are ready to take. There are a great many loan companies in the country. I daresay they go up to the hundreds, and, that being so, this one organization is no more likely to create a combine for the purpose of oppressing the borrower than any one of the banking institutions of the country. If I thought that was to be the case, I would propose to limit the amount of capital that could be paid into any one organization, but when I remember that in the city of London alone there are nearly a dozen loan companies, and I daresay in the city of Toronto three times that number, or perhaps more, then I do not think there is much danger in the direction which hon. gentlemen have mentioned.

The amendment was declared lost on a division.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed on a division.

CRIMINAL CODE, 1892, AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (Q) "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892."

(In the committee.)

On clause 442 A.

442 A. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to years' imprisonment or to a fine not exceeding dollars, or to both who, having in his possession any plate, roll or die made for the purpose of printing or engraving Dominion notes or any stamps, impressed or adhesive, to be used for revenue purposes by the Post Office Department or any other department of the government of Canada, or made for the purpose of printing or engraving any part of any such Dominion note or stamp, fails, neglects or refuses on demand to deliver the same to the Minister of Finance of Canada for the time being or to any person authorized by the said Minister of Finance to demand and receive the same.

Hon. Mr. MILLS said:—I propose to add to this a provison that the contractor's right to compensation shall not be jeopardized, or lessened, or in any way affected by the delivery of these stamps, plates and dies. As a matter of public policy, the government have over and over again required that these plates and dies be given up, altogether independent of the contractor. We have also forbidden the engraving of bills similar to bank notes. Patent medicine engravings, resembling bank notes, were at one time issued and passed off on careless persons. It cannot be that a person can have any right to retain a bank note plate which is of no possible use to him. They may be of use to the government of the day, but no one could make use of them without committing a fraud and being guilty of a crime against the law. So what has been done in the Post Office Act heretofore, what has been done with regard to the law in other cases, has been made general here. In the vast majority of cases there can be no reason in the world for not giving up the plates, or dies, as the case may be. They can be of no possible use to a party who was formerly a contractor, but has ceased to have a contract with the government. They can only be lawfully in the possession of a person while he is a contractor. When that contractoral relation ceases, then the postage dies, or dies for the printing of Inland Revenue stamps, or dies for the printing of bank notes, ought to pass into the possession of the government. There can be no doubt that that is a sound proposition; but if, under the contract, the party has not been paid, if he can show in a court that he is entitled to compensation, beyond the compensation which he has received under the contract, for the delivery up of these dies, we do not propose by this bill to take that remedy away. We leave him in the possession of that remedy, and that is all that can fairly be claimed; for I do not think any one can contend that such plates and dies should be in the possession of a party having no contractoral relations with the state.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The general principle laid down by the hon. gentleman is one in which every one must concur, but does he not think that the amendment to this clause goes too far? You first make a provision for imprisoning a man who has in his possession the articles mentioned in that clause, and you say at the close of the amendment which you propose to add, that that shall not interfere with any claim which he may have against the government for the dies or plates. Supposing a man has, under his contract, a right to engrave the articles which are, by this clause, made to be unlawfully in his possession. You then say that on demand he must deliver those up, and if he does not deliver them up he subjects himself to a penalty. But supposing a man has entered into a contract conditionally that these articles are to be given up on being paid for, and the government refuses to pay for them, under this clause you would nullify that provision in his contract, send him to jail and fine him; and then when he got out he could sue the government for the value of the plates. Would you compel the man to give up the dies before paying him? The principles involved in the bill seem to be very like that in other measures we have had to deal with this session—to be placed on the statute-book for the express purpose of meeting a special case. I find by a document placed in my hands that a difficulty has arisen between the old contractor and the Post Office Department in reference to those plates. He has been deprived—I do not say whether properly or improperly—of his contract. He is not the contractor for the engraving and printing of these articles for the government just now. The Postmaster General demands of the contractor the delivery up of the plates and dies which he has in his possession. The contractor says "Pay me for the value of these dies, &c., and you can have them." The Postmaster General replies "No, you are not entitled to any pay; you were paid for this artistic work which you have performed in the engraving of these plates in the price which was paid to you for the printing of the bills, the postage stamps, and the Inland Revenue stamps." The contractor says "That is not correct; those are not the terms of my contract, nor did I so intend it when I tendered." But the Postmaster General is obdurate and he refuses. He admits an indebtedness for eight or ten thousand dollars, which is also admitted by the department, as I understand it, and I think the correspondence will show that the Minister of Justice himself acknowledged that fact. The Postmaster General says "Well, I will neither pay you the amount which my department has certified is properly, legitimately and legally belonging to you, unless you comply with the demand which I have made and deliver up these stamps." The contractor says "I am quite willing to deliver up these stamps provided you will pay me their value, as is provided in my contract." The question is whether he has the right to retain them, and if he has the right to retain them, is not this clause framed expressly to meet his case? Is it not proposed so that he may be fined and sent to jail in case he refuses, after demand is made, to give up those articles which his contract says he is not compelled to do unless payment has been made for the same, and at the same time the government refuse to pay him? That seems to me to be the case.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman will excuse me for interrupting, the amendment which the hon. minister proposes to the clause here, is that the government shall pay.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—But first you make him a criminal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You make it a penal offence by fining the person if he refuses; and the minister says "If we owe you anything you shall not be debarred from going into court and collecting it." But that does not relieve him of the penalty of going to jail, whether he is paid or not. I cannot understand why the government should exercise such power, through any head of a department, in a case of this kind, where is involved a very small amount. The fifth clause of the contract reads as follows:—

> That all plates, dies and rolls specially used in connection with the said work, or any part thereof, and which have been paid for by the government of Canada shall be reserved for the exclusive use of the said government of Canada, as well as all plates from which the said work or any part thereof shall be printed, and shall be the property of the said government, and the company shall, on demand, deliver to the Minister of Finance of Canada for the time being, or as he may direct, all such plates, dies and rolls, the company holding them after they have been prepared and paid for as aforesaid.

If English language means anything, it means that if he is holding these dies and plates unlawfully, after having been paid for them, he should be subject to any penalty you can impose upon him, because no one will deny the importance of preventing a contractor, after he ceases to be a contractor, from holding plates and dies of this character, which might be stolen from him and improperly used. Then, as I understand, the Postmaster General contends that the value of these dies, &c., were included in the tender which was sent in, and, consequently, he has no claim for them. On the contrary, the contractor says, they were not. The correspondence upon this subject has been placed in my hands. Mr. Hogg was the solicitor for Mr. Burland, the contractor, and in the correspondence it is shown that he made a proposition to deliver up all these into court, subject to the decision of the court as to whether he has any right to them or not, and the Postmaster General pointedly and distinctly refuses to pay one dollar of what is due this man under the contract until he complies with the demand to deliver up the plates, &c., and then he goes further, and Mr. Hogg says, writing to his client:

I found him exceedingly bitter in regard to the question altogether, although he maintained an outward appearance of suavity with me. He said he was most desirous of doing what was fair and right; that he looked upon the dies, rolls and plates as worthless, excepting to the extent that there was a danger to the public. He thought that you would be glad to be relieved of the responsibility of keeping them in your possession. He would listen to no suggestion that the account should be paid and that the question of the payment for the dies, rolls and plates should be sent to the court for adjudication. He referred me to a section of the Post Office Act relating to persons holding in their possession dies and plates for postage stamps, making it a criminal offence for any person to have these articles in their possession.

We know that that is a criminal offence under the Post Office Act, and this contractor would be liable to that provision if he refused to give them up, were it not for the clause which is in his contract, and which I have read, that he is not obliged to give them up until after they have been paid for. The letter proceeds:

He referred me to a section of the Post Office Act relating to persons holding in their possession dies and plates for postage stamps, making it a criminal offence for any person to have these articles in their possession. I told him that such section did not apply in your case, and that so far as that was concerned I would not be very much troubled, as your possession was under contract, and although it had expired there was a question outstanding relating to the payment for them. He did not combat my interpretation of that clause, but said if it did not apply, he had already consulted the Minister of Justice with a view to so amending the Post Office Act as to make it apply to your case, and that when that was done he would not be answerable for any steps that might be taken under the amended Act.

There is a clear intimation that this clause is placed in the bill to meet this particular case. It appears that the Postmaster General —who by the way is a lawyer of some standing in his profession in the city of Toronto— did not attempt to combat the reasoning of the solicitor for the contractor upon this point, but he said "I will use the power of Parliament to compel you to do that which you contend is contrary to the provisions of your contract, and if you do not do it, I will punish you and send you to jail." The Minister of Justice now says "I propose to place that law upon the statute-book, but I will make a provision that even if the contractor does go to jail and pay a heavy penalty, he shall not be deprived of his recourse in court for the amount due him." The letter also says that the Minister of Justice thought that this proposition made by Mr. Hogg to him was a reasonable one, and he recommended him to consult the Postmaster General—a very reasonable course. Mr. Hogg says to the minister "I have consulted him and can do nothing with him. You ought to grant me a fiat in order that I might collect this amount due to my client, and you can take whatever course you think proper in order to secure these dies. We are prepared to place these dies in a court of adjudication awaiting the result and abiding by the issue, but pay me what you owe me." The Postmaster General says "No I will not pay you, nor will the Minister of Justice give him a fiat." I am only speaking now of what this correspondence says. He has applied for a fiat, has he not?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has been refused.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it is in abeyance?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it is not quite so bad as I thought it was.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—But he has not got his fiat?

Hon, Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This correspondence says that he applied for a fiat and it was refused, and the reason was that the Minister of Justice did not like to act in direct opposition to his colleague. The Minister of Justice says now, that the fiat was not refused but held in abeyance, which amounts to the same thing, and with the principle laid down by the government; that a man is not to have interest on his claim, a contractor can be kept out of his money for a year or two before he can get any fiat. I ask any reasonable man whether that is fair or honourable on the part of the government. No private gentleman would do that. If a man conducting a private business were to acknowledge an honest indebtedness to another man he might say "I cannot pay you at present," but he could not deprive him of his right to go to court. The government are not in that position. The government are in a position to pay this claim whenever they like, but through obduracy and stubborness, if I may use that expression, and it appears to me, if there is any truth in the correspondence which I hold in my hand, vindictiveness on the part of the Postmaster General, they punish this man because he stood in his way in a good many matters connected with the renewal and the issuance of this contract. I am not defending Mr. Burland for what he may have done in the past. I am merely taking this as an illustration of the viciousness of attempting to place upon the statute-book any clause, particularly when it affects the liberty of the subject, in order to carry out an idea that any minister of the Crown may have. If Mr. Burland has no right to hold these dies, all the Postmaster General would have to do would be to say to the Minister of Justice "Let him have a fiat and then we will test the question." Mr. Hogg further says:

While Mr. Mills is inclined, I tkink, to be fair, I do not suppose he would undertake to go directly against the wishes of one of his colleagues. On the contrary, the whole correspondence shows that the Minister of Justice acted fairly and with a good deal of consideration in the discussion of the matter with the contractor's solicitors, but unfortunately he is overruled by his colleague, or does not like to act in direct opposition to him.

I think the attempt to put this clause upon the statute-book, unless it specially exempts this case, is not right and I would be one to vote for obliterating it from the Criminal Code altogether. At the same time, I say—and I say it distinctly—that I think the provision is a good one, and all I would ask the Minister of Justice to consider is this: that he would make a special exemption in this case. This man says he has a claim under his contract, which the Postmaster General does not deny, but he threatens to pass a special Act of Parliament and then punish Mr. Burland under its provisions, for he says, "I will not be responsible for what will follow." It seems to me the moment this becomes law a warrant would issue for the arrest of this contractor, and he would either have to pay the penalty or be deprived of his liberty. I ask hon. gentlemen whether any deliberative body should place themselves in a position to assist in carrying out the determination—I will say a spiteful determination—of any minister of the government. I mistake very much the character of the members of this House, and also of the House of Commons, when the facts are known, if they would place a clause of that kind upon the statute-book without the reservation to which I have referred.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I confess I am greatly astonished at the line of argument which the leader of the opposition has adopted. In nine cases out of ten, changes in the criminal law are suggested by individual cases as they arise, but I never heard of a proposition with regard to a case where no crime has been committed in which an hon. gentleman has admitted the propriety of the law and at the same time declared that the particular case in which this law would be applicable ought to be exempted from its operation. There is one important matter which the hon. gentleman has entirely lost sight of, and that is the public interest and the propriety of the proceeding itself. It is not necessary, if Mr. Burland comes under this provision, that he should go to jail There is no proposition to send Mr. Burland to jail. But there is a dispute as to the interpretation of the contract, and there is also a condition of things existing which threatens the public interest. There would be nothing in the world to prevent Mr. Burland using these plates which he possesses to the detriment of the public treasury to an unlimited extent, and yet the hon. gentleman says that because Mr. Burland differs from the Post Office Department with regard to the interpretation of an Act, therefore, Mr. Burland ought not to give up these stamps under the law, even though the law is a proper one, until you first decide the question as to his rights. I do not admit that at all. I say no department or government ever acted on that theory. The hon. gentleman held office in the government for nearly twenty years, and in no case did he act on that theory.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No minister took the position which the present Postmaster General does.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No gentleman sets up the right of an individual against the rights of the Crown. I know, myself, a man not very well informed who had a contract for carrying the mail from a particular station to a post office miles away, and he says: "There is not included in my contract the delivery of the mail from the station to the post office, and I will go to the post office, and wait till the mail is brought there. I will not go to the station for the mail." Did the Post Office Department undertake to interpret the law in accordance with the view of that man and allow him to have his way until, by some process or litigation, it could be decided whether the Postmaster General or the contractor was right in the view of the law? The rule is that you obey the law and act in conformity with its demands and your rights shall be preserved to you, and if you are right you should have redress.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—He would not be required to give up the horse and wagon. He would only be required to give up the mail. That is a parallel case.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No one said he would be compelled to give up his horse and wagon, but the question was whether he should take the mail from the station or the post office, and the Postmaster General said it was from the station, and he did not allow the individual to override him in the interpretation of the contract for the time being. Here are plates which may be used to the detriment of the government to the extent of tens of thousands of dollars. Are they to be allowed to remain in the hands of a party who is no longer a contractor of the government, and no longer can use them without a breach of trust? It would be a crime in him to print postage stamps or bank notes. It would be a crime in him to print stamps for the purpose of being used on cigar boxes. Why should he have the plates and dies? They were useful to him as a contractor of the government, but if he should attempt to use them afterwards he would be committing an offence against the criminal law. He stands in the same position as a man who has dies for the coining of money in his possession, and he is not authorized to have them. Morally that is his position. What ground does the hon. gentleman assign for allowing the man to retain them in his possession? Why should he be put above the law if this is a proper provision?

Hon Mr. PRIMROSE—Read the sixth clause of the contract.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But the Post Office Department has interpreted that contract differently, and it is open to them to go into court and obtain a proper interpretation of that contract. But the dies should be given up in the meantime. They have no right to be in his possession. No other country in the world would permit it. Where else would such a thing be allowed? And yet the hon. gentleman opposite pretends that because this man had these dies in his possession a decision as to the interpretation of the contract must be had before he will give them up.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I said nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman said "No, he shall not give them up."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I did not put it as the hon. minister states.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then the hon. gentleman does not object to this provision. I am putting it precisely as the hon. gentleman's whole line of argument points out. I say that the retention of those dies is an improper act. It is an act contrary to the settled policy of the government in every other case. In the case of the postage stamps it was forbidden. The hon. gentleman says that Mr. Burland has not received compensation. The Postmaster General says "You were compensated under your contract." This is in dispute. The hon. gentleman has referred to a conversation that has taken place between myself and Mr. Hogg, who called upon me. Mr. Hogg himself admitted to me that the interpretation of that contract is doubtful. Then it should go to the court, but the dies should be in the possession of the government in the meantime. The dies ought to be in the possession of the government as much as any other engravings from which may be printed paper that is binding upon the state, and occasion perhaps a loss of revenue. I may say no such dies should be in the possession of private parties, unless under special arrangement with the government that paper may be printed for the use of the government. There is no contractorial relation between Mr. Burland and the government any longer. The hon. gentleman has referred to payment. There are other matters of difference between Mr. Burland and the government besides this particular item. The contract was entered into with Mr. Burland, when the hon. leader of the opposition was in office, for the printing of certain revenue stamps and other stamps from steel engraved plates. It turned out that those engravings were lithographed. They were not from steel plates. They could be done for a small percentage of the actual cost. A fraud had been committed for a series of years that may affect the public revenues to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars, for all I know. That is a matter for inquiry along with every other in dispute between the government and Mr. Burland. I say now I believe there are 70,000 of these stamps still unusued in the Inland Revenue Department, lithographed and not steel engraved, and the hon. gentleman knows what the difference in the value is. The one is not worth more than 25 per cent of the other, and all those matters, of course, will have to be dealt with between Mr. Burland and the different departments of the government, and it will be an adjustment of account; but that adjustment has nothing whatever to do with the question whether it is proper, or not proper, that these rolls, dies and plates should be in the hands of a private individual who is no longer a contractor with the government. Supposing a man had been employed by the government to run a mint, and that he had all the necessary machinery and appliances for milling money in the interests of the state, does the hon. gentleman suppose, after the contract between that individual and the state has come to an end, that he ought to be allowed to keep that machinery? And yet there would be far less danger, because the money milled and stamped would have an intrinsic value if it were made from gold and silver of a proper quality, but that would not apply to paper printed bank notes, postage stamps and stamps for the use of the Inland Revenue Department. All these are matters which affect the public revenue, and the dies cannot be of the slightest value to the individual who holds them. Now, if he were not compensated for them in the contract, no matter how that question stands, whether in his favour or against him, when he is required to deliver them up for the purpose of protecting the public revenue, the Crown has a right to the possession of them. It is required for the public interest, and I do all that is absolutely necessary in this bill, when I provide that nothing in this section contained shall prejudice or affect any claim to compensation which such person may have against Her Majesty for deprivation of such plates, rolls, or dies. If Mr. Burland is called upon by the Postmaster General and the Minister of Inland Revenue to deliver those up, and by the Finance Minister to deliver up plates for the printing of government notes, that is what he should do; he should conform to the law. It is a question wholly apart from what may be his right or interest in the question of compensation. If he has not been compensated—if that was not taken into consideration in the contract—of course he will establish that fact in the interpretation of the contract in the Exchequer Court, but what he gets, whether the government owe him or do not owe him, is a matter wholly apart and distinct from the question as to whether it is right to protect the public revenue by requiring that these engraved rolls and plates be handed in to the Finance Minister for the proper protection of the public revenue. I say that the clause is a proper one. The hon. gentleman admits it is a proper one, but he seems to think—I do not know by what process of reasoning he arrives at that conclusion—that if Mr. Burland was not paid, he has a right to hold on to those dies and plates until he is paid. I say no; they should be positively given up for the protection of the public revenue, and that if he has not been compensated he is entitled to compensation. But that question of compensation to him is a very subordinate question indeed compared to the important one of protecting the public revenue. It may be that Mr. Burland would never think of using those plates or dies and stamps. That may be all very true, and it may be true that many a man, who is in possession of a dangerous instrument, might not be disposed to use it offensively, but if you find that its possession is dangerous to the public, you do not presume to legislate in a way to except A, B, or C. The hon. gentleman said that this particular case had suggested this amendment. I do not think it did, although it is a case in point, and it is an important matter, undoubtedly an important matter, that an individual case may suggest, and one, when suggested, ought to be made general in its operation, and a case that shows that the law was necessary to be put upon the statute-book is not one to exempt from the operation of that law which you declare to be necessary. In this case Mr. Burland would stand in no worse position to-day than any individual might stand to-morrow under another contract. Supposing the American Bank Note Company, that is doing this work under contract at the present time, had their contract cancelled; supposing they failed, or for any other reason the contract came to an end; or that we did not think the work was satisfactorily done and terminated the contract, would it be for a moment pretended that there could be any reason for demanding the delivery up of the plates, stamps and dies in their case which would not equally apply to the case of Mr. Burland?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is where the hon. gentleman is mistaken. The government cannot contract away its responsibility if it were so disposed, and, so far as I know, no government has undertaken to do that. All these contracts imply that the delivering up is to take place when the contract has come to an end. All imply that. Now, if the American Bank Note Company, with whom a contract exists at the present time, were to have their contract brought to an end, and some matter in dispute—supposing this clause were enacted—arises between the Inland Revenue Department, or the Post Office Department, or the Finance Department, and these engravers and contractors, does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that you must settle everything in conformity with their interpretation of the contract, even though it be the right interpretation, before you can demand the delivering up of those things, their possession of which, when the contract has come to an end, is dangerous to the public revenue?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It depends altogether on the contract.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is a preposterous statement. It depends on the question whether this is a danger to the public revenue. In this case a difference of opinion has arisen between the Postmaster General and Mr. Burland as to the interpretation of the contract, does the hon. gentleman pretend to say Mr. Burland has a right to hold on to all those plates and dies until a court of law decides what the true interpretation of that contract is?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That puts him in court. He wants to go into the court, and you will not let him. Put him in the court and you will find who is right and who is wrong.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The right and wrong of it has nothing to do with the case. The interpretation of the contract has nothing to do with whether those things are wrongfully in his possession. In no other country in the world do I think such an argument would be seriously put forward. Take the case of the telegraph, the telephone and other companies in England that have been taken possession of by the government. Did the government undertake to settle the precise amount to which the companies were entitled before taking them over? Certainly not, and this is a matter of much greater urgency, which may affect the public revenue, while the other does not. Supposing the court were to hold to-morrow that Mr. Burland is entitled to five or ten thousand dollars for these stamps—suppose the court were to hold that the Postmaster General's interpretation of the contract is wrong—what has that to do with the case as to whether Mr. Burland is entitled to retain possession of these stamps? The possession does not depend upon whether he is paid or whether he is not paid. The possession depends upon the propriety of protecting the public revenue. If he is entitled to compensation—if his interpretation of the contract is right—he will be paid. Does the hon. gentleman think that the government of this country are bankrupt—that they are not to be trusted with an indebtedness of $4,000 or $5,000 to Mr. Burland, and that he must hold on to those things by which the public revenue is endangered in order that he may be paid. He may go into the court—he may obtain judgment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How is he to get there?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He can go there without any trouble.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No; a fiat must be issued.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And there is no trouble in getting a fiat if he delivers up those things; but, as I said before, there are other things in dispute, and in those matters the government have taken the initiative and Mr. Burland will have, under that initiative, all the right of defence which he would have under a fiat.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Was Mr. Burland not refused a fiat?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No; Mr. Burland has never been refused a fiat. His agent will not say so. But supposing he was, that is beside this question. When Mr. Burland applied for a fiat I wrote to the Postmaster General, as the universal practice of the Department of Justice always has been, for a statement of any reasons why a fiat should not issue, and the Postmaster General sent me a letter and asked that further communication should be had before the fiat was issued. Some matters were under inquiry by him, which inquiry was not completed at the time. When Mr. Hogg called on me, I told him that. I asked him why these plates should not be delivered up as the Postmaster General desired, and if the Postmaster General did not agree with him—and he claimed that Mr. Burland was already compensated for these things—that a fiat would be issued for the purpose of having a petition of right filed by him. There was no difficulty in getting a fiat, but he had no right to attach to that a condition that unless a fiat was issued at once, and until it was decided whether he was entitled to compensation or not, he would not give up possession. I will say this, and I wish to impress it on the House, and I cannot impress it to strongly, that the right of the possession of dies and stamps, by which a fraud might be committed upon the public revenue, is not dependent upon the question as to whether Mr. Burland is compensated under that contract or whether he is not. That is a matter in controversy. That controversy can go on. It does not in the least jeopardize his claim to compensation to give up these stamps. Will any hon. gentleman say how Mr. Burland's chances of obtaining right to compensation or obtaining judgment, if there is any merit in his claim, could be in the least degree jeopardized or lessened or in any way affected by the delivery of these stamps and plates.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—If Mr. Burland holds these things unlawfully, what process can the government take to get possession of them? Surely there must be some means.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Under civil proceedings.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, certainly not. The hon. gentleman knows, as a matter of civil law, that if Mr. Burland is the proprietor of these things he has a right to their possession. Let me put this case to the hon. gentleman; supposing we had no legislation on the subject of counterfeiting, does he pretend to say that if we were to find dies of a costly character in the possession of a counterfeiter, by which he could coin counterfeit money and scatter it through the country?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The cases are not parallel.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say they are. Does the hon. gentleman say that a man, under such circumstances, should before giving them up receive compensation?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is not a fair comparison.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman say he should have compensation?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Mr. Burland lawfully possesses certain articles; the other man does not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am putting a hypothetical case. Supposing he were in the possession of costly dies and there were no law against him?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—He could not break the law then.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman should not hello until he is out of the woods. I say if that were the case does any one in his senses pretend that a man in the possession of those dies should be compensated before you would put on the statute-book a measure making the possession of them illegal? Now, that is the point. Everybody will admit that the public would be endangered by the possession of these dies. Every person would admit that the legislation forbidding their possession is proper, whether the possessor receives compensation or not. Now, I say Mr. Burland had a contract with the government. The use of those dies was subordinate to the fulfilment of that contract. The contract is at an end. The possession by him of the dies and plates endangers the public revenue. It is a possession thereof that ought not to be continued. The Postmaster General says "You are compensated for these dies under the contract for the printing of those stamps. That printing is now over. You were compensated at that time." Mr. Burland says "No, I was not." That is a fair subject for a suit, but that does not in any way affect the right of the government to the instantaneous possession of these things which threaten to injuriously affect the public revenue. That is the position which I take. It is perfectly clear. Let no hon. gentleman think that he can defend a dishonest possession of things dangerous to the public revenue by pretending to say Mr. Burland has not been compensated. The Postmaster General says Mr. Burland was compensated, but, whether that be so or not, we are ready to give Mr. Burland the fullest opportunity he requires to settle that dispute in the courts, but that is wholly independent of the question whether he should retain possession of those dies until that matter is settled. It is perfectly absurd to argue to the contrary, and I say we do all that ought to be done when we say to him, and say to anybody else who may be in the same position hereafter, "Whatever you may require for the purpose of getting compensation for what is justly due to you under the law, shall be given to you. But the instantaneous possession of these articles belongs to us." It was treason at common law to coin genuine money, because it affected the royal prerogative. Are the public interests of the whole country not as important, and do they not stand in the same position as the prerogative of the Crown? There can be no doubt with regard to the matter. When the hon. gentleman opposite said that he admitted that the principle of the bill as it stands is right and proper, then I say it is right and proper absolutely. The moment you give protection to the interests of the party—if Mr. Burland can claim for these stamps and dies $40,000 or $50,000, and show that he is justly entitled to that amount, the court will award it to him, whether those dies are in his possession or whether they are in the possession of the Crown. It is wholly independent of the right of compensation, and to say that he is not to give up possession is to say that this measure is not necessary, because if he is at liberty to retain possession, it must be because the public interests are in no way affected.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the committee rises I want to ask the hon. gentleman a question, just to bring out some information which we can digest before taking up this matter again. The hon. gentleman says there is another question besides the balance of account which Mr. Burland claims as between him and the government with regard to lithographs being supplied in place of prints from steel engravings. When was this claim made against Mr. Burland by the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot tell the hon. gentleman precisely when it was made. I daresay the information can be given by the Postmaster General or the Minister of Inland Revenue. All I can tell the hon. gentleman is the matter has been under consideration for some considerable time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the dates will be very important, to show where this legislation originated and for what purpose this clause has been placed in the bill before us. Therefore, I hope the hon. gentleman will be able to tell us when we resume consideration of this measure, at what time the government made this claim against Mr. Burland for defective work supplied by him during the many years he was contractor.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot answer the hon. gentleman's question, but I tell him this, that no matter whether the claim was made early or late—made last year or this year—that while that is a reason for withholding a fiat until the facts could be ascertained, it is no reason whatever for withholding dies by which the public revenue is threatened, and it is wholly beside the question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why did you introduce that argument if it is not relevant.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was the hon. gentleman introduced that argument.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I did not say anything about that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman spoke of withholding the plates.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A difficulty arose about an account for certain stamps while I was in the government, and Mr. Burland was refused payment. Whether that is the case to which the hon. gentleman refers or not, I do not know.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it is not.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—May I ask the hon. minister whether this amendment will be printed, or placed in such form that members can have an opportunity of looking it over? I think myself a great deal depends on the wording of this amendment. It struck me that it did not go quite far enough, but I could not say by just hearing it read.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would suggest that the amendment be printed in the minutes of to-day's proceedings.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW, from the committee, reported that they had made progress with the bill, and asked leave to sit again.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has the Minister of Justice consulted his colleagues about the correspondence I asked for?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I handed my colleagues a written memo. on the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman, I hope, will not feel offended if I repeat this question on Monday.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, nor on Tuesday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I shall ask the hon. gentleman for the correspondence every day until I get it.

The Senate adjourned.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the House goes into committee on the Criminal Code Amendment Bill, I would ask the indulgence of the House, as I was not present when the orders of the day were called, to make a correction in the report which appeared in some of the newspapers as to what I said in reference to the granting of the fiat by the Attorney General of the province of Ontario. I find in a number of papers that I am reported to have used this language:

> Sir Mackenzie Bowell called the attention of the Minister of Justice to newspaper reports that the Attorney General of Ontario had granted a fiat to American lumbermen holding timber limits in Ontario, with a view of testing the constitutionality of the law imposing an export duty, on logs cut on those limits.

I scarcely think any hon. gentleman who heard what I said, will attribute such a gross piece of ignorance to myself as would be shown by such a statement. I find in the Toronto Globe—which is the only paper that contains anything like a correct report of what I did say—the following:—

> Great interest has been aroused in parliamentary circles by the statement published in the Globe of yesterday to the effect that the Hon. A. S. Hardy has granted a fiat to American lumbermen, permitting them to test the constitutionality of the Ontario Government's legislation, inserting a provincial manufacture clause in all leases of Crown timber limits in Ontario. Sir Mackenzie Bowell this afternoon asked

Hon. David Mills whether the government were possessed of any information on the point. Sir Mackenzie pointed out that the Federal Government had not disallowed the provincial legislation, and desired to know whether the Dominion administration were party to the suit.

That is the gist of what I really said; I think I may take credit to myself for knowing that the Ontario Government has no power to impose an export duty. What I inferentially said was, that the United States lumbermen have two grievences, as I understood it from reading the public press. First, that they purchased limits from the Ontario Government without any regulation as to the disposition of the product of their limits, but since then they have altered the regulations preventing them from sending out of the country the product of their limits, unless it has been manufactured in the country: Second, they take the ground that as the adoption of a regulation of that kind is a direct infringement of the constitutional Act relegating to the Dominion Government all matters affecting trade and commerce, therefore it would be unconstitutional. That was the principal reason why I asked the Minister of Justice whether the Dominion Government were a party to the suit. I desire to set myself right in the matter, although the report is so ridiculously absurd that I scarcely think any one would believe I would make such a blunder. I find, also, in the reports of the discussion on the Criminal Code, when the Minister of Justice called attention to the fact that there was a dispute between the contractor and the government as to work which had been done in the past, I asked the question whether that was the same dispute that arose under the government of which I was a member. The hon. Minister of Justice stated that while the date of the claim might be a reason for withholding the fiat, it was no justification for Mr. Burland refusing to give up the dies, rolls and plates. Then I am made to say that the difficulty arose when I was Premier, and that Mr. Burland was refused payment. I never made any such statement as that. What I did say is correctly reported by our official reporters. Their report reads:

> A difficulty arose about an account for certain stamps while I was in the government and Mr. Burland was refused payment. Whether that was the case to which the hon. gentleman refers I do not know.

Then the hon. minister says "No, it is not." I may add to what I have already said, that at that time Mr. Burland was granted a fiat and he went into the Exchequer Court and obtained a verdict of $3,000 against the government, which was not, however, as large an amount as he claimed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I beg to remark, in regard to what the hon. gentleman has said, that where newspaper reports are very much abridged, mistakes are always likely to occur, and especially where the subject is one with which perhaps the reporter is himself not very familiar, and where necessarily there is greater difficulty in making condensation. The hon. gentleman has spoken about the regulations of the province of Ontario being practically an export duty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is what they contend.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, what the other party contend. I daresay that is their position. As I understand, the position taken by the Ontario Government is that they are proprietors, and have the same rights as any other proprietors. They have a right to attach to the continuance of an arrangement for cutting logs that they shall be manufactured upon the property or they shall not be cut, and these are the respective positions of the two parties. I have no doubt, upon the fiat that has been issued by the Attorney General, if one has been issued, the matter will be argued and determined by the courts.

CRIMINAL CODE, 1892, AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed, in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (Q) "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892."

On clause 442.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When the committee rose my hon. friend the Minister of Justice had offered some explanation in defence of this clause and submitted an amendment to it. To my mind the clause is, in itself, a very extraordinary one. The amendment is rather an extraordinary amendment and the speech which my hon. friend made in support of both was still more extraordinary. Throughout the whole of my hon. friend's remarks on this clause there seemed to be an idea in his mind that the public interest was in great danger because Mr. Burland, or the British American Bank Note Company, had retained possession of certain rolls, dies and plates from which printing had been done for the government during the time their contract remained in force. My hon. friend wished to justify this clause, which he has asked this honourable House to place in the Criminal Code to meet this particular case —he did not deny that it was to meet this particular case,—on the ground that great danger existed in allowing Mr. Burland to retain these dies, rolls and plates. One would think, if my hon. friend had so great an appreciation of this danger, that he would have realized it long ago, and it does seem remarkable that, though the contract expired nearly two years ago with ample power in his hand to get possession of these dies and plates, he has not yet taken any steps to get possession of them. The Exchequer Court Act was passed and the appointment of a judge of that court was made for the very purpose of meeting such cases as this, where a dispute arises between any contractor and the government of Canada. Why did not my hon. friend, feeling this great regard for the public interest, and realizing the very great danger which existed from the dies and plates remaining in Mr. Burland's hands why did he not take some action long ago to recover them? Instead of that, he comes, after a lapse of nearly two years, asking us to amend the Criminal Code so as to enable him to send Mr. Burland to the penitentiary, or have some such sentence passed upon him. We find there have been a good many serious contentions between Mr. Burland and members of the present administration. They evidently began over the awarding of the existing contract. We will not go into that now, but we know a sharp quarrel started between Mr. Burland and the present government of Canada in the matter of awarding that contract. Then we know that a quarrel started between Mr. Burland and Mr. Mulock with regard to the printing of the Jubilee stamps, and Mr. Burland committed, in the eyes of the Postmaster General, the unpardonable crime of going to the newspapers and presenting his case on that matter to the public of Canada; and it was seen from the history, as we are able to gather it, of this affair from that time up to the present, that the Postmaster General has been nursing his wrath to keep it warm against Mr. Burland. There is also a difference, it appears, between the Postmaster General's department and Mr. Burland with regard to an item of account of $9,800 for work which Mr. Burland performed for the Post Office Department, the correctness of which has not been disputed. The correspondence fully shows that the amount was certified by the officials of the department, and found to be the correct amount due. Mr. Burland presented his account for that work, (and I have a copy of it in my hand), a very considerable time ago to the department. It was presented on the 1st of June, 1898, more than a year ago. I am advised, on what I know to be the very best authority, that up to the time of the presentation of that account, Mr. Burland never heard one word from the government with regard to the non-delivery of those dies and plates. From the time of the expiration of his contract, nearly a year before that, up to the 1st June, 1898, when his account was presented, this question with regard to the rolls, plates and dies never came up between Mr. Burland and the government at all. It was in connection with the non-payment of that account that this bone of contention arose between them. A short time afterwards Mr. Burland, finding they were not disposed to pay him for his account, presented a petition for a fiat in order to obtain payment of the amount of his account. He presented his petition, a copy of which I have in my possession, more than a year ago, and to the present time he has understood, and the public have understood, that that fiat was refused. The Minister of Justice has told the committee that a fiat has not been refused, that it has only been held in abeyance, and he sought to create an impression in this House that there was no disposition on the part of the government to refuse a fiat. I ask why has this fiat not been given? Why is it that a full year has been allowed to intervene and no fiat granted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because it has never been contested.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Because the government have raised a contention, which they had not raised before, with Mr. Burland with reference to the possession of these dies, plates and rolls. The dispute with regard to these is that Mr. Burland claims that, in compliance with the terms of his contract with the government, these dies, rolls and plates were his property, and that he was not called upon to give them up until the government should pay for them, and as a layman, reading that contract, it appears to sustain Mr. Burland's contention. I am aware that the Postmaster General puts a different construction upon it. He contends that these dies, rolls and plates were paid for in the work which was executed from them, and with the payment of the work from time to time the government had paid for the dies, rolls and plates themselves. Mr. Burland takes a different view. Hon. gentlemen will see here is a matter for a bona fide contention between the parties. Throughout the whole of this contention, Mr. Burland, through his attorney, Mr. Hogg, has asked again and again to allow the dispute as to compensation for the dies, rolls and plates to be placed before the Exchequer Court, and has expressed his willingness to abide by the decision of that court. If he is right, he looks for a very considerable compensation for the delivery of these rolls, dies and plates. If he is wrong, he will be mulct in costs. That is the whole case. The Minister of Justice knows that, in going to law with Mr. Burland, he is not going to law with an irresponsible man. Mr. Burland, through his solicitor, has not been unwilling that the government should retain that money, legitimately due him, pending the decision of that suit, and if the suit goes against him, the government can indemnify themselves for the costs out of that $9,800. He thinks a less sum would be sufficient, but it cannot be disputed that that amount is sufficient, and it cannot be disputed either that, in dealing with a man of Mr. Burland's well known standing and means in this community, there is no risk as to the costs, even though they had not that $9,800. Why not agree to Mr. Burland's contention. Why not agree to allow that matter of the dies and plates to go to the Exchequer Court? The government had power in their own hands to go there at any moment. Mr. Burland could not get there without their consent. My hon. friend rather led the House to understand that the government were willing and desirous of issuing a fiat, a desire which certainly was very new to them if we judge by the correspondence and their past action. It was a sudden impulse which seemed to seize my hon. friend between four and five o'clock on Friday afternoon, when he rose to defend this extraordinary clause now before the committee. The application for the fiat could only refer to the $9,800. No application has been made for a fiat with regard to the value of the dies, plates and rolls. The government, however, were asked by Mr. Burland and his lawyer to put that before the Exchequer Court, and they would be bound by the results, but that has never been done. The government had power, at any moment, under the law which they had passed themselves, and before a judge appointed by the government of Canada, to place that question as to these rolls, plates and dies before the Exchequer Court and have it settled long ago; and I submit that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has been guilty of a very grave dereliction of duty. If what he has told us in this House is correct, that a grave injury and danger to the public exists in the fact that these dies, rolls and plates remain in the hands of Mr. Burland, I say he has been guilty of a grave dereliction of duty, inasmuch as he has not long before this taken the proceedings at his hand to get possession of them. It is, however, too late in the day for my hon. friend to come before this House and the people of Canada and tell us that he is animated by an extreme sense of danger to the public interest, when he has slept with regard to that interest for nearly two years, and only now perceives it when he is endeavouring to get a clause placed in the Criminal Code which will compel Mr. Burland to defend himself against a criminal action in the place of a purely civil proceeding, as it would be in having this matter settled, as it ought to be settled, in the Exchequer Court as a civil suit. So much with regard to these bones of contention between Mr. Burland and the government of Canada. All this has been going on until within about one month ago. The counsel for Mr. Burland has had many interviews it appears from the correspondence which has been placed in my hands, with the Postmaster General, and some with the Minister of Justice, with regard to this question.

The Postmaster General, so long ago as the 28th of November, 1898, eight or nine months ago, was candid enough to tell Mr. Hogg that he would take good care that there should be a clause placed in the Criminal Code which would compel Mr. Burland to come to terms. This threat was held out to Mr. Hogg. I have it over the signature of Mr. Hogg. I ask once more, why should such an extreme course be resorted to—why should such a threat be made when the Postmaster General had it within his own power and the power of the government to submit a case long before that to the Exchequer Court, and have the matter settled as a civil proceeding? No other explanation can possibly be given of it than that the Postmaster General was animated by a deep feeling of antipathy to Mr. Burland, and that it was his desire to trample upon Mr. Burland in this matter more than that the ends of justice should be served. I am told by excellent authority, the language which was used by the Postmaster General was much more forcible than elegant, and showed a most intense desire on the part of the Postmaster General that he should punish Mr. Burland in some way or another, a feeling which was well understood to have grown out of Mr. Burland's publication of a letter showing a great deal of mismanagement and inefficiency on the part of the Postmaster General in reference to the getting out of the Jubilee stamps in 1897. The history of the transaction does not redound much to the credit of the Postmaster General. From that time we can trace vindictiveness on his part towards Mr. Burland, and we can see constantly that he was not animated by an extreme desire in the public interest to get these dies, rolls and plates out of the possession of the contractor who held them. Otherwise a different course would have been pursued. A month ago, notwithstanding the threat and the intention to amend the Criminal Code to meet Mr. Burland's case and punish him, the matter assumed a new phase by the institution of a suit against Mr. Burland for alleged inefficiency, as a contractor, in the performance of his duty during the last 29 years. On the 20th May last Mr. Burland was served with an information, emanating from the Minister of Justice, laying the foundation for a suit for $300,000 for alleged inefficiency in the work done by him as contractor for the government during that long period. No person can follow the history of these transactions and this dispute between Mr. Burland and the Postmaster General without seeing that there has been a great deal of bad blood between them. I am not going to say that Mr. Burland did everything that was right. I am not going to say that he did not return cuff for cuff, and that he was not sometimes stubborn. It would not be in human nature for a man to be otherwise under the circumstances. It is not at all unlikely that he was stubborn, and perhaps justly stubborn. I am not going to pass an opinion on that subject; but I say that it is a most extraordinary thing, after this dispute has been going on in this shape and form, the government of the day having a remedy to get possession of these dies and plates—the government acknowledged all this, that they owed Mr. Burland $9,800, which they did not pay him—that the government all this time declined or withheld a fiat which he had asked for to secure justice in the courts of the country for this $9,800. Instead of allowing the question as to the possession of these plates to go, as it ought to go, to the Exchequer Court for settlement, the government have taken it up as a quarrel and made it a cause for an amendment to the criminal law of the country. My hon. friend, in his speech on Friday evening, accused Mr. Burland of fraud in his transaction with the government with regard to supplying litographs for engravings.

Hon Mr. MILLS—I made no accusation.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I hope my hon. friend feels a little better to-day. He certainly used the word fraud.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I said there was a charge of fraud.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Well, we will put it that way. My hon. friend says he is charged with fraud; and my hon. friend as Minister of Justice, has officially charged him with fraud, and in this House he has repeated the substance of the official charge which he has made in the Exchequer Court against Mr. Burland, with regard to the difference in the execution of work done by Mr. Burland at various times during these twenty-nine years. And what does this amount to? I do not think that it properly comes within the scope of this committee to try any of these cases, but this clause in the Criminal Code bill having been put there, as we all see and know, and which is not denied, for the purpose of meeting this special case, and my hon. friend having introduced into this debate this question against Mr. Burland with regard to the matter of the performance of his duty as a contractor during the whole of that period, and having charged him with fraud in the information laid against him in the Exchequer Court, we cannot refrain from looking curiously into it. It appears that the charge is that some work called for under the contract to be done by steel engraving was lithographed. That is the extent of the charge, and this extraordinary claim of $300,000 is arrived at by calculating the difference that would arise between the one way of doing the work and the way the work was actually done. I have no doubt this sum of $300,000 has been put forward for a purpose, as also has this clause been put in the Criminal Code for a purpose. That purpose was to appall this House and country with the magnitude of the wrong which Mr. Burland has done the government of Canada in supplying lithographs instead of steel engravings in the performance of work for the different departments of the government. Certainly the amount is to most of us rather appalling. It is a very large sum. I am told, however, that the amount which would really arise from a close calculation would be only a bagatelle compared with the amount claimed. I am further informed that whatever difference may have occurred between the work supplied, was done from time to time with the consent and knowledge of the government or its officers, and that there were abatements and reductions in the accounts furnished by Mr. Burland from time to time that covered the difference, and that Mr. Burland in every account where any difference owing to the press of time or the government itself requiring the work to be done faster than it could be done where the steel engravings were in use and where lithograph engravings were accepted and answered the purpose as well—that wherever such a difference occurred it was done with the knowledge and consent of the government or its officers, and Mr. Burland presented accounts which made ample and complete allowance for the difference. This is what I am informed. My hon. friend, in the information which he laid before the courts, creates a very different impression. His is the extreme statement for the government. Perhaps I have been stating the extreme contention on the other side of the question. At all events I have given information which I am told on good authority is correct.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What is my hon. friend's authority?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My authority is Mr. Hogg, Mr. Burland's counsel. The case is one which, when hon. gentleman look into it, is really amusing, that the government of Canada representing the people of this country—having all the powers of government behind them, should be so unjust and so small as to trump up this account and deal with Mr. Burland as they have been dealing with him. Supposing that their assertion is true, and that lithographs were used. These accounts have been running over 29 years and have involved a great many million dollars. Mr. Burland is one of the oldest and largest contractors the government have had since confederation. He has performed work running up into the millions of dollars for the government of Canada, and the government are now going back over all this work, which has been performed by Mr. Burland, who has the reputation of being an excellent contractor and doing the work well. He does work for the banks and does it well, and has a reputation all over the country as an efficient contractor, but now the government propose to go back over 29 years to find whether in any way there have been discrepancies in the account, and they have come to the House with the exaggerated statements of this alleged wrong, which they say Mr. Burland has done, and endeavour to induce the committee to consent to a clause in the bill which will put Mr. Burland in the position of a criminal. Let us take an illustration. Supposing any hon. gentleman engages a tailor to manufacture a suit of clothes for him. For the last 25 or 30 years one of us has had a contract with a tailor, and one of the provisions is that the suits must be sewn with silk thread. We are in a hurry, and there may be difficulty in getting silk thread at once, and we consent to the use of ordinary thread. We accept the suit with a deduction on account of the cheaper material. We wear it out, and it goes to the rag man, and years and years after that these suits have gone to the rag man and formed part of the paper we are writing with, we come back and charge this tailor, and say to him, "Oh, you have been tricking me all this time. It is true I knew something of it as it was going along, but I am going to hold you to your contract. You contracted to use silk thread, and you have used common thread, and now I am going to make you pay for the difference." The one case is as reasonable as the other. My hon. friend did a wrong in introducing this provision in the clause before us. The dispute between Mr. Burland and the government is a simple one. Mr. Burland has the dies and rolls and plates in his possession. They were prepared and provided for by him to do government work. He contends that the government, by the terms of their agreement, agreed to pay him for these before he would hand them over. The government assume a very different position. But why does my hon. friend not send that matter at once to the court for adjudication? I cannot see why he has not done so. I think that this matter should have been settled, long ago between the government and Mr. Burland, and I think my hon. friend, by the course he has pursued, has not raised the government in the estimation of independent members of this House or the public generally. I think hon. gentlemen will come to the conclusion that my hon. friend has placed himself and his government in a perfectly indefensible position at this moment. If it is dangerous now that Mr Burland should hold these dies and plates, it has been equally dangerous for the last year and a half. My hon. friend has had an opportunity of securing possession of them through the Exchequer Court, and he has failed to do his duty. When my hon. friend came to the House, he had made up his mind that the clause, as it stands, would be a pretty hard one to get hon. gentlemen in this House to accept, and he comes to the House and suggests an amendment before discussion starts at all. The amendment is a most remarkable one.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Very.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If we read this amendment in connection with the course which my hon. friend and the Postmaster General have pursued, I think we will all subscribe to the view that it is a remarkable amendment. It will not take away any legal rights which Mr. Burland has. Will the hon. gentleman tell me what legal right Mr. Burland has had during the last year, when he was seeking for a settlement? If the hon. gentleman will kindly tell that I will be obliged to him. Where lay that claim for the last year? My hon. friend is silent. Mr. Burland could not establish a claim because my hon. friend would not allow him to go before a court, and therefore he thinks this House should be perfectly satisfied to leave the matter where it was, leave the Postmaster General with his foot on Mr. Burland's throat, saying to him: "You have a legal claim when I allow you to exercise it, but I will take great care"—I was going to quote a strong expletive, but I will not—"that you shall not get an opportunity to exercise it." My hon. friend says that Mr. Burland will have his legal claim just as before, notwithstanding that he puts this clause in the Code. He says he has his legal claim for compensation, which he could not use in the past and cannot use in the future, so long as the sweet will of the Postmaster General, supported by the hon. Minister of Justice, thinks it is right to keep their feet on Mr. Burland's throat and not allow him to go into court and settle it. That would be the position he would be in with this nice little innocent amendment. I think that there is a far more reasonable way of settling this question than by putting this clause in the Criminal Code and allow Mr. Burland to retain the remedy that he has had in the past, which we all know is no remedy at all. There is a much easier and fairer way of settling it than that. It is very well for my hon. friend to say and repeat about the public interests being endangered by having those dies and plates held by Burland or any one else. He compared this to a counterfeiter having some of these things in his possession.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was surprised to hear the comparison. Here was a highly respectable contractor, who had a contract under the government and who had a bona fide contention that these plates were his till he was paid for them, and on that contention he holds these rolls and plates. No one knows better than my hon. friend, with these things in the hands of Mr. Burland, the country was perfectly safe. The government of Canada has trusted this man for 29 years and he has taken the responsibility for his servants and premises, and not another man in Canada carried on his shoulders a greater responsibility than Mr. Burland did with regard to the uttering of these postage and Inland Revenue stamps and bank notes. He has been doing similar work for the banking institutions of Canada from one end to the other and not a breath of suspicion has ever been raised against him that he has done anything wrong or that the interests of any government or person have suffered in his hands, and yet my hon. friend says there is great danger to the public interests, and on account of that danger he asks this House to put this clause in the Criminal Code. Now, I propose to submit an amendment. It is not the extreme contention probably that Mr. Burland would hold, but I think the hon. gentlemen will agree that it is a reasonable contention. I move the following amendment, to be substituted for the one proposed by the hon. Minister of Justice :

Provided, however, that in the case of any person who is or has been a contractor with the said government for the engraving and printing of such Dominion notes and stamps, and who has in his possession any such plate, roll or die, for which he claims to be paid by the government under his contract, the demand of the Minister of Finance shall only be made after the payment of the contractor's claim, or in case the claim is disputed, after reference to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Under this amendment my hon. friend will have an immediate remedy, and as soon as he enters this case in the Exchequer Court, Mr. Burland has to deliver up the dies and plates or to submit to all the perils of the criminal enactment. There is a perfect statement of the matter. I think there is a great deal of force in the argument that the government should be in possession of the dies and plates.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is that so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has been arguing against it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, I said nothing of the kind. I was dealing with the extreme position taken by my hon. friend. He said it was so important that the government should have them that there was great danger to the public, and believing as he did that there was such great danger, why he should, as Minister of Justice in Canada, sleep on his rights for a long time and never take one step to get possession of the dies and plates? I admit that it is desirable that the government should have them, but I do not think there is any danger about it. If there is danger, so much the worse for the Minister of Justice, as he did not take steps to recover them. I think the amendment will meet the views of fair-minded men in the House. There is no reason why there should be party feeling. It appears that the Minister of Justice has allowed himself to be led by one of his colleagues to come to this House with a clause which is levelled directly at Mr. Burland.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And, what is yours levelled at?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Justice.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I suppose it would be crime on my part, or on the part of the House, to step in and stop the hon. gentleman from committing a great wrong, and because he is doing a great wrong in introducing the substance of a quarrel, which his government or colleague has had with Mr. Burland, therefore, we are equally and doubly in the wrong because we prevent him from doing it. I do not think my hon. friend will press that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does my hon. friend wish that amendment to be substituted for the one proposed by the Minister of Justice?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have listened to the very extraordinary speech made by the hon. gentleman who seemed to think that this is the Exchequer Court, and that he is here for the purpose of defending Mr. Burland's conduct. The hon. gentleman has not taken the trouble to understand the character of the dispute between the government and Mr. Burland. Mr. Burland has a claim of $9,000 or $10,000, I forget the precise amount, about which there is no dispute. As I understand, the Postmaster General admitted that Mr. Burland was entitled to that sum.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Why has he not been paid?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I thought the hon. gentleman had just completed his speech? The claim was admitted by the Postmaster General, but the Postmaster General said to Mr. Burland, "You have rolls, plates, dies and stamps in your possession for the purpose of engraving Dominion notes, postage stamps and other stamps relating to the public revenue in your possession, and I desire that you should hand these over in order to protect the public revenue." Mr. Burland said, "I have not been paid for those stamps, and I decline to hand them over until I am paid." Now Mr. Burland's demand for a fiat from me, as Attorney General, related not to any disputable contract at all. It did not relate to the dies and postage stamps. It related solely to this sum of money about which there was no dispute, and if there had been a fiat issued and judgment given by the Court of Exchequer, Mr. Burland would have been just in exactly the same position that he occupied at the start, that he had a claim of nine or ten thousand dollars against the Crown which the Crown did not contest, so that that matter may be left aside altogether. It is not a question whether Mr. Burland ought to have been paid that sum or not. The Postmaster General said, "You have dies for printing postage stamps in your possession, by which you might affect the revenue to the extent to which postage stamps are required, and I ask, before I pay over this sum of money, that these should be given up." Then, supposing Mr. Burland had complied with the request of the Postmaster General, what would have been his position? He says: "I am not paid for those stamps." The Postmaster General is of opinion that in the construction or interpretation of that contract he was paid. It was included in the price he was given for the printing of the stamps, the engraving was a part of the expense which he incurred and which he was compensated for in his contract with the government for the printing of those stamps. That is the position taken by the Postmaster General. If Mr. Burland had handed over the dies, the Postmaster General would have handed to him the sum of money that was claimed; then there would have been, if he desired it, issued to him a fiat, for which he has never asked up to this hour, for the purpose of ascertaining whether, under the terms of that contract relating to the engraving of those dies, stamps and plates, he was or was not already compensated. That can be tried. There is no dispute about that. He may have that fiat at any time, or could have had it at any time before the suit was brought against him, and for all I know it may be a part of his defence in the suit. I have not looked at the papers and I cannot say. If it is not, his case is already before the court, and if it is not, it is open to him to obtain what he has not asked for up to this hour, a fiat to ascertain the true construction of the contract as to the dies or stamps.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the case before the court.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—With regard to the printing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not the dies.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. I do not know what the defence may be. I do not know what his cross account may be. The papers are not before me. I desire, before going further, to make an observation in reference to what the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) has said in reference to the supply for a number of years furnished by Mr. Burland—the supply of lithographs instead of steel engraved stamps for the Inland Revenue and for the Postal Department. The hon. gentleman says the government knew it. If it did, it was the government of which he was a member. Does the hon. gentleman say to this House that this matter was brought before his government, that Mr. Burland said: "I contracted with you for steel engraved stamps, I furnished you with lithographs, and I am prepared to make a reduction in proportion and on the terms of that understanding," and that a settlement of that kind was had. That is what the hon. gentleman said. Will he rise in this House and repeat that? Is he prepared now to affirm just what he said?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am told the accounts in each case showed the difference, and that a reduction was made in the account each time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman was a minister of the Crown, and when he comes here to speak he is not entitled to come here and speak on behalf of the party whom the Crown has prosecuted for fraud.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I thought you did not accuse him of fraud?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He is prosecuted for that, and that is so. When the deputy minister was examined in that department he did not admit that he knew anything about the matter. On the contrary, he says that it was never brought to his attention that the stamps were lithographed and not steel engraved.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was repeating to this House what Mr. Burland's contention was, in reply to the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the hon. gentleman accepted that statement.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend is not correct when he says that. I said "I am giving Mr. Burland's contention, and it may be an extreme one."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman was anxious to give Mr. Burland's contention, but I say this, and I wish the point to be impressed upon the attention of the House—that even although Mr. Burland were entirely right with regard to that, and even though the government might fail in any prosecution of Mr. Burland for having furnished the departments for a series of years with lithographs instead of steel engraved stamps, if Mr. Burland were wholly right with regard to that, it would not affect the question that we have to consider here.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then why did you bring it up?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not bring it up.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—You did.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman who leads him, in a speech, which was temperate and fair, I admit, but mistaken in the conclusion which he drew, discussed the question of the application of Mr. Burland for a fiat. The matter was stated by me in this way: I pointed out how it was that it was possible that what could have been done a few months ago, might not be done now, because all these questions might be involved in a suit that was pending. That was the reason I mentioned it, and I mentioned it in reply to a question as to what the government were prepared to do. Now, I say this, that the Postmaster General admitted that he owed Mr. Burland the sum of $9,800. The Postmaster General is prepared to pay that sum. There was no reason in the world why I should issue a fiat when the matter was undisputed, because if the Exchequer Court found for Mr. Burland, Mr. Burland would stand in exactly the same position, in his relation to the Crown, that he was standing in before there was a fiat at all. The Postmaster General was not refusing payment because the sum was not due to Mr. Burland, but he was refusing it because Mr. Burland had in his possession stamps which could be of no use to anybody except to the government, and which it was dangerous to the public revenue should remain in the hands of a private party. The hon. gentleman has taken the extraordinary position of undertaking to subordinate the Crown and the rights of the Crown to Mr. Burland. The hon. gentleman does not say that that is an improper clause in this bill. He does not make a motion to strike it out. Not at all. He does not say that the course which he proposes shall be taken toward Mr. Burland shall be taken hereafter as soon as that clause is upon the statute-book, and that every other man shall be protected against the Crown until the Crown is compelled to make payment to him whether he has now any such interest or whether he has not. I say that all this House has to consider is not Mr. Burland's case, or anybody else's case, but whether it is right, where a party has a contract with the government for printing Dominion notes, for printing stamps for the use of the Inland Revenue Department and postage stamps, that after his contract has expired he should continue to hold those stamps which would put it in his power to issue stamps, Dominion notes and postage stamps to an enormous extent. There is no one here who will venture to say that these dies should continue in the hands of a private party after his contract has expired. The only question as between the Postmaster General and Mr. Burland is with regard to the stamps under this clause, is whether he has already been paid or not. The Postmaster General says: "You were paid under the terms of your contract."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is only a supposition. It is imaginary, not a reality.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says it is imaginary. I fancy that if a man were making a contract with the government, he would consider what it would cost to engrave the plates from which that printing was to be done, and the more the cost was, the higher would be his charges. If he were printing from steel engravings, the price would be a good deal higher than if he were printing from stone. The difference in price is, I am told, about seventy-five per cent—what is worth 25 cents printed on stone, will cost $1 when printed from steel engraved plates, and that being so, hon. gentlemen will understand, in the other case, if lithographs were furnished instead of steel engravings, the extent of the fraud which was committed on the government, unless there was an understanding with the government, which would be a fraud on every other contractor who had tendered in the case. Let me say this with regard to the matter: If Mr. Burland has not been paid, assuming that the Postmaster General is mistaken in the view that he takes, that the value of the engraving is a part of the cost which was estimated for when tenders were made—supposing he is mistaken in that, we do not take away the right of Mr. Burland under this bill, without that amendment which I put there, at all. The amendment was simply to satisfy the consciences of hon. members, if they had any doubt, that there was no intention to take away any right. Without that amendment, this would take away no right. Mr. Burland would be compelled to deliver up those dies, plates and stamps, and after they are in the possession of the Finance Minister, he is as free to sue for their value and receive payment, if he was not paid, as he would be if he retained them in his possession until after that question was disposed of. Now, the whole point is this: is it consistent with the dignity of the Crown that these stamps and plates should remain in the hands of a private party, and that the Crown should take the risk of having frauds committed on it for a long period of time until that question can be disposed of? I say that such a proposition was never made to a deliberative body before—such a proposition is inconsistent with the rights and dignity of the Crown, and one of the last things that this House, or any other House within Her Majesty's dominions, should do, is to set up Mr. Burland before Her Majesty and insist that his wishes shall be met and not those of the Crown. Is the Crown a bankrupt concern that it cannot be trusted? Have we reached that humiliating point of degradation that if Mr. Burland were to hand over these dies and plates he would have no remedy against us, and that a fraud would be committed on him and that he would be deprived of any right he might have? I say the statement is a preposterous one. The fact is this, that the clause, without the amendment which I propose, is all right. It touches no right which Mr. Burland now has under the law, and I offer it merely for the purpose of making it perfectly obvious that there was no intention to take away any right from Mr. Burland. The hon. gentleman opposite talks about Mr. Burland being treated as a criminal. If that clause becomes law, every hon. gentleman knows that any man who disputes it and has in his possession dies, plates or stamps, which he refuses to give up would be a criminal in point of law. He would stand exactly in the same position as any other offender against the law would stand. What harm—what wrong—what injury is done to Mr. Burland in asking him to hand over to the Minister of Finance of this Dominion notes, plates and postage stamps and the other dies and stamps which he has in his possession? Nobody is going to cheat him. Nobody is going to deprive him of a farthing. If he has not been paid, he will be given a fiat to go into the Exchequer Court to determine whether he was or was not paid under the contract. All he has to do is to hand over the dies, plates and stamps, and if he was not compensated in the price he received under his contract, he will have an opportunity of being compensated by the decision which the Exchequer Court will award. The whole statement is perfectly clear. There is no necessary connection between the demand for a fiat to be paid the $9,800 and the demand made by Mr. Burland for the delivery up of these stamps. If the clause is wrong in principle, then reject it; if it is right in principle, do not let this House tack on to it the proposed amendment for the purpose of singling out an individual and saying that we will place him above the ordinary rule of law applicable to other parties. That is what the hon. gentleman proposes by his amendment and that is an amendment that never can be accepted.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—It is perfectly patent to the members of this House, and has become a matter of history, that Mr. Burland has been persistently refused a fiat in order that this matter might be put to the arbitrament of the courts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not at all. The fiat for which Mr. Burland asked the department I say was a fiat for the payment of $9,800 which the Postmaster General withheld under the circumstances I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The information in my hands leads to a different conclusion. I ask this: Supposing Mr. Burland were to give up the possession of these dies and stamps under a promise from the Postmaster General that a fiat would be given to him in order that the matter might be tried out in court, what really would be the value of his security in the light of the way in which the promises of the present government and individual members of it have been kept?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do not know anything about Mr. Burland himself, or his contract, or business. It is enough for me to know that this legislation is retroactive, and after the experience the hon. gentleman has had in this House this session, I am surprised that he should bring in such a clause. It is class legislation, intended to touch a certain individual, as the hon. gentleman has admitted in his argument. Mr. Burland has in black and white his contract which stipulates that he is to give up these dies and plates when he is paid for them. The Postmaster General says he has been paid for them in the contract. That is imaginary and would be settled in a court of law. To pay the price of the contract would not be sufficient to pay him for the tools of his trade. Legislation of that kind is enough for me to vote against it, and I should prefer to reject the whole amendment to the Criminal Code rather than accept the amendment of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. I would like the hon. gentleman to change sides for half an hour in treating this question. If he did so I feel sure he would denounce such legislation as this, as tyrannical, and subversive of right, and sound principles. This is a case of hanging a man first, and trying him afterward. Can the minister point to similar legislation enacted by the Parliament of the Dominion during the thirty years of its existence? I think not. The Department of Justice has been looked to over the whole Dominion with confidence, by the guilty, as well as by the innocent, with a feeling that a calm review would be taken and an impartial opinion given on all questions brought before it. And it would be most unfortunate if Parliament, by any act, should destroy that confidence. The hon. minister seems to forget the high and honourable title of his office in allowing his department to become an instrument of oppression. The minister is not justified in yielding to the caprice, or vindictive feeling of any of his colleagues to coerce and intimidate any one. And in the Burland case the Postmaster General made threats of intimidation. It could never have been the intention of Parliament to make the Department of Justice a machine for taking snap shots at defenceless contractors under cover of a parliamentary enactment. One of the functions of the Minister of Justice is to advise his colleagues, and he should have the courage to advise against class legislation of a retroactive nature and to restrain impulsive ministers. This House should mark its disapproval of such legislation as this in the strongest terms, and to mark my opinion if I moved an amendment it would be as follows:—

Any one who, in a ministerial capacity or otherwise, introduces or causes to be introduced in the Parliament of the Dominion special or class legislation intended (1.) To have a retroactive effect whereby private rights are invaded. (2.) To coerce or intimidate. (3.) To place any person at a disadvantage in the law courts of the country by class legislation. (4.) To direct judicial decisions in certain special cases. (5.) To curtail in any way the inalienable private rights of free subjects. (6.) To lessen confidence in, or detract from, the highly prized integrity of the courts of justice of the Dominion, shall be liable to——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Will the hon. gentleman state a single right or interest of Mr. Burland that is affected by this bill? Of course if this becomes law, he would be required to give up these plates and dies, but his right of compensation is not in the least degree affected by it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I cannot see the use of any agreement at all if the terms of that agreement are not carried out, and the minister will not say that the contract does not specify clearly that the contractor is to be paid for these articles.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is to be decided by the court.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Postmaster General asserts that they have been paid for. That may or may not be accepted by a court of justice. It would be a most unfortunate day for this country if Parliament should give power at any time with regard to any special or class case, and I hope Parliament will never agree to anything of the kind. It was never intended that the Department of Justice should be an instrument of tyranny. It is supposed to take a fair, calm view of all questions brought before it. One of the chief functions of the department is to advise members of the government on points of law, and not to yield to them where it is proposed to do injustice. It is really unbecoming that the minister should forget the title of his department and that his duty is to do justice. The amendment proposed by the hon. minister shows that there is a prejudice against Mr. Burland, because his amendment is to stay prejudice in certain cases. The logical conclusion is that there is a prejudice sought.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The only thing the clause does is to impose upon him the duty of giving up to the Department of Finance those engravings.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is a prejudice if the clause passes as it appears in the bill. I hope the House will reject the whole thing.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I should like to ask the hon. minister what kind of demand has been made on Mr. Burland for these stamps? When was the demand first made?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to answer that question. It is some time ago—some time last year, and it may have been earlier, for aught I know, but it came under my attention some time last fall.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—When was this $9,800 due?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot say that?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—On the 1st of June, 1898.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—You say if Mr. Burland would hand over these dies and plates he would then have an action against the government. Could he have that action without the department issuing a fiat?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He cannot without a fiat. I may say this, that the Postmaster General offered him his money, but said to him, "You give up these dies in your possession," and he refused to give up the dies and the Postmaster General refused to pay that particular sum of money. With that we have nothing to do. Then a fiat was asked for to enforce the payment of that money, not for compensation for the dies. As it was an acknowledged debt, there was no object in getting the fiat, because he would be in no better position after that than he was before.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—When the government admitted they owed the man they should have paid him.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What I am saying to my hon. friend is, if Mr. Burland had given over the dies he would have received the money, and if he thought he was entitled to payment for the dies in addition to the payment on the contract for stamps printed from the dies, he undoubtedly would have had the right to a fiat for that if he chose to ask for it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is what the amendment asks for?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In the amendment which I propose here, his rights are reserved. He does not require to have an express provision of law to bestow the right upon him. He has that right now.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but I have tried very hard to find out for myself, from the argument of the hon. leader of the government in this House, what is the actual point at issue between Mr. Burland and the government. In the wealth of verbiage with which the hon. leader has clothed his remarks, I see in his argument something of the action of the cuttle fish which, when closely pursued by his opponents, surrounds himself with an inky cloud, in which he is lost sight of. I have tried, through the inky cloud of verbiage with which the hon. leader of the government has surrounded this question to get at the facts, and I cannot. It seems to me the only argument which the hon. gentleman put forward why this clause should be inserted in the bill, is the great danger which he holds over the heads of the government and the country, that by these dies and plates remaining in the hands of Mr. Burland, there is a danger of the country being flooded with a false issue of stamps and notes, and that a very great loss to the revenue must accrue to the country. We all know perfectly well that if Mr. Burland was to attempt under the present condition of affairs, to print or put out an issue of stamps, or anything else of that kind, which would be spurious, he would be liable to the law as it stands now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—But that is not the point that the hon. gentleman makes out. He still says that there is danger of its being done, and that that is the reason why he introduces this clause, so that Mr. Burland may be forced by the law——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not Mr. Burland alone, but anybody.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—We know that this legislation is directed against Mr. Burland, as well as we know that other legislation which has been introduced in this House by the hon. gentleman during the present session, had been directed against other individuals, and as was stated by the hon. member from Victoria (Mr. Macdonald) this government is in the position of being watched by the country, to see that the legislation which they introduce is not directed against individuals, as it has been over and over again. As it has been stated and pointed out by other hon. gentlemen, the introduction of these measures, which it is known will not be allowed to go through—legislation by the government against individuals—may be done for the purpose of trying to influence the country against the Senate, because it is known the Senate will not allow such measures as that to become law. If Mr. Burland commits any crime, it brings him within scope of the law as it stands, and he is liable to punishment, and therefore there is no such danger as has been pointed out by the hon. gentleman. If Mr. Burland renders himself liable in a civil way, everybody knows that Mr. Burland is a very wealthy man. Any claims for damages against him, if they can be enforced by law, can be collected. Then the hon. leader of the government says: "Can you not trust the government?" The government is in this position, that if Mr. Burland has a claim, if he gives up everything he has in his hands now, can he trust the government to do justice? I can tell the hon. gentleman that Mr. Burland, and many others, are under the impression that they cannot trust the government to do justice, and that is the reason why Mr. Burland refuses to give up these plates. It appears to me very much like this, that the Postmaster General is standing upon his dignity on one side, and probably Mr. Burland on the other. Very likely Mr. Burland, acting on the advice of his solicitor, might have taken a different stand if the government had not held a threat over him, and held back the money actually due to him, and then tried to bring in legislation here to make him liable to the criminal law if he persist in his refusal to give up the dies. I do not see why it is necessary to discuss this matter at greater length. I do not think this House will allow legislation against an individual to go through.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not against an individual, but if the hon. gentleman thinks there is no danger to the public revenue, he will vote against the bill altogether.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—If Mr. Burland is going to render himself liable to the law, the law will take care of him now without any amendment.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—If that had not been the case of Mr. Burland, would this clause have been introduced?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Then it should have been introduced long ago.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, but it is individual cases that suggest legislation.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—There are one or two points that I am not very clear about, and perhaps a little further discussion will elucidate the matter a little more. I understand that Mr. Burland has had for 29 years a great deal of work to do for the government of Canada, not only with the Postmaster General but with the Finance and Inland Revenue, and perhaps other departments. I understand, and the Minister of Justice will correct me if I am misinformed, that the dies, plates and rolls have been returned to all the other officers and settlement made.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I am told that there is no dispute with the Finance Minister and the Minister of Inland Revenue on this point. It appears to me that this trouble with the Postmaster General really has originated with the Jubilee stamps, and the quarrel which took place between the Postmaster General and Mr. Burland about that time. The question has been asked by the Minister of Justice, of what value can these plates and dies be to Mr. Burland? I think I can see how Mr. Burland may have a very great interest in these rolls and dies. They cost him a great deal of money, I understand. We will suppose a case. Perhaps the Minister of Justice may think it is in the far distant future, but supposing a change of government took place, and new tenders were invited for the printing of notes and postage stamps and Inland Revenue stamps, and Mr. Burland puts in a tender. His tender will be very much lower if he can get the use of his own rolls and dies and stamps than if they were all obliterated and destroyed. In that way, it is very evident that Mr. Burland has a great interest in this material. The Minister of Justice told us, in plain words, that there is no dispute about Mr. Burland's claim for the $9,800. In the name of heaven, why not pay him? Have they not the money? If there is no dispute about it, why not pay your debts like honest men? They say, "There is another claim against Mr. Burland, and we will hold this money until that claim is paid." Is not Mr. Burland a responsible man?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No more so than the Crown.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Will the hon. gentleman say that Mr. Burland is not responsible for any claim that the Crown may make against him? The government cannot take that stand. If it is so important to this government to have these rolls and dies handed over to them, why, in the name of common sense, has not the government insisted upon the return of these rolls, dies and plates long ago? They had that course open to them. Mr. Burland was most anxious to get into court, and these gentlemen would not take him there. They said "we will not pay your just claim. We owe you $9,800 for work certified by the department, but we will not pay you for that and we will not take you into the Exchequer Court to try whether you have any interest and right to these dies, plates and rolls. We will amend the Criminal Code so that if you keep these articles, we do not care whether you have any interest in them or not, we can send you to the penitentiary and impose a very severe fine upon you." I say it is an unfair course to adopt, and it is a course that, in my opinion, is taken simply to satisfy the bad temper and bad disposition of men who have not acted in a very creditable way, to say the least of it. I am informed that no actual demand has been made for these rolls and dies up to the present time. Certainly they have not instituted proceedings against Mr. Burland and why not? It is a mystery to me, if the government have a claim against him. There must be some reason for it, and it is a reason which should be explained before they can expect this House to accept such an amendment as the one proposed by the Minister of Justice. It appears that the present government has instituted a suit in the courts for the collection of money which they claim is due by Mr. Burland. I do not know how much the claim is, but I would suppose that if the public interest were in such a state as the Minister of Justice represents, their first demand would be to get possession of these dies and plates and rolls; but no, they have not instituted proceedings against Mr. Burland for that, but for fraud for supplying lithographed stamps instead of stamps printed from steel plates. I consider that the first and most important case, if they wanted a case at all, was to get possession of these dies. They would not do that, because Mr. Burland would then have an opportunity to bring in his offset and show that he had not been paid for these dies. The Minister of Justice says he has been paid for them. I am instructed that as orders came to Mr. Burland for certain work for the government, he sent in his bill, and if that work was done by steel engraving, there was a charge made in each bill for engraving. If it was done from a lithographic stone, there was no charge for steel engraving, consequently there was a difference in the charges, and there is no ground for a claim in that respect. Unless we have more light on the subject than we have at present, it would be a very unfair and unjust thing to pass such a clause as has been presented by the Minister of Justice. I shall be disposed to support the amendment proposed by Mr. Ferguson unless there is more light thrown on the subject than we have had up to the present time.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I have listened, like the hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) to the very elaborate arguments which have been adduced on both sides, and I feel that some points have not been very distinctly brought out. Points that I would like to have some light upon have not been touched. The hon. minister has stated that the action proposed by the hon. gentlemen opposite would lower the position of the Crown and exalt the position of Mr. Burland against the Crown, and in several ways would interfere with the dignity and power of the Crown. I would like to know the beginning of this matter in the first place. Was it not a contract entered into by Mr. Burland on the one side and Her Majesty on the other? And then is it doing any dishonour to Her Majesty, she having made this arrangement, that we should stand by it and not allow that arrangement to be interfered with by an individual? It appears to me we had better guard the integrity of the empire by upholding any contract the Crown has made with the individual. That is the first question to be settled. Did Her Majesty make a contract with Mr. Burland? It cannot be denied that she did. It may have been a wrong contract, and it may have been a mistake. I think it was a mistake. I think in the contract there should have been a provision that the dies should be given up immediately the work was done. Now we are going to sustain Her Majesty's contract in this matter, and say Her Majesty's contract was properly fulfilled before Mr. Burland is brought in as a criminal and subjected to indignity. It appears to me that perhaps this is the outcome of the ill-feeling of the Postmaster General against Mr. Burland for the transactions that have taken place between them. When the Minister of Justice was asked to issue a fiat, why did he refuse it? Of course it was held in obeyance, but we know there is very little difference between holding in obeyance and refusing a fiat. I understood that in asking for a fiat it was to bring the whole question before the court.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, not at all. It was for no such purpose.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I think the public outside of this House have the same opinion as myself. I understood that the application was in order that the whole question could be brought fairly before the court, and this question with reference to the contract and its effect on his holding of the dies would be adjucated by the court. As soon as the government knew this question was coming up, why did they not issue a fiat? As soon as the government knew that Mr. Burland refused to give up the dies on the strength of that contract, they had power to go immediately into court and have the question settled; and there would be no difficulty then in accepting the amendment proposed in this bill. I must confess that my feelings are such that however desirable and necessary it is that this provision should become law, I would postpone it to another session rather than be instrumental in using the power of this Parliament to inflict an injustice on a man, and I would not expose him to condemnation under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I heard something to-day about the dignity of this House and the propriety of doing justice to an individual. It occurs to me that our duty is to look at the proposition laid before the House and deal with it on its merits. What is the proposition embodied in the clause before the committee? It is that if a subject, or a person who is not a subject, has a contract with the government for the purpose of printing bank notes, postage stamps, Inland Revenue stamps and other things of that kind, when his contract is terminated, he shall not retain the possession of the plates and dies. That is a self-evident proposition. I have not heard any hon. gentleman here say that under those circumstances a contractor should be allowed to retain the plates and dies.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Look at the contract.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not such a lawyer as the hon. gentleman is, who is prepared to expound the contract without seeing it, and further we are not sitting here as jurors, or a court, to examine the contract and decide, as hon. gentlemen are apparently anxious we should do, on ex-parte statements.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—We protect the individual.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The point is that it is right and proper, when a contract of that kind terminates, that the plates and dies, which might open the door for fraud upon the public, should be out of the possession of the private individual. It is no answer to say that the gentleman who happens to have possession of these particular plates and dies is a gentleman who is well to do and is not likely to be a party to anything in the nature of counterfeiting or forging. But when a law is made it is not made for a day. It is made for all time, and suppose that the present contract terminates and you apply the same rule to the gentlemen who now hold the contract, then these gentlemen would have the right to hold the plates and dies until they were satisfied the government had paid everything they claimed. These dies and plates may not be used in this country, and I do not presume that the gentlemen are more likely to do anything wrong than Mr. Burland would be, but there is the risk that this country might be flooded with bank notes printed off these plates in another country. Supposing that they are stolen from the contractor?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is a bad argument for the government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This proposition seems a reasonable one. But hon. gentlemen tell us you should not make the law for a particular case. Those hon. gentlemen do not understand the way in which English law has been built up. It has been built up from start to finish on individual cases. We are not omniscient. British legislators are not omniscient. They do not know all the offences that may be committed. As cases arise, then we legislate for them. It did not occur to any one that this case was likely to arise, but it has arisen, and it may arise another time, and it is our duty to prevent the mischief. What is the position? Every one will agree that some legislation of this kind is necessary. What is the position as to Mr. Burland? I regret that when you put the case of Canada against Mr. Burland hon. gentlemen opposite seem to feel that the country has no claims at all. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson), made a remarkable speech as counsel for the defence in that case, and showed as much warmth and vigour as if he had received a large retainer. I do not, of course, claim that he had. In fact, some of the hon. gentleman's observations remind me of the "chops and tomato sauce" of the Widow Bardell case in the Pickwick papers. Hon. gentlemen do not mean to be led away, but when a story is told by an individual, one's sympathies are likely to be excited, and one is likely to lose sight of the other side of the story. What is Mr. Burland's grievance? As I understand it, the hon. Minister of Justice has stated positively—and he is in a position to know that what he states is correct—that there is no question about Mr. Burland being entitled to receive this $9,800. Consequently, the claim that he should have a fiat for the $9,800 is of no value whatever, because, after Mr. Burland got his fiat, he would have no more right to the money than he has now. The government acknowledge they owe Mr. Burland $9,800.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Why will they not pay him?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am coming to that. The government owe Mr. Burland $9,800. Mr. Burland holds certain dies in his possession, which the government claim should be delivered up; and I think they properly say to Mr. Burland "We owe you the money, and we are prepared to pay it, if you hand over these dies, which you had no right to keep under the circumstances."

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I should like very much to know why it is that treatment of this kind has been accorded him from the Postmaster General, when the treatment he received at the head of the other departments was entirely different, when he gave up his dies and raised no question whatever?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The fact that one of the ministers may be more accommodating and agreeable than another does not affect the right of the matter at all, and it is a perfectly reasonable thing, under the circumstances that he, acting on behalf of the government, should say "We are prepared to pay you this $9,800 upon your delivering over the dies." Mr. Burland had no use for the dies. The hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour (Mr. Prowse) said those dies might be useful if Burland got the contract again, but inasmuch as the patterns of the postage stamps have been altered, the dies could not be of any particular value to Burland again.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER — They might be altered back.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I cannot see where the grievance is. If Mr. Burland hands over those dies, which are of no value to him, and which might be an injury to the public, he gets $9,800. I do not see anything harsh in that. Then the Minister of Justice proposes an amendment to this clause to the effect that if, outside of that $9,800, Mr. Burland has any claim on the government, this clause shall not prejudice his claim. The minister stated that he will be prepared to issue a fiat to enable Mr. Burland to try out his right under his claim for those dies. I think that is a perfectly reasonable proposition. I do not see anything oppressive or wrong in it. The hon. gentleman from Sarnia says that I ignore the contract. The minister says he is prepared to grant his fiat to Mr. Burland to have his rights under the contract interpreted, subject to the fact that he gets his $9,800. Then, there is a legal question between the parties. Mr. Burland claims that the contract should be interpreted one way, and the government claim it should be interpreted another way; and I think that is a fair subject for litigation. It is a matter to be regretted that so much warm feeling should be imported into the discussion. Supposing it was not Mr. Burland of Ottawa, who is in the lobby every day, but supposing it was a gentleman in Hong Kong. We should deal with the matter in the same way as we do now and I do not see the object of reading and quoting letters and correspondence with Mr. Burland's solicitors. With respect to the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) I have to say that if it is proposed seriously to propound that amendment to the House, it should be limited to the present case, and not applied to future cases, because it simply means that in the case of other contracts this amendment will hold out to every contractor an inducement in the first place to make unreasonable claims upon the government, because this amendment will show to him that if he just makes a big claim against the government he can retain his plates and dies. I think the amendment is an unwise one altogether. The contractor should not have any inducement of that kind held out to him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not propose to prolong the discussion further than to compliment the hon. gentleman from Sarnia (Mr. Vidal) upon the terse, succinct and pointed manner in which he has put the case to the House. It seems to me we have all, to a very great extent, been travelling from the record. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice last night made a very passionate speech in reply to the statement which I had made, and called me to account for introducing irrelevant matter. The hon. gentleman will remember that he, in introducing his amendment in the first place, referred to the difficulties which had occurred between the government through one of its departments and Mr. Burland, and it was to that that I referred. I did not introduce that subject. I tried to confine myself, in addition to referring to that fact, to the contract and the rights of the contractor. If Mr. Burland holds these dies and plates illegally, there is a law upon the statute-book to reach him. If he holds them legally under his contract, then the proposition of my hon. friend can be for no other purpose than to reach Mr. Burland: ergo it is a direct blow at a contractor of the government who holds property which belongs to the government, under the contract, when it is paid for. The hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Power) said he endeavoured to deal with the proposition before the House. He made an admirable speech, but he evaded—I do not mean to say that offensively—he omitted to refer to any right which Mr. Burland, the contractor, has under his contract. As I said before, if Mr. Burland holds the dies and plates illegally, let him be punished. If he holds them legally under his contract, the proposed amendment to the law is for no other object than to compel him to give them up. That is the only deduction you can draw from the proposition made by the hon. gentleman. What are the facts? The Minister of Justice very elaborately and very learnedly, and seconded by the senior member for Halifax with an equally ingenious argument, declares that no man has a right to hold these dies in his possession after his contract ceases. With that proposition I am fully in accord, but he omitted to state that there is a provision in the contract which not only enables the contractor to hold them, but gives him the authority and power to hold the property until it is paid for. Now, I say more: the contractor, Mr. Burland, has delivered up—so I am informed upon authority which I believe to be true,—dies and plates which he had in his possession for the making of tobacco stamps, liquor stamps, and other stamps that are required by the government for the Inland Revenue, the Finance and other departments. Mark you, under the contract they paid him for them, and the moment they paid him for them he delivered them up, and that is all he asks now. The question of the $9,800 due the contractor, has nothing to do with the subject under discussion than a bill owed to a baker or butcher.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it has nothing to do with it, what right has the Postmaster General, on behalf of the government, to say "Do a certain thing which is contrary to your contract, and I will pay you?" To my mind, and to the mind of any ordinary man who is not an astute lawyer who can argue any question providing he is retained on either side—to an ordinary mind, the proposition is so plain that I do not think it requires any argument to sustain it. The hon. gentleman says that although I may hold that which, in his opinion, I should deliver to him, and which I claim I have a right to hold under a written contract entered into between Her Majesty and myself, that he refuses to pay me that which he says is legally and properly belonging to me because I will not hand over that which I hold and claim pay for——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is your argument.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I thought the hon. gentleman had made his speech.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am simply correcting a misstatement with regard to myself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman at one period of these negotiations was in a more happy state of mind, that was a period when his better judgment and that kindness of heart, which always actuates him in anything he has to do in his desire to do right, until the greater influence of the Postmaster General seizes hold of his better judgment and warped it. Let us see what he says, and we can judge for ourselves. Here is a declaration by Mr. Hogg, deliberately stating that the Minister of Justice made a proposition which is contained in that very amendment proposed by my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Ferguson). Mr. Hogg writes on the 10th March, 1899, as follows:—

> The day before yesterday I called upon the Minister of Justice and had a conversation with him. I found he had not taken the matter before his colleagues in council.

In a former letter he says the minister agreed to take it before his colleagues.

> I found that he had not taken the matter before his colleagues in council, his statement being that he had been a great deal away, and had been very much engaged in connection with some capital cases which required his undivided attention. He said he also wished to see Mr. Mulock.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—To whom is that addressed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Addressed to his client Mr. Burland. It is the next sentence to which I call the attention of the committee. It reads:

> At the same time he remarked that he had been thinking over the matter and thought that it might be brought to a close by the payment of the account, and by instituting an action on the part of the government against the council, to test the question of whether the dies, rolls and plates should be delivered up free of charge, or whether payment should be made for them.

That is precisely what we are contending—nothing more and nothing less. The question of withholding payment of the $9,800 which they say legally and legitimately, and properly belongs to him, has nothing to do with the question of the retention of the dies and plates in his possession. That is a question separate altogether, and I hesitate not to say that a more tyrannical act could never be prepetrated by any sharper who desired to keep his creditor out of his money, than the position taken by the Postmaster General. I acquit my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. He desired to do what was right until he was overpowered by a more determined or more stubborn will. What is this amendment or resolution, which the senior member for Halifax says should not be adopted? It says clearly, that provided, however, that in case of any person who has been or is a contractor with the said government for engraving and printing of such Dominion notes and stamps, and who has in his possession any such plate, roll or dies for which he claims to be paid by the government under his contract, the demand of the Minister of Finance shall only be made after payment of the contractor's claim—not for what he has done in printing—not for anything outside of the value of the dies, but the claim for the dies and plates which he has engraved. Then the amendment reads "or in case the claim is disputed after reference of the claims to the Exchequer Court of Canada" Mr. Burland claims that he is entitled to payment for these dies. The government says "no, you are not entitled to that account" and then Mr. Burland says "Refer that." It is a matter of dispute as to the actual meaning of the contract.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He does not say that, nor has he ever said it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am putting a hypothetical case. Whenever a good point is being made, the hon. gentleman interrupts, whether designedly or unintentionally, I cannot say. Mr. Burland has a claim. He says so, and he says so under the authority of his contract which declares positively that these goods are to be delivered up when paid for. He says: "Pay me for these dies, &c.," and the Postmaster General said "No, I will not pay you, nor will I pay you anything else till you deliver them up." All the minister would have to do under this amendment would be to refer the matter to the Exchequer Court, and the moment the matter was referred to the Exchequer Court the dies and plates would have to be handed over to the government for destruction; and then the contractor would be out of possession and would have the security of the contract for the amount due him. There is the position, and can you fancy a fairer position than that? I would have no objection to make it a special case if you like, and leave the clause as broad as you please in the future, but you must not forget that there is a contract into which the government has entered with the American Bank Note Company, which is now doing the work that Mr. Burland used to perform, of the same character and kind, and under the same provisions. If it is not, then the contingency that might arise as stated by the hon. senior member for Halifax could not arise. He puts it in this way: The present contractors might hold in their possession all the plates and dies they have for the manufacture of postage stamps, Inland Revenue stamps and bank notes, and until every cent was paid them by the government in case there was a dispute. That is not the point at all. If they have a contract with the American Bank Note Company, that the government shall have the right to demand the plates upon payment for the same, then they will be in the same position as Burland, and consequently it would not affect the question as to whether they are owing $10 or $10,000 for work done with those plates. That has nothing whatever to do with the question. It is on that point my hon. friend from Halifax studiously avoided any argument. The question simply is, to my mind, does that contract entitle Mr. Burland to hold these plates until they are paid for? I say that to anybody who can read plain English, unless he is much more astute than I am, that contract gives him power to hold them. If it does not, then language does not mean anything. I am not going to argue the point. I will not waste the time of the House discussing the point raised by the hon. Minister of Justice that the plates have been paid for in the price which was charged for the articles produced by those plates. That may or may not be the case. If the hon. gentleman went to a printing office and wanted 500,000 circulars, or a book of any kind that would require the printer to purchase a new press or new type for the purpose of printing them, he would put in a tender for the printing of it, and unless it was specially stipulated that that type was to become the property of the government after the printing was done, and it was included in the price charged for the work, they would have no more right to it than to the horse that drew them a barrel of water. If they had stated in their tender "Give us the price at which you will furnish such and such articles, and the plates, dies and rolls, which shall be the property of the government as soon as the work is done," then my hon. friend would be right, but they do not say that. They say they shall be the property of the government when paid for, and Mr. Burland says "Pay for them, and you may have them." As there is a dispute on that point, then refer it to Exchequer Court, and Mr. Burland says: "The moment you do that I will take my chance and you can destroy the rolls and plates or do what you please with them." There is just one point that my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Power) referred to—I do not think it is at all relevant, but I may refer to it, because it was referred to by the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour (Mr. Prowse). He says those articles were of no use, because if you produce any work from those dies it would be punishable under the Criminal Law, and very properly so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not say that. What I said was that the pattern of the stamp has been altered, and thousands of the dies are not of any real value.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The argument of the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour (Mr. Prowse) on behalf of Mr. Burland's position was this: He says "they are of little or no value at present, but they cost him a great deal to produce them, and his contract says that they shall be paid for, when he is bound under that contract to deliver them up. Then he says, this property belongs to him until it is paid for, and if I have them in my safe, when tenders for work in the future are asked for, I will have them in my possession, which will enable me to tender at a low rate, being enabled to go on with the work." You talk about a fiat. He has no right to ask for a fiat in connection with this matter. He could not get a fiat. He says "they are locked up in my safe; I propose to keep them there until I have another opportunity to tender for work." But they say: "Under your contract you are bound to give them up?" He replies: "I am willing to give them up when you pay me for them," and then with the money paid for them, he would have the means to reproduce the very plates that were taken from him. To my mind, the position is clear enough, and if the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Power) will look at the amendment and see what its object is, instead of denouncing it as an improper one, he will see that it is a very proper one. Such a case cannot possibly arise again, unless you make a contract similar to the one in my hand, because as this contract was drawn, as it has been said by the hon. gentleman from Sarnia (Mr. Vidal), it is made between Mr. Burland and Her Majesty, whose contracts should be honourably fulfilled. If the contract is wrong, it is the fault of the late government who did it. What I contend is that the Minister of Justice should have an opinion of his own, and in the administration of that department, he will excuse me for saying so, he might have followed the example set him by his illustrious predecessor, Sir John Thompson. I have a distinct recollection where the Minister of Railways, Mr. Pope, refused to grant a fiat because he thought a man had not preferred a good claim, the Minister of Justice said: "The Imperial practice is that every subject of Her Majesty shall have the right to come into court to test his rights, if he has any rights against the Crown," and although the Minister of Railways, the head of the department against whom the claim was made, refused to recommend to the Minister of Justice or to consent to the issuing of a fiat, that hon. gentleman said: "No, it is the right of every subject of Her Majesty to test his claim in a court of justice," and he granted it. And now, according to the extract which I have read from the hon. minister's own statement to Mr. Hogg—I take it for granted it is correct—his mind ran in the same direction and he thought it was better to pay what was admitted to be due, and then refer the matter to court as to whether Mr. Burland had a claim or not; and I believe his better judgment would lead him to that conclusion now. I have put the case as it presents itself to my mind; whether it meets with the approval of hon. gentlemen I cannot say. Other questions have been introduced into this discussion to which I do not propose to refer. I think we had better confine ourselves closely to the one proposition, which was so clearly and distinctly put by the hon. gentleman from Sarnia (Mr. Vidal), has Mr. Burland a right under the contract to withhold these plates and dies until they are paid for? If he has not, then prosecute him criminally for holding dies and plates which could be used to print counterfeits. If there is a dispute he will hand them over to the court or government the moment you go into the Exchequer Court to ascertain whether he has a claim or not. That is the simple proposition I take. The Minister of Justice declares that this amendment could not and would not be accepted. I cannot understand what the hon. gentleman means by that, except that if it is carried by a majority of the House, he will drop the clause. I would not advise the dropping of the clause, but I would advise this, that if they have not made a different contract to that which the former government entered into with Mr. Burland, the sooner they change it the better. I am not going into the question as to whether Mr. Burland committed a fraud by furnishing lithographs when he should have furnished steel plate engravings. That is a matter for the courts. I have simply to say that it is denied pointedly. I had it from his own mouth this morning that he has examined forty or fifty accounts in his books, which he had rendered to the government for the very articles to which the Minister of Justice refers, and that in no case has he charged the prices which he would charge had the articles been produced from steel plate, and that the difference between the value of lithographs and the steel plate engravings is just about seventy per cent. His denial is—I only mention it in justice to a man who is threatened with a prosecution for fraud, that in not one single instance did he deliver the product of a lithographic stone at the price he would have charged for steel plate. That is his statement.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The hon. member for Halifax expressed a little astonishment at the warmth, or apparent warmth, with which some members have spoken on this subject. I have an idea that the consciences of the members of this hon. House have been shocked by a proposition to place on the statute-book of Canada a provision such as this. It is utterly revolting to them, and therefore they might be excused if they speak with more warmth than might be expected in this discussion. The hon. gentleman quotes British law as our model. We recognize British law as our model. We are proud of British law and willing to be guided by it, but I venture the assertion that the hon. gentleman will search British statutes from the first page to the last and he will not find one page polluted with such a proposition as this. The hon. member also spoke of members of this House expounding the contract without having seen it. He is mistaken there. The majority of those who have spoken to-day have seen the contract and read its provisions, and therefore may be supposed to know whereof they affirm.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I wish to vote on this question with some intelligence, and I have listened a good deal to talk about a contract. A contract has been bandied about by almost every one who has spoken against the measure as presented by the Minister of Justice. I feel that we are not a court of justice to investigate the equity of the contract—a contract that has not been proved, that has been merely asserted. We know the first act in a court of justice would be to prove that this is the actual contract. The question would be presented to the court in a proper manner. I feel I have no right to recognize the assertion of any hon. gentleman who spoke here to-day of the contract. The question before me is simply this: a contract had been made by the government of Canada with certain gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How do you know?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I am going to show from results that there was a contract, and that certain dies and plates were the result of that contract. From the very nature of it that contract would necessarily involve the return of those dies and plates, because we know that those dies and plates mean value for money to the country, and why a gentleman who had a contract to produce money should think of retaining the dies and plates that made that money, for the life of me I cannot understand. I am surprised that any government should have entered into such a contract if such a contract was made. I know if I had the honour of being in the government I certainly would not trust any individual with plates engraved to create money at pleasure in this country.

