and of all Canadians.

That is why the resolution now before the house concerns not only the gold mining industry and the mining, agricultural and other centres directly dependent upon it, but also the country as a whole.

Let no one believe that the Canadian taxpayer is willing to sacrifice an industry as important as the gold mining industry. No, never. That is why the Liberal governments that have been in power these last few years have, as we all know, legislated in accordance with the wishes of the Canadian people and in their interest.

One must not consider lightly the importance of an industry which during 1951 paid for salaries, electricity, fuel, equipment, machine parts of all sorts and buildings, the fat sum of $127 million. Nearly $69 million were paid in salaries alone.

No, Mr. Chairman, the gold problem does not concern only the gold mining industry. It does not concern solely the provinces where we find gold mines; it does not concern only towns like Kirkland Lake and Timmins, in Ontario; Malartic, Val d'Or and Duparquet in Quebec; Ogama-Rockland and Snow Lake, in Manitoba; Bralorne, Hedley and Wells in British Columbia; Dawson and Yellowknife in the Yukon and Mackenzie river country, to mention but a few. It is a problem that concerns all Canadians and Canada as a whole.

Since the middle of 1946, production costs in gold mines have constantly increased, although technical progress and a better yield have enabled the industry to keep the increase in costs to a minimum.

The industry suffered a further disadvantage, and it is not the least. The price received for an ounce of gold not only remained the same, that is the equivalent in Canadian dollars of 35 United States dollars, but also, following the appreciation of our dollar, in terms of the dollar of our neighbour to the south, the operators constantly received inferior prices, so that, on the average, an ounce of gold yielded $34.27 in 1952, $34.45 in 1953, and went down as low as $33.76 during February last.

The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act is essentially intended to help the owners of Canadian mines to meet the considerably increased cost of gold, the price of which, contrary to that of primary products derived from mining or other industries, not only has not increased, but has had a tendency to go down during the last few years.

This act was given royal assent on May 14, 1948, and put into force during the years 1948, 1949 and 1950. It was afterwards amended in 1951, 1952 and 1953, and it lapsed on December 31 last.

On October 7, 1953, the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) explained that the particular problems which during the past few years have confronted the gold mining industry and the communities depending on it still existed, and he announced that consequently the government intended to ask parliament to extend this legislation for another year. That was referred to in the speech from the throne at the opening of this session and a resolution to this effect is now before us.

I have always had at heart the interest of my constituents and it is for this reason that I am today well at ease to deal with this question from all its angles. The miners, the workers and the farmers of my district know of what stuff I am made and they are well aware that I have always tried to protect their interest. They recognize also that those who try to run down the industry and its leaders, while masquerading under the title of protectors of the working class, are doing them more harm than good.

I want to say again that I never miss an opportunity in this house to point out the difficult problems confronting the gold mining industry. I always did my best to collaborate with the government and the other members who have at heart the improvement of the industry and the welfare of the people connected with it.

I am convinced that by rising to the defence of the gold mines I am working in the best interest of all those who live in the county of Villeneuve, whether miners, farmers, merchants or small property owners. I feel that I have done my duty and I am determined to continue to do so.

(Text):

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Prudham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 376, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING CO-ORDINATION ACT

AUTHORITY TO ENTER INTO AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES, CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 326, to amend the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, following the passage of the resolution on March 3 I attempted to cover some of the points that had been made during the debate but in looking over Hansard I find that I did not cover them all; and perhaps the ones that were covered were not fully dealt with. I am just going to mention the points, one by one, that I have jotted down and make comment on them. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) asked for the reason for the increase in the membership of the advisory council. The purpose of the increase is to provide for representation from all the provincial governments and at the same time to have enough vacancies so that other national bodies within our Canadian community may have representation on the board.

Then she asked this question: Under whose auspices will the training be given? The training will be given under the auspices of the federal-provincial training program known as the Canadian vocational training program and the trainees will be selected by special committees representing the federal government, provincial governments and the social agencies concerned with the individual trainees.

Then she also asked this question: Is it planned to confine this training to schools or will some rehabilitation centres be authorized to give training? The answer to that question is that all available training facilities will be used as they may be required, including schools, existing rehabilitation centres and, I would hope, future rehabilitation centres. The question was asked: Will training be given along apprenticeship lines? The answer is yes, and also along any line that may be required to meet the needs of the trainees. I am now of course speaking exclusively of disabled persons in need of rehabilitation training.

I made some reference the other day to what my friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) had said. He asked me few direct questions but he said this, and I am going to quote his words as reported at page 2625 of Hansard:

> I am concerned about giving the boy who had to leave school before reaching the eighth or tenth grade a chance to go back for a year and pick up the knowledge of mathematics necessary to get into a trade course.

That is the end of what I will quote.

Even though, as I stated the other day, the suggestion made by my hon. friend falls pretty well within provincial jurisdiction, I consider that it is a very important one. To answer with some optimism, I think it is true that the provincial governments are all trying quite hard to encourage their young people to obtain a well-rounded basic education. To this end some encouragement is given by the very terms under which family allowances are paid. But I can hear my hon. friend saying that that is all right but nevertheless they are leaving school—too early in many cases—to help their large families of brothers and sisters from what they are able to earn.

As a matter of fact he brought such a young man to see me just the other day. But I think I can tell him that by full utilization of the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act provincially and federally—and I am not saying that it is being utilized fully—a great deal could be done to meet the needs of the young people about whom he is greatly concerned. So far as the officials of my department are concerned, they are very anxious to utilize it to the greatest extent.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), in addition to questions which I answered, asked whether there would be financial assistance for agricultural schools for rural young people who lack the advantage of a formal high school education. Under the provisions of the youth training schedule established under the act, such training is given through short-term courses in the winter months. Vocational courses in agriculture in secondary schools are also assisted under the vocational schools assistance agreement. All financial assistance is given through the provincial governments and is usually shared fifty-fifty. He also asked whether financial assistance is possible for a large school area program. By "large school area program" I take it that he refers to what some provinces term regional high schools, a large school which takes in a large country area. The answer there is no, not in full, but any vocational courses included in such a large school area program might be eligible for assistance.

He also asked whether there is any provision in the act for vocational guidance. I said the other night that the only means I knew of by which federal assistance in training personnel in vocational guidance was given was under the physical fitness program of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). However, I was reminded afterwards that in the federal Department of Labour we do provide assistance to the provinces to some extent by supplying occupational monographs on various skills and by providing special film strips giving occupational information.

The hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hosking) inquired as to what proportion of the cost of vocational schools the federal government is prepared to pay. I think I answered the other part of his question the other night. Normally the federal government refunds to the provincial government up to 50 per cent of the cost of approved vocational school buildings and equipment. All such expenditures are of course subject to the limitation of the funds that may be voted by parliament from year to year.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) asked if the scheme was wide enough to provide retraining for merchant seamen. I think I answered that question the other night. He also asked what changes are to be made in the training given to men and women in the defence forces. No changes whatsoever are visualized under this bill. I think that covers most of the questions. After the debate on second reading is concluded I should like to move that the bill be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations, not because it contains any particularly difficult sections but because there may be some relevant matters that members of the committee would like to look into more fully. In addition, they may wish to have officials appear before the committee to answer questions in detail.