Therefore, on that basis I feel that the government have a right to demand immediately the return of those plates before any other business is done, because the very completion of the contract, in my opinion, involves the return of the appliances with which that money had been created. That being the position as it appears to me, I feel myself obliged to support the government in getting these plates back. Then justice, which can be had through the courts, should be done the contractor. I cannot see what injustice the contractor would suffer. He cannot use those plates; he has no right to them. They are of certain dates. The dates and numbers would have to be altered. They cannot be used for any other purpose than to fraudulently issue stamps and notes. Under the circumstances, I think the government are perfectly right in standing on their rights and demanding the possession of the plates and dies before making any settlement with the contractor.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I propose only to call attention to a single point in this matter. The Minister of Justice has fully explained the position of the Crown, and I think the stand he took is quite unanswerable. There is this point to which attention may be called; if this clause stood without the introduction of the Burland controversy, I have no doubt hon. gentleman would be prepared to accept it. It is only in consequence of an existing grievance which Mr. Burland has that opposition to this clause has arisen. I would call attention to the law as it has stood for the last 25 years. I find, looking over the Postal Service Act, in providing against forgery and having in possession dies, cuts sinks and so on there is this clause, "Or has possession of any such plate, die, &c., except by permission in writing of the Postmaster General, or of some officer or person who under regulations made in that behalf, may lawfully grant such permission, &c." It would seem to contemplate that though persons might be lawfully possessed at one time of plates or dies, if the Postmaster General demanded them or was unwilling that they should retain possession of such plates or dies, it would be a penal offence to withhold them. It subjects the party to a charge of felony, because it is quite clear the possession of a die must be under permission of the Postmaster General. Therefore it is perfectly clear to my mind that unless there was some possession in this case is practically a felony to hold it where the party has no right. It has been stated that no improper use could be made of these dies and plates. We know perfectly well that nowadays the strongest safes will not protect the contents of them, and although it is a fact that a good many of the postal stamps have been altered, still there are many that have been in existence for years. No doubt there are dies in the possession of Mr. Burland from which stamps could be issued. They would be stamps, to all intents and purposes, exactly like the stamps in circulation. I entirely acquit Mr. Burland of being a party to any such proposition, but what I say is there ought to be no possibility of any unauthorized person issuing stamps of that kind, or putting them in circulation, and there is a possibility in this particular case. It would appear under the Post Office Act that any one having possession of these dies could only keep possession by permission of the Postmaster General. I think the proposition made by the hon. Minister of Justice is really a fair one. He states here, on the floor of Parliament, that if Mr. Burland does so give up these dies, he will himself grant a fiat to Mr. Burland. Surely that ought to settle it, and the clause ought to be carried without any further controversy. Mr. Burland will be in no worse position, if this clauses passes and the Minister of Justice issues his fiat giving him the right to bring before the court every possible claim he may have against the Crown.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact, that the point to which he has referred was discussed between the solicitor for Mr. Burland and the Postmaster General. If that law be applicable to the case, then there is no necessity for the clause which the Minister of Justice has prepared.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not very clear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Mr. Hogg says in his letter "Mr. Mulock referred me to a section of the Post Office Act relating to persons holding in their possession dies and plates." Of course it would be a penal offence to which the hon. gentleman referred did he not hold those under contract specially provided for. It simply means this, that the hon. Minister of Justice has introduced this clause for the purpose of compelling Mr. Burland to give up the plates, which have not been paid for as provided for in the contract, or send him to jail.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says that the clause was introduced for that purpose. I do not agree with what Mr. Hogg says with regard to the interpretation of that clause, nor do I think that any court would sustain the interpretation which he has placed on it. My hon. friend will see that there is no contract with Mr. Burland. The period for which he had contracted with the government has terminated. Then let me say further, if the hon. gentleman will look at this clause, he will see that it was not intended simply to meet the case of the Post Office Department, but the case with regard to all the revenue departments of the government, both with regard to Dominion notes and with regard to inland revenue stamps. Although I had to do with the preparation of the clause, my statements, I daresay, would not be accepted by some hon. gentlemen. I understand their sneers to mean that. One hon. gentleman has said he trusted the House would not pollute itself by supporting a clause of this sort. I think I am as incapable of presenting anything that is dishonourable and unjust to a citizen of this country as the hon. gentleman who has made that observation. Further, I ask any hon. gentleman who has discussed this question to point out what there is objectionable in that clause. That has not been undertaken. The hon. gentleman opposite admitted that it was a proper position to take. Why have we had this long discussion: because some of the hon. gentlemen have said that although this is a fair proposition there is a man in existence to whom it would apply, and therefore he ought to be excepted. If the simple passing of this clause would have the effect of making him a criminal by its passage, there would be great force in that argument. But that is not so. All he would have to do, under this clause, would be precisely what any one would have to do ten years hence under the same provision, and I am unable to understand, and I do not think I am wanting in understanding, how any hon. gentleman can persuade himself that this would be unjust to Mr. Burland, and that it would be perfectly advantageous to somebody else who might enter into a contract with the government. The hon. gentleman has referred to that contract as if we were to accept his interpretation of it as perfectly conclusive. I tell the hon. gentleman, although I have a great deal of respect for his judgment, I do not agree with the views he has expressed upon it. The hon. gentleman has here drawn attention to the fact that I did not issue a fiat, and I said that I had not refused a fiat, but the fiat was for what? Not for the purpose of interpreting that contract which the hon gentleman holds in his hand. It related to a payment of $9,800.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is what I said.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The fact that the department was indebted to Mr. Burland for that sum was not disputed, and so there was no object, as I said to Mr. Hogg, to go into court to obtain a decision upon a right which was not questioned. The Crown would stand in exactly the same position that it stood in before. The Crown was in the position to pay, if it chose to pay, and it could not be compelled to pay any more after the judgment than before the judgment. The point was that here were dies held that were of importance to the government, that were not of importance to Mr. Burland, and the Postmaster General took the view that until you do hand over those dies you have no right to insist upon my paying the sum that is now due to you. Other questions have arisen since, about which I need not enter into a discussion, but whether the Postmaster General was right or wrong in the view he took——

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Wrong, I call it,

Hon. Mr. MILLS.—I say that has nothing to do with the propriety of this section. I say that this is a proper provision if Mr. Burland had never an existence. It is proper enough notwithstanding the contract with Mr. Burland. You cannot undertake to say that A or B shall be made an exception to a law, and that what you declare an improper thing in every one else shall be held to be proper in his case. Mr. Burland is not declared by this amendment to be an offender. Mr. Burland would be simply called upon, under this provision, to deliver up the dies, just as any one having a contract for the next 10 years when it expires would be called upon to do the same thing. I repeat, if Mr. Burland's interpretation of the contract is right, the court would say so, and he would be paid for his dies, although they were in the hands of the government, but to say that the government must not claim the dies, stamps or rolls until there is an interpretation in his favour is to take a most preposterous position. My amendment is to avoid the very controversy which has arisen. It is a simple declaration that nothing in this section would prejudice Mr. Burland's claim. If my hon. friend will consult any lawyer on the subject, he will tell him the same thing, that that clause does not enlarge Mr. Burland's right, but is a simple declaration to satisfy the House upon that point. I say, further, that I could never accept the amendment of the hon. gentleman opposite. Of course it is in the power of the hon. gentleman to pass that amendment over my head. I know he has a majority in this House and can do that, but it will not make it a proper proceeding in the case, and I would very much rather drop the clause altogether.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Drop it, then.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I should prefer to drop it. If the majority of the House desire it, they have simply to say so and the clause goes out of the bill, but in my opinion it is a proper clause. It is simply an enlargement of the provision in the Post Office Act, and extends it to every case where it is possible for such a fraud to be committed. I have nothing further to say on that question.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the committee rose at six o'clock, there was a point made by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, that appears to have escaped observation, to which I wish to offer a reply. My hon. friend objected to the amendment which I submitted on the ground that it involved the subserviency of the Crown. If it involved anything of that kind, it would, I admit, be a serious objection, for it is our duty, in legislating, not to make the Crown subservient. While we have a duty devolving upon us to give the subject every fair play, the Crown should be paramount. That is where I think the amendment is so fair. We provide that the demand referred to in the original clause, which the government may make for the delivery of these dies and plates, shall only be made after payment, that is, if it is a matter that can be mutually settled, or in case the claim is disputed, after reference of the claim to the Exchequer Court of Canada. That is, if the party holding the dies and plates wishes to escape a criminal prosecution, he must accept the price agreed upon, or the government, having given a reference to the court, he has to surrender the dies and plates. If it were a case of litigation between individuals, the fair thing would be to propose that the dies and plates should be handed into the court and held in charge of the court until the case was decided; but as it is between the government and an individual, as soon as it gets into court, we say the government should hold the dies and plates while it is in court. Therefore we are not making the government subservient, but are giving them a decided advantage. My hon. friend ventured to criticise the course I have pursued in advocating justice for Mr. Burland, or for any person placed in such a position as he is. He says as an ex-minister of the Crown it is my duty to support the Crown. I cannot see that any such duty devolves upon me. My duty is to do justice between the Crown and the individual, and to give the Crown nothing more than what is just and fair, and there is no such duty devolving on one who has been formerly a member of the government. If that were so, I would feel in an awkward position, especially if I had to accept all the legislation proposed by Mr. Mulock, the Postmaster General, who appears to be the Lord High Executioner of the present government. My hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax, was kind enough to insinuate broadly that I had received a retainer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman must know that he is misstating what I said.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Did not the hon. gentleman say that?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was told the hon. gentleman had used the words. The hon. gentleman speaks so low that I seldom hear him.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I think the hon. gentleman said that the hon. member from Marshfield spoke as if he had received a retainer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, but I said I did not mean to insinuate anything of the sort.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then I will remark another statement which my hon. friend made, and which he is accustomed to make in this House. Whenever he differs in opinion from a gentleman who is not a lawyer he indulges in sneers, as he did with reference to the hon. gentleman from British Columbia about his legal knowledge.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That does not hurt me very much.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But I must submit that although my hon. friend may be a most eminent lawyer, he may be the head of the Bar in his province, but we are on a level here and have a right to form our own conclusions and our own opinions, and sometimes it may happen that in our own unsophisticated way we may arrive at the merits of a case quite as well as eminent lawyers like the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I regard the amendment which my hon. friend has moved to his own clause as putting Mr. Burland in a very bad position indeed. I must speak with somewhat bated breath in the presence of the hon. senior member from Halifax (Mr. Power), because I am venturing on something he will regard as his particular domain, but still while I am entrusted with the duty of voting here, I must endeavour also to try and think for myself. In my opinion, if we yielded to that clause, and it found its way into the Criminal Code through the action of this Parliament, Mr. Burland, in order to escape a criminal prosecution and being sent to the penitentiary, or being heavily fined, would probably have to surrender up these dies and plates, and in so doing would have to surrender them unconditionally without fixing a price or anything of the kind. Up to the present time he has possession of these dies and plates and rolls, and I think it is only playing upon words and wasting time to talk about his applying for a fiat, and being granted a fiat while he is in that position.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Could not he trust the government?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I will reach that point a little later, but I contend that Mr. Burland could not apply for a fiat with regard to these dies and plates while they are in his possession; he could not ask for any price or valuation to be put upon them, and I submit, further, that if he is compelled, under threat of criminal prosecution, to hand over the plates to the government without making any condition, he would not be in a position to ask for a fiat or contest the matter, for he has handed them over without making any stipulation as to price. Whether that is a correct view or not, I think there is a great deal in it, and this House should be very careful in the matter with that point in view. My hon. friend's amendment is, to my mind, of no value whatever. It is a poor apology for the clause, as he submitted it in the first instance, that any such amendment as he proposes to add to it should be necessary. It is a poor compliment to the clause that it had to be saddled with any amendment. My hon friend proposed an amendment with an immense amount of gravity, and explained that Mr. Burland would, after the passage of this clause, under the force of that amendment, have exactly the legal rights he had before, that it would not affect or take away those legal rights. Hon. gentlemen will observe that, as far as obtaining pay for the dies is concerned, he has no legal right unless the government desire to give it to him. They owe him certain moneys, and admit it, and his accounts have been in for several months and they have not yet granted him a fiat.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He does not need a fiat.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—They have withheld it for twelve months, and he never received any information that he would get a fiat in connection with that until the committee took this clause into consideration. How would he stand with regard to the dies and plates? The hon. Minister of Justice says he would have what legal right he had before. Well, that is none at all. He cannot refer the case to the Exchequer Court without the government's consent, and I am strongly of the opinion that if Mr. Burland, under the pressure of this clause, if it passes as my hon. friend desires, would hand these plates over to the government, he would have no right to present a petition of right at all as he handed over the dies without making any stipulation as to price, he would have to depend upon the grace of the government whether they would give it or not. But where they have withheld the fiat in the case of clear indebtedness of $9,800, which they admit they owe him, and they have withheld it since the 1st of June, 1898, nearly thirteen months, when they withheld the fiat in a clear undoubted matter of business as that is, I think it would be a poor consolation to Mr. Burland to find that this House had accepted an amendment which would leave him in possession only of those legal rights which he had already.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the hon. gentleman has proposed an amendment open to exactly the same objection. His amendment reads :

Provided, however, that in the case of Mr. Burland who has been or is a contractor with the said government for the engraving and printing of said Dominion notes and stamps, and who has in his possession any such plate, roll or die, for which he claims to be paid by the government under his contract, the demand of the Minister of Finance shall only be made after the payment of the contractor's claim, or in case the claim is disputed, after reference of the claim to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

That is what the hon. gentleman proposes. He proposes in the Criminal law asserting a general law which it is open to the House to question if the House thought the principle was unsound. He says "Your principle is all right, but there is one man to whom I would not like to see that principle apply, and that is Mr. Burland."

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have not thought it right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then the hon. gentleman should have opposed the clause. He allows it to go into operation with regard to six millions of people, and wants to make it an exception in the case of one man. That is the proposition of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is only one man interested.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There may be others.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If you put them in the same position with the same contract they would be.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It does not matter what the contract is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the contract is made in the future by a man in the same position, then the same rule ought to apply. The hon. gentleman has not made a rule of that sort. He applies it to Mr. Burland. The hon. gentleman says Mr. Burland was refused a petition of right. About what was he refused a petition of right? The Post Office Department said to Mr. Burland that there was an unsettled account between them. They did not dispute the account. They were ready to pay the amount over to him. Now Mr. Burland wanted a petition of right to do what? To inquire into matters that the Crown did not dispute.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—To make the government pay it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. That is where the hon. gentleman is mistaken, and is confusing proceedings against the Crown with proceedings against individuals. You may bring a suit against an individual, but you do not bring a suit against the Crown. You present a petition. The Crown will pay if they are properly informed. The petition is to ascertain whether the Crown is misinformed or not. That had no applicability to a case where the amount was undisputed. The minister may be open to censure if he withheld payment without sufficient cause. Looking at what the law really is, you might call in question the conduct of the minister, but you could not call for a petition of right about a matter in which there was no dispute. I told Mr. Burland's counsel—and the hon. leader of the opposition has read the statement to-day, and he will find that he has misinterpreted it, if he looks at it closely—I told Mr. Burland's counsel that if Mr. Burland would hand over the dies to the government, there would be no difficulty in granting a petition to interpret the contract to see if his views were right. That was open to him, and the amount to be ascertained if he was entitled to anything. The contention of the Post Office Department was that the value of the dies was included in the contract they had with him, and if they had recalled these dies and called upon him to make plates of a different pattern before the term of the contract had expired, these dies would have been given up under the terms of that contract, and he would have been entitled to compensation for them, because they had not been used for the time which he contemplated when he entered into the contract. That is the position of the matter, but I feel, that a clause such as the one that the hon. gentlemen proposed would not be consistent with either the honour or dignity of the Senate, and sooner than such an amendment should be made to this clause, I would prefer to withdraw it altogether. I, therefore, withdraw this clause, and the responsibility of inability to legislate upon this subject. With regard to one class of contract, one class of engravings, those relating to the Post Office Department, there is legislation already and I am simply extending this provision to bank notes and to others that are not covered by the Post Office Act. I will say, therefore, that this section, with the consent of the Senate, I drop altogether and proceed to the consideration of the next clause.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Before the clause is struck out, I desire to make one or two observations. I regret that the minister has felt it necessary to express the opinion which he has just expressed. According to my own view, if I had charge of the bill I would prefer to have it voted down. I do not wish to detain the committee at any length, but I will try and imitate the prudence of the mariner who, when he is tempest tossed, avails himself of the first clear sky.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Furls his sails.

Hon. Mr. KERR—And abatement of the winds to take his latitude and longitude. I have been trying, during the recess, to imitate the prudence of the mariner and to take my bearings and to see whether we are making headway or whether we are drifting from a proper course, and with all due deference to the superior judgment of my brother senators, I respectfully submit that this debate, during the greater part of the afternoon has drifted from the true line of the subject. I make this statement with the greatest possible deference and respect. I respectfully submit that the question before this committee is not whether some person or persons will be hit by this legislation, but whether the clause, as originally framed, is a wise and proper clause to be placed upon the statute book. If it is, I respectfully submit that it is the duty of this Senate, one and all, to vote for it. If it is not a wise and proper provision, it is equally the duty of this committee to vote it down. I do not suppose there ever was, or ever will be, a criminal law passed that will not hit somebody. I do not suppose there ever was a civil statute law of any kind passed that has not hit some one. I am not influenced by this local matter which, unfortunately, has come to the surface, and I regret exceedingly it has. Before I had the slightest knowledge of the case that has been brought up here, as one having had for thirty-five years very considerable experience as Crown prosector in assisting the court to administer the criminal law, I felt that such a clause as has been proposed by the Minister of Justice would be a wise and proper clause, based upon a sound principle, and although I have heard that it may affect one particular case, for the life of me I cannot see how it can affect my duty as to the vote I shall give. I am not reflecting upon anybody, I am only speaking for myself, I am not criticising the manner or the matter of the speeches in this debate. I listen with the greatest possible respect to all who speak pro and con upon any question, and especially to those who may differ from me in the views which I hold, because therein I get greater information by hearing opposing views than I do in hearing those that are in harmony with my own. I just fear that this committee, by the course of the debate this afternoon, has lost sight of its true functions as a committee. We must always bear in mind that in this matter we are here as legislators, law makers, not administrators of the law. Now I think that is a sound principle, and as at present advised I shall vote in line with that view. The House will pardon me when I say that I shall assume, for the sake of argument, that there is a contract and, without prejudice, as the lawyers say, I will refer to the contract. It will not affect my vote one iota. My contention is that this committee has nothing to do, in considering the wisdom or unwisdom of that clause, with that contract. That is a matter for the proper court, and we are not sitting here as an Exchequer Court.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We say that too.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I do not make myself a judge of the Exchequer Court. If I should ever do so—and I do not expect I ever shall—I will expect to receive respectful consideration. I am sorry that it is even insinuated that this legislation is aimed at one individual. I have a perfect horror of that kind of thing, and if I conscientiously believed that that clause was aimed at one individual, and not at a class, in like case offending, I would join in voting it down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Mr. Mulock says so in his letter.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I have not heard it. I am speaking now on the principle of the thing. In discussing whether Mr. Burland—I think that is the name of the gentleman—is right or wrong, that does not influence me, and cannot by any possibility assist us in coming to a conclusion whether that clause ought or ought not to be on the statute-book. If Mr. Burland is doing wrong—I do not assume that he is—he ought to be hit. If he is not doing wrong, he will not be hit under this legislation.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—For whom are we legislating? For the individual or the public?

Hon. Mr. KERR—There is an old Latin maxim which I shall give in English "the safety of the people should be the supreme law." I shall be guided by that maxim in any course that I take. The point I want to make is that in discussing this matter we should discuss it on principle, as legislators, and not have before our minds any one case that this is said to be aimed at. I cannot believe that it is aimed at any one man. I have reason to believe, from all I have heard, that Mr. Burland, who may be hit by this legislation, is a highly respectable man. I have heard the name, but have never met him. If he was in the Senate chamber now, I would not know him, but I think there should be fair play between the Crown and the public.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, Hear! So we do.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I believe if Mr. Burland is here he will consider I am his real friend. If I had the settlement of this matter between Mr. Burland and the government, I would say, "Mr. Burland, I do not believe you ought to keep this property. It ought not to be in your possession any longer than the contract continues." I would turn round and say to the government, I have that property, now give me a cheque payable to the order of Mr. Burland for the amount of the claim which you admit, and then in addition to that give me a fiat so that Mr. Burland can test in the Exchequer Court his claim for any balance.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—If the government will do that I will vote for the clause.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The government will not do that.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I make the suggestion, and I hope it will be acted on. I am a lawyer. I entirely agree with the English practice as expounded by the opposition. I think in almost every case a fiat should be granted. If I were a member of the government, I would give my vote every time, unless it was apparently a most frivolous thing, so that the subject would have the fullest opportunity to claim his rights.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I think that Mr. Burland is acting against his own interests. One hon. senator said that he could not apply for a fiat so long as he withholds that property. That is an error. Of course the hon. gentleman, not being a professional lawyer, might naturally take that view. If he has a right to hold that property, that property is not held by him as payment. It is considered by him to be security, but the law of lien comes in here and, according to my view, the law of lien could not be appealed to by him as an excuse for withholding that property, which may be used for improper and for very dangerous purposes outside of the control of the government. I am not risking my professional reputation on this point, but I should be surprised to find that there is a lien of that kind on property for any claim that a party may think he has against a government claiming possession of it. In certain cases lawyers have liens on title deeds. The man that saws up lumber for his neighbour has lien on the lumber until he is paid for sawing it. The miller that grinds grain for a man has a lien on the grist until he is paid, if he does not take toll. According to the statute law, a man has a lien under certain circumstances, that is, the right to keep possession of the property until he is settled with; but I respectfully submit that from now to the end of this session, every senator in this committee will look in vain for any law which will say that under the circumstances, Mr. Burland has a lien on this property until he is settled with. If I were a minister of the Crown, as I never shall be——

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—You do not know about that.

Hon. Mr. KERR—If I were a minister or an ex-minister of the Crown, and if I had any doubt as to the propriety of Mr. Burland's conduct, I would say that my duty to Her Majesty, where the subject will be amply protected without the possession of that property would be to uphold the dignity of Her Majesty, and insist, as her servant, on having control of that dangerous property. I wish I had Mr. Burland's ear for five minutes, I would say "Mr. Burland, the sooner you give up possession of that property the better. You can hand it over and say that you do so under protest and without prejudice. It will not collect your debt if you hold it in your possession until doomsday. What you want is money; you do not want that property, it is of no use to you. As a security it is useless." Probably Mr. Burland has been advised to take the view that by holding these things it will force the government to give him a fiat. I hope the government, for the credit of the government, will be influenced by higher motives than that. If I were a member of the government I would scorn an idea of that kind. If I granted a fiat, I would grant it from principle, and because I believed it to be right; and if I withheld it, I would withhold it because I believed it was right to do so. I should be very sorry to see either this amendment or the amendment to the amendment carried; I could not think of supporting the latter. Of course, if the Minister of Justice is satisfied with the modification which his amendment would give to the original clause, I would vote for it. But I would rather vote fairly and squarely and say that I vote for the clause itself as a principle—I would either sustain the law or reject it. I repeat, with all due respect, I think Mr. Burland, by withholding that property, is acting against his own interests, and I am satisfied, if this clause does pass in its present form if the contract is as alleged—I have not examined it and I do not want to examine it, I assume it has been correctly interpreted—but if it does give him a right to hold that property, it does not prevent him applying for a fiat at once, and he cannot be hurt, because he could plead that contract. Supposing an indictment was found against him and he pleaded not guilty, do you suppose that any court would convict him of wrongdoing if the contract goes as far as it is said to go? I do not want to discuss the contract. I do not think we have any business discussing it here. As soon as we begin to talk about particular cases and particular contracts, that moment we depart from our true functions as legislators and constitute ourselves judges of an Exchequer Court, I repeat that by passing this clause as originally framed, the committee would not and could not prejudice Mr. Burland, either in regard to his civil rights or in regard to his position in the possible event of criminal proceedings being instituted against him for withholding that property, and I consider I would be his best friend if I advised him to give up that property to-morrow, I would with equally strong voice, a voice that the government might hear reverberating in their ears, say that they should give Mr. Burland a fiat, pay him what they admit they owe him, and let them fight it out in the Exchequer Court as to the balance of it. I refuse to listen to the arguments that have been addressed to us of a dispute between the Postmaster General and Mr. Burland. I have nothing to do with that as a legislator. I have to do with making laws, and I will make laws, so far as I can, in the light of my intelligence and in the light of my conscience, and in no other respect.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Would the hon. gentleman go so far as to say that members of this House should deal with legislation entirely on general principles—that they should close their ears and eyes to individual cases, when we have documentary evidence placed in our hands, and uncontradicted, that the legislation is designed to injure private interests? Are we to throw that aside and deal entirely with general principles? Legislation in this House is surrounded by evidence on certain points which you cannot ignore, and you cannot always go on general principles.

Hon. Mr KERR—If that document were handed to me, I would say "I sympathize with you, but you should go to the Exchequer Court where you will find justice."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C)—But he cannot go there.

The clause was withdrawn.

On clause 520, subsection 2.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This particular subsection was rejected by the Senate in 1897. Subsection 2 is as follows:—

2. Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

Speaking solely for myself, I do not see that the subsection is necessary. What are the offences that are mentioned in the section?

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any other person, or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company unlawfully.

(a) To unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce.

A combination for their own reasonable protection could not affect that.

(b) To restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity.

I do not see how a trade union could very well do that.

(c) To unduly prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture or production of any such articles or commodity, or to unreasonably enhance the price thereof.

Hon. gentlemen will notice that the words "unduly and unreasonably" are put in. Any reasonable action by a trade union would not make them liable under this clause.

(d) To unduly prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation or supply of any such article or commodity, or in the price of insurance upon person or property.

I do not see how that would apply specially to trade unions, and that being the case, the trade unions not standing in any different relation to these offences from what other bodies do, I do not see why any special provision should be inserted here intended to protect them from being held to have violated this clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is to make the law more clear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Senate in 1897 did not think there was any necessity for this subsection.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The opinion has been expressed that trade unions and other organizations of labourers would be amenable to the provisions of this Act. That is the opinion of some very eminent counsel, and it is with a view to remove all doubt on the matter. My hon. friend does not complain that the principle is wrong.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not say that I do not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What I understand the hon. gentleman to argue is that there is nothing in this section which will touch these people, and therefore this clause is unnecessary. I say it is a mere matter of precaution. It removes all doubt as to a matter which is open to controversy among eminent lawyers, and it is proper, unless it is desired to bring them under the provisions of the Criminal Law, and that has not been sought. There are anomalies in this section which I think might be removed but which I did not think it worth while to touch. For instance, looking at the main part of this section, it says: "With any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company unlawfully," to do what? To "unduly limit." That is absurd. It is unlawful to limit, and that word "unduly" has no business there. Take section c to unlawfully, "to unduly prevent." That is not sense either, and is open to the same objection. Then take, further on, subsection c, "to unlawfully, unreasonably enhance." Those are anomalies in the section which might be corrected, but which I did not think it worth while to interfere with. They have been inserted sometime by some persons in committee who were anxious to give adequate protection to those who were forming combines, and they thought that by putting in these words they would give protection that otherwise would not exist. But that is not so. They are a surplusage and, as a matter of art, ought not to prevail.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You could, under clause a, limit the facilities, and it is just so with each of the others.

You say "unduly prevent." You might, if you struck out "unduly," make it a crime to limit the manufacture, &c., but this provides for "unduly" doing an act, whatever that may mean.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But my hon. friend is losing sight of the word "unlawfully." Supposing you read it this way "unlawfully to limit"

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then you would require a section to declare what was lawful and unlawful. A man might limit the sale of an article or combine for that purpose, and you might ask "has he done that lawfully or unlawfully?"

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that if "unlawfully" is left in "unduly" should be struck out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it be wrong for any person to limit the facilities for transportation, to restrain and injure trade and commerce, &c., is it not equally wrong on the part of a combine no matter of what character? Would it be right for one combine, composed of a particular class of men, and wrong in another class? Because the exemption proposed would give a right to a certain class of the community to do what another class of the community is prevented from doing.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is mistaken in that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You go on and say that it is an indictable offence to do certain things unduly or unlawfully. Then you exempt a certain class. If we are to consider it logically at all, you make that right in one class of the community which you make a crime punishable in another class. I think the position taken by the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Power) is correct—if it is wrong it should apply to everybody. I agree with the minister that the wording of the clause is rather inartistic.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The word "unlawfully" should come out, or the other word. My hon. friend will see that subsection 2, from my point of view, does not stand in exactly the same position as the other. It is a limitation also. If a man undertakes to deprive another of employment, that may be outside of the rule altogether. All this clause does is to protect from the operation of this Act combinations of working men or employees who are acting for their own reasonable protection. It does not go beyond that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They would not be prevented from obstructing that which was for their protection, and if they thought it was for their protection to prevent a man doing a certain thing, they would do it. I would suggest to my hon. friend to accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax and drop it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The preceding sections in this part of the Criminal Code show that this subsection is unnecessary. The committee must feel that those sections amply protect anything legitimate that is done by a trade union, and this section 520 is dealing with a different subject—dealing rather with the combines of railways, steamship companies and so on; and bringing trade unions or combinations of working men into this section is a mistake. I do not think it is called for.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—If this clause passes now, what will be the fate of the bill of which the hon. gentleman from Halifax has charge, which is on the order for Wednesday? This is the clause which it has reference to, and we cannot pass on it again very well.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—This appears to prove one thing, that this bill has not received, up to the present time, that careful consideration from the department that it should have had before it was brought in here. The very fact of that word "unlawfully" being in this clause shows that there was not sufficient care taken in the preparation of the bill. We see the effect of it now. A great many changes and propositions have been submitted. It cannot be avoided on the part of those who are not members of the government, but coming from members of the government, it shows how crude the bill is. The same objection applies to the Companies Act. There was scarcely a clause of that bill but the Minister of Justice had long and involved amendments to make to it and it was almost impossible for the committee to get at the meaning of those amendments. I do not say the Minister of Justice is altogether responsible for these bills. He is a very busy member of the government, but it is a reflection on the officials under him who have not properly prepared this bill before submitting it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman cannot have read the bill when he makes the statement he does. This makes no change in the law that has been on the statute-book for years.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE.—The Criminal Law has been changed every year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been unchanged since 1892. This government had nothing to do with it at that time, and I know that this House examined it very carefully seven years ago. The only change in this section is the addition of subsection 2 in order to relieve trade unions of the impression that the preceding section was aimed at them. I do not think it is myself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The word "unlawfully" in the first subsection is clearly unnecessary. When we pass this clause forbidding a thing, we make it unlawful. We had a good deal of discussion on the word "unduly" when the original measure was going through. It was felt in the Senate—there was a motion to strike out the word "unduly"—that it would be improper to make any reasonable attempt to limit production—to make that a penal offence, and the word "unduly" was retained there just to meet that case; but the word "unlawfully" has no use there at all, and I move to strike it out.

The amendment was agreed to

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think subsection 2 ought to be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think that subsection 2 ought to be there, and I move that it be stricken out.

Hon Mr. MILLS—Then the whole section should go out. The hon gentleman will see that the whole section is introduced for the purpose of this amendment and with all due deference to my hon. friend from Halifax, and my hon. friend opposite, in the opinion of very eminent counsel, this section is necessary to remove doubts. Let me say this, further, there can be no harm. If any hon. gentlemen think that the working men ought to be made liable to prosecution for combining, then that is a reason for striking it out, but if the Senate thinks they ought to have the power to combine to protect themselves through unions, that do not affect the rights of others, then the section ought to be there.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They have plenty of power now.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—You say it is unlawful and you say it does not apply to the workman. The word "unduly" is there. You say that nobody can do a thing "unduly," but yet this clause does not apply to workmen.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think there is any necessity for striking out the clause. The hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Power) has made the clause more sensible by striking out the word "unlawful."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will leave the clause in as it is amended.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And leave out subsection 2?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I think the House should pay some attention to the views I expressed on the clause. If I had received no letters or communications from judges and lawyers, I would not make any proposition to amend the section at all. If my hon. friend opposite (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), or my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Power), say that workmen ought to be subject to protection, then I can understand the position, but when they say that that clause is all right without this, then I beg to differ from their views.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have very great respect for the hon. gentleman's opinion legally, and also the opinion of the judges, but I take quite a different view from him. I do not think any class of men should be entitled to do wrong. If it is wrong in one man it is wrong in another. If it is wrong for a combination of grocers to raise the price of sugar, it would be equally wrong for workmen to combine to do the same thing. No class of men ought to be relieved of the penalties of the law when they commit a wrong. That is the ground I take. I do not dispute what the hon. gentleman says, but I regard this as class legislation. It is legislation permitting some people to do what you prevent others doing. I have expressed myself that way to workmen who were on strike, and they did not seem to mind it, but rather admired the courage of telling them. I do not believe in exemption for any person.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are losing sight of the fact recognized in this age in Great Britain, the United States and Canada, that while certain combinations are against the law, yet workmen have been allowed to combine for their protection so long as they do not interfere with others. Take the strike on the Grand Trunk Railway the other day. Everybody admitted that it was a proper combination in order that they might force a higher rate of wages, so long as they did not interfere with the company engaging men. That is the only point.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I agree with the hon. gentleman there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are not allowed to threaten or intimidate any other persons who choose to work, but their own combination is strictly legal in the United States, Great Britain and Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have expressed my views and am not particular.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Do I understand that it is thought that there is no objection to a combination of workmen unduly limiting the transporting, &c., or unduly limiting the manufacture or production of such an article?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Because if the object is not to enable combinations of workmen to do that, why is subsection 2 put there?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Either that subsection does not apply, or if it does apply, it should not be there.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think it does apply, and should be there. Certain parties are forbidden to unduly limit, to unduly restrain or unduly prevent certain things. The insertion of clause No. 2 is a declaration that workmen, by combining for their own reasonable protection as employees, do not do the things complained of in this section. It is perfectly true a factory may be closed up by the workmen striking, and that strike may, in the ordinary sense and apart from the clause being inserted in it, unduly prevent the production of a particular article. It may have the effect of every one of these things stated in the section, but subsection 2 says that this shall not apply to the workman, that he shall have the liberty, for the purpose of protecting himself and other employees. It is not to be considered as unduly doing anything, because we declare it is not; otherwise it might be so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I contend that the sections of the existing law, which I read a short time ago, fully meet that case.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think they do.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We are entitled to our own opinions about the matter, and what gentlemen outside have written does not necessarily bind us. The section reads:

> The purposes of a trade union are not, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, unlawful.

Then section 518 reads:

> No prosecution shall be maintainable against any person for conspiracy in refusing to work with or for any employee or workman, or doing any act or causing any act to be done for the purpose of trade combination, unless such offence is punishable by statute.

And 519 defines what a trade combination is. The language of this section 520 is guarded enough. It does not say that it is a penal offence to limit the facilities for transporting, but to unduly limit them. My hon. friend refers to the Grand Trunk Railway strike. There was trouble 20 years ago on the Grand Trunk Railway, and the then Minister of Justice felt it necessary to introduce stringent legislation to prevent the stickers interfering with transportation, and really I think the trade combinations have fair play now in most ways, and I do not see why we should single them out for special legislation here.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman thinks this immunity is altogether given in other sections. That is not my opinion. But if it were so, then this can certainly do no harm.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know. I think the Minister of Justice himself has given the very best reason why it should not be there. If I understood him, he said that the workmen might, for their own protection, by means of a strike, stop the manufacture of an article and shut up the factory. Is that what I understood him to say?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Well, if that be wrong in another class of people, if it be wrong in a number of manufacturers to shut up a shop in order to enhance the price and it is punishable, would it not be equally wrong for the workmen to shut it up by a strike and thereby prevent the production of the article, and by that means raise the price?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, not at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it is right in the one and not in the other. It is right in the one because he does it to increase his wages, and enhances the price to the consumer just the same. And you say it is wrong for the manufacturer to do it because it raises the price to the consumer. I am glad my hon. friend called my attention to the action of Mr. Blake at the time of the Grand Trunk Railway strike. I remember the position I took at the time, much to the disgust of some of those with whom I was acting. I endorsed the action of Mr. Blake and suggested going further in the protection of life and property. There were those who took the view of what they supposed to be in the interest of the workmen. What I said then I say now. I said it looked like pandering for votes, and it seems to me this clause is for the same purpose.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not accuse my hon. friend of that. He may be looking at it from a legal standpoint.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I believe ninety-nine one-hundreths of this legislation is for the purpose I have indicated. I took the same view at the time of the discussion in the Commons, and I hold the same view now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is a very important matter and the discussion is not personal to the present minister, because the discussion arose on the bill introduced by Sir Oliver Mowat and rejected by this House. One should read it carefully. The clause reads:

Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees.

That is a wide and sweeping declaration to begin with.

For their own reasonable protection.

I put this view to the committee: suppose that a combination of workmen have gone further than any ordinary man would say was reasonable. Suppose that the Attorney General of the province of Ontario has some of these men indicted for what they have done. Suppose these men come up for trial before a jury, composed perhaps largely of members of trades unions. Then the question will be as to what is their own reasonable protection, and my own view is that it would be difficult indeed in cities to secure a conviction of any workman in a case of this kind. I think it is class legislation and, therefore, undesirable.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I move that the clause be struck out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I hope my hon. friend will not persist in that motion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will say no more about it. I do not think it is right, but I do this without prejudice. Let the clause be carried.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 687.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has been suggested to me by a lawyer who has had a great deal of practice, that certain words should be inserted after the word "witness" in the ninth line. The clause reads:

Taken in the presence of the person accused or that he or his counsel or solicitor had a full opportunity of cross-examining the witness.

And the suggestion is to add the following:—

And that the party proposing to use such depositions, whether the Crown or private person, is not responsible for the absence of such witness through carelessness or otherwise.

I think he refers to the case where a person knowingly has got a witness out of the way. We know, from what has transpired during the last few months in certain election trials, that witnesses have been got out of the way and the trials have been dropped, when it was known that violations of the law had taken place, and this makes the provision that where it has not been done through connivance or carelessness the deposition may be used. I merely make this suggestion to the minister. I will give him my copy of the bill with the suggestion in it, and he can consider it. It might be added at the third reading if thought necessary.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The only expression to which that amendment could apply is "or is absent from Canada," and the idea is to amend the clause so that it should not be done by collusion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the intention of the proposed amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is another point to which I respectfully direct the attention of the minister. It is hardly enough to prove that the deposition was taken in the presence of the person accused, and that he or his counsel or solicitor had a full opportunity of cross-examining the witness. If the counsel or solicitor had a full opportunity I think it is perfectly proper that the deposition should be used, but the accused may be an ignorant or nervous man or woman, and it may be read in his or her presence, and he or she may not know how to cross-examine. I am not saying that I am opposed to this amendment, but it might be worth while for the Minister of Justice to consider whether it would be fair to bind a timid or ignorant accused person just simply because he or she had not knowledge or nerve enough to cross-examine the witness.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the law at the present time, that if a person is called as a witness, say at his preliminary hearing, before a justice of the peace and gives testimony, and a person dies or leaves the country, or is unable to give testimony at a later period, that the testimony so given may be used at the trial. That is a question which has given rise to a very great deal of controversy in the province of Ontario—as to whether that is conducive to the proper administration of justice. If the person is represented by counsel and has an opportunity of cross-examining the witness and the evidence is properly taken, then, of course, there can be no objection in the world to using the evidence. But, if the accused is ignorant of his rights and has no counsel, then it is extremely doubtful whether it is in the interest of the administration of justice that that testimony should be used, because it might be that upon cross-examination, or a full record of the testimony, the result might be altogether different. A very distinguished counsel in Ontario, Mr. Johnston, recently wrote an article or two in one of the law journals of Toronto on this subject, pointing out that sometimes the magistrate does not take more than the merest summary of the evidence, that sometimes the summary is not accurately taken. He has no skill in condensing evidence and preserving its general outline, and the garbled statement which he has recorded upon the preliminary examination or trial of the party is used, although in the first place the evidence is inaccurately taken, and in the next place there has been no cross-examination. That, of course, is open to a great deal of discussion as to whether such testimony ought to be admitted at all or not. If the evidence has been fully taken and there has been a cross-examination of the witness by counsel, then I do not see that there would be any proper ground for its exclusion, and sometimes, on the whole, many eminent men, men with large experience at the Bar, take the opposite view from that taken by Mr. Johnston. For instance, a gentleman who was here the other day, who has been very frequently engaged in the consideration of the conduct of criminal cases on behalf of the Crown, is of the opinion that evidence taken before a magistrate, where the party cannot be produced, ought to be admitted. My own personal view has been in favour of the exclusion of evidence taken before a magistrate where there has been no cross-examination of the party.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think, after reading this memorandum given me by a lawyer, and then listening to the remarks of the hon. senior member for Halifax, (Mr. Power) that I understand what the meaning of this suggested amendment is. It only applies to persons who are absent. It is simply to provide that you are able to use that deposition, provided the parties interested are not parties to the absence of the person. I did not see its full force at the time. It seems to me to be a very good suggestion. It does not come from me, but from a barrister who has had a great deal of experience. If a party is responsible for the absence, or if he connives at the absence of a witness, then he should not be permitted to use the deposition, because the party who made the deposition is not subject to cross-examination in the witness stand.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no objection to let this clause stand for further consideration. The clause reads :

And if it is proved that such deposition was taken in the presence of the person accused, and that his counsel or solicitor had an opportunity of cross-examining, &c.

If we leave out the words "or solicitor," I think that would meet the entire case.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 760.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A difficulty arose in Nova Scotia in reference to the grand jury. The provincial legislature, by an Act passed in 1898, reduced the number of the grand jury to twelve ; and I know that some of the judges of the Supreme Court had considerable doubt as to whether the proceedings of the grand jury under that Act were quite constitutional. I do not know whether, during the late session of the legislature, the Act was amended or not, but I suppose the Minister of Justice must have had some correspondence with the Attorney General or judges of Nova Scotia in reference to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, there was correspondence, but I cannot recall what the correspondence was. The point was whether the creation or regulation of the grand jury forms a part of the constitution of the court, in which event it was under the local legislature, or part of the criminal procedure, in which event, it would be under the jurisdiction of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They were not as guarded in Nova Scotia as they were in Ontario.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 790.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire to call the attention of the minister to this clause. The addition to the clause is : He shall be remanded to jail to await the trial in the usual course." If that be adopted, it will place in jeopardy a number of respectable people who may dispute a claim, who may be charged with having done a wrong and at the same time not have done it. I will draw attention to a practical case which will illustrate what I mean. The same barrister, who has gone through this section, writes me as follows :—

Only a few days ago I defended —

This is one of the most respectable men in Belleville and it is not necessary to give the name —— —on a charge of obtaining several hogs under false pretenses.

That is the case provided for I think in this clause ——

The complainant swore he had hogs offered to this gentleman, who asked if they were of special weight. He said "Yes," that is of a special size and special weight. Then they agreed on a price and the gentleman to whom they were sold sent them to be weighed by the public weigher, the clerk of the market, who gave a ticket which when brought to the purchaser he refused to pay for them, not being of the class guaranteed, and offered the man an order to get the hogs back again.

He purchased a number of them purporting to be of a certain quality or weight. When they were weighed it was found that they did not come within the bargain, and the man refused to take them. He said to the man from whom he purchased "You can have your hogs back again as they are not in accordance with your agreement." The vendor goes to the police magistrate immediately afterwards and swears out a warrant against this man for obtaining his property under false pretenses. A barrister, defended him, and the magistrate issued the warrant, and it was shown that the hogs were not in accordance with the agreement and consequently the man was acquitted and released. Under this clause, if he could not have stood the trial immediately, a warrant having been issued for obtaining these hogs under false pretenses, he would have had to go to jail and await his trial.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He could give bail.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not say so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is understood.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not necessary to set it out. He has the right to bail.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have simply given the note as it was handed to me; but here is a practical case in which a respectable man doing business is accused of obtaining property under false pretenses, and he says "I am not guilty." If they were not ready to go on with the trial you say that he could give bail, but many an inexperienced magistrate would say "You must go to jail."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But his lawyer would at once see that he gave bail and got out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You should not place a clause on the statute-book in which there is possibility of sending a man to jail under such circumstances.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He goes to jail for all crimes, and when he is bailed out he is supposed to be still in jail. Of course, every man is liable to be bailed out.

Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman's contention is correct, that a man can get bail, why say that he shall be sent to jail?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Somebody must try him. The magistrate can not try him if he is not guilty.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The object, as shown by the note, is to take from the magistrate the power of trying a case where the accused pleads not guilty. Under section 190, as it stands in the Code, where the accused pleads guilty, as under this section, he is sentenced by the magistrate. The amendment is to take away from the magistrate the power of trial. The magistrate can only remand him to jail. It applies to cases of having stolen or obtained money under false pretenses, or of receiving property stolen, where its value exceeds ten dollars. This amendment provides that a magistrate should not try a case of that gravity if the accused pleads not guilty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But he has to go to jail.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It does not take away the right of the accused to apply for bail.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is rather to guide the magistrate in his duty.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 181.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—When we had this clause before us, Senator Drummond made a suggestion, and I have had before me from various sources the same suggestion, and I would submit to the committee an amendment to the amendment made to this clause. Instead of saying "Every one is guilty of an indictable offence, &c.," say "Every one above the age of sixteen years is guilty of an indictable offence, &c.," so as not to punish a lad for seducing a girl who is older than himself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a very serious proposition to make. A boy of sixteen may do this thing by violence.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That would be rape.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The section of the English Act to which the hon. member for Kennebec (Mr. Drummond) referred, did not wholly relieve a boy under sixteen from punishment. It empowered the magistrate, instead of sentencing him to imprisonment, to order him to be whipped. If the minister makes a provision of that kind, I have no objection to it, but to say that because the offender is under sixteen he shall go scot free, is going too far altogether.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend loses sight of the point that I have in view. Here is a girl of sixteen or nearly sixteen; the boy is fourteen years of age. A charge is brought by the girl of having been carnally known by the boy. You are treating her as absolutely innocent, and you try the boy as a criminal and send him to penitentiary for that offence. The law ought to make provision for these juveniles. The girl ought to be absolutely protected against persons over sixteen years of age, but you should not apply the same rule to a boy, whose judgment is far less mature than hers, and subject him to punishment by flogging or imprisonment, when probably he is the less offender of the two. It is right and proper to protect a girl against the importunities of one who is over sixteen years of age, but the law is more likely to be supported if you do not treat a boy as you would deal with a man having carnal intercourse with a girl younger than himself. Then, with regard to the next subsection, which deals with girls between sixteen and eighteen, I would say that everybody who is above the age of eighteen is liable to punishment, &c. It would be carrying our protection of girls a long way if we should say that a boy of fifteen is liable to be sent to penitentiary for a number of years for the seduction of a girl older than himself. The rule should be the same in both cases. When you have two offenders, a girl and a boy, both of whom are characterized by immaturity of judgment, then the kind of offence which they have committed is one which should apply to each, and that, so far, we have not considered or dealt with. We should act on common sense and rational principles, and you cannot treat a girl between sixteen and eighteen as a person so immature in judgment as to say that you will send a boy, between fourteen and sixteen, to penitentiary for having carnally known her. If there is carnal knowledge in that instance, in a majority of cases the girl would be the offender.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—That is the recognized law in France, the girl would be considered the seducer in that case. For these two classes of cases which I have mentioned, our criminal law has not yet afforded any remedy by way of punishment, and who should be punished is a matter which I think we should further consider, but I am not proposing any to-night, I am submitting the matter for the consideration of the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a member of the committee, I have no objection to the proposed change with respect to girls between sixteen and eighteen, but I do object to the other change being made unless the minister has satisfied himself that there is somewhere in the Criminal Code something to protect a girl against a forcible attempt——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is rape.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It may not quite reach the extent of rape. It is quite true if the boy is fourteen and the girl sixteen that the case may be one in which the boy ought not to be punished, but take the case of a boy nearly sixteen, who may be large for his age. There should be some way of hindering a boy between fifteen and sixteen simply running loose on the community.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The point in both cases is that you are giving to the girl absolute protection because of immaturity of judgment. That ought to be protection against somebody with mature judgment. If you say that a girl between fourteen and sixteen shall be protected against those over sixteen years of age, I think you go as far as you should, because while boys and girls who offend ought to be punished, notwithstanding immaturity of judgment, a different condition of things exists in their cases, and is worth careful thinking out. I have not thought the matter out, but I am perfectly convinced that they ought not to be included in this catagory.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is ample protection in the law as it stands for the female, even if the boy is of the age indicated by the minister, if there is force used to accomplish the object.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The consequences to the girl are much more serious than to the boy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is true, but that would not apply to a child of fourteen years.

The clause was allowed to stand.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW, from the committee reported progress and asked leave to sit again.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

WINDING UP ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (O) "An Act further to amend the Winding Up Act," without amendment. He said:—This bill was referred back again to the committee for further consideration in consequence of some representations being made by parties who were affected by it. The parties were heard by the committee and have since agreed and assented to a settlement of the matter that the bill should pass in its present shape. I read the letter from those parties who appeared here against the bill to that effect at the committee, and the bill was at once passed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under the circumstances, in the absence of Mr. Kirchhoffer, if the House has no objections I move the third reading now so as to enable the bill to be sent down to the House of Commons. It is a somewhat important bill and very many interests are involved in it and there is no amendment.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (30) "An Act respecting the Atlas Loan Company."—(Mr. Power.)

Bill (113) "An Act to incorporate the Canada Mining and Metallurgical Company, Ltd."—(Mr. McKay.)

Bill (129) "An Act respecting the General Trust Corporation of Canada and to change its name to the Canada Trust Company."—(Mr. Power, in the absence of Mr. Loughheed.)

THE USURY BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I move that the report of the committee upon Bill (J) "An Act respecting Usury," be not adopted, but that it be referred back to the Committee on Banking and Commerce to be reconsidered. The report was to have been considered yesterday but was postponed and is now upon the orders of the day, but as there may be long discussions upon bills preceding this order, I ask to be allowed to make this motion now. The discussion which took place in the committee the other day ended by a motion to adjourn this bill, the preamble of which had been accepted by a unanimous vote in this House on the second reading. A great many members of the committee were absent, only fourteen all told being at the meeting of the committee, and since then some members of this chamber have asked that it should be reconsidered, as we may have some time at our disposal, and I would urge upon this House that more time should be given to this bill, and possibly without spending very many hours at it we may be able to make a report which will commend itself to this House. I understand we are all unanimous in our desire to move in the direction of restraining the usurious rates of money lenders, and it is possible that, with a little more consideration of the bill in committee, we may agree upon a bill which would be acceptable to this House.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Of course I have no manner of objection to this bill being referred back to the committee for further consideration, but what I wish to disabuse the minds of hon. members of, if they entertain any such idea, is the suggestion that the bill was not very fully considered when before the committee the other day. I think there was a universal feeling on the part of every member of the committee, that what Mr. Dandurand aimed at achieving was in every respect a most desirable thing, namely, if possible to put a stop to some of these outrageously usurous practices that have obtained in Montreal and other parts of the country, but the committee felt that any legislation upon the subject was surrounded with difficulty, and they heard the opinion of one of the ablest lawyers representing the bankers and others when the bill was before the committee. Several business men appeared there also, and I think the very strong feeling was that the bill as it stood, was very likely not to have the effect that was intended, but that it would encourage an exceedingly large crop of lawsuits, that there would be no end of litigation arising out of the bill as it then stood. At the same time, I think the feeling was that if the object of the promoter of the bill could be achieved it would be very desirable that the measure should be passed. There has been legislation in England upon the subject and many members of the committee—I believe the Hon. Mr. Dandurand among others—thought that it would be desirable to follow as closely as possible the English Act, but there was a general impression that the bill would require to be exceedingly carefully considered and drawn up if it was to accomplish the purpose desired. It was for that reason that the committee reported as they did, simply deferring the consideration of the bill in order to give time for a more matured and considered measure to be introduced. It was not from any desire whatever on the part of the committee to prevent abuses of the kind aimed at in the bill being remedied if it could be done. I desire to impress that very strongly on the House, because it was not the intention of the committee to throw the bill out without due consideration. It was deferred for the reasons I have indicated. The further we went into the matter the more difficult we found it to frame the enactment in such a way that it would not open the door for law suits. The matter was one which the committee thought well worth being considered, and it was therefore postponed. I have no objection to the reference back to the committee, but I do not exactly see the wisdom of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I sympathize very much in what has been said by the hon. chairman of the committee, but I think there is this to be said in favour of the motion made by the hon. gentleman from Montreal; that although we know here that the motives of the committee were good, and that there was no disposition to sympathize with the persons against whom the bill was directed, that knowledge has not extended to the world outside, and the impression conveyed to the outer world has been, "that is just about what you would expect from the Senate." The members of the Senate committee are bankers and money lenders, and they think this measure is directed against themselves. I think it is desirable that that wrong impression should be removed from the mind of the public, and the best way to remove it is to try to get through this House some measure, that is if the com mittee have time, and apparently there will be time to give some little attention to the matter. It would be a good thing for the reputation of the Senate if we could pass a measure here and send it to the House of Commons, rather than let it be killed here; and then our skirts would be clear at any rate. With respect to the insufficient time for very much consideration, I cannot say that I quite agree with the hon. chairman of the committee. I had the pleasure of being present at the meeting of the committee, which was addressed by the legal gentleman to whom the hon. chairman has referred, and I felt that that gentleman's criticism of the measure which had been referred to the committee, was most destructive. But the hon. gentlemen who are members of the committee will remember that the gentleman who appeared on behalf of the banks made a reference to the English bill which has passed the House of Lords and has gone down to the House of Commons and has been amended there, which indicated that the people whom he represented would have no objection to the passage of a measure such as the English bill, which is limited in its scope to the very evil which the hon. gentleman from Montreal by his bill sought to get rid of. There is no doubt that the English measure has been very fully and fairly considered. A commission was appointed which sat for a portion of two years —the committee was appointed one session and considered the matter and took evidence, and was reappointed at the next session of the Imperial Parliament and took further evidence, deliberated and made a report and submitted the bill. With the understanding that the committee shall consider this English bill, which is limited to the purpose which the House wishes to attain, there might be no objection to having the bill go back. The committee can report a modification of the English bill as a substitute for the measure introduced by the hon. gentleman from Montreal.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE IN THE TERRITORIES BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. MILLS introduced Bill (S) "An Act to provide for the administration of criminal justice in the Territory east of Keewatin and north of Ontario and Quebec." He said:—This bill is open to the objection that it has grown out of a particular case. An Indian has committed murder in the country east of Keewatin. That territory is really included in the North-west Territories, although separated from the North-west Territories proper by the intervention of the district of Keewatin. It certainly is more convenient that a person committing a criminal offence in that territory lying west of Hudson Bay should be tried either in Manitoba or in Ontario rather than in the North-west Territories; and it is also more convenient that a person who may have committed an offence east of the Hudson's Bay should be tried in the province of Quebec.

To remove all doubt and difficulty in the matter, I have proposed this bill, by which provision is made that a person who commits crime in that territory lying about the Hudson Bay may be sent to the province of Ontario, to the province of Manitoba or to the province of Quebec for the purpose of trial, in whichever province may be most convenient. I also provide that this section shall apply to past offences as well as to future offences. A murder has been committed by an Indian in this territory, and it is better that he should be tried in Ontario than be sent to the North-west Territories for trial.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Is he a prisoner now?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Where?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He has been taken in custody in the territory. I am anxious that this bill should pass as soon as possible, so that he may be committed for trial either in Ontario or in Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Is he in jail now?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He is in custody now.

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the House will agree, I should like to have this bill read at the table. I am anxious to have the prisoner sent without delay for commitment to Ontario, in order that he may be tried.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What portion of the Territories is it the hon. gentleman refers to? Would it be north-west of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are two pieces of territory, and if the hon. gentleman looks at the North-west Territories Act, he will see that that Act embraces all the country heretofore known as the North-west Territories and Rupert's Land except Keewatin. Rupert's Land embraces that territory which now lies between the eastern boundary of Keewatin and the Hudson Bay, and it is within that territory the crime was committed. That is really in the North-west Territories. It was a mere oversight to include it; I wish to provide that crimes committed there may be tried in Manitoba, Ontario or Quebec, as the case may be.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read at length at the table.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the rules be suspended, and that the bill be read the third time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where is the prisoner now?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He is in the custody of some one, sent thither for the purpose, in the territory of Keewatin.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resumed, in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (Q) An "Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 687.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The only change I propose to make in this clause is to strike out the words "he or." Itsometimes happens that an ill-informed man is without counsel before a magistrate, and evidence is taken and he is incapable of cross-examining the party. He is unrepresented by counsel. The witness who appeared before him may have left the country before the trial and may not be present at the trial. The evidence is frequently not well taken, and it may be very different from what it would have been if the witness had been cross-examined. It is, nevertheless, used against him without any opportunity of bringing out those facts which might have completely altered the complexion of the evidence had he been subjected to cross-examination; so where there is no cross-examination I think it is better that the evidence should not be produced. I have known, myself, cases of injury done to parties where witnesses had given evidence without being subjected to cross-examination and then gone out of the country, and the evidence they had given before the magistrate has been used at the trial to the detriment of the accused, whereas had the witness been subjected to cross-examination the result might have been very different. If these two words are taken out, the section would be on the whole satisfactory. My hon. friend suggested last night that there should also be a declaration that the witness had not been sent out of the country by the party relying upon the testimony which he would have given. If he has been cross-examined by counsel, it does not matter at whose instance he has been sent away. The probability would be that what was brought out by cross-examination would be what would be brought out at the trial. With the change that I propose, the provision is one which will not injuriously affect the administration of justice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As I understand it, where a deposition has been made, and the person making it has not been examined by a solicitor, the deposition is not to be used?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

The motion was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

On section 181.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I propose to make this section read:

Every one above the age of 18 is guilty of an indictable offence, &c.

The other section will be amended to correspond. The intention is not to convict a boy for seducing a woman.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to move against the amendment, but I wish to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that there is no such provision in any existing law that I am aware of, and this provision will give a sort of license to persons between 16 and 18 to indulge in promiscuous sexual intercourse.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is to protect the boy.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We recognize the immaturity of mind on the part of girls between 14 and 16, and we give them absolute protection, but it is absolute protection against persons of mature mind--not persons who are as defective as they are themselves. Therefore, we say that every one above the age of 16 is guilty of an indictable offence who does so. And so with regard to the other age: every one above the age of 18 is guilty of an indictable offence. We recognize the want of maturity of minds and self-control in one sense as well as in the other, but you do not give them any protection in the same way that you do the girls. The further question mentioned by my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Power) is to be considered, whether it is thought desirable that the boys and girls guilty of offences of this kind between the ages of 14 and 16 shall be considered offenders against the criminal law—whether it is necessary to extend the criminal law to them. My own impression is that society would suffer no great mischief if that were to stand over for another session. What I have been thinking of, if we legislate at all, would be something in this direction:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment in a reformatory prison who, being a boy or girl above the age of 14 and under the age of 16 years, has carnal intercourse, and so on.

That would put them both in the immoral class in that regard. As a matter of fact they are, and it would render them liable to be sent to a reformatory for a period of time for the purpose of correction. I am not moving that amendment to-day; I think it is not a pressing evil like the other. As to the other provisions, we have had representations from all the large cities in respect of the other offences showing that girls need protection, but that protection is not against lads. It is protection against persons of mature years. And the clause as it now stands, and as the amendments have been made, I think will give adequate protection on practical and not sentimental grounds. In my opinion if we carry this clause as it has been amended, there will be a strong disposition among all the better members of this community to see the law fairly enforced.

The clause as amended was adopted.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

The order of the day being called:

Second reading Bill (133) "An Act to authorize the acquisition by the Dominion of the Drummond County Railway."—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said:—Before the hon. minister proceeds, I should like to inquire whether he has any further information to lay before the House in reference to the subject which was embodied in the motion which I made some time ago. I have been given to understand that the Grand Trunk officials have been preparing a mass of information somewhat in the direction of that which we have been asking for, I think it is well—not only well, but proper—that it should be laid before the Senate before we are asked to finally consider this very important question. I may say that my authority for the statement which I am now making is Mr. Wainwright himself, but whether that information has been prepared or not, of course I am not in a position to say.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that there has been any information prepared other than what has been brought down. I have from time to time sent over to the department for any additional information they had prepared. I have received none beyond the figures that I referred to the other day, showing the increased earnings of the Intercolonial Railway since its extension to Montreal. Beyond that I have received no further information. I shall be glad to make the inquiry now that the hon. gentleman has referred to the subject. If they had anything prepared I am quite sure they will lay it on the table, I heard only to-day that Mr. Wainwright was in town, and if he has given the department any additional information, I shall be only too glad to have it laid on the table.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That will be as much as we would expect the hon. gentleman to do. But I am merely repeating what the gentleman told me himself—that he had had a number of clerks busy preparing, not all the information which we have been asking for, but information which is in that direction, to show not what the earnings or what the expenses of the government have been, but, as I understood him, the freight and business that they had given the road. Whether that is business that would not otherwise have been given to it or not, I cannot say. However, I have no objections to proceeding.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All I can say is that I shall be glad to communicate with the Department of Railways immediately, so that if they have any information in addition to what has been furnished, it will be brought down to-morrow. The bill will be some time before the House, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It will be brought down before the bill goes a stage further?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That will relate to the Grand Trunk contract more than this.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Does it not refer to the Drummond County?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Incidentally it does.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Most particularly I should say.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move the second reading of Bill (133) "An Act to authorize the acquisition by the Dominion of the Drummond County Railway." In moving the second reading of this bill, I feel that it is unnecessary to remind hon. gentlemen that the subject is one that two years ago, when before this chamber, was very thoroughly discussed, when the government proposed to acquire the Drummond County Railway, under different conditions to those that are set out in the bill now before the House. At that time, as hon. gentlemen are aware, it was proposed to pay for 99 years an annual sum of $64,000 for the Drummond County Railway proper, and $6,000 for the connections at the Chaudière.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That was not to the Drummond County Railway?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, for the use of the Grand Trunk section, from Chaudière Junction to Lévis. The object the government had in view was, not to increase the public debt of this country, but to make the Intercolonial Railway responsible for the additional charge of securing an entry into the city of Montreal. It was thought and believed that the one payment would have exhausted the amount proposed to be paid for the railway without in any way taxing the consolidated revenue funds of the country. This House, however, took a different view, and the general expression of opinion was that a much better bargain might be made by purchasing the road out and out. A good deal of discussion took place on figures furnished by actuaries and accountants to show that by the parties selling the property, the proposed annuity they would realize more than the government had contemplated paying for the road. The proposition before the House is to acquire the road by paying $1,600,000 that formed the basis of the calculations on the former occasion. I need not here, I suppose, enlarge very much upon the importance of bringing the Intercolonial Railway to the city of Montreal. It is pretty well conceded by all those who have given thought to the subject that in order to make the Intercolonial pay its way at all it is necessary to bring it to the important commercial centre of the Dominion. In the city of Montreal the canal system converges, together with the leading railways of the country, the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway and I believe in the near future the Ottawa and Parry Sound Road, which is now, as hon. gentlemen are aware carrying very considerable amounts of grain to the eastern seaboard from Parry Sound. I will only quote the authority of the gentleman who formerly was the Minister of Railways and Canals in giving his evidence before the committee that assembled in another House with a view of inquiring into the charges which were made that the negotiations upon which this purchase was predicted were not altogether honourable. The result of that committee was, to entirely remove the impression that I have no doubt rested in the minds of many hon. gentlemen and probably exercised an influence in deciding the vote that they gave when the original proposition was thrown out of this chamber. Mr. Haggart, in giving his evidence before the Drummond County Railway inquiry in reference to the importance of reaching Montreal gives those answers:

Q. And you thought the Intercolonial Railway should get into Montreal?—A. That was my opinion.

Q. And you think still that the Intercolonial should get into Montreal?—A. Yes.

Q. In order to make it a success it should get into a business centre like Montreal?—A. Yes, that was my idea.

Q. So it comes down to a question whether the government paid too much for the extension to Montreal?—A. Yes.

Q. So far as policy is concerned you and the present government agree on this question?—A. Yes. Mind you, that is my own individual opinion, not the opinion of the late government.

Q. It never came before the late government?—A. No.

Q. That is your opinion as Minister of Railways?—A. Yes.

Q. And as a citizen of the country?—A. Yes.

So it is clear Mr. Haggart from his experience on the administration of this railway was of the opinion that to make it a success it must have its terminal point in the city of Montreal. No doubt, any one who has given any thought to the subject, or who has inquired into the past history of the Intercolonial Railway must be very much impressed with that conclusion. I venture to say that in no part of the world has there been such an unfortunate exhibit in the administration of a railway as that of the Intercolonial Railway of Canada. I hold in my hand a table, part of which is printed in a recent report of the Minister of Railways and Canals. It is found at page 22, it gives the mileage, earnings and losses. I have asked Mr. Schreiber to give me the amounts spent on capital account in those years, and in order that hon. gentlemen may fully appreciate the position of the road they should read it. The railway was finished in the year 1877. There were 714 miles of it then in operation. It commenced with a loss that year of $507,000, and an expenditure of capital account of $1,318,000. The next year the loss was $432,000, and the expenditure on capital account was $408,000. The next year, with the same mileage the loss was $716,000, and the expenditure on capital account was $226,000. Between 1878 and 1880 the extension took place from Rivière du Loup to Lévis. The purchase was made from the Grand Trunk Railway. In that year the mileage added was 114 miles, and the loss was $97,000. The amount spent on capital account was $2,048,000. I presume a part of that was the purchase of this extension. In a letter that I had from Mr. Schreiber he gave me the figures between the amount paid and the amount required to bring the railway up to the standard of the Intercolonial. It was $20,000 a mile. I presume that $2,000,000 represents the purchase of the road. In 1891, with an increase of 11 miles, there was a profit of $542, and the expenditure charged in that year to capital account $608,000. The next year it is credited with $9,000 of a profit, and about $585,000 was spent on capital account. The next year there was a profit of $10,000 and the amount spent on capital account was $1,616,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can you inform the House what was purchased that required to be charged to capital account?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the three years I have been quoting the mileage is the same, 840 miles.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Were there not small extensions through those years?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, in 1881 the 14 miles known as the St. Charles branch was purchased. That cost $1,700,000. The 14 miles cost more than the 133 miles now proposed to be acquired from the Drummond County Railway Company. In 1883, with a mileage of 840 miles, which included in that year the St. Charles branch the profit professes to be $10,000, but there was charged to capital account $1,616,000. In 1884 there was an increase in mileage from 840 to 887 miles. The profits were put down at $6,000, but there was charged to capital account $2,689,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does that include the eastern extension to Cape Breton?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know; but 47 miles were added in that year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It must have been that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In 1885 the mileage was 941. It had been slightly increased. The loss that year was $78,000, and the amount charged to capital account was $1,247,000. The next year there were 5 miles added, making the whole line with its branches 946 miles. The loss that year was $133,000, and there was charged to capital account $680,000. The next year, 1887, the mileage was increased by 20 miles—some branch, I suppose. The loss that year was $262,000, and the amount charged to capital account was $923,000, considerably over $1,000,000 that year of a deficit. The next year, 1887-88, there was a mileage of 971. The loss was $383,000, and there was charged to capital account $1,712,000. That was $2,000,000 of a loss that year. In 1897, with the same mileage, 971 miles, the loss was $276,000, and the charges to capital account was $2,613,000, $3,000,000 of a loss, although no mileage seems to have been added. That was the actual loss that year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a great pity the hon. gentleman has not made himself acquainted with the reasons which caused the expenditure. There may have been charges to capital account which should have been charged to current expenses.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is all the same. I give the hon. gentleman the whole loss.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not know whether my hon. friend has looked into another feature. I think there were considerable payments to the government of Nova Scotia on their claim in connection with the Eastern Extension.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was made many years before.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, it was in the same years that the hon. gentleman has been dealing with.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At the same time the Intercolonial Railway was opened the Eastern Extension was acquired from New Brunswick, at a cost of $24,000 a mile. Probably my hon. friend will recollect it. The government of the day were not satisfied with the condition of the road, and they said they would build a new line unless the New Brunswick Government accepted that sum, which was taken as the probable average of what the railway was to cost.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not understand that that is what is called the Eastern Extension. Is not that the road from Moncton to St. John?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are two Eastern Extensions.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is the Eastern Extension in Nova Scotia I am speaking of.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no increase in mileage. In 1889 the loss was $276,000, and there was charged to capital account $26,613,000. That was a loss of $3,000,000 that year, with no increase of mileage. In 1890, with no increase of mileage, the loss was $547,000, and there was charged to capital account $1,969,000—two and a half millions of dollars added that year, without any increase in the mileage. The following year there was an increase in the mileage from 971 to 1,094 miles. Hon. gentlemen who are familiar with the lower provinces will know what caused that increase. The loss was $684,000, and the amount paid on capital account was $950,000. In 1892, with the mileage increased practically to what it is to-day, 1,142 miles, the loss was $493,000, and there was expended on capital account $316,000. In 1893, with 1,142 miles in operation, it showed a profit of $20,000, but there was charged on capital account $296,000, and in 1894, with the same mileage practically, there was a profit of $5,000, but there was charged to capital account $437,000. In 1895, there was a profit of $3,000, and the expenditure on capital account was $327,000. In 1896, with 1,142 miles in operation, there was a loss of $55,000, and there was charged to capital account $259,000. In 1897, the mileage had been increased from 1,142 to 1,148. The loss was $59,000, and there was charged to capital account $149,000. In 1897-98 the loss was $209,000, and charged to capital account $252,000. Taking a short review of that—taking the last fourteen years from 1885, when its connections had all been made practically, the whole amount spent on capital account was $17,000,000, the losses were $4,891,000. In that time there were 207 miles of road built. If you credit the lines built at $20,000 a mile, you deduct from a little over $4,000,000, and the excess of losses over profits, and you have a deficit of $11,000,000 in the running of the Intercolonial Railway in 14 years. In view of this fact, hon. gentlemen will at least concede this, that it was better to make the experiment of bringing the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, if by any possibility so disastrous a showing could in a few years be averted. We believe if any hon. gentleman who gives it a thought must recognize that the advantages in reaching a commercial centre like Montreal, where so large an amount of traffic of the Dominion of Canada centres, and is distributed, must be convinced that the Intercolonial Railway must in the future obtain, after it has succeeded in making its arrangements, a very much better position than it has attained in the past. It is almost too soon, of course, to judge of the results. I brought down, a few days ago, and laid on the table of this House a memo. of the working expenses up to March of the present year, and had them compared with the running expenses of the preceding ten months, and they showed very favourably since the line has been working to the city of Montreal. In the last few days I secured from the department the working expenses for March and April, and the result is that it continues to show an improvement on the figures of the corresponding months of the previous years. Hon. gentlemen have asked, and on behalf of this House I asked the department to furnish me with a statement showing what might be fairly credited to the Drummond County Railway. I was advised that owing to the manner in which the accounts were kept, it is quite impossible, as no special traffic was credited to that line. I can quite appreciate that that might be so. The value per se of the Drummond County Railway would, no doubt, be very small, but as a channel to reach the city of Montreal, it was invaluable to the country, and very much more so to the earnings of the Intercolonial Railway. When hon. gentlemen questioned the correctness of the answer I gave when I said I was informed by the officials of the department that the information could not be supplied, I wrote this letter to Mr. Schreiber:

DEAR MR. SCHREIBER,—In the discussion on the Drummond County Railway Bill the leader of the opposition in the Senate, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, has pressed for some information on the advantages, if any, that have resulted in the connection with Montreal via the Drummond County line.

In answer to an address for that information some few weeks ago I was advised that as the accounts of the Intercolonial Railway were not kept separately it was impossible to say what amount should be credited to the Montreal extension. Perhaps you would inform me by letter whether the specified information asked for can possibly be obtained, and if if not, can you and Mr. Pottinger, with the experience of the past year, give me your opinion of the advantages or disadvantages likely to arise from the increased expenditure in extending the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway from Lévis to Montreal via the Drummond County Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) R. W. SCOTT.

C. SCHREIBER, Esq.,
Chief Engineer of Govt. Railways,
Ottawa.

I received the following reply:—

OTTAWA, 21st June.

DEAR MR. SCOTT,—We may explain that as a large portion of the traffic passing over the Drummond County Railway does not originate on that road, neither is it destined to points on that line, consequently as the accounts are not kept for sections of the Intercolonial Railway, it is not possible to give correct information of the amount to be credited to the Montreal extension, nor debited to it for maintenance and operation.

We would also state it as our opinion that the road reaching Montreal has placed us in a much better position to do business than heretofore, and we think that the result of the operations of the road for the current year is strong evidence of the advantages likely to accrue from this extension.

The earnings and working expenses for the ten months ending 30th April were as follows:—

Earnings.....	$3,063,768 34
Working expenses....	3,001,198 45
Net profit.....	$ 62,569 89

Whereas the earnings and working expenses for the twelve months of 1897-98 were:—

Earnings.....	$2,545,328 30
Working expenses....	2,580,640 20
Net loss.....	$ 35,311 90

So that the working for the ten months of the current year show improved net results over the twelve months previous of $97,881.79, but it should be borne in mind that in previous years no interest has been paid on capital, whereas in the ten months ended 30th April last, rent on the extension from Lévis to Montreal of $175,000 has been paid, and charged in the working expenses, so that if figured out on the same basis on which the Intercolonial Railway has been run in the past the result will show improved net results of $272,882, which figures speak for themselves.

We need scarcely say more.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) COLLINGWOOD SCHREIBER.
(Sgd.) D. POTTINGER.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What periods do the figures given by Mr. Schreiber cover?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Ten months.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—How much has been expended on capital account?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not the expenditure on capital account here. The profit on the operation of the railway for the ten months was $62,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are these the actual earnings and the expenses of working? How much did you spend on capital account?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot tell the hon. gentleman. The figures that they gave me brought down the expenditure on capital account to 1898. It would not be given for the present year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But you gave the amount charged to capital account in all the other years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not the figures for this year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to show that the figures, for the purpose of comparison, are absolutely useless unless you do that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That certainly compares well with the showing for the fourteen years that I quoted for the information of the hon. gentleman. It is quite evident that there is, at all events, an improvement in the Intercolonial Railway. Messrs. Schreiber and Pottinger are the two gentlemen who, for very many years, have had particular charge of this road and my letter was not addressed to the minister, but to Mr. Schreiber. He called in Mr. Pottinger and they both signed this letter, which I shall be glad to lay on the table for the information of the House. I think, in view of these facts, which are incontrovertible, the opinion, not only of this chamber, but of the people of Canada, would be that the experiment was worth the trial, and I think also it can be clearly demonstrated that the price proposed to be paid for the Drummond County Road, $1,600,000, makes it the cheapest road in Canada—the cheapest road that has ever been acquired by the government of this country.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I shall be glad if he will point out any instance where the government of Canada have acquired any railway property at anything like those figures.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—They got all the Prince Edward Island Railway for nothing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know about that. The public accounts will show that every year we are paying for the benefit of Prince Edward Island from $80,000 to $90,000. That is the cost of running the Prince Edward Island Railway over and above revenue. That is the loss to say nothing of the capital account or any other charge. So that hon. gentlemen will see that the figure we pay is a little less than that. There are 133 miles of this road, made up, as follows: From Chaudière to St. Leonard 70 miles and 73-100. From St. Leonard to St. Rosalie 45 miles and 21·100, making in all 115 miles and 94·100ths, practically 116 miles. Then there is the Nicolet branch, 17 miles, which brings the total mileage up to 132 94-100ths, practically 123 miles. It is a matter of calculation which hon. gentlemen could test the correctness of, but it is in the neighbourhood of $12,000 a mile. I say—and I say it without fear of successful contradiction—that no railway in Canada has been purchased or built by the government of Canada at any such figure. The average cost, charging the Intercolonial Railway with amounts paid on capital account, would be $48,000 to $50,000 a mile. Portions of it cost a very much larger amount; the 14 miles known as the St. Charles branch cost $1,700,000, which is more than the whole 133 miles of the Drummond County has cost.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—And the country which St. Charles branch passes through was worth more than double the country where the other road was located.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not discussing that question. But I think that will stand as the most expensive railway, and I do not know that its construction was challenged by anybody.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understood the hon. gentleman to say that in the cost of the Intercolonial Railway, he added that which was charged to capital account.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume so; capital account, but not running expenses.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is, the cost of the original construction of the road and that which has been charged to capital account since, and that it has cost so much money.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume that is it. I have not gone into that calculation. It may not be correct. I cannot vouch for that at all. But I have a letter from Mr. Schreiber stating what the St. Charles branch costs. The letter reads:—

Answering your letter of this date on the subject of the St. Charles branch, I beg to inform you that the amount of damages on the said branch, a mileage of 14 miles, was estimated at $320,000; the sum actually paid was $935,777. The cost of construction was $882,000. Total, $1,758,541.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not catch the amount that it cost per mile for the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not state that with any accuracy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What have you stated?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My own impression, from past reading of it, is that it cost about $48,000 a mile. I do not state that as a fact, because I do not know. In considering the subject of the Intercolonial Railway, one of the reasons, I have no doubt, why in the past it has proved such an unfortunate investment, as far as the financial aspect was concerned, to the people of Canada was, no doubt, the extension of the Short Line. This country paid pretty liberally for that, to make it a competitor of the Intercolonial Railway. This country is now paying annually for that portion of the road in the state of Maine, from the international boundary to Matawampka, a distance of about 150 miles, an annual subsidy of $115,500. We are paying a subsidy of $71,000 for that portion in Canada, making a total of $186,000 which we are paying annually, and which we deliberately decided to pay annually to a line which is a competitor to the Intercolonial Railway. It no doubt, in some degree, explains why the Intercolonial Railway has been so unfortunate in its financial statement. I think that I have shown pretty clearly that the Intercolonial Railway has been a very expensive road to the people of Canada in the past, from the information derived from the two gentlemen who are best calculated to give an unbiassed opinion. We have their unbiassed opinion that that state of things will be removed by the extension of the road to the city of Montreal. Certainly Mr. Pottinger and Mr. Schreiber are the two men who have been most intimately connected with the Intercolonial Railway, who are best able to give an opinion on its future prospects of reaching Montreal through the Drummond County Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. I have here a memorandum of the mileage from Lévis to Montreal by the three lines—the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Drummond County Railway. By the Grand Trunk, which, as hon. gentlemen know, reaches Lévis by way of Richmond, the distance is 174 miles. By the Canadian Pacific Railway the distance is 172 miles, and by the Drummond County Railway the distance is 161 miles. With that advantage in the way of distance, the road ought certainly to prove a powerful competitor with the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. Hon. gentlemen probably are aware, from seeing the cars here, that the rolling stock has been very considerably improved, with a view of developing the traffic from Montreal eastward, and if I am correctly advised, they were amply justified in the increased growth of traffic that resulted from placing that superior quality of rolling stock upon the road.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think we ought to adopt this motion just now. I desire to make a suggestion to the hon. gentleman which I hope he will accept, that after having made the statement he has, he will consent to an adjournment of this debate, for two reasons: first, to enable him to ascertain whether the information to which I have referred can be procured and laid upon the table, to enable us to come to a somewhat better conclusion as to the course the Senate should take; and, in the second place, that the second reading of the bill providing for the leasing of the Grand Trunk Railway portion of the road, so as to complete the connection, could be discussed. It is impossible to deal with the simple question as to the purchase of the Drummond County section of the scheme, if I may so term it, because the proposition to-day is a very simple one, as to whether we shall pay $1,600,000 for that portion of the road which is necessary to reach the western terminus at Montreal. Now, until we have the fullest information in reference to the cost and the arrangement which has been made, traffic arrangements with the Grand Trunk Railway and other information, it is impossible to come to a conclusion such as any intelligent man would wish to arrive at before casting his vote. I think my hon. friend will see the force of what I state. Supposing the Senate were to approve of the purchase. I am not discussing the difference between the cost of the present proposition, or the advantages of the present proposition, over that which was laid before the Senate two years ago. That is not the point I desire to make. We will deal with that when the question comes up. Then we have to consider what we are to pay and what the arrangements with the Grand Trunk Railway are. I may say my reason for that is, that I want to hear some explanation—and I think the Senate desires some explanation—as to the real meaning of the traffic arrangements which have been entered into with the Grand Trunk. The Drummond Railway there is no difficulty about, because it becomes de facto the property of the Dominion. But there are provisions, particularly in the supplemental traffic arrangements which were laid before the House the other day, which are of a character that requires some serious consideration, and it may be a point with the Senate as to whether they would be prepared, even if the other portions of the bargain were acceptable, to accept it under the circumstances. My hon. friend knows, no doubt, what I mean. The traffic arrangements are tied up for ninety-nine years, which is almost in perpetuity. That return, which was brought down in answer to an address asked for by the Senate, shows that we are bound to do certain things in consideration of certain concessions made by the Grand Trunk for all time to come; and what is most objectionable to my mind—perhaps it can be removed by explanations by the Minister of Justice—is the fact that if we place upon the statute-book these two bills which are now before us, one for the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, and the other for the leasing of a part of the Grand Trunk Railway, there is no provision made for the abrogation of the arrangements to which we are bound for the whole of the ninety-nine years, unless both parties agree to it. That is a point that will require some little consideration when we discuss the question. Holding these views, and desiring to obtain that information to which I referred before the hon. gentleman began his address in the moving of the second reading, and for the reasons which I have advanced, I think it would be well that we should adjourn the debate now, and let the Minister of Justice, in whose name the other bill appears, move the second reading, and then we would be better able to discuss the whole question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no desire whatever to press the discussion on the bill unduly, and I am quite prepared to meet the wishes of the hon. gentleman, or any hon. gentleman in the chamber who make the request on the fair and legitimate grounds that they hope to obtain further information and to consider the proposal as foreshadowed in the few remarks I have been able to make. Therefore, I am quiet prepared to acquiesce in the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would suggest that it be placed on the paper to be taken up at any time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It can be placed on the order paper for to-morrow and postponed if necessary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The assistant manager of the Grand Trunk Railway told me it took eight or nine days' work on the part of his clerks to go through the figures, and it will take us some little time to examine the document.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Does the hon. minister think he will have any more information to lay before the House? I do not think he does. This session is a long one, and it is an injury to a great many members to be kept here. I think business should be facilitated as much as possible. I do not think that we will get any more information, and that this is a mere subterfuge to get the bill postponed, but I do not know.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As I understand the hon. gentleman, what he asks for is information, not with respect to the bill now under consideration, but with respect to a bill that is yet to be submitted. What the hon. gentleman is asking for is not further information with regard to this measure, but with regard to the measure relating to the contract with the Grand Trunk.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire both if I can get them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What is the information the hon. gentleman desires with respect to each? I wish to know, because I might make some effort to meet his view.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have already intimated by motion what I want, which the hon. Secretary of State says cannot be obtained. I am told that other information is coming from the Grand Trunk Railway, and I want to see how far that will bear upon the information which I have. The hon. gentleman knows well that a question of this magnitude cannot be intelligently discussed with only a portion of the scheme before the House, explained. If the bill now before us contained both propositions, as the bill introduced here two years ago did, we would have it in our power to discuss both, and it is only by mutual consent that the suggestion which I have made can be carried out.

AGREEMENT WITH GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY OF CANADA BILL.

The order of the day being called:

Second reading (Bill 138) "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal."

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the order of the day be discharged and that it be an order of the day for to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We may as well proceed with it now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—The hon. gentleman opposite has asked for certain documents which he considers very necessary for this discussion. He wants the two bills to be discussed together. We must decide yes or no whether the two bills shall be discussed and read together. The Grand Trunk Railway Agreement Bill must be read in connection with the other.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The principle of parliamentary law applicable to the case is perfectly clear. The government have dealt with two parties, with each of whom a contract has been made. There are two bills before the House for the purpose of carrying these two contracts into effect. My hon. friend asked for the postponement of this bill because he said there is connected with this other bill on the order paper information which is not under the control of the government, but which he says can be obtained from the Grand Trunk Railway. The hon. gentleman asked for the postponement of the bill which was under consideration until that information could be had, which he said would be useful in the discussion of both bills. Now, they stand for that purpose. I am willing to do almost anything to accommodate hon. gentlemen, but still, after all, as a member of the government, I propose to deal with the government measures in the way that is most convenient.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I gave two reasons. First, that that information should be brought down, and second, to enable the hon. gentleman to make his motion and explain the principles of the bill which was to lease the other railway. I put it on both grounds, and the hon. gentleman surely cannot have forgotten that two or three days ago when this question was before the Senate I pointed out the difficulty of dealing with one portion of the subject without dealing with the other, and if I am not mistaken the hon. gentleman acquiesced in the proposition which I made.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I so understood the hon. gentleman, and that is the principal reason why we should deal with this at the same time. The hon. gentleman understands the difficulty I have pointed out. Unless the hon. gentleman and the Senate are prepared to allow us to discuss both bills at the same time, you may give reasons why you oppose the purchase of the Drummond County Railway on account of defects in the arrangements with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and visa versa. Of course the bills are in the hands of the hon. gentleman himself, and he can do with this as he did with the other bills which he had under his control, drop them if he pleases. It is within his power. I am not interfering with that. I do not desire to dictate to the government what course they should pursue. I threw out the suggestion as I thought it the most reasonable one under the circumstances, and it will be remembered I also said it could only be done with the consent of the House. However, the responsibility rests with the hon. gentleman. I have already pointed out that there are, in that document to which I have referred, exceedingly objectionable clauses in reference to the binding of this country for ninety-nine years to certain traffic arrangements, and I would like to hear, before I cast my vote on the Drummond County measure, whether that provision can be explained to the satisfaction of the Senate and the country. That is my reason, and I think it is a good one.

The motion was agree to.

WINDING UP ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill (31) "An Act to amend the Winding Up Act."—(Mr. Mills) was reported from Committee of the Whole without amendment, read the third time and passed.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (R) "An Act further to amend the Penitentiary Act."

On clause 1.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There may be difficulties in the way of crowding penitentiaries while others may not be fully occupied, but this is certainly a very sweeping change to make in the law. At present we know that Dorchester penitentiary is declared by law to be provided for the three maritime provinces, St. Vincent de Paul for the province of Quebec, Kingston for Ontario, Stony Mountain and the North-west Territories, and British Columbia penitentiary for British Columbia. While a provision might be made to permit the government to remove to any one of those penitentiaries, a prisoner who might be convicted in another province, this goes further than that. It repeals all the arrangements which have been made providing penitentiary districts, and gives to the Governor General power to make any arrangements from time to time with regard to penitentiary districts. I should think it would be enough to make a provision giving the Governor General in Council power, where a crowded state of any one penitentiary might exist, to send prisoners to another penitentiary, but leaving the penitentiary districts as they exist. The Governor in Council would have the power—to take an extreme case—to determine that the province of Prince Edward Island should be attached to Ontario, or to give a still more extreme case, to Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Say British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Well, say British Columbia. It would involve a great deal of expense on the provincial authorities in sending criminals to the penitentiary. The practice is that the provincial government has to defray the expense of removing the prisoners to the penitentiary. Should the Governor in Council attach the province of Prince Edward Island say to some western territory—and that is what this bill gives them power to do—it would involve a great deal of expense.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They would be pretty sure to attach it to British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—From what my hon. friends sometimes do, I would not be surprised if they did a thing as insane as that. We should retain some power in Parliament The tendency of my hon. friend is to ask Parliament, one step after another, to abnegate its functions and to hand them over to him and his colleagues. There are other clauses of this bill to which I entertain stronger objections than to this, but I should like to hear this clause a little better explained than my hon. friend has done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume my hon. friend is aware that for very many years the Crown has been in the habit of transferring prisoners from one penitentiary to another. It is found in the interests of discipline. Take St. Vincent de Paul, where men become unruly and have surroundings that favour that condition of things. They are removed to Kingston, and Kingston prisoners are removed to St. Vincent de Paul. In my recollection, prisoners have been removed from Manitoba to British Columbia. It depends on the reports made from time to time by the gentleman who has charge of the inspection of the prisoners. That has been the case ever since the penitentiaries have been constructed. Practically what that clause proposes to do has been in operation for the last twenty-five years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Practically.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The clause has not been in operation in that sense at all. It has been in the power of the government to remove a prisoner from one penitentiary to another, but when that has been done, it has been done by the government at its own expense. If my hon. friend should attach a remote penitentiary to a district, he would entail on the province a very considerable expense. The removal of a prisoner from one penitentiary to another is a different matter. It is a provision made for the possibility of one penitentiary being overcrowded while there is room in another. My hon. friend in this bill which he submits to us, proposes to go further than that. He proposes to enable the government to break up the territorial arrangements which have been made in the Penitentiary Act, and make a new disposition altogether. He may attach, if he chooses, a part of Quebec to Ontario, or vice versa.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is a matter that at least requires consideration.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It has had it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is it not correct that the provincial governments have to bear the expense of sending the prisoners to the penitentiary, and if a very remote penitentiary is named, is it not imposing a very heavy expense on the provincial authorities?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it is not imposing a heavy expense on the provincial authorities. I do not suppose I could propose anything that would satisfy the hon. gentleman. Upon what decision does this division rest? We have clause 5 in this Act relating to penitentiaries. Does it rest on the British North America Act, or any power beyond the power of this Parliament? This Parliament alone has the right to deal with it. Sometimes one penitentiary is crowded when another is not. It happens just now there is a great deal of room in the penitentiary of Manitoba and Kingston is overcrowded. We find it would cost us less for prisoners if they could be employed at agricultural pursuits, and they are supposed to be less incorrigible if they are allowed to work out on a farm. The west end of Ontario is scarcely 100 miles from the penitentiary of Manitoba. It is 700 or 800 miles away from Kingston, and the hon. gentleman says, "Oh, there is an African in the fence here, and great mischief is being done," and he wants an explanation. It is so suspicious a circumstance that the government would want to attach the western extremity of Ontario, for penitentiary purposes, to Manitoba, so as to enable them to put convicts in the Manitoba penitentiary. That is so serious an offence, that the hon. gentleman must assist us in the work of administration. He must not merely commit to Parliament the work of legislation, but he must commit to Parliament the work of administration, and the government are so dishonest and so little to be trusted that all sorts of difficulties must be thrown in their way, no matter how reasonable the proposition is. It may be some consolation to the hon. gentleman—it may assist him in sleeping to-night more soundly than he otherwise would—if I said this amendment has been suggested by the inspector who visits the institutions, and who thought on the whole it would give the government from time to time the power to equalize the convicts in the different penitentiaries. Then the hon. gentleman knows that at the present time in the North-west Territories there are two jails that are used for penitentiary purposes, and it would be a matter of convenience instead of crowding, as the population of the North-west Territories is rapidly increasing, the convicts in the Territories into these two institutions, to give us an opportunity of sending some of them to the Manitoba penitentiary. What possible misuse the government could make of an authority of this sort I do not know, but perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell us. He has occupied some time in finding fault with this proposition, but he has not indicated his reasons for taking special exception to it. I think that the proposal will be found a proper one in the public interests, and it is because it is so, and becanse it has been recommended by those officers of the largest experience, with the best opportunity of judging, that I have submitted it to this House; and I have asked that the power be given to us in this way to equalize the convicts in the different penitentiaries and prevent undue pressure in the one while there is ample room for the confinement of the convicts in another. When the hon. gentleman suggested that we might attach the province of Prince Edward Island to the province of British Columbia——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That was your suggestion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it was not mine. The hon. gentleman suggested we were in danger of I do not know—hitching a steamer to Prince Edward Island, and towing it into the Atlantic or attaching it to the North-west. That the government which enjoys the confidence of the people of the Dominion to-day, would undertake to do a very absurd thing for the purpose of dissatisfying a large portion of the population of this country, may suggest itself as a reasonable thing to the mind of my hon. friend, but it would hardly do so to any other member.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend finds a good deal of fault with me as a member of this House for asking any questions or critising the bill. I would advise the hon. gentleman not to allow his angry passions to arise in this manner. The whole discussion, as far as he is concerned, has been in the way of lecturing me across the floor of this House, because as a member of the Senate I choose to ask him some proper questions. He has spoken in a truculent tone, and used language which, I may tell him, I have never heard used by any leader of this House before. We never received from Sir Oliver Mowat, during the time he was leader of the House, anything but the most courteous attention. Sometimes we may perhaps have been a little inquisitive, in the nature of our inquiries, sometimes he may have thought that a member inquired a little too closely and too far, but he always received every suggestion and criticism in the fa rest possible spirit. I ask the House whether the lecture I have received from the leader of the Senate is the kind of treatment we have been receiving in the past from Sir Oliver Mowat, and from my hon. friend from Belleville (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), when he was leader of the House. But, notwithstanding the truculent spirit in which the hon. gentleman spoke, and the lecturing form which he assumes, as if he were lecturing a class in a collegiate institute, I have succeeded in eliciting some useful information bearing on this clause. He now tells us that the inspector of penitentiaries has recommended this amendment. He tells us that there is a geographical difficulty in the province of Ontario—that a good deal of new Ontario lies contiguous to Manitoba which might be conveniently attached to the latter province. He has given us fair reasons with a very bad grace. Why not give those reasons at first in a proper spirit to members of this House, instead of lecturing us and taking it for granted that nothing he could propose would meet my view. The hon. gentleman knows very well I have supported his views many times in this House, and have done so within the last three days, but he must take this extreme ground in order to create the impression that I am raising objections for the purpose simply of opposing his government. The hon. gentleman was so extremely unfair that he attached to me the desire to make that unreasonable comparison about British Columbia, I spoke of Ontario. It might possibly be that the Kingston penitentiary might not at some time be fully occupied, and the Dorchester penitentiary might be found to be crowded, and in that case Prince Edward Island might be attached to Ontario. The hon gentleman interupted in his derisive way, why not say British Columbia at once? I said, well say British Columbia. Then the hon. gentleman says that I suggested that the prisoners should be sent to British Columbia. The hon. gentleman, if he wishes his bills to be fairly considered in this House, should receive criticism in the spirit in which it is offered.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So I do.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman has a right to give his explanations without treating me, or any other member, in the way he has done on the present occasion.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 2.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is for the purpose of enabling the government to readjust the salaries of the officers of the penitentiary, and to adopt the same rule that was adopted some years ago with respect to the salaries of the police officers. If hon. gentlemen object I will let the clause stand and prepare a schedule, and I would have preferred to prepare the schedule with some fuller consideration than it is possible to give it at this moment without communication with other parties, and to have submitted it to Parliament at its next session. I make these observations because of what the leader of the opposition said some days ago, when this bill was read the second time. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that in every case we submitted the salaries of officers to Parliament for approval. Now, the provision in the Dominion Police Act, which was passed the first year of confederation, and has been the law ever since, as follows :—

They shall receive such rates of pay from time to time as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council, and an account shall be laid before Parliament within the first fourteen days after the opening of the session, &c.

That was the plan that was in my mind when I proposed this clause. I have not the Act here, because I did not suppose this would be reached to-day, but in the Act of 1887, the Penitentiary Act, there were two schedules prepared, a minimum and a maximum schedule. In the last revision, which took place in 1895, there was a single schedule prepared, and that schedule brought the rate down very much lower than the maximum schedule that was in existence before. In many cases that schedule, I find, is too low. It is impossible to retain really efficient men in many branches of the penitentiary service for the salary that has been fixed ; so I propose to reconsider that provision, and in the meantime I thought that I would adopt the same rule that had been adopted with regard to the police. I say now that if the hon. gentlemen opposite object to permitting that power to be exercised by the Governor in Council until the next session of Parliament, I am prepared to let this clause stand and go on to the consideration of the next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do you mean to drop it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I recollect some years ago there was a schedule of the various salaries submitted to this House. Is it intended to repeal that and form a new schedule? We had a long discussion here on the occasion to which I refer, and I thought myself that there was great inequality, particularly in the salaries paid to wardens, but the argument was that they could change the officers from one place to another, and they wanted a regular stated rate of remuneration for the officers of the penitentiaries. I thought it was a good idea to establish by law, and after a great deal of discussion it carried in this chamber, and is the law at the present time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not as it is at present, but as it was. It was changed in 1895. The plan which the hon. gentleman refers to —and that is the one which I feel disposed to adopt—was in the statutes of 1887.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The remuneration to the different officers was named in that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, the maximum and the minimum.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—We had a long discussion, and agreed on the pay to the various officers in the different penitentiaries.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is the law now.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have no objection to their being properly paid, but I want to know what we are doing.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is practically returning to the old law. Section 33 of the Revised Statutes says:

> The Governor in Council may, from time to time, fix the sums to be annually paid to the warden and other officers and servants of any penitentiary established under the provisions of this Act.

That is just about what we have in the clause before us. But section 33 of the Revised Statutes goes on:

> regard being had to the number of convicts confined therein and the consequent responsibility attaching to their officers respectively, and to the length of service and amount of labour devolving upon them, but such salary shall not exceed the sum specified in the schedule to this Act.

And then there was a schedule to the Act and the warden was to receive no more than $3,000 and not less than $1,000. The Minister of Justice does not object to a schedule, but he is not in a position to present a schedule at once. He will give the Governor in Council the power to fix the salaries and next session will bring down a schedule. Even if it were a Conservative government I think I would trust them for the one year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The suggestion made by the Minister of Justice is a reasonable one and would meet the objection, I think; that is to prepare a schedule and have it embodied in the law so that Parliament would know exactly what it was doing. The Consolidated Statutes to which the hon. gentleman from Halifax has referred gives the power to the Governor in Council to regulate the salaries, but they are to be stated in the schedule.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They must not exceed the lump sum.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—One of the fundamental principles which I have learned of the Liberal, Reform and Grit party, whatever you like to call it, for the last twenty or thirty years, has been that no money should be placed at the disposal of the government of the day, until it has been approved by Parliament. I am sure my hon. friend will remember very well the crusade carried on by the Hon. Edward Blake in our own province when he defeated the late John Sandfield Macdonald on the question of the distribution of moneys. Although this is a minor matter, the same principle is involved, and I think it is much better for the government that no such power should be vested in them. If the law provides a maximum and a minimum salary, or if it makes a fixed salary for the penitentiary, then we know exactly what we are doing. I quite concur in the view enunciated by the hon. gentleman the other day, that there was some of these penitentiaries where the duties are more onerous than in others, and there is no reason why the warden of a penitentiary containing 500 or 600 convicts, should not be paid more than the warden of a penitentiary containing 100 or 200, as the case may be. So far as that clause is concerned, if the hon. gentleman will let it stand and prepare a schedule, I have no doubt the House would approve of it. There is no reason for objecting to this. I have seen so much, shall I say maladministration of the affairs of my own province by the government bringing within the fold of its arms every officer in the country, and the immense influence exerted by every one of them in every appeal to the people, that it makes me suspicious of placing any such power in the hands of any government. If I were in a government I would rather be relieved of that. We know that with us the government has the influence of the bailiff and the jailor and other officers; and that every constituency swarms with officials who are at the mercy and control of the local government. I do not say that my hon. friend or that any Dominion Government would do that, but I say if you place it in the power of the minister—and he must receive the approval of his colleagues. I take it for granted, unless they are governing in this matter as they are in others by departmental heads, without other portions of the administration knowing what they are doing, it is a dangerous power to place in the hands of any man, and not only dangerous to the community at large, but it is a power that no minister, after he has had a number of years experience, would ask to have thrown upon his shoulders. I speak from experience, and certainly, if I were in the hon. gentleman's place, I would ask to be relieved of that responsibility? He knows whether the warden of the Kingston penitentiary should be paid more than the warden of St. Vincent de Paul or Dorchester or Manitoba penitentiaries. Let him put in a schedule and those in this House holding the same views as myself would not object to his bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman the other day stated that there was no such thing as giving power to the minister to fix salaries. I call his attention to the fact that there has been given to the minister power to fix the salaries of the police force and there is that power to-day. That power was given by a government, not of which he was a member, but it was revived by a government of which he was a member. It was introduced by the first government after confederation, before the hon. gentleman was a minister of the Crown, but those statutes were revised while the hon. gentleman was a minister of the Crown and that system has still continued.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When was that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In 1887. It reads:

And such rates of pay or allowance as are from time to time prescribed by the Governor in Council.

That is a very much larger expenditure than occurs in any one penitentiary. There is a difficulty about bringing down a schedule. I can bring one down if the hon. gentleman insists upon it, but there are certain officers in the penitentiary who, in my opinion, are entitled to a larger amount of compensation than they have received, for instance, storekeepers in the penitentiary, where you have ten times the amount of goods passing through their hands that any ordinary country merchant would have. They can save a great deal, or waste a great deal, and it is a wise thing to employ a man who is thoroughly responsible. But when a man tells you, "I will not serve you for the present salary" and tenders his resignation and goes out, as some have done, it is somewhat embarrassing. What ought to be the precise salary is a matter requiring very careful consideration. At the present time we pay, in a case of that sort, $700. I have no hesitation in saying that that is altogether inadequate for the storekeeper. Under the old schedule of the Act of 1887, if the hon. gentleman will look at it he will see that the maximum salary was $900 and yet there was tremendous waste in those cases.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What are his perquisites besides that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are none to-day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not house rent?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, not house rent. One party wrote me that when he paid his living expenses and house rent, his son came to his assistance to the extent of $126 to secure him for the year. We do not want that condition of things. Take the examination in the case of the commissioners. The people made a hard report against a good many of the officials, and some of those officials took perquisites, accepted gratuities, presents and that sort of thing.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—And some commission.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And some commissions. There were some of those men who were not dishonest in what they did, as I think. Of course, men better informed would not have done those things, but these men did not intend to act dishonestly. They were acting under a system in which that was the practice before they came in, and you hold out to them the temptation to do these things in order that they may live. Speaking of this matter, I say that I will submit a schedule if hon. gentlemen desire it, but I feel that it would be imperfect.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We would like to see it anyway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The House would surely have it when we meet again.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We do not want to lock the stable after the horse is stolen.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It would only be an expenditure for a year, and we must keep within the appropriation. If the hon. gentleman will look at my report he will see we have greatly reduced the penitentiary expenditure, but I do not think we ought to bring about that reduction by keeping the salaries of the officials below the proper point.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Of course not. Pay everybody well, but let Parliament know what they are getting.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no objection. I called the attention of the opposition to the fact that to-day we fix the salaries, and that has been a power with the government in all the police force in Canada. The hon. gentleman has not complained of that. He has not spoken of the stable being locked after the horse was stolen, and it cannot be said that they were extravagantly paid. If, however, the feeling of the House is that there ought to be a maximum figure in the schedule, I have no objection to bring the schedule down, but I say that that will be a schedule that I will not feel myself altogether satisfied with, because I will feel that after I have fixed the schedule, and after I have submitted it to Parliament, I may be obliged to turn away a man eminently fitted for the service, and in whom I have the greatest confidence, and who is thoroughly competent, because he will not be willing to serve for the maximum that I would have fixed, that I feel I could make permanent after I have had an opportunity of inquiring, better than I can do at the moment.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think the reason the hon. gentleman has advanced has any bearing upon this question. Because a certain course has been followed in the legislation with regard to the Mounted Police, it would not follow that similar legislation would be adopted with reference to this.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say anything about the Mounted Police.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Well, the Dominion Police. The hon. gentleman spoke so indistinctly that I could not hear him. It is only a very limited employment, and there would be very clear guides in regard to the employment of men in such a capacity as that, and with regard to the officials there would be some guide as to what would be proper in the British army, and so on, and I do not think such a limited employment as that of the Mounted Police and the mode adopted with regard to the payment for that service will furnish any reason why Parliament should hand over to the government of the day the entire financial management of such an expensive service as that of the penitentiaries. I am glad my hon. friend understands the bill better than he did the other evening, for when I called his attention to the fact that it repealed the whole schedule which I find in the Act of 1895, and gave power to the Minister of Justice and the government of the day to fix all the salaries, he told me that the provision in the Act of 1895 was an innovation in the law when it was introduced.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So it is.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, I did not understand the word innovation when he used it then in the sense in which it must be understood if he were to speak by the book, because we have had schedules in the Penitentiary Act. That as it stands in the Revised Statutes was amended in 1887. But the schedule renewed both maximum and minimum salaries. I find that in 1895 the same course is pursued with the difference, that it only fixes a maximum salary, beyond which the Governor in Council cannot go, and it does not fix any grade; therefore the Act of 1895 was not an innovation at all, except that it did away with the minimum salaries. It restricted the government to the amount they should vote as a whole. There are many reasons why the hon. gentleman should take the course he now suggests, and bring down a schedule, because I do not think the government should come to Parliament and ask them to seriously hand over to them such an extensive control of salaries and disbursement of public money. My hon. friend Mr. DeBoucherville raises a question that I was just going to reach when I had finished, and that is the second point, as to whether a schedule of that kind can emanate from this House at all. There may be some way of getting over it, but I do not think so, and I am glad my hon. friend is receding from what was a very untenable position which he took, of handing over such an extraordinary power as this would be into the hands of the government of the day.

Hon. Mr. WOOD, from the committe, reported that they had made some progress with the bill, and asked leave to sit again.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I wish to ask once more when the hon. Secretary of State is going to bring down the return which he promised me again and again, and which was moved for three months ago—the correspondence between the government of Canada and any other person with reference to carrying the mails between Cape Tormentine and Sackville on the Intercolonial Railway. My hon. friend is very courteous, and I am sorry to trouble him, but he must remember that I have asked for this numerous times and I have good reasons to urge that it be brought down. I hope it will be laid on the table as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not find the least fault with the hon. gentleman in pressing for the returns. I have asked for it and failed to get it. I understand that it is in the Post Office Department?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire to ask, has the return been brought down which I moved for in reference to the expenditure on the electric light? I was under the impression that it had been brought down, but I have been unable to find it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Was there a motion in this House for it?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, and I sent up to the record office for it. My impression was that it came down.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I think it was brought down.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I submitted it myself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That was my recollection, but I have been unable to find it. I think the hon. minister laid on the table to-day the correspondence in reference to the franchise?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

The Senate adjourned.

RED DEER VALLEY RAILWAY AND COAL COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (119) "An Act respecting the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company."

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—On the ground of urgency, as the promoters of this bill are anxious to complete arrangements, I move that the 70th rule of the House be suspended in so far as it relates to this bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should first move concurrence in the amendment. I may say that the amendment has not been correctly reported to the House. It was not the amendment which was made in the committee. The amendment as reported to the House is to strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one," and the amendment in the committee, was to strike out the words "two years" and insert "one year," which is a different amendment.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—To be sure there is a difference of a single letter. If you strike out the word "two" and substitute "one," then the plural "years" should be changed to the singular. That point escaped my notice, but the report was put in my hands as the report adopted by the committee, and, as a matter of fact, the amendment is reported exactly as it passed the committee. The word "two" was struck out and the word "one" inserted in its place. I see, however, from the remarks of the hon. senior member from Halifax, that he is technically correct. I am sorry he did not take the objection at the table when the committee was in session, for it would have been instantly rectified. It would be a gross error for a bill to pass this House with a grammatical error of that magnitude.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is all very true. I simply called attention to the fact that the report did not correctly record the action of the committee. It just happens that I moved the amendment myself in the committee, if I may be allowed to refer to what took place at the meeting. My motion was that the words "two years" be stricken out, and the words "one year" inserted instead. The amendment, as it comes up, is that "one" be substituted for "two," and that makes it "one years." That is only a technical error of course.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—My hon. friend might move that the letter "s" be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I shall take note of the correction of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, and in the future, in the interest of all parties concerned and for the guidance of the committee, I shall insist that every motion be put in writing.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD moved concurrence in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed under the suspension of the rules.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I may say that the return which the hon. gentleman from Marshfield called my attention to yesterday was brought down on the 9th March, as I ascertained from looking over the minutes of proceedings. I refer to the return as to the postal service between Cape Tormentine and Prince Edward.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS WITHOUT COMPETITION.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to call the attention of the hon. member from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) to a communication which I have received from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. There was an address carried by the Senate calling for a full and complete return of all contracts entered into by the government since 1896 by private contract and without tender, specifying the kind of goods, the prices paid and from whom purchased. The statement of the minister is that these accounts are all published in the Auditor General's Report each year, and cannot be prepared as requested. The deputy says:

> Such a return would take months to prepare and a large staff of clerks. Unless ordered, we would cut out the pages from the Auditor's Report and put them together. Perhaps Mr. Perley would be satisfied if attention is called to the fact that they are published in the Auditor General's report.

If my hon. friend insists upon it, as the order has been carried, there is nothing for it but to give instructions to carry it out, but it will take a long time and it will be very expensive.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Then, according to that, there has been a large amount of business done without public tender.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There necessarily is in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, as the hon. gentleman will understand, because the supplies required are often in very small quantities.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

> Resuming the adjourned debate on the second reading Bill (133) "An Act to authorize the acquisition by the Dominion of the Drummond County Railway."—(Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said:—I am at a loss to know why my name is put down in connection with this bill. If I am responsible for this measure, I ask permission of the House to withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is an adjourned debate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The bill is not mine. I am prepared to resume the debate, but not as the promoter of the bill. I have no objection to assuming the responsibility if the hon. gentleman is willing to relegate it to me.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that it is not the responsibility for the bill that is put upon him in the notice on the orders of the day; it is merely a continuance of the discussion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is quite true, but I decline altogether assuming the paternity of that which I had no hand in producing. It was well understood, when I moved the adjournment, that it was for a particular purpose, as the official report of the debate will indicate. It was then suggested by the hon. member for Halifax that it should stand until to-day to enable the hon. minister, who had control of these two bills, to indicate to the House what course he intended to pursue. Just as soon as I ascertain what they intend to do, I shall indicate what I think the House ought to do.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say to my hon. friend, there are two bills before the House that are, no doubt, intimately related to each other in dealing with portions of a continuous line of railway, but the two bills are entirely distinct, one making a contract for the purchase of a railway from one company, and the other contracting for a half interest for a period of years with another and different company. I can quite understand that in dealing with these two bills one might be considered an excellent arrangement, while the other might not, and that the House might not be disposed to give effect to that which they thought was an advantageous arrangement as a part of a continuous line if they thought the other was very objectionable, and so what seemed to me not an unreasonable course to take was this, that the debate should be proceeded with on this one bill—that it should be considered on its merits in connection with the contract, and that if its fate, in the estimation of hon. gentlemen, was felt to depend upon the next bill which succeeds it, there would be no reason why the third reading of the bill should be proceeded with, but that it should stand until the other bill was taken up and considered. It seems to me that it is more advantageous to consider the two measures separately, but I have no objection in the world that, in the discussion, the features of the one bill may be discussed and criticised in connection with the other, and so if a majority of the House consider the first bill, that relating to the Drummond County Railway, an objectionable measure, they would not, of course, proceed to give it a second reading. If the majority of the House think this measure unobjectionable, they would give to the bill a second reading, and the third reading could stand until the other bill was brought forward and reached the same stage. That seems to me to be the course called for by the usages of Parliament. If my hon. friend desires to discuss the two measures together, I am sure I should not object, nor do I think any supporters of the government should object to his taking that course, so there will be every freedom of discussion; but in the consideration of the two measures intrinsically, that they would be considered as they are, two separate bills. I hope that will be satisfactory to the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, it is not satisfactory. The hon. gentleman says there are two bills dealing with separate and distinct questions, the one a purchase, the other a lease of a half interest. Now, while that is to the letter true, the purchase of the one without the leasing of the other would be placing the Senate in this anomalous position: we should be purchasing the centre of a system with no right to reach it from the east or to reach the terminal point in Montreal. They are so intimately connected with each other that while, as my hon. friend says, many hon. gentlemen might not object to the price which is being paid for the one, the purchase of it would be utterly useless unless the lease of the other was also confirmed. What I indicated yesterday, was that there were provisions and conditions in connection with the other that, to the minds of some of us at least, are highly objectionable, and it would be much better, in the interests of the government themselves and of the scheme they have at heart, that the other should be discussed first.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If my hon. friend thought the other should come first, he should have said so. Then my hon. friend (Mr. Scott) would have moved the other first.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I said it plainly and distinctly two or three days ago as the Debates will show, when the first reading took place. I intimated then what I thought was the proper course to pursue—that we should hear the reasons given for the purchase of the one, and then that bill should be postponed, and we could hear the reasons for the leasing of the other road, and we could consider whether the terms were such as to justify the House in confirming them. That is the position I took then, and I am not taking a different position now. Any reasonable man who looks at this question, either with a desire to affirm the principles contained in the two bills, or from the objectionable point, not believing in either of them, would take the same view as I do. The Drummond County Railway purchase will stand in precisely the same position for future consideration, as it would, if we passed the second reading. The objection is that if we pass the second reading, then we affirm the principle of the bill for the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, and we would be inconsistent in rejecting it afterwards even if we rejected the lease of the other line. If we reject any portion of the arrangement into which the government have entered with the Grand Trunk Railway, then there is no necessity for purchasing the Drummond County Railway. If the hon. gentleman is not prepared to take the course that I have suggested, then the Senate will have to consider what they think is best to be done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say to my hon. friend that as to the intimate relation of the two measures, I do not dispute it, but there are two measures, two separate contracts with two separate parties. The one may have merits while the other might not have merits. The one, in itself, might be a highly proper arrangment, the other might not be. I think they both are proper arrangements. But apart from that, the hon. gentleman will see my proposition was this: I can well understand that the House, if it thought either of these was very objectionable, could say although the one is advantageous it is useless without the other. Assuming for a moment that the hon. gentleman sees nothing objectionable in the Drummond County Railway arrangement, in voting for the second reading of that bill he does not vote for the absolute acquisition of the road if the other contract is objectionable. He simply votes if the other is not objectionable, then there is nothing intrinsically objectionable in the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, and that is the reason why I propose that we might proceed with the discussion of this measure relating to the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, taking the second reading, assuming that it is not to be objected to on its intrinsic merits, and let it stand until the other bill is discussed and considered, and if the Senate does not approve of the arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway—if the majority of this House are opposed to it, nobody is committed to the purchase of the first road, because we all recognize the fact that the two form necessary links in the one continuous line. Another reason why I thought this the more rational course to pursue—one more consistent with parliamentary usage was this: I understood the hon. gentleman yesterday to say that he was not prepared to go on with the consideration of the contract with the Grand Trunk Railway for a leasing arrangement for ninety-nine years until further papers were in his possession, and it did not seem to me in the public interest, at the present moment, to delay the consideration of both measures for that purpose. Unless the hon. gentleman is prepared to go on with the consideration of the measure upon such information as we can produce, then I would be very sorry to introduce the other and have them stand over for an indefinite period of time until further information could be had. I do not understand that any further information is required in the case of the Drummond County Railway. Everything is before the House that it is possible to lay before the House, and in the case of the Grand Trunk Railway the information which the hon. leader of the opposition asked for yesterday was information in the possession of the company, and not in the possession of the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask the hon. gentleman whether he has not that information now? It is information the Grand Trunk Railway can give him as to the result of these traffic arrangements.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is before the House, as I understand it, everything we have in our possession.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is well the hon. gentleman qualified his remarks by saying as he understands it. I have a letter from Mr. Wainwright, in which he says he has furnished the Railway Department with the information. It seems to me there is just this difference between us; the hon.

gentleman wants to have this House affirm the principle of purchasing the Drummond County Railway by passing the second reading of the bill, and he assumes that all the members of the Senate are of the opinion that that is an advantageous arrangement and that there are no objections to it. I know many members of the Senate who are opposed to the whole scheme, so that by passing the second reading before knowing the facts connected with the other transaction, we are affirming a principle which we should not affirm. I am not going to argue whether the government are paying too much or too little for the Drummond County Railway. What I am opposed to is that we should proceed to discuss it further without knowing the reasons that the government give for purchasing the road. What I say, is it would be an utter absurdity and would place the Senate in a ridiculous position to undertake to buy a portion of the whole system and that portion the centre, and then probably reject the other. That is the position in which we would be. In order that we may better understand this question and that the Senate may know precisely what we propose to do, I move:

That the further consideration of Bill (113) "An Act to authorize the acquisition by the Dominion of the Drummond County Railway" be postponed until Bill (138) "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal" shall have been considered by the Senate.

I have already given my reasons why I ask that course to be pursued. In the first place, I do not desire any member of the Senate to be placed in the position of affirming the principle of purchasing one portion of a system which would be utterly useless to the country and a waste of public money unless we confirm the lease of the other portion—that is the western entrance over the Grand Trunk Railway to the commercial centre and the reaching of Quebec via the Grand Trunk Railway from the Chaudière into Lévis. It seems to me that is a reasonable proposition, and why it should not be accepted I am at a loss to know.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have already pointed out that the House commits itself to no principle—to nothing except that the contract itself is intrinsically acceptable if that be the view.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We do not know until we get the other bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So far as the other is concerned, they are two independent contracts. Supposing the government had made a bargain with the Drummond County Railway to take the whole thing over for $10,000, nobody would have said it was a bad arrangement——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, it would be.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman should wait until I finish my sentence. I was going to add it might be a very unacceptable arrangement if the other was an unsatisfactory one, and so the House, in voting in this case, would have voted as it does in a hundred other cases—it would have voted saying we do not object to this in itself, but we will not commit ourselves finally to its acceptance until we consider the further arrangements in that continuous line. The hon. gentleman insists upon the discussion of the other measure first. If my hon. friend had said that two days ago, we would have put it first on the list and discussed it first. But my hon. friend the Secretary of State moved the second reading of the other bill yesterday. He made his statement with regard to it and the House took no exception. My hon. friend did not rise and say, "I think that you ought not to proceed with that until we have considered the other."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And I did not think so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But according to the statement my hon. friend now makes, he desires that my hon. friend shall make his speech on the bill and state what he has to say in its favour and I shall discuss the other bill which stands in my name, that the hon. gentleman shall sit judicially, and after due deliberation state what conclusions he has reached. That may be, in his estimation, a proper course to take. I do not think it is. Nevertheless, I know that if the hon. gentleman persists in that he may succeed in the motion which he has made. I am not going to resist that motion, and if the hon. gentleman persists in the view which he has expressed, I shall be prepared to take up the other measure to-morrow and proceed with it if the hon. gentleman is ready.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is all I have asked.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then that is understood, and it will not be necessary to put the motion to the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only objection I have to the hon gentleman's remarks is that he complains that I did not take objection to the manner in which he put the notice on the paper. Just as soon as he takes me into his confidence as to what he is going to do, and desires my advice, I will be glad to give it to him, but I decline to be held responsible for the acts of the government when I know nothing of them until after they are done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Nobody knows what the government or the opposition propose to do in matters of this sort. They may be the subject of discussion. But when my hon. friend the Secretary of State undertook to move yesterday if the hon. leader of the opposition had stated that he objected to that bill being proceeded with, then it would not have been proceeded with, and we would have changed the order. But the proposition of the hon. gentleman is a proposition that is unfair to the government. Every one can understand that.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am very sorry that the leader of the government intends to allow the matter to be complicated by taking the two bills together. I think it would simplify matters very much and would facilitate business if the Drummond County Railway Bill had been considered first and the other measure taken up after. I am going to vote against both of them, but I think in fair play and common justice that the measure introduced by the leader of the House should have been allowed to take its place. It would shorten the discussion and we would reach a better result.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. leader of the opposition yesterday called the attention of the House to further information which he thought was available, I wrote to the department at once to know whether they had any other information that the House had called for, or that had been produced in another branch of the legislature, and I was informed that they had not; I then stated that the leader of the opposition had referred to some documents that Mr. Wainwright had prepared, and I asked what they were. Before I came to the House, the secretary of the department came over to me and stated that it was a statement of engine and car mileage on the Drummond County Road. I asked him whether it bore on this discussion in any way, and he said he did not suppose it did. I said to him, "I wish you would prepare a copy and send it over, and we can then judge whether it will be of any service." If it is of any use we will lay it on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called, second reading (Bill) 40 "An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, with respect to combinations in restraint of trade."

Hon. Mr. POWER said:—This is a bill which does not require a very elaborate discussion, but still, as a matter of justice to the other House, which has passed the bill, it should be discussed at some little length, and I regret to say that, being under the impression that the debate on these two important government measures were going to occupy some time, I did not prepare myself to discuss this bill. Perhaps the hon. gentleman from Monck is ready to proceed now, but the better way would be to postpone the discussion till Tuesday next. If the hon. gentleman has no objection, I will move that the order of the day be discharged and placed on the orders for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I have no objection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the bill in reference to combines in restraint of trade—to strike out the word "unduly?"

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. McCALLUM—It passed the Senate before and was sent over to the House of Commons and has come back to us now. The late Hon. Senator Reid had charge of the bill here, but he neglected to get it through the House of Commons in time, and it is now before us in the same shape as before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is a good deal of opposition to this bill from many people who look upon it as very dangerous to every trade. It is a question that is debatable, as my hon. friend well knows, and while it may be as innocent and harmless as it looks, there are people who think it would prevent two grocers getting together to say whether they should charge five cents or five and a half cents for an article. I express no opinion as to whether that is true or not, but I know that is the impression that many people have in reference to this bill. It is a question that ought to be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, where parties could be heard pro and con. Here we would have to discuss it as between ourselves. Those who are engaged in trade would be better able to inform the members on the subject. I confess that I have not studied the question, we should have before us people in the trade who could lay their views before the committe, and the committee could report to the House. I throw out this suggestion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—When the Criminal Code was under discussion two evenings ago this very clause was considered, and the section which my hon. friend proposes to amend by striking out the word "unreasonable" in the earlier part of the section and the word "unduly" subsequently, reads in this way:

> Shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $10,000 and not less than $1,000 who conspires, combines, agrees, or arranges with any other person, or with any railway, steamboat, steamship, or transportation company unlawfully to unduly limit, &c.

The word "unduly" which my hon. friend wishes to strike out of the clause in this bill is already striken out of the clause in the bill which has gone through the committee. The next is that they shall be liable if they unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing and so on, to "unduly prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture," or "unduly lessen competition in the production, manufacture or purchase," and so on. It seems to me, if you strike out the word "unduly," then you would make all proceedings of this sort criminal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The motion which I made seconded by the hon. gentleman from Monck, was that this order of the day be discharged and that the second reading of this bill be made an order of the day for Tuesday next. I do not think it is altogether correct on that motion to undertake to discuss the merits of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, 29th June, 1899.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

ONTARIO AND RAINY RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (121) "An Act respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company," with amendments. He said:—This bill was not only amended in committee, but it was almost completely remodelled. The conflicting interest was that of the town of Port Arthur, and the town was represented by counsel. The solicitors on both sides met and agreed upon a bill that was wholly different from the bill originally submitted to the committee, and the remodelled bill is embodied in the report now laid before the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the report be taken into consideration on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the orders of the day are called I would like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Ferguson) to a request he made for a return. I find it was brought down. It was a return in connection with the curves on the Prince Edward Island Railway. It was brought down on the 15th June.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am aware that it was brought down, and I have never spoken of it since I got it. But while we are talking about returns, there is one that I am still looking for, and that is in reference to the correspondence between the Prince Edward Island Fruit Growers Association and the Dominion Government with reference to some spraying experiments now going on there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will call Mr. Fisher's attention to the matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would like to ask the Secretary of State whether that return with reference to the amount to the credit of the Manitoba School Fund is yet finished. He brought down a return in answer to a motion by the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface, and I intimated that if they would complete that return up to the present time it would answer my purpose.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will call the attention of the Finance Department to the matter. I think the Finance Department and Interior Department will have to make it up.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman will remember there was a somewhat large and elaborate return showing the actual amount collected in interest, and the expenditure in various ways, and I asked the hon. gentleman if he would complete it. It would be an interesting return for those who take an interest in it.

THE FRANCHISE ACT.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would also like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice, who laid on the table yesterday, or the day before, the return which I asked for, of the correspondence between the Dominion Government and the governments of the different provinces, in reference to the promise which they had made to ask the different provinces to so amend the electoral franchise law as to enable an appeal to be made to the judges. I find there is no return from Manitoba. The return laid on the table is a letter from the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to the Premier of New Brunswick, and also to the Premier of Nova Scotia, and the answers to them. I know that it is said, that in Manitoba they have the right to appeal, but not to the judges, unless they are specially appointed by the government of Manitoba; which appeal may be to a judge, or it may be any one else. Judging from what I have seen, I am rather inclined to think that it is not a very acceptable mode either to the people of Manitoba or to the Dominion, as we now have to use the voters' list for Dominion purposes. The correspondence is short, and as it may be the only opportunity of getting it upon the records, I will take the liberty of reading the Premier's letter and the two answers. I shall do so because it will show that the statement I made on the 24th March, when I asked for this return, was quite correct because the Premier himself acknowledged it in his letter. But what I want to call the attention of the House to is the promise made by the government last session, when the Senate consented to recede from some of the amendments which they had made to the Franchise Act, and allow it to become law, without those amendments. The Senate yielded upon the statement and positive promise of the government in both Houses that representations would be made to the provincial governments. As I anticipated and intimated in this House on two or three occasions, no communication had taken place between these governments until after I called attention to the fact in this House. If you look at the records you will find that I asked the question of the members of the government here on the 24th of March. Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier's first letter is dated the 1st of April to Mr. Emmerson and also to Mr. Murray. I know it would be irregular for me to read this now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I shall not violate the rule by doing so, but I draw the attention of the House and the country to the fact that the government did not comply with their solemn and distinct promises to represent these facts to the different local governments until after I had, during the present session, reminded them of those promises. Then, six days afterwards, the Premier wrote to the two gentlemen to whom I have referred and received their answers. The answers are such as could be expected.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I might say to my hon. friend that I think he will find, on looking at the debate of last year, that he puts the statement with regard to the promise stronger than the statements in the report warrant. In the first place, I have this to say, I think that the province of Manitoba has very much the same arrangement with regard to the revision of the voters' list that existed under the statute of 1885. Under the law the appeal was not to the judge, but to a revising barrister, and although a county judge is appointed in most instances—not in all—a county judge is appointed not as county judge, but as revising barrister. That is precisely the condition of things in the province of Manitoba, and unless we were to make the law something different from what it had been in the Dominion, there was no change called for in the province of Manitoba. The Premier addressed his letter to the Prime Ministers of the province of New Brunswick and of the province of Nova Scotia, and it is true that these letters were written on the first April, but they have been written. The promise has been kept. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, is not surprised that the matter had been overlooked when the Prime Minister was away a great portion of the year upon the international commission.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I am not surprised at that, but I am surprised at the attitude of the hon. gentleman in answering my question. I am not surprised considering the Premier was occupied as he was. Without desiring to read the hon. gentleman a lecture, I think it would have been better had he admitted the correctness of my statement. He thinks I have put the promise too strong. I will read one paragraph of the Premier's letter, and the House can judge whether I put it too strongly:

> When we repealed last year the Franchise Act and adopted the franchise of the different provinces as the franchise for the elections to the House of Commons, the opposition pointed out to us that there were some provinces where there was no appeal to the judicial authorities, of the decisions rendered by the provincial officers entrusted with the preparation of the lists. It seemed only fair and reasonable that there should be an appeal in all such cases given finally to the judicial authority, and I promised then that I would communicate in that respect with the governments of the several provinces.

I do not think I put it any stronger than that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. There is nothing before the House. I think it is to be regretted that we are getting into a very slip shod way of doing business here. If the conduct of the government is to be condemned, there is a proper way of reaching them; but this practice of getting up a discussion without any notice is becoming altogether too common, and every one must see how objectionable it is. There is a great deal of business before the House. I refrained from raising the question of order when the leader of the opposition stood up but I raise it now.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I would crave leave of the House, in spite of the point that has been raised.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I insist on the question of order, because if the hon. gentleman makes his speech, some hon. gentleman on this side of this House will want to reply.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I move that the House adjourn.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman cannot move it himself.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then I will move the adjournment of the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The hon. gentleman can, of course, move the adjournment and speak to it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He could not move the adjournment if he had already spoken, but he is in order to move it as he has done.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I should not detain the House long, I merely wish to make some comments on what has fallen from the leader of the government with reference to Manitoba. When the subject was under discussion last session, I took occasion to speak of the iniquitous means adopted to prepare the voters' list by parties appointed for the purpose. Instead of being referred to the revising officer appointed from among the judges, or the revising barrister, no opportunity was given for proper revision at all. We are told that the law of Manitoba is very much the same as in any other province where this has been stated to work well. I give an emphatic contradiction to that. So far as Manitoba is concerned, there is no appeal to a revising officer except the one appointed by the government, who is not obliged to be a barrister or professional man, much less a judge. They have appointed all classes of people, their own creatures as registration clerks taking them from one place where they acted as registration clerks and making them revising officers for others. I called attention to one fact in my address last year, that Mr. Henderson, the district registrar in Brandon, who had been appointed a revising officer, made out a fair list. It was not partisan enough to suit his party, and he has never been appointed since, showing that unless a man makes out a list in accordance with the desire of his own party, he is never entrusted with the duty again. I shall now read an extract from the Winnipeg Telegram:

Hon. R. W. Scott in evading a reply to Sir Mackenzie Bowell's inquiries in the Senate the other day respecting what action had been taken by the Dominion Government to secure amendments to the Manhood Franchise Act declared that he had looked into the Manitoba Act and found that it required the voters' lists to be posted for a month between their compilation and the date of the Court of Revision. And Mr. Scott considers this is quite sufficient to secure justice in the preparation of the voters' lists. The practical answer to Mr. Scott's contention is the fact that the lists are not so posted. This requirement is not being fulfilled at the present revision, any more than it was at the last revision.

At the time this Franchise Act was under discussion, I pointed out that in South Brandon the notice was posted only two days before the date fixed for the Court of Revision. Nobody had seen the notice—nobody knew what the voters' list was, because they had not seen it, and yet a Court of Revision was supposed to be held—the revising barrister and poll clerk met at a school-house. There was nobody there but themselves. They asked were there any appeals. Of course there were no appeals, because nobody knew about it. They then declared the court closed, and 206 Conservative names were left off the list in South Brandon. I say the thing is a scandalous shame. The article from which I have been reading continues:

At the last revision, it will be remembered, there was at least one instance where the lists were not printed and posted until three days before the date fixed for the holding of the Court of Revision. That was in the case of South Brandon. By the time the lists were printed and posted, the time within which notice of appeals to add to strike off names could be filed, had expired. Yet the revising officer would not adjourn his Court of Rivision; and, consequently the election was held upon the lists just as they left the hands of the partisan registration clerk. The scandalous nature of that list was shown by the fact that over 200 names which should have been on were left off and 75 names which ought not to have been on, were included. The vast majority of those left off were Conservatives, while the vast majority of those improperly put on were Liberals. The list has been sent outside the constituency to be printed, though the constituency is in the west of the province, they had been sent to Emmerson in the extreme south-easterly part of the province. They were just sent in order to fix Mr. Bailey, who wanted patronage, and he conveniently delayed their return so as to prevent the Conservatives having access to them in time to file appeals. For all this, the Conservatives had absolutely no recourse. In the light of possibilities such as these, what becomes of Senator Scott's contention that the Act provides for the compilation of fair lists? There is also to be taken into consideration the fact that when the lists are posted, they are frequently found to contain bogus names, which it is impossible to have struck off. At the previous revision of the Emerson list, for instance the revising officer ruled that he would not strike off names unless a subpœna had been served on the party whose name was objected to. This condition it was impossible to comply with, because the names with which the list had been stuffed were either those of bogus individuals or individuals whose whereabouts could not be ascertained in order to serve them with subpœnas. Certain of the lists which have already been posted at the present revision are found to have been similarly stuffed. It is to be hoped that if the matter is again brought up in Parliament the absurdity of the Secretary of State's lame excuse for the Laurier government's violation of its pledge to Parliament in this connection will be exposed.

Now I think, in the face of such enormaties as are being practised in that way in Manitoba, it is outrageous for any member of the government to rise in his place here and say that those lists had been fairly prepared unless he knows the fact personally. If the Secretary of State says the Manitoba lists were properly prepared, he must have an extraordinary way of thinking how lists should be prepared. I have always felt that from the Secretary of State we may expect a fair and honourable statement of what his own views and ideas are, and that he would not make a statement in violation of what actually occurred, had he known what was done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Does the hon. gentleman challenge the statement I made? If he does he is entirely wrong. When we thought it would be necessary to appoint a revising officer there, I looked into the Manitoba law, and found that it was usual to appoint a revising barrister to make up the list. I understood the lists had not been made up since 1896, and a barrister was appointed. The law required that the lists should be posted one month, and that a judge should be named. An Order in Council was passed naming a judge. I corresponded both with the judge and the revising barrister, and I assumed, as I had a right to assume, that they were honourable men, and had performed their duty in accordance with the statute. Had the hon. gentleman given me any notice of it, I would have brought the correspondence before the House, and the Manitoba statute which guided me, and he would see whether I was justified in the statement I made. No doubt frauds are committed in all the provinces. I would not like to stand sponsor for anything of that kind. I can only speak of that with which I had personally to do—that is, with the appointment of an officer in Winnipeg, and a judge in Winnipeg, and from the correspondence I had with both parties, I had a right to assume that they were going to carry out their duty. It so happened, before the judge had entered on the revision, that the government of Manitoba proposed to hold a new election, and we withdrew the authority. There was to be a dissolution of the House, and they then proposed to revise the list The government was contemplating holding an election at an early day in Winnipeg, but as the province was about to revise its provincial lists, it was not our part to continue the revision. I should like if the hon. gentleman, before making references to me, would call for the correspondence, and the different sections in the law of Manitoba which guided me in the statement I made.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I must say the hon. Secretary of State, with regard to that Dominion vacancy in the city of Winnipeg, acted entirely in the spirit of the promise that had been made to the House last year, and that in nominating an officer to discharge the duty of registration clerk for the constituency of Winnipeg he appointed a judge.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A lawyer for the revising barrister, and the judge to revise.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Therefore, my hon. friend, it must be admitted, acted entirely in the spirit of the promise that was made last year, and, as far as his influence could go, carried out the promise of the government. I have not much fault to find in that respect either, with the letters which the Premier of the Dominion has written to the Premiers of two of the provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. But he appears to have fallen under the very serious error that there was already a provision made for an appeal to a judge in Manitoba, which the hon. gentleman from Brandon has said does not exist, and, therefore, that part of the work remains to be done—to write a letter to the premier of Manitoba. That work has not been done in proper time and the lists are now about completed, so that they will remain as they are, probably, for the next federal election, without the safeguard of an appeal to a judicial authority. Both these letters are in about the same words. In these letters there is that one defect to which I have already referred, that it is only in those two provinces that there is a lack of appeal. But there is another statement in it for which the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are to take no small amount of credit. The statement reads :

I submit to your consideration that it would be a proper step to take to amend your Franchise Act by giving an appeal to the County Court judges. You may tell me that your laws worked satisfactorily up to the present time. This I do not doubt, but as it would be desirable to have as near as possible uniformity of laws in election matters, I venture strongly to press on you that my suggestion should receive your favourable consideration.

After having wrecked uniformity by the Franchise Act of last year, he puts himself on record as strongly of the opinion that uniformity is very desirable.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will call my hon. friend's attention to what was stated in this House when this matter was referred to before. My hon. friend opposite said :

We have come to an amicable settlement in the interests of peace in this matter and I should like the Minister of Justice to say, in order to be on record, that he is in accord with the utterances of his chief on this point. Though we have given way upon this question, most of us have strong convictions that the right of appeal should exist, and if the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Justice, will carry out the suggestions which were made in the Commons, and which I have no doubt he will be prepared to repeat —that is to sustain in the position his chief has taken —it will be an additional reason for not insisting upon all the amendments which we made, and some of which we have now agreed to drop.

That is the conclusion of the speech made by my hon. friend. In reply I said :

I may say to my hon. friend that, of course, one has to communicate with local governments upon a matter which is wholly within their jurisdiction with some degree of moderation, and I have not seen the words of the Prime Minister to which my hon. friend has referred, but if the Prime Minister has spoken as my hon. friend has represented--and I do not question at all that he has done so—I shall be very glad indeed to second his effort.

That statement I think has been kept to the letter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I really cannot understand for what reason that extract was read. My hon. friend has read a statement made by myself in accepting the assurances of the government, and his promise also to assist in carrying out whatever the Premier promised. I do not know that I ever said anything else. I said the Premier made the promise, and I hold his letter in my hand in which he says he did make the promise, and I will now take the liberty of reading the answers from the Premiers of the different provinces in order that the House may know what they say. It is quite clear that Mr. Emmerson's letter is not all here. Probably it referred to some other subject with which I have no concern.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—All that relates to the subject is there.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The letters read :

OTTAWA, 1st April, 1899.

MY DEAR EMMERSON,—When we repealed, last year, the Franchise Act, and adopted the franchise of the different provinces as the franchise for the elections to the House of Commons, the opposition pointed out to us that there were some provinces where there was no appeal to the judicial authorities, of the decisions rendered by the provincial officers entrusted with the preparation of the lists. It seemed only fair and reasonable that there should be an appeal in all such cases given finally to the judicial authority, and I promised then that I would communicate in that respect with the governments of the several provinces where there is no such judicial appeal. In looking over the laws of the different provinces, I notice that in every case, there is such an appeal, except in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. In Nova Scotia there is an appeal to the sheriff; in your province, there is none at all. I submit to your consideration that it would be a proper step to take to amend your Franchise Act by giving an appeal to the County Court judges. You may tell me that your laws worked satisfactorily up to the present time. This, I do not dispute, but, as it would be desirable to have as near as possible uniformity of laws in election matters, I venture strongly to press on you that my suggestion should receive your favourable consideration.

Yours very sincerely,

WILFRID LAURIER.

The Hon. H. R. EMMERSON,
Fredericton, N.B.

FREDERICTON, N.B., 3rd April, 1899.

DEAR SIR WILFRID,—I have your note of the first instant, referring to the election law of this province, and beg to say that the matter will have my early attention. We can probably meet your views with respect to the subject.

Very sincerely yours,

H. R. EMMERSON.

To the Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER,
Ottawa.

OTTAWA, 1st April, 1899.

MY DEAR MURRAY,—When we repealed, last year, the Franchise Act, and adopted the franchises of the different provinces as the franchise for the elections to the House of Commons, the opposition pointed out to us that there were some provinces, where there was no appeal to the judicial authorities, of the decisions rendered by the provincial officers entrusted with the preparation of the lists. It seemed only fair and reasonable that there should be an appeal in all such cases given finally to the judicial authority, and I promised then that I would communicate in that respect, with the governments of the several provinces, where there is no judicial appeal. In looking over the laws of the different provinces, I notice that in every case, there is such an appeal, except in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. In your province, there is an appeal only to the sheriff, and I would submit to your consideration that it would be a proper step to take to amend your Franchise Act by substituting the County Court judge to the sheriff for the hearing of such appeals. You may tell me that your laws worked satisfactorily up to the present time. This, I do not dispute, but, as it would be desirable to have as near as possible uniformity of law in election matters, I venture strongly to press on you that my suggestion should receive your favourable consideration.

Yours very sincerely,

WILFRID LAURIER.

The Hon. G. H. MURRAY,
Halifax, N.S.

PROVINCIAL SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
NOVA SCOTIA,
HALIFAX, 8th April, 1899.

MY DEAR SIR WILFRID,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the first instant.

In reply, I regret to say that before its receipt, our legislature had prorogued, and, even if the government were desirous of carrying out your wishes in respect to an appeal in all cases under the Franchise Act to a judicial authority, we could not at present do so. All I can say at present is, that during the recess we will give the views you express upon this matter consideration, and if we determine to amend our Franchise Act in the direction suggested by you, a bill will be introduced at the next session with that object in view.

Yours very truly,

G. H. MURRAY.

SIR WILFRID LAURIER,
Premier, &c., &c., Ottawa.

So that, as far as the correspondence is concerned, it is, perhaps, as favourable as we could anticipate. But I still repeat what I said in the first place, that if the Minister of Justice, when I asked him if any correspondence had taken place, had frankly stated the facts as they were, that owing to the absence of the Premier no steps had been taken, and not allowed the House, as he did in the last answer, to believe that this correspondence had taken place before I called the attention of the House to it, it would have been better for himself and also for the House, and saved him a good deal of trouble in answering questions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman insinuates what is wholly unfounded and what I think he has no right to insinuate in in this House—that I knew whether the correspondence had taken place or not, and that I concealed that fact from the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No; I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes; that is practically the statement that the hon. gentleman has made. I say that statement is wholly unfounded, and until the hon. gentleman put his question, and I made inquiry of the Prime Minister, I did not know whether the correspondence had taken place or not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I never doubted that, but what I say is that when I asked the question a second time, and the hon. gentleman told me correspondence had taken place, it would have been much more frank in the minister to have said, "No correspondence has taken place, but it will take place," and then the House would know what they were doing. I acquit the hon. gentleman as to the first answer, but when I asked him the second time he should have made a frank statement. When I asked for the answers made by the Premiers his reply was, "You did not ask for that."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was perfectly true.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Every one would draw from that answer that the hon. gentleman knew that no correspondence had taken place until I had called the attention of the House to the matter, and that the correspondence not having taken place until the 6th, which was at a period that no answer could have been received, he should have said so. I did not doubt the hon. gentleman's statement.

The motion to adjourn was withdrawn.

GRAND TRUNK AND INTERCOLONIAL EXTENSION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (138) "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal." He said:—I rise for the purpose of moving the second reading of this bill. I regard it as a measure of great importance, not merely to the railway owned by the administration, vested in the name of Her Majesty, but also to the country generally. The object of the measure is to secure to the Intercolonial Railway a fair portion of the commerce of the country—that portion which legitimately pertains to the maritime provinces. It was one of the conditions of the union of these provinces that the Intercolonial Railway should be constructed connecting the maritime provinces with the western portion of the Dominion. The road was built, in the first instance, in fulfilment of that contract, and extended from Halifax to Rivière du Loup. It was not intended, nor was it expected, that this road should be a local road for the maritime provinces—that that should be its primary object. It was for the purpose, not merely of local trade and convenience between the provinces that were interested, but it was intended to commercially unite those provinces to the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario. It was also contemplated in the Act of union that there should be a railway extension westward, to unite Ontario and Quebec and the western territory that had not yet been acquired, but which it was the intention of the promoters of the Act of union to embrace within the federation and to extend that union ultimately to the Pacific Coast. That has been accomplished, but the same course was not adopted to secure intercommunication between these provinces lying to the west that was adopted in the case of the Intercolonial Railway. It was the general opinion of both the great parties represented in Parliament that the railway system of the west could be best promoted and best carried out through the instrumentality of a company; and, in fact, the great corporation that was called into existence for the purpose of constructing and operating that railway, besides many others that were less important and less interprovincial, has been aided and subsidized by the Dominion from the Dominion treasury, and the business which they carry to Montreal, as the great commercial centre of the Dominion, may be very fairly shared in by the Intercolonial Railway in the interests of the entire federation. It would be acting rather an improper part to undertake to deny to the Intercolonial Railway, as a public possession, its fair share of the commerce of the country, and to endeavour to divert commerce into other channels than those through which it naturally flows. When the Intercolonial Railway was first projected, it was connected with the Grand Trunk system at Rivière du Loup, and there it was found that it received only a mere fragmentary portion of the trade from the west which passed over the Grand Trunk system to that point. At a later period, the government believed it in the public interest to acquire that section of the Grand Trunk extending from Rivière du Loup to the Chaudière curve. That was acquired, and the Intercolonial Railway was placed in a better position than that which it had before occupied, because it was at a commercial point, far less important than Montreal, but still a point from which some trade could be acquired The government have for several years held to the view that the Intercolonial Railway system ought to be extended westward to Montreal. That view was entertained and it was expressed by the Minister of Railways under the late administration. In his opinion, speaking he says for himself alone, it would be an advantage to the Intercolonial Railway to have been carried westward to the city of Montreal, in order that at that point it might have a better opportunity of securing a fair proportion of the traffic that was intended for eastern destination. That plan has been carried out under the present administration, and this bill is for the purpose of giving effect to that policy and to enable the Minister of Railways and those officers who are managing the Intercolonial Railway system under his direction to secure to the Intercolonial Railway a larger proportion of the trade of the country than it has hitherto obtained, with a view of making the road in the first instance self-sustaining, and in the second instance of lightening the public treasury from the burdens that otherwise would fall upon it. Any one who will take the trouble to look at the original cost of the Intercolonial Railway, at the sums that have since been expended for the extension of the road and the improvement of its condition, and the increase of its rolling stock, will see that, after due allowance has been made for those expenditures, there are large sums that have been charged during the period of twenty years to capital account that if the road had been made prosperous would not have appeared as a charge against it at all. Now, we are of opinion that the extension westward is advantageous. I assume that that is generally admitted by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, and that it is hardly necessary I should undertake to establish that the western extension is calculated to increase the traffic over the road and to make it more prosperous than it has hitherto been. The traffic that comes from the west and reaches Montreal over the two great railway systems of Canada, west of that city destined for the maritime provinces, may, when the Intercolonial Railway is fairly established in Montreal, secure the business that legitimately belongs to the maritime provinces. The hon. Secretary of State, in discussing the Drummond County Railway—which cost in its construction, according to the most satisfactory estimates that we have had, something over $2,000,000, and which has cost the original promoters, apart from the subsidies from the Dominion Government, from the government of Quebec and from the municipalities, $1,338,000, and which is 133 miles in length—pointed out that it is being secured under the contract made with the Drummond County Railway Company for $1,600,000.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Does the hon. gentleman say that the Drummond County Railway is 133 miles long?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, with the branch, which amounts to a little more than $17,000 a mile. The testimony that was taken before a committee is that roads intrinsically inferior to the Drummond County Railway, as it is on being delivered up to the government, have cost those who have constructed those lines from $16,000 to $17,000 a mile. The evidence of Mr. Wainwright, taken two years ago before a committee of the House of Commons, was that the roads which they had constructed in the province of Quebec, cost them from $17,000 to $19,000 a mile, and which are certainly not superior in construction to the Drummond County Railway. I take it then to be well established, and I think I need say no more upon that point, that the amount to be paid for the acquisition of that road is not an excessive sum, if the Intercolonial Railway system is to be extended from Lévis to Montreal. It could not be done so cheaply to the public treasury in any other way as by the acquisition of this road as a portion of that extension. I need say nothing more on that question. My hon. friend has moved in this House the second reading of a bill to confirm the agreement which has been made between the Drummond County Railway Company and the government. That bill is before this House at the present time for its consideration. I have already stated the importance of this extension to the commercial interests of the Intercolonial Railway, I need but mention one fact, which will go to establish that, and it is that within twelve months the traffic secured by the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal has been about three-quarters of a million dollars, something more than two-thirds of which is east bound traffic, and which is certainly of great consequence to the maintenance of that road. I have, therefore, in this matter, in the first place, to consider the terms of the agreement entered into with the Grand Trunk Railway Company for the purpose of extending the connection from the western limit of the Drummond County Railway into the city of Montreal. The terms of that agreement, set out in the schedule attached to the bill, are that a half interest is acquired in the road itself from the Grand Trunk Company between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert station at the east end of Victoria bridge; also the use of the company's railway to Bonaventure station in Montreal, and that this half interest must necessarily be an undivided interest, subject, of course, to the confirmation of this agreement by the Parliament of Canada. It includes connections, appurtenances and terminals at Bonaventure, Point St. Charles, St. Henri and the Canadian Pacific Railway via Jacques Cartier Junction. Her Majesty acquires a half undivided share in the line of railway itself from and including Ste. Rosalie station, in the county of Bagot, to the Victoria bridge. It is also provided in this schedule that all rights, shares, titles and interests in the company's railway from the point on the west side of Chaudière bridge, at the proposed junction of the Drummond County Railway with the Grand Trunk Company's line, and including the Chaudière bridge, and similar rights over all the sidings, and to use all the stations, shall be secured to the Intercolonial Railway for a period of 99 years. It has been said that this is too long a period, but it does seem to me, if we are to acquire a proprietory interest in 33 miles of the connecting link between Lévis and Montreal, that the longer the interest that we can acquire from the Grand Trunk Railway in what remains the more advantageous it will be to the country; and so I hardly think that this House will take exception to the agreement which has been entered into between the Grand Trunk Company and the Railway Department, subject to the approval of Parliament because of the length of time for which that arrangement exists. It has been suggested that in a new country like Canada, where new settlements are being formed and new channels of trade opened, the traffic at no distant day may be so far diverted that an arrangement for a long period of time, whether over the way itself or in respect to its commerce, is not advantageous. It is impossible, I think, to maintain that position upon reflection. Every canal that is built is a permanent highway. Every railway that is constructed is a permanent highway, and if the government were the proprietor of the entire line, no one would think it would be an unwise thing to undertake to make such an arrangement, with reference to the traffic and travel that should pass over that road, as to continue for as long a period of time as possible If the Grand Trunk Company choose to enter into a contract with the government for the purpose of giving us a common right, absolutely free from interference, as capable of being controlled for our own purposes as if the road were entirely and exclusively our property, it does not seem to me that it is possible to make such an arrangement, if it be a reasonable arrangement, for a period that can be regarded as too long. Now, let me invite the attention of the House to the provisions of the agreement. In the first place, Her Majesty is to pay the company for the use of their road and bridges to the extent that is required for the use of the Intercolonial Railway the sum of $140,000 a year. The Grand Trunk Railway Company agree to keep in good repair and in thorough working condition the tracks and bridges of this common highway. Her Majesty is to pay a share of the cost of maintenance, including the maintenance of the tracks, bridges, switches, &c., in such proportion that the combined engine and car mileage of the Intercolonial Railway trains made over each of the above mentioned joint sections bears to the combined engines and car mileage of the company.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—A bad arrangement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No one will question that that is an equitable arrangement—each pays to keep the road in proper condition in proportion to the extent of their user. It is further agreed that Her Majesty has the right, for all purposes of business and traffic of the Intercolonial Railway, on reasonable regulations, to the full and unlimited use and access the same as that enjoyed by the Grand Trunk Railway itself. Our traffic to-day, of course, over this joint property is much less than that of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but we pay less for the user. So far as right to use the common way, our right is as absolute and as free from Grand Trunk Railway control as the Grand Trunk Company's right and use is from our control. Her Majesty is to have no claim against the company for damages on account of loss of accommodation, &c. In case of a collison between trains, the parties at fault shall be held responsible for damages done to the other party, and there is a plan provided in the schedule for the purpose of settling the amounts. In that regard the two parties stand upon a footing of perfect equality. In case of injury to persons or property on trains, the party at fault shall bear the full amount of the liability, precisely as in the case of collisions of vessels at sea. The superintendents, operators, agents, &c.—all the officers necessary for the working and management of the line of railway—shall be regarded as the appointed employees of both railways, and they shall render to each party proper service. They shall be subject to dismissal if they decline or refuse to serve either party. Each party is responsible for his own trains, and for the conduct of his own and the general employees as respects such trains. That, I think, is a perfectly fair arrangement, because all the officers on the Grand Trunk Railway are, so far as Intercolonial trains are concerned, the officers of the Intercolonial Railway and, as such, as subject to its authority as if they were the sole appointees of that company. The Grand Trunk Railway Company shall and will furnish standing room for the rolling stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The trains of Her Majesty shall be treated in every respect by the officers, agents and employees of the company, the same as the trains of a similar classs belonging to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. In every respect the Intercolonial Railway is to be on an equality with the Grand Trunk Railway in the use of the roads and sidings, and in the use of the tanks and stations, so that for all the purposes for which the railway can be used it is as exclusively the property of the Intercolonial Railway in that respect as if they were the sole proprietors. The time tables are to be arranged, in respect to the arrival and departure of trains, in accordance with the reasonable request of the Intercolonial Railway. The station masters, freight agents, ticket agents, baggage masters and other employees in the service of the Grand Trunk Railway are to be regarded as in the service of the Intercolonial Railway, and their officers as the joint employees of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Intercolonial Railway, and are to serve the Intercolonial Railway, so far as its business is concerned, in the same way as if they were its sole employees. The traffic secured by agents of the Intercolonial Railway, or carried in its trains, is accounted as the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway. The Intercolonial Railway is to have the right to carry on its through train traffic to and from all points on the line of railway between Ste. Rosalie and Montreal as completely as if it was the only road doing business over that line, and rates and fares are to be the same as those charged by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The Intercolonial Railway shall have the right to carry on its through trains, over the joint road, passengers and freight as freely as the Grand Trunk Railway Company. All moneys collected in the vehicles and trains of the Intercolonial Railway at any point between Ste. Rosalie and Montreal shall be deemed to be earned by the Intercolonial Railway. The tickets issued by the one shall be received on the trains of the other, and the party issuing them shall pay to the party who carries the passengers the full amount of money received. The Intercolonial Railway shall pay its proportion of the salaries and wages of the employees of the joint service. The engines, the vehicles and rolling stock in connection with the business of the Intercolonial Railway shall be manned exclusively by officials and employees of that railway. Her Majesty will be responsible for mileages on foreign cars carried over the joint sections by the Intercolonial Railway trains. The Grand Trunk Railway will house the engines of the Intercolonial Railway and, if required, will clean and fit them for the road, supply them with fuel and water, &c., and the company shall be paid therefor the net value. The Grand Trunk Railway Company will clean passenger trains and cars of the Intercolonial Railway, heat and supply them with water and small stores, and the Intercolonial Railway shall pay the cost. The Grand Trunk Company will make temporary repairs on engines and rolling stock of the Intercolonial Railway paying the actual cost. They will carry passengers on through tickets, and freight also. The Intercolonial Railway will supply their own stationery forms and tickets over the joint road. All rates and fares are to be divided on the basis of mileage except where the result would be inequitable. The Grand Trunk will, at its own cost, keep on sale at stations a supply of tickets for all points on the Intercolonial Railway. The Grand Trunk agrees to sell the tickets that may be asked for on points of the Intercolonial Railway. The Intercolonial Railway is to have the same privilege of displaying advertisements at all the stations on the Grand Trunk Railway as the Grand Trunk itself. The business and traffic of the Intercolonial Railway shall have all the facilities on the joint road and its appurtenances that the Grand Trunk has. The Grand Trunk shall furnish, if required, a suitable ticket office at Bonaventure station, and if the Intercolonial Railway maintains at its own expense a separate office it shall no longer be liable to the Grand Trunk for the maintenance of its ticket office. The accounts are to be adjusted every month, and all information necessary to this end shall be promptly furnished. A joint audit shall be had each month. Neither company shall be responsible to the other for the acts or defaults of the servants of the other. If the traffic shall necessitate the laying of a double track and additional siding, the Intercolonial Railway shall be entitled to the full and unlimited use of such improvements, and they shall form part of the leased premises and the proportional cost shall be borne by the Intercolonial Railway. The Grand Trunk Railway Company covenant that they have a right to lease the rights and privileges that are leased by this agreement to Her Majesty. Further agreements, if necessary, to carry out the terms of this contract shall be entered into.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question just there? Referring to the 35th clause, does that apply to anything beyond the railway from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert? I think not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. It applies to the road to which the contract and agreement refers. That is the road under the control of the Grand Trunk Company, and it specifically describes its terminals in this agreement.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, and on to Montreal double tracking so much as may be necessary. The contracts are for ninety-nine years. Second and third terms of ninety-nine years are arranged for, subject to limitations and modifications by mutual agreement. Of course this agreement is subject to the confirmation of Parliament, and so it is being submitted to Parliament at the present time for that confirmation. Mutual traffic arrangements have been made of the dates of this agreement. Close train connections to develop the business of the Intercolonial Railway by the Grand Trunk are agreed to at Montreal. The agreement also provides for the regulation of rates and fares. It regulates shipping to and from Europe through Halifax and St. John, and the rate is to be the same west of Montreal for passengers brought over the Intercolonial Railway, as for other passengers that are carried by the Grand Trunk Company. It is also provided that through bills of lading and forms for the receipt of goods shall be such as are agreed upon by the officials and are settled if not otherwise by arbitration. Her Majesty may deduct from the rentals agreed to be paid such sums as may become due by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and of which the company is at any time in default. It is also provided that, for the settlement of difficulties, arbitrators may be named, one appointed by the Minister of Railways, one by the Grand Trunk, and a third by the two arbitrators so named. But if none should be named, then a judge of the Supreme Court may nominate the third upon the application of either party. In case of the death or refusal of an arbitrator to act, the other party may nominate another arbitrator, but if this is not done within a month, the Chief Justice, or puisne judge, as the case may be, may nominate a successor. The arbitrators so chosen shall decide all matters in dispute that may be properly referred to them, and the award made by a majority of the board, after arbitration so constituted, shall be final. The agreement that previously existed between the company and the Intercolonial Railway, made in 1879, is suspended during the operation of this agreement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not the whole of it. It only says, "Clause 20 of the agreement between the company and the Intercolonial Railway, dated 17th July, 1879, is rescinded."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Besides this agreement to which I have referred, there is a supplemental traffic agreement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What clause does this repeal?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not looked it up. There is a supplemental traffic agreement, entered into on the 21st February, 1898, by which it is agreed that for traffic originating through the company's system, or on account of its connections west of Montreal, for shipment to any point on the Intercolonial Railway, Montreal is the junction point, and that the company undertake to route all traffic destined to points on the Intercolonial Railway. So that the Grand Trunk Company are not at liberty to carry traffic over their line, between Montreal and Lévis, or Chaudière, but they must deliver over all traffic, intended for any point on the Intercolonial Railway, to the Intercolonial Railway at Montreal. All business originating at Montreal, destined to points on the Intercolonial Railway, is to be considered Intercolonial Railway traffic. The Intercolonial Railway will, in turn, give all traffic destined to New England, east of Ste. Rosalie, to the Grand Trunk Company, and its connections at Chaudière Junction, the Intercolonial Railway being allowed Aston mileage. Traffic destined to points in the United States, reached by way of St. John, in the province of New Brunswick, or Rouse's Point, or Huntingdon, in the province of Quebec, or Massena Springs, N.Y., is to be delivered by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, at St. Lambert. All business originating on the Montreal joint section destined to points on the Grand Trunk Railway, east of Ste. Rosalie, shall be considered the company's business, and all business originating on sections destined for Intercolonial Railway points shall be regarded as Intercolonial Railway traffic.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Where will I find that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is in the supplemental agreement.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Is it distributed?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was laid on the table the day before yesterday.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I think it ought to have been printed.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—There was only one copy of it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—For how many years is that traffic agreement?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will state that presently. All business originating on the Grand Trunk east of Ste. Rosalie, or on the Intercolonial Railway between Ste. Rosalie and Lévis, inclusive, is to be changed at Chaudière Junction, or at Ste. Rosalie Junction. It is also provided in this supplemental agreement that Her Majesty will bill via Montreal all west bound traffic controlled by the Intercolonial Railway to points west in connection with export or import traffic, Halifax, St. John, or any point in the maritime provinces. The Intercolonial Railway will accept 425 miles to Halifax, and 325 to St. John. That is to put the Intercolonial Railway in this respect, by this specific arrangement, on a footing to compete with the Grand Trunk from Montreal to Portland.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—What is the actual distance?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is very much more.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is just double.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—St. John's rates are to be the same as those on the Canadian Pacific Railway and the same as quoted by the Grand Trunk to and from Portland, Halifax rates one cent per 100 lbs. over the road to or from St. John or Portland. This, of course, only applies to foreign traffic. It has no application to the local traffic, and the distance which the local traffic is actually hauled is charged. It only refers to foreign traffic. In the event of the Intercolonial Railway making arrangements with steamship companies to ply between Halifax and St. John, or any other port in the maritime provinces, and European points other than those covered by the Grand Trunk service from Portland, the company are to publish rates from stations west of Montreal. I take it those are the principal provisions of the supplemental agreement which has been made. This agreement is for a period of 99 years, renewable after the expiration of the period by those who may be living at that time, and that I think is a very proper agreement, both the renewal and the length of time. There can be no doubt whatever that this portion of the agreement is a portion that, hon. gentlemen will understand, is not insisted upon by the railway company, but by the government, for the purpose of protecting and securing a proper share of the traffic, which may be legitimately claimed by the Intercolonial Railway, to that road. I have already mentioned that the traffic obtained during the past 12 months by the Intercolonial at Montreal amounts to about three-quarters of a million, more than two-thirds of which is east bound traffic, and is carried over the Intercolonial Railway to the various points, within the maritime provinces, for which that traffic is destined. If there were no such arrangement, what would be the position of the Intercolonial Railway upon the expiration of any short agreement that might be entered into? Instead of delivering over the traffic to the Intercolonial Railway at Montreal, it would be the interest of the Grand Trunk to carry it on to Lévis and to deliver it to the Intercolonial at that point. The Grand Trunk might make an arrangement for a portion of the traffic to be carried from Sherbrooke over the Canadian Pacific Railway that otherwise, under this arrangement, would be secured to the Intercolonial Railway. The Grand Trunk Railway might carry traffic destined for the maritime provinces to Portland and ship it from there, which could be done successfully, in competition with the Intercolonial Railway, to various ports in the maritime provinces. So that the Grand Trunk Railway Company have actually at their disposal three other ways in which the traffic or the trade over their line from the west could reach the maritime provinces—by being carried to Lévis, by being handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway at Sherbrooke, or being carried to Portland. This arrangement, so far as the traffic is concerned, is not an arrangement specially to benefit the Grand Trunk Railway, but is intended specially to benefit the Intercolonial Railway, and to secure to it the largest share possible of the trade that will pass eastward, or may be made to pass eastward over the Intercolonial Railway to the various points in the maritime provinces to which that trade is destined. Let us suppose you were to enter into an agreement for ten years If these measures are carried out we will have purchased the Drummond County Railway, 130 odd miles of this connecting link of 160 odd. What would be our position at the end of ten years with that road upon our hands, and with no satisfactory traffic arrangements in force with the Grand Trunk Railway? We would be at the mercy of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. We could not use our road, known as the Drummond County Railway, so advantageously with any other company as with the Grand Trunk Railway link which we lease for the period of ninety-nine years—the undivided half interest which we secured by that lease. The moment our lease expired, our traffic arrangements would come to an end, and they would be masters of the situation. We would not be in the position we occupied when we stopped at Lévis We would have extended our road westward to a point that terminates practically nowhere, apart from the interests which we acquired in the Grand Trunk Railway section of the road. Besides that, very considerable expenditures might be made at our expense in the maintenance of a road in which, practically, our interests would have come to an end, because we would have no longer traffic arrangements with the company. I say, then, that it is of the first consequence to the Intercolonial Railway, and to the country, that these traffic arrangements provided for under this agreement should continue in force, and that they should not be terminated at a very early period. In fact, once you admit that it is a wise thing to expend money upon a highway, whether that be a waterway or a railway, you assume that the traffic over that is to continue for all time. No one expects, when you are making arrangements for the deepening and enlarging of your canals, that there is likely to come a period of time when any money that you expend, and any arrangement that you may make with a view to the future trade and commerce of the country carried over those canals, is to come to an end. We are proposing at the present time to deepen the harbour at Port Colborne, to fit it for the large vessels that ply upon the upper lakes. That refers, not to the present moment, but to the trade of the future. It is an important expenditure, extending over a long period of time—an indefinite period of time—and no one would think for a moment, once you make up your mind to expend money upon such an enterprise, that that expenditure can look forward to any other condition than that the commerce upon that line, or by that way, is to continue for all time. All your public works and undertakings in the interest of commerce and to facilitate trade between one section of the country and the other are based upon that assumption. If the government were the proprietor of the Grand Trunk as well as of the Intercolonial there would be nobody with whom traffic arrangements would be necessary. But your road is not a completed undertaking. It is a mere section of the commercial highways of the country, and you connect it with the Grand Trunk and also with the Canadian Pacific Railway, not for the purpose of promoting trade for five or ten or twenty years, but if your arrangement is a just one, the longer the period of time for which that arrangement can be made the greater permanency and security you give to traffic, and the greater assurance you give to those wishing to invest money in public works and undertakings or private works and undertakings, looking forward to the general commerce to be carried on over those lines. I say, therefore, I am unable to understand how any objection can be taken to the traffic arrangements between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the government. Those arrangements, I say, have been reluctantly entered into by the company. They were made necessary conditions by the government; in fact the arrangements would have no value apart from these permanent arrangements.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the hon. gentleman leaves that point, I would like to ask where the Intercolonial connects with the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway, I have understood the hon. gentleman to say in the arrangement it connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway. At what point does it connect?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It connects at the present time at Montreal with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, but the hon. gentleman was speaking of the arrangements into which they were to enter, and I understood him to say that the arrangement did enable the Intercolonial Railway to connect with the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railway. Where does it connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say there was any arrangement made between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the government, or the Grand Trunk Railway and the government under this agreement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understood the hon. gentleman to say that by this arrangement it enabled the Intercolonial to connect with the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railway. At what point does it connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understand they connect at Montreal Junction, and I understand that when the bridge is completed over the St. Lawrence at Quebec there will be connection there also. I say that already the Intercolonial has begun to reap some of the advantages that are to be derived from this extension to Montreal. In fact, the figures that were laid upon the table to-day for the information of members disclosed that fact. The expense of maintenance and the like paid by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and the government on behalf of the Intercolonial Railway, shows that the proportion of the Intercolonial Railway's interest in the trade over this line is constantly increasing, and that in April, 1899, it was very much larger than it had been in April, 1898.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The trade on all railways is increasing.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, the trade may increase, but the trade would have been, if it had not been for this arrangement, wholly under the control of the Grand Trunk Company. The same beneficial change is shown by the difference between the credit and debit side of the Intercolonial account. Now, for the eight months ending March, 1895-96, the Intercolonial was run at a loss of $161,632, and in 1896-97 it was run at a loss of $209,000. If you include in that the rentals that had been paid for the additional railway mileage secured, or $140,000, as a net loss for those eight or nine months of 1896-97, the loss was $71,000 in running the Intercolonial for the eight months ending March, 1897-98. For the current year ending in March there is a gain of about $4,000, showing that the Intercolonial has commercially benefited by the arrangement that has been made, and that the benefit each month is increasing. I say then that the arrangement proposed, by which the Intercolonial is to be extended to Montreal, is one in the interests of the Intercolonial Railway, and one of advantage to the country, upon the revenues of which that road has, in spite of all efforts to avoid it, been a burden. The financial condition of the road has been improved, its commerce has been increased. The public burdens have to a limited extent been lightened. That condition of things we have every reason to believe will improve, and to-day the Intercolonial Railway is in a more hopeful condition than at any period since it was built, and that is mainly due to this arrangement by which it is proposed to acquire the property in the Drummond County Railway, and the arrangement that has been made with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and especially the traffic arrangement that has been made that is to continue for a very long series of years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the hon. gentleman resumes his seat, would he inform us if there is any supplemental arrangement in reference to local trains between St. Lambert and Ste. Rosalie.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that the local trade is absolutely provided for in the agreement, a summary of which I have given and detailed to the House. Each is entitled to all the local traffic it can obtain, and the Intercolonial Railway is as free to solicit traffic within the common district as the Grand Trunk.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could the hon. gentleman inform us what material difference there is between this arrangement with the Grand Trunk and the old agreement which we were asked to confirm two years ago. Are there any material differences, and, if so, what are the differences?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will have to leave that question to be answered by hon. friend the Secretary of State. I was not a member of the administration when that old agreement was made, and I tell the hon. gentleman frankly, that I have never looked at it—never read it. I cannot say what its contents were.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the general arrangement was the same, but this is more in detail. A material point was the knocking off of $6,000 at the Chaudière end.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is there no other?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not that I can recall at this moment.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman's memory is bad.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps it is.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—What about the interest on the expenditure?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The difference is from five to four.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend does not take the position the Minister of Railways did in the House of Commons, that there is no material difference, and that it is the same bargain in both agreements. That I understood to be his position—that we are asked to confirm exactly the same agreement and terms that existed in 1897. Is that the case?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no. There is a material difference—a very great deal of difference. For instance, there is the annual rental at the eastern end, of $6,000 a year. That is absolutely off.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He admitted that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The amount, as we calculated it, $70,000 a year for the portion between Ste. Rosalie and Chaudière was reduced by the $6,000.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—How is that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the improved agreement made with the Grand Trunk Railway. Under that agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway we agreed to pay $6,000 a year from the Chaudière bridge. We took over that in the old agreement, but it is not in this.

Hon. Mr. WOOD- I should like to ask whether the agreement referred to in the 50th clause of the bill, which the hon. gentleman has just been discussing, will be placed on the table of the House, or placed within the reach of members. I have been unable to find it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was placed on the table the day before yesterday.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I mean the one of the 17th July, referred to in the 50th clause?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was under the impression that it was attached to the paper laid on the table.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—They ought to be printed, and we should have them here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The House can order them to be printed.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have not seen one of them.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—There are two agreements referred to, one in the 40th clause of the bill, and the other in the 50th clause. They are distinct agreements. They have not been printed. The first one, I understand, has been laid on the table of the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is an agreement which has been cancelled by the new agreement. However, if the House desires it, I can order them to be printed in time for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—It does appear to be cancelled.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the hon. member what he meant when he said that, at the ending of the contract and agreement, the country would be at the mercy of the Grand Trunk Railway. Would the hon. gentleman kindly tell me what he meant by that expression? Does it mean after the 99 years, or had he reference to the general traffic arrangement, or the supplemental arrangement?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I spoke of the condition of things that would arise if we had not the provision for the 99 years contract—if the traffic arrangements had been for a limited time, five or ten years. That is what I meant.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The address of the hon. Minister of Justice was delivered in a calm and judicial way, to which no one could take exception, no matter what opinion one may have of the deductions which he draws from the provisions of the agreement now before us. It consisted, in a great measure, of a synopsis, or a precis, of the agreement, which I think most of us have read. I would have preferred had he devoted more of his time, not only to presicing the provisions of the different sections and paragraphs of the agreement, but to explaining what will be its real effect upon the country after we have entered into this agreement, provided we ever do so. We are to consider by mutual agreement, as I understood it, both the bills before the House, one being a part and parcel of the other, and as the hon. Minister of Justice very properly said, without the one we should be left in a position in which the acquisition of the central part of the railway would be of no use to the country. With the indulgence of the House, before entering into a discussion of the provisions of the contract, I shall refer briefly to the policy which the government has pursued, and then to the difference between the contract as it is now before us and the one which we considered two years ago. I must express no little surprise at the position taken by the members of the government in reference to this bargain. We were told, in the most positive manner, by the head of the department, whose duty it is to govern and control the railroad system of the Dominion, that there was no difference whatever in the bargain made in 1897 and the one which we are now asked to confirm. First of all, the policy of the government, in its endeavour to increase the benefits to the country from the Intercolonial Railway by reaching the city of Montreal, is not disputed except by a very few. The mode in which that could have been carried out is a question upon which we do differ, and differ materially. There are some members of this House who think that it was not necessary to reach Montreal in order to accomplish the object which the government had in view in securing western trade. Two years ago speaking on this question, I mentioned the fact that my own view, and the view of very many others, was that this object could have been accomplished without incuring the debt which we are asked to assume by the adoption of this policy. I stated then that I believed it would have been better eventually, in the interests of the country, in the interests of the Intercolonial Railway, and more particularly in the interests of the eastern bound freight, which has its origin in the western portion of Canada, had the connection been made by the construction of a bridge at Quebec, thereby connecting with the Grand Trunk Railway on the south, and the Canadian Pacific Railway on the north side of the River St. Lawrence. We are, if I am to accept the declaration made by the Premier, and others of both parties in this Dominion, morally bound to assist in the construction of that Quebec bridge, and if that be the case, the traffic destined for the eastern provinces, whether it was for use and consumption in the maritime provinces, or for shipment to Europe, could have been competed for by the Grand Trunk on the south side of the St. Lawrence, and by the Canadian Pacific Railway on the north shore of the river at Quebec. However, that is not the policy that has been adopted by the government. They have taken the position that they should have a distinct and separate road on the south shore in order to reach Montreal, and there tap east bound traffic from the west. We are told by the Minister of Justice now, that we are not to have a complete and independent road because we are at the mercy at both ends of this road, of the Grand Trunk Railway, and that it is only by making arrangements, almost in perpetuity, for ninety-nine years, that gives us that right under certain conditions. The policy which I advocated I think would have been better in the interests of the country, certainly financially. Neither is there any reason why a traffic arrangement could not be made over either of these roads had such a policy been entered upon. If this House does not confirm the proposition now before it, and if the House of Commons delayed the passage of the measure for the length of time that they did, I lay the charge to the government themselves for having created this delay, and for having, I will not say blocked, but having placed the Senate in a position, if they so desire to do it, to reject this proposition. I have already pointed out that on no less than three or four pages of the Debates it will be found that the Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat, when leader of this House and a member of the government, pledged himself distinctly and positively that if the appropriation which was then before the House to enable the government to lease these two roads and to run them for nine months—these are the words which he used—it would be an experiment, and would enable the government and the country to decide as to whether they should confirm the agreements which had been entered into. We have asked for that information so as to enable us to arrive at an intelligent conclusion upon this point. That information has been steadily refused, on the ground, as stated by the hon. Secretary of State, that it could not be procured, and Mr. Schreiber is given as authority for that statement. On reading Mr. Schreiber's letter, from which the hon. gentleman made his quotations, it will be found that Mr. Schreiber's statement is, that owing to the manner in which the books are kept it is impossible to give that information. Now, no one ever denied that point. What we have contended is, that, a promise having been made, we should have certain information in reference to the earnings and expenditure connected with the working of that portion of the railway, the Drummond County, and between Montreal and Ste. Rosalie, to enable us to come to an intelligent decision as to the advantages which were to be derived from the purchase and lease of these two roads. It seems to have been, and must have been forcibly impressed upon the mind of every man who has read the debates in the other House, and the action of the government upon this question of furnishing information, that they have deliberately, on every occasion when attacked withheld information from the House of Commons, and consequently from the country. They seem to forget, at least I think so, that all communications, all public documents, and everything resulting from the action of the government, whether it be in a minor matter, or one of so grave importance as this with which we are now dealing, that the country is entitled to that information, and that it is not the private property of the government. Does the hon. gentleman want an illustration ? The House sat from three o'clock one day until four o'clock next afternoon, asking for a certain return, only a mere letter, which it was necessary to have before the House of Commons could deal with the question then under discussion; and for 28 or 30 hours they sat continuously until the government came down with that document. Since that time it was necessary, in discussing matters connected with the Yukon district and the projected telegraph line to Dawson City, that they should have the instructions which had been given to Mr. Charleson, whom some of us know by reputation, at least, to insist upon having the information. The government withheld it and kept the House sitting from 3 in the afternoon until 5 o'clock next morning, and finding the House determined to continue sitting until they got it, the government came down with the document. It seems to me the government's mode of dealing with this House is of precisely the same character. The leader of the House in 1897 made certain distinct promises. These promises have not been fulfilled, and the books of the railway have been so kept that they cannot furnish the promised information. I find in very agreement before us that there is a special provision for a monthly account between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and Her Majesty in connection with the mileage and the traffic on that portion of the road between St. Lambert and Ste. Rosalie. If that can be kept by these two companies, in order that the government can pay their proportion of the expenses connected with the running of that portion of the road, every month, surely it could have been kept in order to inform this House, in accordance with the promise made, of the results of entering into the lease of these two roads. I might repeat, in connection with this, because it is pertinent to the point which I am now discussing, the statement made by the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, Mr. Schreiber, before the committee investigating the Drummond County Railway affairs of the House of Commons, and the replies made by telegraph from Mr. Pottinger to Mr. Schreiber in reference to the furnishing of certain information. He did give the information as to the earnings and working expenses of these two roads for two or three months, and then he said that he could not procure the information for the remainder of the time for a couple of months. If they could do it for a portion of the time, could they not supply the information for all the time? That is one cause of complaint the Senate has against the government for not furnishing the information they had been promised. It would have enabled every member to arrive at a better conclusion than they can possibly do to-day, in dealing with this question. Let me refer for a moment to the financial aspect of this arrangement as it affects the Dominion. One hundred and forty thousand dollars is to be paid annually to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It represents, capitalized at three per cent, $4,666,666. Then we are to pay in cash $1,600,000 for the Drummond County Railway from Ste. Rosalie to the Chaudière Junction. That makes a total amount of $6,266,666. In other words, we add, in order to accomplish the object which the government has in view by its policy, to the public debt of the country that amount of money. My hon. friend was not able to tell us what difference there is between the old agreement and the one now submitted to the House. I shall venture a little information to him in that respect. When we look at the agreement as it is before us to-day, and then look at the declaration made by members of the government, that there is no difference between the old arrangement and the present one, hon. gentlemen will marvel at the position taken by the government, who should have come down to the House and stated all the facts in connection with it. Would it not have been much more manly, straightforward and honest?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Unmanly, crooked and dishonest!

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that be the language the hon. gentleman applies to his colleagues, I have no hesitation in accepting it as correct.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is what the hon. gentleman uses as parliamentary language.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman will be kind enough not to attempt to interpret what he thinks I think. I am not in the habit of speaking by innuendo. I am more inclined to speak a little too plainly what I do think. I say that any man who is not overburdened with pride, and forgeting the position which he occupies in the country, the duty he owes to his constituents and to those who support him, and to those who are not in accord with him, would have come down in a manly way and said "The Senate rejected the proposition for certain reasons. We are delighted to know, and we claim credit for having made a better bargain to-day, and we ask you to accept it." That is what I mean, and what I do say. The Drummond County Railway Company was to receive $64,000, per annum for ninety-nine years. That represents capitalized at three per cent $2,123,000. Calculated, as it was calculated by the actuaries, at two seven-eights, it would be more than the amount I have stated. Any one who desires to see what that calculation is can refer to the report of the investigation on the Drummond County Railway. Now, we are asked to pay $1,600,000. That is an actual saving to the country, in that transaction alone, supposing that we accept the agreement, of $523,333. Would it have been derogatory to the head of the Railway Department to have admitted that, instead of having, when he was told he had made a better bargain than he had made before, denied it positively and claimed that it was the same thing? Then we have a saving of $6,000 per annum, which the country was to pay for the use of the Chaudière bridge and the entry into the town of Lévis. That represents at 3 per cent, no less sum than $200,000, which makes in these two transactions a saving of $753,333. If the Senate were prepared to rest on its laurels and say on this transaction alone we have saved the country three-quarters of a million dollars, I think they would stand in a very creditable position before the people of this country. Having said this much, I will reply to some statements made by the hon. Secretary of State, before dealing with the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. I do not know how it impressed itself on the minds of those who heard the hon. Secretary of State, but it seemed to me like an address delivered to an illiterate jury without any judge to correct the position that he had taken. I cannot conceive how a gentleman in his position could have made the statements that he did, and delivered the speech he made, unless he came to the conclusion that every man who listened to him knew nothing of the subject with which he was dealing. He spoke in the first place—and the hon. Minister of Justice also referred to it—of the deficits of the Intercolonial Railway, from the time of its construction up to the present day, and in order to swell the figures he added expenditures which were charged to capital account to the losses of the Intercolonial Railway, each year, and the Minister of Justice incidentally referred to it, and made this extraordinary statement, that had the railway been more prosperous in its earnings than it was, these charges would not have been carried to capital account.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear!

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not understand that to be the true principle of railway book-keeping. It matters not how much a railway may earn: it may earn enough to pay large dividends, but if any additional road be added to the original line, or if any new structures be made, that is always charged to capital account. The current expenses apply only to the replacing of that which has been formerly constructed. In other words, if you have one hundred cars and they are worn out, and you replace them by another 100 cars, that is charged to the current expenditure of the year and not to capital account.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not always.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They should be always, I am coming to that presently. I know you do not do it, but you should do it. If my hon. friend takes the trouble to look at the public accounts, he will see that certain changes of route, sidings, &c., were charged to revenue.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the hon. gentleman is scarcely fair. In all cases where there was extra mileage, I stated whether there was extra mileage or not. There were some years in which there was no extra mileage, and I called attention to the fact that there was still a large deficit. The hon. gentleman is rather misrepresenting what I said.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The system of railway book-keeping, if I understand it—and I have the best authority for the statement—is this, that if cars are worn out, whether freight or other cars, they are replaced and charged to the earnings of the road for that year; but if you add an additional 100 cars to the road that you had not before, you charge them to capital account. That is proper book-keeping, and that is the manner in which it has been done. Now, my hon. friend intimated to us when he spoke of those large amounts which were charged to capital account, that when he referred to them that there was certain additional mileage; and otherwise he took particular pains when there was a large sum charged to capital account to point out to the House that there was no additional mileage.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Had the hon. gentleman studied the question a little, and had he been desirous of giving all the information that should have been given on that point when dealing with capital account, he might have said that there were large expenditures in connection with the construction of bridges in different parts of the lower provinces, particularly in Nova Scotia, in which no mileage was added. Take, for instance, the bridge at Grand Narrows; there was a bridge that cost between five and six hundred thousand dollars. That was charged to capital account, but there was no additional mileage added to the Intercolonial Railway, and in many other cases precisely the same way. My hon. friend reminds me there is a very large expenditure in connection with the Dartford bridge at Halifax, which was swept away upon one occasion and had to be rebuilt. Then there was the construction of elevators in Halifax. These did not add to the mileage of the road, but it added to the charges in the capital account, and so it was in many other cases. Then the hon. gentleman led the House to believe that the losses in connection with the Intercolonial Railway had been so enormous that it was necessary every year to add to the capital account, in addition to the loss on the running expenses. But he failed to inform the House that there were a number of lines constructed which added to the length of the Intercolonial Railway. There was that section which forms now a portion of the Intercolonial Railway, running into Cape Breton, and we know that a portion of that is of a most expensive character. If you refer to the public accounts you will find that that road cost between three and four million dollars. Then there was the Oxford branch, and there was an addition made to the road from New Glasgow running into the town of Pictou, and many others, so that the length of the line was increased materially which that added to the expense. Then there was an extra line which forms now a part of the Intercolonial Railway—probably my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Snowball) knows something about it—called the Indiantown branch. That had to be added to capital account and not to the current expenditures of the year. Then in calculating the cost to the country of the Intercolonial Railway, the hon. gentleman told us that it was about $48,000 per mile, and then he compared that with what they were paying for the Drummond County Railway. The actual cost of the Intercolonial Railway including all rolling stock, all the additions and everything connected with it, was $47,300 per mile. But when the hon. gentleman told us they were getting the cheapest railway in the world, the Drummond County at $12,000 a mile, he did not know, when I put the question to him as to how much had been charged to capital account and which should form a portion of the expenditure in connection with it. I suppose the hon. gentleman knows they have had to purchase a large amount of rolling stock in order to operate that road. I suppose he knows also, that on some fifty miles of that road, they have been taking up the light rails, and placing down heavier ones. That would go to capital account. And if the hon. gentleman desired to give that information which he should have given, knowing all these facts, he should have stated them, because the public know very little about it; then we should have known exactly what the Drummond County Railway is costing the country. The unfairness of a statement of that kind is apparent to every one—to say that the Intercolonial Railway costs so much and then hold up the other as evidence of their economical management, in purchasing the new road, though when they received it, it was not worth a snap of your finger until they had repaired the track. They have changed some four or five miles of the route of the road in order to avoid the heavy grades which were upon it—grades greater than those on the Grand Trunk Railway, which was the great objection, they said, to their entering into the bargain—for running powers over their road.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Has the Drummond County Railway to pay for it?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Then it cannot be charged to capital account.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They rebuilt some portions of the road and repaired the other. The statement of earnings given by the hon. gentleman and the apparent saving and expenditure was only for ten months. I do not find any fault with his giving the receipts and expenditures on the whole line for the three months only, for the simple reason that they could not very well obtain the other at the time the statement was made out, but it must not be forgotten that the two months for which we have no statement of the expenditure are the two months in which all railways have to spend the most money. It is just after the breaking up of the winter season after the upheaving of the track; and this case will be, I venture the assertion, similar to one which occurred on the Intercolonial Railway when the late Minister of Railways could show a large earning up to a certain period, but when he came to deduct the expenses of the two months which were not included in the statement, as in the case we have here, precisely the same two months, he found that the expenditure in keeping up the road to its proper standard cost nearly all the savings that had been made during the previous ten months. So it will be in this case, and if we live to examine those accounts after another year, I venture the statement that you will find that what I have stated is correct. Then I was not a little surprised to hear the statement made by the hon. gentleman that we had subsidized the road now known as the Short Line, operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway, as a competing line with the Intercolonial Railway. There was a period when I thought probably there was some truth in that statement. But what are the facts. If we are to accept the hon. Secretary of State's statement that the Intercolonial Railway, since the construction of the Short Line, has been earning more annually then it ever did before and that its earnings are gradually increasing, then its in evidence that the competition has not injured the Intercolonial Railway. Does it not suggest itself to the hon. gentleman that the road has given a great impetus to travel through the maritime provinces. Thousands of people go by the Short Line, take the Intercolonial Railway at St. John and go to Halifax and to Cape Breton, which they never would have thought of going if they had to travel 800 or 900 miles on the Intercolonial Railway. Such we know to be the fact, and although one might suppose and believe that that would be a competing line the question now arises as to whether, on the whole, it is not proving a benefit rather than a detriment. But that was not the reason which induced the government at that time to subsidize the road. We know, and every man more particularly in the maritime provinces knows, that it has been the fond dream of every commercial man in this country, that there should be a winter port established in the lower provinces. The question has been agitating the mind of every politician and every commercial man for the last twenty-five years as to how that could be accomplished. I do not speak egotistically, but I say that when I was Premier a deputation from St. John waited upon me as to granting subsidies for the line of steamers between St. John and European ports. The question was then discussed, and I put it to the deputation in this way: "If you can show that you can by the Canadian Pacific Railway's Short Line deliver freight in the city of St. John at the same freight rate as it is now delivered by the Grand Trunk in Portland, you will have accomplished that which you are asking for, and have been endeavouring to accomplish since confederation." Their interview with the Canadian Pacific Railway was of this character: the managers of that road, the present Sir William Van Horne and Mr. Shaugnessy, being shrewd business men, saw that if they were to accomplish anything they would have to make the mileage rate to St. John, though over 200 miles further, the same as to Portland, and by that means furnish trade for the steamers that were to sail for the European ports. Upon that condition and for that reason alone we asked Parliament to give subsidies to the Beaver Line of steamers, and I am glad to know that it has succeeded to a very great extent. If, however, the government are to deprive the Canadian Pacific Railway of all the advantages which they are deriving from their connection with St. John by this traffic arrangement which they have entered into for ninety-nine years, good-bye to the winter port of St. John in the future. Look at it in another light. Railways are like corporations, they have very little conscience. They care very little more about one port than another, and while statesmen ought to look at these questions from a patriotic standpoint, the railway manager will look at it from the manner in which it affects the pockets of the shareholder. What I fear is that the Canadian Pacific Railway, through this discrimination which is being made against them, may be driven by necessity to look for an outport at some other place. If they can carry freight from the west and Montreal to Boston, as cheaply as the Grand Trunk will take it to Portland, then they will come into competition with them. They are now carrying it 200 miles further to a Canadian port in order to give traffic to a British line of steamers, which they may carry to a foreign port precisely as the Grand Trunk is doing to-day. This agreement does not prevent the Grand Trunk from taking their traffic to Portland, and St. John will have lost the benefit to a very great extent, which they are reaping now from the construction of the Short Line. We have watched the course of trade for a number of years past. We have noticed how traffic has been diverted from one port to another. Those who have studied the trend of trade in this country, or in any country, know that its outlet will be where the carriers can take it the cheapest, and that where there is discrimination against them at one point, you will find they will give the preference to any other port.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Resumed his speech. He said:—I was when the House rose at six o'clock, pointing out what effect the freight tariff would have upon the business of the maritime provinces, particularly so far as relates to the establishment of a winter port. I shall occupy a few minutes and shall be as brief as I possibly can in referring to the clause to which I take the most objection in this contract. The 40th clause of this contract reads as follows:—

> In consideration of the rents and covenants hereinafter reserved and contained Her Majesty represented by the general traffic manager of the Intercolonial of the one part, and the company by its general traffic manager of the other part have entered into a mutual traffic arrangement in writing of even date herewith which traffic arrangement is hereby declared covenanted and agreed to be and form a part of and be supplemental to the contract and shall be read herewith and shall be binding upon the parties hereto during the continuance of his leasing contract, except so far as the same may be altered with the mutual consent of Her Majesty and the company. When and if the traffic arrangements shall be so altered from time to time, such amended contract shall be substituted for the supplemental contract of this date.

What the former contract was or what its provisions were, the House is not informed, nor am I aware that it has been laid before either House of Parliament. One thing we do know, that the supplemental contract, with which we have to deal just now, was not laid before Parliament until after the motion had been carried which I placed upon the paper asking for that document. It has been argued that in the lower House the terms of that contract were known, and that it was fully discussed and not objected to. I have searched in vain to find any correctness in that statement. It is true, one of the leading men in the lower House called attention to this paragraph of the contract, and moved an amendment based upon the terms of this contract. But any one who will read his remarks and read the amendment can come to no other conclusion than that the amendment was based upon the general principle that the Department of Railways should not have the power to enter into any supplemental freight contract, perhaps I had better say freight arrangement, supplemental or otherwise, without first laying it before Parliament and having it approved by Parliament. Had he known that this supplemental contract existed, and that it contained the provisions which it does, his amendment would not have been in that direction. The idea which suggested itself to the gentleman in the lower House who moved that amendment, suggested itself, I confess, to me when I first read the fortieth clause. But when I came to consider the latter clause, that there was a supplemental contract and that it was necessary that we should know the terms and conditions upon which this traffic should be carried on, I placed the notice upon the paper, and until that document was laid before the Senate, none of those who took part in the discussion, as I can learn, had any knowledge whatever of its terms, or even its existence. What I object to most, is that it gives to the Minister of Railways and Canals absolute power to enter into any traffic arrangement, no matter of what character, and the moment they enter into that arrangement, that moment it becomes de facto the law of the land, and there is no means of abrogating or changing it except by the mutual consent of all the parties. If the supplemental arrangement into which they have entered at the present moment be to the advantage of the Grand Trunk Railway, as I think I will be able to show it is, though detrimental to the interests of Canada as a whole, then it is not to be supposed that the Grand Trunk having its own interests at stake, and desiring to pay a dividend, no matter how small it may be, will ever consent to a change in that arrangement. The same argument may be used and the statement may be made providing it is found to be in the interest of Canada, but not half as likely to be enforced, because there are always influences outside that prey upon —I use that word advisedly—a government that compels them sometimes, for many reasons, to do that which an individual in dealing with another individual never would think of doing or consenting to. I think any one who has had any experience in the administration of affairs will concede that point at once.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Government secret.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not exactly a government secret, most people who know anything of politics will know exactly what I mean, without my putting it in words. Let me call attention for a moment to the supplemental contract which my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) declared had not been printed or circulated. The hon. Minister of Justice truly said it was laid upon the table. It was laid on the table, and I have it on my desk, because I desire to refer to it. What the other contract was I do not know. We have never seen it. And what is meant by repealing of the 20th clause of the agreement between the company and the Intercolonial Railway of the 17th July, 1879, I do not know.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was entered into by the government of which the hon. leader of the opposition was first a member, when the Rivère du Loup branch was taken over and the Chaudière Junction was made the place for transferring freights from the Grand Trunk to the Intercolonial Railway, and it refers to that particular contract, which, of course, is suspended, so far as the transfer at that point is concerned, by this one coming into operation which requires transfer at Montreal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The question of suspending that contract is referred to in another clause. I understand that. Very likely my hon. freind is right, because at that period when they purchased the Rivière du Loup branch and the Grand Trunk owning the road into Lévis from Chaudière, and the connection being made with the Intercolonial Railway at the Chaudière, that is in all probability the contract into which my hon. friend refers. But the supplemental contract with which we are now dealing reads as follows :—

All business originating in the city of Montreal or on the Montreal joint section——

That, I presume, means the section between St. Lambert and Ste. Rosalie. I think that is what is understood as the joint section.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—It will all be a joint section in Montreal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We all understand that, but I am speaking of the contract. I am reading and endeavouring to understand what it means. It continues :

Shall be considered Intercolonial traffic, it being agreed that in connection with that consideration the Intercolonial Railway will give all the traffic from its system and connections that it can control destined to New England points, or any other point east of Ste. Rosalie, reached by the Grand Trunk system and its connections to the Grand Trunk Railway at Chaudière Junction, the Intercolonial being allowed on Aston mileage.

The latter part I suppose is an arrangement by which they arrange for the mileage, but I do not know why Aston is spoken of.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It was one of the junction points.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the contract continued :

All traffic which can be controlled by the Intercolonial Railway destined to these points must be given to the Grand Trunk Railway.

Another paragraph reads :

Traffic destined to points in the United States reached via the gateway of St. John, P.Q., Rouse's Point, N.Y., Huntingdon, P.Q., and Massena Springs, N.Y., delivered to the company at St. Lambert.

That is the western terminus on the south shore of the St. Lawrence of the Intercolonial Railway road, if we term that portion of the Grand Trunk the Intercolonial, which it is, for all traffic purposes.

All business originating in the Montreal joint section destined to points on the company's line east of Ste. Rosalie shall be considered company's business, and all traffic originating on said section destined to Intercolonial Railway points shall be considered Intercolonial traffic.

The paragraph is fair enough, apparently, because there is no compulsion either one way or the other, but it simply declares that certain traffic shall belong to one road, and other traffic to the other. Then it continues :

All business originating on the company's line east of Ste. Rosalie or on the Intercolonial Railway between Ste. Rosalie and Lévis, inclusive, to be interchanged at the Chaudière Junction, Aston Junction or Ste. Rosalie Junction, or at other junction points as may be hereafter opened, the understanding being that such business is to be forwarded by both lines via the shortest route between the points of shipment and destination.

How that is to be carried out I scarcely know, not being a railway man, but I think I will be able to show presently that some freight is carried 200 or 300 miles further than other freight, and that the Grand Trunk receives a larger percentage for carrying it than if they had carried it only the shorter distance.

Her Majesty further undertakes to route via Montreal all unconsigned west bound traffic controlled by the Intercolonial Railway or its connections destined to points west thereof reached by the company and its connection.

It is to the last three lines the most serious objection can be taken. If is a provision that compels the Intercolonial Railway, or the government, to give all unconsigned traffic that arrives at any seaport in the maritime provinces that has any connection with the Grand Trunk Railway, to send it over that line when it reaches the western destination.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see it does not refer to external traffic at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It refers in another place to European traffic.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think I can find it if I am not very much mistaken.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It refers to all traffic controlled by the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—On their line, but not foreign.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that if a cargo of goods arrives at Halifax destined for British Columbia, unconsigned, and forwarded by the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, that the Intercolonial Railway is not compelled, under this arrangement, to hand it over to the Grand Trunk Railway to be forwarded westward?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Yes, because it s not a Grand Trunk Railway connection..

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The Grand Trunk has in Halifax a connection with all steamers arriving at that port. What I am endeavouring to illustrate is that goods, the freight of which is controlled by the Intercolonial Railway to any point with which it has connection, has to be handed over to the Grand Trunk Railway and its connections, so that if a cargo of goods arrived at any port for shipment over the Intercolonial Railway that the Intercolonial Railway controls, unless the goods are otherwise consigned to their future destination, westward. A cargo of goods carried to any of our eastern ports for shipment to British Columbia we will say—and we all know that that trade is increasing rapidly—the moment it arrives in Montreal it is handed under this agreement to the Grand Trunk. The Grand Trunk conveys it to Chicago over its own lines, because it has an interest in and owns the line between Port Huron and Chicago; then it is handed over to some of the United States roads until it reaches St. Paul, and from that point is sent by what used to be termed the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba road, or what is now called the Great Northern, to Tacoma or Seattle, to be transferred by steamer and forwarded to Victoria or Vancouver. There are two competing lines that are fighting for traffic to-day, the Grand Trunk Railway, and the Canadian Pacific Railway which sends all the trade and traffic it can through British territory, giving employment to workmen on the road, to those who supply the cars, and to Canadian railways in which this country has invested some hundred of millions of dollars in cash, and twenty-five million acres of land. What I object to is this, that an agreement should be made by the government which gives the whole traffic of the eastern portion of Canada to a line, partly Canadian, which throws that great increasing traffic into United States lines though it may come ultimately into Canadian territory. Let us take a practical case: supposing a cargo of machinery is shipped to Quebec over the Intercolonial Railway, destined for the Atlin district, or the Rossland district, how do you suppose it would be forwarded unless sent by water? I am assuming that it goes by railway. That machinery—a class of freight which is constantly being sent from the eastern provinces, particularly from the provinces of Quebec and Ontario to the mining district—the moment it reaches the western terminus of the Intercolonial Railway it would be handed over to the Grand Trunk, and the Grand Trunk Railway, in its own interests, would forward that freight through United States channels. I do not find any fault with the Grand Trunk Railway Company for doing so. It only shows the shrewd business ability and perspicuity of the head of that railway at the present moment, for which he deserves great credit. He has too much brain and knowledge of railway traffic to deal with the men who represent Canada in this instance. The Grand Trunk Railway would send it over its own line and through its United States connections to the Pacific Coast. Now, that is what we have to look at in considering this bill. It is not a temporary arrangement that can be dropped at any moment by the government. It is there, I was going to say, almost in perpetuity, for ninety-nine years, and nobody can modify or terminate it unless the Grand Trunk Railway Company consent to a change. It seems to me a most marvellous thing that any Minister of Railways, or those who guide him, would have consented to terms of that kind. They might have made an arrangement for five or ten years. It may be—in fact, I am rather inclined to think that a few years of it might possibly be to the advantage of the Intercolonial Railway, but when I contemplate, as every man must do, the rapid growth of the trade of western Canada—and when I say western Canada I mean Manitoba, the Territories and British Columbia—and compare the traffic which we have to-day with that which existed prior to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we cannot come to any other conclusion than the day is fast arriving when it will be a hundred fold, yes, a thousand fold, what it is to-day. The country is growing rapidly; trade is developing marvellously, and that trade which used to round the Horn, taking some three or four months to reach British Columbia, can now cross the continent in about as many weeks. While it may cost the merchant, the miner and the manufacturer more to send their goods by rail instead of by water, the time saved in receiving the goods more than compensates for the extra freight they have to pay. I do not think it necessary that I should attempt to argue that question any further. It is so self evident to any one who has paid attention to the rapidity with which this country has grown within the last twenty years, more particularly in the western section since the Canadian Pacific Railway has been constructed. We are told by the Minister of Justice that the Grand Trunk Railway Company, did not want that clause inserted in the agreement, but that the Minister of Railways insisted upon it. The Minister of Railways and Canals told the country last year when he was discussing that now famous Yukon deal, that he himself insisted —you will find it in Hansard—that the company to which he was giving 3,750,000 acres of land to construct a narrow gauge road, nothing more than a tramway, that he insisted upon having a clause inserted in that contract that they should have a monopoly for five years; I have reason to believe that the parties interested refused to take the contract unless they got that monopoly. I leave it between them. One is Minister of Railways, the other the contractor. I leave the hon. gentlemen to draw their own conclusions. Under the circumstances, I should be inclined to believe the contractor, because the contractors who have to run and operate a road, particularly in a country where the traffic is supposed to be doubtful, would be more than likely to ask for a monopoly than the party who is paying them for building, and whose reason for having it built was that immediate entrance into the country, which was then not accessible by any other means except for two or three months of the year, was necessary. I said before 6 o'clock, that this agreement, solemnly entered into and unrepealable unless by those most interested, would be likely to drive the traffic in a direction outside of Canada to the detriment of the interests of Canada in every way. If it has the effect of taking away employment from our people and reducing the revenue of Canadian roads, then it must, to a greater or less extent, endanger the ports in the east, and more particularly that which I think every man in Canada has been working for, a winter port as an outlet to the ocean for the products of the west, and have the effect of providing employment for United States railways and steamboats at United States ports. The object of giving subsidies to steamers leaving St. John and Halifax has been to establish a Canadian winter port. The Canadian Pacific Railway carries from Montreal to-day, and has been carrying for some time, hundreds of thousands of bushels of grain, and cattle and hog products to St. John during the winter, which would otherwise have to go, as in the past, to Portland or Boston. If this agreement will have the effect of driving that traffic back to Portland and Boston, the government will have to take the responsibility of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman is quite prepared, occupying the position he does, to assume the responsibility, or he would never ask the Senate to confirm this agreement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That responsibility does not arise in this case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman said "hear, hear" when I said he would be responsible for diverting trade from Canadian ports. The hon. gentleman is in the habit of interjecting something that has nothing to do with the point I am trying to make, whether it is because he does not understand what I am saying, or to throw me off the track, I do not know. I am rather inclined to think it is the first.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear!

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am very glad the hon. gentleman approves. I was not in public life exactly, but I was in newspaper life, when the Grand Trunk Railway was built, and with what little ability I had, and from the time it has been in existence, I have always, as far as I possibly could, written and spoken on behalf of that great enterprise, believing, as I do, that it has done much in developing the resources of Canada. While I say that, I am equally convinced, having some little responsibility for the great assistance given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, I believe it is in the interest of Canada that these two roads should be equally aided in every possible way they can be, consistent with the revenues of the country. But I think that any Canadian who loves his country will come to the conclusion that no distinct preference should be given to one or the other, as both are destined to develop the resources of this country to an enormous extent, and I repeat what I said a moment ago—when we contemplate the rapid growth of the country, when we look at Manitoba alone which this year will turn out in all probability over 30,000,000 bushels of grain——

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Over 40,000,000 bushels.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend says the calculation is 40,000,000 bushels. Most of that has to find an outlet to Europe, and the more of it that is consigned by our railways the better, not only for the railways, but for the country. The more the railways can earn, the better for the people, and the higher the stocks stand in the market, the better is the credit of the country and the best possible evidence we can have of its prosperity. Should we, as a Parliament, do anything to aid one of these roads to take the traffic from the other, when its ultimate destination, if we confirm this agreement, would be to United States roads. That is the question we should ask ourselves. In looking over the tariff rates of freight on the Intercolonial Railway to the eastern provinces, I find this extraordinary fact—extraordinary to my mind, it may not be to others. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Snowball), as a railway man, will perhaps be able to give an explanation which, with my limited knowledge, I am unable to furnish. I find, looking at the present division of rates between the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk, based on the proposed agreement, that the government is not contented with buying St. John's business from the Grand Trunk at a most extraordinary price, but is giving the Grand Trunk a still further consideration on this particular traffic, as will be noted from the following figures showing the percentage as allowed the Grand Trunk from the various districts on that line to Moncton and St. John. Freight taken from what is called the Champlain district—that is the district below Montreal to Moncton—goes part of the way on the Grand Trunk, and the Grand Trunk is allowed 15 per cent of the freight rates, but if it goes by the Intercolonial to St. John, which is about ninety miles further, the Grand Trunk gets 22 per cent. In other words, the Intercolonial carries the freight ninety miles further and allows the Grand Trunk for the distance which it carries the goods, 22 per cent, when, if it is delivered at Moncton, it gets only 15 per cent.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—A discrimination against Halifax.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—They get in proportion to the mileage it is carried.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is quite the other way.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I suppose St. John is a competitive point, and Moncton is not?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps I can give another illustration which will make the point clearer, a car of goods taken from Windsor, Ontario, to Moncton. The Grand Trunk is allowed, for its haulage from Windsor to Montreal, where the freight is delivered to the Intercolonial Railway, forty-three per cent of the total freight paid. Then the Intercolonial Railway takes it from Montreal to Moncton and receives fifty-seven per cent; but if that car of goods is destined for St. John, N.B., which is ninety miles further, the Grand Trunk would get fifty-three per cent of the whole, and the Intercolonial only forty-seven per cent, though it takes the goods ninety miles further. That discrimination is carried on from the Chambly district, Kingston, Hamilton, Collingwood and all western points. There may be a reason for it which I do not understand. My hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McDonald) suggests that it is a discrimination against Halifax. I think not, because if you read this supplementary contract you will find if the goods go to Halifax the Intercolonial is entitled to one cent more per one hundred pounds. It can be for no other purpose than, having entered into an arrangement with one company to discriminate against another company——

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Is the hon. gentleman speaking of the tariff made a year or two ago?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am speaking of the tariff as it exists to-day, made under this arrangement within the last two years.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The supplementary tariff is in force under the temporary lease.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Of course, the hon. gentleman knows that the Railway Department entered into a contract upon certain terms and conditions with the Grand Trunk Railway Company and with the Drummond County Railway Company, after the defeat of the measure in this House, and that has been going on since, and this is the result. Should the government be a party to an arrangement of this kind? I have always been on the most friendly terms with the Grand Trunk as a public man and a journalist, but I can see no reason why the government should deliberately enter into an arrangement with one company at the expense of the other, and more particularly when the one is exclusively a Canadian enterprise, backed up, as I have already said, by over $100,000,000 of Canadian money, in order to enable another company to take the traffic of Canada to enrich a foreign country, and give employment to a foreign people.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Instead of carrying it across to the state of Maine.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What difference does that make? I know a great deal of our trade goes across the state of Maine. It is no fault of ours, and no credit to Lord Ashburton, who sacrificed our interests to earn a reputation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You subsidized a United States road in Maine.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not a United States road. It is a Canadian road, and the only means by which you can get a short line to the coast is by passing through Maine. There is only a short section of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Maine.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—This being a lower province matter, I feel anxious to get all the information I possibly can. The hon. gentleman says that if a car load of goods started from Windsor and went to Moncton, the Grand Trunk would get 43 per cent and the Intercolonial Railway the balance. Now, suppose the freight for that distance is $50——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Say one dollar a mile, to get at it easier.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—$50, is about the rate. I know, because I have had a good deal of experience. That would be $21.50 to carry it to Moncton. Supposing its destination is St. John, in that case the Intercolonial Railway would get $28. They would get a percentage, but more freight.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend has not understood what I said. It is exactly the reverse. If a pound of freight was carried by the Grand Trunk from Windsor to Moncton and the charge for that was $1, the Grand Trunk would get 43 cents; but if it went to St. John the Grand Trunk would get 53 cents, though if it was carried only to Moncton it would receive only 47 per cent.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—The freight would be $1.50 to St. John.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman knows very well there is a mileage rate on which railways carry freight. As an illustration, the Canadian Pacific Railway carries goods from Montreal to-day to St. John for shipment abroad at the same rate that the Grand Trunk charges to Portland, although the distance to St. John is 200 miles further, and according to this arrangement the Intercolonial Railway will have to carry goods 480 miles for nothing, at the rate the Grand Trunk is paid for that distance. I have given the rates as they are to-day, and I have shown, by this statement, that if the Intercolonial Railway carries freight ninety miles further, it gets less than if it leaves it at Moncton. That is the case according to the table I have been quoting from.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is the very thing this supplemental tariff would work out.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They do more work and get less pay.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—That has been the case for years. As the hon. gentleman from Halifax has remarked, St. John is a competitive point. For the last eight years you get freight from Montreal to St. John for a lower rate than to Moncton.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know what the hon.gentleman from Moncton says is correct—you get cheaper rates at competitive points. What I am pointing out is that the arrangement entered into under the supplemental contract is a direct discrimination against a Canadian road. I could elaborate this for an hour if necessary, but one or two illustrations are sufficient for my purpose. That is, under all circumstances, the most objectionable feature in this new arrangement, and I do not believe, when the people understand it, that they will justify any one in voting for its ratification. I admit that the present arrangement less those clauses, is better than the one we rejected before, for reasons which I mentioned in connection with the Drummond County Railway Bill, and the concessions which have been made by the Grand Trunk in reference to local traffic, and in reference to the percentage which should be paid on improvements, and some other points that it is not necessary for me to point out to the House. That is the duty of the hon. gentlemen who are asking us to ratify this agreement, and not of the member who is opposing it on the ground that it contains, to his mind, an exceedingly objectionable clause. If that were out, I cannot say, and do not say, what I would do in connection with this, speaking for myself as a member of the Senate, but that clause I do look upon as objectionable, more particularly when you consider that it is an agreement for ninety-nine years. There is another clause in this agreement which strikes me as unfavourable. It says at the end of ninety-nine years that the parties have the right, if they agree, to renew it for a second term of ninety-nine years. Let me ask the hon. Minister of Justice this question: supposing the development of the country is such that it may be to the advantage of the government, at that period, to abrogate this agreement and not to enter into another arrangement for another ninety-nine years, to whom will all the improvements that have been made during the term of this lease, in double tracking, building bridges and other improvements, belong? There is not a single word in the contract to show that the government, in case of the dissolution of the partnership (for such it really is), will receive a red cent. It all goes to the Grand Trunk. There are many points in connection with this that suggest themselves to one. Does any one believe it probable that we are to be confined for ninety-nine years to one or two railways running into Quebec? Why, at this very moment arrangements are going on for making a connection with the city of Quebec by way of the Canada Atlantic Railway, crossing at Hawkesbury and joining the Great Northern Line, and depositing western freight in the city of Quebec. The Canada Atlantic Railway and Parry Sound Railway have been in operation but a year or two, and when we look at the development of the traffic of that road and the millions of bushels of grain already carried over it from its western terminus by the means of boats that Mr. Booth's company has put on the upper lakes, what may we anticipate in the very near future?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It shows how mad this contract is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is what I was trying to point out. If that trade grows, and grow it will, a large proportion of the grain traffic of Manitoba and the North-west, which is increasing by millions of bushels every year, will come over that road and down to Quebec, yet by this arrangement the Intercolonial will be compelled to send all the unconsigned freight that passes over its line westward to the Grand Trunk, depriving all other competing lines of any part of it, and sending it through the United States to the great North-west. The more I look at this agreement the more I am satisfied that it would be ruinous in its character, particularly in the future. I may not live to see it, but there are others sitting here to-dav who will reflect, if they retain their memory, and regret the day they ever put an agreement of this kind on the statute-books of the Dominion, particularly the Quebec senators. The city of Quebec has been going down, down, down, for years. It is now beginning to look up, and why? On account of the enterprise which has been exerted during the last eight or ten years in the construction of a railway to reach that port. It is sixty-six years ago this summer since my father landed in Quebec, and as a boy I remember that city very well. I hesitate not to say, from my boyish recollection, that it was more prosperous than it has been for the last ten or fifteen years. They have been struggling, and so has the country been struggling, to build up the trade of that place, and I hope it may prosper; but if the members representing that section of the country are prepared to ratify this agreement and put another nail in the coffin of their city, on them must rest the responsibility. Statesmen cannot, in considering questions of this kind, think only of to-day or to-morrow. If I were to look at that contract as a Grand Trunk man or as a private individual, I would say that it would be to the advantage of the revenue of this country for a few years. I might not hesitate to say that for a moment, but looking as far as I can at it in the light of one who has had some little experience in governing the country, and as a statesman should look at it, I consider it as a most damnable, if I may use the expression, clause, which will ruin the future of this country. It is a strong word, but justfiable under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I did not intend to make any remarks at this early stage of the discussion, I do not know that I shall say much at the present time and I do not think that I should follow the hon. leader of the opposition. He, however, has made a few statements and dwelt on a few subjects which I think deserve some attention. The very last matter he has been dealing with, the section that reads:

Her Majesty further undertakes to route via Montreal all west bound traffic controlled by the Intercolonial Railway or its connections destined to points west thereof reached by the company, &c.

The hon. gentleman can not say that freight originating in Europe and landed at Halifax or St. John comes from a connection of the Intercolonial Railway. The freight that crosses the Atlantic, as a rule, is canvassed for and secured by persons in the interest of the different large corporations of this country. The United States lines all have their agencies, their travellers, and the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway certainly have their agents also. They go to the manufacturing centres of Europe and make arrangements for billing freight through. This freight comes to Halifax, Portland, St. John or whatever port the vessel may arrive at, but it is billed from its point of manufacture to its destination. The Intercolonial Railway has no control over it after it arrives at Halifax. The parties that ship to this country ship by the route on which they can get the lowest rate of freight. This section has no connection with freight from the other side, because it is not referred to. Then, if there is no injustice done there, let us look at the next section, which has not been read. It reads as follows:—

In connection with the import and export traffic via Halifax or St. John, or any other port in the maritime provinces that may hereafter be selected, it is understood that during the life of the agreement, the Intercolonial Railway will accept 425 miles on Halifax, and 375 on St. John, the St. John rates to be the same as those quoted by the Canadian Pacific Railway to and from that port or West St. John, and the same as quoted by the Grand Trunk Railway to and from Portland, &c."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And yet it is 800 miles, and they get paid for 400 miles.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—They have to carry it 481 miles against carrying it to Portland 297 miles. The Canadian Pacific Railway agrees to carry freight 200 miles further to St. John at the same rate, and apparently it pays, if the discussion extends till to-morrow I should like to show what position the Canadian Pacific Railway is in for carrying the freight those long distances at the low rate. They got a large annual bonus for extending the road from Montreal to St. John through the state of Maine. I believe that bonus is $185,000 per annum for running 180 miles of road. What was it given for?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—To make St. John a winter port.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—But that is not all the government does. They bonus steamers going to St. John and these steamers carry freight lower than they could if the bonus had not been given. To talk of the Cananian Pacific Railway being driven out of St. John is simply an absurdity. The Canadian Pacific Railway is bonused, and the steamers are bonused, and the rest of the country has to pay for it. I am not denying it at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—$186,600 is the exact amount of the bonus.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What has that to do with it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It has to do with your argument.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—The Canadian Pacific Railway receives $186,600 of a bonus annually to run from Montreal to St. John, and the other road run without assistance. They would be very foolish not to go on with their business. I am not at all sorry that we have bonused the Canadian Pacific Railway from the first to the present day. But the Canadian Pacific Railway is now on its own feet, and this country should not be required to carry it any longer. If there is anything to be gained by sending freight through the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to Halifax, via the Intercolonial Railway by all means let the country have the benefit of it. I say that the Intercolonial Railway can to-day carry freight from Montreal to Halifax, which is 740 miles against 480 to St John, in competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway and make money. We know that the curves and grades on the Canadian Pacific Railway, especially in that section through the state of Maine, are not such as they can risk trains to the extent they would risk them on other portions of the road. They cannot haul the immense trains that are now used up a ninety foot grade. The Intercolonial Railway has no grade over sixty-two feet. The Intercolonial Railway could start from Montreal with a train of fifteen cars and take it through without any hesitation, as against the Canadian Pacific Railway, taking ten cars and would earn more money in going even to St John. I tell hon. gentlemen that the life of the maritime provinces certainly depends on getting the Intercolonial Railway connected with the western provinces at Montreal. It was built by the government as a military road, as a government enterprise, and it has done wonders for the country. Stopping the Intercolonial, as it was stopped at Rimouski, the government of the day found their mistake. They found that that was not a proper terminus, and they extend it to Chaudière, which was a move in the right direction, but you might as well try to stop a steamship in mid-ocean and expect it to pay as to stop the Intercolonial Railway at Chaudière or any point east of Montreal and expect it to pay.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—The Intercolonial Railway never stopped at Rimouski.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Well, Rivière du Loup, which is about the same thing. I am satisfied that the Intercolonial Railway is better equipped to-day, and more capable of carrying freight between Montreal and Halifax at a profit, than the Canadian Pacific Railway is between Montreal and St. John. I do not want to appear in opposition to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Give them the benefit of their subsidies, but do not let us sacrifice Canada entirely. We want more than one outlet in the maritime provinces. The Canadian Pacific Railway has done a great work, but the Intercolonial Railway has done a greater work. The Intercolonial Railway, stopping at Chaudière or Point Lévis, is incapable of meeting the requirements of the day. It might have answered twenty-five years ago, when the government put it there, but now the traffic of the lower provinces requires it to go on to Montreal. It is all very well to make a tariff. We comply with the tariff very largely, but anybody who has a large amount of freight to move wants a special rate. You go into Truro, Moncton, St. John or Chatham and you ask a special rate, and they say, "We can only quote you to Chaudière; we cannot quote any further." And it takes days to telegraph and get the quotation from Chaudière westward. But the Canadian Pacific Railway can in the meantime quote a through rate and secure the business, the Canadian Pacific Railway do not want this road to be built into Montreal. They want it left as it is to the detriment of the Intercolonial Railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway can bill goods to any part of the continent without any other road being consulted, and the consequence is they are able to monopolize a larger amount of freight, because they are able to quote a rate immediately. Bringing the Intercolonial road into Montreal would remedy these evils. It will not remedy them at once, because the service of the Intercolonial is such that it will have to be largely reformed and the agents will require to have more control than they have. But we are moving in the right direction and, in the meantime, I would appeal to the House to let the Intercolonial Railway have a terminus at some point that they can quote for the business of the country, and meet the requirements of trade and be a blessing to the country. I have already spoken of the 3rd clause. It is in the event of the Intercolonial Railway making arrangements with steamship companies. Well, they will no doubt make such arrangements, and then the agents will route the goods in the best interest of his company. We do not want our traffic sent west over the Grand Trunk Railway through United States territory nor do we want our business sent east over the Canadian Pacific Railway through the state of Maine. We want the people in our own provinces to receive all the benefit that is to be derived by carrying goods through our own territory. My hon. friend also dealt with the exchange of goods at Montreal as being unfair. I wish to emphasize the fact that it is not unfair. The government agree to give the Grand Trunk all the freight, originating on the Intercolonial, at Montreal in preference to any other road if unconsigned. Everybody is at liberty to consign his goods, and will consign them by the cheapest route. If the Canadian Pacific Railway can come in there and show better arrangements, they will get the freight, if the freight is consigned. But what do we get in exchange? The Grand Trunk Railway are bound virtually to close their road from Montreal to Lévis and give all their freight to the Intercolonial Railway. What is the position? We agree to give them the west bound freight and they agree to give us the east bond freight. The east bound freight to points on the Intercolonial Railway is ten cars to one. We give then ten cars going west and they give us 100 cars going east. Who benefits by the transaction? They can carry the freight to Richmond and down to St. John. They can go down the Temiscouata route, or they can take it to Portland and send it by water to all points in Nova Scotia the year round, but to the eastern section of the province they cannot.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where does the hon. gentleman get the statistics which justify the statement that the east bound freight is ten to one more than the west bound?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—We get at it in this way: What are our exports? Nothing but fish, coal and lumber.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What has that to do with it?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—These items do not go west.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Except the coal.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—The coal cannot go past Montreal. We have nothing to go west, therefore our traffic is comparatively nil.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—They want fish badly.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—If we get this road extended we can then send Ontario better fish food. How do I know? Well, my experience of the business of this country is such that I have an idea of everything that is done in the country. We have nothing to send west, and our custom-houses do not show the amount of revenue we pay to the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Do the maritime provinces not send fish from Halifax to Chicago?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Not very much. There are two or three car loads from Miramichi to one from Halifax. The coal goes only as far as Montreal and we have nothing else to ship. All we have to ship is the merchandise that comes from the European market, and it will go over any road that it is consigned by, and in return we get all our manufactured goods, pork, and even oats and hay—and these latter goods have largely gone through the province of Quebec for years. We do not raise enough for home consumption, and we draw on the western provinces for everything.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—How do they pay for them?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—In hard cash.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Where do they get the money.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—From Europe.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—What do they send there for it?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—We send our lumber and other goods, and from there we get the money. I think I have made the point as to the easy grades and easy curves of the Intercolonial Railway. It is purely and simbly on Canadian territory. My hon. friend made the strong point that he does not want the railways of the United States to be assisted unnecessarily by us.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He speaks of westward freights.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Well, eastward we give them more, and we are paying a heavy bonus besides. I want to avoid United States territory, as much as my hon. friend. I want to see everything go through the province of Quebec, and Canada receive every dollar in return.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I wish, at the opening of my remarks, to deprecate the statement which I saw in a Toronto paper, to the effect that the opposition in this House was championing the cause of the Canadian Pacific Railway as against the Grand Trunk Railway, I wish to emphasize, in the strongest possible way, that we are not taking up the quarrel as between two rival railways. That the Grand Trunk should be getting an advantage over the Canadian Pacific Railway in some traffic arrangement which may be made between them and the government is absolutely of no interest to us, except for the fact that the interests of this country are going to suffer enormous damage should it happen by any chance that this bill were to become law. I am no advocate of either one of these railways over the other. The fact that the Grand Trunk was the pioneer Canadian road does not lead me to sympathize with that company any more than I do with its younger, its newer and energetic rival, and the incident that the Canadian Pacific Railway passes altogether through Canadian territory, and passes, as I may say, by my own door, is the only reason why my name should be mentioned as advocating its cause. If the names of the two roads should happen to be changed, my argument would apply equally well to the Grand Trunk. It has been stated that when this bill passed through the House of Commons the real effect of clause 40, which is the principal one in debate here, and which has caused the opposition to this supplemental agreement, was not actually discovered. I can scarcely wonder at that, because these traffic arrangements between railways are of such an intricate and complicated nature that they can only be really, thoroughly understood by experts. They need a special education in a man, and almost a special form of intellect, in order to make them clear and properly understood. And it is quite apparent, even from the discussion which has taken place in this House so far, that many of us have a great deal of difficulty in understanding at first blush what the real effect of such a clause as this would be. The hon. gentleman who introduced this bill set us the example of reading the clauses of the bill as it stood, and I am sure he will allow me to take some of the clauses in what I consider the most important part of the bill, which is the supplemental agreement, and discuss them as I go along. I will take clause number 1 of the supplemental agreement, which reads as follows :—

> Notwitstanding anything contained in any agreement between Her Majesty and the company heretofore made and now existing, it is agreed between Her Majesty and the company that during the continuance of the contract to which this is a supplement, percentage divisions via Chaudière Junction shall be suspended, and that with respect to all traffic originating throughout the company's system, or connections west of Montreal, and offered for shipment to any point on the Intercolonial Railway, or reached by its connections, Montreal shall be the junction point, and the company undertakes to route all traffic destined to points on the Intercolonial Railway and its connections, via Montreal and the Intercolonial Railway.

This clause imposes on the Grand Trunk an obligation to hand over to the Intercolonial at Montreal any traffic offered for shipment from any point on the Grand Trunk system, or its connections west of Montreal, and destined to a point on the Intercolonial "east of Ste. Rosalie Junction," and it cancels all divisions by way of Chaudière Junction, on such traffic. The only traffic to which this could apply is the traffic coming into the Intercolonial local territory, so that the Intercolonial Railway could at any time, by the mere cancellation of divisions via Chaudière Junction, accomplish just what this clause is intended to cover. It is quite proper, however, that the clause should appear in the agreement, because paying the Grand Trunk practically three million five hundred thousand dollars in cash for the joint use of the railway, bridge, and terminals the government had every justification for demanding that the Grand Trunk should deliver at Montreal the traffic in question. The amount to be paid by the government under the agreement represents, at least, the value of the entire Grand Trunk line from Victoria bridge to Lévis, and in view of this large sum the condition about the delivery of east bound traffic is one that the government naturally would have imposed. Indeed, this is the only traffic that was covered by the original agreement, as will be seen by reference to the bill discussed in the House in 1897. As I remarked above, however, this business being practically all local traffic going into the territory of the Intercolonial the same end would have been accomplished by the cancellation of divisions via Chaudière Junction, on east bound business. The true definition of the term "Montreal Joint Section" in the main agreement was pretty clearly that this covenant is not intended to apply to the section of the line between Montreal and Ste. Rosalie Junction. Clause No. 2, reads as follows :—

All business originating in the city of Montreal or on the Montreal joint section, destined to points on the Intercolonial Railway, shall be considered Intercolonial traffic, it being agreed that in connection with that consideration, the Intercolonial Railway will give all the traffic from its system and connections that it can control, destined to New England points, or any other point east of Ste. Rosalie reached by the Grand Trunk system and its connections, to the Grand Trunk Railway at Chaudière Junction, the Intercolonial Railway being allowed Aston mileage.

It is not easy to see the necessity for this clause unless it be to furnish grounds for an undertaking on the part of the Intercolonial to deliver all New England business originating on its system to the Grand Trunk at Chaudière Junction, instead of carrying it through to Ste. Rosalie Junction. However, in view of geographical conditions this clause is not an unfair one. Clauses Nos. 3, 4 and 5 read as follows :—

Traffic destined to points in the United States reached via the gateways of St. Johns, P.Q., Rouse's Point, N.Y., Huntingdon, P.Q., and Massena Springs, N.Y., to be delivered to the company at St. Lambert.

All business originating on the Montreal joint section, destined to points on the company's lines east of Ste. Rosalie shall be considered "company's" business, and all traffic originating on said section destined to Intercolonial Railway points shall be considered "Intercolonial" traffic.

All business originating on the company's lines east of Ste. Rosalie, or on the Intercolonial Railway between Ste. Rosalie and Lévis, inclusive, to be interchanged at Chaudière Junction, Aston Junction or Ste. Rosalie Junction, or at such other junction point as may be hereafter opened, the understanding being that such business is to be forwarded by both lines via the shortest route between the point of shipment and destination.

These are ordinary traffic relations such as should exist under the circumstances. Clause No. 6 provides that :

Her Majesty further undertakes to route via Montreal all unconsigned west bound traffic controlled by the Intercolonial Railway or its connections, destined to points west thereof reached by the "company" and its connections.

To describe more particularly what is meant, this clause should read as follows :—

Her Majesty further undertakes to carry to Montreal all unconsigned traffic originating at any point on the government railway system and its connections, or arriving from any portion of the world by water at any port in the lower provinces reached by the Intercolonial and destined to any point west of Montreal in Canada or the United States, and there hand it over to the Grand Trunk for transportation over the lines of the Grand Trunk, or over the lines of the Chicago and Grand Trunk, Chicago and North Western, Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, Northern Pacific, or Great Northern Railways, and this arrangement shall continue for ever.

So that if a shipper at Rivière du Loup, Moncton, or any other point on the Intercolonial forwarded a consignment of machinery or of material of any other description, to Winnipeg, Brandon, Portage la Prairie, the Kootenay country, Vancouver, New Westminster, or the Yukon territory, the shipment would be taken to Montreal by the Intercolonial, there handed over to the Grand Trunk, and by that company, in the ordinary course of business, handed to its connections at the United States frontier for transportation through the United States to its Canadian destination. If the shipper specified that the goods were to be consigned by the all-Canadian route, they might possibly be handed over to the Canadian Pacific at Montreal or North Bay, but in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred no route would be specified, and, therefore, the shipment being "unconsigned traffic" would be forwarded by the Grand Trunk and its United States connections. Import traffic by the Atlantic steamships lines and others arriving at Halifax, Sydney, or any other Intercolonial Railway port would be routed in the same way. Whatever new conditions might arise within the next ten, twenty, fifty or one hundred years, the government railway system would be bound, and through it, every town, village and community on the line of the government railway system would be tied up irrevocably to one railway route, other Canadian railway lines west of Montreal, now existing or that may hereafter be built, would be for ever deprived of any interest in the traffic of the government railways or in the business development of the territory tributary to them, because by a most exclusive and perpetual agreement they would be debarred from any participation in the traffic between Intercolonial territory and other sections of Canada. From the standpoint of the government the proposition is a monstrous one, and would not receive a moments consideration at the hands of a practical railway official. I can imagine nothing that would more certainly prevent the possibility of any expansion of trade between the lower provinces and other sections of Canada than this improvident and unwise bargain. I need not refer to the effect that such a servitude would have on the value of the Intercolonial property in case the government should at any time hereafter desire to sell it. The consideration would, of course, be a most valuable one for the Grand Trunk. There might be some excuse if, in return, the Grand Trunk undertook to pay the annual interest on the cost of the government railway system. Clause No. 7 is an undertaking on the part of the government to accept about one-half its mileage rate on traffic from Grand Trunk points to St. John, Halifax, &c. On imports and exports the Grand Trunk does not undertake to send any of this business to the Canadian ports as against its own Atlantic terminus at Portland, Maine, but, if it should, the Intercolonial undertakes to carry the traffic at half rates. A very bad feature of this clause is the establishment for ever of a series of groups of stations in making rates. The agreement does not show these groups, although they are an essential feature of it. Whatever the groups may be now, they should not be fixed for ever, because, new conditions may make periodical changes desirable, if not necessary, from time to time. I will come to clause No. 8. The Grand Trunk has its own steamship connections between Portland, Me., and Liverpool, Glasgow, London, Bristol and other ports on the other side of the Atlantic. If at any time hereafter the Intercolonial should establish steamship connections between Halifax, St. John, or other ports, of the lower provinces, and European ports, the Grand Trunk are required to participate in such rates as are made to these ports by other lines. In the first place, the agreement excludes every good European port, because the Grand Trunk are sure to have their arrangements with these by way of Portland. In the next place, the publication of the rates to such ports does not mean anything, and is only put in for the purpose of leading the country to suppose that in making this absurb traffic agreement export and import traffic by way of Canadian ports was being looked after. The regular grouped percentage divisions mentioned in this clause deserve the same criticism as those referred to in the previous clause.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—The hon. gentleman says that the Grand Trunk Railway has its own steamship connections between Portland, Maine, and Liverpool, Glasgow, Bristol and other ports in Europe. Will the hon. gentleman say whether he is positive the Grand Trunk Railway Company have those connections? They have one at Liverpool and one at Glasgow, but unless he has good authority, I do not know of any other.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I know it has its agent at Cork.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—What steamer goes to Cork?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The hon. gentleman lives down by the sea and can tell what vessels go from Cork to the maritime provinces. If he asked me about the production of wheat in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, I could tell him about it. I am speaking from the information I have received, that they have those connections on the other side of the Atlantic.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I tell the hon. gentleman there is no steamship line or tramp steamer that goes to Cork.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I come from there, and I ought to know. I have been there, not once, but many times. I said at the commencement that the proper effect of this clause can only be understood by experts, and I may say that when the result of this clause was pointed out to me, I was fairly astounded at it. I could hardly believe that the government could have knowingly incorporated such a clause in this bill; and I am informed that when the result of such a provision was pointed out to the government they themselves expressed great astonishment at it. There is no question about it, but this agreement and this supplemental agreement passed through the House of Commons and was not understood or questioned there, nor was any attention called to it by the government. I cannot but think it must have been because the points in it were so involved, so locked up that it was difficult for the ordinary lay mind to understand them. I cannot believe that the government understood the effect of the clause. I cannot believe that the government would knowingly seek to barter away the birthright of the country in this manner. Now, although the government as a government, may not have been able to see through this clause, the Minister of Rail ways should have seen through it. That is his particular department. He himself is, or should be, an expert in these railway matters. He has as much right to be conversant with his business as Mr. Hays, the manager of the Grand Trunk, with whom he was negotiating and carrying on this agreement. If he was not able to see through it while he was negotiating with Mr. Hays, then he is not fit for the position which he enjoys, and the emoluments which he draws. I can think how that clever and astute manager of the Grand Trunk Railway must have chuckled to himself as he drew the wool over the eyes of the representative of the Canadian railways—how he must have enjoyed it. The manager—a very astute one, too—of the Northern Pacific Railway said, when he was entering into negotiations with the Greenway government, "the government is our meat." That was the way in which the manager of the Northern Pacific looked at the agreement which he was making with the Greenway government, and I have no doubt that Mr. Hays, as he saw the childlike and bland and blissful ignorance of the Minister of Railways, while he was bartering away the rights and the birthright of this country, must have felt equally that the Minister of Railways was his meat. I do not want to bring in a bill to make the Minister of Railways liable to a criminal prosecution, but I do charge that the Minister of Railways, if not criminally guilty, was criminally innocent. I say that he was criminally ignorant and negligent when he allowed this monstrous concession of the country's assets to be given away in this manner. A mortgage of the Intercolonial Railway, never ending, perpetual, ad infinitum. How do you like it, hon. gentlemen? What do you think of it?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I do not like it at all.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—If Canada were ever anxious to dispose of this road, she would be obliged to do it at half what you could get for it if this mortgage were not placed upon it. Now, one of the arguments of the hon. gentleman who spoke last was to the effect that the west bound traffic of the Intercolonial was so small that it was hardly worth while talking about, I am not questioning what the hon. gentleman says. He is a resident of that part of the country and knows better than I do what the conditions of business over the Intercolonial are.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—An immense local traffic.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—But, as I said before, we are not legislating for the present. We are either bartering away, or we are going to protect the interests of posterity. We are living in a country of great extent and of vast possibilities, and those of us who think that a bill passed now with a limitation of 100 years is one that should not be altered ten times over during the continuance of that time, has no conception of the advance that has taken place in this country and that will take place in a far greater degree in the next fifteen or twenty years. Because this country is on the eve of a very great expansion. One has only to go to the north-west section of Canada to see how hundreds of thousands of acres of prairie are being added to the land that is broken up and cultivated. What a few years ago was merely an output of five or six millions of bushels of wheat has now increased to 40,000,000 of grain, as it was last year, and this year, with the extension of the area of land under cultivation, it will probably reach 10,000,000 higher than we have ever reached in the history of that country. With such a future as that, and with a traffic which is bound to come out to that western country, with our connection with a fast line of steamship as we will have, I presume before very many years—as soon as this government changes—we will have it——

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Not before?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—We probably will not have it within the next two years. Then the quantity of freight which will be shipped to this county from Europe to the homes of the millions who have settled in the North-west and will have taken up lands in that western country, will all come out here and where will it go under this agreement? Why the traffic will go over the United States lines and the great amount of money which is to be paid for the handling of that vast freight and the forwarding of it and all the expenses connected with it, with the exception of what the Grand Trunk will receive until such time as it passes over the boundaries of Canada and enters United States territory, will all go to western United States roads, and what will be the position of our Intercolonial, our government, its railway and its employees? They will be a set of agents in that eastern province for the western United States roads. That is the position that they will occupy. As I said before, this is not a quarrel between two railways; this is a fight for Canada, a battle for the future of our Dominion. I say that this simple clause, which has hardly been understood until it appeared here, contains a vast element to control the future of this country. I am given to understand that since this clause has been explained the members of the government have been anxious to devise some means whereby the bill could be altered. I do not see that there would have been any great difficulty in doing so, but it would have involved the necessity of their declaring that they had made a mistake, and that would seem to be a hard thing for them to do. I cannot see that it is so hard for any man, or for any government, if they have made a mistake, to admit it. I think that the most statesmanlike proceeding would have been for this government to have come down off their high perch, to have admitted that they had made a mistake. If they had come to this House and said "we are glad we have the Senate here to revise our measures, we are glad to have an opposition here to point out where we have made errors," and asked leave to withdraw this bill and after consultation with experts and a conference between the leaders on both sides,—because it is a matter in which they could take one another into their confidence—they could perhaps bring in a measure which would be fair to the railroads and an advantage to the country and to all parties concerned. I did not think, when the hon. leader of the Senate was introducing this bill, that he did it as if his heart was in it. I think he must, with the right instincts that he has in almost all those matters, as we have seen in the case of other measures he has brought before the Senate, in his heart agree with all I have said. But he has been put here to bring in those measures which he cannot possibly, with his high instinct, have his heart in. He has been obliged to advocate other objectionable measures of which he could not have approved. But this is not a bill for the expropriation of an Archie Stewart, or for making a criminal out of Burland; it has a far-reaching effect on the people of this country, and I would say now I am satisfied, from the feeling I have seen exhibited in this House, that it is not the intention of the majority of the Senate to allow this bill to pass. I am quite sure that when a motion is made to postpone the ratification of this agreement, you will find a majority of this House against the bill.

Hon. Mr. WOOD moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

CONDITIONAL LIBERATION OF PENITENTIARY CONVICTS' BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS introduced Bill (T) "An Act to provide for the Liberation of Penitentiary Convicts." He said:—The object of this bill is to introduce into the administration of justice in Canada the indeterminate sentence system. It has been adopted in England and works very satisfactorily there, and has been introduced in many states of the neighbouring union, and I have no doubt it will prove satisfactory here. The bill is a short one and is an Act to provide for the conditional liberation of penitentiary convicts, for the issuing of tickets of leave indicating the districts in which they are to remain, and the sheriff or some other officer to whom they are to present their ticket for registration, and if they leave that district and go to another, they will be required to register there also, so that the Crown may at all times know where they are. Being convicted of criminal offences, as long as their sentence remains in operation, even should they actually cross the border, their extradition may be secured the same as any other escaped convict. The system has worked satisfactorily in all the states of the American Union in which it has been introduced, and it has worked satisfactorily in the United Kingdom, and if we can permit the convict, under a ticket of leave, to remain at large, under surveillance, earning his own living, it would be a course less burdensome than that which at present exists. It is a measure which has been pressed on my attention for more than a year, but until recently I have not had time to consider it with a very great deal of care. I now introduce the bill for a first reading and shall proceed with it further in the session.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I am glad, indeed, that the hon. Minister of Justice has seen his way to introduce a bill of this kind. Similar legislation has been in force in England and the United States. The effect can not be otherwise than beneficial, and I am glad that the measure has been introduced.

The bill was read the first time.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY AND INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY AGREEMENT BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the second reading (Bill 138) "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal."—(Hon. Mr. Wood.)

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Senator Wood is unwell and is not able to be present.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I regret exceedingly the absence, as well as the cause of the absence, of the Hon. Mr. Wood, and I trust that his illness will prove to be of a very temporary character, and that before this debate closes I shall, in common with the other hon. senators, have the pleasure and satisfaction of listening to a speech by him upon the important question before the House. It will be very obvious to hon. gentlemen that, expecting the hon. senator to-day would resume the debate, I am a little taken by surprise at being called upon to speak this early in the discussion. However, it was not my intention to detain the House at any very great length with observations of my own upon the agreement now before the Senate. I should like to have the wisdom, as well as the gift of tongues, to be able to say something that might be of benefit in solving the important problem now before the House, and my remarks should, I think, be directed towards the possibility of arriving at some solution of the difficulty, so that hon. senators might be able to reach a decision that would be satisfactory to their own minds, satisfactory to the government and satisfactory to the country. Hon. gentlemen are aware—and I merely go back for the purpose of reference—that at the time of confederation it was part of the agreement which led up to that confederation that the Intercolonial Railway should be constructed. That seemed to be a necessary bond of union between the several provinces then about entering the union, and in a sense the Intercolonial Railway was made by the British North America Act part of our written constitution, binding upon all the provinces entering into that contract, and as such it has been maintained ever since it was constructed. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that according to the terms of the 145th section of that Act, the construction of that road was to be begun within six months after the Act came into operation, and was to be proceeded with without delay until the road was completed; but the Act specially stipulated that the road should commence on the River St. Lawrence and terminate at the city of Halifax. Hon. gentlemen know, and many of them are much more familiar with it than I can be by reason of residence and otherwise, that that road was constructed, so to speak, by instalments as the necessities of the provinces and the terms of the compact required. It is rather an unpleasant subject to contemplate the history of that road in its financial results, but I have a very warm side for the Intercolonial. It is a child of this Dominion. I do not suppose any hon. gentleman thought at the time that the great benefit to be derived from the construction of that road was the financial benefit alone. The construction of that railway enabled myself, as one of the residents of the province of Ontario, more readily to meet you in the capital of the Dominion, a privilege which I greatly prize. It also gave you of the extreme east the facility for coming to the capital without using the circuitous route through the territory of our neighbours. The Intercolonial Railway, therefore, has a claim upon the sympathy of the Senate. Its history financially has been somewhat chequered. The country has put a great deal of money into that project, between $55,000,000 and $56,000,000 I believe of capital, aside—altogether and over and above the amount that has been expended in the operation of that road and in meeting the deficits from year to year. Why that road was not brought to Montreal in the first instance, or early in its career, is a question which I never could decide satisfactorily to my own mind. I do not profess to be a railway man. I do not profess to be as competent a judge of the importance of a railway as other hon. gentlemen in the Senate, but I profess to be equal to any hon. senator in my desire to see every railroad, ever canal, every public work as fully developed as possible, and that the greatest possible good shall come out of each and every one of these public works and thereby confer a great benefit upon the country at large. The Intercolonial, as we are told by the hon. Secretary of State, has had large deficits from year to year going back to a period, I think, which he named, some $11,000,000 of money in the shape of deficits. Well, it would be the dictate of prudence, it would be the course that any honourable man would take, and any business man would take, to try and stop that leak. According to my view of the road, financially speaking, it would have been better if the government could have handed it over to some company, or in some way or another got rid of the financial burden, but the duty of maintaining that road was cast upon this government and this country by the very terms of the Imperial Act, and therefore, we were not in a position to take that course. Now, what is the proposition? I need not enlarge upon that, and I am glad that the issues now between us are narrowed down very considerably. When this project of extending the road to the city of Montreal was first launched before the country, it created, at the time of its being launched, a large cloud of dust, or something worse. I am happy to say, and I am delighted as a member of the Senate and as a Canadian—that subsequent investigation and inquiry cleared away very much of the cloud that was then cast over it, and that we are now not obliged to see in it the ugly features which it first presented to this country, but that we are able now to look at it as an honest business transaction, and I suppose the sole question before the Senate and engaging the attention of this country is whether the arrangements which have been proposed and provisionally entered into are wise and provident arrangements. And from the discussion which has taken place since the matter has been brought before this House—I speak of this session—I am glad to find, and I hope I am not wrong in my inference, that we are all united as to the desirability, the expediency and the wisdom of extending that road from its present western terminus to the city of Montreal. Then the other question, as the hon. leader of the opposition told us yesterday, and with which I entirely agree, was the means of getting there. The present Minister of Railways has in his wisdom—and he has received the sympathy and support of his colleagues in that view—thought that the Intercolonial might reach Montreal by adopting two means, first to buy out another railway with a small branch, making a mileage of some 130 miles, known as the Drummond County Railway. Although I have told this Senate that I am not a practical railway man, I have since 1852 had more or less to do, as a provisional director or otherwise, in connection with railways, and I am told by men competent to form an opinion, that the price agreed to be paid for the Drummond County Railway, of $1,600,000, is fair and reasonable and, in fact, a moderate amount to be paid for that property. I take it from the discussion in the House thus far that that will not be combatted, or gainsaid, or disputed. We are within some thirty-seven miles of the city of Montreal when we get to the western extremity of that railway. Then we have to take another step to get to Montreal, a step of thirty-seven miles. How do we get there? Practically by an arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, for which the government has agreed to pay $140,000. Therefore, these two together amount to nearly 160 odd miles. By adding that 160 odd miles to the 1,154, the mileage of the Intercolonial proper, we have a railway practically of 1,300 miles. I do not propose to go into the earnings of these respective portions of the road. If I did, I am afraid hon. gentlemen might say that I was amenable to the sarcasm of the poet Pope, who said that "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Tread in.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I do not wish hon. gentlemen to infer that I consider we are all angels here. In fact, most of us have been born a little lower than the angels, and we are somewhat of the earth earthy. But I can only give you my views as they may occur to me, in a simple and unsophisticated manner.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—And not as an angel?

Hon. Mr. KERR—Not as an angel.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It might be as one of the fallen angels.

Hon. Mr. KERR—In order that I might have an intelligent notion of the position of this thing, I have understood, and it has been stated here that the former Minister of Justice, Sir Oliver Mowat, suggested in his wisdom—and he has always been considered a very wise man in Ontario—that the experiment should be tried and that this Senate, before finally rejecting this arrangement, should await the result; so that up to the present the experiment has been only tenetative. I argue to this Senate that it has been a success. I find upon inquiry at the proper sources of information, that on the 30th April, 1898, there was a deficit in the operations for the year of the Intercolonial of $33,311. So that the new arrangement began with that deficit. What is the result on the 30th April, a year afterwards. That deficit of $35,000 in round numbers has disappeared. So far, so good. The government have been enabled, out of the additional earnings of the railway, to pay to the two companies, the Drummond County Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, the large sum of $175,000 by way of rental, and, having wiped out the deficit of $35,000, having paid that sum, there is still to the credit of the railway, over and above liquidating these two large amounts the handsome sum of $62,569. I would say tally one for that. I think that is an encouragement. I am sure the former Minister of Justice, Sir Oliver Mowat, will be glad to know that his suggestion was wisely acted upon, and that the Senate should be encouraged and look with more favour upon this arrangement than they were enabled to do at the time it was discussed before. In round numbers the increased earnings of that road, adding the $62,000, the surplus, and the $35,000, the deficit, together, making $97,000, and the $175,000 of rent paid making $280,000 in round numbers, earnings of that road more than the previous year. Some hon. gentlemen say that that can be accounted for in a variety of ways. I do not know whether it can or not. I do not know, and no hon. gentleman within this chamber can say, whether it can or not, but a fair argument to be used, and I shall use it, and I think I have a right to use it, is that during that short period, that extended road, the road with its extensions, the whole road which I shall call the Intercolonial Road from Halifax to Montreal, shows an improvement in our financial returns of nearly $273,000. Is not that an encouragement? Just here I would like to refer to one fact. This matter was before the Senate on a previous occasion. Fortunately, or unfortunately for me, perhaps, I was not present, but I learned yesterday from the hon. leader of the opposition in this House that by the course the Senate took when this matter was before them on the first occasion, the country has saved over $700,000 of money. I am glad to hear it. That item stands to the credit of this Senate, and what I want to do is to see that that item is not blurred by anything we do now. I want that item to stand there to the credit of this Senate, that this Senate has been the means of saving to this country some $700,000. I am a member of the Senate and I intend from now to the end of the chapter to stand up for the rights and dignity of the Senate, and I will advocate its rights on every and all occasions, and I will give credit when I think credit is due. I am bound to say that the Senate has been the means of saving this country some $700,000 by the course that they took then. I submit further that the Senate ought to be satisfied with that.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I mean that if the terms are so much more favourable now, I for one shall claim that the Senate is entitled to the full credit of getting these better terms.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—You would not object to another $700,000 better?

Hon. Mr. KERR—Oh, no, I would not object if we could get it for nothing. I will modify that. I have always thought that governments and parties in dealing with each other ought not to aim to see how much they could get and how little they could give in return. I hope that price for that road is a fair and reasonable price, and that who ever is entitled to that reasonable price should get it; but I do not want them to get any more than it is worth. I have taken pains to inquire from railway men of practical experience—men who have built, and who have operated railways, and who do not care one straw for either of the political parties in this country, and they one and all tell me, that that road, well built as it is and was, is worth considerably more than the price agreed to be paid for it. Now, that is so or it is not so. It is the best information I can get upon it, and I give it to you. I have not any hesitation in endorsing it, because, from my knowledge of what the Northumberland and Cobourg to Peterborough cost us. I know that $12,000 a mile is considerably under rather than over the actual cost of building a railway. I need not enlarge upon this point any further. Then as to the rental to be paid to the Grand Trunk, I am equally advised, by competent judges, that the Minister of Railways has not stipulated or tried to commit this country to too large a rental, considering the privileges and the value he gets for the money. I am informed by competent judges that to build a new road would cost from a third to a half more than the price that is being paid to the Grand Trunk. I need not discuss that any more. I take it for granted, from the observations that have been made already, that no hon. gentleman in this House seriously disputes the wisdom of what has been done in regard to the Drummond County Railway, nor with regard to the amount to be paid to the Grand Trunk for the privileges which the country gets. These are two points. Hon. gentlemen might say we ought to have got a little better terms, but we are one practically upon those two points. We have the issue narrowed down, as we say in law, to one point, that is the traffic arrangement agreement. About that I do not intend to say a great deal. Both the ministers in this chamber have, I think, very fully and very satisfactorily explained that, as well as the general clauses of the agreement and the acquisition of the railway. I am sorry to say that a great many hon. senators differ from me in the view I take of what we call the traffic clause, but I take it that it is narrowed down just to that one point. Now, we ought to be able, between the government and the opposition side of the House, to solve that difficulty. If we are not able to do so, it seems to me we are not as capable and as patriotic as I believe the senators of this Dominion to be. My greatly esteemed friend, the leader of the opposition, had very strong views in regard to that agreement. In fact I got nearly frightened yesterday as I listened to him, because he emphasized it, and I think he concluded with as strong an expression as he could find—that it was a damnable agreement. I was very much shocked, but I understood the sense in which the hon. leader of the opposition meant it, that it was a condemnable agreement. It was a word which, while it rather shocked my nerves, was a proper word from his standpoint, because I do not know what other he could have employed to express his fellings on that occasion. We in this Senate think we are omniscient—all of us do not think it, but we are pretty wise men. I will not say that there are not some wise men elsewhere. In the first place, the Minister of Railways says that this is a provident and a good agreement for the country. I did hear yesterday, and I was sorry to hear it—I do not wish to use any unkind expression, I never will if I can help it, and if I seem to do it to-day I do not intend it—a member spoke from that side of the House, and I thought that he seemed to wish to belittle the Minister of Railways. Well, I intend, whenever I can, to vindicate the ability of that minister. I knew that hon. gentleman long before he was a member of this government. I have heard him in the Supreme Court and elsewhere years ago, and I have been led to believe that he was one of the ablest men—ablest professional men in the province of New Brunswick, remarkable for its clever men and bright intellects, as I have had evidence since I came here. I think it is due to the hon. Minister of Railways for me to say that, and I would rather have his judgment on this railway transaction—I will not say than what, but I would rather have it than my own, at any rate—and he tells you hon. gentlemen that this is a good bargain, a provident bargain for the country, and one which he can justify. But what does the hon. leader of the opposition say? He says, "Mr. Blair, that is a damnable contract." As my hon. friends on the other side have, I thought, drawn on their imagination a little, I shall draw on mine a little. I have examined Mr. Blair and got his evidence. I have examined the gallant leader of the opposition and got his reply. I will examine the whole government now, and ask them, Do you consider that a good contract? "Yes." I ask the hon. leader of the opposition, What have you to say to that? "Just the same as I said before." I will not repeat the words. Then, I will remind the hon. gentleman that 120 representatives of this great Dominion endorsed that contract, representing 120 constituencies alone who fresh from their constituencies.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Not very fresh.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Men who are prepared to go back and give an account of their stewardship, and they have endorsed this contract. Suppose I put them all in the box, what will the reply of the hon. leader of the opposition be then? I imagine him saying, and no better illustration comes to my mind than the Latin words upon the Vatican at Rome—I will not give the Latin, but I will give the English—it is this, and it is the position taken by the hon. leader of the opposition in the Senate, "Not one step backwards." Although the hon. gentleman has the views of the Minister of Railways and the government and these 120 representatives, and not one step backwards will he take from his position. Then again, in addition to all that, in this House, the hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Secretary of State have fired the first shots in the battle in this chamber and what does the hon. leader of the opposition say to those shots? Now they are coming to close quarters and, in the midst of this battle, he looks around upon his veterans, the heroes of many an engagement and the victors of many a battle in this House, men who can move with the precision and steadiness of veterans, and what does he say in addition to all that he said before? He says: "No surrender, gentlemen, that is my position." But I hope he will modify that position. I think he will, because he is one of the best-hearted men in this Dominion, and I believe he is open to conviction. I only wish that I had the power to convince him. It is all narrowed down to one point and that point is the little agreement. Now, what about that little agreement? I was thinking of a little sarcasm, I do not use it in an offensive sense, but it illustrates what I have in my mind. It is this:

> The mouse that has but one small hole,
> Can't be a mouse of any soul.

I do not mean that offensively, but the opponents of this measure are confined now practically to that one view. Now, hon. gentlemen surely we can overcome that. I will say a word or two more on that traffic arrangement. I believe that that traffic arrangement for ninety-nine years, as it is, is a good arrangement for this country, and I fancy I hear, as I heard yesterday, hon. gentlemen scoffing at that idea. I ask hon. gentlemen not to dismiss that idea hastily from their minds If one of us was intending to make a large outlay, and make an arrangement by which we expected to get a return from that outlay for a long term of years, and would not have made that large expenditure except upon the faith of getting those returns, the dictates of prudence would be that some arrangements of a permanent character should be made, so that the other party to the contract would not be in a position, from mere caprice or some other cause, to put an end to that contract and deprive us of the fruits or the interest or the dividend or the benefits that we might have had for that large expenditure. But I am told that worse than the financial aspect of this question—and this seems to be the core of the objection to it—is the fact that while the east bound freight from the west comes down to the seaboard and the Intercolonial Railway gets the benefit of it, that peradventure the west bound freight from the seaboard to the great west is likely, in part, to go through the United States. I am sorry that that view was trotted out. There is only one thing that I could madover in discussing these questions, and that is if I think—I do not say any hon. gentleman thinks it, but it is capable of that construction,—because forsooth some of that trade may go into or through the United States, therefore, the arrangement should not be entered into. I have no sympathy with that view of the matter. I will not yield to any man in my desire to keep everything that I can for Canada and Canadians, but I wish to remind those who are opposed to that arrangement that the Canadian Pacific Railway, as was mentioned yesterday, goes through a portion of an alien country—sometimes I almost feel a hostile country. I do not like to use that word, especially just now. I understand also that the Canadian Pacific Railway have a connection at the Sault with that country. There is no objection to that. These railways will run their lines and their branch lines like any prudent man would, where they believe they will get the greatest possible return for their outlay. I believe in my heart that this traffic arrangement is one which will be more beneficial to the Intercolonial Railway than it will to the Grand Trunk, and if I had anything to do with the management of the Grand Trunk I should be very glad not to have that traffic arrangement extend over the ninety-nine years. I would rather have the power reserved in that agreement that I might cancel it at an earlier date. That is my view of the matter. I hope and believe that this question will be discussed purely upon a business basis and upon business principles, and that we will not consider the question, will our lines go through any portion of another country or wholly on Canadian soil. That is my view. There is not a railway in this country, as I said before, that I cannot wish a hearty good speed to. I am told by people outside that this opposition proceeds entirely from the pressure of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—No, no, no.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Give us your authority for that.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I say I am told outside, and I will not mislead or do my fellow senators the injustice of imagining them capable of acting from such motives.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Why bring it up then?

Hon. Mr. KERR—Because it was brought up yesterday, and it is merely to reply to that, I hope there is not an hon. senator, whether he agrees with my views or not, but will say I was perfectly right in bringing it up. I wish well to the Canadian Pacific Railway, I think, in a word, that it is a public work that is the pride of this Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—And deserves protection.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Yes, of a proper kind. I contend, further, that the Canadian Pacific Railway ought not to interfere with any arrangements between the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk. I take that as an unassailable position, and I have yet to hear arguments to combat it successfully. That is a mere domestic arrangement between the government and the Grand Trunk. I thought in listening to the debate yesterday—perhaps it was not intended—that the Intercolonial received a secondary consideration. With me, that railway being a child of the government—when I say the government I mean the people of Canada—shall receive every consideration at my hand. We ought to make it, and I believe we are on the road to making it, a paying concern, and I feel that in five years from now men listening to the sound of my voice will say "Well, it has proven a success, though I did not think it would." It has stopped that drainage and that leak that has been so annoying, and if the Minister of Railways, by his judgment and foresight, has been the means of breathing into the somewhat torpid trade of the Intercolonial the breath of a more active and business life, all honour to the Minister of Railways. I am not reflecting upon anybody. I believe it would have been a grand thing for this country if that extension to Montreal had been made twenty years ago. What is the use of a railway practically beginning, or ending as you may call it, nowhere.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—Do you call Quebec nowhere?

Hon. Mr. KERR—I hope hon. gentlemen will not interpret my language literally. I mean, where I think it ought to go is to the city of Montreal, that being the objective point of the railway, and how any hon. senator—do not find fault with me, and think I am questioning your judgment—in or about the city of Montreal or the maritime provinces, can vote against this project, I cannot understand. That is my view. It may be worth much, or it may be worth little. I would expect, if I were a member from Montreal, or a senator from Montreal —mind you, there are better men than I am among the senators from Montreal, men whom I will have to imitate at a long distance, but I could not understand—perhaps it is my obtuseness and want of comprehension, but I never could think, if I were a citizen of Montreal or of the maritime provinces, of doing other than holding up both hands to see if this arrangement would not bear some fruit—if it would not give us a live Intercolonial Railway. It is hard to speak to an unsympathetic audience, but I will say this—it is only due—that you have listened to me with more attention and consideration and forbearance than my poor words are entitled to; but I promise you this, from now to the end of my senatorial career, I shall listen respectfully to every word pro and con, and never do anything but act the part of a gentleman. This is a very serious matter; the country is looking to us. There was in my part of the country —Central Ontario—a very considerable amount of public indignation at the action of the Senate last year. I did not join in that. I always, lawyer-like, wait until I hear both sides, but the Senate are entitled to and should receive, and I believe will receive, credit for what they have already done and the only other consideration on this point of the question is to take care that the pail of milk is not kicked over. I use that simile because I, like some other hon. senators, was brought up on a farm. I am as satisfied as I can be that if this bill is voted down there will be a very considerable noise in this country. I believe there will be considerable dissatisfaction. I should like to have this country polled on that agreement, and I venture to say that there would be an overwhelming majority in favour of ratifying this agreement. This country is tired of paying out money for a loosing concern. We, in all our enterprises, want to get hold of something that will pay, and the balance should be on the right side, and since that road has been constructed until this year we have never been able to welcome such an item. May these items increase, and I firmly believe they will increase if this agreement is ratified. I should like, in discussing this, as all other questions, to bring ourselves nearer together, and I believe we can come together upon this agreement. I should like to be a humble member of this House that would contribute to that good time, when the present shall become the past, when the future shall have become the present, when some future Macauley may say of that period when I lived:

> Then none was for a party,
> Then all were for the state,
> Then the rich man helped the poor man,
> And the poor man loved the great.
>
> Then spoils were fairly portioned,
> Then lands were fairly sold,
> Canadians were like brothers
> In the brave days of old.

That is what I want said of us by some future Macauley, and let us all take part in ushering in that time. I want to see the Canadian Pacific Railway first, I want to see the Grand Trunk Railway first, and I want to see this Intercolonial, with its extention to Montreal, flourish abundantly, and I believe it will. I want to see more. I want to see Newfoundland brought into this confederation, and from the far Atlantic to the distant Pacific I want Canada to be united in one mighty happy home, and to see the words of the poet Tupper—not Sir Charles nor yet Sir Hibbert—but Martin Tupper the author of "Proverbial Philosophy," come true. In referring to the British Empire, he speaks of it as "a glorious whole of glorious parts." If that is true of the British Empire—and I am proud to say it is—it is equally true of this Dominion. We are glorious wholes of glorious parts. We are a united Dominion. We have seven grand magnificent provinces in that family, we want an eighth and will have it when Newfoundland comes in, and then we will be complete. I believe we are to-day the happiest, the most contented, the most industrious, the most law abiding land under the sun, and with the best institutions—in a word a land of brave men and fair women. In reference to this Intercolonial matter, let us not throw it back. I have yet to make up my mind that the hon. gentleman will not throw it back. What I ask the hon. gentleman to do is to help the government in this matter. Governments want help as well as individuals, and I think the country expects that we shall do so whether we are in favour of the government or opposed to the government, I hope to see the day—although perhaps I may despair considering how well the affairs of the country are managed—when I will be called upon in this Senate to consider measures of a Conservative government. The day may be remote, but if I am called upon I promise you I will give them as fair and honest support as I will the measures of the Liberal party. I will try to do that. I ask the hon. gentlemen to help the government. If I were sitting as a senator and my hon. friend, my distinguished personal friend (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) were the leader of the government I would feel that I could not go back to the county whence I came and say that, although he had introduced a bill to bring the Intercolonial to Montreal, and although he brought arguments to show that that project was in the interests of the country, that forsooth for some reasons or another I voted it down. I have yet to believe that the Senate will vote it down. I ask hon. gentlemen to vote for it. If hon. gentlemen think it ought to be modified, try to modify it and I will assist. To vote it down would be a retrograde step. Let us give this country a mighty impetus upward and onward, and then our consciences will not trouble us hereafter.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved the adjournment of the dabate till Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMEFT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed Committee of the Whole for consideration of Bill (R) "An Act further to amend the Penitentiary Act."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 3.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This clause is a supplement to section 45 of the Act.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not quite understand that clause. It is a new provision, I think. It provides that the prisoners shall be deemed to be in the custody of the warden of the penitentiary immediately upon receiving sentence. Does that mean that immediately upon their being sentenced, perhaps in another province, they are held to be in the custody of the warden immediately? The warden is not there. He has no officer present, because the warden cannot be represented before the court, and the criminal is, after conviction, usually in the hands of the provincial authorities until he is delivered to the officers of the penitentiary. I cannot understand how he can be held to be in the custody of the warden during the time that intervenes from the time that he received his conviction until delivered over to the penitentiary.

Hon Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that this subsection is suggested by the provision that already has beem made. Of course the warden situated under the law as it was in one province has no jurisdiction over the convict in another province. This provision gives the warden legally the custody of the prisoner. He is deemed to be in his custody from the time that he is convicted, and so he may through his officer, if it becomes necessary to take charge of him, although he is in another province, so as to exercise, through his officers, legal jurisdiction if he is within the district from which ordinary convicts are sent to the penitentiary. As a matter of practice, at the present time the sheriff takes the prisoner to the penitentiary. He delivers him up to the warden, and at the penitentiary he is given a receipt therefor. The sheriff at the present time terminates his responsibility when the prisoner is handed over to the custody of the warden. That is the present condition of things. There is some legal difficulty, in his capacity of sheriff, carrying the prisoner beyond the boundary of the province, because he is a provincial officer and has no official existence as such beyond the limit of his own province. Under this provision the intention is to treat the sheriff, so far as he has care of the prisoner after the prisoner's conviction, as a Dominion officer and subordinate in this regard to the warden of the penitentiary, so as to make the custody of the prisoner, during his transit, a legal custody in charge of the sheriff beyond the limits of the province in which he is sheriff.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understand now the reason of the clause. Will it go so far as to relieve the provincial authorities of any expense in forwarding the prisoner? The warden is understood to have legal custody immediately on conviction. Will that carry with it the obligation, on the part of the warden and the Dominion Government, to bear the expense from the time of the conviction?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The object of the clause is undoubtedly good, and the latter part of the clause seems to be calculated to carry out the object, but I should respectfully submit to the Minister of Justice that the language at the opening of this proposed subsection may lead to difficulty. It reads:

For the purposes of this section any convict sentenced to be imprisoned in any penitentiary shall be deemed to be in the custody of the warden of that penitentiary immediately upon such sentence.

Unless the warden is present when the sentence is delivered, or is represented by some officer holding a warrant who has the right to the custody of the person convicted, it seems to me that, under the wording of these first three or four lines, there is no one who has a right to hold that convicted criminal if it happens there is no one there representing the warden. I do not mean to say that the Minister of Justice may not be able to so construe this proposed subsection as to show what its real meaning is, but the language ought to be made so plain that the ordinary citizen, like myself and, if I may venture to say, the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, will have no doubt about the meaning, and I would submit that perhaps it would not be unwise to allow the clause to stand to consider the first three or four lines.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So far as the warden's custody is concerned, once a prisoner is in the hands of the warden, supposing he has escaped, no matter where he may be, the warden would have legal jurisdiction over him, and therefore it is intended to put the prisoner, the moment he is convicted, under the jurisdiction of the warden.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But if the warden is not there?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But he is in the custody of his officer. It is a legal custody which the law creates.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Have the provincial authorities not deputed certain men to receive the prisoners?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So far as the province can give him custody, the sheriff has actual custody of the prisoner, and is not relieved from his responsibility until he is handed to the warden.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The provincial authorities have appointed certain parties to receive the prisoners.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are deputed to receive them from the penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I know they have been sent down here from Kingston.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is from the asylum.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The object of this clause was, where the penitentiary district extended beyond the limits of the province and the sheriff could have no legal jurisdiction conferred by the province upon him.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is quite evident that the object of this clause is to avoid the round about method which just now prevails. My attention happened to be called to it yesterday, when I was called upon to sign a number of warrants conveying prisoners from Dorchester to Kingston. They are constantly being changed, backwards and forwards, from one to another. No doubt that is the object—instead of sending them first to the provincial penitentiary and then transferring them to another, to allow the judge to send them, he being advised as to the best place, or as to where there are vacancies, because sometimes one penitentiary is overflowing and an another is comparatively empty, and they are constantly changing about. Sometimes they want to make a change from a particular province where a prisoner is sent to. It is all done by the Governor General's warrant and by the Secretary of State. A good deal of red tapeism is gone through with by parties who know nothing about the facts.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Those remarks are applicable to subsection 3?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes; that is the provision I am adding.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Sub-clause 3 is an application to the North-west Territories the same as sub-clause 2 is an application to the other provinces?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is sometimes necessary to transfer an officer from one penitentiary to another. Sometimes a man possesses certain qualifications, and because of his special fitness, in the public interest he is transferred, but we make provision here that if he is so transferred he shall not be put in a worse position pecuniarily than he was before. That is to protect him against any wrong that might be done him in the transfer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Experience has taught me that this amendment is absolutely necessary. Many cases have arisen in which the peculiar qualifications of a warden have rendered him better fitted for the management of one penitentiary than another; and cases have arisen of friction in a locality from which, in the interest of the government and the prisoners, the warden should be removed. I should like to ask an explanation on one point from the hon. gentleman. He says the officers are not to be prejudiced by the removal, in salary or perquisities. The idea, I suppose, is to raise the salary of the warden who has the greatest responsibility.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing it should be found, in the interest of the service, that a warden should be moved to an inferior penitentiary, then his perquisites and the salary he received in the more responsible position is not to be interfered with?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it would necessitate equitably the raising of the salary of the officer who was removed from the inferior position. That, I suppose, would be the course pursued by the Minister of Justice in case he was called on to make these removals.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was not the warden, but inferior and subordinate officers in a penitentiary that were in contemplation when the clause was framed. Differences arise between officers in a penitentiary. Both may be very good men, and it is to the advantage of the institution that one of them shall be sent to some other institution, and you want to do so without affecting the compensation which he receives. Sometimes it is necessary to transfer an officer because he has special fitness. A man may be an architect, having special knowledge of the construction of penitentiary buildings. You want to send him from one institution to another, where work is required to be done, and under this section you can do so without his feeling that you are going to affect in any way the compensation which he has been receiving.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I fully approve of that, but the hon. gentleman did not meet the question I asked him. The officer receiving the inferior salary having been removed to a more responsible position, would it not necessitate, in equity, the raising of his salary, thereby increasing the expenditure. I do not object to it, but I want to point out that that would be the effect.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It would be, if you were trading one officer for another.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But you would have to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There may be a vacancy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the clause would not apply; but in case of trading, then it would necessitate an increase?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It would if there was a difference in the salaries.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The amendment in this clause seems to be called for, and I notice, by looking at the original Act, that there are three classes of officers in the penitentiary, some appointed by Order in Council, some by the Minister of Justice and some by the warden. This clause gives the Governor in Council power to remove the officers that it appoints itself, and it gives the Minister of Justice the power to remove to another penitentiary his own appointees and those made by the warden as well.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I see also it is provided that this shall be done without prejudice in any case to the salary and perquisities that officers may enjoy in the first mentioned penitentiary. That means that the mere removal shall not prejudice the salary of any officer. There is nothing to prevent the minister giving a man promotion with his removal.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is to prevent him feeling that a wrong has been done him.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Supposing a man receiving $2,000 salary is removed to a position where he gets only $1,600?

Hon. Mr. POWER—He cannot be prejudiced by the removal.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—You give him $2,000, though he should receive $1,600 only.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, if that were the case, but we have no such differences.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 7.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—This is a pretty hard clause. There is a great deal of difficulty getting insane persons removed from jail to any asylum and you are sending them back. I know our jails are often troubled by having insane persons confined for a long time, and after they do get rid of them they feel very bad if they are sent back. It is a hard problem I know.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that in this matter we are simply doing our duty. With the care of the insane we have nothing to do. That falls under the local jurisdiction. It is the duty of the local authorities to make the necessary provision, and we have had cases of this sort—cases of parties who have been discharged from the insane asylums for some reason or other allowed to be at large. They have committed some offence. Take a case which I remember well, where an insane man who had been discharged, attempted to take the life of another. He was brought before the magistrate. He pleaded guilty and, without any inquiry, was sent to the penitentiary. When he arrived there, it was observed by the warden that he was an irresponsible man. That man ought never to have been discharged from the insane asylum, or, if he was discharged under the impression that he was cured, greater care ought to have been taken at his trial. It seems to me that in every case where a man commits an offence, and especially where there is apparently no motive, the mental condition of the party is at once suggested as a proper subject of inquiry, and one of the difficulties of allowing a man to plead guilty under the circumstances is that if he is insane it might not at the time be discovered. I am not complaining of the condition of these parties and the apparent want of care in considering that mental condition at the time that they are put upon their trial, but when they are sent to us and it is discovered that they are insane persons and incapable of committing the offence in contemplation of law, then they ought to be sent back to the place from which they have been received, after notifying the Attorney General, and it is his business and his duty to give instructions to the officer what shall be done with them when they are received. The proper course is to re-commit them to the asylum where they will be taken care of. We will discharge our duty, so far as it is in our power to deal with the subject, by the provision which I propose here.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Supposing an insane convict is dealt with under the proposed subsection 2 of section 45, the one which has been allowed to stand, how will this work then? The warden is to direct the removal of such insane convict from the penitentiary to the jail or other place from which such convict came to the penitentiary. If the same convict, immediately upon his conviction, is taken to the penitentiary, can he be said to have come from a place of confinement to the penitentiary? He has come from the court to the penitentiary. It is barely possible that some change may be required in that clause.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think so.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 8.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We have in the penitentiary two classes of officers, one coming under the Superannuation Act, who are entitled to a superannuation payment, and the other a gratuity which they are entitled to on their retiring from their position. For instance, you take the case of a keeper: he is not entitled to superannuation, but he is entitled to a gratuity. He is allowed the value of one month's pay, I think it is, for each year's service. If you retire him at any time, he receives that gratuity, but if, instead of being retired, he is promoted to an office which is within the Civil Service Act, and he becomes a contributor and pays into the civil service fund, what I provide here, his civil service will count from the time he began to make payment and he, under the recent arrangement, will be entitled to receive back the money obtained from him, with the interest upon the same at the rate fixed by the Civil Service Amendment Act. What I provide here is that what he has earned under the provision of the law which bestows a gratuity he shall not be deprived of because he begins under another Act, and under another provision, to earn some compensation in another way. He is entitled to both, and he ought, in my opinion, to receive both, and it is for the purpose of enabling him to do so that I have inserted this provision in the bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will this apply to those who have been made the subject of promotion before the passing of this Act. I think it ought to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has this effect, if I understand the clause. Supposing a man has been in the service of the penitentiary for twenty years, not being on the civil service list. He is then entitled to a gratuity, if he retires, of a month's salary for each year that he has served.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes; that would be twenty months.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If he were a young man going into the service, say at twenty years, he would be forty. Then he is removed to another position in which he is entitled to all the benefits arising from the Civil Service Act. Supposing he served twenty-five years more, at sixty-five years he would be entitled to claim superannuation, provided you let him go. Then he would be entitled to fifty per cent of his salary under the Civil Service Act, if he retires. You would add to that fifty per cent of his salary, a gratuity of twenty years in addition.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know that that would be inequitable, but I was going to suggest that if you give him the advantage of the Superannuation Act for the full time, forty-five years—if he served thirty-five years altogether under the Superannuation Act, he would be entitled to have the highest allowance, that is, seventy per cent of the average salary three years prior to his retirement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Under the old system.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am speaking of the Civil Service Act as it existed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is speaking of those who were under the civil service before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am speaking of the Civil Service Act as it was on the statute-book. You deal with the officer the moment you transfer him from one position to another, you make him a civil servant and bring him under the Civil Service Act. He is then entitled to all the advantages arising from that position. You are unable to retire him. He cannot be retired until he has served ten years, that is under the Civil Service Act, unless it be for economy or efficieny in the service. Supposing you want to remove him, what position would he be in then? Under the Civil Service Act the practice has been to retire him, if there is no charge against him, by adding ten years to his service, and thereby bringing him under the operation of the Act, but if he has not served for ten years, and it is not for the efficiency of the service or to effect economy, then you could only retire him by giving him a gratuity. Would you add that gratuity to the other allowance? You will find these questions arising all the time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that under the Civil Service Act as it existed, a party was entitled to contribute a certain sum.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the case of gratuities.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am speaking of the Civil Service Act before it was amended. His duty was to pay a certain sum and he was entitled to superannuation after a service of ten years. That option is reserved to all who were paying at that time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That expired, though, last year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He is entitled to receive what he pays in with interest, on his retirement. Now, that is the law that must necessarily apply to almost everybody in the penitentiary service at the present time, not the older appointments, because a large number of these were retired under an older provision on account of age.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under the provisions of the law, as amended by Mr. Mulock, is it compulsory now on all officers appointed under the government to allow a certain proportion of their salary to remain in the Savings Bank?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then there is no payment to a man on account of that time. He gets the amount to his credit and the five per cent interest.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does that apply to everybody?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, except under the old system.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does it apply to all new appointments?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know the old officers were allowed to accept the new provision or not, as they pleased.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think the hon. member will find it perfectly fair.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is just one point in connection with this clause that I do not quite understand. I think that the clause has reference almost entirely to officers of the penitentiary who are promoted from being ordinary officers to come into the civil service.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are not dealing with any other.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If I understand this clause aright, supposing an officer who is in the class that is only entitled to a gratuity, is promoted, he would not receive his gratuity until he retired from the service?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not as long as he is in the service.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would it remain at interest?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it would not.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLE, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the bill, and asked leave to sit again.

RAILWAY COMMUNICATION TO THE YUKON.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to move the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House desires to express its approval of the declaration of policy contained in a portion of the speech of the Right Honourable the Premier of the 9th June, relative to Yukon Railway matters, of which the following is a summary:—

"Should it be decided in the future that the Lynn Canal does not belong to Canada, the policy of Canada will be to gain access to the Yukon, not by the Lynn Canal, but by building railways down to what are indisputably Canadian waters, to Observatory Inlet, through the Cassiar, Atlin and Yukon districts."

That this House desires to reaffirm the following portions of the resolutions unanimously adopted by it during last session relative to railway communication with the Yukon district:—

"Resolved, That it is desirable and necessary that an all-Canadian railway route from the Pacific coast to the Yukon district should be opened up without delay, in order to secure to the Dominion as much of the trade of that district as possible, giving continuous communication, cheap and safe transportation to passenger, food supplies, and other necessary articles of commerce, and safe and rapid conveyance of mails and bullion.

"That keeping in view the economical administration of that district, compatible with every possible encouragement to miners and the mining industry, there are good reasons, from present indications, for expecting that the revenues of the Yukon district will be sufficient to defray the cost of establishing railway communication and other legitimate charges.

"That it is desirable that the mineral lands of that district should be reserved for the general public, and for revenue purposes, for on wise and judicious administration depends the progress and prosperity of the district.

"That the alternate blocks of mineral land reserved under government regulations in the richest known portions of the Yukon district, places at the disposal of the government property which can be readily converted into money and made available in the prosecution and development of necessary public works in that district.

"That with such valuable resources, together with a large annual revenue, the Yukon district can easily meet the cry, 'Let the Yukon build its own railways.'"

He said:—It may be thought by some hon. gentlemen that it may be unnecessary to bring up a question of this kind on the Yukon communication at the present time, that the issue is dead, that there is nothing before the country or before the House. I think this is a question which should not be allowed to die at any time. It should be forced and urged on the government at all times in a reasonable and proper way. I would not allude to it now but for the announcement of the Premier of the Dominion about three weeks ago of his policy with regard to communication with the Yukon and where he would start from—from an indisputable Canadian port. The opinions of hon. gentlemen here being in favour of an all-Canadian route, I thought they would have no objection to express their approval of that announcement by the Premier. That is one of the reasons why I have brought the matter before the House. We all know that the communication to the Yukon is very defective, and even from the humanitarian as well as from the economical and commercial point of view a road should be built in that country. The means of communication to the Yukon is very imperfect, expensive and dangerous. We have all read with horror of the loss of life on the Skagway and White Pass route. Men anxious to reach the Eldorado, pushing on regardless of the consequences, have met death from avalanches, and the breaking of treacherous ice in the lake and from other causes. Some improvement has taken place during the last year, but there is plenty of room for still more, and especially for an all-Canadian route. The St. Michaels and Yukon River route is a long circuitous one, uncertain on account of shallow water, and shifting sand bars and subject to the delays and annoyances incident to foreign customs regulations. Other roads, no doubt, will tap the Yukon from the east as it becomes more developed and its resources better known. In the meantime, the shortest and safest route is from the Canadian seaboard on the Pacific. Such a route could be worked all the year free from climatic interruptions. In carrying out such a necessary work as this, no time should be lost. Should there be no company in sight now to carry it out the government might do what was done in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Select a strong company to carry out such an undertaking. I am sure the House has had much satisfaction in hearing or reading of the anticipated output of gold this year in the Yukon, not by the ounce but by the ton. The lowest estimate of the yield is twenty millions, and some persons think it will reach a much higher figure, all conducing to greater commercial activity and a larger revenue. The government is, no doubt, fully alive to the wisdom of securing to the Dominion as much of this wealth and commerce as possible by making the ingress and egress through our own country—thus preventing the present flow into a foreign country. In this connection the opinion given by the Premier is of much importance. We will always have strong competition in the United States coast cities, and it behooves us the more to use every means to hold what is really our own. Last session this House unanimously adopted a set of resolutions approving of an all-Canadian route to the Yukon, as distinguished from a half-foreign, half-Canadian route, and I hope it will, this session, reaffirm the policy it believed in and recommended last session, strengthened as it is now by the recent utterances of the Premier of Canada in favour of an all-Canadian route, which is in harmony with the opinion of the Conservative wing of Parliament, and in harmony with sound principles of internal development. I feel gratified that the government have come to think of an unmistakable all-Canadian route as the wise and proper course. I hope the House will agree with the resolution now brought forward, and express approval of the words uttered by the Premier about three weeks ago on this question. Of course, they were qualified to a certain extent; that is to say, should the Lynn Canal belong to the United States, we should build to some Canadian port further south; but should the Lynn Canal belong to Canada, that being the nearest point to the Yukon country, that the government should build their railway there. In any event, it would be an all-Canadian route.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I would suggest that the discussion of this question should be postponed until the more important matters which we have before us are disposed of. Should a discussion take place on this question, a whole day might be wasted which we should devote to a discussion of the Grand Trunk Railway agreement.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—My hon. friend has asked me to second his resolution. I should be glad to do so, but I venture to suggest to him whether it would not be well, having brought it before the House, to let it stand for the present, because—I do not know whether others are in the same position—I have not had an opportunity to look into those resolutions as fully as I should like to do.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is pleasant to know that some good can come out of Nazareth, even in the opinion of the hon. gentleman from Victoria. He admits that for once the Premier has said the right thing. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the hon. gentleman's motion——

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—There is nothing before the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understood the question was on the resolution.

The motion was allowed to stand.

SUPPLY OF BEEF FOR GOVERNMENT FORCES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired :

If the contract for the supply of beef for the government forces in the Yukon and elsewhere "that the hon. Minister of Justice, in answer to my question a few days ago, said was under consideration," if such supplies has been called for by public tender? And if so, in what papers have notice of such tenders been given?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In the case of supply of beef for the militia regimental depots, or for the volunteer militia training in camp, tenders are called for by posters in each locality where the school is situated or where the camp is to take place. In the case of the Yukon militia contingent, arrangements for the supply of beef are left to the commanding officer to arrange locally. No tenders for this supply for the Yukon force have been called for since they left for Fort Selkirk.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—In the locality—do you mean the Yukon?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—To arrange locally. The whole matter is left in the hands of the officer; he is on the ground and knows what supplies can be locally had, and what will be necessary to import, and so the matter has been left entirely in his hands. I think that is all the hon. gentleman's question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a departure from the usual course pursued in asking for supplies for these camps. I suppose that that may arise from the fact of the peculiar circumstances of the Yukon as compared with other portions of the Dominion. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the supplies are always asked for, not by the officers of the camp, but by the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly, but my hon. friend knows the Yukon is well nigh an inaccessible country, and an officer on the ground is in a better position than the officials here to state what is required, what can be had in the locality and what will be necessary to import from elsewhere, and so the officer in command of the force is left to arrange for the supplies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can he arrange for the supplies without advertising for tenders, and take such course as he thinks proper?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, he may take such course as he deems proper.

THE PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed, in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (R) "An Act further to amend the Penitentiary Act."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The clause as it was proposed here reads as follows :—

33. The Governor in Council may, from time to time, fix the sums to be annually paid to the warden and the other officers and servants of any penitentiary established under the provisions of this Act.

I propose to add: "But such salaries shall not exceed the sums specified in the schedule of this Act."

The clause was amended and adopted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—For the Kingston penitentiary there is a maximum and minimum schedule in the statutes of 1887 and there is a maximum schedule in the statutes of 1895. I have adopted very nearly the maximum schedule of the statute of 1887. The statute of 1895 was found in many instances below that which competent offices could be retained for. The maximum salary of the warden of Kingston penitentiary is $2,600.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before proceeding any further, while upon that one point, how is it proposed to arrange the salaries of the different penitentiaries in case hereafter one should become more important than the other? Will that be left to take care of itself?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Some are more important, but I recognize the present state of things. The schedule may require to be amended from time to time. I should have preferred to allow the schedule to stand for another year, but hon. gentlemen took a different view of the matter, and I am proceeding with it on the best information I have.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What was he getting before?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was $2,800 in the statutes of 1887. In 1895 it was $2,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the maximum.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—With the perquisites?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. The deputy warden, $1,500, the chaplain $1,200, surgeon $1,800, accountant $1,200, warden's clerk $900, storekeeper $900, steward $900, chief keeper $1,000, hospital overseer $800, schoolmaster $700, engineer $1,000, trade instructor $700, keeper $600, guard $500, messenger $500, stoker $500, matron $600, deputy matron $400.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Those are in many instances the same as before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We could not ascertain whether if they were the same as before without knowing the number of years they had served.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was taking the maximum, with the yearly increases.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not finding any fault with the sums.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There will be no increase above these.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They can be appointed at a lower sum. Is it intended to raise salaries each year, until the maximum is reached, or will the government exercise their own discretion?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think we should increase it at our discretion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, that is the best way.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The only one I was thinking of increasing was the schoolmaster's salary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think we would be justified in increasing the pay of the schoolmaster.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The salaries which the hon. gentleman has just read refer only to Kingston?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—You are going back to the plan adopted in 1887 of having a maximum for each penitentiary in place of a general provision?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—How many hours a day does the schoolmaster work?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is very uncertain.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I think the salary is very low.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—By the schedule of salaries provided in 1895, the offices of schoolmaster and hospital overseer were united in one person.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They have been separate, but sometimes they are united and we retain the power of giving two offices sometimes to one man. Sometimes you get a man specially well qualified for the work, and it is better to unite some subordinate office with his principal office than to lose his services. Those two offices were united in 1898.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Has the schoolmaster been a long time in the service?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No; I think not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has the work that has devolved upon these two offices rendered it advisable to have two officers?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think so. Mr. Macdonald had been for some time deputy warden in the Manitoba penitentiary. I think he was appointed there as hospital overseer, and he was specially well qualified, and the two offices were united for the purpose of giving him a better salary than he had before. He was specially qualified. We might not get another party possessing the same qualifications, and, while they were united in order to give him an adequate compensation, it was an arrangement not intended to be permanent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The statute makes it permanent.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think under the law, at the present moment, there could be only $800 paid for the joint positions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman will see in the schedule of 1887 how it was.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am speaking of the 1895 schedule.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was impossible to get men, because the salaries were so low.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is Mr. Macdonald there yet?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He has tendered his resignation. He was suspended when Sir John Thompson was Minister of Justice, on account of some difficulties in the Manitoba penitentiary, and he was without salary for a time. Then it was felt he had not been quite fairly treated, but another having been appointed to his office, he could not be restored, and he was sent to Kingston penitentiary and arrangements were made to give him the compensation there. His health has, in some measure, failed, and he has asked to be retired. He has been a long time in the service. He has also asked that the compensation he was entitled to in Manitoba should be paid him. Then, in the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, I propose the following salaries: Warden $2,400, deputy warden $1,500, the same as in the other place, the chaplain $1,200, the same as in the other case, surgeon $1,400, accountant $1,100, warden's clerk $800, storekeeper $900, steward $800, chief keeper $900, hospital overseer $750, schoolmaster $700, engineer $900, trade instructor $700, keeper $600, guard $500, messenger $500, teamster $400.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understand now that, as far as we have gone, we are dealing with Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul penitentiaries, and we are creating a separate office for schoolmaster and hospital overseer in these two at least? Therefore, as compared with how it stood in 1895, we are creating a new office in each case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There was a schoolmaster and a hospital overseer in all the penitentiaries under the Act of 1887. Under the Act of 1895 these two offices were united in one in most of the penitentiaries. The hon. gentleman proposes to re-enact the old state of affairs and create a new office in each case?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would like to know the reason of that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hospital overseer has the hospital in charge and attends to the administration of the medicine, and so on.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Is he a druggist?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He may be a druggist. He is a party who has had some experience as an attendant, and acts as surgeon.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—He should be a druggist.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not necessarily, because the medicine is prepared by the surgeon of the hospital. The hospital overseer is the person who has the sick of the hospital in charge and sees to the administration of the medicine. The surgeon sees them every day, of course, but if any changes take place in the condition of the patients, he reports to the physician, and to some extent discharges the functions of one having the care of the hospital, and sees to its hygienic condition. He is an officer who has always existed in the institution, and while it may be united with the functions of some other officer, the duties are essentially distinct. It is not new. It has always existed in the institution.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The surgeon only receives $1,400 and at Kingston he gets $1,800.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Why is that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I intended to have made it $1,600. I think he is entitled to that. But he has a good deal less work to do than the surgeon at Kingston, nearly 200 patients less. I think $1,600 is not an extravagant amount to allow the surgeon at St. Vincent de Paul. The intention was to make it as nearly as possible in proportion to the number of patients and the amount of work. I propose to make the salary of the schoolmaster in this case $800, the same as in Kingston, as he has very onerous duties to discharge. Then with reference to the Dorchester penitentiary, I propose that the warden's salary shall be $2,000. The number of convicts there is less than half, or about half, the number at St. Vincent de Paul. The deputy warden's salary will be $1,400, and if the offices of deputy warden and chief keeper should be united, then the salary will be $1,500, chaplain $800, surgeon $1,200, accountant $1,000, storekeeper $800, steward $800, and if the offices of storekeeper and steward are held by one person, the salary will be $1,000, chief keeper $800, hospital overseer $700, schoolmaster $700, engineer $900, assistant engineer $750, trade instructor $700, keeper $600, guard $500, messenger $500, teamster $400. Then, in the Manitoba penitentiary, the warden's salary is to be $2,000. This salary it may be necessary at no distant day to increase on account of the increase of population in that district. Deputy warden and chief keeper $1,200, chaplain $800, surgeon $1,200, accountant and storekeeper $1,100. These offices are not so enormous but what the two may be discharged by the one person. Steward $800, hospital overseer and schoolmaster $900, united into two offices, engineer $1,000, trade instructor $700, guard $600, messenger $600.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I think I understood from the Minister of Justice that the guards in the Dorchester penitentiary were getting $500, the same as in Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul penitentiaries, but in Manitoba they are to receive $600. Why are they paid more in Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The difficulty is that the cost of living is greater, and they are miles away from any town or place to get supplies.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I suppose they have to look after the same number of convicts?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, not so many, but there are fewer guards?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—But if they are away from the town they will not have a chance to spend their money.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then, in the British Columbia penitentiary the salaries will be as follows: Deputy warden $1,200, chaplain $800, surgeon $1,000. He need not be paid that sum if the number of convicts in the penitentiary does not warrant it. But at the time the surgeon's salary was fixed, at $600, there were fewer convicts in the penitentiary than at the present time. The population is rapidly increasing, and so I think it would be only a prudent thing to fix the salary of the surgeon at $1,000. It may be necessary to make it higher at no distant day. The accountant and storekeeper and schoolmaster are united in one office; that may be continued so at the present time. If the number increases at an early day, it will be necessary to increase these. Then, the steward $800, trade instructor $700, guard $600, messenger $600, teamster $600. There are a few parties to whom you are obliged to pay more, in order to secure the service of proper officers in the eastern penitentiaries. The guards in Manitoba and in British Columbia are paid $600 a year, that is $100 more than they are paid at Kingston, Dorchester or St. Vincent de Paul, owing to the cost of living and the difference in the pay for which competent parties may be secured. I have now stated what I think are the maximum salaries which should be paid to these officers in charge of the penitentiaries, and I shall ask the committee to adopt this schedule.

The schedule was adopted.

On section 2.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This clause was allowed to stand. The object of this clause is to enable parties to be sent directly from the jail to the penitentiary without being first sent to some other penitentiary or institution. We had a female convict in the province of British Columbia, but there are no female wards in that penitentiary. We are obliged to send a female convict to Kingston. Under the law as it stands it is necessary to send the convicts to the first penitentiary within the district embraced for persons convicted in that district, and so the prisoner had to be sent to the penitentiary in British Columbia, and from that point forwarded to Kingston. Now, when this provision becomes law, that convict would have been deemed to have been already in custody of the warden of the British Columbia penitentiary, and he could have issued his warrant to have her forwarded to Kingston without the cost or expense of first being sent to the institution. So that is the reason for these words:

For the purposes of this section any convict sentenced to be imprisoned in any penitentiary shall be deemed to be in the custody of the warden of that penitentiary immediately upon such sentence.

That is the case that is intended to be met by the provision of this section.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I notice in Kingston penitentiary and St. Vincent de Paul, and Dorchester also, the two offices are separate, while under this law they are to be one. In the other penitentiaries the present system is continued. The reason given by the minister for the additional increase at Kingston does not apply to the other two. There must be some other reason. The reason given by the Minister of Justice for uniting them in Kingston was in order to give a position to Mr. Macdonald at a greater remuneration. The remuneration in Kingston for the two offices was $800. What he received in Manitoba I do not know, so there must be some other reason for the separating of the offices in the other penitentiaries than that given by the minister. In reference to the last motion made by the hon. gentleman, for the adoption of that provision to place the prisoner immediately in the custody of the warden of the penitentiary, that is a good suggestion to avoid delay, trouble and expense, but who is to be the judge, at the time of the sentence, to which penitentiary the prisoner is to be sent? It is not to be presumed that the judge would be in a position to know the number of prisoners in the different penitentiaries of the country. Would the prisoner be sent to the penitentiary in the province in which he receives his sentence, and then have an investigation and inquiry made as to the expediency of sending him to another place. I can understand if the judge in sentencing a woman to any length of servitude, if he knew there was no woman's ward in the penitentiary in the province in which the sentence took place, he could then send her to another; but supposing it is a case of an overcrowded penitentiary, how would he know where to send her?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not the judge; it is the executive government that decides finally the penitentiary to which the party is to go.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The executive in Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes; this is simply to avoid an intermediate step.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That, of course, would have to be provided for under the first section of this bill. The Governor General, by proclamation, would have to declare the territories. At present we have the territories defined by law, but the Governor in Council may make changes under the present bill. That would, of course, be known to the judge and the officials in the court, and the prisoner would go forth to the penitentiary that would, under the last proclamation, be declared to be in the territory. That was a subject of some discussion at an earlier stage of this measure. I think that is a good provision, because it will obviate a good deal of expense in some cases—in the case, for instance, of New Ontario, which is a long distance from Kingston. Under the present Act a prisoner would have to be sent to Kingston, and thence to Stony Mountain, whereas, if New Ontario is attached to Manitoba, the prisoner could go direct to Stony Mountain.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Do I understand the schedule of salaries is based on the maximum?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes; there is no minimum.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Supposing a person should be appointed hereafter, would he commence, say at Kingston, at a salary of $800, or would there be discretionary power given to the government to regulate his salary? I can understand when a man has been a long time in the service of the government he is entitled to greater consideration, but in the case of a new appointment, would he commence at the salary of his predecessor?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, not necessarily. A minimum is sometimes very inconvenient, because it would prevent, sometimes, the getting of a thoroughly competent man. I know a gentleman who was highly recommended for an office in one of the penitentiaries, but I found that he would not touch any salary that we could give or that I could ask him to accept. We want the power, where a man is specially fitted for certain work, within reasonable limits, to secure his services, and so, while I have no objection to a maximum salary, I think a minimum salary is rather inconvenient. Where the service you require is clerical service, and the men employed are young men, it works well enough, but where you require special qualifications, men possessed of good judgment, who are thoroughly trusty, you have not any necessity for a minimum. Of course, Parliament is entitled to know what is being paid, and I do not object to saying that Parliament shall decide what the maximum sum shall be beyond which the minister shall have no discretion; but as long as it keeps below that, I think it will always be found advantageous to leave his discretion as free as it well can be.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would suggest that the schedule be printed with the bill as it is. We can understand it better having it before us, and can have the third reading at the same time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not intend to ask for the third reading to-day, as I want to consider the schedule myself.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLE, from the committee, reported that the committee had made some progress with the bill.

PORTAGE DU FORT AND BRISTOL BRANCH RAILWAY BILL.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

The order of the day being read:

Consideration of the Report of the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, to whom was referred Bill (42) "An Act respecting the Portage du Fort and Bristol Branch Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said:—Probably it would be well, before making any observations with respect to this report, I might intimate to the Senate the result which I have arrived at in my own mind, and which I propose to present to the House, asking them to adopt it in the shape of a resolution. I purpose, after having made some explanatory observations, to move that the report be returned to the committee for further consideration. I do not think there is a member of this House who has a higher respect for the decision of a committee than I personally have. I am exceedingly unwilling to appear to pass a judgment upon a decision which has been arrived at, but I feel, under the circumstances in which this bill has been presented to the committee, and their decision upon it, that it is my duty to submit the motion which I propose to make. In the first place, I may be permitted, by way of explanation, to say—though I believe it is perhaps a little out of order to speak of what was done in the committee—that the majority by which this decision was arrived at was a small majority,—a majority of four in a committee of twenty. Had it been a very decisive majority, or had there been anything like unanimity in that committee, I should have been exceedingly unwilling to question the judgment of the committee, but coming, as that bill did, from the House of Commons, where it had been very fully and very carefully and for a long time considered by the Railway Committee of that House,—coming to us in that shape, it appears to me to be entitled to much more careful consideration than perhaps might otherwise be given to it. We know that in that House a great deal of trouble was taken to arrive at a correct judgment with reference to this bill. There were no less than four or five sittings of the committee, and an opportunity was afforded to a large number of persons interested, both for and against the bill to be heard, and so the bill was fully considered, and all the points which have since been brought out before the Senate committee, were just as strongly brought out before the Railway Committee of the House of Commons. When we think that, after all that careful consideration, the House of Commons passed the bill, I contend that the measure comes to us in a very different shape from one originating in this House. As a general rule, we are not disposed to treat the decisions of the House of Commons lightly. Where we find it necessary, as a duty of this House, to come to a decision contrary to that which has been arrived at in the lower House, we do so with great care, and with the certainty that in so acting we are safeguarding the interests of the country. We do so when there is some principle at stake—something of importance connected with the bill which influences our action before we venture to differ from the judgment carefully and deliberately arrived at by the House of Commons. In this respect I think the bill has been, perhaps, scarcely as carefully treated as it should have been in our committee, and it would not be a proper thing that a small majority of four in the Railway Committee of the Senate should condemn a bill which has received such careful consideration and approval in the other House. No matter what the majority might be in the Senate it would be considered a fair decision, but I do not think we should allow a small majority of four in a committee to throw out a bill which has come to us with the sanction and approval of the other House. That is my reason for asking that the bill be re-committed, with an instruction that the Senate has approved of the principle of the bill. Now, is it not generally the rule that at the second reading of a bill in this House, the principle is discussed, and when it passes is generally approved of. I know it is not considered an inflexible rule which we cannot depart from at all, but it is the general rule. At the second reading is the time when any objections to the bill should be stated in this House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There was objection taken at the second reading.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I do not remember it, I had not at that time become sufficiently interested in the bill to be aware of it. At any rate, there was no objection in the shape of a vote of this House being asked upon it. There was no decision. There may have been some adverse remarks about it. In this case I think the bill should have received further consideration at our hands. In reference to what the committee has reported, that the preamble has not been proven, I may say there is not much in the preamble. It is a mere statement of facts that I fancy there is no question at all about. There cannot be any question about the facts recited in the preamble, so the essential feature of the report is that it is not expedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners. The reason assigned for the decision of the committee is simply this, that this road parallels an existing line. That is the whole sum and substance of the objection, and it is held that it would jeopardize an interest which has already been sanctioned by Parliament. Now, does it realy jeopardize this interest? Can it, in any sense, be said to be a parallel line? In my judgment it cannot. Here I come to a distinct issue with the views that have been advanced by those who oppose the bill. It does not parallel an existing line in any way to injure it. To consider this question properly, one must divide this proposed road into three distinct and separate parts, that part going from Pembroke to the Ottawa River at Portage du Fort, then from Portage du Fort on the Quebec side of the river to Quyon, and from Quyon to Ottawa. They are not exactly equal divisions. The 27 miles from Pembroke to Portage du Fort passes through the province of Ontario, and cannot by any possibility be considered as paralleling the Pontiac Pacific Junction Road, because between the two is the Ottawa River unbridged, and a considerable extent of territory besides. There is no possible connection between the Ontario side of the Ottawa River between Pembroke and Portage du Port, and the Pontiac Pacific Junction line, as it extends up to Walthan. I cannot conceive that any one can say that, there is any paralleling it in such a way as to injure it there. The Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway ends at Waltham. Before it could possibly reach Pembroke, there would have to be two bridges across the Ottawa River and a road across the Alumette Island also. The Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company have held the power to build that particular part of the road and those bridges for some 18 years, and nothing has been done. They have held the charter and prevented anybody else from doing anything, while they have done nothing. It is a heavy and expensive work to do, and when accomplished, if it should ever be, very little would be gained by it, because Waltham is so far north that it would add considerable mileage between Pembroke and Ottawa. So I consider the Ontario section of this road out of the question as influencing our decision about the granting of this charter. The section from Portage du Fort to Quyon, in one sense may be considered a parallel line. But we are not asked to give this. The company already have that. They have a charter.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Then why do they come here.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I will tell you presently. They have held a charter for a long time, and are not asking us to initiate a new line. Their charter was extended about five years ago, for its completion, up to next January, so that it is still extant, and it's power unimpaired. The parties holding that charter, you will observe, are not asking us to interfere with the other line. They already have the power, and all that they are asking us is that we shall allow them to build that line and extend it into Ontario, making it a Dominion work. They also ask power to build the third part of the line that I have spoken of, from Quyon to Ottawa. Is there any parallelism there? Has not the House of Commons very clearly and distinctly laid it down that they shall not have power to build a road from Quyon to Ottawa unless they are refused access by the Pontiac Pacific Junction line. The Act expressly says that while it gives them a charter, in the event of the Pontiac Pacific Junction refusing them right of way over their line or neglecting to make a connection between Aylmer and Ottawa, only in that case will the power be granted them to build the road. It is very carefully guarded, so that you cannot say there is any parallelism there. They join the Pontiac Pacific Junction at or near Quyon, and from that point would get running privileges over the existing line to Ottawa, these privileges being defined—consequently we may rest assured of their equity—by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, the ordinary court to decide any question as to the value of the franchise which may be required or granted. So that the House will see in this way the rights of the Pontiac Pacific Junction are very carefully guarded by the other House. I have shown that not one of those three sections can be said to affect the well being or existence of the present Pontiac Pacific Junction. That part of the territory in Quebec lying between Portage du Fort and Quyon contributes little or nothing to the Pontiac Pacific Junction line, in fact I believe it is generally understood the line is run at a loss, because there is not traffic enough to make it pay. The rates are so high that in that section of the country the people prefer waiting till the winter and getting an ice bridge across the Ottawa and bringing their goods in that way.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—How far i Quyon from the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It is not very far, but the river runs between. The Canadian Pacific Railway does not object to this enterprise. The route is very much nearer being parallel with the Canadian Pacific Railway than with the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway. They start at Pembroke together and diverge very slightly as they come eastward. If the Canadian Pacific Railway had objected I could have seen some force in it, because the line to Portage du Fort really parallels the Canadian Pacific Railway some five or six miles, widening as it approaches the city, but the advantage that would be gained by the making of this new road is that there would be a distance of twenty-eight miles saved between Pembroke and Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It would be twenty-eight miles shorter than the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Yes, shorter because the Canadian Pacific Railway diverges to the south a great deal. If the company could obtain running privileges over the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway from Aylmer to Ottawa it would make a difference of four miles, for the distance from Quyon to Ottawa would be by that route twenty-seven miles, while by the new proposed line it would be twenty-three. I think, under all these circumstances that the objection that this new road would be interfering with the rights and privileges of the Pontiac Pacific Junction should have very little weight. Why is it that the Pontiac Pacific Junction remains without any connection with Ottawa? It is a line beginning at Aylmer and ending up the Ottawa River some place, and having no great depot at either end. They have had the privilege of making that connection between Aylmer and Ottawa; and what has been accomplished? Nothing effectual has been done. There is a pile of rails there, and they have had a survey, but no actual work has been done in laying down the continuation of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway from Aylmer to Ottawa. So far from its being a hindrance to the Pontiac Pacific Junction, the construction of this road would be the best thing that could possibly happen to it. This line would bring to Quyon a large amount of traffic coming from the west, because I believe in a short time the saving of that 23 miles would cause a great deal of traffic to be sent from Pembroke to Ottawa by that line instead of by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and just as soon as it became known that this was to be a living road, that Portage Du Fort bridge was to be built and communication made to Pembroke, the proprietors of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway would have less difficulty in raising money on bonds for the completion of that eight miles from Aylmer to Ottawa. We can scarcely conceive it possible that an active company would allow so short a section to intervene between their present eastern terminus and Ottawa. I believe if it was known that this company was going to construct this road immediately, it would be seen that the necessity of it was great, and there would be no difficulty in obtaining whatever funds might be required for building the road into Ottawa. Of course, the Pontiac Pacific and the Ottawa and Gatineau Valley Railway Companies are the proprietors of the interprovincial bridge that is to be built from Nepean Point to Hull. It is proceeding very slowly. There are indications of its existence, and that is all you can say about it. But I believe that if it was known that this other road was coming in, money would be easily obtained for the completion of that bridge, and would thus afford access to a large amount of traffic and business coming in from the west by that new line. So that, altogether, the very best part of the Pacific Junction Railway would be that section lying east of Quyon, over which large traffic would pass. All these things being considered, I think it would be well before the Senate rejects this bill, which has been so well considered and fought out in the Commons, that it should at least give more attention to the subject. And I propose that it shall be remitted back to the committee, with the instruction that the Senate, having agreed on the principle, it no longer remains with them to say the preamble is not proved; that they will go through the clauses of the bill, and if any amendments are required in the clauses, by all means let them be made and reported to the House. I think it is not becoming to the Senate to reject a bill in that very curt way by the adoption of this report.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I desire to say that, in seconding the hon. gentleman's motion, I do it with some hesitancy, because I have a natural disinclination to refer back a report to a committee which has been appointed by this House for the purpose of taking it into consideration. I would not do so, and did not do so, without first seeing the chairman of the committee and explaining to him the reasons why I supported this motion. Having done so, and having heard the very admirable presentation of the case from my hon. friend's point of view, I have very little further to say about it. The only objection which I really heard, which seemed of a tangible nature, before the committee was the fact that this road was supposed to parallel the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway. As far as I could see, the only part of that line that it paralleled was the part not yet built, and we all know that, in getting out of a large city, there are certain channels which are common to all roads entering the city, and it is almost impossible for two roads to come into a city without paralleling one another. That is what is done here. The part that is threatened to be paralleled is the section which is not yet built. In referring this back to the committee, I would like to have it thoroughly understood that no hon. gentleman who votes to refer it back is necessarily bound to support the bill in the committee. All we ask to do here is to have it placed before the committee, when the parties can come there and lay their views before us. It does not bind me to support it in the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has not read the motion, evidently.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Yes, I have. It is to refer it back to the committee and for the committee to go through the clauses. I do not think any hon. gentleman is bound to support it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—As a member of that committee I am surprised to see the hon. gentleman from Sarnia bringing up this question and giving us a lecture, and proposing a vote of want of confidence in the committee, as much as to say we did not consider every clause of the bill. Every hon. gentleman at the table read the bill and considered it. We listened for two hours to intelligent lawyers discussing the question, with maps on the wall showing us the locality, and now the hon. gentleman from Sarnia tells us that we did not know our duty and did not know what we were doing. We should consider, he says, that the Commons passed this bill. Is that a sufficient reason why we should pass it? The people that engaged with Mr. Beemer in the first place had to be bought out. Some of those fellows have Mr. Beemer's money in their pockets. I am tired of this business. We got rid of it once and that should be sufficient. If the Senate sends it back to the committee, what are we to do? We went into it as carefully as we possibly could and we decided to report against the bill. I dislike hearing the hon. gentleman say that the committee appointed to look into the matter did not thoroughly do its work. I know they looked into it carefully and came to a conclusion, but we did not satisfy the hon. gentleman from Sarnia. What has the senior member from Halifax (Mr. Power) to say about this, and what has the chairman to say about it? He occupied the chair in an impartial way, and was perfectly right all the way through. I should like to hear what they have to say. When an hon. gentleman rises in his place and casts reflections on me as a member of that committee, and says that I did not do my duty, I will not submit to it in silence. I say that the whole committee did their duty. There were about twenty members present, and the vote was eight to twelve. Of course, if the hon. gentleman desires to appeal to the House, he has that right, but I hope the House will not pass a vote of want of confidence in the committee.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—This Portage du Fort and Bristol Railway Bill received, in the committee, every consideration. We heard counsel on both sides, for and against it. We heard gentlemen interested on both sides and heard them patiently and quietly, and the committee came to the conclusion that it would be unfair to allow this road to be built, paralleling another road, and also to take part of its traffic and crush it out in that way, and interfere with the large financial arrangements the Pontiac Pacific Junction Company have to make to build their bridge across the Ottawa River. It has been a starving road, I believe now it is paying a little and to grant this charter would hurt that road. If we thought there was traffic enough, we would not have reported against it. If the bill goes back, it will not receive more consideration than it has already received. I move that the report of the committee be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Quite apart from the challenge thrown out to me by the hon. gentleman from Mouck (Mr. McCallum) it is my duty, as chairman of the committee, to say a word or two upon the motion before the chair. As to the position the hon. gentleman from Sarnia (Mr. Vidal) has taken, everything he proposes to the House is deserving of the most careful attention, and I am sure I shall not be considered uncivil, much less offensive to my hon. friend, if I say that the proposition which he is now submitting to the House, appears not to have engaged the careful attention which the hon. gentleman usually gives to matters which he brings before us. The motion, as submitted to the Speaker, contains a direct reflection upon the Railway Committee. It goes further than that. It refers the matter back to the committee with instructions that leave the committee no power to exercise its discretion. No one knows better than the hon. gentleman from Sarnia what the functions of a parliamentary committee are. The committees are the creatures of the House. Matters are submitted to them. It is true they are subordinate to the House itself and the reference back to the committee does not, if made in general terms, necessarily imply a censure upon the committee, but couched in the language contained in that motion, there is a direct censure upon the Railway Committee. As the chairman of that committee, I feel that it is my duty to repel such an aspersion. It is nearly thirty years since I first took a seat in the Parliament of Canada, and I never, during that whole experience, had to do with a committee more keenly alive to the proper discharge of its duties than the Railway Committee of the Senate. There is not a matter that comes before that committee that does not receive the most careful and critical attention, and to say that that committee is to be censured because of the exercise of its power—and I may say in the exercise of its wisdom, it chose to reject that bill—is to cast upon that committee a censure that it does not deserve at the hands of the hon. gentleman from Sarnia, and which it will not deserve if the motion is carried in this House. What is the history of this enterprise? It was chartered by a local Act of the legislature of Quebec in 1888. It was charged with power to construct a railway over a great portion of the ground embraced in the present territory. It came some years afterwards to the legislature of Quebec and obtained an amendment to its charter, by which it was authorized to build a telegraph line as well as a railway. Subsequently it was subsidized by the Dominion Government to the extent of $3,200 per mile for fifteen miles of its railway, and yet with all those privileges it never showed a sign of life until it fell into the hands of its present promoter, who appears, from his own statement and what came out before the committee, to have come before the Parliament of Canada for the purpose of obtaining powers contained in its charter, which would enable him to exercise an undue influence on an existing corporation. What is the proper rule that has been applied to the construction of railways in Canada? It is, that power shall not be given to duplicate railways. Look at the map. Examine the plan produced before the Railway Committee and see whether it is not a fact that the object of the enterprise is to duplicate the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway. It is true that at one portion of its line it is a considerable distance from it, but the object of the promoters of this enterprise is to duplicate the railway into Ottawa. The Railway Committee heard the parties by their able and astute counsel and gave them every opportunity to present their claims before them, and after sitting in judgment upon it, they decided that it was not expedient that the bill should become law, and they so reported. It is for this House to determine whether, by the adoption of that motion, they will pass a vote of censure on the Railway Committee. If it is passed, as the chairman of that committee, I shall sit in silence and listen to the verdict of the House, but I submit it would be an act of injustice, under the circumstances, to pass such a vote of censure. I submit there is nothing before this House to show that the committee acted in a manner to justify the reference back to them in the words of that motion. I submit that it will be an unjustifiable act if this motion should be adopted. It is no breach of confidence for me to say, as I do, that members of that committee who voted for the bill in committee stated that they would vote against the adoption of this motion, and I believe, when the votes are called for, if it comes to that, it will be shown by a majority of the House that it is not the intention of the House to cast an aspersion on the Railway Committee by the adoption of this motion.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I wish to second the motion proposed by the hon. gentleman from Victoria that this report be concurred in. I was not present when the report was made, but if I had been present, the majority would have been five instead of four. Before leaving for home, I gave some attention to that bill, and have done so since, and the more I look into it, the more I am confirmed in the conviction that the Railway Committee adopted the right and proper course. I would have no objection to confirm the privileges of the company, as originally chartered, so far as that portion of the road is concerned. I believe it would be a good and useful road, but from Quyon to Ottawa, the new line is certainly paralleling the other one, zig-zagging and dancing about it, but really parallelling it, and I do not believe, as a member of this House, that we should authorize the building of a railway for which there is no necessity. It traverses no new country. It answers no good purpose and simply has the one object, of hurting a railway against which nothing has been brought forward and nothing has been said, a railway which is not earning, I believe, extra dividends, and all this in contradiction of what has been all along the policy of the committee in this and the other House—to prevent the unnecessary duplicating of railroads.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not think that this motion can be put to the House, because it contains a misstatement on the face of it. The motion is that the report be returned to the committee for further consideration with instructions to the effect that the Senate, having sanctioned the principle of the bill, desire that the clauses may be examined, &c. Now, the parliamentary rule is that the principle of a public bill is affirmed on the second reading, but the principle of a private bill is only affirmed contingent upon proof of the facts recited in the preamble. The bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Railways to take evidence of the facts set forth in the preamble, and the committee have reported to the House that the preamble has not been proven. Therefore, this motion is incorrect on the face of it, as must be evident to every hon. gentleman. The House did not affirm the principle of this bill, because it being a private bill, the House affirmed the principle only conditional on the facts stated in the preamble being proven. These facts were referred to the committee for investigation. The committee investigated them and reported that they were not proven; therefore, it would be absurd for the House, after investigation, to override the action of the committee and pass a motion of this kind. Besides, there is an objection to this motion that no notice of it has been given. It is not part of the notice on the paper. It requires notice.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—In seconding this motion, I had no intention to cast any reflection on the committee of which I am a member. The objection raised by the hon. gentleman from Richmond (Mr. Miller), is so well taken that I am quite content that it should go on that point.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The question is on the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Victoria.

The SPEAKER—If the hon. member insists on the question of order, I shall rule on it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I shall not take any exception for want of notice.

The amendment was adopted.

LIBERATION OF PENITENTIARY CONVICTS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (T) "An Act to provide for the conditional liberation of penitentiary convicts." He said:—The principle of the bill is contained in the first clause. Hon. gentlemen will see, in examining this bill, that it is an adaptation of the principle of what are called indeterminate sentences in the United States, but which in England are usually designated as in this bill. You will see, by an examination of the clauses of this bill, that every one of them is taken from some English statute or other, and that, under the bill, a party may be liberated by order of the Governor in Council and granted a ticket of leave, or license, as it is called in the bill, when he reports to the sheriff or the chief officer of police in the county or city to which he may go, and that he is under necessary surveillance in respect to his good conduct during the period for which he has been sentenced. If he should, at any time, be guilty of any improper conduct—if he should at any time spend his time idly, or associate with those who are known to be disreputable persons, he is liable to have his license revoked, and to be committed to penitentiary to serve out the balance of the time for which he was sentenced. If he is guilty of crime at any time before his sentence expires, he may be convicted of the offence with which he is charged, and the period for which he is sentenced is added to the period of the time the sentence has yet to run, and he may be committed to serve out the balance of one sentence and the whole of the other in the penitentiary. This principle has been found to work satisfactorily in the United Kingdom, and it has been found to work satisfactorily in the States of the Union where it has been tried. Of course, old offenders, whose habits of mind and character have become fixed, who are disposed to crime and who have not the necessary self will to restrain them, when an opportunity offers, from committing crime, are not likely to receive any license under the operation of this measure, but young offenders, those who have committed offences for the first time, and especially where those offences are not of a very serious character, may be liberated upon license being granted them and upon their subjecting themselves to the conditions imposed upon them by the license. They are constantly acting under restraint during the whole period for which they have been sentenced, and so acting under restraint, having their good conduct ever before them, an opportunity is given them to form better habits, those more consistent with the rights of others and with obedience to the law than have been previously formed in their case. I have no doubt that in this country it will be found by experience that the adoption of the rule will be advantageous in bringing about a reformation of the offender, advantageous in giving him an opportunity of continuing in the employment of those who are in the law-abiding class, and relieving him from all the disadvantages to which he would be subjected if he were kept in constant contact with the criminal classes. It is, in my opinion, much more likely that one to whom a ticket of leave is granted will reform while at liberty under that ticket of leave and under public surveillance, than if committed to the penitentiary. Further than that, in my opinion, the cost of the maintenance of the penal institutions will be proportionately diminished. That cost, at the present time, is not so great as it was formerly. It has been suggested—and was suggested under the late administration—that there should be a better classification of prisoners than exists at the present time. In that view I share, but that classification would entail, no doubt, further charges upon the public revenue. At the present time, old offenders and those who are offenders for the first time, men who are hardened in vice and crime and those who are not naturally disposed to crime who have nevertheless been convicted, are thrown together, and the opportunities for reform are very limited indeed, especially to those over the age of sixteen, and who have been convicted of offences which are punishable by confinement in the penitentiary. A great deal of attention has been given in England of late to the subject of criminology, and one thing, perhaps, more than any other has impressed itself upon those who have studied the subject, that the criminal classes there—and to some extent the same is true everywhere—are in a certain sense degenerates. They are those in whom physical vitality is less than in those who are law-abiding, and it has been found in many cases that no inconsiderable improvement has been brought about by attention to physical training as well as to moral instruction. I am not, however, going to discuss this subject generally. I may submit for the consideration of the House a measure framed on lines upon which a large experience has been had and where the results have been satisfactory. I, therefore, ask for the second reading of this bill, believing that it will tend to diminish the growth of crime, and to give those—especially the young—who have been convicted of serious offences another opportunity of reforming their habits under the aid and impulse of surveillance which cannot be otherwise than advantageous.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not give the person, under the circumstances, the right to leave the province. Does it confine him to the province or, if he leaves it, does he violate his license?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman will see that he is required to report himself to the sheriff, or to the constable, in the county to which he may go, and if he leaves that county and goes to another, he reports himself there also, so that he is under continuous surveillance.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But if he does not report himself?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then he will be arrested and committed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How long does the ticket of leave last? If the person behaves himself for the balance of the sentence, he will be clear, will he not?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It will last until his sentence expires, and then he is in the position of a free man. Of course, if he escapes to another country he can be extradited.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I am glad the Minister of Justice has introduced a bill of this kind. It is one which has been felt by those who take an interest in this subject, as one long needed. The subject has been discussed, more particularly among those who are members of an association which the minister knows very well, the Prisoners' Aid Association. Arguing from what has been done in England, and particularly of late in the United States, it would be a great help in reforming young offenders, if there was such a thing as a reformatory for first offenders. This bill will, to a certain extent, meet that want, because instead of a young offender who, perhaps for the first time, has lapsed from the straight path, and has been sent to the penitentiary where he is brought in contact month after month with those who are older offenders and hardened in crime, from whose association no good could be expected, will now have an opportunity of seeing what he can do if he is given this conditional liberty and allowed another opportunity of improving himself, and if he so desires of abandoning his past habits and endeavour to become a worthy and upright citizen. I hope, therefore, that the bill will pass, because I think a very great good will be done by it, I think, at all events, the experiment is well worth trying, and I am quite sure that the results will be found to be such as to justify the adoption of this measure.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY AGREEMENT BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the second reading Bill (138) "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal."

Hon. Mr. WOOD said:—In the discussion which has taken place so far upon this bill, very brief reference has been made to the question of the general policy involved in the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal. The hon. Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State rather assumed, in their opening remarks, that no reasonable objection could be urged to a policy of this kind. I desire to offer a few remarks on that feature of the question before addressing myself to any of the special features of this bill. In the discussion which took place two years ago, in 1897, I ventured to express the opinion which I entertained then, and which I entertain still, that it was not desirable, further than could be prevented, that the government should own and operate railways in Canada. I do not believe that, as a function of the government, a railway can be operated as economically or as successfully as it can be by private companies. My views upon this subject, I think, received very strong confirmation in some of the figures which were submitted to the House by the hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Secretary of State. They read from the railway statistics a very complete statement, or general statement I would perhaps more properly say, of the result of the operations of the Intercolonial Railway for a period extending over some twenty years. The results showed, as they very properly pointed out, that there had been a capital expenditure, first for construction and afterwards for various extensions and improvements, amounting to some $50,000,000. That upon that expenditure no return of any kind, in the shape of interest, had been received ; that in addition to this, there had been a very large deficiency between the gross revenues and the operating expenses amounting to—I do not recollect very correctly and I have not looked to verify the figures—some $11,000,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That embraced part of the capital.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—It may not amount quite to that sum ; still I think there has been a very large deficiency.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—These results confirm the opinion which I have expressed myself, that a government could not successfully, from a business standpoint, operate a railway system under the condition of things that existed in Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is one more point that the hon. gentleman might consider in connection with that—how far that deficiency of revenue is due to the very low rates, and whether those low rates have not inured to the benefit of the population through whose territory the railway runs.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That is a consideration, and I will make reference to it later on. I should like to say, however, before leaving this particular feature of the question with which I am dealing now, that I think there might be other inferences drawn from the very same figures to which I have referred, which would strengthen the position I am taking upon this question. During the period which the hon. gentleman covered with the figures that he submitted to the House, the mileage of the Intercolonial has been very much increased. It has increased during some twenty years from about 700 miles to nearly 1,150 miles. These increases have been by various extensions. One of the most important has been the extension which has been referred to in this discussion, from Rivière du Loup to Lévis, Que. That extension was made at the time, under the impression that it placed the Intercolonial Railway, as a system, in a better position. Another, and in my opinion, a very much more important extension, from a business point of view, was the extension from Truro to Pictou in eastern Nova Scotia, and also the extension from Oxford Junction to New Glasgow and Sydney, in the Island of Cape Breton. In these extensions an entirely new territory was opened up, a territory which, up to that time, had enjoyed no railway facilities. It is one of the very best portions of the province of Nova Scotia, and a territory which certainly furnishes a very large and lucrative railway traffic. During this period, as a result of these extensions, and partly also of the natural growth of business in the maritime provinces, the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway has very largely increased. During twenty years the receipts from freight traffic increased from about half a million to over a million and a half dollars. It increased three-fold in about twenty years. The passenger traffic increased in about the same proportion. Instead, however, of the net results improving under these conditions, it appears that the working expenses have kept pace with the increase of receipts from both freight and passenger traffic, and the net results from the extensions which have hitherto been made are no better, from a general point of view, than they were some twenty years ago. The Minister of Justice called my attention, a few minutes ago, to the fact that this was due to the very low rates which were charged in the maritime provinces. It may be that the rates there are lower than they are in some other parts of the Dominion, but I think if a comparison were made, it would be found that the general tariff on railways which are operated through the old and thickly settled country, will not differ so very much from those which prevail in the maritime provinces as one would infer from the hon. gentleman's remarks. At all events, I venture the statement that in my opinion,—and I believe my opinion will be confirmed by any person who has experience in railway business—that if the Intercolonial Railway as it is to-day, and as it has existed for many years past, were operated by private individuals, or by a company organized for that purpose, it would show a handsome profit, and that could be made without adding one dollar to the charges either for freight traffic or passenger service. I might, I think, make this point stronger, if stronger proof is needed, by a comparison between the results of the profits of the government railway and railways, under similar circumstances, that are operated by private companies. I do not wish to detain the House with any lengthened remarks on this point, but I will cite, for the information of the House, one case which I think bears specially on that point, and that is the case of the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company in Nova Scotia. This railway company is formed from the union of what was originally the Windsor and Annapolis Railway and the Western Counties Railway, the connecting link between Digby and Annapolis being built, if I remember rightly, largely, if not altogether at the expense of the Dominion Government. The railway runs from Halifax to Yarmouth, passing through the Annapolis valley. The different parts of this railway have been under the control of a private company. That company has exhibited a great deal of enterprise in developing the traffic of that country. They have paid special attention to the development of tourist travel in southern and western Nova Scotia. They have placed two magnificent steamers on the route between Yarmouth and Boston. They have placed a very fast boat in the Bay of Fundy between Digby and St. John. These boats are run in connection with the railway system, and the net result, as I find from examining the railway returns of last year, shows that they had a profit above working expenses of $118,000. This company has established for itself a very strong financial position. It is able to borrow money at the present time in London at four per cent interest, and last year it could pay four per cent interest on nearly $3,000,000 of capital. Three millions of capital would represent for the entire length of the line about $15-000 per mile, or about the sum that would be required to build a railway in a district like that which the Drummond County Railway passes through. With the cheap means of constructing a railway which we have at the present time, that would be sufficient to construct a railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Can the hon. gentleman say how much of that earning is from passenger traffic and how much from freight?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I could by turning it up in the railway returns. It is possible I could find it here.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is Longfellow's road. That is the road made valuable by the story of Evangeline.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Yes, no doubt. For one year I have the statistics. The passenger traffic was $193,000, freight $204,000, mails and express $23,000. That, when compared with the Intercolonial Railway, furnishes a comparison of the results obtained from a railway operated by the government and one operated by a private company under similar circumstances. In my opinion, so far as traffic is concerned, the advantage is in favour of the Intercolonial Railway. It connects Halifax and St. John with Sydney and Cape Breton. On the main line of the Intercolonial Railway in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, the railway passes through important cities and towns and agricultural villages. Besides that, I may also direct the attention of the House to another fact, that the Intercolonial Railway has the monopoly of the local traffic in the country through which it passes. There are no competing lines. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that it has the whole traffic, whatever it may be. I have always held the opinion, and my experience since I have been in public life certainly confirms me in the opinion that it is impossible to operate a government railway on strictly business principles, and the fact that the Intercolonial Railway is not paying dividends, is not due, as the hon. Minister of Justice perhaps may suppose, to the low rates which are established, but due to the fact that political consideration must, to some extent affect the operations of the road and influence the results. In saying that, I do not wish to reflect upon one party or one government more than another. Since this railway was opened, it has been under the control of both political parties and I have no doubt each one will make out a case, to their own satisfaction, at all events, that during their regime they have managed it more economically and upon better business principles than the other party. But looking at the whole result in a general way, the results are practically the same.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman think that public opinion in the maritime provinces would support any government in parting with the control of it?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Certainly not. I do not wish the hon. gentleman to understand that I expected the government of which he is a distinguished member, would undertake to sell the Intercolonial Railway or place it under the control of a private corporation. I was rather making the argument for two purposes: in the first place, to give the reasons which influenced me to entertain the opinion which I do, unfavourable to the government owning and operating railways, and, in the second place if my views on that subject are sound, the same reasons would apply—on general principles, I mean—against any further extension of the government system of railways.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the public management is bad, and the rates are not lower than on roads owned by private corporations, on what theory does the hon gentleman explain that the public of the maritime provinces desire that that bad management should continue?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Some person holding opposite views from mine would probably be able to answer that question better than myself. I am not putting forth the views of the public in the maritime provinces. I am expressing my own views, and if they are not in accord with the sentiment of the maritime provinces, I cannot help it. I entertain these views strongly, and I feel it incumbent upon me, when I present these views to the House, to give, as fully as I can the reasons upon which I based these views. I venture the hope that, to some extent at least, they may commend themselves to the consideration of other hon. gentlemen sitting in this chamber, and possibly, to some extent, to the public at large. The only conclusion which I wish to draw from the remarks which I have made thus far is that, on general principles, the history of the Intercolonial Railway in the past and our experience of government management do not justify further extensions of the government system of railways. Other arguments have been addressed to the House in favour of the present scheme. It is of course possible, when one does establish a general principle or general rule, that that rule may have exceptions. Such is often the case, and it might be argued, and perhaps it will be argued by some, that the extension proposed in this present case is an exception to the general rule which I have just endeavoured to establish. I will note very briefly some of the arguments which have been presented in support of this bill. In the first place, a good deal of stress was laid upon the opinions which have been expressed by the Hon. John Haggart, late Minister of Railways, in the evidence which he gave before the Drummond County Railway Commission; also to the opinions held by Mr. Schreiber, the Deputy Minister of Railways, and Mr. Pottinger, the general manager at Moncton, who both signed a letter favouring this extension. That letter has been read to this House. I am ready to admit, at the outset, that all these gentlemen are gentlemen of great ability and great experience in railway matters, that perhaps no higher authorities could be quoted in this House with regard to the Intercolonial Railway than the two gentlemen to whom reference has just been made, and in differing from them, as I do, upon this question, I will only say this in regard to the opinions which they have expressed—I would call the attention of the House to the fact that Mr. Haggart was Minister of Railways in the late government for a number of years, that he had this question at one time under consideration, that he was offered the Drummond County Railway at a price considerably lower than the present government were proposing to pay for it under this arrangement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—His evidence in the Drummond County Railway Committee was certainly to that effect.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. When Mr. Schreiber's letter was read and he was asked to explain, he said the proposal made to him was for an unfinished road.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Yes, that is quite true. Mr. Haggart, in his testimony before the Railway Committee, stated that he was offered the Drummond County Railway as it then stood for $500,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—How much of it?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The part that was then completed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Ninety miles. The section from Moose Park to Chaudière, forty-two miles had to be built. If you take $500,000 for the completed section, and add the cost of the parts which had been built, take the figures which were given before this committee of investigation, you will find that the road on that basis would have cost a little over $1,000,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, not at all. Read page 153, where the question was put by the chairman, the last question, where Mr. Schreiber's estimate of the whole road was given as a finished road.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Oh, that is certainly correct. Mr. Schreiber's estimate of the cost of building a new road from Ste. Rosalie to Chaudière Junction was $1,535,000, but the statement I was making, was that Mr. Haggart was offered the portion completed at that time, which was ninety miles of that road, for $500,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the state it was then in.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Certainly in the state it was then in, and in the state it was when the late purchase was made, and the expenditure since amounts to $685,000. Add that to the $500,000, which they were willing to sell the completed portion for, and you would have $1,185,000 for the whole road, completed as it is to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You are speaking of the road as it was then, but a large amount has been spent on the uncompleted portion since.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—How much? If you refer to McLeod's report you will find that he estimates that $35,000 would be required to bring up this completed portion to the standard required by the government, and in the last arrangement, part of the agreement was that $100,000 was to be spent by the government on the railway, $35,000 of it to bring up the completed portion to the standard required by the government, and the other $65,000 on the new part of the road to bring it up to the standard. Therefore, I think, if the hon. gentleman will look carefully into the case, he will find the statement I am making is strictly correct, that Mr. Haggart, in his evidence before the committee, testified that when he was Minister of Railways he had the option of purchasing that railway for $500,000. The figures show that the cost of the remaining few miles was between $600,000 and $700,000, making the whole cost from Ste. Rosalie to Chaudière, if it had been purchased on the basis Mr. Haggart mentioned in his evidence, between $1,000,000 and $1,200,000. I was referred to the opinion which had been expressed by Mr. Haggart before the investigating committee, as to the desirability of extending the railway to Montreal, and I was observing, in connection with that, that when he was Minister of Railways and had the option upon more favourable terms than it is proposed to purchase now, and when he was also given to understand that he could obtain access to Montreal over the Grand Trunk on favourable terms on the mileage basis, as he expressed it, that he did not consider this of sufficient advantage to the Intercolonial Railway to propose it to the House, or even to submit it to his colleagues in council for their approval. With regard to the opinions of Mr. Schreiber and Mr. Pottinger, I cannot say when these opinions were formed. I felt, when I heard this subject referred to the other day, somewhat curious to know what were the opinions of Messrs. Schreiber and Pottinger at the time this proposition was made to Mr. Haggart, and whether they gave him their advice upon the subject. I do not know any way of getting that information, I can only say, with regard to this, that I should attach very much more weight to the opinions which they express now had they been for some time past open and zealous advocates of this extension to Montreal, than I could attach to opinions which have been recently formed and only found expression since the negotiations commenced which have resulted in the proposition now before the House. There has been another argument presented to the House which is a plausible one, and I have no doubt has had a great deal of weight with very many gentlemen who compose this House, and that was the argument that it was desirable, on general principles, that any railway system should have its terminus in a great commercial and distributing centre like the city of Montreal.

As it is six o'clock, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

GRAND TRUNK AGREEMENT BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The order of the day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the second reading Bill (138) "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal."

Hon. Mr. WOOD said :—In the observations which I addressed to the House yesterday afternoon, I endeavoured to give the reasons why, in my opinion, a government railway under the conditions which exist in Canada could not be operated as economically and as satisfactorily, from a business standpoint, as a railway operated by private companies, and also to show from the past operations of the Intercolonial Railway that, from a business standpoint, we were not justified in further extending the government system. I have nothing to add to that branch of the subject to-day, except this remark, that the reason which originally existed for building the Intercolonial Railway as a government work, and for operating it as such, no longer exists. The construction of the Intercolonial Railway was one of the conditions upon which the four original provinces entered into confederation. At that time the cost of constructing railways was very much greater than it is to-day, and their earning power for some years was not supposed to be very great. It was impossible to have this railway constructed by any other means than as a government railway. No private individuals could be induced to place one dollar of capital in an enterprise of that kind. Those reasons, however, do not exist to-day, and so far as extensions of the government system are concerned, they must, in my opinion, be justified on business grounds, and the arguments which have been addressed to the House in support of the present proposition have all been, I believe, of that character. The most important of these was the argument which has been used, I think, by every hon. gentleman who addressed this House, that any railway system of any importance found it desirable to have its terminus in some commercial centre, some large distributing centre like the city of Montreal. That is a proposition which I think will be generally recognized by railway men and by business men throughout the country. As a general proposition it is undoubtedly a sound one, and I am quite free to admit that there will be to the Intercolonial some advantages from having its terminus in the city of Montreal. It will certainly be an advantage, so far as the arrangements for running its trains are concerned. It can make the time tables and other arrangements regarding its trains without being obliged to consult the convenience of other railways. It is possible, too, that having the terminus in Montreal, those who control the Intercolonial Railway may be able, to some extent, to develop a tourist travel in the summer time between the upper provinces and the provinces down by the sea. I think, however, that, with these exceptions, there can be no very material gain, and that those who regard the proposition which I have just referred to as a sound one in the case of the Intercolonial Railway, probably over-estimate its advantages. It must be borne in mind that the Intercolonial has already connection with Montreal, and, so far as its traffic is concerned, the principal effect of the proposed change will be that the traffic will be carried 175 miles farther by the Intercolonial than it is at the present time, and the Intercolonial will, on the other hand, have this 133 miles to maintain, and its proportion of the maintenance of the other forty miles. It must also be borne in mind that, by this extension, there are no new industries created, no country opened for traffic which has not already railway facilities, that there will be no more flour, provisions, or manufactured goods sold for consumption in the maritime provinces than there is at the present time, that there will be no more of the products of the maritime provinces sold in the west than there are at the present time. There may be—I hope there will be, and I have not any doubt there will be—a very considerable development of trade in both directions in the future, but this will be due to the natural growth of business and trade throughout the country, and cannot in any sense result from the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal. In so far as through traffic is concerned, I do not hope for any satisfactory results to follow from this extension. The hon. Minister of Justice, I think it was, read a statement to the House showing the increase of traffic during the last year—during the period that the Intercolonial has had its terminus in the city of Montreal. This appears to have been entirely local traffic, for by the return laid on the table of the House, I find that the whole traffic carried from Montreal to Halifax for export during that period amounted to only 1,050 tons, scarcely two respectable train loads. I wish to discuss this question fairly, and while I am free to admit that there will be some small advantage from extending the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal and making its terminus there, I at the same time express it as my opinion that these advantages are not sufficient to justify the extra expenditure involved, for it must be borne in mind that if these bills pass, and this policy is carried into effect, we add at once $1,600,000 to the permanent debt of the country, and add, at the same time, one or two hundred thousand dollars, and possibly more, for the purchase of the rolling stock to operate this extension; that we also bind ourselves in the near future to make further expenditures for double tracking the line between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, and for additional expenditures for improvements and accommodations at the terminus in the city of Montreal. The net result, therefore, is that we take over a business or a traffic which has hitherto been done by the Grand Trunk Railway, and which it appears, from what has taken place during these negotiations, that the company has not and is not to-day unwilling to abandon, and that for that privilege, besides the expenditure on capital account to which I have referred, we are going to pay annually $140,000. It must also be borne in mind in considering this whole question that in the near future the position of affairs with regard to the Intercolonial Railway will very materially change. I believe it is the settled policy now that the River St. Lawrence near Quebec is to be spanned by a railway bridge. If the reports in the newspapers are correct a sum is to be placed in the supplementary estimates this year to aid that project. When this project is brought about, whether it is sooner or later, the Intercolonial Railway, besides the connections which it has at the present time with the Grand Trunk to Montreal, with the Quebec Central to Sherbrooke and the eastern townships, will have connection across the St. Lawrence River with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in the near future I believe with the Canada Atlantic Railway and Parry Sound Railway through the extension of the Great Northern to the city of Quebec. In the peculiar position which the Intercolonial Railway occupies—for in my opinion its position is somewhat singular and unique, having an absolute monopoly of all the railway traffic in the territory through which it passes—it is not in any sense a competitive railway, and therefore does not require to have its terminus in a great commercial centre for competition purposes; but controlling its traffic, as I have pointed out, I cannot conceive how any railway system could be in a better position than the Intercolonial Railway will be, when that bridge is built and these connections are formed, for making arrangements of a most favourable character for the exchange of its traffic with all the great lines with the west. Now, a word with regard to the development of foreign traffic—that is, traffic which is intended to be forwarded to Great Britain or the continent of Europe. The hon. member from Miramichi (Mr. Snowball) I think it was, referred to this subject, and from the tenor of his remarks led us to believe that he entertained the idea that by getting into a business centre like Montreal, the government would be in a position to control a very considerable quantity of this business and divert it from its present route over the Intercolonial Railway to the seaports of the maritime provinces. I must say that I cannot concur in that opinion. I do not see what possible advantage the Intercolonial Railway will have for securing through traffic when it has its terminus in the city of Montreal, which it has not at the present time. In my opinion, the Intercolonial Railway can never expect to carry through traffic to Halifax or St. John, or any maritime province seaport, destined for Great Britain in competition with the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railways, with their terminus at Portland or Boston or St. John. If the Intercolonial Railway ever does succeed in becoming a thoroughfare for this foreign traffic, it must accomplish that end, not by entering into competition with these great lines, but by securing their co-operation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is what we are doing.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. That is what they are not doing. Take the Intercolonial Railway as it has been in the past, with its terminus at Lévis; if the Grand Trunk has any object whatever in sending its freight to the maritime provinces for export, it would get a larger proportion in the division of the rates for carrying that freight if delivered at Lévis than it will at Montreal. In my judgment, by extending the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, under this arrangement, you actually cut off any possible interest the Grand Trunk may have in sending freight by that route.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The hon. gentleman perhaps differs from me in that. I am expressing it as my opinion. I am glad to say—for I like to agree with hon. gentlemen who differ from me in politics, whenever I can—that if the hon. gentleman from Miramichi (Mr. Snowball), and the hon. Minister of Justice differ from me upon this point, I believe that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals himself is thoroughly in accord with this view. In a speech which he delivered in the city of St. John, and in another speech which he delivered in the city of Halifax, during the last year, he stated plainly that, in view of the distance which the Intercolonial Railway had to haul freight between Montreal and the maritime provinces, he could not hold out to the people of those provinces any hope that they could successfully compete for the foreign traffic between the west and Great Britain. I entirely agreed with the minister when he made that statement.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Did he make it?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—He did. He made it on two occasions. He is so reported in the newspapers. I desire, on this point, to say that my view with regard to the foreign traffic of Canada—which I am as anxious as any person here to see diverted to the seaports of the maritime provinces in the winter time—has been this, that instead of extending the Intercolonial Railway and adopting a policy the basis of which is entering into competition with these other railways, the government should adopt a policy which would make the Intercolonial Railway open and free to all—more in the nature of a common highway for all the great railways which control the traffic originating in the west, sending it over this line to the maritime provinces. The Intercolonial Railway, with its terminus at Lévis, and with a bridge built across the St. Lawrence at Quebec, would be in the character of a great national highway between Lévis and the seaports of the maritime provinces and any railway company that was willing to do so should have the privilege of sending its traffic for export over the Intercolonial Railway, paying barely the cost of carriage. I do not think it is possible, under present conditions, that the Intercolonial Railway can ever hope to carry that sort of traffic with any profit. The distance is too great as compared with other routes. It has appeared to me possible and I have entertained the hope that at some time in the future the great railway companies of Canada might be induced to take some interest in shipping the freight which they have to send to Great Britain over the Intercolonial Railway to seaports in the maritime provinces. To accomplish that successfully we have to depend upon the active efforts of these great railway companies. They will have to arrange for the establishment of the steamship connections. I should like to see them make their own terminal facilities in any part of the maritime provinces they may select, and it appears to me that if they can be interested in doing that, instead of seeking to make any profit out of this traffic (for I feel we cannot hope to do so) we should offer them the free use of the Intercolonial Railway as a highway for the transportation of their traffic at the bare cost of the carriage.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he thinks the Canadian Pacific Railway would be disposed to deliver their traffic at Quebec rather than carry it over their own line to St. John?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I might answer that question, perhaps, by asking the hon. gentleman a question whether he supposes the Grand Trunk will deliver their traffic to the Intercolonial at Montreal rather than carry it over their line to Portland?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They do not stand in the same position at all. The Canadian Pacific Railway runs to the maritime provinces and the Grand Trunk Railway does not.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—The country is paying $150,000 a year for carrying this freight at a low rate.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is where the folly comes in.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—What has that to do with it? Does the hon. gentleman wish me to understand that ocean freights are cheaper from Halifax than they are from Portland?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—They should be.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—But are they?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—What do they pay the $150,000 for?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Is it a condition of the payment of that $150,000, that freights are to be cheaper from Halifax than from Portland? I know that the hon. gentleman knows too much about it to venture the assertion that freights are cheaper from Halifax than they are from Portland or Boston. If the hon. gentleman could discover some way of making them so, he would be doing a good thing for the country. If the hon. gentleman will establish a steamship company, we will give him the preference, if other conditions are the same, and he can get the bonuses.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He will take the highest rates he can get.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the bonuses are thrown away.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not see how the question of bonus affects the matter. I do not agree with the Minister of Justice that the bonuses are thrown away. Without the bonuses we would not have the steamers at all. The bonuses are to secure the steamers and oblige them to make regular trips to the seaports of the maritime provinces. They are not to regulate the rates of freight. I was endeavouring to place before the House, when this interruption took place, the views which I hold personally. They may be worthy of consideration, or they may not, but they certainly are views which I have personally held with regard to the best methods to be adopted for securing for the maritime provinces some portion of the export trade from the western provinces to Great Britain or the continent. I believe, myself, that the advantages which these railway companies would enjoy under a policy such as I have outlined would be of great benefit to them, for it must be borne in mind that they would have no capital invested. They would have no interest on capital to pay, they would have no fixed charges of any kind whatever. These are enormous advantages and, in my opinion, they should be sufficient to overcome the difference of distance which the companies would have to haul their freight in order to avail themselves of the maritime provinces seaports as a place of shipment. I have just one remark further upon this branch of the subject, and that is this: If I am wrong in holding out the hope that, under an arrangement based upon the conditions which I have named, the traffic could not be carried to the seaports of the maritime provinces by these railway companies, I am sure I am safe in coming to the conclusion that the Intercolonial Railway, as an independent and competitive railway, could never hope to carry it except at an enormous loss. I have perhaps dwelt too long upon these phases of the subject, but I have had for some time my own views upon this question. I have given it some thought and consideration, and I thought it only right, in the course of this discussion, to place them frankly before the House. I will not detain the House longer, except to offer a few observations with regard to the two agreements which are now submitted for confirmation. The 2nd agreement, which I shall refer to first in my remarks, is an agreement for the purchase of the Drummond County Railway. The proposal now is to purchase this railway for $1,600,000. That is certainly a very much more favourable agreement, so far as the government and the country are concerned, than the agreement which was submitted to us two years ago. The difference, as has been pointed out by several hon. members, is a saving to the country of over half a million dollars.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—How much is the loss to the country?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I will leave the hon. gentleman to point that out himself when he makes his speech. I am not quite prepared to say that this is a price that the government is justified in paying. If it is true, as hon. gentlemen have pointed out, that it is as cheap as the government could build an independent line, there is that much to be said in favour of it, but the position I took in the discussion two years ago, was that, so far as the constructed portion of the Drummond County Railway was concerned, the government should have bought it on the basis of its market value, and not on the cost of construction. The market value of that road can be easily fixed by the price that the company offered to sell it for, which was at one time $500,000, and another time $400,000. That fixed the market value of the ninety miles of the completed portion of the road.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question.——

Several hon. MEMBERS—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I have a right to ask a question. Would the hon. gentleman place the value of the Cape Tormentine road at the same amount that the people who owned it twenty years ago valued it at?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The hon. gentleman says he has the right to ask a question. He has no right to ask it without the consent of the Speaker, and I do not think these premeditated interruptions are commendable.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not object to ordinary questions, but I do object to questions which are entirely irrelevant, and I do not propose to take any notice of the question which was last addressed to me. I was saying that, in my opinion, the government could have purchased the completed portion of the road for its market value—the price which the company offered to accept for it. The uncompleted portion of the road should be purchased at the cost of construction. That is quite right. If the purchase had been made upon this basis, the road would have cost, as was pointed out yesterday by the hon. Secretary of State, between $1,100,000 and $1,200,000. This would have included the rolling stock. However, I am not going into details.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—At page three of the evidence it will be seen that it was valued by Mr. Schreiber at $1,365,000.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That amount is the estimated cost of construction from Ste. Rosalie to Chaudière. Mr. Schreiber submitted a written report of the cost of construction from Ste. Rosalie to St. Leonard, 45½ miles, $595,000, and from St. Leonard to Chaudière, 70 miles, $770,000. The cost of construction of a new line from Ste. Rosalie to Chaudière would be $1,365,000, according to Mr. Schreiber's estimate. And if that estimate is correct, where is the justification for paying $1,600,000?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—One of those sums is the amount actually spent by the company.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. This is the estimate of the cost of construction of a new line made by Mr. Schreiber.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Ask another question.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Unless the hon. gentleman wishes more information, I shall not dwell any further on that branch of the subject. With regard to the other bill, which refers to the agreement between the Grand Trunk and the government, this, too, has been amended in several very important particulars. Under the old arrangement, the government were to pay $6,000 per year for the Chaudière section—that is the section between the bridge and the Chaudière Junction. Under the present arrangement, this amount is included in $140,000 which they pay for the use of the terminals at the city of Montreal, effecting thus a saving of $6,000 a year for all time to come. Another very important alteration is the readjustment of the proportion which the government is to pay for the betterments on the line between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert and the terminus in the city of Montreal. Under the old arrangement, the government was to pay 5 per cent on one-half the actual cost of any improvements or additions that were made. So far as the government are concerned, that placed them in no better position than if they had undertaken to pay the whole cost, for they could borrow the money at between 2½ and 3 per cent—it would place them in nearly as bad a position as if they had undertaken to pay the whole cost, for they could have borrowed the money at a rate of interest which would represent the same annual charge, or about the same annual charge as 5 per cent upon half the cost. As this was an arrangement which was to last for all time to come, I have no doubt that, in the long run, the annual charge of the whole cost at the rate of interest the government would have to pay would be even less than five per cent upon half the cost. Under the new arrangement they pay, not the interest on half the cost, but the interest on a proportion of the cost based on the relative amount of traffic done by the two roads, and upon this proportion they pay four per cent instead of five, or have the alternative of paying their portion of the cost in actual cash. It is very difficult—it is of course impossible to make an accurate estimate of what this change amounts to. So far as I can estimate, from any returns which have been submitted, the amount the government will pay under the present arrangement will be less than one-fifth of the cost of permanent improvements. In my opinion it would be not more than one-tenth. It cannot exceed one-fifth or one-sixth of what they would have to pay under the former arrangement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is at the present moment, but if the traffic grows the result will be different.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—If the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway was to develop so that it would be larger than the traffic of the Grand Trunk, the hon. gentleman would be quite right, but I scarcely think the hon. gentleman seriously entertains the idea that the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway at Montreal will ever approach the traffic of the Grand Trunk.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am speaking of the proportion. If it relatively grows of course the payment will be in proportion.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Whether it will grow or not remains to be seen. In my opinion, the traffic of the Grand Trunk will relatively increase very much more rapidly than the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway, for it has a very much larger mileage and a very much larger field to draw traffic from. The changes to which I have referred are changes which are certainly to the advantage of the government. There is one change which, however, I think had been made in the wrong direction, and that is the change which has been made in section 40 of the agreement. Section 40 of the old agreement provided for the equalization of rates between Montreal and Chaudière. It provided that the Grand Trunk, in rating freight for the maritime provinces, should not, in any way, discriminate against the Intercolonial Railway in favour of its own line via Richmond. That section has been dropped, and a section has been substituted as part of the bill making for all time to come a permanent traffic arrangement. It appears to me that this is an unnecessary and, I might say, a very objectionable feature of the bill. I scarcely see what object the government has in making this arrangement as it now stands. The Minister of Justice, in explaining the bill the other day when he was referring to this clause, spoke of the necessity of permanence in arrangements of this character, between railways. I quite agree with the Minister of Justice in the position which he took with regard to a great deal of the expenditures which railway companies have to make. They are of a permanent character and they must be permanent in their nature. Any railway company must permanently secure its right of way. It must make permanently its roadbed and its bridges, and secure its terminal facilities. Those are expenditures which, from their very nature, must be of a permanent character but the hon. Minister of Justice will, I think, admit that traffic arrangements between railways for the exchange of freight are arrangements of an entirely different character. They are not, and should not be, and cannot be, of a permanent character. They are governed by changing conditions, and must be changed from time to time as new conditions arise, and as changes are necessary. In my judgment, the incorporation of any agreement for the exchange of traffic in a bill of this character is an entire mistake. I do not think it should he there. In this traffic arrangement, for instance, there are provisions that during the life of this agreement the Intercolonial Railway will accept 425 from Halifax and 370 miles from St. John. That is making that divisional rate for traffic permanent for all time to come. It is impossible for any man here to say——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As to what traffic?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—As to through traffic.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As to traffic from abroad.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Certainly. The same principle applies to the whole. I say any arrangement of that character for the carriage of traffic must be subject to alterations from time to time, as changing conditions arise. If any change in conditions arose, so that that was a disadvantageous arrangement for the Intercolonial Railway, what position would they be in? They would be bound to the Grand Trunk Railway for all time to accept the division on those terms, and they are bound besides to hand over every pound of their freight to the Grand Trunk when it reaches Montreal.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We can not make an arrangement to alter the geography of the country. The Grand Trunk have a terminus at Portland, and whether the freight was landed at Halifax or taken to Portland would depend upon an arrangement of this sort. My hon. friend, at the beginning of his speech to-day, spoke of the geographical disadvantage of the maritime provinces. This is simply a recognition of that fact.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I entirely agree with what the hon. gentleman says. I will not raise a question as to whether that is an equitable arrangement under the conditions which exist at the present time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And always will exist.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The hon. gentleman may see into the future. He may be able, from his extraordinary power of predicting the condition of things yet to come, to say that these conditions will always exist.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that this is not a matter of prediction, because the distance between Montreal and Portland and between Montreal and Halifax are permanent matters of geography and are not going to change.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Let me suggest this to the hon. gentleman: supposing that, under any troubles which might in the future unfortunately arise, the United States were to refuse us the bonding privilege, there could be no traffic sent via Portland, and there could be none carried over the Canadian Pacific Railway. Would it be right that the Intercolonial Railway should be bound, under these circumstances, to hand over all its freight at Montreal to the Grand Trunk and receive pay for carrying it one mile for every two miles it actually hauled it? I simply mention that as a possible and not a probable condition to arise.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The freights could be altered to meet the different circumstances.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That is just what you cannot do under this arrangement. Whatever the freights may be, if this bill passes, under these circumstances the Intercolonial Railway gets precisely the same amount for carrying that freight 850 miles, that the Grand Trunk Railway gets for carrying it 425 miles.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That is an unalterable arrangement, and I say, under the conditions I have spoken of, it would be a most unjust and unfair arrangement to be entertained by any reasonable person. I do not wish to get into a controversy with the hon. gentleman, but I think, if he really considers my point, he cannot differ from me. Traffic arrangements, in their very nature, are changeable from time to time, and must be changed as changing conditions arise, and in my opinion it is a very grave mistake to incorporate any permanent traffic arrangement in a bill of this character and make it perpetual. There is another clause which fixes the rate to Halifax, at one cent per hundred pounds more than the rate to St. John. It might, at some future time, be found advisable to change that, and to make the two rates equal, but if this bill passes, it is fixed for all time, unchangeable and unalterable. I might also point to the fact that this traffic agreement refers to certain divisional rate percentages. It refers to the regular rate percentage division. This, as hon. gentlemen will understand, is a division of territory into certain sections, over each section of which the rates are the same to any particular point. There is a certain division existing to-day. No one can say in ten years time that it will be desirable that the division of to-day should be maintained, but if this bill passes it fixes the present division permanently for all time to come. In my opinion, at all events, whatever may be the opinion of other hon. gentlemen, it is a vital error to incorporate in a permanent arrangement of this kind, traffic arrangements of that nature. I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman that when you make the purchase of the Drummond County Railway you are making a permanent investment. When you lease the Grand Trunk from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert you are making a permanent investment, and it is right and proper that you should do so. It is simply completing or purchasing a new line, and when you make your terminal facilities in Montreal, they are of a permanent nature; but what I am trying to point out is the distinction between arrangements of that kind and arrangements for traffic, and the terms on which it must be exchanged which are not of a permanent character, but are liable to change from time to time as new conditions arise, and in my opinion should not be permanently incorporated in a measure of this kind. There is a clause in this agreement with regard to unconsigned west bound freight. I can only say I agree with the observations which have been made by some of the speakers before me, that that is a condition which, in my opinion, should not receive the sanction of this House. The very object, if there is an object, in extending the Intercolonial Railway to the city of Montreal, is to place it in a better position to make arrangements for the exchange of traffic with the various lines that converge there. If this bill passes, that power is taken away. It is bound for all time to come to deliver all its west bound freight to the Grand Trunk Railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No; the unconsigned.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I should have said all the unconsigned, and that of course is the only freight over which it has control. With regard to the other clause, referring to the east bound traffic, in my opinion that is of a permanent character, and should be incorporated in the bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman suppose that the Grand Trunk Railway would make an agreement to incorporate the east bound traffic in the bill and get nothing in return?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—In my opinion they should do so, and if they did not do so, I certainly would not consent to enter into any agreement with them. That is my view of it. Just look at the question of that east bound traffic for a moment. The Intercolonial Railway can, if it chooses, control that traffic. As I have pointed out more than once, it has a monopoly of the traffic between the portion of the maritime provinces through which it passes. All traffic, either east bound or west bound, arising on any point on the Intercolonial Railway must use the Intercolonial Railway, and that places the government road in a position to say where it will receive that traffic and the terms and conditions upon which they will receive it. I believe this is a power which, in railway parlance, is called an arbitrary power. Beside this, as I view this transaction, it is a part of this whole arrangement that the Intercolonial Railway, if it is extended to Montreal as proposed in these measures, is to do the business that passes between the west and the maritime provinces which has hitherto been done by the Grand Trunk between Montreal and Lévis. That is a separate arrangement, and in support of that view I might refer hon. gentlemen to what took place in the investigation before the Drummond County Railway Committee. I quote the following evidence of Mr. Wainwright to be found on page 62 of the report:

Q. Beside the change you have already mentioned as a difference between the agreement of this year and that of last year, is there any other?—A. There is some difference with regard to traffic.

Q. Could you briefly state what it is?—A. The principal one I think I could tell you; there are other minor changes. The principal one is this: The Grand Trunk held that if our line between Lévis and Richmond was to be destroyed, that we could not be expected to offer the traffic to the government at Montreal, and the agreement did not allow for that. We proposed to use our line to Lévis whenever we had the opportunity, but the government insisted on having the traffic from the west handed to them at Montreal. In other words, that we should abandon and take away our Chaudière rates, and that is most important.

Q. They insisted upon having the western business given to them at Montreal to the exclusion of your line?—A. Yes.

Q. Besides that there are some minor changes in the agreements?—A. Yes.

Q. These are the two principal ones?—A. Yes.

Q. That is embodied in the agreement now made?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you regard these changes as important?—A. Yes I regard the change of handing over the traffic at Montreal and shutting up our line to Lévis as a great concession to the government.

By Mr. Haggart:

Q. That entered as part of the consideration into the bargain?—A. We did not think it did. We did not have that idea at the time when we agreed to it.

By Mr. Blair:

Q. We claimed that was the true and proper interpretation. Did I not claim that was what the language was intended to mean?—A. You certainly claimed that.

So whether I am right or wrong in this contention, I have to support me, the Minister of Railways himself. That was certainly according to the testimony of Mr. Wainwright the understanding which the Minister of Railways had of the first agreement that was made, and I entirely agree with the minister that that should have been the understanding if it was not, and that this agreement should not have been entered into unless that was a part of the understanding. It is practically, as I said before, buying the business of the Grand Trunk between the maritime provinces and the west, carrying it in future over the Intercolonial Railway instead of over the Grand Trunk. That was really the object, the main object the government had in view in extending the Intercolonial Railway to the city of Montreal. There is one other point to which I should like to invite the attention of the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State. It is rather a suggestion which I am submitting for their consideration. As I understand this agreement, it is permanent, so far as the government is concerned. The point I wish to raise, for which I would ask the consideration of the minister when he has time to look into it, is whether it is sufficiently permanent, so far as the Grand Trunk is concerned. I am referring now to the permanent part of the agreement, the agreement to run over the line from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, over Victoria bridge and into the Montreal terminus. Is it not possible that the present bondholders, if they at any future time should take actions to realize upon their bonds, would deprive the government of the advantages which they secured under this agreement? The hon. Minister of Justice laughs. He probably considers it a point not worthy of consideration. But I will tell him what suggested the point to my mind, and here again I must refer to the Minister of Railways. He certainly, in his remarks to the House, made the statement that it would be more advantageous for the government to pay interest at 4 per cent upon any amount that was expended in connection with the road from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, or the Montreal terminals, rather than pay their share in cash, because if they paid it in cash they made a permanent investment, which they might at some future time be deprived of by such action of the bondholders as I have referred to. If the Minister of Railways was right in making that argument in support of his position, I make the same argument in support of mine. I did not do it with the idea of raising a contentious point, but simply of calling the attention of the Minister of Justice to it, and perhaps if he consults the Minister of Railways, they may consider it worthy of consideration.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend think the road would be more valuable to the bondholders if the government would withdraw?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That is not the point. But their road will be made more valuable to the bondholders by the improvements which may be made a portion of which the government will pay for, and the question in my mind is whether it would not be proper and necessary, in a measure of this kind, to have some provision for any expenditure which the government has to make in that connection, so that in case, under change of circumstances, the bondholders ever foreclose their claim and sell out the road, the government would not entirely lose any amount which they had permanently invested in the shape of extensions and other improvements.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I may inform the hon. gentleman that the government of Canada have a lien on the Grand Trunk Railway Company's line which takes precedence of the liens of the bondholders, somewhere in the neighbourhood of $15,000,000 or $20,000,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They have foregone their claim and allowed bonds to be issued to the extent of millions.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, those bonds have not been issued. There may be certain preferences, but no preferences at all commensurate with the value of the road.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Does the hon. gentleman mean seriously to assert that the government could make use of the preferential claim he is referring to for the purpose of protecting any subsequent investment which they made under this arrangement?

Hon. MILLS—Why not?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The Minister of Railways does not think so. I merely make this suggestion. I find that the hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Secretary of State hold views on this point entirely in opposition to the views of the Minister of Railways, and I merely suggest that they should consult.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—I am astonished to find that the hon. member from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) is opposed to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal. He is about the last man I would think would oppose it. He is also opposed to the government ownership of railways. He would in all probability not object to see the Intercolonial Railway sold or given away. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the maritime provinces are a unit upon the question of retaining the Intercolonial Railway as it is, in Moncton particularly, the place where I belong, and the place in which my hon. friend who has just spoken has a large interest, and a great many friends, I think that he will find that his course in opposing the extension of this road will not meet with their approbation. We know that the Intercolonial Railway has had many trials and tribulations. There have been deficits time and again, and I must confess that I gave the hon. leader of the opposition in the House credit for trying, when he became minister, to lessen the deficits. The first year the deficit was only $97,000. In the four subsequent years he had a surplus of some $20,000 but he took a remarkable way to lessen the deficits. There were 360 men employed in Moncton when he took charge, and in midwinter they reduced the force by 120, bringing it down to 240 men. That very time he ordered some $500,000 worth of rolling stock, $150,000 of which was procured outside of the Dominion, and some of those very men who were dismissed in midwinter went to the States and helped to build cars and locomotives for the Intercolonial Railway. That is how he helped to reduce the deficit. He also superannuated Alex McNab, a man 46 years of age, giving him $1,700 a year, and he went and lived in London and died there. He also superannuated Mr. Thomas Foote, who was the accountant. Mr. Foote went to the United States and lives there still. When he was superannuated he was only 44 years of age. The hon. leader of the opposition speaks of bringing the Intercolonial Railway traffic over the bridge at Quebec. Well, we have no bridge at present, and we do not know when we will have one. We think the cost now of the Drummond County Railway compared with the cost of other roads built by the government, is very reasonable. We bought the road from Rivière du Loup to Lévis at a cost of $12,000 a mile, and they paid $5,000 a mile additional for ironing the road. We know that the St. Charles branch was to have been built at an estimated cost of $370,000, including land damages. As a matter of fact, it cost $1,700,000 for fourteen miles. The Oxford and New Glasgow branch was built by the government at a cost of $33,000 a mile, and the Prince Edward Island Railway, a narrow gauge road, cost some $16,000 a mile. So that if we get a railway like the Drummond County road, 133 miles in length, for $1,600,000, I think we are making a very good bargain, when we compare it with the St. Charles branch, 14 miles, which cost $1,700,000. We have heard from various speakers that the net profit on the Intercolonial Railway for the ten months ending 1st May, was $62,500, and that they have spent some $175,000 in paying the rental for the various approaches into Montreal. That was all taken out of the traffic returns. The Drummond County Railway Bill and the bill which is now before us, were well debated in the House of Commons, and we find that they were supported by the hon. gentleman from Compton, who is opposed to the government, and also by the hon. members for East Toronto and Stanstead. They thought it was a good bargain and in the best interests of the country. The only opponents of the bill we have seen around the corridors—the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—have been in evidence to a considerable extent. We have had the whole outfit here, and their complaint is about the traffic agreement which has been in their hands for months past. They have known for some time exactly what it is, but it does not suit them till just this particular time to bring pressure to bear upon the Senate to reject this bill. Considering the way the Canadian Pacific Railway has been treated, it makes a very poor return coming here to the Senate and trying to block these bills. The country has done pretty well for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. We have given them 25,000,000 acres of land, $25,000,000 in cash and 700 miles of completed road—in all $135,000,000 for a road that cost, from all accounts, $100,000,000. Besides that we have given them a subsidy on the Short Line, passing through United States territory of $115,000; passing through Canadian territory $71,000 in all $186,000. They are trying to scare us by saying that if this supplemental agreement passes, the Canadian Pacific Railway will withdraw from St. John. I do not think that they have the remotest intention of doing any such thing. They have splendid facilities in St. John, paid for by the city. They have cost well up to a million dollars. At what other port can they get such facilities? They are shut out of the city of Portland by the Grand Trunk. They cannot get into Boston without paying enormously for it, and in New York they are in the same position. There is an agreement now about terminating between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway between St. John and Halifax, in regard to running powers over the Intercolonial Railway, and the Canadian Pacific Railway has had the best of the bargain. It is computed by the Intercolonial Railway that they lose some thousands of dollars by the agreement, and I strongly suspect that the Canadian Pacific Railway people want to force the hands of the government to get a renewal of the agreement upon the same terms. A great deal is said about the Grand Trunk or its connections passing through United States territory. Some 300 miles of the Soo line of the Canadian Pacific Railway pass through United States territory. All the roads have connections, more or less, with United States roads. Now, I will read you some freight returns between the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk, which will show which road has the best of the bargain :

Intercolonial Railway earnings from freight for Manitoba, North-west and British Columbia by the Canadian Pacific via St. John for 12 months ended 31st May, 1899, were, $3,202.58 ; weight of above, 2,109 tons.

If this arrangement had not been made, the Grand Trunk would have been free to compete with the Intercolonial in Montreal, and all along its own lines, and the lines in connection west of Montreal, for traffic for all points on the Intercolonial Railway and its connections, and having long occupied the field and having a staff of employees at every point, it would have great advantages over the Intercolonial Railway in securing traffic. The figures which I have quoted show how important it was that the Intercolonial should secure the interest of the Grand Trunk in turning over to the Intercolonial the business at Montreal. The concession made by the Intercolonial to the Grand Trunk and which is complained of, really injures no one, for it is only the unconsigned traffic controlled by the Intercolonial that is to be routed via Montreal, and senders of freight are not compelled to route their freight by way of Montreal and the Grand Trunk, but are left entirely free to send it by any route they wish after it leaves the Intercolonial. In regard to freight destined to Manitoba, North-west Territories and British Columbia, being sent through the United States instead of through Canada, it is only necessary for the senders of the goods to specify the route they wish them to take after leaving the Intercolonial, and their wishes will be carried out. The hon. ex-Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Westmoreland, Mr. Powell, strongly supported that supplemental agreement with the Grand Trunk in the House of Commons. The ex-Finance Minister said :

There is one point in the matter of the traffic arrangement to which I wish to refer; you put the traffic arrangement alongside this bill. You say that this contract shall continue for ninety-nine years and, longer, if not then broken. One of the essential points in the argument is that in the supplementary agreement you have got the Grand Trunk Railway to agree to transfer freight at Montreal instead of at Lévis, which is a great advantage. That is not the ordinary traffic arrangement in which rates play a part and all the like of that, but is a generic feature in this whole thing, and we pay what we pay, if we agree to pay it in the ultimate, because we suppose we have got that concession to run as long as we pay these rentals and these other sums of money. But whilst the contract itself goes on, and our $140,000 must be paid each year for ever, and our maintenance on the mileage basis and our improvements on the basis of half the cost at 4 per cent—whilst these are to run on for ever, within ten days, after this bill is passed, the Minister of Railways may sit down with the manager of the Grand Trunk Railway and make a further agreement by which the point of transfer will be Lévis instead of Montreal. There is no doubt about that, and that is not as it ought to be. I say that this is a generic part of the scheme, which gives to it very large value, and for which we pay, should be made a substantial and permanent part of it just as well as our payments are. As you cannot change the payments without an Act of Parliament, you ought not to be able to change this feature of the traffic arrangement without the consent of Parliament. I do not see why the hon. minister did not put that in. It ought to be there. If it is not to be there, let us know it, and we will find out that we have no compensation such as we thought we had, through that transfer point being at Montreal rather than at Lévis. I think that that is of great moment, and ought to be a part of the contract. That came down to us with the schedule, we passed it with the schedule, but when we come to the bill we do not find it; but we find instead a provision authorizing the railway company and the government to change that any moment they like, after the bill is passed, and after we are committed to these immense payments for ninety-nine years, or in perpetuity. Before the discussion is over, my hon. friends on the treasury benches ought to consider that point and agree to insert it in the measure itself. If it is intended that we should have this advantage, if it is not a mere makeshift, let it be put in the bill as a permanency. It is of great moment. We are paying great sums for these privileges, let us have the compensation as permanent as the payments. At least, let us have it permanent this far, that if a different arrangement be made it shall be made with and by the consent of Parliament, and not simply with and by the Minister of Railways and the government. It may be fair to say that circumstances might arise which would make it necessary to have a change. Then, leave it in the power of Parliament, which will be a good and conscientious judge, just as competent as the minister and the government, to make the change.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—This, to my mind, is more than an ordinary bill. If it was a bill of small importance I would not claim the indulgence of the House to give my views upon it, but as it is a measure of very great importance, and I have endeavoured as best I could to carefully read the bill and all the conditions connected with it, and listened to all the speeches made in this debate on both sides, I have formed an opinion as to its merits. In support of the bill the speeches of the hon. Secretary of State and his colleague were not of such a laboured and exhaustive character as they should have been, considering the importance of the question, if the hon. gentlemen had been as much in sympathy with the bill as they ought to have been. The opponents of the bill have done remarkably well and deserve the gratitude of the Senate for the exhaustive manner in which they went into the details of the measure. The hon. gentleman for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) I am sure has spent a great deal of time over it, and with his ability and his experience in railroading, and living as he does in that eastern part of Canada through which this railway runs, he is quite capable of giving an opinion, and his opinions are valuable. If that is the case, hon. gentlemen will have very little difficulty in coming to the conclusion that this is not a bill which should receive the approval of the Senate. So far as I am concerned I shall vote against it, and I shall give the reasons why I propose to do so. I have heard some hon. gentlemen say that it is not good for the Senate to veto too many government measures. I disagree with that view when the merits of the measures are not such as to warrant us in supporting them. This is a measure which has been before the Senate twice. While I should like to vote for government measures they must be of a character that I can support; but when they are not I care not how many they may be, I shall vote against them, and that, I think, is the principle on which hon. gentlemen should act—to vote only for measures which are calculated to advance the interests of the country, and to oppose all measures, no matter how many they may be, that are not in the interest of the country. We have exercised our judgment in the past on this project, and I think, in many respects, the proposition now before us is more objectionable than it was when presented on the first occasion, because we are asked to hand over to the Grand Trunk the privilege of carrying the traffic of Canada into the United States. That is opposed to one of the cardinal principles of the Conservative party, whose policy has always been to foster the trade and the industries of Canada in every way we possibly could. We are asked to sanction a bargain to transfer the business of the Intercolonial Railway to the Grand Trunk to be carried through United States channels to Canadian points beyond. That is a bad policy which would justify any one in opposing the bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then the hon. gentleman's position, as I understand it, is this, that no arrangement could be made with the Grand Trunk on any terms, because their western connections are in the United States. Is that so?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I did not say that. I might say, in this connection—and I do not want to be rude—that I am not a lawyer or a great parliamentarian, but a farmer, and I cannot answer questions of that kind on the spur of the moment as some hon. gentlemen can, but if I did not make a better fist of it than some hon. gentlemen who support this measure, I should hold my tongue.

However, I will show further on, that the hon. gentleman's question does not apply to my remarks. When we fought this bill two years ago, we did not know what the expense of the operating of the new portion of the road was likely to be. We objected to that here, and the leader of the Senate at that time, Sir Oliver Mowat, promised us to make an experiment and let us know the result. The experiment has been made, and the government report that they are not in a position to give us any information as to what it costs to operate the Intercolonial Railway extension. Either they do not understand their business and are not good accountants, or they are not giving the information, because it will interfere with the ratification of their bargain. The argument of the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) tends to show that any further outlay on extending the Intercolonial Railway would be an improper expenditure. He shows that only a small portion of the freight on the Intercolonial is through freight, and he tells us that if the government think that by this extension they are going to materially increase the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway, they are mistaken. I wish to make a few remarks in reply to my poetical friend from Cobourg (Mr. Kerr). He says he appreciates the Intercolonial Railway, because it brings the genial, honest faces of the senators of the maritime provinces to the capital. With his associations, I can understand it will be a great enjoyment for him to look upon honest faces; but it is not necessary to have the Intercolonial Railway extended to Montreal for that purpose, because none of those gentlemen he is so fond of associating with come by the Intercolonial Railway to Ottawa. They come by the Canadian Pacific Railway, because it is 250 miles shorter. Therefore, that portion of the hon. gentleman's argument is of no use.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is mistaken. All the Nova Scotia members and half the New Brunswick members come by the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It is only the honest faces I am speaking of. The hon. gentleman also made a reference to this bargain as compared with the last one. It was amusing to me to hear his honest confession. I realized that it was the admission of an honest man, and I could understand and appreciate his statement that he liked to look upon honest faces. He told us that this was a very much better bargain than the last one we rejected. He said it was at least a $700,000 a better bargain. In that respect he differs from the Minister of Railways who said it was not a better bargain, and from the Secretary of State, who said, in his opening remarks, that it was only $6,000 a year a better bargain. We will take the opinion of the hon. gentleman for Cobourg (Mr. Kerr), because he is an honest man, and this is what he honestly believes, although, perhaps, he did not receive all the information from his friends that he desired. He says there is a saving of $700,000 by the rejection of the first agreement. He adopted the homely comparison of the old cow. He did not want us to be like the old cow that gave a good pail of milk and then kicked it over. The Senate, at the time the old agreement was rejected, was the cow who gave the good pail of milk. The hon. gentleman did not want us now to kick it over, showing that in his opinion this bill is much better than the bill of two years ago, and that the Senate, by its action on that occasion, saved the country $700,000.

Hon. Mr. KERR—My attention has been called to the fact that my remarks at that point of my observation have been misundertood.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Do not spoil it.

Hon. Mr. KERR—What I said was this, and the official report will confirm my statement: I said the hon. leader of the opposition has said that by the action of the Senate the country had been saved $700,000, I did not profess to speak from my own knowledge, because I knew nothing about it, but I took it from what the hon. leader of the opposition said, and of course I had a right to assume that he was correct; but I do not know that he was correct, and I do not acknowledge that his statement was correct. I was merely repeating his statement. All my subsequent remarks were based upon the statement of my esteemed friend the leader of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—In support of my understanding of it, I would say further, the hon. gentleman remarked that the Senate had been like the good old cow which had given a good pail of milk, referring to our former action, and appealed to us not to kick it over now. He said there was a cloud of dust over the eyes of hon. members, I can tell him in that particular there was no cloud of dust over the eyes of the senators who rejected the bill. The cloud of dust was over the eyes of those who supported it. There was a great deal of dust at the time; it was not the kind that disturbs people's vision, but the kind that goes into pockets. The hon. gentleman also went on to say that we could not sell the Intercolonial Railway, I think the same principle should prevail in public affairs that prevails in private matters. Any gentleman who has an opportunity to sell a property that is unprofitable should be able to sell it, and the same rule should apply to government property, even the Intercolonial Railway. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland, who is not in favour of the government operating this road. My idea would be to let the government sell or lease the Intercolonial Railway. Then the hon. gentleman said the agreement to pay $1,600,000 for the Drummond County Railway was a good bargain. If I am any judge of a road of the character of the Drummond County Railway at the time the government proposed to take it over, I should say it was not at all in keeping with the other roads with which it connects. Both the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway are said to be first class railways. The Drummond County Road was built for local traffic and was not of a character to carry such trains as run on the Intercolonial and Grand Trunk. Therefore, when we pay $1,600,000 for such a road as that, we make a bad investment of the public funds. The hon. gentleman from Cobourg made another remark which I think was equally at fault. He said that because 120 gentlemen in the other branch of Parliament voted for this measure, we should not reject it. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the same 120 men voted for the bill two years ago, while the Senate rejected it, and the whole country praised our action on that occasion? The 120 men that he asks us to agree with now are the same men; therefore that was not much of an argument. To my mind the Grand Trunk is getting by far the best end of the bargain in this deal. The hon. gentleman said he would like to see the country polled on this question. Well, I should like to see it polled too, and I am sure there would be no doubt as to the result. It is a question involving the addition of at least $6,000,000 or $8,000,000 to the national debt. The hon. gentleman knows that the late government, when they went to the polls at the last election, promised not to increase the national debt. I do not see how they can support a proposition to increase the public debt by $6,000,000 or $8,000,000. I have no fear, therefore, of the result of a poll of the electors on this occasion. The people would not support the government in violating their promises. By this bill there would be an addition to the public debt of the country, and the annual expenditures of the country would be largely increased. Therefore, there need be no fear that the country will find fault with us for rejecting this bill if the government should go to the country on the question, because the hon. gentlemen opposite would have to contradict one of the foremost planks in their own platform. I am not opposing this bill because I live in the western country. I am by birth a native of New Brunswick. I lived in that province until I passed the meridian of life, and I have the strongest affection for the people of New Brunswick, so much so that when a few years ago the Conservative party was in power and a bill was introduced by which it was proposed to divert the trade from St. John to Halifax, I was one of those who took an active part with other Conservative members of the Senate to defeat that bill, and I do not hesitate to say that we were the means largely of St. John to-day being our winter port. I have always favoured St. John being a winter port. It has a fine harbour and, with improvements which the government are putting on the wharfs, breakwaters, &c., it will make one of the finest harbours in Canada—in fact the only available winter harbour we have on the Atlantic.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Yes, and I can prove that before I am done. The Intercolonial was built under the terms of the agreement between the provinces at confederation. It was built, not like a road that was intended for commercial purposes. It was projected as a military road. It was built in the wildest part of New Brunswick, the hardest section in which to build a railway and the one which affords the least traffic, local or through, because in building in by that road it greatly increased the length of it. It was built as a military road, but there is no longer any prospect of war arising between Great Britain and the United States. As a military road, therefore, it has lost its importance, but it will be there in the future if it should ever be necessary to transport troops from the maritime provinces to the west. We are living in a progressive age, when saving of time in transportation is of the first importance We have passed the stage coach period, and the Intercolonial Railway, while it serves a good purpose for local traffic, cannot compete for through traffic because of the great distance it has to haul goods. A few hundred miles of voyage by water does not amount to much, but every mile by rail costs. There is the outlay for construction, for maintenance and for running expenses; therefore, I say we are living in an age when we have to get the shortest possible route to the seaboard in order to compete with others in the markets of the world. Hon. gentlemen are aware that from Montreal to St. John by the Intercolonial Railway is 740 miles, by the Canadian Pacific Railway it is 489 miles a difference of 251 miles in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Is there any man of ordinaay business intelligence who from patriotic motives would haul his goods 251 miles further than he need haul them?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Can not he tap it on the River St. John?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The hon. gentleman does not tap it when he comes here. The hon. gentleman only taps it for one purpose. Therefore, with all due deference to the character and necessity of the Intercolonial Railway as a local road, that is the only thing it is useful for to-day and for that it will always serve a useful purpose; but to increase the capital account by seven or eight millions of dollars to extend it to Montreal would be to made a great mistake. I am interested in cheap transportation. In the North-west we are a producing people, and our surplus products must find a market at the seaboard, and the important thing for us is to get it to the seaboard as cheaply as possible. If we were not patriotic enough and willing to be taxed $150,000 or to subsidize the Canadian Pacific Railway to carry our products to the seaboard, we would ship it to Portland and it would be better for us, particularly so in the case of live stock. When we ship by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the east live stock arrive at the seaboard very much fatigued, and every mile of transportation is a loss to the shipper. When the cattle are on the ship they do not lose much, if anything, but the great object for us is to get them to a seaport by the shortest possible route. I would not ship stock by the Intercolonial; it would materially injure them if I did.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is British territory.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I know, but it is 251 miles more of British territory.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—So much the better.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I am willing to vote a subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway to make St. John a winter port rather than go to Portland and Boston. I want to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the trade of the country as I understand it. It is no use having a railway unless you have something for it to do. This bargain should be based on business principles. The great article of produce in New Brunswick is lumber, and next to that smelts; (laughter) I did not say that disparingly. The smelt is a good fish, but the two great articles of commerce in that province are lumber and fish. You deplete the forest when you cut a tree down; it does not grow again. That is not so with us in the west. We reap a harvest on the same ground every year. In New Brunswick the timber has been cut down until now logs are marketed that are not more than seven or eight inches in diameter. Even if there was freight for the Intercolonial Railway in lumber, the amount of it would be decreasing; but not a single thousand feet of it goes over the Intercolonial Railway. Some shingles may go over it, because they are carried for next to nothing.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. There are dozens of train loads going daily.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I am free to admit that there are from one little station to another, but there is none from Miramichi to Montreal.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—But From Truro to Halifax I am speaking of.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I was speaking of New Brunswick. It is simply a local traffic. It is not a traffic that would require the Drummond County Railway to carry it.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—But we want your flour from the west.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—We will send it by the Canadian Pacific Railway. We cannot send it by the Intercolonial Railway, because it will cost too much. Of course, a railway is of no use unless we have something to carry over it. A man might as well own a white elephant if he had nothing for it to do, as to own a railway where there is nothing to be carried over it, and when the product of a country does not require the use of a railway to support it in any way it is useless to construct it. The lumber export of New Brunswick was 300,000,000 feet annually. One hon. gentleman put it at 400,000,000 feet; take the latter quantity and say that the whole cut of lumber in New Brunswick this year was 400,000,000 feet, and I am sure it will not be more next year, because to keep it up they would have to destroy their forests. All this lumber finds a market at the seaboard where it is taken away by the vessels. It never sees a railway at all. Not one thousand feet of it goes on the Intercolonial Railway or Drummond County Railway, or this section of the Grand Trunk that they are proposing to lease, except perhaps from one small station to another, where a farmer may buy a few feet. Take the output of lumber from New Brunswick at 400,000,000 feet and at $8 a thousand its value is $3,200,000. That includes all the labour in connection with getting it to market where it is saleable; the farmer's supplies the feed for horses and men in so far as they supply the trade, and altogether it only amounts to $3,200,000. Not one dollar of that contributes freight to this line of railway.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—The hon. gentleman is placing it at a very low figure.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—$8 a thousand is a fabulous price. I had a contract for lumber in New Brunswick and it required the smallest log to be fourteen inches at top end, and only got $7 per M. The hon. gentleman could contract for lumber for twenty years if he could get that price.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Not deals.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I am not talking about deals. They do not transport deals over the railway. They do not ship logs in the round, except some small logs in some little spars. They ship it all in sawed lumber. They take it from the mill, which is on the shore of the ocean, and put it on the vessel and ship it to European or United States ports. I tell hon. gentlemen that the matter of freights is an important item to the farmers in the North-west Territories. We have by industry and hard work tilled the soil and made farming a success in that country, and whilst we have been taxed to the utmost, we have borne the burden and contributed our share to Canada. In the North-west 40,000,000 bushels of wheat is the output. Those who are now prophesying about what this railway is going to do, predicted that the North-west Territories would never produce freight to pay axle grease on the cars to haul it out. But now they ask us to accept their statement with regard to this road. They would not give the information about the working of the Drummond County Railway during the time they have been operating the line. It is an exhibition of deplorable ignorance or dishonesty, because they should be able to give us the information we ask for. We have waited for it two years, and they cannot give it to us yet. The freight is an important matter to us in the North-west Territories. West of Lake Superior we have no competing lines, and we have to pay whatever the Canadian Pacific Railway demands. I am not prepared to say that it is an exorbitant rate, because there are portions of the road which are not paying. But what they say is: "Give us something to carry back on our cars, and we will give you lower rates." This bill proposes to give it to the Grand Trunk Railway. I am not an advocate for the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I have always been in favour of that line, even before I ever saw the North-west country, believing it to be a necessary project. Now that I am located there, and see the importance of the road, I say that we want lower freight rates, and we cannot expect to get them much lower unless the Canadian Pacific Railway can get return freights. This bill takes away the chance of their getting return freight. My farm is 300 miles west of Winnipeg. The country is well settled and occupied by an industrious class of farmers for 100 miles west of that point. The Moose Jaw district is a very fine country, and produces a good class of grain. Indian Head, Qu'Appelle and Regina are good farming districts. They will produce great quantities of wheat. I paid fourteen cents a bushel freight on my wheat by the carload from Wolseley to Port Arthur last year. Taking the distance to my place in comparsion with the distances south, east and west, I say that twelve cents is a fair average for freight on wheat from where it starts to Fort William. About 40,000,000 bushels of wheat will be the output this year. It may or may not amount to that, but in less years than I have fingers on my hand it will amount to sixty or seventy million bushels, and therefore we should look after the interests of the country, and the important thing is to tell the farmers how they can get their wheat out without paying too much freight. Now, at 12c per bushel the freight on 40,000,000 bushels would be $4,800,000 freight on wheat we export from the North-west. That is $1,600,000 more than the whole commercial value of the product of lumber in New Brunswick. We have to pay freight on it, and it has to go over the Canadian Pacific Railway. We do not ship it at our doors as they do with the lumber, but have to pay freight on it to get it to the seaboard. Then take the matter of stock. We are raising hundreds of thousands of cattle in that country. The western portion of the North-west does not produce grain as well as the eastern portion, and the fields are covered with herds of cattle. My hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Cochrane) has 14,000 head of cattle up there. He may have the largest herd owned in that country, but there are thousands of cattle there living off the grass, and they do not require to be housed at all. The grass is growing continuously. We have to ship these cattle to a foreign market. By the shortest existing route it is a long journey, and uses up the cattle. They may be fine and healthy when they start, but when they reach Montreal they may weigh 200 or 150 pounds less each. Now, do the government want us to take them to St. John or Boston? We want to take them the shortest way. We are at a disadvantage in the North-west as far as the freight rates are concerned, but the same argument that I am applying to the North-west would be applicable to Ontario, that province which has done so much for Canada. This bill affects them because they get lumber coming back. There is another advantage which they have by reason of the fact that we buy all our manufactured goods. We do not manufacture anything. We buy our mowers, reapers, ploughs, harrows, spades, shovels, scythes and binder twine from eastern Canada, and we have to pay a very extravagant rate of freight to get that stuff up west. The argument is that the road does not get enough to fill the cars going back to the North-west, and therefore they have to charge more freight. My desire is to give them all the traffic we possibly can, as it is the only means of getting better freight rates than we have at present. A member of Parliament yesterday told me he was charged $35 for bringing a horned animal eighty-five miles a couple of years ago. I bought a band of horses one time at Qu'Appelle station, and a cayuse got lame. He was not worth twenty dollars, but it cost me nine dollars to have him carried thirty miles. Compare that with the freight in the maritime provinces. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice asked how the people in the maritime provinces would like this road to be operated by private parties. That is a question which need not be answered. We know that Mr. Blair said, on his advent to office, "I am going to work the road on business principles, and I will put the freight up. These men who want their shingles must pay their freight." Then he appointed Mr. Harris, and they raised the freight rates. What a howl of indignation there was over the country? It is pretty hard work to make the Minister of Railways come down, but they brought him down upon that occasion, and old rates were restored at once. I have a man in my employment whose father has a ticket from St. John to Hampton for a year for twenty-two dollars over this road. They say that the other government charged about the same or less. I say that two wrongs do not make a right. A gentleman told me the other day that the Conservative party would not have a member elected in the maritime provinces if the party opposed this bill. If they are going to loot the country for the sake of keeping the government in power, the sooner they get out of power the better. The time has come in the history of our country when railway rates should be more equalized. I do not believe that one part of Canada should have advantages over other portions. We have to pay exorbitant rates in the North-west. I no not say that they are too high. I do not, because I am not a railroad man. A railroad man tells me they are not too high. I do not believe that any people under heaven to-day, as an agricultural community, have better railway facilities than those given by the Canadian Pacific Railway to Manitoba and the North-west. Their car service and their freight service are good. The accommodation is good, but we have to pay for it, and perhaps, pay too much. I think the policy of the government should be to have a railway commission to arrange freight rates, so that a company could not take advantage of a man because he cannot help himself. One portion of the people should not be compelled to pay an exorbitant rate because other people get their freight at too cheap a rate. I desire to say that I feel justified in voting against this bill, and if I stand alone, I will vote against it, and in order that I may have an opportunity of expressing my opinion, I shall move that the further consideration of the bill for the purchase of the Drummond County Railway be postponed for six months. I am not a lawyer, but I endeavour to do what I think is in the interests of the people. I represent the people of the great prairie land, and it is my duty to tell the House what I think about these matters. I say that any bill which has for its object the diverting of trade into foreign channels is not a bill in the interests of the country, and I am sure that if the matter is allowed to stand over for another year, we will be in a better position to consider it. We have done away with the old stage coaches and old systems of all kinds, and the time is come now when the Canadian Government can lease or sell the Intercolonial Railway to some company and let it be worked as a local road, or it could be used a through road if necessary, but let a private company take charge of it for the benefit of the people. If the government make this proposed connection, they will be getting into deep water, and will not be able to get out quite so easily. If they spend $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 on this road they will then have a considerable government railway system in Canada. The next thing will be to buy the Canadian Eastern at a million dollars. That is the next thing on the tapis with the government, and the whole province of New Brunswick will be girdled with railways charging one-half the rates they should obtain. Mr. Gibson and others, get large land subsidies, for building railways and they want to sell them back to the government as soon as they become non-paying institutions, I say it would be wrong, and if we endorse this bargain we will be called upon to endorse other bargains of a similar nature. I have a great regard for the ministry of the day. I do not like to see them break all their promises, and I do not want to see them downed as badly as they will be at the next election. I do not want to see the taxes increased. I understand the supplementary estimates will increase the annual expenditure $50,000,000. How can they expect us to vote on bills without any information? I do not care what government may be in power, it is the duty of the government to give us the fullest information on everything pertaining to public matters. We have no right to go it blind. The second part of this agreement was not put forward for some time after the first part, until some one raised a row about it. Then it was laid on the table and in five minutes it was upstairs. The Grand Trunk Railway map was also laid on the table, and in fifteen minutes it was also away. What is this bargain? It is to pay a yearly rental of $140,000 which capitalized at 3 per cent means a capital account of $4,600,000, the Drummond County Railway cost $1,600,000, and yet you have that annual increase to the public bebt of Canada, because if you pay the interest it is the same as using the capital. There is to be $6,266,000, of an increase in the public debt at one jump without the road being an efficient and a good road. They will have to spend two or three million dollars to fix the road so as to be in keeping with the other two lines with which it connects. It is not in the interests of the country that we senators should stand by and let the government pass the bill simply because people may say we have thrown out too many bills. I am prepared to vote against this bill, and that is the spirit which animates me just now.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON — Before this motion is put, I wish to offer a few remarks upon the matter before the House, and in doing so I may remark that this discussion has so far been conducted with a great deal of ability and good feeling, and I hope, in the observations I propose to make in reference to it, if I express myself in any other way than in a line with the remarks that have already been addressed to the House by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, that hon. gentlemen will attribute it to the natural warmth of my disposition and the earnestness of my feeling rather than to a desire to conduct this debate in any other than a calm and dispassionate manner. I have to repeat the complaint that hon. gentlemen who are opposed to the bill in its present form have already expressed very freely during this debate, that we have not been supplied with the information which we were entitled to and which was solemnly promised to us in 1897 when Sir Oliver Mowat was leader of this House. It is not necessary to recall what took place on that occasion. A very decisive majority of this House determined on that occasion to reject the bill of that year. Hon. gentlemen will remember that on the very night of the rejection of the bill, an hour or two afterwards, a sum was placed in the estimates providing for the carrying out of this leasing agreement with the Grand Trunk and Drummond County Railway, and which was believed in this House and in the country to be intended to over-reach and override the free and independent action of the Senate. It will be remembered that the hon. gentleman who then led this House, Sir Oliver Mowat, on more than one occasion, during the exciting days which followed that step in the House of Commons, assured the Senate that there was no intention whatever to override its action with regard to these matters, that it was only intended by a nine months' experiment to ascertain whether this scheme was in itself a really meritorious one or not; that it was only intended that the experiment should be of a tentative character, in order, when the question would next come before Parliament, that this House, as well as the other branch of Parliament, should be in possession of the fullest possible information with regard to it. Two years have passed, and we have these bills before us again, and we are asked to consider them without this promised information. I know that my hon. friend the Secretary of State has told us that it is almost impossible to give that information, and he has fortified himself by the opinions of Mr. Schreiber and Mr. Pottinger that there are great difficulties in the way of furnishing information of that kind. Mr. Pottinger has gone so far as to say that it would be impossible to give it correctly. I know very well that there are some difficulties in the way, and there will have to be some little allowances made, but there is no question about its being quite within the possibilities of railroad book-keeping to furnish a statement which, taken into consideration with two or three matters for which allowance might be made, would present to the House a fair statement of what the earnings and expenses of this particular railway would be. Holding that view, I must complain that we have not been furnished with that definite information which, I submit, we could have been supplied with. My hon. friend the Secretary of State, during the course of his remarks, read a letter addressed to him by Messrs. Schreiber and Pottinger. I observe there is some serious mistake in this letter. I ask my hon. friend if he has read this letter since it appeared in the Debates?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I have not, I think I have the original here.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think it appears in the Debates as the hon. gentleman read it to the House, and if that is the case, they have made a very serious mistake. At all events, as it appears in the Debates there is a mistake in it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I handed the letter to the reporters.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The mistake is that it gives the earnings and working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for the ten months of the year which has just expired, and it purports to give the total earnings for the previous twelve months. It then draws a comparison between ten months of this year and twelve months of the preceding year. I have looked at the report of the Minister of Railways and on page nineteen of the report I find there that the loss on the working of the Intercolonial Railway for the full period of last year was $207,978.66, whereas by this statement it appears to have been only $35,311.90.

Hon. Mr. POWER—On what page of the minister's report is that?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—On page nineteen. However, these figures are found in many pages of the report.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The comparison related to the ten months for each year for three years, ending each year on the 1st of March.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is only for two years.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The comparison is for ten months of each year.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The letter in itself showed that Mr. Schreiber and Mr. Pottinger were drawing conclusions and drawing a comparison between ten months of last year and twelve months of the preceding year, which is an error. The comparison is evidently for ten months of each year. The hon. Secretary of State told us the earnings of the Intercolonial Railway during the year which expired on the 1st July last, will show a surplus over its working expenses during that year greater than all the earnings of previous years taken together.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was on the faith of that letter that I made the statement.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think my hon. friend will see, if he examines this letter closely, that it does not bear out any such conclusion. Up to the end of ten months in in the year 1897-98 it shows a net loss of $35,311, while there is a net gain of $62,569.89 on the ten months of the year 1898-99. Now, hon. gentlemen will observe from these figures that the Intercolonial Railway, in the year terminating the 1st of July, 1898, went behind to the extent of $174,667 in the last two months. These are two months that can be compared with the two months of the year 1898-99, because in both of these periods we had the Montreal extension to operate, and if we got behind to the same extent in these two months that we did the previous year during the corresponding two months, the deficit would be over $112,000 during the past year. The hon. gentleman will know that the last two months of the year are months in which very many expenses will accumulate. That is the reason why there was such a large falling off in net savings in the two closing months of 1897-98. A deficit of $174,667 occurred in the two closing months of that year, and it will be a very strange thing if there is not a deficit in the corresponding two months of the year just closed, even making allowance for the improvement in trade of last year, and that is the only allowance that can be made, because in both years we had the Drummond County Railway and the Montreal extension in the closing months. Therefore, if there is any change it must be in the improved state of the business of the country, and if you allow $12,000 for that for the two months, you have a deficit on the Intercolonial Railway for the last year of over $100,000. If anything different is shown, it will call for investigation as to whether payments were not made corresponding with payments made for the corresponding two months of the preceding year. The hon. Secretary of State dealt at considerable length on the bad showing, as he called it, of the Intercolonial Railway from 1877, up to last year, and he took very great pains to give us the capital expenditure in all those years, during which the road was extended some 435 miles, and during which very important betterments were made in the way of bridges and raising the standard of the road. This he described as a very bad showing which had been made during all this time. My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, during the course of his observations—I could not hear my hon. friend very distinctly, but I understood him to say that the era of capital expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway had ceased in 1898.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am afraid not. The hon. gentleman did not so understand me, because I am afraid it has not ceased.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am only dealing with what I understood my hon. friend the Minister of Justice to say. I was going to show why I think it has not ceased. Before leaving the revenue and expenditure, taking my data from Messrs. Schreiber and Pottinger's letter, I wish to compare, in another way, the earnings for 1897-98 with those of 1898-99. I find, comparing the increase in earnings of the Intercolonial Railway for the ten months of this last year with the corresponding ten months of preceding years, that the increase has been twenty per cent. I find that during the last two of the ten months of 1898 we have been running 1,315 miles of railway as against 1,145 miles in the eight months of the year. As two months of this period were months in each year in which we had the extension, we have therefore to make an allowance for that, and the real increase has been about twelve per cent in the mileage of the roads we ran last year as compared with the previous year. The increase in mileage has been twelve per cent, and the increase in earnings twenty per cent. The increase shows a net improvement in the earnings last year, in comparison with the preceding year, of about eight per cent—about two per cent less than the average increase in the earnings of all the other roads in Canada, leaving nothing to be credited in the way of increase to the Montreal extension. I have been complaining of the lack of information, and of the fact that the government did not bring down the information which had been promised to us, and which would have been so very useful in discussing this question. But we have had some information. We have had a return laid upon the table showing the tons of freight and the passengers carried for the year ending the 28th of February, 1899. The freight is 463,847 tons, and the passengers number 88,701. These are the total tons of freight and total number of passengers carried over the Montreal extension for that year. Now, I turn to the discussions of 1897, and I find that in the House of Commons in that year the Minister of Railways submitted, as he said, on the authority of Mr. Schreiber, an estimate that the acquisition of this Montreal extension would lead to an increase in freight of 500,000 tons, being 37,000 tons more than all the business that the Montreal extension has done during the last year. So that instead of giving us the increase which they promised, the whole figures do not come up to the amount of increase promised.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That would be promised the first year. I presume they promised it would grow into that in a short time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We were dealing with the present, not a remote future. I am coming now to what my hon. friend promised himself. He was not quite so sanguine as the Minister of Railways was. But before I come to that, I want to show the difference in passengers. The total number of passengers carried was 88,000; while the number promised as an increase by Mr. Blair was 632,000. I now come to another set of figures which were submitted by my hon. friend the Secretary of State to this House. The estimate was a little more modest than that of the Minister of Railways, and in this case it was signed by Mr. Schreiber and Mr. Pottinger. My hon. friend very kindly sent the statement across the floor of the House, at my request, so that I was enabled to use it and it was referred to in the discussion and will be found in the Debates. My hon. friend's figures, based on the authority of these railroad men, were to the effect that the increase in freight was to be 320,000 tons and the increase in passengers 228,000. As against that, the total number of passengers carried as I have stated over this road has been only 88,701, or only a little over one-third of what my hon. friend, on the authority of his railroad experts, assured this House the increase would be. I have referred to this simply to show that we have not been supplied with the information which was promised to us and which I think could have been supplied to us as an approximation, at all events, so nearly complete that it would have been acceptable to the Senate, and if any allowance were to be made they could have been easily explained, and those explanations we would have been happy to accept so far as they were reasonable. But that we have not been furnished with, and what we have been furnished with has altogether contradicted the statements made in 1897 by the hon. gentlemen opposite. I have only one point more to refer to before six o'clock. My hon. friend rolled up a very heavy indictment against the management of the Intercolonial Railway by pointing in detail to the expenditures on capital account and the deficits which had occured during the years since the opening of the Intercolonial Railway and they were very serious. But he was answered by my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Snowball) in a very conclusive and convincing manner. That hon. gentleman told this House that so efficient is the equipment, so high the standard of the Intercolonial Railway at this moment, that it can compete successfully with the Canadian Pacific Railway to St. John which is 480 miles, that so thorough is the equipment of the Intercolonial Railway and so high the standard of that road at the present moment, it can compete successfully, although it is carrying freight to Halifax by a route about 360 miles longer than the Canadian Pacific Railway has to carry it to St. John. That is a complete and effective reply to the indictment of the Secretary of State against the management of the Intercolonial Railway under the preceding governments. My hon. friend the Secretary of State has just told us that he is afraid, notwithstanding what his colleague may have said to the contrary, that the era of capital expenditure has not ceased on the Intercolonial Railway. I turn to the estimates of the year which is now concluded, and I find that in three batches of estimates brought down for the year ending 30th June, 1899, there was $1,358,960 voted by Parliament for capital expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway, and I am not aware that a single mile of new road was being undertaken. I take it for granted that nearly, if not all, that money has been expended, from the fact that Parliament was asked to vote $35,000 of it the other day and we know very well that the meaning of a supplementary estimate coming down the last days of the year is that the vote is just about the amount the department requires to complete its engagements for that year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand it is for rails and rolling stock.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—All right, for rails and rolling stock. I am not indicating what the character of this capital expenditure has been, but I have these estimates, and the strong presumption that they all, or very nearly all, have been expended during the year. I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

THE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. POWER, before the doors were opened, called attention to the fact that the minutes did not correctly set forth the proceedings of yesterday in relation to the Intercolonial Railway Extension Bill.

The doors being opened,

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM said:—These two bills, the Grand Trunk Railway extension and the Drummond County Railway purchase bills, are fastened together like the Siamese twins, and if we kill one we kill the other. I should like to know exactly where we stand on this question. The point of order should have been taken when the hon. gentleman for Wolseley (Mr. Perley) made his motion. There was a discussion and he was allowed to go on and make his speech. I took it for granted then that we could not separate the two bills, but I am ready to do anything reasonable.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Monck misapprehends the reason why I spoke. I was not dealing with the question of order. I think the hon. gentleman for Wolseley had a right to make the motion. I simply called attention to the fact that the minutes are not a correct record of what took place in the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think it would be irregular to make a motion combining two bills. One motion was made by my hon. friend and the other by myself. They are two separate bills, and although the House may acquiesce in the course suggested that both be considered together, and discussed in the debate which is going on, nevertheless when the vote is taken they must stand separate.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What led me astray was that the hon. gentleman did not object at the time. The point of order was not taken when the motion was made, and the hon. gentleman from Wolseley had a right to proceed. I think that was the proper time to take the point and not now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No point was taken at all.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I may be allowed to say that the Drummond County Bill was introduced in the Senate one day and the Grand Trunk Agreement Bill the next day. The leader of the opposition took exception to the two measures being separated. It was agreed that they should be discussed together. I naturally inferred that they were amalgamated, I am not a very old parliamentarian, but when the Senate discusses two bills together, as we discussed these two bills, I thought they were one and the same, and I therefore made the motion, but when I made the motion the Speaker informed me that the motion was out of order, inasmuch as it implied the vetoing of a bill which is not before Parliament, and I then amended it and submitted the amendment which I handed to the Clerk, who entered it in the minutes as it is now. The result is, the motion stands as it now appears in the minutes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I may say that I am not at all surprised at the hon. gentleman mixing the two bills together, under the very peculiar circumstances, for it is very seldom that two bills having one object in view, though altogether separate, have been discussed together in the past. The hon. gentleman very naturally fell into the error of making his motion in condemnation of both bills, because, as I stated once before, the ratification of the one would follow the ratification of the other, and vice versa. But while I say that, I must take exception to the mode in which the change has been made. In this case no possible harm can arise from it. It is only a question of precedent and procedure that I am now speaking of. When a motion is made in the House and placed in the Speaker's hands, that is the only motion that can go on the record except by permission of the House. I know that the Clerk called my attention to it after the adjournment of the House, and I said, "That is the motion that the hon. gentleman from Wolseley intended to make, and that is the correct one, but I do not see how you can put that on the record after the other motion has been made, and the only way that it could be done would be for the hon. gentleman from Wolseley, when the motion was called again, if no objection was taken to it on a point of order, to say that it was an error and asked to have it corrected with the consent of the House, which could be done in a moment." If this were permitted to pass as a precedent, much harm might arise in the future, and many disputes might result from it, and I am quite sure that the hon. gentleman from Wolseley has no such intention. The suggestion that was made by the Speaker was one that would very naturally occur to him. Had it been in the Commons, the Speaker would have called his attention to it as being out of order, but as our Speaker only rules when he is called upon to rule, he could take no other course than that of friendly consultation. No harm can arise out of this, and I make these remarks so that it may not be taken as a precedent in future.

THE USURY BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (I) "An Act respecting Usury," with certain amendments. He said:—As I still retain the same view that I did when I presented the report, namely, that while the object of the bill is very commendable, and while it is desirable to put a stop to the abuses complained of, yet it will be better to take further time to consider the bill by letting the consideration of the matter lie over until next session. The House did not think that that was the best course to take, however, and referred the bill back to the committee, where it has been amended. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman who has charge of the measure, that it would be well, before further steps are taken, that the bill should be printed, because it is very difficult for the House, as the bill now stands, to understand what the effect of these amendments would be.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I intend moving that the amendments should now be concurred in, and that the third reading be fixed for Tuesday. The amendments will appear in our minutes to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—That is the best course to take.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved that the amendments be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—We cannot concur in the amendments without notice, we do not know the effect of them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved that the amendments be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (112) "An Act respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company, and to change its name to the Montreal Terminal Company."—(Mr. Owens.)

THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EXTENSION.

AN EXPLANATION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the House to a telegram which has been sent as a matter of news to the papers of the lower provinces. I find it in the Charlottetown Patriot of the 3rd July, and the same telegram, word for word, appeared in two or three other daily papers in in the maritime provinces. The telegram has a very sensational heading, and is as follows:—

TRYING TO OUST

SIR MACKENZIE BOWELL—SENATOR FERGUSON THE PRIME MOVER—BOWELL WILL STAND TO HIS COLOURS—THERE WILL LIKELY BE A SPLIT IN THE TORY CAMP.

—o—

(Special to the Patriot.)

OTTAWA, July 3rd.—The trouble over the Grand Trunk Railway Agreement Bill has revealed in the Senate that Senator Ferguson is making terrible efforts to oust Sir Mackenzie Bowell out of the leadership. If the proposition which has been mentioned in this correspondence is not carried out when the matter comes up in the Senate next Tuesday, it will be due to Senator Ferguson, as Sir Mackenzie Bowell has signified his intention of carrying it out.

Senator Ferguson insists that in addition to making an agreement and one year's notice by the government, that the Grand Trunk Railway should get a share of the new routed traffic.

With reference to this statement, as far as it relates—and that is of course the only matter of any public consequence in it—to my own attitude as compared with that of my hon. leader with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway agreement, I have to say that nothing could possibly be more entirely, not only devoid of truth, but contrary to the truth than this statement is. It would be impossible for two public men to have viewed a great public question like this so entirely eye to eye as my hon. friend and myself have seen it; and I may further say that such has been our happy experience in public business ever since I have had the honour of occupying a seat in this House. I am sure my hon. friends who are associated with me know that there never has been the slightest difference between Sir Mackenzie Bowell and myself, and it is unnecessary to assure them that I have never at any time tried to oust my hon. friend from the position he holds with such signal advantage to the country.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EXTENSION BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called for:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the second reading (Bill 138) "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal."

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON said:—When the House adjourned yesterday afternoon I had been discussing the statement submitted to the House at an earlier period in the debate by my hon. friend the Secretary of State, founded as it was upon a letter signed by Mr. Schreiber and Mr. Pottinger, and I arrived at the conclusion that when my hon. friend said that the Intercolonial was going to have a larger surplus at the end of this year than all the former surpluses put together, his deduction from this letter was altogether unfounded and unwarrantable. I came to the conclusion that it is morally certain, from the information contained in the comparison between ten months of each of the past two years, that there will be a deficit of not much less than $100,000 in the working of the Intercolonial Railway during the year 1898-99, and that in addition to that, judging by the amounts voted by Parliament for capital expenses for the year ending the 30th June last, it will be found when the public accounts come out that there has been an expenditure on capital account for the last year on the Intercolonial Railway of between $1,350,000 and $1,400,000. So that the happy assurances that were given to this House about the prospects of a very handsome surplus on the Intercolonial Railway at the end of the year which is just closing and of the termination of all capital expenditure, on the Intercolonial Railway have no chance whatever of being realized. I might say, further, that if these measures which we are now considering become law, it is morally certain that, in the current year on which we have entered, there will be a very large capital expenditure on that road. There will be, first, the sum of $1,600,000 that this bill proposes we shall pay for the Drummond County Railway, and there has been one set of estimates already submitted to Parliament of $941,000 for expenditure on capital account on the Intercolonial Railway. And then we must remember that there are two other sets of estimates forthcoming, one of which we are promised this week and which we are led to believe by government organs is enormously swollen. There will still be an opportunity for the government, before the close of the current financial year to submit another set of estimates in which there will probably be further provision for capital expenditure. Therefore, it is fair to conclude that, not only was there a capital expenditure last year of nearly $1,400,000, but there will be, if this bill passes, a further capital expenditure this year of about three millions, and nearly one and a half million dollars even if this bill should not become law. Notwithstanding that this is the case, before leaving this point, I am free to say that better days are dawning for the Intercolonial Railway. I have no doubt that such is the case. A great deal was made, by my hon. friend, of the fact that the earnings of last year were greater than those of former years, but, as I have already shown, I think most conclusively, no part of the increased earnings is due to the Montreal extension, because the total increase in earnings for the ten months has been only 20 per cent, while the increased mileage, has been 12 per cent, leaving an increase of eight per cent, which is two per cent less than the average increase of earnings on Canadian railways last year. The inference is that the Montreal extension has not contributed to the increased net earnings last year, but is to be debited with absorbing 2 per cent of the earnings of the road. The remarks from my hon. friend from Northumberland are no doubt true, that the Intercolonial Railway is to-day, thanks to the very large capital expenditures made by the previous administration, a road of a very high standard indeed. It is probably equal to any road in the Dominion of Canada, or perhaps on the continent of America. It has a very high standard, and that being the case, together with the undoubted development and improvement in business that is going on all over the country, and in view of the fact that the province of Newfoundland has nearly completed a railway down to a port very convenient to the Intercolonial Railway terminus in Cape Breton, and that an excellent steamer has been put on, and a valuable trade developed between Newfoundland and the mainland, it is certain that the business of the Intercolonial Railway will increase. Looking at all these things, and the extraordinary developments going on in mining, and the prospects of development and enterprise in Cape Breton in iron and other industries, there cannot be the slightest doubt that the Intercolonial Railway is going to have better times in the future than it has had in the past. Hon. gentlemen may think that perhaps a portion of the earnings of last year have been due to the larger rates charged during Mr. Harris' regime, when he tried to introduce a system of higer rates for local trade on the Intercolonial Railway. I am told that no part of the earnings have been attributable to that cause, because I am informed, on what I think is excellent authority, that although the government collected a very considerable sum on these higher charges, they very carefully and punctiliously returned them to the people of New Brunswick before the late elections in that province. Therefore, no part of that amount is to be counted or included in the earnings of the Intercolonial Railway during the past year. I come now to the terms of this extension, and I will make this remark in starting, that it was not a question before the people at the general election of 1896. I think I may safely challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to point to any speech or declaration of any of their number made during, or before, that contest which will show that in any degree whatever the question of the extension of the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal over that route, or over any other route, was before the people during that election. That being so, it may excite and does excite a very considerable amount of surprise why it was that gentlemen in the government, with their hands so full of promises that they had made, with such a herculean task before them of fulfilling the numberless promises which they undoubtedly gave, should have given precedence to a matter about which they made no promises at all. It is a very surprising thing why it was that, so very soon after the election, the gentlemen of the government should have turned their attention to this matter about which they had made no promises, while they gave no attention to the fulfilling of the promises which they had undoubtedly made. We cannot help coming to the conclusion that there was some interest involved. It turns out that a prominent supporter of the government had a very controlling and powerful interest in what was called the Drummond County Railway, I refer to Mr. Greenshields. This was a railroad which was regarded as bankrupt. It ran through a sparsely settled district, not at all a rich country in resources as regards the then completed part of the road at all events, and it began, as has been stated, nowhere, and ended nowhere. It was not a road that, up to that time, the people of Canada had ever heard much about, and it was hardly ever mentioned as likely to become an important factor in regard to the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal, or in any other sense. It so happened that, by some means or other, the attention of the government became supremely directed to the importance of going in to Montreal by this Drummond County Railway and no other way. In going that way they had to parallel the Grand Trunk line for a distance of something like 140 miles. It was a very serious consideration to undertake to parallel a line of a powerful corporation such as the Grand Trunk, and the first question that would certainly strike any person, was that the Grand Trunk would be greatly opposed to that, and we must certainly conclude that the Grand Trunk could not become reconciled to having their road paralleled unless it was amply made up to them in some other way. The powerful influence which led the government to not only take up this gigantic question, involving a capital expenditure of $7,000,000 at this time and under these circumstances but to select the Drummond County Road as the way to do it, is hard to understand. The only explanation at all satisfactory is that Mr. Greenshields had a great deal of influence with the government. He was the owner of about a one-third of the capital stock of that company at the time. He had acquired it for the mere bagatelle of $24,000. Mr. Greenshields also afterwards became the owner of another large block of the same stock, I think only in trust for other gentlemen, and therefore I will not charge him with it, but he certainly was the absolute owner of about one-third and still continues to be owner of one-third of the stock, and in making close calculations I find that Mr. Greenshields would make a net profit of $400,000 out of that transaction on an investment of only $24,000, if the bill, introduced in 1897, had been passed, and he stands to make $236,000 of clear cash profit if the bill before us becomes law. He is known to be a very powerful politician. Mr. Tarte explained in the House of Commons, during the discussion of this very question, that he was the treasurer of the Liberal party fund, a powerful organizer and had a great deal of influence, and we cannot account for the selection of this road as a means of getting into Montreal on any other consideration than that Mr. Greenshields had a great influence with the government. Why that is so I am not going to say. Not only that, but the question of the Intercolonial extension from Lévis to Montreal was not as pressing a question in the public mind as it was some years before. It is well known that under the old management of the Grand Trunk Railway the connection had been very inefficient. It had been very bad indeed in Mr. Sergeant's time, and just complaints were made against the way the connections were made with the Intercolonial Railway in and out of Montreal. But, happily, under the present efficient management of the Grand Trunk, a very different state of things has prevailed. Since Mr. Hays became president new life and a new spirit have been introduced into the Grand Trunk, and there has not been anything like the just ground of complaint that there was before. After the grounds of complaint against the Grand Trunk management had to a large extent passed away, we find the government, without much consideration, almost immediately after the elections, taking up a question to which they were not pledged and for which no agitation had existed, and undertaking this work of carrying the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal. The mistake, in the first instance, was made of having anything to do with the Drummond County Railway, even if it was determined to come to Montreal. I hold if the effort had been made to come in by the Grand Trunk's own line, the matter would have been divested of a great many of the difficulties since connected with it. Many of the difficulties about traffic arrangements would have been far more easily got over if that had been done, than with the two lines paralleling each other as they are now doing. But the government had to use this Drummond County Road, and the only reason that they ever put before the public for adopting that in preference to the other, is that they claim now that it is twelve miles shorter, which perhaps is correct.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is there no difference in the grade?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman says there are differences in the grade.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No; I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I cannot hear the hon. gentleman. There may be some differences in the grade, but I apprehend it would have been just as easy for them to have got over the difficulty about the grades and improved them as it was on the Drummond County Railway. They had the resources to do it, and could have seen to it that it was done, and I have no doubt any difficulty with regard to the grades could have been easily overcome if the government had any desire to use the Grand Trunk Railway and come to Montreal in that way. Then we have to consider the terms under which they have come in, and we have to carry with us, in the consideration of this question from beginning to end, the influence upon these negotiations which the fact of paralleling the Grand Trunk must have had. The Grand Trunk, in placing a value upon their rental and upon everything they were giving to the government, from first to last, had to take into account that they were allowing a road owned by the government, with government money and all the government influence behind it, to parallel their road, and they had to be satisfied that the money consideration given to them would not only pay them for the use of their line, but recompense them for the paralleling of their road by the Drummond County Railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Drummond County Railway existed already.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, incomplete and bankrupt. We will start at Ste. Rosalie and take the first thirty-five miles from that point to St. Lambert. Mr. Blair explained in the other House, on the introduction of the bill two years ago—an explanation which he practically repeated at a later period—that the Grand Trunk alleged that this road had cost them $1,500,000. He admitted it might be built now for less money. That amount would mean about $43,000 per mile. But the Grand Trunk said "It cost us $1,500,000," and they said to him, "We will give you a half interest in that for half this valuation based on interest at five per cent." It has been proved by the returns which have been unwillingly brought down in the other House, and reluctantly brought down here, but nevertheless brought down, that our use of that road is but a limited use. The Minister of Railways claims it is about 25 per cent. The figures which we have in our possession, and which I have examined with very great care, seem to indicate that our user by the Intercolonial Railway of these lines is about 16 per cent. It therefore comes to this, that Mr. Blair deliberately allowed $1,500,000 as the price of that road, admitting it was more than a road of the same kind could be built for now, and while he only needed, according to his own story, one-fourth interest, and according to our belief about one-sixth interest, he nevertheless undertakes to pay for one-half of it, and while he could borrow money at two and seven-eights per cent, he undertook to allow the Grand Trunk Railway Company at the rate of 5 per cent, on the swollen orignal cost of the road. As far as that part of the line is concerned, there cannot be the slightest doubt, even if we need a half interest and we get it, we are still paying more than double what we ought to pay for the road. We are paying double in two ways: we are paying a nearly double rate of interest, and we are paying double our user of the road. Therefore we should multiply it by four, and it is four times as much as we ought to pay for that part of the line. I admit frankly that other parts of the rental are not so wrong as that is, although I think they are wrong in this respect, that we are buying a half interest when we do not need a half interest. Therefore, there is room for reduction on business principles with regard to the terminals and with regard to the bridge. But they are not so monstrously wrong as the arrangement with regard to the line from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, and it is the more surprising and inexplicable that any such bargain as this should be entered into, because if we turn to page 62 of the report of the evidence taken before the Drummond County Committee of the House of Commons last year, we will find very specific information about the rate of interest.

At page 63, Mr. Blair was examining Mr. Wainwright, and, after having questioned him upon another point to which I will have to refer at a later stage of my remarks, he asked:

Q. And did you not argue and point out that your five per cent bonds in England were only selling in the market at 85, and did you bring me a newspaper showing that they were selling for only 85?—A. I told you we could not borrow at less than five per cent and that our four per cent bonds were selling at 85.

Q. And did you say that if we consented to going on you would have to put these betterments in at a lower cost than you actually incurred?—A. We could only get 85.

He was talking of the betterments, but the arguments and facts he has elicited have the same bearing upon the valuation of this portion of the line between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, as it would have upon the betterments. The examination proceeds:

Q. And when we made the temporary arrangement, did I not point out that your bonds had gone up and that you could borrow at a less rate of interest?—A. Yes, we recognized that they had gone up and that we could borrow at three per cent.

This was, I think, on the 25th March. It was less than one month from the time the last contract was signed and completed, and here we have Mr. Wainwright declaring before the committee, on his oath, that the Grand Trunk Railway was then in a position to borrow money at 3 per cent, and the government, we know, at the time the last loan was affected, not only was able but did borrow money at 2⅞ per cent. That being so, can any hon. gentleman in this House, or anywhere, explain to me why a rate of interest of 4 per cent should have been fixed with regard to the betterments, and 5 per cent with regard to the line between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert? I am unable to understand why this should be, because almost at the very time—at the very time indeed—that this last contract was entered upon, the Grand Trunk Railway, according to Mr. Wainwright's evidence, was able to borrow money at 3 per cent. I may as well finish this question with regard to the rate of interest as it applies to the betterments, and that will save me from bringing it up again. Hon. gentlemen will remember that, under the contract of 1897, there was a provision in that bill that in the event of the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk agreeing upon the necessity of double-tracking the line between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, and making other improvements on the terminals, that the government should pay 5 per cent on one-half the cost of the betterments. It was in this House in 1897 that the enormity of that feature of the bargain was pointed out, and it was pointed out so strongly and effectually that when a new contract came to be made, that feature of it was changed in this respect, that we were only to pay in proportion to our wheelage use, which was the principle which should have applied to all the property we were acquiring, not only to the betterments, but every other property, whether it was the bridge or whether it was the line from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, or whether it was the line into Montreal. It was, however, conceded in regard to the betterments that we should only pay in proportion to our wheelage use, and that we should have the privilege of paying in cash for these betterments, and I ask hon. gentlemen to tell me why the rate of four per cent was fixed? Why was four per cent selected as the rate when Mr. Wainwright went before this committee and swore that the Grand Trunk Railway could borrow money at three per cent, and we know that the government could borrow at two and seven-eighths per cent? It is the more pertinent and more important that we should solve that question at this stage and get at the bottom of it, because Mr. Blair, in his examination, announced a course to which my hon. friend from Westmoreland referred in his admirable address to this House the other day, and it seemed from the remarks made by my hon. friend representing the government in this House that neither of them was aware of Mr. Blair's intention until my hon. friend brought it up here. Mr. Blair announced last year, before the Drummond County Committee, and again in the House of Commons this year, that it was not the intention of the government to pay for the cost of these betterments in cash, but that they intended to elect to pay at the rate of four per cent interest on the cost.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am asking for information, and I should like to know what the hon. gentleman means when he speaks of the Grand Trunk being able to borrow money at 3 per cent? Is it on bonds or on stock?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am quoting Mr. Wainwright.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says they were selling bonds at 50 cents on the dollar.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not say so. I think he meant on bonds, and I will tell the hon. gentleman why. He said in 1895, "Our 5 per cent bonds were selling at 85, and we had to pay 5 per cent interest. Now," he said, "our stock has gone up and we can get money at 3 per cent."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What price would the bonds sell at? Everything depends on that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We have the bald statement of Mr. Wainwright, that the rate of interest was 5 per cent—that the money would cost the company 5 per cent. It does not matter whether it was on bonds or not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman will see that that is 5 per cent on $85, not 5 per cent on $100. It is 3 per cent on $100.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think it is. The hon. gentleman's explanation is entirely untenable, and I will tell you why. They were discussing the 5 per cent on these betterments under the old contract and they changed it to 4 per cent. Why did they make the charge 5 per cent? Because money was to cost them 5 per cent. That is the meaning. The conclusion is inevitable. Mr. Wainwright said, and Mr. Blair led him up to saying it, that money cost the Grand Trunk Railway 5 per cent then, and now they could get it for 3 per cent. The hon. gentleman has made this point, but it has no relevance whatever to the statement made by Mr. Wainwright, because Mr. Wainwright was speaking of the same class of security in 1897, as in 1898, and he said money "cost us 5 per cent then and now 3 per cent."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It cost him 5 per cent to get $85. He gave a bond for $100 and got $85 and paid 5 per cent on that. The hon. gentleman says he could get it now for 3 per cent, but whether that is better than 5 per cent would depend upon what the bonds would sell for.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend is just drawing a red herring across the trail. Mr. Wainwright did not draw any line of distinction whatever. He was talking of what money cost the Grand Trunk Railway Company. He spoke of the price of their bonds, and it is a fact which everybody knows that on the consummation, as was believed, of this bargain with the government of Canada, the bonds of the company went up with a bound in the English market. Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, president of the Grand Trunk Railway, at the annual meeting held in the early part of the winter of 1897—in fact that was one of the first intimations we had that this bargain was effected—told the shareholders at the annual meeting in London that they had made such a bargain with the government of Canada as would enable them to get the new bridge over the St. Lawrence for nothing. That statement had such an immense effect on the securities of the Grand Trunk that Mr. Wainwright was able to say in his evidence that the cost of money, when the Grand Trunk went to borrow, came down from 5 per cent in 1897 to 3 per cent in 1898. In connection with the subject Mr. Blair made this declaration in Parliament and before the Drummond County Committee, that he was not prepared to pay cash and would not pay cash, but would exercise the option of paying 4 per cent interest, and why? Because he said that there were extensive mortgages and bonds on the Grand Trunk Railway and he would not consider it safe and judicious to spend capital on the road in that condition. Mr. Blair has shown extraordinary lack of business capacity, if not something worse, in dealing with this question, because if Mr. Blair entertained any such serious doubt on that point, it was a very easy thing for him to put a clause in this bill that would have protected any money spent by the government on the Grand Trunk Railway. That would have allowed him to exercise his option, under this bill, without let or hindrance, of paying cash instead of paying interest, because no rate of interest that could be established would be as favourable to the government as paying cash. But, strange to say, last session, one month after making this contract, Mr. Blair went to the Drummond County Railway Committee, and said he never intended to pay cash. Mr. Blair has shown an extraordinary want of business capacity, to use no stronger term, in making an arrangement like that, and not making it secure that he could exercise the option he took, otherwise the option was a delusion, as he announced his intention not to exercise it. I am speaking, not only on the point before us, but also of its reference to the betterments. On the whole, I have no hesitation in saying that the price agreed to be paid as a rental to the Grand Trunk Railway is excessive—that the government went about acquiring an interest in that road which they will never use, and, as was remarked by my hon. friend from Westmorland yesterday, and very truly remarked, that in consequence of the large territory they have to draw upon, the extent of their line and other considerations the business of the Grand Trunk is certain to grow faster than the business of the Intercolonial. Therefore, their use of these terminals, and the bridge and road out to Ste. Rosalie is certain, year after year, to permanently grow greater than the business of the Intercolonial.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is an assumption.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If it had not been for the pressure on the government that they must come in by the Drummond County route and parallel the Grand Trunk, and that they had to make up to the Grand Trunk for that paralleling of their road by agreeing to pay these excessive rentals, I am sure a much more reasonable bargain, and something like value would have been given for the rights and interests we are acquiring. Instead of that, we are buying a half interest when we are only requiring, according to Mr. Blair's statement, a 25 per cent user, and I believe less. It is certain, as years go by, that our percentage of user will be less than it is now. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Snowball) shakes his head, but I do not think many members of this House will dissent from the proposition put before us by the hon. gentleman from Westmorland (Mr. Wood) yesterday, that the probabilities, not only probabilities, but certainties, are that the Grand Trunk's use will increase faster than the Intercolonial Railway's use of all this property. Not only is it wrong in the matter of our buying a larger interest than we have any necessity for, not only is it wrong by putting the first cost too high, but it is wrong in the additional respect that the rate of interest on which it is valued is made 5 per cent, for which there can be no justification whatever. I wish now to discuss for a few moments a document that has become very important, called the supplemental traffic agreement which, under the 40th section of this main contract, is made to form a part of this bill. It has to be read with the bill and is to become part of the bill and to have equal force and continuity with the bill itself and with the main contract. That leads us to inquire a little into the history of this traffic agreement. It was made on the 28th February, 1898. On the 15th March, just two week later, Mr. Blair, the Minister of Railways, went before the Drummond County Railway Committee and gave his evidence on oath. He took a solemn oath to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. During the course of a long series of explanations which I had the pleasure of hearing myself, he did not wait to be asked questions; he delivered a statement which was very lengthy and explicit as it would appear, but from the beginning to the end of it he never told that committee one word about the supplemental traffic agreement. Mr. Wainwright was subpœnaed before the committee and examined, and he was questioned particularly with regard to matters which we now know form part of that supplemental agreement, but it was never explained to the committee that it was in the supplemental agreement they were to be found, and not in the main contract, and up to that time, neither the Drummond County Railway Committee nor either branch of Parliament was put in possession of the main contract itself, nor of the supplemental agreement. All the principal witnesses appeared before the Drummond County Railway Committee,—Mr. Schreiber, Hon. Mr. Blair, and others, and they were examined on all the points of the old contract and the new contract, and up to the close of their various examinations, there was no reference made except a belated one by Mr. Wainwright to this supplementary tariff agreement. It was only on the 19th of April, 1898, during a night session, nearly two months after the Drummond County inquiry had been entered upon, and when the committee had nearly completed its work, so far as receiving evidence was concerned, that the Minister of Railways laid on the table of the House of Commons some documents with reference to the question. It was at the time when we were overwhelmed with the consideration of the Yukon question, and I wondered a little why that document had come in that way, it was distributed over our desks, but as we had no bill before us at the time, I simply shoved it into my desk and it passed away from my recollection, I did not make any closer examination of it then. It turns out, however, at a very late date in the proceedings of the Drummond County Committee, on the 28th of April, that reference was made to this agreement by Mr. Wainwright, and then it was found by the committee that they had never got the agreement up to that time, and it was produced and filed as an exhibit. The copies that found their way to our desks at that time, I suppose, were treated by all the hon. gentlemen as I treated mine, as not having any present importance, and they were thrown aside. When the bill was brought down this year in the House of Commons, the traffic agreement was not brought down with it, although the 40th clause, re-sealed its existence to a sharp critic, but the document itself was not brought down with the bill. During the time it was discussed in the House of Commons through all its stages, not one gentleman in the opposition there had ever obtained a copy of that supplemental agreement. I observe that on one occasion, on page 4835 of the Hansard of the House of Commons of this year, that Mr. Blair, referred to it, and read from it. He read the whole preamble, which was very uninteresting stuff, and he read the first section of the real body of the traffic agreement, and stopped there. The section that he read is the one that gave to the government railway at Montreal all east bound trade, and which suspended or cancelled the Chaudière line from Montreal to Lévis as a divisional route. That is the section which gives to the government of Canada a very great concession indeed. The other seven sections are mainly considerations for that one, and very serious considerations they are. They are, more or less, against the government and to the advantage of the Grand Trunk Railway. The hon. Minister of Railways, however, just read that first one and there he stopped. A discussion started and the question arose among members of the House of Commons as to where the supplementary traffic agreement was, and Mr. Blair told Mr. Haggart, "You must remember that I sent you a copy of it across the floor of the House." Mr. Haggart said he never saw that copy. "It was in the Drummond County Committee when Mr. Blair was examined, and I examined him upon it," said Mr. Haggart. Mr. Haggart turned out to be wrong, because it was not in print at that time and was not submitted for two months afterwards. Mr. Haggart thought he knew about it, but he did not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman is discussing now the proceedings of the House of Commons, which is quite irregular.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I leave that part of the subject by saying I have undoubted authority for stating that, up to the time the bill left the House of Commons, the opposition members of that body did not realize the contents of this supplementary traffic arrangement, and it was only after it came to this House that information regarding that point came before the public. The newspapers supporting my hon. friend and the hon. gentlemen around him have been very industrious, from one end of the country to the other, in endeavouring to create an impression that the Senate have been aroused in their action with reference to this supplemental traffic agreement by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Every effort has been made to create an impression in the minds of the people that the hostility on the part of the members of this House has been created by sympathy with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Let me tell hon. gentlemen this fact, which I happen to know: The Canadian Pacific Railway, as well as the House of Commons, were in blissful ignorance of the terms of this traffic agreement up to the time my hon. friend, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the leader of the opposition in this House, put his motion on the order paper asking for the production of that document, and it was that action, and the discussion among members of this House that aroused the Canadian Pacific Railway to come into the field and look after some interests which it had in regard to this traffic agreement. So the statements which have been made, and which have been used, I daresay, in many cases effectually, for the purpose of neutralizing the effect on the public mind with regard to this supplemental traffic agreement, by creating the impression that all this excitement was brought about by the action of the Canadian Pacific Railway, are entirely unfounded. On the contrary, the Canadian Pacific Railway got their information from the hon. leader of the opposition in this House when he made his motion for the production of that traffic agreement. It was then that the Canadian Pacific Railway became conscious of the fact that this traffic agreement was in existence, and that it militated against its interests as well as against the interests of the people of Canada. The fact that the important committee struck for the purpose of investigating the affairs of the Drummond County Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway bargain with the government were kept in the dark, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was kept in the dark with regard to this subject, is one that certainly is calculated to excite surprise and perhaps, in some minds, even suspicion. It does seem strange that this very important supplemental agreement should not have been attached to the bill, and brought down to this House and to the House of Commons so that members of both Houses would have been able to weigh every word in it when considering the bill. It is to the honour of the Senate of Canada, that they and not the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, have made this discovery, the importance of which our hon. friends on the other side are not in their hearts disposed to minimize one jot at this moment. Having said so much about the history of this traffic arrangement, let me now refer to the document itself. Before touching that, it will be remembered that before the Drummond County Committee, and in parliamentary statements and through the newspapers, it was announced last year that the government had made a very much better bargain with the Grand Trunk and the Drummond Railway than the one that they had previously made, and the points of these improvements were indicated very clearly in many ways, and amongst the rest before the Drummond County Committee. Here is what Mr. Wainwright said when asked by Mr Borden as to what the differences were between the new contract and the old:

Q. Beside the change you have already mentioned as a difference between the agreement of this year and that of last year, is there any other?—A. There is some difference with regard to traffic.

Q. Could you briefly state what it is?—A. The principal one I think I could tell you; there are other minor changes. The principal one is this: The Grand Trunk held that if our line between Lévis and Richmond was to be destroyed, that we could not be expected to offer the traffic to the government at Montreal, and the agreement did not allow for that. We proposed to use our line to Lévis whenever we had the opportunity, but the government insisted on having the traffic from the west handed to them at Montreal. In other words, that we should abandon and take away our Chaudière rates, and that is most important.

Q. They insisted upon having the western business given to them at Montreal to the exclusion of your line?—A. Yes.

Q. Besides that there are some minor changes in the agreements?—A. Yes.

Q. These are the two principal ones?—A. Yes.

Q. That is embodied in the agreement now made?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you regard these changes as important?—A. Yes I regard the change of handing over the traffic at Montreal and shutting up our line to Lévis as a great concession to the government.

By Mr. Haggart:

Q. That entered as part of the consideration into the bargain?—A. We did not think it did. We did not have that idea at the time when we agreed to it.

By Mr. Blair:

Q. We claimed that was the true and proper interpretation. Did I not claim that was what the language was intended to mean?—A. You certainly claimed that.

Mr. Wainwright sent this abroad as a very great concession to the government. If there was a quid pro quo given for that, apart from the rentals, it could not be called a concession, because they were getting something for it. Mr. Blair came in and pleaded "we thought we were getting that from the first; we thought that was what the language of the old agreement meant. Did not we claim that?" and Mr. Wainwright said "You certainly did, but others did not," Therefore it was made plain. The impression was made on the minds of the members of Parliament and the members of the committee that that was a concession which was got without any quid pro quo, but when this traffic agreement comes out we find it is a different matter altogether. Instead of receiving it as a concession without any consideration, except the rentals, we are called upon to give enormous considerations for it. We are almost compelled to give the earth to the Grand Trunk for the sake of getting this concession. Important as it is in my estimation, it is not sufficient to justify us in binding ourselves up for ninety-nine years to the Grand Trunk Railway in so many injurious ways. I hold that that concession should be made just precisely what Mr. Blair said it was, and said that he meant it to be in 1897—that it should form a part of the main contract, and that it should be irrevocable as other parts of that contract were. It was part of the consideration we were getting for the $140,000 a year we were paying, and should have been embodied in the contract, and not tied up in traffic agreements and other things. If this bill should reach a second reading, it would the duty of those having charge of it to make the 40th section read so that that condition would be irrevocable and give the Intercolonial Railway that east bound trade, cancelling the Chaudière branch as a divisional route, and in that way getting over the competition which we would have in conducting our own business after buying this section. I will glance over the different sections in the tariff agreement. The first one does not in the interest of the government of Canada seem to be at all unfair :

Notwithstanding anything contained in any agreement between Her Majesty and the company heretofore made and now existing, it is agreed between Her Majesty and the company that during the continuance of the contract to which this is a supplement, percentage divisions via Chaudière Junction shall be suspended, and that with respect to all traffic originating throughout the company's system, or connections west of Montreal, and offered for shipment to any point on the Intercolonial Railway, or reached by its connections, Montreal shall be the junction point, and the company undertakes to route all traffic destined to points on the Intercolonial Railway and its connections, via Montreal and the Intercolonial Railway.

This section means this, that we are to give all the traffic that we control from the east destined for points on the Grand Trunk and for forwarding from these points to the United States—we are to hand over that business at Chaudière Junction to the Grand Trunk but we receive something else in consideration for it. But we have to remember that there is another interest involved there, an interest that this Parliament has no right to exclude from consideration. There is a struggling railway connecting Lévis with Sherbrooke, known as the Quebec Central. This is the very traffic that that company lives on. Under this provision we were bound to hand over this business to the Grand Trunk at the expense of the Quebec Central, and for 99 years to come that road would be placed at this disadvantage, that they never could handle one pound of this traffic. It is a very serious consideration whether, to gain a point for ourselves, much less for the Grand Trunk we should do anything to paralyze or seriously injure a struggling railway such as the Quebec Central, the advantage of which to Canada was conceded by granting subsidies in aid of its construction.

Then comes the next section :

All business origating in the city of Montreal, or on the Montreal joint section, destined to points on the Intercolonial Railway, shall be considered Intercolonial traffic, it being agreed that in connect on with that consideration, the Intercolonial Railway will give all the traffic from its system and connections that it can control, destined to New England points, or any other point east of Ste. Rosalie reached by the Grand Trunk system and its connections, to the Grand Trunk Railway at Chaudière Junction, the Intercolonial Railway being allowed Aston mileage.

There does not appear to be anything objectionable in that section.

Traffic destined to points in the United States reached via the gateways of St. Johns, P.Q., Rouse's Point, N.Y., Huntingdon, P.Q., and Massena Springs, N.Y., to be delivered to the company at St. Lambert.

All business originating on the Montreal joint section, destined to points on the company's line east of Ste. Rosalie shall be considered "company's" business, and all traffic originating on said section destined to Incercolonial Railway points, shall be considered "Intercolonial" traffic.

Nor is there any objection to that. It seems to be fairly balanced, and just and equal, and does not hurt any other company. The next is :

All business originating on the company's lines east of Ste. Rosalie, or on the Intercolonial Railway between Ste. Rosalie and Lévis, inclusive, to be interchanged at Chaudière Junction, Aston Junction or Ste. Rosalie Junction, or at such other junction point as may be hereafter opened, the understanding being that such business is to be forwarded by both lines via the shortest route between the point of shipment and destination.

That also appears to be right, although, as my hon. friend for Westmoreland put it yesterday, the making of such conditions as this for such a long period as ninety-nine years, when we cannot possibly conceive the different conditions that might arise, is a matter of very doubtful expediency. Then we come to the worst of all :

Her Majesty further undertakes to route via Montreal all unconsigned west bound traffic controlled by the Intercolonial Railway or its connections, destined to points west thereof reached by the "company" and its connections.

Under this section of three lines—they look very innocent until you examine them—the government bind themselves for ever—that is practically what this lease with the Grand Trunk means, ninety-nine years, to be renewed for another ninety-nine years and so on for ever—to hand over to the Grand Trunk all west bound traffic of the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Unconsigned.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Unconsigned. What was consigned to the Grand Trunk Railway would of course go to the Grand Trunk, but all that is unconsigned would go to the Grand Trunk and its connections for ever.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a mere fraction.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Hon. gentlemen have only to reflect for a few moments to see what that means. My hon. friend from Northumberland, in addressing the House the other day, had a very erroneous impression in his mind that this applied only to traffic originating in Canada. The truth is, it applies to all traffic controlled by the Intercolonial, originating either in Canada or delivered to the Intercolonial and going westward, and covers every pound of that traffic that is unconsigned for ever. It means that we would be obliged, during the continuity of this lease, to deliver over to the Grand Trunk, and its connections, at Montreal all this unconsigned traffic, and that the Grand Trunk would, of course, hand over that portion of it which is intended for western points to its United States allies, the Great Northern and the Minneapolis and St. Paul, or whatever the lines are. Take an illustration, a car load of mining machinery manufactured in Moncton or New Glasgow, N.S., and intended for the Kootenay district, that would be consigned for these points, the shipper not indicating the lines, except that he consigned it by the Intercolonial Railway to be forwarded in their own way. That traffic would be handed to the Grand Trunk Railway at Montreal, and handed to their connections at Chicago and forwarded on the United States lines to Seattle, and thence north into the Kootenay and delivered to our own people. The preposterous character of that proposition is to be considered, and every hon. gentleman will see how absurd it is that any such arrangement should be entered into by the Minister of Railways. The business would be taken out of our country. We all hope and believe that the traffic between the east and the west will be enormous. We believe that in Cape Breton at some future day all our iron will be manufactured for our own use, as the greatest facilities exist for its manufacture. Whatever is shipped to western points in future would be handed in this way to the Grand Trunk Railway and its connections. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice has intimated that this only referred to unconsigned freight, which is a mere fraction, but I am told, on good railway authority, that in the general run of trade the proportion of consigned to unconsigned is 1 to 10 —that there is ten times as much goods unconsigned as there is consigned.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—It is the very reverse.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend's opinion may be just as good as mine. I have great respect for him and his opinions, but I have more respect for the opinion of disinterested railway authorities in regard to the matter.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I was interested myself to know what proportion the unconsigned bore to the consigned freight, and I asked Mr. Wainwright, and he told me there was ten tons consigned to one ton unconsigned. He thought that was the general proportion. My own experience is only limited, but I may say that in the west 99 merchants out of 100 give instructions how all their freight shall be shipped. They name the roads. I think I am quite right in saying that there is ten times more consigned than unconsigned freight.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend evidently made up his mind what answer he wanted before he selected the party to inquire of. I have great respect indeed for Mr. Wainwright's opinion, but I have not as much respect for his views on traffic matters as for the opinion of traffic managers of his road or other roads. They are better authorities. Hon. gentlemen may well smile when they hear that my hon. friend from Victoria went to my good friend Mr. Wainwright for information on this subject. I am not surprised at the character of the information he received but I am a little surprised that he should be so well satisfied with the answer. I was going to state that some carriers object to have directions put upon the goods at all. I have been refused myself, although I studied the matter out and knew exactly how I could reach my point. I am speaking of shipping to Cape Breton. I knew the time of connection with the trains and everything, and I wanted the Charlottetown Steam Navigation Company to put it in the bill of lading and they refused. They said, "If you are wrong in any of these particulars, we will get in trouble about it. We will be responsible for getting it to its destination, but we object to being tied down as you propose. We undertake to work that out and decline to be bound by this because we do not know." Shippers generally, understanding the force of that, choose to put the responsibility upon the carrier, and properly so. It is not a matter of consequence to them, because as between the two routes that I have been describing, the route over the Grand Trunk and its United States connections, and over the Canadian Pacific Railway to Kootenay, the rates are made the same, and the shipper knows that. He hands the carrier the goods and the carrier is responsible and the shipper does not bother his head further about it. Not only are we handing over, by this contract, all the unconsigned business originating east of Montreal, in Canada, and unconsigned by the shipper, to the Grand Trunk at Montreal and passing it from their hands to their United States allies and handing the freight to foreigners and strangers, but we are mortgaging our own future in regard to European trade. It is in the heart of a great many in this country to establish a fast Atlantic steamship service. We have, without that fast service, some ocean service at Halifax and St. John, and we are anxious that it should grow and improve. We are looking forward to the day when we will have a powerful fast Atlantic steam service, connecting the mother country with our own ports, for which Canada will have to pay sooner or later, whoever enters into that contract, a subsidy of $1,000,000 per annum. I have no hesitation in saying that. In paying that subsidy we are bound to use all the influence we possess to draw our trade to our own ports.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—To Montreal.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, when Montreal is open, but as Montreal is frozen up many months in the year, we are trying to establish communication to some of our ports on the seaboard. We are going to hamper all our future and jeopardize all this money that we propose to spend for the establishment of a fast line to bring trade into our country, and we are going to bind our hands for that trade which goes westward much of which will thus reach our own western country by United States lines to its destination. I hold that we have a right to encourage the carrying of that trade over our own lines. My hon. friend from Northumberland seems very uneasy about it. I am glad he manifests uneasiness, because it shows me that he is disturbed. Other hon. members on his side of the House are just as much disturbed as he is, but they have a little more self control and they do not let us see it. He is doing our work magnificently. He is not only disturbed, but he takes pains to let us know that he is disturbed. I pass on to another part of that traffic agreement. There are two sections following the one I have just read. As I understand it, they are to be read together and they have a reference to our trade with European ports. One clause reads :

> In connection with import and export traffic via Halifax or St. John, or any other port in the maritime provinces that may be hereafter selected, it is understood that during the life of the agreement that the Intercolonial Railway will accept 425 miles on Halifax, and 375 on St. John, the St. John rates to be the same as those quoted by the Canadian Pacific Railway to and from that port or West St. John, and the same as quoted by the Grand Trunk Railway to and from Portland ; the Halifax rates to be one cent per 100 pounds, on all classes, and special class over the rates to and from St. John or Portland, on both exports and imports, the company to have as its proportion the mileage as per the various groups west of Montreal.

I am not going to find any serious fault with that arrangement if it only covered a reasonable time. My hon. friend for Westmoreland made a magnificent discussion of that clause before the House yesterday, and I think hon. gentlemen cannot fail to agree with him, that even if that arrangement be equitable now, it is not one that we should enter upon for so long a period as one hundred years. My hon. friend pointed out, when he was twitted by the hon. Minister of Justice, that geography could not change and that as years went by Montreal could not get nearer to Halifax than it is now, that in the event of the bonding privileges being abrogated what would happen. That is a thing which has been threatened.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says no. He never sees lions in the way when the government have anything on hand, but I think there are gentlemen in this House that will see very great danger and difficulty in making a 100-year bargain. A short time ago we heard threats that the bonding privilege would be taken away from us. The president recommended it, and it assumed a very critical phase at one time in our international relations with the United States; and although at the present moment a better feeling prevails and the statesmen of the two countries are wrestling earnestly with a view to find a satisfactory solution of this and kindred subjects, we must bear in mind that we are distinct and separate peoples and are likely to remain so. That being so, there are possibilities of friction arising, and there is a possibility of the bonding privilege being interfered with, and that being so, just let me tell the House what would happen in that event. Supposing a carload of goods originates in Chicago, and the Grand Trunk Railway conducts it to Montreal to be forwarded to Halifax for export; the distance from Chicago to Montreal and the distance from Montreal to Halifax are just about the same. Under this traffic arrangement, the Grand Trunk Railway would get a little over sixty-six per cent of the freight. Supposing $100 was the amount, they would get $66 and some cents out of it, and the Intercolonial Railway would get $33 and some cents. That is the character of the arbitrary arrangement made under this provision. We are only allowed 425 miles for carrying the freight from Montreal to Halifax, and the Grand Trunk Railway gets whatever the Chicago mileage is in connection with the group to which it belongs, which is a little more or less actual mileage. The Grand Trunk would get two-thirds of the money for doing one-half the work, and we would get one-third for doing the other half. Portland is a competing point, as also St. John by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and under present conditions and circumstances it may be that an arbitrary arrangement is necessary. I daresay it is. We cannot possibly, perhaps, get much freight unless we make that concession, because if we do not make it the freight will go some other way. The point is whether the concession is not so great that it is better for us not to get the trade at all. I think it is better for the Intercolonial Railway not to get the trade at all than to carry it at a loss. If we should lose the bonding privileges the Grand Trunk, as far west as Windsor, could still send their goods to Halifax, and could claim the two-thirds arbitrary rate against the Intercolonial Railway, and under this arrangement it could not be removed. It would have to continue, and although the Grand Trunk could not send their goods in any other way than by our route to the seaboard, and would have to use it, they would get $2 out of the trade for every one we would get.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—We have Portland.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Under such circumstances Portland would not be available. Notwithstanding my hon. friend's confidence and enthusiasm in government measures, I think in human possibility there is some danger of that happening, and when it does occur, just what I have said will happen, and the Grand Trunk could go on year after year compelling the Intercolonial to carry freight at a loss while they were getting a good price at the other end of the line. The Minister of Railways is a New Brunswicker, and being a lower province man, I would like to say something good about him. We are pretty clannish in the maritime provinces, and I would like to say some good things about the Minister of Railways, but I feel compelled to say that I cannot, under any circumstances, compliment his judgment on being a party to this traffic agreement. I assume he did not know anything about it, and that the finger was put in the eyes of his officers who were engaged in making it, or otherwise that he must have been standing in with the other side in regard to the contract. I am inclined to take the first named view of it, and to believe that the Minister of Railways did not know anything about what he was doing. We come now to the last paragraph in the traffic arrangement which reads as follows:—

> In the event of the Intercolonial Railway making arrangements with steamship companies to ply between the ports of Halifax, St. John, or any other port in the maritime provinces that may be hereafter selected, and European ports other than those covered by the Grand Trunk service from Portland, from time to time, the company to publish such through rates from its stations west of Montreal as are effective via other competing routes to all or any of such ports, such traffic to be divided on the regular grouped percentage divisions.

I have taken a good deal of pains to study this section in connection with the one before it, and I have had excellent authority, legal as well as expert, in railway matters, in endeavouring to arrive at the true import and meaning of these two sections.

The first one has reference to import and export trade, between maritime province ports and a European port with which the Grand Trunk Railway has a steamship connection at Portland. The second has reference to the quotation of a through rate from points on the Grand Trunk Railway in the west by the steamship company with which the Intercolonial Railway has made arrangements to connect with a British port, not being a port with which the Grand Trunk has connections from Portland. In this case the arbitraries are more favourable to the Intercolonial Railway. We are entering into an alliance with a railway company under which we give them enormous rentals and other valuable franchises, and bind them to give to us a thorough rate via a port in the maritime provinces and to a British port by a steamship line with which we have made arrangements. This is to be only where the routes are effective, where all the arrangements have been made to make them effective, to a British port, but that port must not be one with which the Grand Trunk Railway has a steamer plying from Portland. That has been put in to protect the Portland service of the Grand Trunk Railway. The Grand Trunk only binds itself to give the public through rates under this section over the Intercolonial Railway and over our steamers to a British port with which it has no connection from Portland, and the words "from time to time" are carefully put in, so that if the Grand Trunk should connect with other European ports from Portland besides what they do now, they would not give rates which would militate against their rates via Portland. The effect of these clauses will be to hamper us in the selection of a British port with which to make our connections either with a fast line or any other line of steamers, and that being so, I am very much surprised that the Minister of Railways and his friends in the government did not look more carefully into the matter before making such an extraordinary provision as that, as well as others in the agreement, and that they should make them apply for so long a period of time. Although I have already taken up too much of the time of this House, I must yet crave your indulgence while I say a few words upon another point, and that is the improvements in the present contract over the one that was submitted to Parliament and rejected by this House two years ago. The Minister of Railways, speaking elsewhere, discounted the improvements and changes. They were not of any consequence; he did not know that they were worth considering, or discussing very much, there was one item, indeed, of $6,000 which was taken off the rental. That was the way he discussed the matter in another place, but he did not admit that there was any material difference. My hon. friend from Cobourg (Mr. Kerr) in discussing this matter, animated by considerations of truth and justice, made a very different statement, and I congratulate my hon. friend on the candour and the independence he showed in making so important a statement, which nevertheless is nothing more than truth. My hon. friend said that, owing to the action of this Senate in defeating the bill two years ago, $700,000 had been saved to the taxpayers of Canada. When my hon. friend made that statement, I think that we might well ask why has the Senate been made the subject of such intense villification by government papers and speakers all over Canada because we had the hardihood to reject that measure.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman explained that yesterday and corrected the view which my hon. friend is now putting forward.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not hear that explanation. I did not know that the hon. gentleman had qualified his statement in any way.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I am sure the hon. gentleman would not intentionally misrepresent what I said on that occasion. What I did say, and the exact words are in the Debates, was that the leader of the opposition had told us that by the action of the Senate on a former occasion the country had been saved $700,000. That is what I said. It is not fair to me, or to the government, or to the friends of the government throughout the country, that my expression should be taken as unqualified. I clearly said that the information came from the leader of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Do you not believe the statement is true?

Hon. Mr. KERR—I do not know anything about it. The statement may be true or it may not. There might have been corresponding compensations if the contract were gone into, but I am very sure the hon. gentleman will accept this correction. I wanted, in the course of that speech, to be just and fair as I could be, and as fair as my knowledge would allow me to be, and I must, in self defence, add that I did not say the country had been saved $700,000 by the action of the Senate. I said the leader of the opposition told us so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that he was present when my hon. friend from Cobourg made the statement, and interrupted him at the time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was present, undoubtedly, when he made the first statement, and never to this moment did I understand that the hon. member claimed that he was only giving an extract from what the leader of the opposition had said, which I understand now to be his explanation. I was present at the time, and my interruption will show how I understood his statement. I was not in the House when an explanation was made.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman said this:

> But I learned yesterday from the hon. leader of the opposition in this House that by the course the Senate took when this matter was before them on the first occasion, the country had saved $700,000.

That was what the hon. gentleman said.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Since we are at it, I shall read a little more. I have no hesitation in accepting any explanation the hon. gentleman from Cobourg may make with regard to his own words. I understood him when he made the remark, and I think I was justified in understanding him so, although I must have lost the remarks which led up to this declaration, as giving his own conclusions. He was saying:

> I am bound to say—and this is where the Minister of Justice left of—that the Senate has been the means of saving to this country some $700,000 by the course that they took then.

My hon friend's explanation is that he was bound, receiving it from the leader of the opposition, to believe that the action of the Senate had saved the country $700,000. I have no hesitation in accepting the statement of the hon. gentleman from Cobourg, but when my hon. friend the Minister of Justice tries to fasten on me the imputation that I being present must have known of the explanation, the inference is that I was misrepresenting the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman from Cobourg continued:

> I submit further that the Senate ought to be satisfied with that.
>
> Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Oh, no.
>
> Hon. Mr. KERR—I mean that if the terms are so much more favourable now, I for one shall claim that the Senate is entitled to the full credit of getting these better terms.
>
> Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—You would not object to another $700,000 better?
> Hon. Mr. KERR—Oh, no, I would not object if we could get it for nothing.

I will take this ground, however, that while my hon. friend—and I accept his explanation unhesitatingly—only put this forward as a view which he had extracted from the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition he did not put himself in opposition to that view. He quoted it, and the inference is that he quoted it approvingly. He, at all events, said nothing to weaken it, nor did he intimate that he did not not believe it, or that he doubted that the amount of the savings was stated too large, or anything of that kind. The fact that my hon. friend made this quotation from the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition, apparently with approbation shows me that he is altogether too honest a man to weaken the force of the opinion which was contained in it.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—He kicks over the pail of milk now.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We will now turn to the provisions of this contract in detail. Two years ago, when a contract was brought down for the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, hon. gentlemen will remember that the method of payment was $64,000 a year for ninety-nine years. When the subject was under discussion in this House, a good deal of difference of opinion was expressed with regard to the actual present value of that $64,000 a year. I remember my hon. friend from Northumberland wrestled manfully with the question, and the result was some very colossal figures that rather astonished my hon. friend himself when they were worked out to their legitimate conclusion. But the Drummond County Railway Committee took a thoroughly accurate and proper method of arriving at a solution of this question. They subpœnaed before them perhaps the best actuary in Canada, Mr. Fitzgerald of the Insurance Department. He was brought there, was sworn as a witness and was asked to state on oath what was the present value of ninety-nine annuities, paid semi-annually, of $64,000 a year based on 2⅞ per cent interest, and he said it was $2,094,154. There is no mistake whatever about that calculation. Actuaries can arrive, with mathematical accuracy, at a figure with regard to it, and he had no hesitation in positively swearing that the value of these ninety-nine annual payments was this amount. We have a bill before us in which the Minister of Railways has taken an option to himself of continuing to pay sums representing a present value of $2,094,154 or paying cash down $1,600,000. I would really, after what I have heard from the Minister of Railways with regard to another option that he took to himself, and for which he claimed a good deal of credit, be inclined to inquire and inquire curiously, whether there was not to use a common expression "a nigger in the fence" with regard to these also, for when the hon. gentleman took to himself an option in another respect, with regard to the betterments, he tells us that he never intended to exercise that option—that he intended to continue paying in the way most unfavourable to the government. I hope there is no similar reservation in this case, if so he might pay the full $2,094,154.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—It was on the Grand Trunk lease he had the option.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am giving an illustration to show that it behooves us to be on our guard with reference to options. I have pointed to the extraordinary statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways about another option to pay cash instead of paying 4 per cent or 5 per cent interest. I am referring to the extraordinary statement of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, that he does not intend to exercise that option, although he has the power to do so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no option in the Drummond County Railway Bill. The government are only authorized to purchase.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In the earlier prints of the bill there was an option. However that does not make any difference, but——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Except that it is not there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We need not, therefore, be under any alarm at all with regard to the Minister of Railways having the same extraordinary excuse to offer, since there is no option, and I congratulate the country that there is none, knowing how suspicious options obtained by the Minister of Railways are. Put $1,600,000 against $2,094,000 and there is a difference of $494,000. There is another improvement in the present contract and that improvement arises in this way: Under the first contract the Drummond County Railway Company were required to bring the completed part of their road up to a certain standard, the standard of the Intercolonial Railway, and it was stated that a sum of about $35,000 would be required to do that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—$100,000.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Thirty-five thousand dollars was the estimate, and under the scheme of 1897 that was the amount. It turns out, however, that under the new contract, and as a result of it, over one hundred thousand dollars has been expended, being $65,798 more than was to have been expended under the contract of 1897. Therefore, there is $65,798 accruing to the taxpayers of Canada in that respect in the new contract over the old. Then there is the $6,000 a year that is dropped from rental, which represents a present value of $208,695. We have now three distinct items: $494,000 for the clean difference in the price; $65,798 representing the additional amount expended on bringing the Drummond County Road, the new as well as the old part of it, up to the standard of the Intercolonial Railway—$65,000 more than was provided in the old contract—and we have the capitalization of $6,000 a year which has been saved in rentals, being $208,695. So far we are on sure and certain ground about which there can be no question, and we have got a little over $769,000 saved to the people of Canada. I know that my very careful and cautious friend from Cobourg could have gone a little further than he did go, with regard to that, and even pledged his own reputation, as well as that of the leader of the opposition to the fact that, beyond any doubt or peradventure, there was a saving of $769,000 on points about which there is no difference possible. We come now to one about which there may be some conjecture, that is, the betterments. As I have already explained, under the contract of 1897 we were bound to pay interest on one-half the cost of betterments on the Grand Trunk line and on the terminals, at rate of five per cent. A different bargain has been made by which we are to pay for these betterments according to wheelage use, which, I think, will be not more than twenty per cent anyway; but the Minister of Railways says it will be about twenty-five per cent. We have to pay, according even to the Minister of Railways, about a quarter the cost of these betterments, and, in my opinion, based on the figures brought down, about one-fifth the cost, instead of one-half, which makes a very great difference, indeed. Here, again, the difference between five per cent and four per cent comes in as a very material difference; and we have again another difference which we should have the benefit of, and that is the option to which we have already referred over and over again—the option of being able to pay cash. I am sure if this bill should receive a second reading from the Senate, which I very much doubt, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House would feel themselves bound to put a provision in this bill by which the government would protect any money that it would pay for capital expenditure under this betterment provision, and that we would be enabled to exercise that option, and get the benefit of $2\frac{7}{8}$ per cent instead of four per cent in this bill and five per cent in the bill of 1897. On the double tracking of the road from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert alone—which is not a matter of conjecture and has been spoken of as a possible contingency—taking no other betterment into consideration at all, and which is likely will have to be done within the next two or three years, there would be a saving of $127,623, without putting one cent down for all that would be saved on the betterments during the whole life of this lease. We know that very many betterments will be required there, for the Intercolonial Railway, whatever its business will be, and we cannot resist the conclusion that that change in the provision is worth more than anybody can at this moment undertake to put down in dollars and cents. We have simply to consider the enormous advantage which, if this ever becomes law, will be secured by it, that we can pay for these betterments in cash, and the money would only cost us what we have to pay for money in the English money markets, and the advantage of that over the old contract requiring us to pay 5 per cent, would be very great. I have in my calculation mentioned the $127,623 which would be saved in the double tracking of the line between Ste. Rosalie and the bridge, without making any allowances for the advantage there would be in the future in the way of being able to pay cash for the betterments and pay for wheelage use in place of half the whole, the advantage of which it is impossible to put down in dollars and cents. There remains one other improvement to which I shall refer. Before touching it, I want to say that the new contract is a little more clear than the old one with regard to the connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway and the use of the Jacques Cartier branch. I think it was intended in the old contract that that connection should exist, and the difference in the language does not justify me, or anybody, in putting down a sum for that betterment in the contract. I now come to the largest of all betterments, and that is having handed over to us at Montreal, instead of at Chaudière, all the east bound trade. It has been estimated by members of the other House, who have spent a great deal of time in examining the documents and returns and all the information they can gather from the working of railways, that the trade which we get in consequence of that clause will be $35,000, taking the figures of 1897. Capitalize that amount and it comes to $1,219,488. That would be a distinct betterment of this contract over the old one, were it not for the uncertainty which exists with regard to this provision from the fact that it is wedged in the supplementary agreement instead of being put, as it ought to have been put, in the main agreement, irrevocable and not given for any quid pro quo of any nature whatever. I have gone over some of the points that affect our minds with regard to the general consideration of this question, and I think that hon. gentlemen cannot help coming to the conclusion that on every page and in every line, and in every word of discussion that takes place on this question, from one end of Canada to the other, the words "credit and honour to the Senate of Canada" may be read, for were it not for the Senate of Canada, having with care, deliberation, patience and patriotism entered into this question, as we did in 1897, this monstrous bargain that was then propounded would have become law and prevail for ever, and we would be ground down in this country owing to those improvident and reckless conditions which the government tried to force upon us, and which they denounced the Senate from one end of Canada to the other for not having sanctioned. This contract will bear further sifting, and very careful sifting and discussion, and there are yet so many features in this bill that are prejudicial to the public interest and improvident in their character, that it would justify us in holding this bill over for still further consideration.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether the rumour I have heard is correct, that it is the intention of the leader of the government, or his friend behind him, or some one else, to suggest any amendment to that 40th clause, presumably upon its going into Committee of the Whole? I think it is well, in matters of this kind, if there is any suggestion of that nature to be made, that the government should take the House into their confidence. As my hon. friend knows a great deal of difficulty has arisen, not only upon the discussion of this question, but upon the discussion of others, owing to this withholding of information which the opposition in the other House and also in this House think they ought to have had. If that is the intention of my hon. friend, the House ought to demand, in the consideration of this question, whether any amendments are to be proposed. It will enable those who are to speak hereafter to come to a more correct and decided opinion as to the course which they should pursue.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose, hon. gentlemen, that it is my duty to state what has transpired in this matter. The contract as hon. gentlemen know right well, which was entered into between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway is a contract which could only be altered with the joint assent of the two parties. The contract embraced in the traffic arrangement is a contract for a period of 99 years. When that was under discussion in the House, I understood the hon. gentleman himself to take exception to that arrangement and thought that the contract ought to have been terminable at an earlier period. If I have been rightly informed, this matter was discussed between my hon. friend opposite and the representative of the Grand Trunk Railway, and also between the Minister of Railways and Mr. Wainwright. Mr. Wainwright spoke to me on the subject and stated that he understood that the only objection made by a number of hon. gentlemen in the Senate was this traffic agreement, and so far as they were concerned, the government were at liberty to alter that arrangement and to make it terminable at any time upon twelve months' notice being given by the government to the manager of the Grand Trunk Railway. That was assented to, and I hold in my hand the amendment which the government were prepared to accept and which I think was communicated to my hon. friend opposite. The government were prepared to accept that in case the bill were to carry. I thought when we were in committee this provision might be added: Insert after the word "company" on line eight in the bill:

And subject to the conditions that within ninety days after the passing thereof the Grand Trunk do execute a further agreement with Her Majesty in amendment of and in addition to the traffic arrangement referred to in the 40th clause of the said agreement set forth in the schedule to this Act, to the effect that Her Majesty may terminate any of the traffic arrangements referred to in that clause, including the one already executed, and any alteration thereof, and any subsequent one which may be made as an amendment or an addition thereto, at any time, upon Her Majesty giving the Grand Trunk Railway twelve months' notice in writing of such termination, and that after the execution of the said amending agreement, as far as it shall always be held to be a part of the agreement confirmed by this Act, provided that this Act shall not come into force unless or until the said further agreement shall be executed as above provided for; and a copy shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State, whereupon a proclamation shall be made by the Governor General, and published in the Canada Gazette, bringing the Act into force.

That amendment, if incorporated in the schedule to the bill, will always put it in the power of the government, whatever government it may be, to terminate the traffic arrangement made with the Grand Trunk upon twelve months' notice. The arrangement continues for the period mentioned, subject to be terminated in this way. It does not confer any additional power upon the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but it does confer upon the government, for the time being, at any time during the period for which the traffic arrangement has to run, the power to terminate upon the notice being given.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Without any claim for damages?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly not.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Then the government can terminate the arrangement that no unconsigned freight can be given to any other railway except the Grand Trunk?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, a free hand as far as any traffic is concerned.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Under this arrangement, the government could not take away the power which they have of obliging them to give everything to the Grand Trunk in preference to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It terminates the present traffic arrangement and puts it in the power of the parties to make a new arrangement, which could also be cancelled in the same way.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Do I understand that provides for cancelling the whole arrangement, or does it make it optional that they can give notice and cancel the whole arrangement or any part of it?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is the whole, or any part.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The traffic arrangements could be cancelled at any time by giving twelve months' notice.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The whole arrangement?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, and the parties may make a new arrangement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It gives power to the government to give twelve months' notice to abrogate any portion of the contract, and it will rest with the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Grand Trunk to enter into a further contract, whatever that may be, and in the meantime the present arrangement stands.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That might go on the notice paper, so that we can read it carefully. No one grasps the full meaning of a document like that upon hearing it read.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am quite ready to agree to that, if there is any way of doing it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It can go on as a notice of an amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am prepared to do that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—It appears this is to be supplementary to the traffic arrangement; that it is to be incorporated with it or be part of the traffic agreement. We have not that traffic agreement before us. There is only one copy within the walls of this chamber. I have not been able to get a copy of it up to the present moment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are several copies of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The simplest way to become possessed of it would be to do with the traffic agreement what we are doing with the amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I sent my copy down to the Bureau and told them to print 100 copies, and I think I can send them up.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I have just been handed a copy by an hon. senator. I have been endeavouring, up to the present time, to obtain one and could not. The copy I have before me is marked "strictly confidential."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have several not marked strictly confidential.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—This copy was handed to me by one of the railway men, and it is a usual thing to mark such documents confidential; otherwise they would go all over the country.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—That is a most deplorable declaration to be made to this chamber—that members could not get information with reference to this agreement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Printing Committee might have ordered that it be printed and distributed. We laid it on the table of the Senate for information the same as any other document, and the hon. gentleman could have moved to have it printed if he so desired.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—A more outrageous thing I never heard of.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Reports are laid on the table and that is the last we hear of them. A report is laid on the table, and in fifteen minutes it is gone, God knows where. We should have some means of examining the report. A report the other day disappared in five minutes and could not be found. I think there should be some means of permitting members to see these returns.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am reliably informed that the copy which was in the hands of one of our colleagues comes from a Grand Trunk source and was printed by them for the necessities of their business, in order that the employees, who have something to do with the traffic arrangements, could peruse it. That is the reason why they put the words "strictly confidential" on it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—While we are talking about getting information, I think I should ask the government to give us the statement promised by the late Minister of Justice two years ago, when this subject was before the Senate. They leased the road and promised us they would keep strict account of the earnings and expenses of the running of the road for the year. We have not that here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We gave all the information it was possible to obtain.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not blame the present Minister of Justice, but he is responsible, to a certain extent, for the acts of his predecessor. I am not going to vote for this measure until I know what bargain we are making. We were promised this information, and I look for it now before we sanction this bill. I would like to have this information before I say what I intend to say on this question.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman for Rideau has made a complaint for which there is a certain amount of foundation. Papers are, in the ordinary course of business, sent up stairs to the clerk of routine proceedings, and from his office they go the clerk of the Joint Committee of Printing of both Houses, and there is not an opportunity for members of the House to consult the papers before they go to the Joint Committee on Printing, which there should be, and that is a matter which the Joint Committee might consider. I presume we shall sit this evening. I propose to continue the debate, but it is now six o'clock. I have just received from Mr. Wainwright a letter which I will read to the House, and I have no doubt the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) will be pleased to have a difficulty which caused him a great deal of worry, explained and removed. The letter reads:

MY DEAR SENATOR,—Mr. Ferguson is making some capital out of my evidence given before the commission where it reads I stated the company could borrow money at three per cent. I did not say the company could borrow at such a rate, but that I knew the government could. When I saw the evidence in print I saw the mistake, but too late to correct it. We cannot and never could borrow at any such price, and our four per cent debentures with all the boom have only reached about 108. Please see he is put right on this. Yours truly,

A. WAINWRIGHT.

Senator POWER.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—It is not marked "confidential."

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is not necessary to ask any information.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not asking any.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—How long has this amendment which the Minister of Justice proposes been agreed to?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I saw Mr. Wainwright on Tuesday night of last week, and discussed the matter the next day with the the Minister of Railways and my hon. friend opposite.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The hon. gentleman has been in possession of it three or four days?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And the hon. leader of the opposition has been in possession of it, and the press.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I want to know if this House has been discussing this question for two or three days with that new amendment in the possession of the Minister of Justice. It is a new proposal entirely. It gives the government power to cancel the agreement on a year's notice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What does the hon. gentleman desire to know?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—When did the government come to this conclusion?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I communicated this fact to my hon. friend opposite, and he also had it from Mr. Wainwright himself. I communicated the fact to him and the matter was entirely in his hands.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Whose hands?

Hon. Mr. MILLS.—In the hands of the leader of the opposition. It was a proposition we were ready to accept, and a change we were ready to make if it was acceptable to the opposition and they desired it when the bill went into committee. That is all I can say to the hon. gentleman with regard to it. I have dealt with it exactly as such agreements are always dealt with, when such amendments are the matter of correspondence between the leaders on opposite sides of the House.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I take exception to that. I have no leader in this House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman's leader is outside.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—That document should be laid on the table and not put in the hands of a senator.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman forgets this fact, that it was not a matter that I was called upon to submit to the House at all.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The hon. gentleman's duty, as leader of the government, should have forced him to submit it to the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know my duty quite as well as the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman says his leader is outside of the House. We all know that. This was a matter of correspondence between my hon. friend opposite and myself, if by that amendment the bill would be made acceptable to hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. Whether it would be submitted at all or whether it would be the subject of discussion here at all, might depend wholly upon the action which the supporters of my hon. friend might take. That was the position of things. The hon. gentleman undertakes to lecture me about what I shall propose or not propose. If my hon. friend supported the government I might consult with him, but I know he is bitterly hostile, and I could make no proposition to him that would be acceptable, and I discussed the matter with the hon. leader of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I say it is the duty of the government, when they make changes, to lay them before the Senate. I am prepared to support the hon. minister on every measure with reference to the issues which they went to the country on and came into power on, but I am not prepared to support him on measures which have not been presented to the country, and, in my opinion, not in the country's interest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman misapprehends the position. We have the bill and the agreement and schedule, and it passed the House of Commons, and it has been said that it was a monstrous proposition to tie the matter up for 100 years. That question was discussed in the press, and it was stated that it would alter it very much if the government had power to terminate the arrangement and the Grand Trunk said that if that amendment was made in the Senate they would not object.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Why was it not presented to the Senate?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It could not be made until the bill was read a second time.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—My hon. friend from Marshfield and myself and others have been discussing this question for two days without knowing about this amendment. If that is the way the government are going to trifle with the Senate, all right, but I will not be humbugged in that way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am afraid the remarks of the hon. leader of the government is likely to leave a misapprehension on the minds of many as to the part I played in this transaction. After the speech which I had made in the Senate, particularly upon this branch of the contract, I was called upon by Mr. Wainwright and Mr. Hays, who expressed their very great surprise at the stand which I had taken, which he predicated upon some remarks or conversation which I had with himself and the president of the company a year ago. I said he was quite correct in his recollection of that conservation, but that events had transpired altogether different from what existed at the time. Then, Mr. Wainwright said, "Your principal objection appears to be to that 40th clause which binds the government to a ninety-nine year contract." I said, "That is one of them, and to my mind one of the most objectionable provisions. That is setting aside the general policy." He said, "We are quite willing to have that repealed and leave it in the hands of the government." There ended our conversation. Subsequently he submitted an amendment to me. I think there was something else added to it. He showed it to me and I said, "I do not think it goes so far as those who object to the bill would desire, even if they accepted the bill." That is the full extent of my intercourse with these gentlemen. The only correspondence between the Minister of Justice and myself was the note he sent to me asking me if I proposed to move any amendment? My answer was no, as I had informed Mr. Wainwright that the terms on which he asked us to accept the amendment were not such as would be demanded and accepted by those with whom I was acting. My hon. friend will understand that, as far as I was concerned, I never agreed to accept that amendment. We could not help holding conversation with gentlemen who came to discuss matters with us in order to explain away the objections which we had taken to the bill, and I presume the Minister of Justice is in the same position. I have reason to think that Mr. Wainwright and those interested consulted the government, and my hon. friend wrote me a note asking whether I intended to accept that amendment or to move it, and I have given the House the answer. Speaking for myself, the amendment is not what I would accept, and I told him the only thing which would be acceptable by those opposed to the bill, and his reply was: "That would be given you the cake, and letting you eat it."

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EXTENSION.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL gave notice that when the House is in committee on Bill (138) "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal," he will move the following amendment:—

That the first and second sections of said bill be stricken out, and the following be substituted therefor:—

1. The agreement set forth in the schedule to this Act between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada hereinafter called "the company," and Her Majesty, except the 40th clause thereof (the said agreement excepting that clause being hereinafter called "the main agreement") is hereby declared to have been and to be valid and binding in all respects subject to the following qualifications and conditions and to the happening of the following events, that is to say:

(a.) The main agreement to be confirmed by the shareholders of the company in the regular way.

(b.) The making of an agreement within days after the passing of this Act between Her Majesty and the company (which agreement is hereinafter referred to as the new agreement) to the following effect, that is to say: That so long as the main agreement remains in force and irrespective of any traffic arrangement between the parties as to any other matter, and without any further consideration from Her Majesty than the continuance of the main agreement, percentage division via Chaudière Junction shall be suspended and Montreal shall be the junction point for all traffic originating throughout the company's system or connection west of Montreal and offered for shipment for any points on the Intercolonial Railway or reached by its connections, and the company shall route all such traffic via Montreal and the Intercolonial Railway, and all traffic controlled by the company originating either in the city of Montreal or on the Montreal joint section and destined to points on the Intercolonial Railway, shall be considered Intercolonial traffic, and the company shall forward it by the Intercolonial route; and also, that except as to the said provisions for so routing traffic as aforesaid (which provisions are to remain in force concurrently with the main agreement), the traffic arrangement now existing and referred to in the said 40th clause and every other traffic arrangement between Her Majesty and the company made at any time in lieu thereof or supplemental or in addition thereto or irrespective thereof or otherwise howsoever in respect to traffic on or to or from the Intercolonial Railway, shall be terminable on months' notice from Her Majesty; and also, that the said 40th clause is to be of no effect and not binding on either of the parties, and that except as otherwise provided for by the new arrangement, the supplemental traffic arrangement referred to in the said 40th clause shall remain in force.

(c.) A copy of the new agreement to be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State, after which such new agreement shall be always held to be a part of and embodied in the main agreement.

2. It shall be lawful for Her Majesty, and for the company, to do whatever is necessary to the carrying out on her part, and its part, of all the provisions contained in the main agreement according to the true intent and meaning thereof.

3. Upon the main agreement being approved by the shareholders as aforesaid, the line of railway and the property described in and leased by the main agreement shall be and become part of the Intercolonial Railway, and shall be operated as such in so far as may be consistent with and subject to the terms of the main agreement.

4. This Act shall not come into force until after the deposit of the said copy in the office of the Secretary of State as aforesaid, nor until the Governor General shall, after such deposit, make a proclamation to be published in the Canada Gazette, naming a day on which this Act is to come into force, after which it shall come into force on the day so named.

He said:—In giving this notice of motion, it will be observed that it abrogates the 40th clause of the supplemental agreement into which the government has entered with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. In addition to that, it provides, first, that east bound traffic shall, during the continuance of the lease, he handed over to the "Intercolonial Railway at what is termed the junction point," namely, Montreal; and it also gives the same power to the government which is given them in the notice of motion proposed by the hon. Minister of Justice, the right to terminate any traffic arrangements into which the government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company may at any time have entered upon a certain notice being given. I have left out, in two cases, the limitation of time in the first clause, which would be of shorter date, and in the one in reference to changing the traffic arrangements, to the term of three or six months or longer if it were deemed advisable. This, if passed, will secure for all time to come—that is during the term of the lease—the right of the east bound traffic to the Intercolonial, leaving it with the government of the day to alter, change, amend and adjust traffic regulations as the necessities of trade may demand, reserving, however, the perpetual—if I may use that expression because it is perpetual so far our lives are concerned—the perpetual right to the Intercolonial to the east bound traffic. We who have had strong objections to the whole policy of the government are asking no more in that amendment than we think was promised—in fact documentary evidence shows was promised—by the Grand Trunk Railway people themselves, and was so understood by the Minister of Railways when he entered into his first arrangement for the leasing of that portion of the road which gives the Intercolonial access to Montreal. We base that opinion upon a statement which has been read before, and which I desire to put on record again in connection with the proposition which has been made. In the special committee on the Drummond County Railway inquiry, we find Mr. Borden, in questioning Mr. Wainwright, asked this question, "Do you regard these changes as important?"—that is, the changes to which I will refer in a few moments, changes in the original agreement entered into between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway, changes which were made and conceded by the Grand Trunk Railway shortly after the rejection of the bill by this House. Mr. Borden asked:

Q. Do you regard these changes as important?

Mr. Wainright replied.

Yes I regard the change of handing over the traffic at Montreal and shutting up our line to Lévis as a great concession to the government.

By Mr. Haggart:

Q. That entered as part of the consideration into the bargain?—A. We did not think it did. We did not have that idea at the time when we agreed to it.

By Mr. Blair:

Q. We claimed that was the true and proper interpretation. Did I not claim that was what the language was intended to mean?—A. You certainly claimed that.

From that examination it must be clear to the minds of those who read it, that Mr. Blair at the time, as Minister of Railways and Canals, was of the opinion that he had obtained the concession to which Mr. Wainwright referred in his evidence, as a part of "the consideration" for the rentals, &c., which the government was to pay for the use of the Grand Trunk Railway road and the terminus at Montreal; that is, of securing all the east bound traffic, originating in Montreal or west of Montreal, to points on the Intercolonial Railway. That is still more strongly confirmed in my own mind, and I think will be in the mind of every senator when I read a memorandum which I made last year, a duplicate of which was supplied to me this year in the month of March, by the manager and assistant manager of the Grand Trunk Railway. I intimated the other day, when speaking in reply to some remark made by the Minister of Justice, that I was called upon by Mr. Hays and also by Mr. Wainwright last year in reference to the position which the Senate had taken, and myself in particular, in regard to the bill, then before the House, for the acquisition of the Drummond County Railway, and the acquiring of the right to use that portion of the Grand Trunk Railway from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal. They themselves pointed out to me that great concessions had been made on the part of the Grand Trunk Railway to the government in addition to what they contended they were entitled to in the original agreement. That, to me, as I suppose it would be to most other members of the Senate, if not the whole of them, was new information. They repeated to me at the time what those concessions were. I made a memorandum of them, read them over to Mr. Hays and asked him if I was permitted to use them in case it was necessary to do so in the debate in the Senate. They said I was quite at liberty to do so. That memo. I had mislaid when I arrived at the opening of Parliament this year, and then I consulted the same authorities and asked them if they would kindly duplicate the memo. so that I could lay it before the Senate in case I thought necessary to do so in any discussion that might arise. I shall now read that memo. in order that the Senate may learn this important fact that they themselves—that is the Grand Trunk Railway authorities in this country—were of the opinion that they were making concessions, that they had made the concessions which we are now seeking in the amendment which I am about to ask the Senate to consider. It is as follows:—

Memorandum of changes made in agreement between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company for trackage rights over the line between Ste. Rosalie and Montreal and terminal facilities.

The Grand Trunk Railway Company agree to hand over all traffic for Intercolonial points to the government railway at Montreal, and to take out their Chaudière Division. This is a concession which virtually destroys the Grand Trunk Railway line between Richmond and Lévis excepting for local business, and gives the Intercolonial Railway all the earnings between Montreal and Lévis on the traffic.

There is a clear, distinct and positive statement that the arrangement into which they had entered secured to the Intercolonial Railway all the east bound traffic arising west of Montreal or at Montreal; and mark, in all these discussions, and in the discussion that took place in the Commons, to which I have referred, and in the memo. which I have read, there is not the slightest intimation of any arrangement, nor had we any intimation of it last year or the year before, of the disposition of west bound traffic arising in Europe or any place on the Intercolonial Railway bound westward. So that was not an element which entered into our consideration at all. The second and third paragraphs are:

2. The Grand Trunk Railway Company agree in regard to betterments that in the event of any expenditure being considered necessary the government shall first agree, and then instead of paying 5 per cent on one-half of such expenditure they shall only pay 4 per cent on their proportion based on wheelage, or if they prefer their proportion in cash.

3. The Grand Trunk Railway Company have also made the concession of allowing the Intercolonial Railway to handle local business at points between Montreal and Ste. Rosalie and to receive the proceeds. This is a concession never before agreed to in any trackage agreements with railway companies.

The Senate will remember that when that contract was under discussion two years ago, we contended on the reading of the terms of the contract, that they had not the right to handle local business—that the only right they had was to send their trains carrying through traffic and that no local business was to be done. The Minister of Railways at that time, if my recollection serves me right, contended that, with reference to east bound freight, they were entitled to all the traffic. However, this memo., furnished by the Grand Trunk Railway officials themselves, shows that if there was any doubt about this in the past, they made the concessions.

4. The Grand Trunk Railway Company have also agreed to consider the line to Jacques Cartier Junction, although about fifteen miles from Montreal, a part of the arrangement in order to give the government line a direct connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

5. Other concessions have been agreed to in regard to divisions of rates for business arising in Ontario which will benefit the Intercolonial Railway.

The last paragraphs, two, three and four, are not altogether pertinent to the subject before the Senate at the present moment, but I thought it well to put the Senate in possession of all the information that I could glean in reference to this arrangement. What I want more particularly to impress on the minds of hon. members, in order that they can understand more easily the proposition which is now before them, is the fact that in all the communications and in all the investigations which have been held, it was distinctly understood that east bound traffic and freight was to go to the Intercolonial Railway without any quid pro quo except rentals. What we propose is to secure that for ninety-nine years, in case the agreement becomes law, leaving it with the government to take the responsibility of making whatever traffic arrangements they please, and if these traffic arrangements are of a character which are not consistent with the interests of the general public, they will be held responsible by Parliament and by the people. I think I have made the explanation—unusual I know it is in presenting a notice of motion—but in a matter of grave importance I thought it well to give the reasons which actuate those who have consented to place that amendment to the bill upon the notice paper for consideration after the debate has taken place.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not had time to examine the motion. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he could state in what respect the amendment which he now proposes differs from the amendment to which the Grand Trunk Railway has given its assent and which I read yesterday?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Those who have read the amendment of which the hon. gentleman gave notice would scarcely require that explanation. The amendment, as I understand, is simply this, that it abrogates, or repeals that portion of the 40th clause which makes the traffic arrangements or any supplemental arrangements which may be made hereafter perpetual, or rather as long as the lease continues, and not to be abrogated or repealed or amended unless by mutual consent. That is the agreement into which the government have entered. The hon. gentleman's proposition, I understand, is to give power to the government to annul that agreement and to enter into any other supplemental agreement. The difference between that and this proposition is that while it gives the government the power which the hon. gentleman proposes to give them to change the traffic arrangements whenever they deem it necessary, they cannot do so without securing for the whole time of the ninety-nine years the east bound traffic. The majority of the House, I think I am safe to say, if it were a simple question of accepting or rejecting in its original state the agreement into which they have entered and the policy which they have laid down, would reject it, and that is no more than we have a right to expect, in view of the memorandum which I have read to the House, and in view of the opinion held by the hon. Minister of Railways when he entered into the agreement. There is a substantial difference between the two. While we repeal the 40th clause in toto, it is held in force until this new arrangement can be made; and then, instead of adopting the two first clauses, we propose to make the proposed amendment part of the bill so that it will become law de facto, and unalterable except by Parliament.

SUPPLY BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (106) "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the public service for the financial years ending respectively the 30th June, 1899, and the 30th June, 1900, and for other purposes relating to the public service."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the bill be read the second time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think that the Minister of Justice should make some explanation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The explanation is very obvious. Supplies are required. The current year has begun to run, and it is necessary that a certain proportion of the appropriation should be made at once available. The amount that is voted in the bill is $6,981,785. Hon. gentlemen know that the Indian annuities are all to be paid at this season of the year, and the Indian tribes all over the country are assembling for that purpose, and there are also large sums of interest accruing to be paid, and it is important that the funds for these purposes should be immediately available.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand that this is to pay sums that had fallen due prior to the 30th of June? We all know that the financial year ends on the 30th June each year, and unless there is an appropriation to meet the expenditures they have lapsed, or to provide for a portion of the current year's expenditure, that the Auditor General would not pass any accounts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is this to cover amounts past due for which there is no appropriation and for any portion of the present year, or for both purposes? And is it during this month, or how long? Is it a twelfth portion of the estimates for the year?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand it covers one-tenth of the estimates for the year commencing on the 1st July.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is probably a twelfth.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know the exact proportion. No moneys can be paid out after the 1st July without the authority of Parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We are not to understand that this $7,000,000 is a tenth of the estimates for the coming year? It would be very small.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It covers the supplemental estimates of last year, which have been before the House of Commons for some time. It is usual to vote a tenth or twelfth, or whatever the fraction is.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second and third time and passed.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (146) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Department of the Geological Survey."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the bill be read the second time on Monday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman give us an explanation of the bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The bill provides certain amendments to the Geological Survey Act. No person shall be appointed to the department under the class schedule A in the civil service, unless he is a scienced graduate of either a foreign or a Canadian University, or some other recognized science school of standing. That has reference to those who are employed in the Geological Survey.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the scientific branch?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. Then no person shall be appointed until he serves a probationary term of one year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think there is more than that in the bill. What I object to in this bill is giving power and authority to a deputy head which should only be exercised by the head. I cannot understand a divided authority in the management of any one department. No one who has presided over a department for any length of time would consent to allow a deputy to dismiss any officer without first reporting to him. He has, if I understand this bill, the power to do that. The duty of a deputy head, if he finds one of these officers to which this bill refers incompetent, or unfitted for his position, to report to the minister, and the minister should be held responsible for whatever action he may take.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Has he not to do that?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It reads:

> During which probationary period he may be rejected by the head of the department or by the deputy head.

The deputy head has the power to reject him. Then the clause provides:

> But if he be not rejected, the deputy head shall, at the expiration of the probationary period, signify to the head of the department in writing, that he considers the person so appointed competent for the duties of the office and the appointment shall become permanent.

The deputy head has the power, without any reason at all other than his own opinion, to dismiss any gentleman who may be appointed as provided in this bill, but if he is found to be qualified, then the deputy head reports and he shall be appointed. The deputy head is a bigger man, with more power, than the head himself.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—He very often is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the head never should place himself in the position not to be able to say to the deputy head, "So far shalt thou go and no further."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So far as the general principle is concerned, I quite agree with the view which the hon. leader of the opposition has expressed, that the department, with regard to permanent officers, can only have one responsible head, and that is the minister who is responsible to Parliament and the country; but with regard to specialists, the head of the department of the Geological Survey is a specialist. In fact, all the officers employed must be specialists and fitted for the purpose.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The deputy heads are not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The deputy has a recognized head. That is Dr. Dawson. He is the deputy for that purpose. I might say to the hon. gentleman that with regard to probationary officers it would not be an unusual thing at all to give to the deputy minister power to say that such a party, who is probationary in the department, is wholly unfit for his work, and should be dispensed with. I will not say how far that is a departure from the principle the hon. gentleman has laid down, nor is there any special reason, perhaps, for giving to the deputy in this matter a larger power than deputies usually possess over officers, but officers are generally permanent officers in the department. They are not probationers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the deputy head has the power now, under the Civil Service Act, to suspend an officer and to report to his chief?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If he himself is unfitted, the deputy head is the only man who could know that. What I object to is that he should have the power to dismiss him, relieving the head of the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that there is not much responsibility in the matter, because the head of the geological branch is the person who judges of the qualification of the party, and when upon his trial as a probationer, he is the party who judges of his fitness and the minister acts upon a report from the deputy? My hon. friend knows we are discussing this upon the first reading of the bill, and that the discussion generally takes place upon the second reading.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understood the hon. gentleman moved the second reading.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—For Monday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad I called the attention of the hon. gentleman to it, because when the bill was discussed in the other House I thought it was a new doctrine. The hon. gentleman knows the objections I have and the reasons, and I hope he will make up his mind to make the change.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (153) "An Act to amend the Unorganized Territories Game Preservation Act, 1894."—(Mr. Mills.)

Bill (149) "An Act further to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894."—(Mr. Scott.)

Bill (147) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the Department of the Interior."—(Mr. Scott)

Bill (148) "An Act further to amend the Dominion Lands Act."—(Mr. Scott.)

Bill (139) "An Act respecting the Nova Scotia Steel Co., Ltd."—(Mr. Power.)

YUKON TERRITORY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Before the orders of the day are called I beg leave to introduce a bill to amend the Yukon Territory Act. There are certain provisions of that Act which I purpose to amend so as to remove any doubt as to powers possessed by the government in respect to the government of the territory. I also provide, in addition to that, for an appeal from the High Court in that country to the Supreme Court in British Columbia, giving it an appellate jurisdiction in respect to controversies that arise in the Yukon Territory similar to those which the Court of Queen's Bench in Manitoba has in respect to appeals from the Territories. At present there is but one judge in the Yukon country, and in all probability it will be necessary immediately to appoint a second, but in order to give that court power to dispose finally of all questions that might come before them, subject to appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada, it would be necessary to appoint at least three judges.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am speaking of the Yukon country. That may be unnecessary. Of course we cannot say precisely how large a population will be in that country as a permanent population, nor can we say what may be the extent of litigation. We know this very well that so far as questions that arise there are concerned they will, many of them, be very important. Important questions of law will be dealt with in the litigation which arises, and in many cases for very considerable amounts, and that being so it is necessary that an appeal should be given to some court of high standing, and the Supreme Court of British Columbia is the most accessible.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there a Supreme Court in British Columbia? I thought it was the Superior Court and you could appeal from it to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is a Supreme Court in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So there is in Ontario, that is the title of the court. It is the Supreme Court of British Columbia, and the other is the Supreme Court of Canada. I have stated in general terms what the object of the bill is. Power is given to impose municipal taxation. That is a necessary power, but under our constitutional system it has never been exercised except through the instrumentality of the elective body. It is a power which is not derived from the Crown or from Parliament, but from the people who elect representatives to Parliament and so long as the council in the Territories continues to be an appointed council you cannot, with due regard to our constitutional system, confer upon them the power of taxation. But the municipal body elected by the electors, whoever they may be, for the purpose of municipal government, deriving their authority from the people, may impose taxes upon them.

The bill was read the first time.

THIRD READING.

Bill (113) "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Mining and Metallurgical Company, Limited."—(Mr. McKay.)

THE INTERCOLONIAL EXTENSION BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the second reading (Bill 138) "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal," and on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Perley, That the said bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. POWER said:—The position of this question has undergone some modification since I moved the adjournment of the debate—at least our knowledge of the position is somewhat different from what it was then. However, I think it is better not to anticipate what the result of the notice given to-day by the hon. leader of the opposition may be, but to go on and deal with the measure before the House as I think the Senate ought to deal with it. This is a measure which is chiefly financial in its character, and in as far as it is not financial, is it administrative. It is concerned with the carrying on of the public business of the country, with the administration of one of the great departments of the government. The House of Commons is the proper place to deal with the financial aspect of the question; and they have dealt with it and decided that this is a measure which should pass. The administration of this country is placed in the hands of the government and next to the government, I suppose, in the hands of the House of Commons; and I do not think that, as a rule, the Senate is supposed to have very much to do with the administration of the departments of the government. If those departments are conducted in a way which secures the confidence of the other chamber we, as a rule, have not very much to say about them. It has never been contended that this chamber was a chamber which was supposed to administer the government of the country. I consequently think, when a measure of the character of that which is now before the Senate, comes here, it is the duty of this House to pass it (Hear, hear.) Hon. gentlemen might wait until I get through. I am very far from saying that it is the duty of this House to pass every government measure that comes here; but I say it is the duty of this House, having regard to its position in the country, to pass every measure which comes here once it is reasonably clear that the going into operation of that measure is not calculated to do serious injury to the public interest. Unless it can be shown with reasonable clearness that the adoption of this measure, which has now been passed twice substantially by the other House, is likely to do serious injury to the public interest, I think it is the duty of this House to pass the measure. If it is clear to any one who looks at the measure with an unprejudiced eye, that it is sure, or nearly sure to do serious mischief to the country, or if there is overwhelming evidence that there has been corruption or other misdoing in connection with the measure, then it may become the duty of the Senate to reject it. And, again, if the measure, taking it as a whole, is a good measure, and calculated to benefit the country, and if it be defaced by certain objectionable features, it is the duty and the function of this House not to destroy it, but to amend it by removing the objectionable features. Having regard to these considerations it is our duty to look at this bill from as judicial a standpoint as we can assume. Now, what is the object of this measure? The object is to give to the Intercolonial Railway a satisfactory connection with Montreal, which is the commercial capital of Canada, and through the commercial capital with the remaining portion of the country. This is a proposal which, at the first blush at any rate, commends itself to the average citizen. It has apparently commended itself to the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition in this House, and to the hon. gentleman from Brandon—that is, the measure as a whole, carrying the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal—but it does not seem to commend itself to the hon. gentleman from Sackville (Mr. Wood). That hon. gentleman has told the House that he is totally opposed to the government ownership of railways. The opinion of the hon. gentleman I am rather disposed to share; but, after all, politics are practical things, and the hon. gentleman does not pretend that he could get a single member in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island to advocate the handing over of the Intercolonial Railway to a private company. It is just a mere pious opinion and of no practical consequence.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I did not advocate the handing over of the Intercolonial Railway to private parties. I only spoke of past history, and said that would justify private ownership.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman declared that he was opposed to the government owning railways. Now, if the hon. gentleman is to be consistent, his only logical course is to advocate that the government shall get rid of this railway which they own; but the hon. gentleman has not the courage of his convictions. He expresses an opinion? He gives arguments to influence the House in order to make the House agree with his opinion, but then he says he does not want to carry his opinion to its logical conclusion, so I say the hon. gentleman's interruption shows that what I stated is absolutely correct.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman or to get into a controversy with him, but I must say he is entirely misrepresenting the position I took. I did not advocate the handing over of the Intercolonial Railway to a company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not assert that the hon. gentleman did. I am drawing a logical conclusion from the hon. gentleman's argument. If it is a bad thing for the country to own the Intercolonial Railway, if it has been mischievous in the past and will be mischievous in the future, then the hon. gentleman should advocate that the government should get rid of it as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—This may apply when the question of the disposal of the Intercolonial Railway comes up.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I put the natural construction on the hon. gentleman's language. The hon. gentleman now gives the House to understand that he did not mean that his language should convey its ordinary meaning to those to whom he spoke. As I say, it was a mere pious opinion of the hon. gentleman, and I do not see that it had any business in the discussion. The hon. gentleman has admitted that the people prefer public ownership. The hon. gentleman may have given expression to that opinion for this purpose. He admitted that we own the road as far as Lévis. The hon. gentleman does not like public ownership, but he is not going to object to it as far as Lévis; but when it comes to carrying the public ownership 170 miles further, when the railway, which has been more or less of an incubus as far as the public treasury is concerned at any rate, may, by its extension to Montreal, be made to pay, and cease to be an incubus, then he objects to that extension. But the hon. gentleman must see that if this extension changes the character of the Intercolonial Railway, and is the means of making it a smaller burden than it has been in the past, the evil of public ownership is diminished; and I contend that the effect of this measure will be just that, that it will diminish the drain on the public treasury for the operating of the Intercolonial Railway. Every one admits that up to the present time the Intercolonial Railway has not been, directly at any rate, a paying investment. Whether it has paid indirectly or not is another question. A great many people think that, looking at the facilities which it has given for intercourse between the different parts of the Dominion and the low rates of freight which it has afforded to the inhabitants of the whole country, on the whole it has been a benefit and that the money expended on it has not been altogether injudiciously spent. But I think now—the hon. gentleman from Sackville I think agrees in that view, that the Intercolonial has reached a position when people begin to feel that it is time the condition of things which has hitherto existed should change. I contend that if, by paying $1,600,000 for the Drummond County Railway and $140,000 a year (something over $4,000,000) for the Ste. Rosalie portion of the Grand Trunk and the Victoria bridge and the terminal facilities at Montreal, we can stop this continual drain on the public treasury for the maintenance of the Intercolonial, the money will be well invested. The hon. gentleman, and some other hon. gentlemen, spoke as though the traffic with which the Intercolonial had to do was chiefly through traffic—that is ocean borne traffic. It is true that the ocean borne traffic is a matter of some consequence, but that is not, in the case of the Intercolonial Railway at any rate, by any means the most important part of the road's business. The business of the Intercolonial is a local business—local in the sense that it does not go beyond the Dominion as a rule; but the number of passengers and the quantity of freight carried from Montreal down to the lower provinces increases every year. As the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton pointed out the other day, what is in fact a through business is likely by and by to develop at the eastern extremity of the line — that is the business with Newfoundland is likely to increase. Without dwelling on the freight which goes to Europe and which is generally spoken of as the through freight or of that which goes to the West Indies, the business of the Intercolonial Railway is a very important one. I only mention this by the way, because some hon. gentlemen seem to think that the through traffic is the important thing. It really is not, as far as the Intercolonial is concerned.

When we come to deal with a question such as the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal, we would naturally take the opinion of the people who should know most about the matter, as to what the effect of the extension would be. Who are the people who ought to know most about what the probable effect of the extension to Montreal would be? I should say that they are the gentlemen who have been managing the Intercolonial Railway for a number of years. I do not say anything about the minister, although the minister is a man of marked ability and business capacity, and he appears to have realized, almost immediately after he came into office, that this railway, which is one of the principal subjects over which he has jurisdiction, needed extension to Montreal to make it what it ought to be.

But I leave him aside altogether, and I take gentlemen like Mr. Schreiber and Mr. Pottinger. Mr. Schreiber has been connected with the Intercolonial Railway, off and on, ever since about 1867, or shortly after that. Mr. Pottinger has grown up in the service of the Intercolonial. These gentlemen are not public partisans, as far as I am aware. I do not know anything about the politics of one of the gentlemen ; the other I know to be a Conservative, but these gentlemen agree and the subordinate officers in the employment of the Intercolonial agree, that this extension is a desirable thing. They are in favour of it. I do not know that it is necessary to quote authority for it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We will take that for granted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We can find Mr. Schreiber's opinion in various places in the Drummond County Railway Committee report. At pages 74 and 75, he said amongst other things :

I believe it to be a great advantage to have our trains running freight into a big mercantile city like Montreal, and that we would be more likely to capture traffic there than we would at Lévis.

The hon. gentleman who represents the county of Westmoreland in the other chamber took the grcund, which has been taken here by the hon. gentleman from Sackville, that Lévis would have done just as well. There is another authority to whom I had better, perhaps, refer, and that is the gentleman who was a little while ago Minister of Railways in the Conservative administration. He was examined before this Drummond County Committee, and here is what he said on this subject, at page 150 :

I entertained favourably, at that time, an opinion of the extension of the road for a good many reasons. We had trouble making connections with the Grand Trunk Railway ; we had a great deal of trouble with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I thought it was in the interests of the country that the road should be extended to Montreal. That was my personal idea at the time.

And then he gives, on page 151, the reason why the negotiations ceased—perhaps one can hardly call them negotiations—but the reason why he did not go any further. He said :

The Finance Minister objected to it. He was not objecting to the scheme but to the expenditure of any money.

That was the reason why the late Minister of Railways did not proceed with the work of securing the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal. Then at page 152 the ex-Minister of Railways dealt with one or two other schemes. He had considered the question of utilizing the Grand Trunk and the South Shore Road, but he did not think that either of these was the best way. He was asked this question :

And you think still that the Intercolonial should get into Montreal ?—A. Yes.

Q. In order to make it a success it should get into a business centre like Montreal ?—A. Yes, that was my idea. * * * * * The Grand Trunk was very badly managed at the time. We could not make connections and could not run through freight punctually from Montreal. For the assistance of the Intercolonial it was necessary that we should have a long haul. The Canadian Pacific agents were more active in every part of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island than the Grand Trunk, and they were diverting traffic around by the short haul, and you could not waken the other fellows up, and the Canadian Pacific agents were using their influence against us on the Intercolonial, and I thought the solution of the whole difficulty was to have our terminus in Montreal.

So it appears that not only the permanent officials of the road, but the ex-Minister of Railways as well as the present minister believe in the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, and hon. gentlemen must see, common sense indicates how important a thing it is that the whole road to its terminus—and Montreal is the natural business terminus of the Intercolonial—should be under one management. Every one who travelled over the Intercolonial in former years, when there were two managements to deal with, knows how unsatisfactory and inconvenient it was, and how very much better it is to-day that it is all under one management. The question is whether the method of extension adopted was the best. The hon. gentleman from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), thought a better plan would be to stop at Lévis, and wait until a bridge is built at Quebec, whenever that may be—and hon. gentlemen know that the bridge was not very much in sight at any rate when this arrangement was made in 1897—and make arrangements to run over the Canadian Pacific Railway into Montreal. But hon. gentlemen will see that if that was done we would still have a double management—we would not have a single management from Halifax, St. John and Sydney to Montreal, which is of vast importance. There were three methods of making the connections discussed, and this across the bridge at Quebec was a fourth. It will be remembered that in 1879 the country purchased 118 miles of the Grand Trunk Railway from Rivière du Loup to Chaudière curve, and paid for it $1,500,000, a rather higher rate than is being paid for the road which we are getting now. And the difference between the two purchases was that in the case of the Rivière du Loup section of the Grand Trunk the country got practically nothing but an embankment. There were very few steel rails on the road, and under the agreement to sell, the Grand Trunk were allowed to remove the iron rails. The road was in a bad condition. Most of the ties were rotten, and practically the government bought an embankment at a dearer rate than they are paying for the Drummond County Railway, and it cost, I think, some half million dollars to make the road satisfactory to run over, so that for that 118 miles the country paid $2,000,000. In fact it cost more than $2,000,000, but I put it at $2,000,000 because I like to be under the mark.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Did my hon. friend approve of that purchase at the time?

Hon Mr. POWER—I did. I felt that it was a matter the Senate had not much to say about. It was a matter for which the House of Commons and the government were responsible, and I thought on the whole, although we might be paying a little too much for what we were getting, that it was a step in the right direction. I am not finding fault with it now, but I call attention to the fact that that measure was passed by this House in the space of about an hour. It came down the day before prorogation, and was passed in the space of about an hour. It makes a difference whose ox is gored.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The gauge of the road was also changed, if I recollect rightly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not remember about that. I think not. I think the Grand Trunk had the standard gauge at that time. I may as well say a few words more about the Rivière du Loup section. We got to Chaudière curve by means of that purchase, with certain rights of running back over the Grand Trunk Railway from Chaudière curve into Lévis. It was felt that it was desirable that the Intercolonial Railway should get to Lévis by an independent route. The hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition in the House of Commons was at the time Minister of Public Works, which included Railways and Canals. He decided to build a branch from the Intercolonial Railway down to Lévis. That branch was 14 miles long, and that 14-mile branch cost in or about $2,000,000 first and last. That is more than we are paying for the Drummund County Railway of 133 miles. The impression was that when we got there we would, by means of the North Shore Railway, across the river, have competition with the Grand Trunk Railway, but our hopes were not realized. The Grand Trunk Railway Company got control of the North Shore Road for a while, and afterwards the North Shore Railway passed into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and that company built a line of their own to St. John, N.B., and naturally wished to take their traffic over their long haul to St. John instead of bringing it to Quebec and ferrying it across to the Intercolonial at Lévis. Railway companies are always governed by their own interests. They are like individual men in that respect, only they are more exclusively governed by their material interest, and properly so. It is the duty of the directors of a commercial corporation to do the best they can in a business way for their shareholders; and if we had the bridge to-morrow, the Canadian Pacific Railway would still send its freight down over its own long haul to St. John instead of delivering it to the Intercolonial at the bridge; so that I do not think the scheme of the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland would very materially improve the condition of the Intercolonial. There were three methods of extension proposed on the south shore of the river. One was to buy the section of the Grand Trunk, which lies between Richmond and Chaudière; another was that the government should build a road along the south shore of the St. Lawrence, and a third was that the government should take the Drummond County Railway. I am not going to enter into any long discussion on these several routes. Mr. Wainwright was examined before the Drummond County Railway Committee, and, at page 50 of the blue book, I find the following:—

Q. Of the three roads, therefore, which would you consider the cheapest and best for the government to acquire, taking it altogether, for this purpose?—A. Well, as I would like the government to have taken the Grand Trunk Railway through to Lévis, it is rather—I would, of course, have to admit, after we were out of the race, that the Drummond County Railway, with its shorter mileage and lighter grades necessary, would be worked more economically and probably make better time for the service. I am bound to admit that.

Q. Do you remember stating that you could not possibly sell the line between Ste. Rosalie and Richmond as that was part of your through line?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. Do you remember naming a sum between $2,000,000 and $2,500,000?—A. Yes, I think we put the value of the line between Lévis and Richmond at $2,000,000, and then there would have been an arrangement to have been made between Ste. Rosalie and Richmond.

Q. Don't you remember making this remark, Mr. Wainwright: That it would not exceed $2,500,000, or would not be less than $2,000,000?—A. I think my conversation with Mr. Hays was that it might probably be between $2,000,000 and $2,500,000 for the branch road between Richmond and Lévis.

Hon. gentlemen will see that the scheme, which, I understood to be endorsed the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) would cost, at the very least, $400,000 more than the plan which the government adopted, would have given us a road eleven miles longer, and a road with steep grades, and then that we should have had to make arrangements with the Grand Trunk for ninety miles from Richmond to Montreal instead of thirty-five from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal. So that, looked at from every point of view, the Drummond County Railway was a better line to take. That is plain, on the face of it, to the ordinary man; but as this is a matter about which railway men are supposed to know a little more than we do, we quote their opinions with respect. Mr. Wainwright substantially repeats what I have just read at page 55 in reply to questions from other members of the committee. Then with respect to the South Shore line, the estimates showed that its construction would cost at least $23,000 a mile, and the South Shore Road would have been fifteen miles longer than the Drummond County line; there would have been several very expensive bridges on that line, and the land damages would have been very heavy, because the road would have gone through one of the longest settled portions of the province of Quebec, and judging from our experience with reference to the St. Charles branch—that is the branch from St. Charles to Lévis—the land damages along the road would probably cost as much as the government paid for the Drummond County Road altogether. The land damages on the fourteen miles of the St. Charles branch were over $900,000. So that it is clear that any business man, looking at the thing in an impartial way, looking at it as a question of business, would have selected that method of bringing the Intercolonial into Montreal, which was selected by the government. The scheme of taking the Drummond County Road and the plan of utilizing the Grand Trunk terminals is, on the whole, one which should commend itself to this House. With regard to the Grand Trunk terminals, hon. gentlemen have raised an objection to the payment of 5 per cent interest on what those terminals cost the Grand Trunk Railway Company. But it takes two parties to make a bargain. We cannot always have our own way. The government could not fix a value upon these things. It is a case of give and take, and the question is whether the government could have done as well in any other way. The government could not have got a bridge across the St. Lawrence for anything less than a couple of million dollars at the very lowest. No sum of money would have purchased the terminal facilities which they have secured in Montreal, including the connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and then they will have, I suppose, very shortly a double track road from Ste. Rosalie in to the bridge, and I cannot help feeling that the sum of 5 per cent on the actual cost of the bridge and the estimated cost of the terminals in the city of Montreal is a very moderate rental to pay for the accommodation which the Intercolonial is getting.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The company only pay 4 per cent on the money they borrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That has not much to do with it.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—They borrow at 4 per cent and charge the government 5 per cent.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Sorel is probably the owner of several houses which are leased to tenants. He can borrow money at probably four or five per cent. Does he limit himself to five per cent on the cost of the property when he leases it? Would any one be so unreasonable as to expect to get a property at five per cent on what it costs?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The hon. gentleman is making a mistake. The government pays $140,000 a year for the lease of all the terminals and running power, but the five per cent is on the money spent for betterments. It is on capital account and not on the lease.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then I presume that the people who made the estimates did not know what they meant. Mr. Schreiber, before the bargain was entered into, made a calculation as to what rental should be paid, and he took the cost of the section of the railway and the bridge, and the estimated cost on the terminals in Montreal, and he figured that five per cent on that would be $61,500 as to part, and $62,000 I think was what the Grand Trunk Company asked for what he figured beforehand would be worth about $61,500, I do not think it is the opinion of experienced railway men that the rental which the government is paying for the Grand Trunk line is at all excessive.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—No, but the interest on the betterments is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is possible that if two people are dealing together, not on even terms, if one is in straitened circumstances, or in a hole, as they say, that person may be squeezed so that he will accept a less sum for what he is giving than he would if he were more or less independent, but as between two independent parties to a bargain, I think the government have made a very good bargain with the Grand Trunk Railway Company; and I may say now, while I think of it that the hon. gentleman who represents the county of Stanstead in the House of Commons (Mr. Mohr) who is a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, stated in another place, in connection with this matter, that this agreement was the best railway agreement that had ever been made by Canada, and that is my honest opinion. I do not propose to go into the details of these figures, but this scheme, taking it on the whole and at large, is a scheme which should commend itself to this House. Then hon. gentlemen may naturally ask why was this scheme rejected two years ago? It is claimed there have been improvements in it since, but without going into detail it is substantially the same scheme. I am not entering into the question of the improvements and I am not discussing them, but I say that though the later bargain may be better than the other, though there may be a difference, take them in their principal features and they are pretty much the same. I ask the House—and I appeal to hon. gentlemen to say whether my answer to the question is not true—why was this measure rejected by this House two years ago? One reason was that hon. gentlemen thought there had been unnecessary haste in dealing with the matter on the part of the government. Any one who heard the speeches will remember that. But the principal reason why that measure was rejected two years ago was because a great many members of the opposition were under the impression that there had been corrupt dealing between the government and the company. No hon. gentleman, I think, will deny that that was the substantial reason why the arrangement of two years ago was defeated. Hon. gentlemen will remember that we felt so suspicious about it that we appointed a committee to inquire into the matter. Our committee did not proceed very far with the inquiry, because the session was just about closing and the matter was allowed to remain over till the following session. The following session I think we appointed a committee again; but then a committee was appointed in the other House, and this Drummond County Railway question was considered carefully and at length by that committee, and the evidence which that committee took and their report is before us in the blue book, and what do we find with respect to this charge of corruption? I take the very last page of the blue book and we find the following:—

The CHAIRMAN.—If, as Mr. Haggart says, it was a matter of policy with which he agrees, the policy of bringing the road into Montreal, then the only difference is as to the price paid, and of course the question of corruption does not arise at all.

Mr. HAGGART.—That was my point of view. We never made any charges of corruption.

Mr. POWELL.—Candidly, I never heard anything in the House about corruption.

So that the element of corruption appears to have been removed. I notice the hon. gentleman from Marshfield does not seem to be quite clear about that yet; but it has not been alleged in the other House, and, except in an indirect way, it has not been charged here, that there was any corruption about the matter. We occupy a different position now from what we occupied in 1897, because this suspicion, which I think really influenced the action of this House in 1897, has been substantially removed; and there was this other thing to be said in favour of the delay at that time and of the action which this House took, that the delay would give a chance to judge of the value of the scheme from its practical working. From a business point of view, there is no doubt that the extension has improved the condition of things on the Intercolonial.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What does my hon. friend say about the term of ninety-nine years? Does he approve of that?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have not dealt with that yet. That is equivalent to a purchase almost. What do we find, hon. gentlemen? We find that the opinion of those who ought to know best is that the extension has improved the condition of things financially. If there are any people who ought to know about the effect of the change, it is the gentlemen who have charge of the railway. We find that all the officers of the road, from the lowest up to the highest, are of the opinion that the traffic has been improved by the extension, and that everything is more satisfactory. Commercial travellers, who know as much about railways as almost any other class of men except railway men, have that impression. The people of the lower provinces all feel that the extension to Montreal has made a vast improvement in the road, and that the business of the road has increased since the extension. Any hon. gentleman in this House, Conservative or Liberal, who has been in the habit of travelling over the Intercolonial Railway, who travelled over it four or five years ago and has travelled it recently, must have noticed a marked difference. There is no comparison between the passenger travel at the present time and that which passed over it four or five years ago. The hon. Secretary of State read a letter from Messrs. Schreiber and Pottinger the other day. I shall read a portion of that letter to the House. It is as follows:—

> We would also state it as our opinion that the road reaching Montreal has placed us in a much better position to do business than heretofore, and we think the result of the operations of the road for the current year is strong evidence of the advantages likely to accrue from this extension.

Then they give the figures of the earnings and working expenses for the ten months ending 30th April, and also the earnings and working expenses for the twelve months of the year before. In one case there was a net profit of $62,000, and in the other case there was a net loss of $35,000. The letter proceeds:

> So that the working for the ten months of the current year shows improved net results over the twelve months previous of $97,881.79, but it should be borne in mind that in previous years no interest has been paid on capital, whereas in the ten months ended 30th April last, rent on the extension from Lévis to Montreal of $175,000 has been paid, and charged in the working expenses, so that if figured out on the same basis on which the Intercolonial Railway has been run in the past the result will show improved net results of $272,882, which figures speak for themselves.

Now, I take it that the evidence of these gentlemen is evidence which we ought to accept. There cannot be any better evidence. It is true that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) has told us substantially that Messrs. Schreiber and Pottinger did not know what they were talking about, and that their statement was quite unreliable and wrong. I regret to be obliged to say that this statement of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield does not weigh very much with me.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend need not pass any judgment on that statement, because I never made it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not in the habit of being captious about words. I said substantially the hon. gentleman had said so. That is the fact, the hon. gentleman said there must be something wrong about the letter.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did, and it was admitted there was something wrong.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I said before, the hon. gentleman's statements do not weigh very much with me. I do not suppose that troubles the hon. gentleman at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Not the slightest.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is a fortunate man. In the first place, let me say that he has devoted a little personal attention to me, and there is no reason why I should not return the compliment, and he has also devoted some attention to other hon. gentlemen during the course of the debate, and he cannot complain, therefore, if we say something about himself. I notice that what the hon. gentleman says is always right. I never knew any hon. gentleman with whom the wish was more the father to the thought, and the hon. gentleman has never any doubt as to the truth of what the occasion makes it desirable to believe. The hon. gentleman further took occasion to refer to me the other day, saying I had sneered at him. I am not in the habit of sneering at any one; but if I may be allowed to express an opinion on the subject, there is a maxim which the hon. gentleman appears altogether to forget and that is, that a cobbler should not go beyond his last. The hon. gentleman is prompt to express the most decided opinions on any and all questions. If it be a question of law, finance, public works or what not, the hon. gentleman knows all about it, and he knows more about it than the people who have given their lives to these things. I recognize the hon. gentleman's ability and industry, but he must see that it is not possible for any one man to know more in every branch of knowledge than the people whose business it is to pursue those branches of knowledge. I believe the hon. gentleman is a farmer, and if he were to express an opinion upon the relative merits of Durhams and Herefords, or Jerseys and Holsteins, I should not venture to question his statement; but the hon. gentleman is always ready to set up his opinion on a question of law against the opinion of the best lawyers of the country, the Minister of Justice or no matter whom.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I know I do not always agree with the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not in the habit of talking of my knowledge of law, but I will say this to the hon. gentleman, that I think if he asks his friend, Mr. Borden, of Halifax, what his opinion of me in that respect is, he will find perhaps it is not so bad; with respect to statutes, at any rate. I do not claim any special merit for the thing, but it just happens that I was for several years occupied in dealing with the drafting and the amending of bills, and consequently may claim to know something about them, just on the same ground that the hon. gentleman may claim to know something about farming. Under these circumstances—I was tempted to say something about the hon. gentleman's modesty, but I will leave that aside, because it is a non-existent quantity—I say I prefer to accept the statement of Mr. Schreiber and Mr. Pottinger and the other officers of the Intercolonial Railway, and the evidence of commercial and other travellers, and the evidence of my own senses, to the fine drawn calculations of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. With the practical experience of the last year before us, to reject these measures which are now before the Senate and bring things back to where they were two years ago, would be wrong. It would be a wrongful act, an unwise act, an exceedingly unpopular act throughout the country, and calculated to damage the Senate in the popular estimation. We may have made a hit in 1897, but if we repeat what we did in 1897, instead of making a hit in the right direction we shall probably damage ourselves much in the public estimation. I am not going to trouble the House very much longer; but I say the extension in itself is a good thing. That is recognized in various parts of this blue book, which I have read, and every one, I think, recognizes the fact that it is a good thing—that is, every one that looks at it with an unjaundiced eye. Is there anything about the measure which renders it objectionable? That is the question. That has not been shown at any rate. Does the thing cost too much? I do not think it does. We are paying at the rate of $12,000 a mile for the Drummond County Railway, forty-two miles of which are up to the standard of the Intercolonial, and the other seventy miles very nearly up to that standard. It is shown in the evidence taken before this committee, that no respectable railroad has been built in the province of Quebec during recent years at so low a figure as $12,000 a mile. The accountant of the company testified that the road had cost between $1,900,000 and $2,000,000—that that was the amount which had been spent on it. Mr. Greenshields who, although he is interested, is a reputable man, said that by the time they had finished spending on it under the temporary lease, the cost of the road would be from $2,100,000 to $2,250,000. At all events, this road is a cheap road. The government could not begin to build the road at any such figure. The chief engineer and Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals prepared an estimate which figured out something between $1,500,000 and $1,600,000, but that estimate did not include what would have to be paid for right of way if the government built an independent line, and it is safe to say that that right of way would have brought up the price even in the region that the Drummond County Railway passes through to at least $2,000,000. Conceding that the extension is a good thing in itself, and is not costing too much, there is not, nowadays at any rate, any flavour of corruption in the matter. I admit an objection has been taken, and what is the objection? The only substantial objection to this measure was the one taken by the hon. leader of the opposition in his first speech on the second reading of the bill, and that is the objection to the 40th clause of the agreement between the government and the Grand Trunk, which provides for a permanent traffic arrangement. With respect to that I may say that this arrangement is at present so advantageous to the Intercolonial that the gentleman who was Minister of Finance in the other chamber expressed a desire that it should be made permanent by statute. Before saying anything further I wish to correct a misapprehension into which the hon. leader of the opposition and also the hon. gentleman from Marshfield appears to have fallen. In fact the hon. gentleman from Marshfield said broadly yesterday that the public knew nothing about this traffic arrangement and Parliament knew nothing about it until his hon. friend the leader of the opposition in this House had unearthed it. The hon gentleman from Marshfield was quite mistaken in that as he has been mistaken in a good many things. If the hon. gentleman will turn to page 77 of the blue book he will find that the traffic arrangement is referred to there by Mr. Blair. He says:

> Under the traffic agreement with the Grand Trunk we have a mileage basis with them, have we not, for western traffic. And Mr. Schreiber replies, "we now have."

On page 125 Mr. Borden asks the question:

> Q. I wish to ask a question relating to the agreement between the government and the Grand Trunk and I thought we had the agreement here, but I do not see it?—A. The new agreement is before the House. I saw it in print and got a copy of it. You can easily get it. Copy procured and filed as Exhibit No. 37.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I quoted that and said that that was the first intimation the Drummond County Railway Committee had of the new agreement.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is more than a year ago anyway.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—All the evidence was in.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No. Mr. Greenshields was examined after that, and Mr. Farwell was examined after that, so that the hon. gentleman is wrong again.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What had Mr. Farwell to do with the traffic?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman said that this information was given after the evidence was all in. I am showing that two other witnesses were examined afterwards, and he asks what has that to do with the traffic.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I said none of the witnesses who had any information to give with regard to the traffic arrangements were examined after that document was produced. They were all examined before that document was produced, except Mr. Wainwright who produced it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—At page 148 Mr. Wainwright is under examination and he is asked:

> Q. Do you know the present arrangements that were made between Mr. Hays and Mr. Harris?—A. You mean Mr. Harris and Mr. Reeve. There is an agreement, I think, between them.
>
> Q. Do you know what it is?—A. I have read it. It is a traffic agreement.
>
> Q. In that agreement, as I understand it, Mr. Wainwright, the division of through freight is calculated on a mileage of 375 from Montreal to St. John and 425 from Montreal to Halifax?—A. Well, it may be; I do not know.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That was after it was produced.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The evidence continues:

> Q. It is here? (Mr. Powell had it in his hand.) I will let you see it. I do not want to tie you down to too much detail, but I want to get the general statement.

So that the document was before that committee, and was discussed there. It was further discussed in the House of Commons, and I can give the page where the gentleman who was formerly Minister of Finance insisted that the arrangement should be made permanent by statute and should not be terminable, because he was afraid that the government might yield to the fascinations of the Delilah of the Grand Trunk and yield this precious treasure; and yet the hon. gentleman from Marshfield undertakes to tell the House that this agreement was concealed in the most disingenuous and complete way, and only for the eagle eye of the hon. leader of the opposition in this House, no one would have known anything about it. The hon. gentleman must see that the claim is perfectly unfounded. As I say, this agreement is so advantageous that the hon. gentleman who was the Minister of Finance thought it should be made permanent by statute; still, hon. gentlemen, I think there is force in the suggestion first made by the hon. leader of the opposition in this House, that permanent traffic arrangements are unusual, and that the supplementary contract which is made binding on both parties for 99 years by the 40th clause, while exceedingly advantageous at present, may in the future become disadvantageous to the country. I rejoice that the Grand Trunk Company who did not want that traffic arrangement made perpetual have consented to give the government the option of discontinuing it on a year's notice. That is a most unusual thing to do where two parties enter into an agreement, each giving value; that one party shall be allowed the option of discontinuing and the other not. I look upon the bargain, as it came to this House, as a particularly good one—as the member for Stanstead said, the best bargain ever made by the government of Canada with a railway company—but I think with this singular and exceptional provision in favour of the government, that it is a most admirable bargain and that the Senate will assume a very serious responsibility, and will damage itself very much in the eyes of the public if we reject an agreement which is so advantageous.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I am opposed to this bill for reasons altogether different from those advanced by hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this question. While I believe the bargain is a bad one in both bills, and while I believe the proofs of that have been given by hon. gentlemen who have already spoken, still my reasons, in my own estimation at least, are greater for the rejection of the bill than those advanced. What is this bill? The hon. Minister of Justice, in introducing the measure, stated that the commercial interests of the Intercolonial Railway required its extension into the city of Montreal, but he failed to prove that proposition to my satisfaction. He, it is true, stated that the revenue of the Intercolonial Railway for several years had not met the disbursements of that road, but that last year the revenues exceeded the expenditures. That did not, however, prove the proposition with which he started out. It is true, the revenues last year were greater than the expenditures on the Intercolonial Railway taking it for its entire length, with its branches, from Sydney to Montreal. But last year the Intercolonial Railway was not the only railway that prospered. It was not the only railway that showed a surplus on its year's earnings. The Canadian Pacific Railway, for the first time in the history of that railway, had its stock raised to par. The Grand Trunk Railway declared a dividend last year, which it had not done for some years before, and my hon. friend and the members of this House, I am sure, cannot deny to the Intercolonial Railway a share of that prosperity which was enjoyed by the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway. But there are reasons for the prosperity of the Intercolonial Railway during the last year which are not due to the acquisition of the Drummond County Railway and the leasing of the Grand Trunk to Montreal. The Intercolonial Railway, extending though the length and breadth of the three maritime provinces, goes through a country which has prospered considerably for the last few years. The tourist traffic of the lower provinces, particularly to eastern Nova Scotia, has been increasing from year to year, and that is a great source of revenue to the Intercolonial Railway. We have tourists travelling from the United States by St. John, N.B., by Yarmouth, by Halifax, and all of these pass more or less over the Intercolonial Railway. We have, of late, prospered in Cape Breton as we have never done before. We only had the Island of Cape Breton opened up by a railway eight years ago. It takes time to bring prosperity to a country, and during those eight years industries have been springing up along the line of railway in Cape Breton which contribute considerably to the revenue of that road. Then we have a great industry in Cape Breton which has only been established permanently and profitably during the last three or four years, which is adding to the revenues of the Intercolonial Railway. Then the Island of Newfoundland has been building railways for the past few years. It is only about eighteen months since that island has been able to complete a system of railways several hundred miles in length. That railway in Newfoundland passes from the south-east coast of Newfoundland to its north-west coast, all through the breadth of the island where the population is settled. The island contains a population of about 200,000, and at the western terminus of that road, at Bay St. George, it is connected by four or five hours of steam navigation with the eastern end of the Intercolonial at North Sydney. The passenger and freight traffic carried between Newfoundland and the Intercolonial Railway was very large during the last year, and it is secured at North Sydney for almost the entire length of the Intercolonial Railway. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice, was I think very wrong in attributing the increased revenue on the Intercolonial Railway mainly to the acquisition of the Drummond County Railway. When this bill was before the Senate two years ago, it was rejected on the ground that we had no information before the House to show us what were the earnings and disbursements of the Drummond County Railway. That statement was promised to us. It was said that the experiment of keeping that account for a year would enable the Senate to deal with the matter, if it came up again, in a judicial way. My hon. friend did not produce that statement, and he ought not to expect the Senate to pass this bill without that information. I am sure no other member of this House could prove his case better than my hon. friend if he could do so. If they had kept the account, as the late Minister of Justice promised it would be done, it should be here. Considering everything in connection with this road, I assume that they have kept that account. I will assume that they looked over that account, and found that if they submitted it to the House it would prove that their contentions were wrong, and that the Drummond County Railway had not contributed anything to the prosperity of the Intercolonial Railway. It is unreasonable, therefore, to expect the Senate to vote for this bill the second time in the absence of proofs promised to the House two years ago. Again, my hon. friend had no right to assume that the increased revenue last year on the Intercolonial Railway was mainly due to the extension to Montreal. I take it to be the other way. If there was any prosperity last year on the Drummond County Railway, I believe that prosperity was largely due to the Intercolonial Railway. My hon. friend from Marshfield last evening conclusively proved that the average earnings of the Intercolonial Railway and the Drummond County Railway will bear this out. The average earnings of the Drummond County Road, according to my hon. friend's statement and figures, was 2 per cent less than the earnings of the Intercolonial Railway, and therefore there was no revenue that ought to be credited to the Drummond County Railway. But what is this bill for?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then the hon. gentleman has the information that he was asking for?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I simply state the argument used by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. It has not been answered yet, and until it is answered successfully I shall continue to consider it unanswerable. My hon. friend from Halifax has said that the Intercolonial Railway, for the the past few years, has been giving greater satisfaction and comfort to people travelling over it. I believe that I agree with the hon. gentleman, but will not that comfort and satisfaction and pleasure continue if this bill never becomes law? We have paid for the last two years $210,000 yearly for the comforts and satisfaction and for the running of the Intercolonial Railway into the city of Montreal. It is true that it entails a burden on the taxpayers of Canada yearly.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—The earnings have paid it.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—That is only from year to year until the government choose to do something else.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Do you suppose the Grand Trunk Railway will keep this thing open for ever?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—If this bill carries, we will have no more comfort or satisfaction than we have now, and therefore it is better to leave the matter as it is for the present. What is this bill? It is simply a bill to take the burden off the shoulders of a bankrupt company and impose it upon the shoulders of the people of Canada, who can ill afford to bear it. The increase of the public debt is alarming. It is calculated that if this bill passes it will represent an addition to the public debt of $7,000,000. I see it stated by the newspapers that, as the result of adopting this measure, it will add $3,000,000 more to the debt of the Intercolonial Railway in making improvements and putting it in a state fit to run as the result of the acquisition of these two roads. If that is the case, we have a sum of $10,000,000 at once added to the debt of the country. I think that is not an expenditure justified by the scheme.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Did not the hon. gentleman vote for the Grand Trunk agreement in 1879?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—That is a different thing altogether. I contend that the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway at Lévis is better for the country—that is looking to the future—than in Montreal, and for this reason: the arrangement with the Grand Trunk in the bill before the House if carried out will be an injury for ever to the Intercolonial Railway. If the Intercolonial Railway ends at Lévis as it is now, we all know that it is the intention of the government to help to build the bridge at Quebec, and when that bridge is built, we will have connection with Quebec and the Canadian Pacific Railway to Montreal. We can get running powers over the Canadian Pacific Railway from Quebec to Montreal just in the same way that the Canadian Pacific Railway has running powers from St. John to Halifax, and in that way, comparatively, it will not cost us anything. One will go against the other. We would have the communication with the Grand Trunk which exists now; with the Drummond County Railway, with the Quebec Central and with the South Shore Railway, and all those roads would be competing for the business of the Intercolonial Railway If the Intercolonial Railway connecting with all these roads at Quebec, carries freight for the west, all these railways will be competing for a share of that freight, and the Intercolonial Railway will be in a position to dictate terms, which it will not be if this bill carries and the terminus is in Montreal. I contend that the future hope and prosperity of the Intercolonial Railway rests on having a bridge at Quebec and connecting with the roads on the north of the St. Lawrence as truly as those on the south. It can never expect to carry a large amount of freight from southern Ontario.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman think that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would carry their east bound freight past Montreal to Quebec, when they have a road of their own extending from Montreal to St. John, and deliver it over to the Intercolonial Railway?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I will come to that in a few minutes. We are legislating, not for a few years to come, we are legislating for the future.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—On the north shore at Quebec we have the Lake St. John Railway. In a short time we will have the Canada Atlantic and Parry Sound Railway, which is proceeding there at a great rate. It is proceeding there now at a great rate. Then we have the Northern Railway and we have some other railway, I forget the name. We see in the newspapers that another railway is talked of, has been projected from Lake Superior direct to Quebec, which will be 300 miles shorter than the Canadian Pacific Railway. I tell my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, that as northern Quebec settles, and as northern Ontario settles, there will be a great trade in that country, and the trade will seek its outlet naturally to the seaboards of the lower provinces through Quebec. In that way I fully expect that the Canadian Pacific Railway traffic, from Lake Superior to Quebec, ought to go by the Intercolonial. Not only that, but I believe the great future of Canada lies north of the St. Lawrence in northern Ontario and northern Quebec. The settled portions of Ontario are very small now in comparison with the unsettled portions of the province, and the unsettled portions of Quebec and the trade of those regions will go down to the sea through the railways I have mentioned, and those regions are selling up fast. The manufacturing industries which are springing up in the east will go up to northern Ontario and northern Quebec and on to the west by the Intercolonial Railway and Quebec bridge. There is the Dominion Steel Company at Sydney and the Dominion Coal Company at Cape Breton with a capital of $44,000,000, I have no doubt that great industry will be manufacturing a large portion of the iron and steel consumed in Canada. I see that they are negotiating for the nickle mines at Sudbury, north of Lake Superior, and they propose to take that nickle down to the east. They must take it down to Quebec by the Canadian Pacific and by the Intercolonial Railway to Sydney. It will be manufactured there and sent to Europe, and back again to Quebec, Ontario and the great west in the manufactured form. If you carry out this legislation, I believe it will interfere with the Intercolonial in making its arrangements with all these railways from the north and converging at Quebec, and it is far better for the country to continue to pay $210,000 a year for a few years until the Quebec bridge is built and at that time, if it is necessary, Parliament can take it up again and pass it. The main objection is, after all, the alarming amount which this will add to the national debt. The people of Canada can ill afford to bear the burden by having the interest on $10,000,000 added suddenly to the national debt. If it is the determination of the government of Canada to swell the national debt so alarmingly, then I submit they can find other public works in Canada which will be of the greatest benefit to the most people by spending it in another way. It is not in the commercial interests of the Intercolonial Railway that those roads should be acquired by the government. On the contrary, I believe it is the commercial interest of the private owner of a bankrupt profitless road that dictated this bill. I believe the interests of the Grand Trunk Railway is served by this bill better than if the government made no arrangements with them. The Grand Trunk Railway Company knows how to manage their business. The Grand Trunk are not going to concede anything to the government unless they make some money out of the transaction nor is any other company, and therefore I say those bills ought to be rejected. But I was saying that if $10,000,000 is to be added to the national debt, that money should be expended in another way. There are hundreds of new public works which are more required than these already built roads. These roads are not required. The Intercolonial Railway gets to Montreal now. The Grand Trunk is not going to tear up and destroy the rails to keep the Intercolonial Railway at Lévis nor is the Drummond County Railroad. We pay $210,000 a year for the Drummond County Road and the lease of the Grand Trunk Railway now, and I am willing that we should continue to pay it. I represent the views of the people down east, and I believe I represent the views of a large portion of the Canadian people when I say I would prefer to continue to pay $210,000 a year for the privilege now enjoyed rather than to burden them for ever with a national debt of $10,000,000. If they have $10,000,000 to expend, let them expend it in other parts of the Dominion and distribute it equitably all over Canada, so that people having the advantage of it may be able the better to pay the interest on that debt. There is British Columbia with its gold, silver and copper mines opening up, and our young men all over Canada are flocking to that region. Let the government assist these people by voting a million or two for the purpose of building railways to open up these mines. Let them spend a million or two in the district of northern Manitoba; two millions in northern Ontario, of which we hear so much—it will help to open up for settlement New Ontario—and let them go to northern Quebec and endeavour to keep at home the Quebec people who are now going to the factories in Maine and Massachusetts. This will help to build railways in northern Quebec and keep the young people in Canada, let them spend a million in Nova Scotia, a million in New Brunswick, let them go to Prince Edward Island and spend half a million there and, finally—but not leastly, let them go to Cape Breton.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is said when a railway was built in Cape Breton the people used it to run away from the country.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—Some of them go away from Cape Breton to the United States and they will continue to go. I am very sorry for it. There is no doubt that too many go away. Our young girls and young men go to the United States every day, but if my hon. friend will give us his influence and assistance in getting a portion of this $10,000,000, say half a million of it spent in Cape Breton, it will help to keep them at home.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Has not the emigration ceased since the new government came into power?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—And then we will have $2,000,000 to spare.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Divide that among the senators.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—Leave that as a contingent fund with the Minister of Railways, to be spent where the requirements of the country demand it; but if the Minister of Justice chooses to take issue with him let them divide as best suits the country. I submit that the commercial interests of the taxpayers of Canada require those bills to be rejected, and I am opposed to them and shall vote against them.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I wish to make a few remarks upon this question. I would say, at the outset, that I believe that every Canadian wants to give every facility possible to the trade of the country. At the same time, I am satisfied that the people do not want any measures that will send the trade to United States channels. The Minister of Justice told us this was a good venture and that every one in the country was favourable to the scheme of bringing the Intercolonial to Montreal. I want to see every connection possible between the Intercolonial Railway and Montreal, but the question is, are we not paying too dear for the whistle? Are we treated fairly by the government of the day. We were told when this measure was before the House two years ago that they would keep track of the earnings and expenditure of the Drummond County Road. They told us they would do that in order to be able to inform us whether we were making a good bargain, and that the Senate was wrong in defeating the measure then before the House. What do we find? The then Minister of Justice made a promise. I do not blame the present Minister of Justice for not keeping it, but in many cases he should be liable for the acts of his predecessor. I feel satisfied that if the present minister had made the promise he would try to keep his word. But they have not told us what they are doing, and they want us to go in the dark. They have been telling us that this bargain is no better than the one we defeated before, but they are going to try and put it through this time. They tell us we did not save anything to the country when we defeated this measure two years ago. That is what the senior member for Halifax said.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said nothing of the sort.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM — The hon. gentleman said this bargain was no better than the other one.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What did the hon. gentleman say?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said there were differences of detail, but substantially they were the same.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is it exactly, but fortunately we have hon. gentlemen in this House who think a little differently. We have gentlemen who will tell the truth no matter who is hurt by it. We have the member for West Northumberland, who told us here that we saved $700,000. He told us that from the bottom of his heart, and I admired him for it.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I said the leader of the opposition said so.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I have the hon. gentleman's words here. I will leave it to the Senate if I misrepresent him in any way, and I am sure I have no desire to do so. When the hon. gentleman stood before me and made that statement I said, "Young man, you will get a wigging for that," and there is no doubt he has got a wigging for it, but I give him all the honour possible, and it will go before this country from county to county that the honest senator from West North Northumberland told the truth. They were trying to hide it but he let it out. He might have told us that we saved a little more. He might have stated what we saved the country last year. He might have told us that we saved a large amount on that tramway business also. My hon. friend was not in the House then. No doubt if he had been he would have told the truth on that question too. If you take the value the government put on their own land of $10 an acre we can find what was saved. I have here a letter which states that it was only $3,750,000, but I know differently. It was 4,000,000 acres, according to Mr. Jenning's report; therefore it is $40,000,000 saved.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—$37,000,000.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—If you add that to the savings effected by the Senate since the present government came into power, it will make about $40,700,000. I want that to go to the country, and the Senate to get credit for its work. But it would hardly be fair that the Senate should have all the credit for it. Every member of the House of Commons that voted against these iniquitous measures is entitled to as much credit as we are. They were overcome by that mechanical majority in the other House. They did their best to save the dollars for this country. What do we get for doing all this—standing guard over the treasury of this country? They threaten that they are going to reform or abolish us. I say "Come on, McDuff." I am in favour of bringing the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, but the point is that the government have not taken the right way to do it. I agree with the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton in every word he said about the ancient, glorious city of Quebec; I agree that it never had a chance. I know that everything was done for the city of Montreal and nothing for Quebec. I know that a few Scotchmen landed on the banks of the river, and I know that they taxed the whole commerce of the country to make Montreal a seaport and spent money to improve Montreal and give the go-by to Quebec. I am amused at my hon. friend from Moncton telling us the other day that we gave $140,000,000 in money and land to the Canadian Pacific Railway. What has that to do with this? Is it the same old cry? Are they coming back? Hon. gentlemen will remember that years ago they stated that the whole resources of the empire would not build that road in ten years. They said that road would not earn enough money to buy oil to grease the wheels, yet every one that was against that great undertaking which has been the life artery of Canada, is in favour of this scheme. They were in favour then, as they appear to be now, of going through the United States. I was not in favour of doing that, and by my voice and vote I stand in the same position to-day as I did then. I do not want our trade to go through the United States. As much as possible I desire that it shall go through Canada so that Canadians will make an honest livelihood out of it. The Minister of Justice in introducing the bill told us that there were improvements in contemplation, as far as the carrying the trade of this country is concerned, and I was very much pleased with him when he made that statement. As it is six o'clock I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

EXCHEQUER COURT JURISDICTION ACT.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (159) "An Act respecting the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court as to Railway Debts." He said:—This bill is rendered necessary on account of our federal system. In a case relating to, I think, the North Western Railway Company, which was chartered by the Dominion, and which extends from Portage la Prairie northward to Yorkville, a portion of which is in the province of Manitoba and a portion in the North-west Territories, it was held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that a provincial court had no jurisdiction, as the road was not wholly within the limit of the province, but extended from the province of Manitoba into the North-west Territories. This bill is for the purpose of giving to the Exchequer Court jurisdiction in that class of cases.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Did the judgment of the Privy Council go to the extent of declaring that the provincial court had no jurisdiction over that portion of the road which was in Manitoba, or was the decision merely that it could not decide upon issues that might arise affecting the whole road which was in two provinces.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not looked at the decision for some time, but my recollection is that the road was regarded as a unit, and the province could not exercise effective jurisdiction as the whole road was not within the province.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That is true. I know a case of that kind myself.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the bill under a suspension of the rules.

Hon. Mr. O'BRIEN, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (137) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Protection of Navigable Waters." He said:—This bill makes some verbal changes in the law as it now stands. The changes, although verbal, are important. The word "tidal" is struck out of the section of the Act which forbids the depositing of rubbish and refuse in any navigable tidal water. The other change is to strike out "low tide" and insert "any tide."

Hon. Mr. FORGET—What is the cause for the amendment?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because it is quite important that in navigable waters the navigation should not be interfered with by the depositing of rubbish.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The clause refers to all navigable waters. Could not steamers throw their ashes in the water of a river?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The harbour regulations of the various harbours contain regulations with reference to depositing ballast.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—A steamer plying between Toronto and Montreal, will not be permitted to throw ashes overboard under this clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes if the water has a depth of twelve fathoms.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—The ashes are not going to lodge there. They will pass on until they strike a shoal, and it does just as much injury as if they were deposited in twenty feet of water. We should prohibit the throwing of anything into a harbour or river. Take the St. Lawrence or the Miramichi, or any other river, you may come to a place where you have seventy-two feet of water and throw ashes in there. They will be carried along by the current until they strike the next shoal, and eventually will make the river less navigable. I think it should be prohibited entirely.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are improving it at all events, in the right direction.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I do not know about that. I would like to have more information.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Take the steamers plying between Kingston and the head of the Bay of Quinté. It is eighty or ninety miles before you reach the Murray Canal, and pass on to Presquil Harbour thence on to Toronto. There is also a line of steamers running to Montreal. They would be obliged to have a place on the steamer to store their ashes and debris nearly the whole of that distance, for I question whether in the whole bay there is seventy-two feet of water.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—They must be disposed of in some way. The fireman cannot remain at his post if there is a large quantity of hot ashes in the fire hold.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no place between Montreal and the head of the Bay of Quinté coming up the rapids and the canals where you could deposit ashes. How deep the lake is I cannot say.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—They would consume about sixty tons of coal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under this law they could not deposit anything in the river or bay. The refuse would be carried down the river and perhaps deposited on a bar. In the Bay of Quinté there is no current and the ashes would sink.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Would the hon. gentleman advocate filling up the river with ashes?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The St. Lawrence has never been filled up yet, and people have been navigating the St. Lawrence for sixty years. Has the hon. gentleman had any complaints.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. There are many parts of the navigable parts of the waters of the Dominion that are being filled up.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Where?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All over the country. The hon. gentleman has only to see where the dredges are employed. The government have a number of dredges and are constantly using them. Take Toronto harbour, for instance, it is being filled up with rubbish all the time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend is altogether in error in reference to Toronto harbour. It has been filled in by the wash of the waves on the point, carrying soft and alluvial soil immediately below it until the western entrance has been partially filled up necessitating a large expenditure of money upon the eastern entrance to the harbour, which thirty years ago could only be entered by means of a small craft. Let me mention another matter. You have been dredging Belleville harbour at the public expense. That was not the result of throwing rubbish into the harbour. It filled up on account of the currents in the spring bringing down large boulders fastened to the floating ice, and these, as the ice melted, became deposited in the harbour. What are you doing with the debris that you are taking out? You are depositing it where a steamboat will not be allowed to throw a pail of ashes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They will not be allowed to do it if this bill passes.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—No city would allow us to unload our rubbish and ashes at their port. I do not see how you are to make this bill work. After you have served a couple of hundred people at dinner, if you throw the rubbish into the river you will be fined under the provisions of this bill; you must carry it to the next port. Do you think the authorities there will allow you to land it?

Hon. Mr. OWENS—I think, if the hon. gentlemen who are interested in steamboats, were to make inquiries they would find that the firemen generally sell the ashes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Wood ashes.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—They always sell the wood ashes.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—We never sell a pound of ashes; it is always thrown into the river.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—The company do not sell it; firemen and engineers generally attend to the selling of it. As to the ashes filling up the streams or interfering with navigation, I think that this is drawing it rather too fine. I am certain you will find not only in Belleville harbour, but at mostly any point where dredges work—I know it is so on the Ottawa River—they dump the material into places in the river where there is much less than ten fathoms of water.

Hon Mr. FORGET—The coal ashes are no good and must be dumped into the river.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the question asked by the hon. gentleman from Sorel ought to be answered. He wishes to know why this bill is to be put on the statute-book. Perhaps it would be better to let the bill stand until the hon. gentleman can ascertain from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, where the great injury has occurred that necessitates such a measure.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We can pass the second reading and I will ascertain, before the next sitting of the House, where the complaints have come from.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I do not like to see a bill of this kind rushed through the House. Perhaps there are other members, who are interested as much as I am, and I should like to examine the bill more closely before I accept the principle of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have heard a great deal about the serious injury done to our rivers——

Hon. Mr. FORGET—From sawdust and mill refuse.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Sawdust is the worst here, but there are localities where other debris is thrown in, and the most important thing in this country is to keep our rivers at the depth that nature left them. We should not fill them up. It is not in the interest of the country generally, and even if it became necessary to keep the ashes and deposit them at some particular point on shore, the owners of vessels on the river should be obliged to do so. You will find that in any other country but Canada where they have navigable rivers, they will not allow rubbish of any kind to be dumped into the water because eventually it must affect the navigation.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—How about the river between here and Grenville? They will be prohibited from dumping rubbish anywhere, because the river is not seventy-two feet deep at any point.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What they are doing now on the Ottawa River is dredging a narrow channel.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—There are not twelve fathoms of water between here and Montreal; how can you provide for that?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I do not believe coal ashes will cause any obstruction.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it must in the course of time. It was thought that sawdust would be less objectionable, but it has been found to be a serious obstruction to the navigation.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I think we should have a minimum depth of water as well as this greater depth. Take a river where the depth of water on the bar is twenty feet. There are places where the water is 100 feet. Anything you throw in at those places is drifted on to the bars. Wood ashes, though detrimental to fish life, are valuable and there is no fear of them being thrown into the river. Coal ashes are not valuable and they will be thrown in.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Coal ashes will likely sink to the bottom, and wood ashes will float.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Wood ashes would do no harm to navigation, but it would do harm to fish life. If boats were compelled to go in on the flats and deposit their ashes, I would prefer putting them in the shallow water to depositing them in the deep water, because if dropped in shallow water they are likely to remain there. You would have to make special regulations for each river, because what will apply to the Miramichi will not apply to the St. John. The Miramichi is navigable for large ships for thirty or forty miles, while the St. John is not navigable for large vessels above the falls. What would apply to the Ottawa would not apply to the St. Lawrence. There is a great difficulty in connection with the enforcement of such a law. If this law is put on the statute-book and rigorously enforced, you will demoralize the trade of the country. I suppose, like some other laws, it will not be put in force at once.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it is better not to have it on the statute-book.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman consents to the second reading now it can be discussed in committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We can do so if it is not accepting the principle of the bill. I agree with the hon. gentleman from Northumberland that it will be unworkable. Our little yachts burn coal. Do you think they will not throw their ashes into the water?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I think the navigation companies ought to be consulted about it. It is not merely because the department wishes the thing done; the interest of the country should be consulted. I doubt if any other country would adopt such a bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is done in the interest of navigation.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—It might not be in the interests of navigation; it might be in the interest of one or two men.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Do you not think the yachts could get rid of the ashes when they get into deep water without dumping them into the harbours?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They might throw the lead and find the depth, I suppose?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—They might be rendered liable to blackmail. People on the boat might charge them with throwing ashes into the water at certain places, and how can they prove that they did not? The people interested in navigation ought to be consulted before such a bill is put on the statute-book. I do not believe that anybody in the country knows that such a bill is before the House. I never heard of it before. The press never mentioned it.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—There is a law on the statute-book now, is there not, for the protection of navigable waters?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but it only applies to tidal waters. The St. Lawrence is tidal up to Three Rivers.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—It is tidal only twice or three times in the year. Our vessels run from Hamilton to Three Rivers, anyway, above tidal water.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the House will allow the bill to be read the second time now, before it goes to committee, I will find at whose instance it is proposed. It is done by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, no doubt, under representations from the trade. I will give the explanation in committee, and hon. gentlemen will be quite free to vote against the bill at any stage.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (155) "An Act further to amend the Post Office Act." He said:—Under the Post Office Act the Postmaster General is authorized to carry out a number of details in the management of his department, and he proposes to ask Parliament to allow him to fix a rate of fees payable on late mailable matter. It is found in many places that the mail is made up very often half an hour before the train leaves and it would be a great convenience to have either electric cars or boys on bicycles to carry letters to the train up to the very moment it leaves, on payment of a small fee. There is now, as hon. gentlemen are aware, a regulation by which quick delivery is made by payment of a fee, and it is proposed to enable parties to rush mail at the last minute.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do you mean to attach an extra stamp to it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, in that way, I do not know what the amount would be. The next clause authorizes the Postmaster General to establish a system for indemnifing losses on registered mail matter up to $25. That system is in practice now in Great Britain, and in other countries, of course for very much larger amounts. It is proposed to try it here for amounts up to $25. It is not proposed to charge any more for the delivery of the letter and the contents than will be absolutely necessary to protect the department from loss. It is thought the fee will be very little, as the proportion of registered letters lost in Canada is very small. The Postmaster General mentioned a sum, but he said he had not thought it out. It will be very small—one and a half or two cents. It is optional with parties to take their own risk or pay this sum. The next clause is a contribution to newspaper men. It amends a section of the Post Office Act which makes it a penal offence for persons to inclose in a newspaper any letter or matter that is mailable in order to evade the postage. That clause does not apply to publishers of newspapers in sending out accounts to their subscribers. They often send more than accounts: they send notices. The words "to their subscribers" is struck out in order to give publishers an opportunity to inclose a slip of any kind in a newspaper when sending out their newspaper to others than subscribers. It is limited to publishers of newspapers and to their communications with the public.

Hon. Sir JOHN CARLING—Might I ask the hon. gentleman if business men will be allowed to post their own letters in case there is not time enough for the mail? I know in London there is a post office box at the station.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is done now every day. This is only when taking it from the post office. There are some post offices which are remote from the depots. Take the city of Montreal. The mail is generally sent off fifteen or twenty minutes before the train leaves. A boy on a bicycle could carry a small package in five minutes from the post office. I think at nearly all the railway stations there is usually a box.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—If a private person sends a newspaper from one city to another what is the rate? Two cents?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, one cent, but you are not allowed to send anything inside of the paper.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Ladies sometimes send patterns that way, and they would be liable to punishment.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I think there should be some restraint on publishers of newspapers. I would exempt all matters that are their business, but say a show comes to a town and the proprietors get the newspaper men to inclose dodgers to their subscribers. There should be something to restrain publishers from doing anything of that kind, because I know that traders object very much to these outside people coming in and using the press to distribute their advertisements in that manner.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That is penal law.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—It is, but the wording of this clause would perhaps exempt a publisher from the operation of the Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It opens the door to what my hon. friend objects to. This would enable a publisher to send circulars to anybody, whether a subscriber or not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is as I explained. It applies only to newspaper publishers, and their privilege is limited under the law as it stands to communications to subscribers. It is proposed to allow them to communicate by sending the communications in newspapers to anybody. It is an extension of the existing law.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I can scarcely understand why the door is opened in this case to persons beyond subscribers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I fancy it is that they often send to persons circulars asking them to become subscribers. We have all received communications from newspaper offices, and they have to pay on those particular communications. They send you a sample paper if you are not a subscriber.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Would this clause, as it is proposed now to amend it, permit of the sending out of a supplement, or a paper, to non-subscribers—addressing it to them ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You could put a circular in calling attention to the newspaper.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I know that law has been applied to prevent the sending out of supplements—what the editor claimed to be a supplement, but what the department contended was not a supplement. It was printed as a supplement. I have had experience in that line, and I know the effect if the law would be to prevent a publisher sending it out. I bowed to the law myself. I thought it was right; but this might lead into abuses.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it is so wide as the hon. gentleman says. Under this bill they can send to any one. Previously they send to subscribers those special envelopes, accounts, receipts, circulars inviting a subscription, together with the printed envelopes that are usually sent for the party communicated with to report to the publishers.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Still, it would be subject to whatever the newspapers postage would be.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes. The object is, I think, to enable them to communicate with persons in writing to subscribe to the paper. We all get communications of that kind from various people, and they have to pay the postage on that, because they are sent to persons who are not subscribers.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It would give newspapers a great opportunity, during election times, to circulate literature.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They will do that anyway.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I know something of that too, and I know under the late admistration the post office authorities interfered with the party with whom I was acting, and we had to pay postage. We had to come under the law in the matter of sending out newspapers before an election. I do not know whether it was under this section or not. We were prevented, unless we were sending to bona fide subscribers : under the proposed law we could send them to every voter.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—It was not a bona fide portion or section of a newspaper. Evidently the hon. gentleman has had some political literature printed, or has received political literature, and desired it inclosed in the newspaper. Of course that cannot be done. But any newspaper has a right to print a supplement to its own paper and inclose it in that newspaper, paying the ordinary postage on it. In other words, we can make our papers just as large as we please.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And fill them up with political matter.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—But you cannot take a part of Hansard and issue it as a supplement to the Charlottetown Examiner and have it go through the post office. The newspapers are not limited in the issue of political literature. I think this provision is in the right direction.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The next clause is one relating to railway mail clerks. Before a railway mail clerk can become a superintendent, he must serve ten years as a railway mail clerk, under the law as it stands at present. It has been found that half that time will be sufficient. It is found convenient, instead of having a railway mail clerk all the time on the road, to have him on the inside service a portion of the time. This does not shorten the ten years, but it allows one-half of it to be passed within the post office.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why is British Columbia made an exception to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think they have some particular rule there in reference to the superintendent. I think British Columbia is not subject to the conditions which have heretofore prevailed, that before a railway mail clerk can become a superintendent he must necessarily have served ten years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And you reduce that term to five years except in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We reduce it all over Canada, except British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—What is the rule in British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know what the rule there is.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I can quite see the necessity for the exception. In British Columbia we have not very many mail clerks who have served ten years. We did not have them before the Canadian Pacific Railway was constructed. There would be very few eligible in British Columbia.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When we go into committee the hon. Secretary of State had better ascertain the facts. We have drifted into a very free and easy discussion on the second reading of this bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Second reading (Bill 2) "An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, so as to make more effectual provision for the punishment of Seduction and Abduction."

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—This bill stands in the same position as when formerly spoken to. I move that the order of the day be discharged and placed on the order paper for this day week.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask the hon. gentleman what object there is in keeping the bill standing upon the notice paper? The matter has already been dealt with in the Criminal Code, as I understood, to the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman, and if there is no intention of pressing it as an independent bill, it might just as well be discharged altogether.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I am anxious to see if the amendments which have been made here will be accepted in the House of Commons. If they are rejected, I would still like to have the privilege of proceeding with this bill in the Senate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And having this measure rejected here.

The motion was agreed to.

ONTARIO AND RAINY RIVER COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to Bill (121) "An Act respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company." He said:—This bill was reported from the Railway Committee on the 29th June, with a number of amendments. The hon. chairman of the committee, who has gone away for the week, was to make an explanation of the changes in the bill. The amendments are all of a non-contentious character. The government of Manitoba was represented before the committee and the promoters of the bill and the town of Port Arthur were also represented, and the amendments were all concurred in by both parties. The only important amendment was satisfactory to the gentlemen which represented Port Arthur, and the promoters were satisfied that it should be made. There was a clause added at the instance of the government of Manitoba forbidding this company or any company with which it may become amalgamated, to amalgamate with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The object of the road was to give a competing line between Winnipeg and Thunder Bay, and that object would be defeated if this railway became the property of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand that the first amendment provides that certain arrangments must be concurred in by every shareholder?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If they are not concurred in by every shareholder, then the sanction of the Governor in Council must be obtained.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is an extraordinary provision.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was then read the third time, as amended, and passed.

CONDITIONAL LIBERATION OF PENITENTIARY CONVICTS BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Commitee of the Whole on Bill (P) "An Act to provide for the conditional liberation of penitentiary convicts."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 6.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. Minister of Justice just explain to us why, after making the clause very restrictive, power is given to the Governor General under the hands of the Secretary of State to remit any of the requirements of the foregoing section?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That, I think is necessary. In that respect we are following the English statute. The reason is that a person is under surveillance as long as the former provisions of this section are in force in respect to it. The police officer, the sheriff and certain other parties, must know that he has been an offender and that he is under constant restraint. It may be—and such cases are not infrequent—that a young man is an offender who does not belong to the criminal class. His natural tendencies are not with that class. He has committed an offence. He is perhaps more than any person else shocked and grieved at what he has done and even though he had not been brought to trial, and punished, there would be no probability of his ever again committing an offence, and it is not desirable, where you see and learn from the report, that the party is not likely to commit the offence, to keep him constantly notorious as having been an offender under surveillance. It may stand in the way of his getting employment. It may put a ban upon him that is in his particular case altogether unnecessary, and so where the authorities feel that they can safely release the person from that strict and constant surveillance, it is found desirable to do so. That is the experience in England and I think it will be our experience here. I may mention a case. Here is this man Holden. He was discharged from the penitentiary at one time for an offence which he had committed and was given a small sum of money, as is usual in the case of parties discharged from the penitentiary, and he found employment as an engineer in the Windsor Hotel at Montreal. He was constant in his attendance to his duties. He was there, I am told, for nearly two years. There was no fault to be found with him. He was a skillful man in his way, but he was under the surveillance of the chief of police, who waited upon the proprietor and told him that he had a convict in his employ, that he was a most dangerous man and some night he would, perhaps, find his safe blown to pieces and his engineer gone, and the result was that he was immediately dismissed, and he was for weeks without any employment and returned again to his former evil ways. The representation made by the man himself to the party, with whom he was conversant, was that he was fully resolved never to return to any dishonest practices again, and that he was driven to it in a large measure by want and by the feeling that he was so far under strict surveillance that he could not obtain employment any where while the detectives were upon his track.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is his own story.

Hon. Mr. O'BRIEN—Cullen the detective in Montreal gave the story to a Gazette reporter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He has learned to be an awful liar since. This is the law in England is it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, we have followed as closely as we can the English statutes, only making verbal alterations so far as they were applicable to our own position.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It might be a terrible millstone around the neck of some young man who was trying to reform if it was known that he was a ticket of leave man. If it were found out by the police officer he might lose his position.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We want to give him a chance.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I think it is a good provision.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 8.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Supposing this man becomes a tramp, would the hon. gentleman say he was getting his livelihood by dishonest means? If he becomes a vagabond, without visible means of support, should he not be liable to be taken up again?

Hon Mr. MILLS—So he is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This confines the punishment to persons convicted of getting a livelihood by dishonest means. Supposing he is a tramp and vagabond, should not that be covered? As a rule, tramps do not obtain their living honestly.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think that is covered.

Hon. Mr. OWENS, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS WITHOUT PUBLIC COMPETITION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a full and complete return of all government contracts entered into since the first day of November, 1878, by private agreement, and with public competition by tender or otherwise, specifying in detail the goods purchased, the prices paid and from whom purchased, and the character of all work done, the amounts paid therefor and to whom paid.

He said:—I do not propose to make any speech on this motion. We have had various motions for partial returns in the direction indicated by the motion now before the House, and it is desirable that we should have a full and ample return, and I think that probably the preparation of this return will give employment to any clerks in the various departments who would not otherwise be occupied during the recess; but inasmuch as a good many partial returns, which cover portions of the ground covered by this address, have already been brought down, the amount of work to be done, will not be as great as it might appear at first blush.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—What part has been brought down.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Several returns have been brought down. There has hardly been a session in which some returns of the kind have not been brought down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As my hon. friend from Halifax is thursting for information, I would suggest that we go back a little further, more particularly as he indicated a desire to furnish employment for some of those unnecessary clerks who have very little to do during this hot weather. I suggest that the motion be amended by making it read from the 5th day of November, 1873. Then we shall ascertain exactly what errors or wrongs, if any, have been committed by both parties during the time they have been in power. I do not know that it will be necessary to go back beyond 1875. However, I should have no objection to assist my hon. friend in satisfying his thirst for information, and I move that the 5th November, 1873, be substituted for the 1st November, 1878.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—As an objection has been raised against partial returns, I think it would be well to go further back and have the returns from 1867. As we are likely to have an election before long, it would be convenient for the government to employ a lot of men and keep them on hand.

The motion was amended and adopted.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to direct the attention of the leader of the government to a statement made in the newspapers on Saturday, and also this morning, in reference to a settlement of the difficulties which have arisen between the Imperial Government and the colonies as to the terms upon which the Pacific cable shall be constructed, and to ask him if it is correct. The statement made in the papers is that an arrangement had been arrived at between the Imperial Government and the representatives of the colonies, based upon the terms that were agreed upon a year ago in London. If the hon. gentleman has any information on the subject, it is important that we should know it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I believe the negotiations are very nearly consummated, that they are satisfactory, so far as they have gone, but they have not yet been finally disposed of. As soon as they are completed and the government is at liberty to do so, information will be given to Parliament.

THE ALASKA BOUNDARY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is another matter of some importance to which my hon. friend from Victoria has called my attention, that is, in reference to the modus vivendi on the Alaska boundary question. It has been stated that all negotiations have been broken off—that it was impossible to come to an agreement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think that statement, that all negotiations have been broken off, is inaccurate; but I am not in a position to make any statement to the House on the subject.

THE DEATH OF SENATOR SANFORD.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the orders of the day are called, it is my painful duty to read to the House a telegram received to-day by a member of the House of Commons, which reads as follows:—

Senator Sanford was out boating this morning at Windermere, when the boat accidentally upset a few yards from shore. The young lady, who was accompanying him, was rescued, but, though the senator's body was recovered in almost an instant, life was extinct. The accident took place at eleven a.m.

I need scarcely say that this information is of an exceedingly sad character; and I am sure those who knew the late senator will, with myself, deeply regret this untoward ending of his life. Senator Sanford has been for a number of years a member of this House. He was well known in the community as one of the most energetic business men in the Dominion. He was also known for his many charities and munificent gifts to charitable and other institutions. I scarcely know a man in the locality in which he lived who will be more missed than Senator Sanford. His business was one of enormous extent, and he was just building immense warehouses for the purpose of enlarging that business. His energy, his perseverance, in all matters with which he was connected, were not excelled by many men in the whole Dominion. I do not know that I can say more, or that I desire to say more, further than to express the regret which, I am sure, every member of the Senate and every man who knew Senator Sanford will feel. His loss will not be merely to his family as he was a fond and affectionate parent, but to this Senate, and to the whole Dominion. Under the circumstances, I do not know that we could show greater respect for his memory than to adjourn, and I therefore move, with the consent of the leader of the government, that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is with very great regret that I had placed in my hands the telegram which the hon. leader of the opposition has read. That telegram was received by Mr. John Ross-Robertson from his office in Toronto to-day. I entirely agree with everything that the hon. leader of the opposition has said in reference to Senator Sanford. He was a most useful member of this body. As a man, there were few held in higher esteem by those who knew him. He was a man of great patience, of large sympathies and of broad views of public and social questions. He will be very greatly missed in this House, and as a member of this community. Few men in Canada engaged in mercantile pursuits were more successful than Senator Sanford. His business was very extensive. It was constantly growing and he seemed to be master of it, and capable of managing it with extraordinary skill, as much so as any man engaged in large mercantile pursuits, such as those that occupied his attention. I agree with the motion which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has made, that it is due to one of so estimable a character as Senator Sanford that this House should express its respect for his ability, his character and his memory by adjourning for the remainder of this day.

The motion was agreed to

ATLAS LOAN COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (30) "An Act respecting the Atlas Loan Company," with an amendment. He said:—A clause has been added to this bill simply for the purpose of giving the company power of investment in municipal and government stocks, and prohibiting them from lending on bills of exchange or promissory notes. I may say the clause follows the wording of the Act which the Minister of Justice introduced to the House respecting loan companies.

The amendments were concurred in.

BANQUE DU PEUPLE BILL.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved that the report of the sub-committee of the Committee on Banking and Commerce on the bill relating to La Banque du Peuple, together with the documents accompanying the report, be printed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to direct the attention of the hon. gentleman from Glengarry to the the fact that, while the information which he is seeking is very desirable and should be in the hands of members of the House when the discussion comes up on the third reading, unless some further action is taken in the way of deferring the third reading, the information will not be in our hands when the bill comes up to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—We could defer the third reading to get that information. It will not take very long to do the printing and I simply desire that the hon. gentlemen of the Senate should be in possession of the facts in connection with this bank before the vote is taken on the bill in order that they may have an intelligent idea of the situation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Can we be guaranteed that the printed copies of this report will be available for the discussion of the third reading. If it is going to delay the voting on the third reading to such an extent as to jeopardize the bill I intend to vote against the motion made by the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—There is plenty of time yet.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think it is very important that we should have some idea as to whether this report and these papers are voluminous or not. I suppose some hon. gentlemen have examined them and know the contents and would be able to state the matter to the House. If they are very voluminous, they are not likely to be printed in time for the consideration of the bill this session, and even if they are printed and are very voluminous, the members of this House will be scarcely able to acquire more information in connection with them than they would be able to obtain from the statements of the hon. gentleman and others who have considered the subject.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The chairman might explain whether the papers are very voluminous ?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It will undoubtedly take some time to print the papers. The hon. gentleman who can give most information as to the nature of the papers is the hon. gentleman behind me (Mr. Forget) who is one of the committee to whom it was referred. I was not on the sub-committee.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—There is no doubt these papers are very voluminous. I do not know how long it would take to print them, but we can lay the papers on the table and hon. gentlemen can examine them before the third reading of the bill to-morrow. There are a great many names of debtors to the bank, and if the documents were printed it would be making these names public. The Senate does not want this bill to appear worse than it is. It is very bad at it is. I do not think it would be judicious to publish to the whole world the names of the unfortunate people who have been insolvent since that bank failed. I do not see what advantage hon. gentlemen could gain by having the papers printed. If the papers were laid on the table, hon. gentlemen could take cognizance of them. It took us three days to get through them ourselves, and besides that, if these papers were printed and circulated they will have to be explained. We had Mr. Kent from Montreal, and another gentleman, before us during two sittings to give us the explanations required, and nobody else could give us the explanations. They would have to come from outside, and the sub-committee was appointed to go into these papers because the general committee saw that they did not have the time, and therefore did not go through them. A sub-committee of five was appointed and obtained all the information possible and were unanimous in adopting this report. I have no objection to having the papers laid on the table for the information of hon. gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Better limit the printing to the report of the sub-committee?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I may tell hon. gentlemen that the papers are somewhat voluminous, and I am willing to admit that it will be a great deal of trouble perhaps for the hon. gentlemen to go through them. But there are papers that will give the information that we would like to have —an abstract statement of the details, as far as assets and liabilities are concerned, and accounting to some extent for the shrinkage. That consists of one or two sheets. If I had all the documents laid on the table except that abstract and the report of the sub-committee of the Standing Committee, and had these two documents printed, I would be content. The printer would certainly get that abstract and report up in two hours.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I think only a part of the details of the shrinkage of the assets would be unsatisfactory. The report of the sub-committee is short and we can have it in print by to-morrow. We could find the other details on the table. How could we choose among fifteen hundred or two thousand men?

Hon. Mr. VILLENEUVE—The member for Glengarry has had all the documents before him that he wished. He made the motion before the House ten days ago.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I am not the whole Senate.

Hon. Mr. VILLENEUVE—The hon. gentleman represents the shareholders of the bank, and every document was laid before him. We brought two experts from Montreal who examined the assets and explained the shrinkage, and everything was made satisfactory. The report we made this morning was unanimous. It would not take five minutes to read that report to the House, and hon. gentlemen will find that everything there is as explicit as possible. If we were to have all these documents printed, it would take a week or more. We have had three sittings of the Banking and Commerce Committee, and two or three of the sub-committee, and every precaution was taken. We had one of the best accountants to assist us, one who knows the state of the bank perfectly well. He gave every explanation, and in such a way that he satisfied even the hon. member for Glengarry, and the hon. gentleman from Ottawa. I think there is no use in delaying any more. We should go on with the bill.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I propose to amend my motion, to read as follows: That the report of the sub-committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the Banque du Peuple to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, as well as the abstract statement submitted to them by the valuators, be authorized to be printed for the use of members.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The abstract statement may be the whole report.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—No.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—What does the hon. gentleman call the abstract statement?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It is only one sheet of paper. I can tell the hon. gentleman what it means. It means under one heading the shrinkage due to notes that were found valueless; shrinkage due to real estate; shrinkage due to mortgage, and bonds, and so on—that is all.

Hon. Mr. VILLENEUVE—You have that before you.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I wish the hon. gentleman would put that in his motion so that we would know exactly what he wants.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It is there.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—It is not mentioned.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I should like to know if that abstract statement is already on one single sheet, or if it is clerical work that must be done? Is it a sheet that bears that name, so that we may know what is to be printed—the report and a certain sheet headed abstract statement. If it is work that is yet to be done how can we define it?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I know very little about this matter myself, but my first impression, and I think the impression of many senators, is that this was a very bad failure—that the business was not conducted honestly; that the stock diminished in value very soon. The directors made reports that the bank was in a good position, and in a few days afterwards the bank failed. The hon. gentleman opposite says it would not be right to expose the names of those people. I say it would. It might prevent others from getting into trouble. The whole world ought to know who they are. I know many senators will vote against the bill if we do not get that information.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I want it thoroughly understood that I do not wish to hide any information from this honourable House. I want to give all the information we have, and I think it could be got when the hon. gentleman from Glengarry opposes, as he probably will, the third reading of the bill. He has all the information he wants, and his speech will very likely be made on those notes. I am quite desirous of giving all the information possible, but I do not want any delay. If the House gives orders to print too many papers, it will cause a delay which may prevent the passage of the bill. If the hon. gentleman wants only a statement showing the depreciation of real estate from such a date to such a date, I am not opposed to it.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—This is the document that I wish to accompany the report of the sub-committee. It is headed "Banque du Peuple Synopsis, showing the shrinkage in the different items of assets from the 28th February, 1895, to the 1st January, 1899, and algo the shrinkage from the 1st of January, 1899, to the 1st June, 1899," all on that sheet of paper.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I think it would be very much better for those who are in favour of the bill to have the report of the sub-committee and that abstract printed, then every member of the Senate can have a copy and can read it. At the present time, I feel certain that not one-half the members of the Senate know anything about the matter except what has been told them.

Hon. Mr. VILLENEUVE—As chairman of the sub-committee, I have no objection to printing their report and the abstract to which the hon. gentleman from Glengarry refers. No one can object to that.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—That is all that is asked for.

Hon. Mr. VILLENEUVE—As far as printing all the papers connected with it is concerned, I object to it decidedly.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The papers can be printed in the proceedings so that every member of the House can have them before him to-morrow.

The motion, as amended, was agreed to.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the orders of the day are called, I have to direct the attention of the House and hon. gentlemen to a report of an incident in this House relating to myself which has found its way into the newspapers in an incorrect manner. It is the first time since I have been a member that I have called attention to an error or misrepresentation in newspaper reports, of our debates, and I do not do it in this case in consequence of the great importance of the matter that it involves, but with a view, if possible, to get a little more consideration and justice from the press than we are receiving. If an hon. gentleman is misrepresented in this House and the attention of the newspaper or its reporter is called to the matter, one would think a correction would follow, but as the tree falls there it lies. Whatever way they report you they seem to think they must not go back on themselves. I am very sorry that is case. I know that the newspaper men cannot always get the right idea as to what passes here; therefore, I am not at all inclined to be harsh with them or make any severe criticism, but when attention is called to an error one would think that a correction should follow as a matter of course. On Friday last, during the discussion on the Grand Trunk Agreement, I made a statement with regard to the evidence given by Mr. Wainwright before the Drummond County Committee last year, and I read Mr. Wainwright's exact words as reported in the blue book. My hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax, speaking later, read a letter from Mr. Wainwright explaining that the words that I had read from that document, having reference to the amount of interest at which they could now borrow money, was a mistake in the report, that he had not known it until recently, and that he was not correctly reported. I find, however, that the newspapers put it that Mr. Wainwright contradicted my statement. My statement was not contradicted. I made the statement on the strength of the report. I am very careful about the statements I make, and I was simply repeating what I found in the report, and the letter which Mr. Wainwright had put in the hands of the senior member for Halifax did not contradict anything I said, but just put Mr. Wainwright right in the matter of reporting, but I find that the newspapers have got it in a different way. I have the Mail and Empire before me, in which there is no report of what I said, but simply this statement referring to remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, and giving a version of something which hon. gentlemen know did not occur at all. Mr. Wainwright did not call in question the accuracy of my statement, but he did call in question the accuracy of the report.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have no criticism to pass on what has been said by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, but I may give Mr. Wainwright's further explanation. I wish to explain how it was that that error came about. Mr. Wainwright never saw his evidence after it was taken down. He had not an opportunity to read it over, and it was not signed by him, and consequently the fact that that mistake remained in the evidence is not to be wondered at.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (146) "An Act further to ament the Act respecting the Department of the Geological Survey." He said:—I mentioned the contents of this bill when I introduced it. In the first place, there is a proposal to amend section 4 of the Act of 1890 relating to the Geological Department. The proposed bill reads:

No person shall be appointed to the department under class B of schedule A of the Civil Service Act unless he is a science graduate and so on.

Previously under the law the provisions were that:

No one shall after the passing of this Act be appointed to the department under class B of schedule A of the Civil Service Act unless he is a science graduate of either a Canadian or foreign university or of the mining school of London or of the school of mines of Paris or of some other recognized science school of standing equal to that of the said universities and schools, or graduates of the Royal Military College and in each case only after having served a probation of not less than two years of scientific work in the department, or unless he has served a probation of not less than five years in the scientific work of the department, or he has had experience for the same number of years in a similar work, official or otherwise elsewhere.

The section reads:

Unless he is a science graduate of either a Canadian or foreign university or of one of the mining schools of London or the school of mines of Paris or of some other recognized science school of standing equal to that of the said university or school or graduate of the Royal Military College or unless he has served a probation of not less than five years in the scientific work of the department.

Hon. gentlemen will notice the distinction. There is an enlargement of the class who are made eligible for appointment, with no degradation of the qualifiation required. There is a further section, a provision for appointment on approbation. It reads:

Any person so appointed shall be appointed on approbation and shall not receive a permanent appointment unless he has served a probationary term of at least one year during which probationary period he may be rejected by the head of the department or by the deputy head, but if he be not rejected the deputy head shall at the expiration of the probationary period signify to the head of the department in writing that he considers the person so appointed competent for the duties of the department, and the appointment shall thereupon become permanent.

My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, on the first reading took exception to the words "Or by the deputy head." I think, in all probability, my hon. friend's suggestion is more in conformity with the settled principles of parliamentary government than the retention of these words, and the deputy head may formally, as the act of an executive officer, report to his chief and the chief can carry out his suggestion if, in his opinion, the public service requires it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should infer from the remarks of the hon.

leader of the govern ment that he proposes to have this rejection by the deputy head struck out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, we can do that in committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When we go into committee on the bill, I presume the hon. minister will explain why it is that the probation of two years, which is required by the existing law, has been reduced to one year. I presume it is because of the difficulty of getting officers for the department.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

UNORGANIZED TERRITORIES GAME PRESERVATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (153) "An Act to amend the Unorganized Territories Game Preservation Act, 1894." He said:—This bill is simply providing that the remaining bison in the North-west Territories shall be absolutely protected until 1902, instead of 1900. That is a period of two years longer.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do the reports of the department indicate an increase in the buffalo or bison of that country? Has my hon. friend any information on that point—as to whether the reports of the Department of the Interior indicate any increase in the herds of buffalo or bison?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot inform my hon. friend as to that. This bill came from the House of Commons, but I understand that there are buffalo or bison in the Territories.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—A great many people are skeptical as to the existence of them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is said that there are, and I have no doubt the Minister of the Interior ascertained the fact before he introduced the measure, and if there are, the object is to give them protection for two years longer.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I understand there are two herds of wood buffalo in the barren lands, and it would be a good thing if they were propagated and increased, I think they should receive all the protection the government can give them.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

LAND TITLES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (149) "An Act further to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894." He said:—In laying out the towns in the North-west, Moosejaw, Regina, Medecine Hat, Q'Appelle, and some others, the same mistake was made as was made in Ontario, and the division of the country round those particular towns was planned and they were prepared to be sold as villa lots. It was found that the lands were not really available for any other purpose than farming, and therefore it was desirable to restore them to the condition of farming lands, and practically to cancel the plans that were filed, and provision was made in 1894 authorizing the judge, on application, to cancel the plan and restore the land to the condition of a farm. In a case that arose not very long ago before one of the judges, he held that the law as it then existed applied only to those particular subdivisions that came under the Land Titles Act, and many subdivisions were not under the Land Titles Act, and therefore it is to remedy that particular defect in the law that the amendment in the first section of this bill is proposed, in order that where it appears to the judge that it is in the interest of all parties that the land should be restored to its original condition, and the plans practically obliterated, he is authorized to do so, irrespective of the Land Titles Act. The next clause refers entirely to Indian lands, and makes provision for subdividing Indian lands wherever it is desirable to establish a town site.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (148) "An Act further to amend the Dominion Lands Act." He said:—By referring to the first clause of this bill hon. gentlemen will see that the object is to change the terms upon which school lands are sold. Heretofore school lands, under the law, were sold under the five years' system : that is, one-fifth shall be paid down at the time of the purchase, and the balance in five yearly instalments. It is found by the department that a larger price will be obtained if the terms are made ten years instead of five, the interest being paid with each instalment, and where the lot has been subdivided, being perhaps in the vicinity of a town or village, or perhaps a railway station, and a smaller area than 140 acres is being sold, the terms will remain the same as before, the one-fifth being payable. The next clause of the bill provides that the words "perfect in title" shall be struck out. The object of the second clause is to bring the practice of the department into conformity with the law. Homesteaders under the law, as it now stands, are allowed six months to perfect their entry after they notify the agent. Practically, I am informed by the department, the time is allowed to count from the period when the man first proposed to go on the land, and this clause is to bring the law into conformity with the practice of the department as it is. The latter clauses relate to the change in the formation of the board of examiners. As the law at present stands, the board consists of eight surveyors, and the expense of an examination is found to be unnecessarily high. More persons attend, in order to get the fees, than are necessary, and this proposes to reduce the number of examiners to three, and authorizes the examination to take place at a point that may be most convenient. Instead of taking place at Ottawa, if the plaintiff is a resident say at or near Regina, or some other point in the North-west, the examinations may be taken there upon these lands.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to inquire of the minister as to the disposition of the interest which is paid upon these lands. The interest, I believe, which has been paid by the purchaser of school land heretofore has been 6 per cent. Is that to be continued?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think so. I am not aware of any change contemplated in that respect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose the interest which is paid upon the unpaid purchase goes to the credit of the school fund so as to augment the capital?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I ask this, because I read a discussion on that question in some of the Manitoba newspapers in which they pointed out that that interest ought to be paid to them. If the interest is paid on the purchase, it forms part of the actual capital, and consequently becomes part of the capital of the school fund, and should be credited to the school fund the same as the price paid for the land. Is that the practice?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand there has been no change in the practice. None has been made, I certainly should have heard of it. The interest goes into the fund, and the fund is credited to Manitoba.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What interest do you allow the Manitoba Government of this fund? Orginally I am of opinion it was 5 per cent; is it that now?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not very sure. I will ascertain before the bill goes to committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am in favour of the change which has been made in this respect. I think it will be likely to secure a larger amount for the lands, and certainly if you can get 6 per cent on the unpaid capital, it will assist materially, running as long as ten years, to augment the school funds of that province.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out an objectionable feature in the bill, and that is, you propose to deal with sub-clause f of clause 90, which provides a limitation in respect to residence, and so on. Sub-clause f-2 of clause 4 is of the most sweeping character. It provides for no particular length of time in the matter of residence, but would permit the Minister of the Interior or permit the Crown to issue a patent to any one being in occupation of lands immediately previous to the extinguishment of the Indian title. It is a well known fact that the extinguishment of any Indian title is a matter of considerable publicity, and it would be an inducement to a great many persons to at once go into occupation of those lands, because there would be little or no probability of their possession being in any way disturbed; consequently, under this subsection they could immediately demand of the Crown a title for the lands, because they were in occupation immediately before the extinguishment of the Indian title. Under clause f, of clause 90, you make provision for half-breeds who were in the North-west previous to 15th July, 1870, being entitled to certain rights and there is nothing parallel or analogous in the clause which you propose in this bill. There should be some explanation why such an extraordinary power should be given, and why such a sweeping clause should supersede the existing one.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Probably the hon. gentleman is aware that at the present moment Mr. Laird, who is the Indian Commissioner, and, I think, one or two officers of the department, have been deputed to extinguish the Indian title north of Edmonton, and it is known that there are a number of half-breeds there who have never received anything under the Act of 1870, or under the subsequent Act of 1885.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You are issuing scrip in satisfaction of their claims?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is proposed to deal with them as under the Act of 1890, and it is for that purpose that the clause is introduced.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This deals with an entirely different subject. The granting of scrip to half-breeds, by reason of the extinguishment of the Indian title, is one matter, provided for by the Dominion Lands Act. Now you are providing for the granting of a patent to any person, whether half-breed or not, who may be in possession of lands immediately previous to the extinguishment of the Indian title, so that the question of the half breed claims is not taken into consideration at all in clause f-2.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The object, I can assure my hon. friend, at all events is to deal with the half-breeds when they are extinguishing the Indian title.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is under clause f. In the bill which you have just introduced you have provided for that particular matter. Then in clause f-2 you proceed to deal with an entirely different subject, namely, the issuance of patents to persons their servants or agents who may be in possession of lands immediately previous to the extinguishment of the Indian title. What I say is, there should be some limitation to that occupation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They should have been in occupation for some considerable time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They should have been in occupation for some time; otherwise, if you leave a broad and sweeping enactment of this kind on the statute-book, immediately it is announced that there is to be an extinguishment of Indian title, you will have a deluge of persons upon the land to avail themselves of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The report is being made now, and this will apply only to parties found there before the Act is passed. There are a number of squatters on those sections besides the half-breeds, and they are entitled to receive patents for their land.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why should they?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Are we to give them to homesteaders and others, and not give these squatters the same privileges?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You are not dealing with homesteaders.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are dealing with white men found in possession of the lands under such circumstances. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that they should not be placed on the basis of homesteaders? They may have been there ten years, or only one year, and you would not dispossess them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand the point raised by the hon. gentleman from Calgary is this, that persons who would be tempted to squat, hearing of the passing of this bill——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They would not be considered.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It occurs to me that the objection of the hon. gentleman from Calgary could be met by a slight amendment when the bill is in committee—to make those persons prove that they were in possession prior to January.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not see what objection there can be to the clause. You are anxious to get settlers into the country. You are willing to give them homesteads which they may occupy. You have large unsurveyed districts over which you want to extinguish the Indian title. Settlement is advancing in a north-westerly direction. You propose to set out lands for settlement, but there are already some people there. Surely we should be as much pleased to find them there as to have them come afterwards, so long as you are setting out lands for settlement, and I can see no reason in the world why these squatters should not be allowed to remain there and receive a grant of land. The provision here has a limitation. The experience in the settlement of Manitoba and the North-west Territories in many cases was this: where lands are being set out for settlement, you find here and there a squatter, a party who had been trading with the Indians, or supplying persons in the country with provisions they needed in their expeditions for trading and hunting, and those persons in some cases demanded large blocks of land, eight or ten hundred acres. In settling with them, in a few cases a very considerable area was recognized. This settles by law the amount of land that those persons you find as squatters in the territory are to receive. They cannot argue with the minister; they cannot insist on receiving a larger amount than the law allows, and the law removes any discretion the minister might have in the matter. He will be in a position to say to them, "The law allows 160 acres to each squatter; you stand in the same position as if you had been a homesteader after survey." It prevents controversy and assists settlement.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am quite in sympathy with that class of squatters to whom my hon. friend refers. What I want to point out is this: it takes a considerable length of time to extinguish an Indian title. In the meantime very considerable publicity is given to the fact. The clause places no limitation upon the length of occupation of the squatter. Therefore, the moment you announce that you are going to extinguish an Indian title, many people will at once move on those lands for the purpose of securing areas of 160 acres. It is not material about their being bona fide settlers under this bill, but any person upon the wing can settle down on that Indian reserve and, without any qualification for settlement, demand from the government 160 acres. I say such persons should not be in any better position than a bona fide homesteader who goes on the land, and who is compelled to put in three years practically of settlement upon his land. You should place some limitations upon it. Furthermore you may have other Indian titles to extinguish than the Indian title that is now receiving the attention of the government. You make provision for all time to come. I simply direct attention to the matter so that when the bill comes before the committee it can be thought out in all its phases.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This can be better discussed in committee. We have got into the habit of discussing such questions with the Speaker in the Chair as if we were in committee. I wish to supplement what my hon. friend has said in reference to this clause. The hon. Secretary of State did not seem to grasp the real objection that he took. He did not object, under the system which has prevailed in the past, to granting patents to such settlers as the Minister of Justice has described. With this bill before the House and the probability of its becoming law, and the knowledge which prevails all over the North-west that this bill has been introduced, and that Mr. Laird is now negotiating with the Indians north of Edmonton with the view to the extinguishment of their titles, what is to prevent any one from sending his servants to squat on a desirable piece of land there? If they are on the land ten days, there is nothing to prevent them from making a demand for a patent. If the parties who are there, either as servants or as agents were going to be permanent settlers, there could be no objection to it at all. But we know very well from past experience, especially in the United States, when a proposition has been made to acquire Indian titles to land, there is a rush from all the other States, to get possession of the best localities. And so it will be in this country. There will be speculators in our North-west as well as in the United States, and the moment this law is put on the statute-book it may be abused in that way. I think that is the only point my hon. friend intends to make.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall bring the matter under the notice of the Minister of the Interior before the bill goes to committee, and I presume, with the experience Mr. Laird and those associated with him in the department have had, unless a man had considerable improvements, his claim will not be recognized.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is not in Mr. Laird's discretion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes it is. Any man who squatted a few months before Mr. Laird went in there would not be recognized.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My impression is the privilege would be greatly abused if the bill passes in its present state.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (147) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the Department of the Interior." He said:—This bill is not unlike, in some of its features, the bill relating to the Geological Branch. The necessity for this measure arose very recently, when a Mr. Dufresne, who was computor under the chief astronomer, left the service, and it was found impossible to appoint a successor except at $400 a year, and there was no one with the qualifications necessary that would accept that sum. This bill is for the purpose of enabling the department, irrespective of the Civil Service Act, when a specialist is required in that particular branch, to name some one who has the capacity and who naturally will expect the remuneration due to an officer possessing high qualifications. Under the Civil Service Act of 1895, as the hon. gentleman knows, clerks commence at a salary of $400 a year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A third class clerk.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no third-class clerk now. I think there are only two classes, second and first, so that it leaves the department in a rather embarrassing position. The necessity for it arose in the case that I have referred to on a report from an officer of the department.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there not a clause in the Civil Service Act that permits a minister to employ a person with special qualifications and pay him a higher rate than a second class clerk?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—An officer in the service of the country, who is under Parliament and who has very strained ideas on that subject, declines to recognize that principle. Every man must come under the regular provision of the Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Unless he has a special qualification?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There has been a difficulty in filling up the particular vacancy to which I have referred.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

POST OFFICE AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (155) "An Act to amend the Post Office Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As was explained on the second reading of this bill it refers to certain details of the Post Office Act, giving the Postmaster General additional power, fixing a fee for late mailable matter, on the same principle, I presume, as quick deliveries, and rates fixed for the insurance of registered letters up to $25. The hon. leader of the opposition asked for some particular explanation as to why clause 127 exempted British Columbia from the operation of the clause. The reason given at the time was the substantial reason, that in British Columbia it is quite impossible to find railway mail clerks who have served for ten years, and therefore that province was exempted by the Act of 1894, when some amendments were made, and it is continued to be exempted because they could not get officers who had been ten years mail clerks for the offices of superintendent. For that reason it is considered only fair that British Columbia should be excluded.

On clause 2.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can you explain why, if you are adopting the principle of insuring registered letters you confine its operation to sums not exceed ing $25? I take it for granted that if $5 is inclosed the fee for insuring its proper delivery would not be as much as if it were $25.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it is to be a graduated insurance, why confine it to $25?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because it is a novelty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A novelty?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, in Canada. It has been tried in other countries and has been found acceptable. I have no doubt when we have had some experience of it here it will be widened. The Postmaster General wished to see how it worked, and what loss it might entail on the Post Office Department.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It will have an affect on the issuing of post office orders?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand this to mean $25 cash. Would not an accepted cheque be treated as actual cash.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You can pay a fee for cash or a draft. I do not know whether it would apply to parcels, it says "registered mailable matter."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose it means anything not exceeding in value $25.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 3.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why do you except the Territories and simply deal with British Columbia in the clause? The mail clerks in the Territories have about the same term of service as the mail clerks in British Columbia. The mail service was practically organized in both sections about the same time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume the draftsman took it from the former statute of 1894-95.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You could easily appoint an outside man?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There would be no difficulty because the law is widened now. Only half the ten years is required to be put in on the road.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You would debar many men who might have reasonable expectation of becoming superintendent by reason of this limitation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is another serious objection to this provision. It is perpetuating a system of provincialism. It has been the practice heretofore to move officers from one section of the country to another. There is no reason why a competent official of this character, who has been in service in Manitoba or the North-west Territories, or anywhere else in the country, should not be sent to British Columbia and vice versa. It seems to me on the introduction of a province into confederation, there might be an excuse for a few years for adopting a policy of this kind, but after they have been a part and parcel of the Dominion for ten or fifteen years, I think the system is bad to confine appointments to any one particular place. We have been obliged to remove officials from Manitoba to British Columbia, particularly in the Customs Department, and customs officials have been sent also from Ontario and British Columbia into the Yukon Territory, and a great many have been sent to the Rossland and other districts, for the simple reason that you want men who have had experience in the work. It enables an officer better to collect the revenue. In this case, a superintendent should be a man who has had a good deal of service, yet my hon. friend says because they have not had officials long enough in the service in British Columbia, therefore you must exempt them from the operation of the law. The best way to meet that local demand is to exchange officers. Why not extend the same principle to all the departments at once? You have sent a man from Ottawa, to take charge of the New Westminster penitentiary, simply because you had no man there with the experience necessary to justify you in placing him in the position. Why it should be confined to this department alone, I do not know. If British Columbia, or Prince Edward Island, or any other province is to be exempt from the general operation of the law, you had better exempt them all at once and prevent a Quebec officer from being sent into Ontario, or an Ontario officer being sent into Quebec. It is vicious in principle and will lead to abuse—I will say abuse of power, and of political influence. In a constituency where they have not a man actually qualified for a position, the influence may be such as to induce the minister to appoint a man who is totally unqualified for that office. I lay it down as a general principle,—and I think those who have had any experience in the filling of these positions, cannot help coming to the same conclusion—that the sooner the confining of the appointments to any one particular place is abolished, the better for the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman will see that the position of British Columbia is peculiar and different from that of any other part of the Dominion. There is no other place in the Dominion where so many new mail routes have been opened. There are more in British Columbia than any other portion of the Dominion, up through the Cariboo and Kootenay districts and all through that country. A man from the east, who had not served in British Columbia, would be quite incapable of gaining in a short time that experience which one, who had been in the country for three or four years, had acquired; and for that reason British Columbia was excluded. I do not think that the parallel of the penitentiary will apply, inasmuch as the Post Office Inspector in British Columbia has to be an active officer, familiar with all the routes and highways of the country, and it could not be expected that a man being sent from the east could possess that information at once. That is the only reason British Columbia should be exempt from the law and the department should be allowed to select the most intelligent of those who had been serving in the best parts of the country.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think this committee is rather missing the full scope of the amendment contained in clause 3. The old Act provides that no person shall be eligible, except in British Columbia, for this position unless he has served ten years as a railway mail clerk, but it is now proposed that any person shall be eligible in any province of Canada, except British Columbia, if he has served five years as a railway mail clerk. The real scope of the clause is to make any railway mail clerk who has served five years eligible for this office of superintendent in all the provinces except British Columbia, instead of ten years as formerly. We certainly should be furnished with some reason, when a staff is increasing in number, and when experienced men are easier to obtain than in former years, why it is that experience is going to be cast to the winds and a man of the limited experience of five years is to be made eligible for an office which, in earlier years of the service, required ten years?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He must serve ten years, but one-half of it may be served in the inside service if the Postmaster General thinks proper. Ten years has to be served in all cases, but one-half may be inside and one-half outside.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think that is so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it reads that way. He must be at least ten years in the mail service, and must serve as mail clerk at least one-half. There is no intention of shortening the period.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The argument of the hon. Secretary of State in favour of this clause leads me to the conclusion that it ought not to be adopted. If you require an experienced man to superintend all the mail clerks in a country which is growing rapidly, as in the Kootenay district, surely you should select one who has had that experience instead of one who has not. All he has to do is to superintend the work and to see that it is properly done, and the moment the mail service is established, then it is for the superintendent to see that the employees do their work properly. It is not his duty to travel over all these roads. The inspectors do that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a matter of fact, this provision with respect to British Columbia is in the existing law. I understand the hon. gentleman thinks the exception should be removed?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps he is right, but the experience of the department should be the best guide. With respect to the other point, I cannot see why an officer who has been employed in the office of the inspector of post offices for five years, and who has been dealing with the letters which go over the railway line, and who has been a railway mail clerk for five years, should not be nearly as good as one who has been a railway mail clerk for ten years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—After the discussion we had on this point on the second reading, I sent the bill to the Postmaster General for his view and I received the following:—

The reason for the exception in British Columbia from the provisions of chap. 127, is that the railway mail service has been only so recently organized in British Columbia that there are no mail clerks there of ten years standing, and but for this exception it might be necessary, in case of vacancy, to send to British Columbia a superintendent from some other part of the Dominion.

This provision is not new, but is the present law. The only part of the section which is new is that which allows the ten years to be distributed partly in active service on the railway and partly in the office of the Chief Superintendent.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Entirely apart from the existing Act, in dealing with the merits of the bill, there is no qualification whatever upon the appointment to office in British Columbia. Why should so wide a distinction prevail between the other parts of the Dominion and British Columbia? You require a very considerable service in the other parts of the Dominion, and at the same time there is not the least qualification necessary for a superintendent of railway mail clerks in British Columbia. You can appoint a man who has not had a year's experience on the railway or mail service and make him superintendent of British Columbia. I have heard no good reason advanced yet why so broad a distinction should be made between the other parts of the Dominion and British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose the hon. gentleman knows the reason for the introduction of this clause?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It seems to have been the Act for 1894.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend is altogether too conservative for me. He is marching on towards toryism at a rate which rather surprises me and will surprise the whole Dominion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Hear, hear!

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the first remarks I made I called atttention to the fact that when British Columbia and the North-west Territories joined confederation, there might have been an excuse for that, because at the time the system did not prevail which prevails now, but that has passed away, and I see no reason why it should be continued. I am not so wedded to what took place twenty or fifteen years ago ——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Or five years ago.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, five years ago.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Hear, hear!

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There might be questions on which we disagreed five years ago which do not exist to-day, and we might be working together. I do not think I should be rowing in the same boat, however, as my hon. friend who cheers derisively at the remarks I made. But what we should all object to is that if any principle has been adopted in a bill, whether it is five or two years ago, and we find circumstances do not exist to-day as they did then, and that should be abolished, I am sufficient of a reformer myself to have it abolished at once. I am not half as big a Tory as my hon. friend the leader of the government. I am sorry he is not still more of a Tory in matters of public interest. He would do better and there would not be much opposition.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I did not speak derisively when I said hear, hear. I approved of the proposition that five years ago we might hold one view and abandon it now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is it the fact that in the case of a man you wished to reward for services, who never had any experience at all as a mail clerk in the Post Office Department, he can be put over the heads of those who understand their business? Because that appears to be the provision, and one would be led to suppose that it was done for the purpose of providing for those who had claims on the government setting aside the Civil Service Act. If that is the case, we had better repeal the Act altogether.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is placed at ten years all over Canada except in British Columbia and I think you may trust the Postmaster General to that extent.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY, from the committee, reported the bill without amendments.

USURY BILL.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The orders of the day being called :

Consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to ((Bill J) "An Act respecting Usury."—(Hon. Mr. Dandurand.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I hope my hon. friend will not proceed with this bill until it is printed. I understand important amendments have been made to the bill which the members of the House have not had the opportunity of studying.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman was not here when we deferred the consideration of the bill. It was decided at that time that there was no reason for printing the bill, inasmuch as it appeared as amended in the minutes of this chamber, and for that reason nobody moved that it should be printed, and the House concurred in that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Did the House agree that it should not be reprinted?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is reprinted in the minutes of Friday last on page 500.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I would recommend the hon. member to take the advice of the hon. gentleman from Calgary and have the bill reprinted, as otherwise a great many members would vote against it who would not do so if they had the bill before them in reprinted form.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The whole bill appears on page 500 of the minutes. The Committee on Banking and Commerce have maintained the limit of interest at 20 per cent which appeared originally in the bill, as I submitted it. Instead of making the bill general they have reduced it to sums under one thousand dollars. It covers all the usurers I want to reach who lend small sums of money from $50 and perhaps somewhat lower, up to two or three hundred dollars, and it is not open to the objection that it interferes with loans which have been made to railway promoters and to developers of mines where people, under the form of interest, bargain for a share of the profit. They are not touched by the bill at all. The interest from date of suit is reduced to 6 per cent. There is a penal clause added, which is clause 8. Then clause 9 declares that the Yukon Territory is excepted. As I have stated, the interest is reduced to 6 per cent from date of suit. In reprinting the bill from the sub-committee to the Banking Committee, a phrase was left out which I want to place in the bill again. The members of that sub-committee, two of whom are present here, the hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Ottawa, will agree with me when I state that we intended reducing the rate of interest from the date of suit to six per cent, and in reading the reprinted form of the bill I thought I did it in clause 5. It was in the second clause of my bill as printed. Clause 5 reads:

5. The principal of any sum of money, as expressed by section 3 of this Act, due and exigible, before the date of the passing of this Act, shall not, from and after the said date, bear a rate of interest greater than twenty per cent per annum; and from and after the said date no rate of interest greater than six per cent per annum shall be recovered under any judgment, rendered before the said date, allowing a greater rate than six per cent per annum.

As hon. gentlemen will see, it simply affects judgments already rendered. I therefore move to add the following to section one:

But the rate of interest should be reduced to six per cent per annum from the date of issue to process in any suit, action or other proceeding for the recovery of the amount due.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think that adds very much.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The maximum rate of interest is 20 per cent. After maturity, in cases where the instrument does not mention the rate of interest, the legal rate of 6 per cent will be charged.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Would my hon. friend accomplish what he desires by taking out of section 5 "rendered before the said date?"

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—This clause only covers judgments which are hanging over people at 60 and 100 per cent. I confess I tried to remodel clause 5.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—You want to make it retroactive.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Clause 5 is retroactive. The amendment I am moving to clause one makes it declare that it is for the future as well as for the past. By clause five we make it apply to judgments at the rate of 6 per cent.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does that cover all cases on which judgment has been issued notwithstanding there may have been a contract that a larger rate shall be charged?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then I understand if two parties solemnly enter into a martgage paying eight per cent, and the lender sues the borrower, that that mortgage contract is not to retain its validity, but immediately on the suit being entered becomes reduced to six per cent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That was the intention of the committee. This is for sums under $1,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman of Montreal should read his amendment again. He must see that clause two of the bill does not deal with sums under $1,000 alone. It deals with sums of all amounts. Clause three deals with the amounts of $1,000, but the preceding clause deals with all amounts, no matter what the amount of the loan is. That is why I ask the hon. gentleman to read the amendment again because he is doing more than he wishes to do.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Would it not be better to go into committee and discuss these clauses?

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—If my hon. friend leaves clause eight as it stands now, he will find a great many members obliged to vote against the bill.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—My hon. friend from Calgary asks in case mortgage bears eight per cent, under this bill if the mortgage is sued on will it bear only six per cent. If the rate is twenty per cent or over, it is reduced to six per cent after the judgment but up to twenty per cent the contract is good.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—All this shows it is useless to go on with this bill until the final bill, as reported from the committee, is printed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—We have it at page 500 of the minutes. I move that this bill be referred to Committee of the Whole to consider the amendment.

The motion was agreed, to and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee).

On clause 2.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why repeal clause one of chapter 127 which deals with interest in every ramification of business?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—In the clause which is substituted you will find it practically re-enacted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You are dealing with a class of contracts under $1,000. Why should you eliminate the enabling clause of the Interest Act? It is entirely unnecessary?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Because you will find in the clause that is substituted you have the whole wording of that section. It is the law clerk who prepared this under the direction of the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You propose now to substitute clause 1 for clause one of chapter 127, and as far as I can see that clause does not deal with the limitation of $1,000.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The clause which we are substituting is a general clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You start off with a prohibition at once. Clause one is not parallel at all with chapter 127. You are interfering with the whole Act, and you are placing the prohibition on chapter 127, and making this clause which we are now considering referable to all matters of contract under chapter 127.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—We are simply making a limitation of 20 per cent.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This limitation of 20 per cent, as I understand it, applies only to loans of $1,000 and under.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then you are striking out the law which relates to the rate of interest on all amounts.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That is subject to clause 2 which declares it is only applicable to sums of $1,000 and under.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The law provides for freedom of contract in interest. You substitute for that a limitation that all transactions shall be limited to 20 per cent. You start off with the prohibition, no one shall stipulate for, allow or exact a rate of interest larger than 20 per cent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I will satisfy my hon. friend by moving that clause 2 be replaced by the clause in the bill as I drafted it, limiting it to amounts under $1,000.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Do I understand that if this bill passes a man can legally loan money at 20 per cent?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Do you suppose if I go back to Nova Scotia and say that I voted for a bill to put down usury which admits such a rate of interest that they will not consider me a fit subject for a lunatic asylum?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Twenty per cent upon a small sum for a short time, is not considered an exorbitant amount. A proposition was made to fix the limit at ten per cent, but a member from the North-west asked that the rate be not reduced, because for small loans and for short terms it has been usual to lend money at fifteen to twenty per cent. I am after a certain class of money lenders, and those money lenders I know I can reach by fixing the maximum at twenty per cent.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I admit that it will regarded, in my province, as rather a queer way of putting down usury by putting the rate at twenty per cent. It will be like the old political watchword we used to hear about, "Come along, John, and put down bribery and corruption. We have lots of money."

Hon. Mr. POWER—The bill as it came from the committee provided that in no case—it was not limited to sums under $1,000—should any person stipulate for, allow or exact more than twenty per cent. I was not aware that any gentleman in this House thought that any greater rate of interest should be allowed. I think the hon. gentleman from Calgary only claimed that in the North-west loans were sometimes made as high as twenty per cent, and I do not think there can be any objection to this provision that in no case shall more than twenty per cent be recovered, and the bill which the committee has reported prohibits a higher rate of interest than twenty per cent per annum in any case. Now, the hon. gentleman who has charge of the bill proposes to amend it and provide that it shall apply only to loans of sums of less than $1,000. I do not see why he should make that change. I do not think the clause goes too far as it is. If there is any hon. gentleman in this House who can show that it is desirable that more than twenty per cent should be allowed, let him rise and speak now or for ever hold his peace.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I cannot see why you give the privilege to a rich man to borrow any sum over $1,000, while you limit a poor man who wishes to borrow less than $1,000, to a rate of 20 per cent. If I understand this bill properly, it does not reach those who borrow over $1,000.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I think that is a discrimination in favour of a rich man which this House ought not to recognize. I would rather see the $1,000 left out entirely. There are instances no doubt where a rich man would like to borrow $2,000 at 20 per cent or even more, and that may be less to him than 20 per cent on $1,000 to a poor man. The rich man may be willing to pay a sum exceeding 20 per cent, 30 or 40 per cent for a short loan. He is at liberty, according to this bill, to do it, while the poor man must be limited, because he cannot borrow more than $1,000, and he is subject to the penalty this clause imposes if he enters into a contract to pay more than 20 per cent. I think the bill is wrong from first to last.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—We were told that the object of the bill was to protect the poor man. That poor men were obliged to pay exorbitant rates of interest. This bill is to protect that class of the community. I suppose it is small in a large population, but we must all admit it has been a crying evil in the past, and the object of this bill is to meet the cases which have been brought to the notice of this House by the hon. gentleman from Montreal. That is why the amount is limited to $1,000. Cases were instanced where large sums of money had been borrowed at high rates of interest.

The amounts ranged from $20 to $200, if rich men choose to pay a large rate of interest, they know what they are doing; they do not require any protection. This bill is to protect the poor men who are obliged by necessity to borrow money from parties who are so usurious in their ideas that they charge extortionate rates of interest. I do not see how you can reach such a class as that without legislation such as is proposed here.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—My amendment is to prohibit a larger rate than 20 per cent for any sum under $1,000.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am sorry the hon. gentleman has jeopardized the passage of this bill by the language of the latter part of the clause. There is not a loan company in Canada but would be a loser by it; I refer to the limitation of interest to six per cent between due dates and judgment.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Is not the rate limited now?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Can they collect more than six per cent after judgment under the law as it now is? I say no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They can collect according to contract.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I will admit they can in the province of Quebec. If the hon. gentleman thinks six per cent is too low from the date of the issuing of the writ, let him propose seven or eight.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I say where a contract has been entered into between a borrower and a lender, whether under mortgage or any other class of contract, that contract should be enforced in its entirety until judgment is obtained. At the present time that is the law throughout the Dominion of Canada—the contract rate applies until the recovery of judgment. If you adopt this clause you at once offer inducements to a borrower, be it on mortgage or occupying any other position, to keep the lender in court with his suit dragging along possibly six months, a year or two years, as I have known suits to do, so that he can have the advantage of that money at six per cent from the time the writ is issued until judgment is recovered. If you legalize the rate of interest as you are doing at least 20 per cent, I say that until the recovery of judgment at least, if not until the payment of the money, the borrower should be bound by the contract into which he has solemnly entered, and you should not offer a premium on fraud, because it would be a fraud for a man who agrees to pay 8 per cent per annum to say to the mortgagee, "I will permit you to sue me; I will resist and delay the suit in every possible way, and I will have the use of your money at 6 per cent notwithstanding my contract."

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—My point is this: a mortgage becomes due to-day bearing, say, ten per cent and it is not paid. Can the mortgagee claim from the mortgagor anything more than six per cent after that time?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, all he has to do is to set out in his statement of claim that there is a contract to pay a certain rate of interest.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I am speaking of the interest after the mortgage is due. You cannot collect more than six per cent.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The matter has been settled by the Supreme Court. If it is provided in the mortgage, for instance, that the rate of interest shall be ten per cent and that the mortgage shall expire at a certain date, then the mortgagee would not be entitled to recover more than six per cent after the due date of the termination of the mortgage; but if the mortgage provides, as nearly all mortgages provide now, since the authority to which I have alluded, that the rate shall continue until the debt is paid—"whether paid at maturity or afterwards," are the words usually used in the mortgage—then that contract bears interest at the rate stipulated until payment is made.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Provided the contract so stated. But if it does not contain those words, and no mortgage did until very recently, it merely carries six per cent until paid.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend from Montreal proposed to wipe out the contract between the parties, and to provide that the rate of interest shall cease from the issuing of a writ.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—But the contract is at an end.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman will remember I spoke of a reduction from twenty to ten per cent. A majority of the committee thought six per cent should be the rate that a sum should bear from the institution of suit. My hon. friend moves no amendment to the sum fixed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am simply pointing out to my hon. friend and to the House the impropriety of invading contracts representing millions and millions of dollars throughout the whole Dominion of Canada, and making practically a laughing stock of this Senate. If we are to approach this subject we had better do so from a business standpoint, and not enter upon practically a cancellation of existing contracts or, in other words, a confiscation of money.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I notice my hon. friend substitutes a clause differing from the clause reported by the committee. The bill as reported provides that the rate of interest shall be reduced to six per cent unless another amount is fixed by express terms in the instrument; but in this amendment it is proposed to reduce the rate to six per cent, notwithstanding the contract.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If the hon. gentleman will read the clause, he will see it does not bear that interpretation. If the contrary has been provided, according to the clause it cannot go beyond twenty, but I want to reconcile that clause with clause five which provides that for judgments bearing a larger rate of interest which had been rendered before the passage of this Act, they shall after the passing of this Act bear no greater rate of interest than six per cent. I thought we should declare that for the future as well as for the past.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is that difference anyway, that in the first clause of the bill, as reported from the committee, the interest would not be reduced to six per cent, but would remain at any rate provided for in the contract. We are now asked to reduce the rate to six per cent no matter what the contract was.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes, for sums under $1,000.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Surely my hon. friend will appreciate the fact that the great majority of the mortgages in the Dominion of Canada are for sums under $1,000, and the borrower is perfectly willing to pay eight or ten per cent, as the case may be; are we by this legislation to involve the whole country in law suits, as would undoubtedly culminate in the event of the passage of this legislation, to reduce the rates to six per cent?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—With the permission of the committee, I will practically return to the original clause. I had struck out the word "ten" and substituted a "six," and I am prepared to say the reduction shall be ten if it meets with the approval of the committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If there is a contract to pay a fixed amount, why should there be any reduction?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Because when a borrower has borrowed at a higher rate than ten per cent, and fails to pay, and shows thereby that it is impossible for him to pay, it is but just, when a judgment may hang over his head for a number of years, that we should say that the rate of interest is reduced to ten per cent. I think ten per cent is quite a large rate of interest. We allow twenty, but we say ten per cent from the date of suit until payment is made.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—If the hon. gentleman makes some alteration of that kind, it may to a certain extent meet the objection, but I have been trying to make out the case between the two lawyers, and what I could not understand was this: there is a great deal of money loaned in the North-west at 8 per cent, and the borrower undertakes to pay that 8 per cent until the money is repaid. If the bill as it stands now was to have the effect that when a mortgage of that kind became due, if the party loaning the money had to sue the mortgagee, no matter what trouble it might involve, he could not get more than 6 per cent, it seems to me it would be a most outrageous thing to meddle in that way with an enormous amount of business throughout the whole country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have suggested that I am ready to change the 6 per cent and make it 10 per cent.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why not say after judgment?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It would be from the date of suit that the interest would run.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is hard to understand what we have before us from the various modifications in the clause, but if I am right that this clause, which formed number two of the bill as the hon. gentleman introduced it in the first place, or as it was reported from the sub-committee, then I understand that the reduction, on the writ being issued, to 6 per cent will be only in cases where the usurer had demanded more than 20 per cent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No. The interest is reduced to ten per cent from the date of suit on all sums borrowed below a thousand dollars.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Whether the rate was twenty per cent or ten per cent or any other rate?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It cannot be reduced if it is below ten per cent.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This bill is aimed at usurers, and the twenty per cent rate has been fixed as one which will be regarded as excessive or usurious, and one of the penalties for such a charge is, when the suit commences the interest will be brought down to ten per cent, but that that will not apply to cases where the rate of interest is seven or eight per cent, or any reasonable rate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It cannot be reduced if it is eight per cent, of course, because we make the minimum ten per cent. But if it were any rate from 11 per cent to 20 per cent then it would be reduced to 10 per cent. I move that this amendment be adopted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the hon. member has rather confused the matter, and that he has departed from the bill as reported from committee. I think he should have met the objection of the hon. gentleman from Calgary, which, after he enlarged upon it, I could see the importance of—that we should not repeal the old law which is intended to affect all loans of money, but that we should bring this in to have the effect we want under the bill, and if my hon. friend had simply provided for that and not introduced a clause which differs so widely, he would not have got into difficulties.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am not departing from the principle laid down in the bill as reported from committee, because in clause 5 they have reduced the interest after judgment to 6 per cent. If we say now 10 per cent we will have, when we come to clause 5, to replace the six per cent interest by uniform rate of ten per cent. I am still in accord with the bill as reported.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the bill and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

The Senate adjourned.

MANITOBA AND SOUTH EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

RULES OF THE HOUSE SUSPENDED.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, I move that the rules of the House be dispensed with in so far as they relate to Bill (157) "An Act respecting the Manitoba and South Eastern Railway Company." The rule requires posting up for twenty-four hours before the bill goes to the committee. The Railway Committee meets on Friday, and the bill will not be posted up till to-morrow. I make this motion in order to avoid the necessity of the bill being postponed till next week.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Is this a bill on which there will be much debate? Will it cause any delay?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The bill is likely to be amended in our House, and it is desirable that it should go to the House of Commons if it is to pass this session.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am anxious that we should get to the consideration of the Drummond County Railway Bill. There are many obstructions put in the way of that bill, I think it is three weeks, or nearly that length of time, since the bill was brought before us, and there have been different things brought up to prevent the discussion going on. That may not be done purposely, but it is done, and if this bill is likely to take any time I shall oppose this motion. If the hon. gentleman can show me that it will not occupy much time, I do not wish to raise any obstacle. If the object is to lose time, I object.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It will not occupy any time. The object of the motion is to save time.

The motion was agreed to.

OIL SUPPLY FOR THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRIES.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired:

1. If tenders were called for in May, 1896, by the Intercolonial Railway for one year's supply of lubricating and burning oils?
2. What offers were received for such supply of oils?
3. What were the analyst's reports on the samples accompanying each tender?
4. Were contracts awarded and successful tenderers notified?
5. Were such contracts subsequently cancelled, and if so, when?
6. Was any contract entered into during the year 1896, or subsequently, with the Galena Oil Company, of Detroit, U.S., or its agent, A. Lichtewhein, of New York, for the supply of oils to the Intercolonial? If so, what was the date of such contract?
7. Was such contract the result of a public advertisement for tenders?
8. Were samples furnished by the said Galena Oil Company? If so, what were the analyst's reports on them?
9. What was the cost per gallon of lubricating oil supplied to the Intercolonial Railway for each of the years 1895, 1896, 1897 and 1898?
10. What has been the amount paid to the Galena Oil Company for oils from the 1st of July, 1896, to the present date?
11. Were any deductions made to the Intercolonial Railway by the said Galena Oil Company on contra account or any other cause?
12. Were new tenders called for, for the supply of oils since the first contract was made with the said Galena Oil Company?
13. Is the contract with the Galena Oil Company aforesaid on a mileage basis, with a guarantee of a reduction of 10 per cent on the previous cost of lubricating the Intercolonial Railway?
14. Was a similar offer with the same guarantee made by John Humphrey & Son, of Moncton, the 27th of May, 1895, and declined by the Intercolonial Railway?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The answers are as follows:—1. Yes. 2. Offers were received from John McGoldrick, St. John, N.B.; Galena Oil Works, Toronto; J. R. Hutchins, Montreal; Eastern Oil Company, St. John, N.B.; Samuel Rogers & Co., Toronto; A. Holden & Co., Montreal; Imperial Oil Co., Petrolia, Ont.; The Bushnell Oil Co., Montreal. 3. The reports of the analyst are too lengthy to be given in answer to an inquiry, but will be given on motion for a return. The reports received from the analyst were, however, not acted upon, and the oil recommended in this report was not selected, nor were contracts awarded based thereupon. 4 and 5. The Imperial Oil Company were notified, on the 7th of July, 1896, that the contract for passenger coach oil, summer use, engine oil, summer use, freight car axle oil, summer and winter use, cylinder oil, petroleum "A," and single or hand lamp oil would be awarded to them; but, after the change of government, the minister, on looking into the tenders, and receiving a more favourable offer from the Galena Oil Works was authorized by Order in Council to notify the Imperial Oil Company that a contract would not be executed with them, and it was awarded to the Galena Oil Works of Toronto. 6. The contract with the Galena Oil Company bore the dates of 17th of September, 1896, and 23rd September, 1896, being for lubricating oil and signal oil respectively. 7. Yes, the letting of the contract was the result of the public advertisement for tenders; the Galena Oil Company was one of the tenderers, and their tender was regarded as more favourable than any of the others—containing as it did a provision or agreement to supply the oil to the Intercolonial Railway at a cost per car mile 10 per cent less than the oils had cost the Intercolonial Railway for the preceding twelve months. 8. Samples were furnished by the Galena Oil Company, and the analyst's report thereon will be furnished when called for by a motion for the papers. The department was satisfied with the reports on the Galena Oil Company's product; it is being used by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Canada Atlantic Railway Company, and all the principal railways of the United States, and to the extent, it is believed, of 95 per cent of the railways in the latter country. 9. The price per gallon for lubricating oil supplied the Intercolonial Railway in 1895 was:

	Winter.	Summer.
Passenger coach oil.....	19½c.	15⅜c.
Engine oil.....	21½	22
Freight car axle oil.....	8¼	9¼
Cylinder oil.....		30
Dynamo oil.....		22½

The total cost of lubricating oil used for locomotives and cars from the 1st of November, 1895, to the 31st of October, 1896, was $33,377.75. This amount was for the twelve months preceding the commencement of the contract with the Galena Oil Company. 10. From the 1st of November, 1896, to the 31st of October, 1897, the oil furnished by the Galena Oil Company for locomotives and cars cost $43,174.09, and for the twelve months from 1st of November, 1897, to the 31st October, 1898, lubricating oil from the Galena Oil Company used for locomotives and cars cost $40,266.12. As the contract with the Galena Oil Company is on a mileage basis, the figures per car mile for the years mentioned will have to be obtained from Moncton,—and this information is in course of preparation. 11. In making payments, there has been deducted from the Galena Oil Company's account a sufficient sum to assure a saving of 10 per cent a year, according to the contract, for each year during which the same has been in operation. 12. New tenders have not been called for lubricating oils since the first contract was made with the Galena Oil Company. 13. Yes; the contract with the Galena Oil Company is, as above stated, on a mileage basis, with a guarantee of a reduction of ten per cent, as above stated. The amount paid the Galena Oil Company for oil for the years 1896-97, 1897-98 and 1898-99, is $99,429.41. A sufficient amount has always been kept back in making payments so as to cover the guarantee. 14. J. A. Humphrey & Son, of Moncton, N.B., tendered for oil on the 27th May, 1895, along with others; they gave prices for engine oil, cylinder oil, passenger coaches; but they made no offer to oil passenger coaches according to mileage, and gave no guarantee of reduction in cost of oiling cars or coaches; but they made an offer to oil all locomotives on a mileage basis, and guaranteed a saving of ten per cent from the cost in the previous year.

The prices per Imperial gallon with guarantee were:

Cylinder oil.. .....80c.
Engine oil..... .....40c.

INTERCOLONIAL EXTENSION BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the second reading (Bill 138) "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal," and on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Perley, that the said bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM said:—When speaking last Friday at six o'clock, I informed the Senate that I would only speak a very short time on this bill, but on considering the matter, I think there are some contradictions between members supporting the passage of this bill, and I will refer to them. My hon. friend from West Northumberland showed us that the action of the Senate two years ago saved the country $700,000.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—When speaking the other day, I did not read the remarks of the hon. gentleman from West Northumberland (Mr. Kerr) in the House, and he did not appear to be satisfied with the expressions which I used. I will read to-day just what the hon. gentleman stated. I may say, further, that the hon. senior member from Halifax (Mr. Power) tells us that this is substantially the same bill, that there is no difference, and when I conclude my remarks I will leave the hon. gentlemen to settle that difference among themselves. In order that there may be no misapprehension about the matter I will read from the remarks of the hon. gentleman from West Northumberland. I probably did not make it very plain the other day, but I will try to do so now. He said:

> The Intercolonial road from Halifax to Montreal shows an improvement in our financial terms of nearly $273,000. Is that not an encouragement?

I agree with him that it is an encouragement. However, the earnings of every railway company in the country are increasing, and that is not a sign at all that this bargain is better or worse than the previous arrangement which this House rejected. The government promised us that they would keep track of the earnings and expenditures on the Drummond County Railway, and be in a position to tell us at the end of a year whether it would pay us to enter into this arrangement or not. Have they done so? No. One says it is better, and another says it is substantially the same, and as far as I am concerned, I am satisfied they should have another year in order to show the people of this country whether it will be beneficial to purchase this road or not. The hon. gentleman from Northumberland (Mr. Kerr) also said:

> Just here I would like to refer to a fact. This matter was before the Senate on a previous occasion. Fortunately or unfortunately for me, perhaps, I was not present, but I learned yesterday from the hon. leader of the opposition in this House that by the course the Senate took when this matter was before them on the first occasion the country had saved over $700,000 of money. I am glad to hear it. That item stands to the credit of the Senate, and what I want to do is to see that the item is not blurred out by anything we do now. I want the item to stand there to the credit of the Senate, that this Senate has been the means of saving the country some $700,000. I as a member of the Senate I intend to the end of the chapter to stand up for the rights and dignity of the Senate. I will advocate its rights on all occasions, and I will give credit where I think it is due. I am bound to say that the Senate has been the means of saving this country $700,000 by the course they took then. I submit further, the Senate ought to be satisfied with that.

I do not wish to be uncharitable, but it looks to me as if there had been some engineering in this matter. I do not wish to censure anybody, but it appears to me as if the hon. gentleman from West Northumberland (Mr. Kerr) had been put up to smooth down the senators which had voted against the measure before, and wanted to smooth over the leader of the opposition to support what that gentleman had called "a damnable bill." The hon. senator from Halifax (Mr. Power) says this bill is substantially the same bill that the Senate rejected two years ago. If it is, I do not see how the senators who voted against this arrangement before are going to support it now. I ask hon. gentlemen to consider for a moment the fact that this thing is well engineered. The hon. gentleman from West Northumberland is put up to smooth down hon. gentlemen and get votes in favour of this measure. My hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax, who is an old politician, knows all about it. He will not give us credit for saving anything to the country, because he says it is the same bill substantially. I may have to address myself a little further to the senior member for Halifax, but I shall do it with the greatest kindness possible. I have the greatest respect for him. I was sorry the other day that he went so far as to tell this Senate to consult a member of the other House, a member, learned in the law, as to his own standing at the bar of Nova Scotia, and he spoke of his valuable services in the legislature of his province. I admit all that, and I say it was not necessary for the hon. gentleman to say it. We know him. I know him. I know that he is a most industrious and intelligent member, and his desire is to act in the interests of the country. It was not necessary to refer us to anybody to tell us what his character is. We know it already. In this House, for nine years, if he was not the elected leader, he was the virtual leader of the House, and discharged his duties well. I know he is close to the government now, and many people in the country think he ought not to be outside of the government, but inside of it. I may have to disagree with the hon. gentleman in many cases. For instance the other day he told us that the ex-Minister of Railways was favourable to the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, and he undertook to prove it by quoting his remarks. If he was favourable to it, why did he not take it when the road was offered for $500,000, with all the right of way of which my hon. friend spoke the other day, and which he said was so valuable. But the ex-Minister of Railways would not take it, and he even says in his evidence that it was peddled round and offered for $400,000. The ex-Minister of Railways would have been guilty of great neglect if he did not take advantage of that offer if it was such a bargain. There is something strange about the whole transaction. The hon. gentleman says there is no corruption in this business. I do not charge corruption against anybody. I never did, and I do not now; but there is something strange about it. This gentleman, who virtually holds the stock in the Drummond County Railway, had at one time only 500 shares, but when this government came into power, his holdings increased until he got possession of the road. I understand that he has been manager, to a certain extent, of a political organization. It is strange that the price of the road should go up from $400,000 to the price we are asked to pay for it since it came into his possession. I do not say there is anything wrong, but putting the facts together, I think there is something for the boys in it, and I think there is something for the machine. I think this gentleman has been hugging the machine pretty closely. The hon. gentleman from Northumberland says we saved the country $700,000 by rejecting the first bill. The hon. gentleman from Halifax says we did not save a cent. The government do not admit anything. They are afraid the country might learn that the Senate saved so much to the public treasury. My hon. friend from Northumberland, in the goodness of his heart, let the whole thing out. He tried the other day to excuse his remarks. He says the hon. leader of the opposition told him that the Senate had saved the country $700,000 in this matter. It is something new for the hon. gentleman to take the leader of the opposition in this House as his father confessor or his director on this question. But he was bound that he should tell the truth. I want to see how they work this thing in order to get the Senate to adopt the bill. They do not tell us that this is better than the other bill. They do not tell us so, because the eyes of the people are on them. If the leader of the government will acknowledge that the government were mistaken before, it would make quite a difference in my judgment. But the hon. gentleman asks us to swallow ourselves, to vote for the same thing that we voted against before. I find that on the first occasion ten senators voted for the ratification of this transaction and thirty-seven voted against it. The government now wants us to appear before the country that we were forced to pass this measure. They hold a threat over our heads—a club that they will abolish us if we do no pass this bill. I do not think the Senate are to be frightened by any such threat. I am in favour of bringing the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal. I believe that every man in this country wants the Intercolonial Railway to connect with Montreal, but the government have taken the wrong way to do it. For my part, I want to have the connection at Lévis and Quebec, and you can then get connection with Montreal on both sides of the river. But we look at the expense we are imposing on this country, it is another thing. This arrangement is to last 99 years in the first place and then 99 years more, and then for ever. It puts me in mind of the enterprising lumber man that kept a lumber yard and had all kinds of lumber for sale. A man wanted to purchase posts from him and he said, "Yes, I have cedar posts." "Will they last well?" asked the purchaser. "Yes," said Pat, "they will last for ever, and if you turn the other end down, they will last as long again." That is the way with these gentlemen. They are not satisfied with a 99 years lease, but they want 99 years more and then for ever. I wish to make a few remarks in reference to another branch of the trade of this country. We all know the large amount of money that we have expended in digging and enlarging our canals to prepare for the increasing trade of the country. When the Minister of Justice said the other day that the government would spend a large amount of money at the entrance to Welland Canal on Lake Erie, I was very much pleased. He did not tell me, because it was not in his department, what depth of water they were going to get, or anything of that kind; at the same time I know the government should be very careful and I hope they will see that there will be plenty of water.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Twenty-two feet.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—If they do not have plenty of water at the entrance to the canal, all the expenditure upon our canal system will be useless. There are gentlemen in this House now who remember the stand I took on that question many years ago. I hope the Minister of Justice remembers it. Probably the hon. senator from Cape Breton (Mr. McDonald) remembers it. I was left out of court then—I may be now, but I tell hon. gentlemen this is a serious matter. After all the expenditure in the enlargement of our canals, to-day vessels cannot enter Port Colborne. I raised my voice at the time and said the government had made a great mistake, when adopting the 14 foot draft for our canals, in not having considered the question of the depth of the harbour at Lake Erie then. I shall be very much pleased if my hon friend the Minister of Justice will tell me what depth of water they expect at Port Colborne harbour.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Twenty-two feet.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I can tell my hon. friend that he cannot get 22 feet at Port Colborne if he spends $2,000,000. I know that outside of Port Colborne harbour there is nothing but rock, and any man who has a knowledge of the trade of the country, especially any vessel owner, knows that outside of a harbour you should have good anchorage. If you let your anchor go on the rock, there will be no safety. They are going to build a breakwater out into the lake, to raise the water. If they have to increase the depth of water from 14 to 22 feet, how much is it going to cost the country? The Minister of Justice knows I raised this question before and showed him that Port Maitland harbour was the proper harbour for the entrance to the canal, and for this reason to-day there is 17 feet of water at the entrance to Port Maitland harbour, and for miles up the river you have 20 to 30 feet. There is a bar outside of the harbour for a short distance. Probably it would take a dredging machine a couple of days to remove it. I tell hon. gentlemen that for 54 years Port Maitland harbour has not cost the government of this country one cent for dredging, and I defy contradiction. I know that the Minister of Justice has a good deal to do, but I would ask him to look at the expenditure at Port Colborne harbour during that time. He will find that it has cost a large amount of money to dig and blast, to drill and to dredge, and yet they talk of going on with that work now. I hope they will not. It will be worse than the Drummond County Railway business. They will spend a great deal of public money with little advantage to the country. I see an item of $350,000 in the estimates to improve Port Colborne. I have nothing against Port Colborne. I have a great many friends there. If it is the best place, spend it there by all means. There is quite a controversy going on in that part of the country, naturally, and the people of Port Colborne, of course, are anxious to get the expenditure. They are foolish enough to pass resolutions in their council. Much they know about harbours! Look at Port Maitland. There is a sandy beach of four miles with good anchorage outside and clay bottom, and as I have said, with a very little expense you can get 22 or 24 feet of water there all the time. I want the government to look into the matter. I might read some letters showing what people think about the matter. Here is an article I find in the Toronto Mail and Empire of 14th June, 1899, headed "Defence of Port Maitland." The people round Port Maitland had to defend their harbour; other people were abusing it. If the Minister of Justice can spare the time to come up to my place, I will show him Port Maitland harbour. I will go with him and sound the river myself. I cannot take the time to bore, but I have seen boring 22 and 24 feet, and there was no rock in the way. I am giving him this invitation, because it is important, in the interest of the country, that the question should be settled properly. I know he has no prejudice in the matter and is willing to take the best place irrespective of consequences. I know he would not stoop to get any political advantage, and in this case he could not if he tried. It would not make any difference. I would not accuse him of doing it. In a letter to the editor from Stromness, that's where I live, but I did no write this letter, and I was not consulted about it—the writer says:

DEFENCE OF PORT MAITLAND.

In a letter to the editor from Stromness, "Fair Play" replies to two items which recently appeared in the marine column of the Mail and Empire from Port Colborne, which he characterizes as "gross and glaring misstatements of clearly established facts." "Fair Play" says:—

"In the first item referred to, it was stated that the tug 'Golden City,' with Captain Carter, took soundings off Port Maitland harbour and the statement was also made that the depth in mid-channel at the harbour mouth was but twelve and one-half (12½) feet, and that it was unsafe to enter drawing more than nine feet. The tug 'Golden City' was at Port Maitland, but we much doubt if Captain Carter, of whose integrity and ability we have a very high opinion, ever found the soundings as stated, in the proper channel laid down by coast pilots for entering the harbour. The article was probably written by some one unacquainted with the facts.

"The second item was even more insulting to the people of Dunnville, Port Maitland and vicinity, than the first; inasmuch as it stated that the inhabitants of those places were jeopardizing the lives and property of the marine public by distributing literature tending to show why their own magnificent natural harbour would be a more suitable place for a port of entry to the Welland Canal than the gigantic stone quarry known as Port Colborne. The people of this vicinity have a right to draw attention to the splendid harbour, unequalled in many respects on Lake Erie, and intend to do so if they prefer, notwithstanding the censure of the Port Colborne Town Council, whose object in acting as they do is clearly evident to every thinking person. It is a most natural and legitimate object, too, if they did not misstate facts and pass votes of censure on competent and respectable gentlemen to gain their point; but as they are themselves undoubtedly well aware Port Maitland is the far better harbour, they seem resolved to stick at nothing to get the improvements the government is now considering making.

"We will now state a few facts about Port Maitland harbour, it being comparatively unknown doubtless to a large section of your intelligent readers. We challenge any one to prove by any government chart or coast pilot (Canadian or American) that the facts are otherwise than as stated below. Other vessels can take soundings as well as the tug 'Golden City,' and a great deal better if these two articles stated her soundings of Port Maitland harbour.

"Grand River harbour, or Port Maitland, named from the celebrated Sir Peregrine Maitland, is a truly magnificent natural harbour. A spacious bay, miles in width, flanked on either side by a bluff point reserved by government for defence purposes in case of trouble, gives natural shelter in making the piers with north-easterly to north-westerly winds. With westerly winds the bay is still somewhat sheltered by the upper point or cape. With southerly winds the ship is driven swiftly in, and the only necessity is to carry abundant sail. This harbour can be, and has been, made by sailing schooners without the assistance of a single tug: for steamers it is dead easy. A sandy beach extends far out on each side of the river, forming, with the points, the bay above referred to. Sand dunes shelter the inner harbour, which could easily be converted into fortifications of great resistance. Two long wooden piers extend from the river mouth on either side, sixty yards apart at their outer end; the west pier has the lighthouse, an open frame tower —fixed white light about fifty feet above the water.

"Inside the harbour the river extends with great depth, broad and placid, with easy curves to Dunnville, a distance of five miles. The old canal enters the river about a quarter of a mile from the east breakwater. The land about the river is a marsh flat, intersected by creeks, and rising at the outer end in the sand hills referred to above. The bar outside the harbour referred to in the Port Colborne despatch has eleven feet of water over it. The harbour can be entered from the west in seventeen feet of water; from the east in fifteen. The water in the channel between the piers varies from twenty to twenty-five feet. The bar could be speedily removed, simply by a dredge, in a short time, and a depth of twenty feet throughout the harbour, or even to twenty-five feet, easily maintained. If any one doubts these statements let him come and look for himself."

I know that is a fact. I know that in order to get the truth before the public, that young man took soundings himself. The consideration of a proper entrance to the canal is very important, because seven months of the year the larger portion of the trade will go by our canal. If it does not, our policy heretofore has been all wrong, and the sooner we find it out, the better. But we do not help it if we build a breakwater to raise the water over the rock bottom at Port Colborne. It will cost a great deal more to do that than it will to dig the canal from Port Maitland to the junction of the Welland Canal. I do not wish to be misunderstood in reference to this matter. I know that the business of the country at one time came in by Port Maitland, and that the commerce from the lakes and from the St. Lawrence went through that way for four years, and we were doing four times more business in the Welland Canal then than we are doing now. When the government decided to make the canal 14 feet from Lake Erie to Montreal, they made this mistake, the third mistake which has been made with reference to the Welland Canal. Two of the mistakes were excusable, but the third was not, and was ruinous to the interests of the country. If the government make a fourth mistake, which they will do if they do not consider this matter seriously, it will be detrimental to the trade of the canal. We all know how much a man in charge of a vessel tries to keep clear of a rock bottom, because it will not hold his anchor, and if the ship goes down the least bit in the sea and strikes the rocks she springs a leak and there is no chance for her. I know that it would be necessary to dig eighteen miles of canal and enlarge the feeder. It could be done. I have made a few figures in reference to it, and I know something about canals and dredging. They have placed $350,000 in the estimates for Port Colborne harbour, and I know that they could dig that 18 miles of canal much cheaper than going to Port Colborne. You can do it for $650,000 to $700,000. If the government wish to do it, and do it in haste, they can set the dredges to work to-morrow. They can advertise for tenders and have it finished for next spring's navigation. It is the easiest digging I know of anywhere in Canada. There is no rock anywhere, and any one can see what it will cost. It would have to be dug five yards deep, eighteen miles long, 100 foot bottom and some of the bottom of the feeder is now two feet below the lake level and for two miles out of the eighteen miles the route is through the Grand River swamp is from three to four feet down below Lake Erie's level. I know these facts, and therefore I say that we should be careful not to waste money in that way. They should not go over to Buffalo to see what they have done in the rocks there. They should look for a natural harbour. There is plenty of water to-day and it is not costing a cent in a lifetime scarcely. I am glad the hon. Minister of Justice gave me an opportunity to mention this matter. I will read another letter to the House, addressed to the editor of the Mail and Empire as follows:—

PORT COLBORNE HARBOUR.

To the Editor of the Mail and Empire:

Sir,—There have been three errors made in making Port Colborne or what was known as Gravelly Bay the entrance on Lake Erie to the canal, two of which are excusable considering all circumstances, and one is not.

When Hon. Hamilton Merritt was digging the Welland Canal he had to do the work by hand with men and wheel-barrows; there was no dredging machinery in Canada in those days, and he did well, considering the circumstances and what he had to overcome. He got the canal from Port Dalhousie to Port Colborne whith wooden locks, with seven feet of water on the mitresills, and dug a feeder from Dunnville on the Grand River, twenty-one miles, to feed the canal, to what is known as the junction, seven miles, from Port Colborne. It was found that seven feet of water and wooden locks were not sufficient to carry the trade through the canal, so there was a stone lock built at the junction and a stone lock at Port Maitland, and about two miles of canal dug, from Broad Creek, that is to say, Stromness, in order to use Port Maitland and the feeder to pass the trade that way, which was done with eight feet draught of water for four years until the canal was enlarged and deepened to ten feet. Locks one hundred and forty feet long and twenty-six feet six inches wide and a new aqueduct were built over the Welland River, instead of the wooden one with ten feet of water, and there was plenty of water at Port Colborne harbour for ten or even twelve feet of water. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, it was considered in the best interest of the country and excusable so far to this point. But when the government decided for fourteen-foot navigation from Lake Erie to Montreal, making Port Colborne harbour the entrance to the Welland Canal, they have made a great blunder, knowing, as they must have known, that the depth of water outside of the harbour over the rocky bottom will not float a vessel drawing fourteen feet of water. It may do in calm, smooth water, but not in heavy, stormy weather. Then, vessels taking Port Colborne harbour are liable to come to grief. This is what I call mistake No. 3, and should have been looked into and avoided when the depth of water was adopted of fourteen feet from Lake Erie to Montreal.

That is the third mistake to which I called attention of the Mackenzie government, and my hon. friend in front of me will remember it. If my advice had been taken, if they had even treated it with any consideration at all, we would be in a much better position to-day to take the trade of the country by our canals without any further expenditure:

To continue, by undertaking at Port Colborne, Lake Erie, to build a break-water and outer harbour, to smooth the water over the shoals and rocks, will be, if carried out, what I call mistake No. 4. It will be what the people of Canada will call a wilful mistake when the government have all the facts before them. And what I call mistake No. 4 will be more serious than all the others. To avoid making mistake No. 4 the entrance to the Welland Canal should be on Lake Erie at Port Maitland, sheltered from all winds except the south wind; sheltered from the west by Hyde's point and from the east by Rock house point, located on a sandy beach at the mouth of the Grand River, with plenty of water for miles up the river large enough to accommodate a large fleet of vessels, in fact with more room than is required for a harbour on Lake Erie for all the business of the canal if a hundredfold more than at present. The question of cost should be considered as well as the advantage. By going to Port Maitland you have nine miles more canal, but you will be eighteen miles further up Lake Erie and have a harbour that is free from ice from a week to ten days in the spring before Port Colborne. By going to Port Maitland the feeder from the Grand River to the junction, a distance of about eighteen miles will have to be deepened and made wider, which can be done by dredging—easy, good digging, no rock—and ought to be done at less cost than building an outer harbour and breakwater at Port Colborne, which breakwater will have to be renewed often and never will be satisfactory, as it never has been as a harbour for the purpose for which it was intended. After digging and blasting a basin out of the rock outside of the lock to make a harbour for vessels at a great cost, any one knowing the circumstances of the enlargement of the Welland Canal knows that Port Colborne was not chosen or considered a good harbour for the entrance to the Welland Canal on Lake Erie, but a make-shift from time to time intended to accommodate the trade of the country from year to year.

If the government of Canada will spend a million of money to build an outer harbour at Port Colborne by building a breakwater, they will find that it will be a failure as a harbour in comparison with Port Maitland, where the water at the entrance of the Grand River is twenty feet and the natural harbour inside the river with a depth of from twenty-five to thirty feet of water, where it has not cost the government a dollar for dredging in the last fifty-four years. It would be interesting for the public to know how much it has cost for digging, dredging and blasting to make Port Colborne an artificial harbour during that time (fifty-four years), and after all the expenditure it is considered a failure, even by those that are favourable advocates of outside harbour and breakwater, by advocating the expenditure of more money to overcome former mistakes. A breakwater will calm the sea in its lee, but the breakwater will require renewing and keeping in proper repair to be of any use, which will be adding to the expenditure annually. So they should take warning and choose the proper harbour on Lake Erie, as they have all the information required to choose the proper port.

This short letter is from one who knows a little about Port Colborne, Port Maitland, the Welland Canal, and lake shipping.

Yours, &c.,

A BRITISH-CANADIAN.

OTTAWA, June 26.

I do not know that I can add anything to that, but I am very anxious to have a proper harbour for the Welland Canal on Lake Erie. Without it, all the expenditure on the canals will be useless, though all the heavy freights for eight months of the year must be moved by water. My object in bringing this matter before the House at all is that the Minister of Justice may be careful to look into this matter and see what it has cost already. He may think I have no confidence in him. It is true that politically he is not my leader, but I have confidence in him as a man. I look upon him as the most industrious, the most intelligent and the most learned man in the government, although he may not be the most influential. As far as this Drummond County Railway matter is concerned, I can tell the minister, that he cannot get this bill through the Senate unless he admits that this is a better arrangement for the country than the former one. My hon. friend from Northumberland says it is, but if we act on his assurance and pass the bill, his friends will go on the stump and say that the Senate weakened. Unless the government acknowledge that this bargain is better, I am sure to vote the other way. Much as I think of the Minister of Justice I will not swallow myself on his account.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon friend makes an extraordinary request when he asks me to make a confession to him and the House, that the government, before I was a member of it, made a mistake two years ago in respect to a contract which up to this hour I have never read. All I ask my hon. friend is not to vote upon the old contract. It is dead; but if this is a good one, whether I make any confession or not, let him give it his support. I am like George Washington in that matter: I cannot tell a lie.

Hon Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman was not in the House when the first bill was rejected, but his predecessor promised us a lot of information. Ministers generally are bound by the policy of their predecessors, but I do not know that it will hold in this case. I addressed myself particularly to the Minister of Justice on this question of harbour improvements on Lake Erie, and shall be pleased if he will let us know in some way publicly, before Parliament prorogues, what they propose to do at Port Colborne, what they want this $350,000 for, and how much more money they expect to spend before they get, what I believe they can never get, a harbour at Port Colborne.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—This debate has taken considerable time, and in my opinion a great deal of irrelevant matter has been introduced into the discussion. I intend to discuss the bill purely from a business point of view. The last time this question was before the Senate I took occasion to say that I did not think we had sufficient information to enable us to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion respecting it. Since that time I have not been enlightened in the slightest degree by anything that has taken place with reference to the present bill as compared with the bill of two years ago. It is true we are told by the Minister of Railways and Canals that this bill is identically the same as the previous bill. The Secretary of State demurs to some extent to that statement. He says it is better to the extent of some $6,000 a year. Another hon. gentleman, who has been referred to, contends that this arrangement is better by a very large amount. However, I am not going to dwell on this point. In the first place, I assume that the sentiment expressed by the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland the other day is the one which should prevail in this country—it should be ascertained, in the first place, whether it is desirable, in the interests of the country, that this road should be extended to Montreal. Before we can arrive at a decision on that important matter, it is necessary to understand the whole subject, and the benefits to accrue to the country from the proposed extension. The government have taken a very inopportune time to consider the subject, when there are vast improvements under consideration, when in all probability, the bridge at Quebec is to be constructed, and when it was almost certain that other roads from the west would find an eastern terminus at Quebec. It seems to me that prudent business men would have taken the trouble to examine, and to ascertain by actual observation, the effect that this would have in the future business of the country. The first course to pursue should have been to ascertain the amount of business that the Intercolonial Railway would gain by this extension to Montreal. We are in the dark upon that subject. If what we heard last year is true, that the business between Lévis and Montreal is very insignificant—not sufficient to maintain the lines now in operation—it seems an extraordinary proposition that by adding a third line we are going to increase the business to such an extent as to give profitable employment to three lines. That is the first thing that a business man would have considered. He would then have ascertained by practical experience whether it would be a profitable enterprise, because it does not matter, as far as the interests of the Intercolonial Railway are concerned, whether the eastern terminus is at Lévis or Montreal. The Intercolonial Railway has the entire business of the maritime provinces, and it could not be taken from that road under any circumstances. Therefore, the first consideration, as prudent men, would have been to ascertain the extra amount to be realized through the extension to Montreal, and to calculate what extra expense the country would be put to by this extension. The government have a perfect right to consider, as part of their policy, the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, but before doing that they should have been in a position to convince this country that it was a prudent course to adopt in the general interest of the Dominion as far as revenue and expenditure are concerned. I think calculation of that sort could have been made, and if the government could have shown to Parliament that there was sufficient business to warrant it, I do not believe any one would object to the extension of the road. But we are in the dark and cannot get any information. Two years ago we were told "If you give us a year or two to find out these details, we will come down the next session and give you such a statement of the advantages of this policy that no man will demur to the carrying out of the proposals the government have made." But they decide, in the first place that the road must be extended to Montreal. That policy having been decided upon, it was of course necessary to ascertain what arrangement could be made for that extension. No other party was in a position to treat for this service. Did they inquire into these circumstances before entering into the arrangement? They made an agreement with the Drummond County Railway Company. We are told that this road was constructed some years ago for the purpose of meeting a local want in the transportation of tan bark in that section. But I suppose the supply of tan bark was exhausted, and there was no business for the road, and the owners of it were most anxious to dispose of the property. What did this property consist of? The rails, whatever condition they were in, and the right of way, and it was necessary for the government to ascertain what arrangement they could make with the Grand Trunk for the carrying out of this policy of extension. The Grand Trunk Railway knew that the government were in such a position that they must accept any proposals that were made to them. Whether these proposals are right or not, hon. gentlemen are in a position to decide. The company made an offer of the Drummond County Railway, and that offer was accepted conditionally on its sanction by both Houses of Parliament. We all know that when people have an unprofitable road on their hands, they will dispose of it at almost any price. The longer they hold it the more they will lose; therefore, they will dispose of it, as a merchant will dispose of old stock, for what it will bring. Now, let us inquire into the nature of the arrangement that was made with the Grand Trunk. What do we get in return for the $140,000 a year that we are to pay? We receive the benefits accruing to this new line in connection with the Drummond County Railway and the Grand Trunk, some thirty-five miles I believe, conditional on the government paying a certain portion of the expense attending it. So far as the Grand Trunk is concerned, they had the matter in their own hands. The road was there, and the government agreed to pay this enormous sum of money for a very questionable advantage. Did they ever take into account the collateral advantages that would accrue to the Grand Trunk by this arrangement, or the immense advantage it would be to the Grand Trunk to have a large western trade given to them for all time to come under any circumstances? It seems to me the arrangement savors very much of a huge combine. It appears to me the Grand Trunk and the government have entered into this combine to the exclusion of all other roads in the country. Is it right for any government to enter into a combine of this kind to the detriment of any other road? It is very natural to suppose that the Grand Trunk would make the best arrangement they could. I do not blame them for that. If they did it upon commercial principles I would not have a word to say, but the government did not have the necessary means of ascertaining whether the public were paying too much for the supposed advantages they were deriving by entering into this arrangement with the Grand Trunk. They went on and concluded the arrangement to some extent, and have had a couple of years experience, and what is the result to-day? Can they give us an exact idea of the benefit that will acrue in the future if this arrangement is sanctioned by Parliament. I have not seen any information on this point anywhere. It is true there was a document the other day in the hands of some hon. gentlemen, but it was marked private and confidential, and no honourable man could make use of its contents at that time. That secrecy has been removed and the document has been referred to, but the contents of it amount to very little. The government have not taken the course which any prudent man would take to find out whether this would be a beneficial arrangement for the country or not. They were very hot headed and went to work for the purpose of assisting their political friends. I say that it was the duty of the government to consider whether this contract would be in the best interests of the country. I do not think it will be found that the business will be so increased as to compensate in the slightest degree for the extra expense of the business being transferred from Lévis to Montreal. It can be easily calculated. If a long haul in the past had not been sufficient to pay the expenses of the Intercolonial, how can we expect, a longer haul to compensate the government for entering into this extended agreement? It increases the liabilities of the country to an enormous extent. I do not care how you view it, but if you capitalize $140,000 a year you will find there will be an additional sum to the debit of the Intercolonial of between seven and eight millions. That has to be made up in some way. Then they made a most extraordinary agreement which is embodied in the bill before Parliament to-day and which no man can understand, at least I cannot. The phraseology is such that, in order to understand it a man would require to be throughly conversant with railway matters, but I can see that the greatest trouble was taken to conserve and protect the rights of the Grand Trunk in every detail. The government were expected to pay for every small item that possibly could be managed. It was well laid out, for the purpose of protecting the interests of the Grand Trunk. Then, consider the enormous risk that this country takes by going into this arrangement. We have to pay a proportionate part of the betterments that may take place on this road in the future. We do not know whether it will be $100,000, or $200,000, or $500,000. We are completely at the mercy of the Grand Trunk for anything done in the future. It is all very well to say, "You have a voice in the matter," but the Grand Trunk are well up in their business, and they will convince the government that these improvements are necessary to carry on the business of the country. If they want an additional store-house for freight business, or require additional carsheds or office room, the cost of all these will be proportionately borne by the country for the benefit of the Grand Trunk. Is this not a very great risk we are undertaking? We join with them, we may say, as partners to a certain extent, without the right that partners generally have. We are not joint proprietors. That road will be theirs, and this country will be bound to pay $140,000 a year and all the other extra expenses connected with it, and we get nothing in return except the provisional arrangement by which we can use that road under certain circumstances. Supposing that great bridge, which has cost so much money, was blown up, would we be liable for that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no. We are only liable for the roadbed.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I am glad to hear that, but no one can understand this arrangement. I thought we were joint partners and became liable for everything. I have gone over the schedule and cannot comprehend it. I do not believe there is a man in this House, except a railway man, who can understand it. Whoever undertook the responsibility of preparing that document was more imbued with the necessity of safeguarding the interests of the Grand Trunk than the interests of the country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman must have read the contract with blue spectacles.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not care whether the spectales were blue or white, I am only telling you my impression and giving my opinion of this agreement as a business man, and I say there has been a disregard of the first principles attending business transactions in this arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway. I may be wrong, but until I see evidence before me of such a character that I can place reliance upon it to convince me otherwise, I cannot see that it would be well for this country to undertake the very great risk in agreeing to the proposition now before us. We are told that the concessions we are getting are very great. What are they? I do not think they amount to much. It is said the business will increase. It will increase, but it will be in the maritime provinces to a very great extent. We are sure of that at any rate. That is something the country is sure of for all time to come; therefore, I think it would be better if the government had given more time to the consideration of this important subject, and had all the figures placed before the people of this country, to enable them to arrive at a decision whether it was right before entering into an agreement of this kind without much information. By this agreement we are bound for ninety-nine years. There will be very few of us here at that time to know the effect of this arrangement. The trade of this country is improving and increasing. This country has shown marvellous improvements within my time. I recollect when we had not a railroad, and when we had not a harbour in Montreal. I remember the time when we merely had one sailing vessel a year visiting our shores. What changes have taken place since then hon. gentlemen like myself know. I have no doubt if I could live as long in the future as I have lived, I would see this country still increasing in prosperity, and the advantages of this country in place of decreasing will increase. Therefore I think it is right and proper that we should take care to protect ourselves in every possible way. We should not give away, on any consideration, any of those valuable points that we can control at the present time. As you all know, the Intercolonial was built for a purpose—a national purpose—to meet the necessities at that time with respect to confederation. No man has a right to find fault with what has been done in the past, as far as the Intercolonial Railway is concerned. I do not believe any hon. gentleman does. It has served a very good purpose, and has satisfied the people of the lower provinces that the people of the upper provinces have carried out the compact made at confederation. Therefore, we do not find fault with what has been done in the past, but I want to preserve our rights for the future. If it is necessary to retain that road let us retain it, but do not let us get into another arrangement whereby we will lose a large amount of money, whereby the capital of that Intercolonial Railway will be increased to $89,000,000, without a corresponding possibility of getting a revenue. It is a matter of perfect indifference to me, as it would be to the people of this country, if you went into an arrangement of this kind provided it could be shown that there would be a substantial benefit arising therefrom for all time to come from the increased outlay that would be incumbent upon you at the present time. As far as this arrangement is concerned, I do not think the government have pursued the policy which is usually adopted by strict business men. They told us last year they had not time for their surveyors to go over the road to examine it, and that they would be in a better position this session to judge whether they were right or wrong. They have made this arrangement with the Drummond County Railway. Whether it was a good or bad arrangement the future will decide. Did they endeavour to see whether some other route could not be secured upon better terms? Here is a road possessing no advantages except roadbed and the iron rails. There was no revenue from it all. They want to arrange this matter without finding out if there was any other road that would compete with them. There are collateral benefits arising from the purchase of that property, I am told that there is no intermediate business. There cannot be. It passes through a miserable country and as far as the revenue for the Drummond County Railway is concerned, it would be nil for all time to come. That is a very important factor in making arrangements of this kind. If a prudent business man went into it he would say "Here I am offered the Drummond County Railway at $1,600,000. I am offered another road at $2,000,000. I find that I had better pay the $2,000,000, than to buy the first mentioned road at the $1,600,000. And why? Because the collateral advantages incidental to the $2,000,- 000 are so great that in time it would repay far more than the difference between the $1,600,000 and the $2,000,000." I do not know whether that is the case or not, but I know that in Quebec there is a feeling that there is a road that would better accomplish the object in view than the Drummond County Railway. Those are facts for consideration. If the government had told us plainly all that took place, the same as any business man would do, we would be able to judge whether the arrangement was for the benefit of the country or not. It is clear to any man that that would have been the course adopted by any prudent business man. Then, again, what will be the effect in the future? The Canadian Pacific Rrilway, of course, will take advantage of that bridge at Quebec, and the Northern Road and other roads will come in too, and before long you will find there will be a great many roads competing for the business of the Intercolonial Railway. Of course they want something in return, and therefore they would give you very satisfactory terms to get this western trade. The collateral benefit accuring to the company ought to be sufficient to enable them to give the traffic arrangement at a nominal figure. Take the case of a wharf in a large place, the owner is only too anxious to give a steamer free access to the wharf, knowing that the collateral benefits arising would be sufficient to pay him. That is the principle underlaying this whole transaction. Whether the government have taken that into account or not, I do not know. I am desirous of doing all I can for the purpose of advancing the material interest of this country, but at the same time I want to be certain that what I do is done with a proper knowledge of the subject, and then I know that I have done right. It is said that we have no right to deal with this measure, that the House of Commons has to do with it because it is a pecuniary matter: if we have no right to interfere, why submit it to our consideration. If the arrangement is a bad one, and we consent to it, we must bear the odium attaching to it, or if the arrangement is a good one, then we get credit for endorsing it. Under any circumstances they cannot with any justice say that the Senate has not the right to deal with the question. Having placed it before us, I am bound to give it the best consideration I can, and to vote as my conscience dictates. Relieve me from responsibility and I will do as I like, but as long as I have to vote, I consider myself in duty bound to do the best I can and give the best advice in my power as to what would be advisable for all the parties concerned. I do not look at this from a political standpoint. I never do in a case of this kind. I look upon it as a business matter. We should all give our opinion to the best of our judgment, irrespective of our political proclivities. I have done that in the past, and will do it in the future. I may not be here very long, but I do hope at some future time the government will be able to give us more information and place the matter so clearly before us that no man will hesitate to vote on it. If they do that, in view of what has taken place in the past, in view of the fact that last year we had not sufficient information before us, we can vote intelligently on the question. I do not think they have exercised sufficient caution in coming to this solemn arrangement involving an expenditure of seven or eight millions for all time to come. It is an important matter to the country. I know some people have very expanded views at the present time. I remember once when we thought more of $14,000 than we do now of millions. We are now voting large sums of money because the country is prosperous, but there is a termination to all things, when one exceeds the bounds of propriety and what is considered right. Therefore, we should be careful that we do not place this country in a position that will make them liable to difficulties in future, because we may not always continue prosperous. We should be prudent and take care of our resources, and not part with what has been given to us as an inheritance. For all these considerations, I believe that we would best serve the future of this country by delaying this matter in order to give the government a further opportunity of rectifying, if they admit them, the mistakes of the past. Perhaps they believe they have given us all the necessary information. I have merely seen the agreement made with these people for ninety-nine years and have tried to comprehend it, but I cannot. It is beyond my comprehension. It may be due to my ignorance, but there is the fact. I want the government to place this matter before us in a manner that we can all comprehend, so that we can all give a vote on the question which will be in the long run satisfactory to the people of the country.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—This is a question which involves a large amount of money, and I do not think it would be out of place to discuss it very fully. It it estimated that it involves an expenditure of about $10,000,000. If that is the case I do not think we have so much money to throw away. If we were getting full value for our money it would be all right. The ostensible reason held out to the people of this country for the introduction of these bills is to extend the business of the Intercolonial Railway by having its terminus in the city of Montreal. And for what purpose? For the purpose principally of stopping the annual loss which is caused by the operation of the Intercolonial Railway. In the first place I may say that the Intercolonial Railway was not built as a commercial enterprise. The government did not go into the scheme for the purpose of making money out of it. The object was first to unite the provinces together, to develop interprovincial trade between the upper and lower provinces, and to open up that vast country through which it runs. If it was anticipated to be a paying speculation we would have found financial companies prepared to put money into it, as they have into other railways. The object the government had in view was entirely different from that which railway companies have. Railway companies invest for the purpose of making money for themselves. The government would not be justified in investing money for the purpose of making money. It was for the purpose of developing interprovincial trade and uniting the provinces together. The only justification that I can see for the passing of these bills is to put a stop to the loss which has been sustained year after year by the country through the operation of the Intercolonial Railway. But why are we asked to single out this particular public work to stop a loss that is incurred every year? We are giving annually large subsidies to railways throughout the Dominion of Canada. They return no direct profit, but they are of indirect benefit to the country by opening up and developing trade. My hon. friend from Monck has dwelt at some length on the expenditure on canals. A very large expenditure is made every year, amounting to millions, to enlarge the canals of the country. That expenditure will go on for years to come. We do not expect the canals to be profitable, but the country will be more than compensated for the outlay through the benefit they will be to the trade of the Dominion. Is it necessary to extend the Intercolonial Railway into the city of Montreal? This, I take it, is the principle involved in the bill. We have communication between Montreal and Quebec to-day by the River St. Lawrence, by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. The South Shore Railway is under way, and in addition to that, there is every prospect, if we leave the Drummond County Railway in the hands of the able men who are managing it, that we will have another route to Quebec by that line. Have we railways enough between Montreal and Quebec to accommodate the trade of the country? I think we have. Those railways could do a great deal more work than they are doing at the present time. Then why should this country go to the expense of acquiring a competing line? The more competition the lower the freight will be, and the less chance there will be to make the expenditure profitable to all parties. If the argument advanced by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) is correct, that there is ten times as much unconsigned freight going east from Montreal as there is of freight controlled by the Grand Trunk, then it may be of some advantage to have proper facilities in Montreal to secure that freight; but if, on the other hand, the statement which has been made by the hon. gentleman from British Columbia (Mr. Templeman) is correct, that there are ten carloads consigned direct to the parties for whom it is intended to the one that is uncontrolled, then the advantage of getting into Montreal is very much less, for it is only one-tenth of the freight that we can control by this extension. We already have facilities for getting traffic from Montreal to Quebec. The Grand Trunk Railway may be relied upon to secure for their own line, supposing we do not put these bills through, all the freight they can from Montreal to Lévis? Once the freight gets to Lévis, what is to take it away from the Intercolonial Railway? The trade for Halifax and all the lower provinces must go by the Intercolonial Railway, whether we get into Montreal or not. The question is, are we making a good bargain to extend the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal? We will get pretty much all the trade of the Intercolonial Railway from Lévis down, and the Grand Trunk will endeavour to get all they possibly can secure from Montreal to Lévis, and from the west down to Quebec. Another consideration is this: taking it for granted that it is advisable, and in the interest of the country, that the Intercolonial should be extended to Montreal, the question arises, is the plan suggested by this arrangement the best that can be adopted? It may and it may not be. I think with the hon. gentleman from Rideau (Mr. Clemow) that it would be better to wait a reasonable time to ascertain the effect of the arrangement already made. We know that a bill similar to this, some say identically the same, and some a less favourable arrangement than this, was rejected by the Senate two years ago. We can all see that this bill is better than the one rejected in 1897, but that alone would not justify us in passing it unless it should be passed on its merits. It is understood that both political parties are committed to giving $1,000,000 to the bridge across the St. Lawrence at Quebec. If that is the case, surely it is only reasonable to expect the government, if they vote that $1,000,000, to secure running rights over that bridge for the Intercolonial. If we can secure that, where is the necessity, everything else being equal, of paying interest on that million dollars, which is perhaps $30,000 a year—why should we lose $30,000 a year in interest for the bridge at Quebec and pay $40,000 a year for the rental of Victoria bridge from the Grand Trunk at Montreal, when we can utilize the bridge at Quebec for the same purpose? That, in my opinion, ought to be well considered before we commit ourselves to this scheme. Then, again, it is a question whether it is not best, in the interests of this country, that our Intercolonial Railway, if we have to extend it further west from Quebec, should go to the north side of the St. Lawrence. In my opinion from Quebec west it should go on the north side of the St. Lawrence, because it is on the north side of the St. Lawrence that we have the greatest extent of country. It is a new country, and traffic between the east and west will be altogether through our own country. If we keep on the south side, there is great danger of a large portion of that traffic going through the United States and giving to the United States the advantages and the benefits of trade that ought to be confined to our own people on the north side of the St. Lawrence. I would not say this in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway more than in favour of the Grand Trunk. We have an equal interest in both of these enterprises and are anxious to see both of them prosper and develop the best interest of the country. In that view alone I advocate the one in preference to the other. It appears to me if that is the best way for our trade to go, the government ought to be in a position to make a better bargain if we are committed to paying $1,000,000 towards the Quebec bridge in the interests of this country in crossing the river at Quebec than coming up to Montreal and crossing by the Victoria bridge. Now, in reference to the value of this extension, the contract that has already been entered into provisionally is one to which some consideration should be given. It has been said that this whole scheme has been introduced and cooked for the purpose of satisfying the supposed claim on the party in power of a certain gentleman in Montreal, and to accomplish that the government should buy this Drummond County Railway, and he would get the benefit of the sale. That may be worth taking into consideration when we examine the bargain itself, but I may say this, no matter how much that gentleman may make out of the bargain that should not of itself prevent us giving it the full consideration which it deserves, if it deserves consideration at all. If Mr. Greenshields makes two or three hundred thousand dollars out of it, that does not concern us. We should ascertain whether the bargain is in itself beneficial to the country or not. It seems to me that it is an unfair and unreasonable thing for the government to buy that Drummond County Railway. If we buy the road it becomes absolutely the property of the Dominion. We do not buy the Grand Trunk section; we only rent it. I wish to make a remark in confirmation of what the hon. gentleman from Rideau Division said. It is almost impossible for a layman to understand this agreement. It has been so drawn that we should not understand it. We are told that we are renting the Grand Trunk from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, and we are to pay five per cent interest on that contract. It is valued at about $50,000 a mile, and we are told by competent men that a railway can be built from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert for a lower price. But that is not the worst feature of the transaction. Although we are supposed to have half the road for this rental, and we are to pay interest on it at the rate of five per cent, it is double the rate we should pay. It is equal to buying the whole road from the Grand Trunk because the government can now, or will within a very short time, be able to borrow money, not at five per cent, but at two and a half per cent. Indeed they tried a year ago to borrow from the poorest people of this country at that rate. They introduced a measure whereby they would not pay widows and others who had their money in the savings banks more than two and a half per cent on deposits. They anticipated that the rate of interest on money would come down to two and a half per cent; but in this agreement they are to pay five per cent to the Grand Trunk, practically for all time; I do not understand that. It appears to me that if they wanted to make a fair and honest bargain with the Grand Trunk, they should have done with the rentals exactly as they are doing in this bill with the betterments and maintenance, just pay according to user, and the same way with the bridge, instead of paying $40,000 a year for the bridge, they should pay according to user. It may be said the business of the Intercolonial Railway is going to increase. So much the better. If it does so, we will be better able to pay the increased amount for rental in proportion to usage. I think, in that regard, a very great mistake was made. There may be another way of explaining the traffic arrangement. I do not wish to go into the details of the measure in that regard, further than this, as far as the traffic arrangement is concerned, if the Intercolonial Railway management have a good live agent in Montreal to do their business and compete for the trade for the Intercolonial Railway, so that too much of it should not go by the Canadian Pacific Railway to St. John or by the Grand Trunk Railway to Portland we would get traffic at Montreal for the Intercolonial Railway and save the expenditure which we are asked to incur for this extension. Another point that I might refer to is this, that while we are buying the Drummond County Railway, we are only renting the Grand Trunk, and from whom are we renting it? We are renting it from the company. But the company are not the owners of that road. The bondholders are the owners of that road, and we may be living in a fool's paradise and, although we think we have a bargain with the Grand Trunk for ninety-nine years, with the option of a renewal, the bondholders may come and foreclose these bonds. Where would the government be in that case? They would be shut out, and left with the Drummond County Railway on their hands, a road ending nowhere, or a new bargain would have to be made with the new management of the Grand Trunk. It looks to me as if the government could not lose anything by delay. This House rejected the measure that was submitted to us in 1897. I believe the whole country was in sympathy with the policy we adopted at that time. Notwithstanding our action on that occasion the government were so committed to this scheme that they did not stop their plan of operations. When they found they could not succeed fully, as their scheme was blocked by this House, they leased both roads one from the Drummond County Railway Company and the other from the Grand Trunk, and the extension has been managed in that way ever since. I do not object to the government going on with that for a year or two longer. We were promised the result of that experiment by the hon. gentleman who led the House in 1897. We have not yet received that information, and although I would not be disposed to attach much importance to the results, whatever they might be, still I think this country has nothing to lose by a little longer delay—say two years. Let the matter be fully discussed in the press, on the platform and elsewhere, and then, if after it is thoroughly discussed throughout the length and breadth of the land, the country is anxious to carry out the policy of the present government and returns them to power under that policy, I am satisfied if the measure comes to this House again it will not be opposed any longer. There is nothing to be lost by continuing the present arrangement for a year or two, and we have everything to gain. When we have the bridge built across the St. Lawrence at Quebec, we will be in a better position to deal either with the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway, or with any other company that may have a road to that point then. Looking at it in every way, I think it is in the interest of the country to postpone the consideration of this question to a future date.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—The question, I believe, is on the motion of the hon. gentleman from Wolseley to postpone the second reading of this bill for six months. It was understood that in discussing the question we might at the same time deal with the bill for the purchase of the Drummond County Railway. Before entering into the consideration of the advantages and disadvantages of these two contracts, I should like to call the attention of the House to some features in the form of this bill. I have always thought that in any contract where Her Majesty's name is used that name ought always to be first. In this agreement I see that it is put in this way—"the company of the first part and Her Majesty Queen Victoria represented by the Minister of Railways and Canals of the second part." I think that is wanting a little in respect to our sovereign. (Cries of hear, hear.) Hon. gentleman may laugh; for my part, although I am not British to the core, I am a loyal subject to Her Majesty, and I consider that this should not occur. More than that, if hon. gentlemen will look at section thirty-eight they will see something which I am convinced the Minister of Justice must have overlooked. I hardly believe that a British subject could have put such words in the contract. I suspect they must have been put there by some foreigner. These are the words:

That the company shall and will, if during the term of this lease Her Majesty well and faithfully performs all the covenants and agreements herein undertaken by Her Majesty to be performed, at the expiration of this lease, on request by the minister, execute and deliver to Her Majesty, Her successors and assigns, a renewal of said lease for a second term of ninety-nine years, and shall at the expiration of said second term, upon like faithful performance on the part of Her Majesty.

I do not believe there is a gentleman who would dare to use such language towards another gentleman, and I cannot but protest against such language in a bill presented to Parliament. I hope and believe that, even if the motion of my hon. friend is rejected, the bill will not be read the second time until this is changed.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Perhaps the hon. gentleman knows that the gentleman acting for the Grand Trunk Railway is not a British subject.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I do not, but it strikes me the expression is not very loyal. Taking advantage of the permission of the House to discuss both bills at the same time, I shall take up first the Drummond County Railway Bill. The new contract is considered by some hon. gentlemen more advantageous to the government than the bill of 1897. Others say it is exactly the same thing. I differ from both. I think it is a great deal worse than the bill of 1897. In the contract, as we had it in 1897, in the fourth clause there is this provision:

That any conveyance of such right of way upon any portion of the said line of railway or branches thereof not yet executed by the owners thereof and delivered to the company shall, previously to the acceptance of this lease, be duly executed and delivered by the persons having title to said right of way; and any unsettled claims or demands of any kind or description which may prejudice or affect the title which Her Majesty is hereby acquiring to the company's property shall be fully paid, satisfied and discharged and further, that in the event of any claim for right of way, or in the event of any debt or demand of the company being hereafter preferred against Her Majesty, which ought to have been paid or satisfied by the company in pursuance of this agreement, if demanded Her Majesty may, on payment thereof, deduct the amount of such claim out of any rents due and payable under this lease.

Her Majesty was obliged to pay $70,000, but any claim put in against the government could be deducted. By the new plan the company will get $1,600,000 and will give no guarantee. I consider this last agreement is more disadvantageous than the other. It is calculated that $70,000 a year for ninety-nine years would give the company $2,000,000. It seems to me clear that the capital cannot be settled by rent when that capital is loaded with conditions which may take away the whole sum of money during the course of the lease. I have some figures here which go to the point. In 1882 the government of Quebec sold the North Shore Road, one part of it to the Canadian Pacific and another part to another company. They sold it clear of debts. The two companies were saved from any debt that might accrue against the road. The government was able to pay and ready to pay its way along and therefore it was improbable that there would be any debts. What has happened? The government was obliged to ask the legislature to pay in 1883 $244,625.59.

In 1884	$269,475
1885	90,000
1886	34,000
1887	18,000
1888	33,500
1889	15,000
1890	6,956
1892	52,821
1893	50,000
1894	5,000
1895	290

Out of these there were revotes for $60,000, $8,500 and $5,000, making in all about $73,000. I think there was something over $800,000 against the government which they had to pay. Supposing the same thing happened in this case, I do not believe that the proprietor of the company is such an immensely rich man that debts might not accrue. In this arrangement the government have not taken the precaution to provide for that, while in the contract of 1897 they did take that precaution. Therefore, I think I am right in saying that this contract is not as good as the previous one. It has been said by the hon. leader of the opposition, reading from a memorandum, that the road from Richmond to Lévis will become a purely local road. This road passes through a well settled country, and the Drummond County Road passes through a country which is not settled and not in a condition to be settled. That makes a great difference. What will be the result to that part of the country? Instead of having a road belonging to the Intercolonial, not having another road in competition with it, open the whole year round, it will become a purely local trade. The road will become preserved for old wagons and engines and broken down employees, and whenever the snow falls heavily the road will be stopped. That will be the result that will be reached, and why? I was asking an hon. gentleman from the lower provinces if there was a great difference in the time from Point Lévis to Montreal and he said two or three hours. I looked at the time table and did not find any difference. If the Grand Trunk takes no more time to go from Lévis to Montreal than the Drummond County takes, then it shows the Drummond County is not in a proper condition. I call attention to the fact that the country will be paying much dearer for the road without having that security which we had in the last contract. The $70,000 which was to be paid to the Drummond County comprises $6,000 for the road which the government had acquired from the Grand Trunk to pass over the Chaudière bridge on the road to Lévis. But does the Grand Trunk give a great advantage to the country by allowing the government road to cross the Chaudiére bridge and the route to Point Lévis? I think it would be much cheaper to pay $6,000, and I will explain it by reading clause three of the agreement :

That Her Majesty shall and will pay to the company a share of the cost of maintenance of the rail, way between and including Ste. Rosalie and Bonaventure station, and Chaudière bridge and connections, including tracks, bridges, switches, sidings-signals, appliances of all kinds, platforms, water-tanks, water supplies, fuel stations, fences, crossings and all other appurtenances and appliances used by it jointly with the company and upon the two joint sections, it has the right and privilege of usage included in this demise, such share of the cost of maintenance to be in the proportion that the combined engine and car mileage of the Intercolonial Railway trains made over each of the above mentioned joint sections bears to the total combined engine and car mileage running over each of the above mentioned joint sections during each month.

As I understand, on this section of the road, from the western part of Chaudière bridge to Point Lèvis, the Grand Trunk will not run. It is a little local road and will not have much to do. It will not have many trains a day, but the Intercolonial will have the greater part of the mileage. The Intercolonial Railway will be obliged to keep up trains going to the lower provinces and will have to carry all the freight which the Grand Trunk will give to it, therefore, if the cost is to be kept on each section according to the mileage and usage, the Intercolonial will have to pay on that section of the road probably ninety per cent of the cost and usage. I do not think I am exaggerating, but let us say seventy-five per cent. I think that is not much. Now, what happens? This bridge is not a new bridge ; it was built a long time ago. This road is not a new road ; it is built on trestle work. This trestle work, as everybody knows, is very apt to decay and it has probably decayed already. This bridge was not built for the immense engines which the government has bought in the United States lately ; therefore the usage of the railway will oblige them to renew this bridge, to renew this road and to renew these trestles, and they will have to pay seventy-five per cent. I think $6,000 a year would have been a much better bargain for the government than to have it as it is. On the rest of the road, what are we paying? We are paying $140,000 for the road from Ste. Rosalie and over the St. Lawrence bridge and for the terminal in Montreal. I think it is thirty-three miles from Ste. Rosalie to the bridge.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Thirty-five miles.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—This is over a completely flat country. It was stated by a gentleman in the House of Commons who ought to know, that there are about ten or twelve cities or towns from St. Hilaire to St. Hubert. There is the town of St. Hyacinthe.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The statement made was that there were ten or eleven towns or villages.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Name them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman said it was stated in the other House that there were ten or eleven towns or cities. The expression was ten or eleven towns or villages; so that if you have two or three towns on the road the declaration is true and the remainder may be villages. There is St. Hyacinthe and there is St. Lambert. They are two towns and the balance are undoubtedly villages.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman was asked to name them.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—There is not one village.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I will mention St. Hilaire.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—The railway passes outside the village. It was not worth while for the hon. gentleman to interrupt if that is all he has to say. There are no villages where the railway passes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—The railway passes St. Villières, St. Hilaire and St. Hubert, and there are no villages.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE resumed. He said:—When the Speaker left the Chair at six o'clock, I had shown that the present contract with the Drummond County Railway was worse than the contract that was submitted to us two years ago. I have demonstrated, I think, that the security taken by the government against the company, if any claims were made against the railroad and paid by the government, might be taken off the $70,000, or the $64,000 rather, because we must not forget that $6,000 was for this arrangement between the Drummond County Railway and the Grand Trunk which is taken off by this present contract. Therefore, being weighed down by those conditions this rent for ninety-nine years could not be negotiated, because those who bought did not know really what they would get. I may add that by the old contract, after paying during ninety-nine years, the government was free and had nothing more to pay. Just now, if we give them $1,600,000 they can easily get $64,000 supposing they put it in our institutions in Montreal, the Montreal Bank and other banks. They may get $80,000 if they put it at five per cent, which I think can easily be obtained on mortgage. I come now to the Grand Trunk agreement. The Grand Trunk Railway by this contract will have from the government first $140,000 a year which at three per cent gives $4,600,000 for how many miles of the Grand Trunk? Thirty-five. I thought it was thirty-three, but I was informed by the hon. Secretary of State that it was thirty-five. In that country no rocks will be touched and no obstacles will be met with, I think the road could easily be built for $20,000 a mile. Supposing we take off half the cost of the road, $10,000, that would be $350,000. There are two bridges, one very important bridge at St. Hilaire and another important one, not quite so large, at St. Hyacinthe. I think I am within the mark when I put them at $600,000 together. One-half of that would be $300,000. Then $300,000 and $350,000 would be $650,000. That would be about the surplus over $4,000,000. There remains $4,000,000 for the bridge in Montreal and for the terminal. It must not be forgotten that we have voted lately a large sum for improving that bridge. When that bridge was built we must remember that iron was dearer than it is now, and steel was dearer than at present. I think it cost $6,000,000 when it was erected, but things are much cheaper now. Take $3,000,000 for that and there would be still $1,000,000 for the terminal that the government will have to pay for the user of the road. We are going into a partnership in which all the improvements may be lost after a number of years, and we shall pay for the user of the road also, and apart from that, we are also going to give a sort of quasi monopoly to the Grand Trunk Railway. I would be very sorry that the hon. gentlemen should think that I am inimical to the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Pacific or to any road. I am in favour of all the roads, more particularly those two, which certainly are the cause of the great prosperity of Canada. But I do not think we should pay more than is necessary, and in this case we are certainly paying more than we ought to pay. Take half and we will not have more than 25 per cent of the passenger traffic on that road. There are some other curious points in this arrangement. I suppose the government does not like to make any amendment, but I presume they will amend this 50th clause, which reads :

Nothing herein contained shall in any way merge or affect the claims or rights of Her Majesty, if any such there be, as they now exist against the company, or the property of the company, other than that which is the subject matter of this agreement.

This looks very much like as if all the rights of the government were saved, but if you compare this clause with clause 45, it will be seen that Her Majesty shall have the right to :

Deduct from the rentals herein agreed to be paid to the company any sum or sums of money which may hereafter become due by the company to Her Majesty and for the payment of which the company is in default.

Therefore for the past you cannot count that money ; for the future you may. The first clause says that :

That Her Majesty shall and will during the continuance of this lease or any renewal thereof pay to the company the rent hereby reserved in the manner and at the times hereinbefore mentioned without any deduction whatsoever, save for the reasons and on account of the happening of any or either contingency or contingencies hereinafter mentioned.

By this it looks to one who reads it carelessly, as if the rights of Her Majesty are safe. But I do not know. They take away the right of Her Majesty to be paid. The hon. gentleman shakes his head and says it is not so. The hon. gentleman will not deny the accuracy of what I have read. I may construe it differently? Lawyers can put different constructions on the plainest language. Why should we lengthen the Intercolonial Railway? The Intercolonial, as the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Prowse) said just now, is a political railway. It is not a railway which belongs to New Brunswick, Quebec or Nova Scotia. It is a railroad which belongs to the whole Dominion. It is the house of our father, I might say. If our father was to say, "Here is the paternal house; I have five or six children, but one of my children only shall have the right to be here and the others can only come in if he permits them." If you consider that the Grand Trunk is to have the right to put its notice on the Intercolonial Railway cars and buildings, that is enough for people coming from Europe, and it is only from Europe we can expect large numbers to use the Intercolonial to go to the North-west—is not that a sort of monopoly? Then there is the 40th clause. I do not know if the government will accept the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition, but even if you strike out the clause there will certainly remain a great advantage to the Grand Trunk, and why should we give a greater advantage to the Grand Trunk than to the Canadian Pacific Railway? Why should we give a greater advantage to the Grand Trunk than to the Parry Sound, the St. John Railway, the Quebec Central, the Drummond County and the South Shore Road which will soon be built? It seems as if the city of Quebec is always to be thrown aside. When the Intercolonial Railway came to Rivière du Loup it was necessary to connect with the Grand Trunk. The government thought it advisable to buy the extension to Lévis opposite Quebec. By extending it to Point Lévis we give the same right to all the railways—we give the same advantage to every one of those railways now existing, and to others which will certainly be built before ninety-nine years have passed. Therefore, I shall vote for the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Wolseley, because I think there is a clause in the bill which I consider very disrespectful to Her Majesty; because we are paying too dear for the Drummond County Railway; because we are going to deprive a large district of the province from Richmond to Point Lévis of a road like the Grand Trunk connecting with the Intercolonial at Quebec and leaving them with a poor local road, and because we are not doing justice to the other railways. For these reasons I shall vote against the bill.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I should be sorry to give a silent vote on this question, because it is my duty to explain the position I take. I was in hopes that the hon. leader of the government would have made an alteration in the bill which would enable me to vote for it. The alterations which have been proposed are so trivial that I cannot consent to sacrifice the interests of the country by voting for the measure. I differ from the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island who spoke about the necessity of the Intercolonial connecting with Montreal. I think that is absolutely necessary for the Intercolonial, but we have that connection already. We are now tenants of the Grand Trunk, and the Secretary of State says that we are doing very well indeed in that relation. My hon. colleague, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Power) has told us how well things are going on now, and I quite agree with what he says. I think he said that the road was a very level road, well equipped in every respect; that the attendance on board the trains and the cuisine were all that could be desired, that the trains made good time and arrived at Montreal on time. Others confirmed everything that he said, and it struck me as testimony to the good way they get on now as yearly tenants. I do not see why we should not continue that relation. More than that, I should have no objection to increasing the lease to three or five years. At the end of that time we could see how it was succeeding. A number of hon. gentlemen claimed in this debate that the government had not supplied promised information to see whether the arrangement was a good one on which to make a permanent agreement. The Drummond County Railway, as we have been informed, is a road which commences nowhere and ends nowhere. It can have no through traffic, and any one who has travelled on it will see that there is no local traffic. What does one see from the car windows? A country covered with small trees. In many places where clearances were made, it has grown up again with small spruce and birch, and where the forest has been cleared there is very little cultivation. There are a few farms, but there is nothing of any importance. I saw no village or even the nucleus of a village. A village is generally supposed to be formed in the first place with a blacksmith's shop and next with a lawyer's office.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Is there not a tavern?

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Yes, the lawyer would likely be found near the tavern. What is to become of the blacksmith's shop in such a country? The fire would go out for want of horses to shoe, and the lawyer would, in the absence of clients, go to the devil. All that a stranger would discover there would be a sulphurous smell, whether it would be from the half burnt embers of the smithy or from the general way in which the lawyer makes his exit it would be difficult to tell. You may ask why was this road ever built, there being no through traffic and no local traffic. That is difficult to answer. I think it was chiefly, perhaps, for the two subsidies which were given to aid its construction, one from the Dominion and the other from the local authorities. There is another reason which I will explain by quoting in prose some words of a poem by Peter Pinder, which I once read. A farmer went into a town to buy some razors. He bought half a dozen, and when he got home started to shave himself. He pulled some hairs out, but the razor cut none. He tried one razor, then another and another and had bad success with all of them. This was on a Saturday, and not on Sunday morning, because according to Mr. Charlton's bill it is wicked to shave yourself on Sunday. On Sunday he went to church. On Monday he went to the hardware shop and said to the merchant "The razors you sold me won't shave." The merchant replied, "I did not think they would shave, they were not made to shave." The purchaser asked "what were they made for?" "Made to sell" was the reply. That's what the Drummond County Railway was made for—to sell, and the Minister of Railways was sold at the same time. He made a better bargain for it than he made with the Grand Trunk. The manager of the Grand Trunk is a shrewd Yankee, and a blue nose would have no chance with him—much less a Nova Scotian. The Minister of Railways persuaded us to give $50,000 towards building an elevator at Halifax. When the old government built an elevator there, the city was not asked to pay anything.

The Grit papers grumbled very much at having this elevator built, and said the government after building it should have bought cargoes of grain in order to use it. The government did not do that. No grain came to it, and the elevator was burnt down and there was a pean of joy from the Grits that the elevator was removed. We have now another one for which we have paid $50,000. Mr. Blair has gone to St. John to build elevators, and I am told has given notice to the Canadian Pacific Railway that they are no longer to have running powers over the railroad to Halifax. All the cargoes of grain, therefore, by the Canadian Pacific Railway, must stop at St. John instead of going on to Halifax. What we are to get for the $50,000 I do not know. Halifax is burdened with taxation. We have schools wherever they could be put. The school board never meet without voting an increase to the school masters or school mistresses. We are afraid to paint our houses because the tax collectors would own them. I have three properties where the rents I receive from them do not pay the taxes. It was not because we had plenty of money, therefore, that we voted that $50,000 towards the construction of an elevator. Under this agreement we are to give all the trade which comes from the east to the Grand Trunk. What is the Grand Trunk to give us? The hon. gentleman says they are giving us all the western trade. Let us look at that. All the western trade that the Grand Trunk can influence will be sent by w y of Portland. The manager of the Grand Trunk is a United States citizen. The United States people have some good traits in their character, and one is an intense patriotism, and when we put Mr. Hays' intense patriotism and his regard for his company together, you may depend on it all the traffic that he can influence to go by Portland will be lost to St. John or Halifax. All the traffic that is not going to Portland must come by the Intercolonial. It will be taken as far as Lévis by the Grand Trunk if it can be carried to that point at a profit to the shareholders. We have the carrying of the freight to Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, and therefore if the Grand Trunk Railway showed a disposition to discriminate against the Intercolonial Railway we could put an extra price on the goods coming that way and prevent the Grand Trunk from diverting traffic from the Intercolonial. Therefore, I do not thank them for the east bound traffic which they give us. My great objection to this bill is the ninety-nine years clause. I think it will make us a laughing stock, not only now, but in future generations. About four years ago any one who read the English papers could have seen the account of a meeting of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in London, when it was decided that no dividend would be paid even on preferential stock; most of the shares could be got for the asking, and although everybody acknowledged the whole thing was bad, yet they must have thought it was irreparably ruined because the directors were never changed. There was the same grumbling from everybody. The president held out hopes but they have not been realized. It put me very much in mind of a person who is dying, whose physician recommends that another doctor be called in to consult, but the patient says "No, we might as well go on with the same doctor. There is no use making a change now." The Grand Trunk asked for the ninety-nine years. The same confession that the road was ruined four years ago was made in the committee room to-day. The person acting for the Grand Trunk said, three years ago, they thought it was all up with them. Those are not his words, but they convey his meaning. Is not that 99 years lease absurd? Supposing that war takes place—and God forbid—what will happen to the Grand Trunk? Half of its property is in the United States. The Republic would either confiscate it or not allow it to be used during the war. Of course, that is an unlikely thing, but a likely thing is that the bonding privilege may be suspended. I think that that threat will be carried out, and the bonding privilege may be taken away. History repeats itself. It is not a hundred years ago since an expedition went out from Halifax and took the greater part of the state of Maine. In this expedition Colin Campbell, afterwards Lord Clyde, the hero of the "thin red line" at Balaklava and the suppresser of the Indian mutiny, took a part. He had been serving for some time with half of his regiment with the garrison at Annapolis Royal. The people of Maine were very glad to be incorporated in the British possessions at that time. The celebrated Harvard convention was in session, in which the New England States threatened to break off their connection with the other states, being dissatisfied with the war. We will go a little further back. Any one who has examined our archives will see that towards the close of the first American war, Vermont wished to leave the Union and join Canada. I have read the letter from the minister in England to Haldimand telling him not to receive negotiations, because in all probability England intended to make peace with the United States, and it would be just as well not to involve themselves. This was part of a plot carried on by a brother of Ethan Allen, who was a hero in the United States of the war for independence. One incident happened a little more than one hundred years ago, and the other not a hundred years ago. And yet we are told that nothing can happen in ninety-nine years. Since Joshua commanded the sun to stand still I do not think such a stupendous thing has occurred than this ninety-nine year agreement. How do we know that in ninety-nine years railways will be the means of carrying goods? If at the beginning of this century any one had said that goods would be carried by railroad, what would have been thought of him? Is it not likely that as great a revolution will occur in the next ninety-nine years? We will all be dead before then, but our grandchildren will be here, and it will be awkward for them when people say to them, "What old fogies your grandfathers were to make such an agreement." I am going to appeal to the Conservatives on this side of the House not to follow their leader, but to follow their own judgment. If it is felt that this is a bad bill, throw it out altogether. What did the militia do at Batoche? Did they follow their leader? No, he was three miles away from the line of battle when they said, "We are getting potted by those riflemen, and we will not stay here to be shot down. We will charge," and they no sooner charged than the officers were ahead of them, and Middleton had just finished his marmalade probably, and came up and said he had given orders for the charge. If hon. gentlemen defeat this bill, after voting as their consciences dictate, their leader will be pleased to see what they have done.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is not my intention to prolong this debate or to inflict a speech on this House at this advanced stage of the discussion, but I do not think I can give a vote on this occasion without a word of explanation. In 1897 when this arrangement with the Grand Trunk and the Drummond County Railway Companies was before this House for the first time, we took a stand which for my part I am bound to maintain. At that time we found that the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal by the means offered by the government was not to the advantage of the Dominion, and by our vote we rejected the bill. There was a great deal of agitation in the country, threats were made also by the organs of the Liberal party and the Prime Minister of this country with all his supporters announced that a reform of the Senate was becoming more and more necessary. In the face of those threats I think we should maintain the stand we took at that time. For my part, I do not feel any disposition to yield to those threats. There is a constitutional way for testing the opinion of the country and threats will not improve the constitution.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is the hon. gentleman proposing to dissolve this House? Is he proposing something for himself or his wife's relations?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am speaking of what has been proposed by the hon. Premier himself. There is no doubt that when public opinion has been consulted on a question, this House will yield to the decision. But public opinion has never been consulted on the subject we are now discussing. In the last general election this question was not one which was brought before the electorate. The extension of the Intercolonial Railway from Lévis to Montreal was never referred to. The electorate was not consulted on that particular point, and I maintain that, under those circumstances, the Senate had a perfect right, and was quite justified in taking the stand we took in 1897, and nothing since that time has occurred, in my opinion at all events, to justify a change in the stand which I then took. It is true that the contract before us to-day may be, in some details, different from the one brought before us in 1897, though the Minister of Railways said, in another House, that it is about the same. If it is the same contract, there is an additional reason for me to stand by my vote of 1897. In the sessions of 1897 and 1898, I was permitted to put a few questions to the hon. Minister of Justice, and he was kind enough at that time not to answer them, but to say that he would answer me when a better opportunity presented itself. The opportunity presents itself to-day, and if the hon. minister will recollect the question I put at that time, he might be prepared to give an answer to-day. At all events, in order to prevent him from saying that he forgot the question, I shall read it to him together with his answer. At that time we were bound by the contract, if it had been approved by this House, to pay, during ninety-nine years, to the Drummond County Railway a lease of $64,000 a year plus $6,000 for the right of way from the Chaudière bridge to Point Lévis, and I asked the hon. minister last year if the action of the Senate in refusing to pass such legislation had not been more beneficial to the country than was generally thought. By its measure in 1897, the government was binding itself to give to the Drummond County Railway Company for a period of ninety-nine years $64,000 per annum, representing the interest of $1,600,000 capital at a rate of four per cent. This amount of $1,600,000 was the estimated cost of a railway between Chaudière and Ste. Rosalie. Now, the government has been able for several years to borrow money at a lower rate than three per cent. We could safely assert that the government, at all events, could obtain any capital at three per cent. The capital of $1,600,000, at the rate of three per cent, would bring $48,000 as interest every year. If this interest of $48,000 were deducted from the annuity of $64,000, it would leave $16,000 for a sinking fund. This sinking fund embodied in the annuity of $64,000 would, at the end of forty-seven years and a few months, reproduce the original capital of $1,600,000. I hope the hon. Minister of Justice will not dispute those figures. It is a matter of calculation, and I suppose the government first of all made those calculations. They will find that in a period of forty-seven years and two months, this $16,000, which is the surplus over the $48,000 interest on the $1,600,000 of capital, would reproduce the entire capital of $1,600,000, the estimated value of the road to be purchased. By binding itself to pay an annual grant of $64,000 during ninety-nine years, the government at the expiration of forty-seven years and two months, having paid the capital of $1,600,000, was undertaking, by its agreement to pay, during a further period of fifty-one years and ten months, $64,000 per annum for a capital already paid. This useless annual payment of $64,000 would, at the expiration of fifty-one years and ten months, form a capital in round numbers of $7,800,000. And then I asked was not this amount of $7,800,000 really saved the country by the action of the Senate in throwing out the Drummond County Railway Bill. Does the government deny the correctness of those figures? If so, wherein are they wrong and what are the correct figures? What was the answer of the Minister of Justice?

I would say to the hon. gentleman that this calculation reminds me of nothing so much as a statement made by Mark Twain in reference to shortening the Mississippi between St. Louis and New Orleans. He said that the windings of the river had, during the flood season, been cut off and that the result was, that the distance between New Orleans and St. Louis was some ninety miles shorter than in 1780, and at that rate of shortening by the year 3,000 and something, St. Louis and New Orleans would be brought together. Now, my hon. friend's calculation is very much of the same sort. I dissent from the view which he has expressed. I deny the gain to which he refers, and when a fitting opportunity occurs I shall be prepared to discuss that question with the hon. gentleman.

The minister admitted by that reply that he was not discussing the matter seriously but simply making a joke.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The whole thing was a joke. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that what he was saying was not a jest? He surely was not serious.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly I was serious. Why was I not serious? Why did the hon. gentleman say he would be ready to discuss the question with me at another time? I am ready to discuss the question with him now. He can joke if he pleases, but that is not the way to answer a serious question. If my calculation is not correct he can say it is not so and give his reasons. Has he any reason? Does he deny the figures? Does he deny that that payment would be made at the rate at which he could borrow money, say three per cent? Does he deny that at that rate the capital would have been paid in forty-seven years? He cannot deny it; he will not deny it. I see his colleague on his left (Mr. Snowball) is enjoying the discussion. That reminds me I questioned him too, and here is what occurred:

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—The transaction can be defended on its merits before the severest tribunal which could be named, if the tribunal is an impartial one.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him one question? The hon. gentleman said just now that the $64,000 represented interest at 4 per cent on the $1,600,000; that ¾ per cent would represent the sinking fund. That would be $12,000 per annum for a sinking fund.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBAL—That is only my version.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to see if the hon. gentleman is in earnest when he says that that will be ¾ per cent.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Three-quarters of one per cent.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Three-quarters of one per cent in that transaction represents $12,000. One per cent would be $16,000, and ¾ per cent would be $12,000.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Did the hon. gentleman calculate what that would bring the sinking fund to, if it was placed at compound interest, at 3 per cent during ninety-nine years? It would represent $87,063,645. That is what you are paying.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I do not know how many dollars it would make. The hon. gentleman is evidently unable to make a calculation. If he will come over to me, I will teach him a lesson in arithmetic.

Well, I am ready to have that lesson in arithmetic. I do not know what authority he will consult to give me that lesson. Does he deny the figures I put forward? On his own figure that he gave me, of $12,000, for the sinking fund, does not that amount, placed at 3 per cent for ninety-nine years produce a capital of over $7,000,000? If the hon. gentleman is right I am wrong and then he will correct me; if he is wrong he will keep silent. Well, I think he is wrong since he is unable to maintain his pretensions and to discuss them with me. Then comes that question of the $6,000 annually paid to the Drummond County Railway for the usage of that part of the railway from Chaudière Junction to Lévis, but there is something which must not be forgotten. That part of the road is already worked by the government which have also running powers over the other half. We must not forget that in 1879 an Act was passed by Parliament by which the government secured from the Grand Trunk that part of the Grand Trunk from Rivière du Loup to Hadlow Cove. That became the property of the government and the Grand Trunk running from Chaudière to Lévis had to pass over a part of the railway bought by the government from Chaudière Curve to Hadlow—they got running powers on that part providing they gave running powers over the part from Hadlow Cove to Lévis, and this is in black and white in the contract which was made on the 17th July, 1879. I remark en passant that in this contract Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, is the "party of the first part," and the Grand Trunk "the party of the second part:"

Now the said parties hereto agree as follows, that is to say that they, the government, do purchase the line of the Grand Trunk Railway from its junction with the Intercolonial Railway at Rivière du Loup, up to, and including, the first bridge east of the Hadlow Cove station grounds.

Clause 10 provides:

That the company shall have the right in perpetuity to run their trains and engines, separately or combined, and as frequently and at such times as the character and extent of their trafic may require, under the reasonable rules and regulations of the Intercolonial Railway, and under the direction of the officials in charge thereof, between Chaudière Junction and the first bridge east of Hadlow Cove station ground and to take up and deliver traffic at all places to and from their line all free of charge.

This clause defines the rights of the Grand Trunk Railway. What are those of the government? We find them enunciated in clause 13 which reads as follows:—

That the government shall have the right in perpetuity, and free of charge, to run their trains and engines, separately or combined and as frequently and at such times as the character and extent of their traffic may require, under the reasonable rules and regulations of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and under the direction of the officials thereof, between Hadlow and Point Lévis station, to and from places between these points, in the yard at Point Lévis and to and from and beyond that station; also the right in perpetuity and free of charge to use the said Point Lévis station yard, and the tracks, sidings, platforms, and appurtenances thereof; but all shunting and making up of trains in and about Point Lévis station shall be done by the said company and under the direction of their servants.

By this contract the government had acquired a part of the Grand Trunk from Chaudière Junction to Hadlow Cove and had running powers from Hadlow to Lévis over the Grand Trunk, because the government gave similar running powers to the Grand Trunk from Chaudière to Lévis. Notwithstanding that, the government were willing to pay to the Grand Trunk Railway $6,000 per annum for ninety-nine years, and by the contract to-day the government is binding itself to pay over to the Grand Trunk a part of the usage of that road from Chaudière to Point Lévis which already belongs to them, and over which they have now running powers.

An additional reason which compels me to stand by the position I took in 1897 is this—it was a good reason in 1897 ; itis still a good reason for me to-day—I claim that if the policy of the government is to construct a bridge at Quebec, they cannot, by this Drummond transaction, injure the bridge more than they are doing to-day. If you want a bridge at Quebec, you must try to get all the railway companies to aid in the building up of that bridge. The government will not build the bridge itself. The government will aid it to the extent of $1,000,000, but you must get the railway companies to combine with the city of Quebec to build the bridge. If you make the bridge useless for those companies, they will not contribute one cent towards the building of it, and the money offered by the government will be of very little use to the city of Quebec. I am considering this, certainly, from a local point of view, but that does not prevent one, in a general way, from saying that you would have succeded better in making the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal beneficial to the country at large by interesting in it several companies instead of one only. Coming back to the Quebec bridge, what will be its use, for example, to the Canadian Pacific Railway? The Canadian Pacific Railway have a bridge at Montreal. If they want to go to Halifax, they will go by their own bridge at Montreal, and will not use the Quebec bridge. The Grand Trunk has its bridge at Montreal also, and all the traffic of the Grand Trunk going to Portland will cross the bridge at Montreal. But if the government had not made any arrangement at all with the Drummond County Railway and had not decided to extend its lines from Lévis to Montreal, there would have been a terminus at Lévis and the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway would have found in that terminus a sufficient reason to take an interest in the building of the bridge so as to arrive at that terminus and make arrangements for traffic there.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend argue that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would abandon their line to St. John—the short line across the state of Maine—for the sake of carrying traffic down to Lévis to be given to the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, but I say the Intercolonial would have been a feeder to the Canadian Pacific Railway if the Intercolonial had stopped at Lévis.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But the Canadian Pacific Railway would not there be a feeder to the Intercolonial Railway because they would carry their traffic to St. John.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Because there is no bridge, but if there was a bridge at Quebec it would be different, for the Canadian Pacific Railway touches Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman does not catch my point. I say the Canadian Pacific Railway would never carry their traffic to Quebec for the sake of giving it to the Intercolonial Railway. They would carry it to the south side of the St. Lawrence at Montreal and take the freight on the line to St. John.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If there had been a bridge at Quebec, and the government had not brought the Intercolonial Railway to Ste. Rosalie, the Intercolonial Railway could have crossed at Quebec and become a feeder to the Canadian Pacific Railway and vice versa. If I did not catch the hon. minister, he has not caught my idea, or if he has got it he does not appear to have. I say that if the government has a policy towards Quebec in the building of that bridge, it should not on the other hand prevent the commerce of the Intercolonial Railway from reaching the Canadian Pacific Railway. The arrangements they are making now with the Drummond County Railway might have been made with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The reason is perfectly plain. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have their own line to carry their own traffic to St. John. They have nothing to give us to-day at Montreal.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If that reason is good for the Canadian Pacific Railway it is good for the Grand Trunk. In the meantime you are making arrangements with the Grand Trunk.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Grand Trunk, under this agreement, have agreed to hand over to the Intercolonial all the traffic for the maritime provinces, not to take it to Portland, but to hand it over at Montreal. The Canadian Pacific Railway would not make an agreement of that sort—it would not be to their interest to do so.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—The Canadian Pacific Railway would have to do it if they took freight by the North Shore.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They would not do it. The hon. gentleman must know that right well.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is the first time I have heard of a company refusing to take freight. I think that the Canadian Pacific Railway would have been in a better position to make a bargain with the government than the Drummond County Railway, and would have given a better guarantee and more satisfaction to the public than the Drummond County Railway. For all these reasons I shall vote for the amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the question is put, I desire to say that in voting for the second reading of the bill, it is for the purpose of enabling the House to go into committee to consider any amendments which may be made, therefore, I do not commit myself either to the principle or the details of the measure. If the amendments, of which notice has been given, or others which may be proposed—because there are some I think that may be very properly discussed in committee which cannot be discussed while the Speaker is in the Chair—should not be of a character to meet the strong objections which many members who have addressed the House have taken I shall reserve to myself the right to vote for the six months' hoist, at the third reading, and that I presume is the view of those who are opposed to the general principle of the bill. I wish that to be distinctly understood before I cast my vote. In saying that, I think I am expressing the opinion of a large number who probably will vote for the second reading of the bill. That is the parliamentary way of dealing with a bill of this kind. The hon. Minister of Justice has given notice of an amendment. I have also given notice of an amendment. These amendments cannot be discussed here. There is decided opposition to some clauses particularly that clause which binds the government to a traffic arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway for ninety-nine years which, as I have already pointed out, leaves it in the power of the Grand Trunk Railway, providing it is found to be to their advantage, to perpetuate that agreement. That, I take it for granted, will have to be eliminated entirely, leaving power to the government alone to forego that portion of the agreement upon notice of three, six, nine or twelve months—whatever may be agreed upon by the House. If it is to the advantage of both, it can be continued. If it should not be to the advantage of the Intercolonial Railway to continue the present traffic agreement, then the government can give notice that the traffic arrangement into which they have entered, either the present or any other, must terminate. That is the ground that I have taken. I may say further that if I thought my vote would destroy the whole scheme, the leasing of one and the purchase of the other, entirely, I should vote for the amendment, but I am convinced from my experience in government and dealing with questions of this kind, that the government have so far committed themselves that even if they went out of power to-morrow, their successors would have difficulty in setting the whole agreement aside. Individuals may go; governments continue, and when ministers have pledged the government to any policy, and particularly when capitalists have acted upon that policy, depend upon it no government coming into power, however much they may dislike the agreement and the policy of their predecessors, when the country is committed to that extent in the manner I have pointed out, you are not likely to have it abrogated. I think my hon. friend, although we do not very often agree, will agree with me on that point, and those who have studied the history of our institutions—those who know anything about the working of free institutions as practised in England, which we are following as closely as practicable in this country, will agree with the position that I have taken. I do not wish in voting against my hon. friend's motion, to have it understood that I am thereby pledging myself either to the principle or the details of the bill, but if the details of the bill can be so amended as to make them in accordance with the position which I, and others who agree with me, hold, it remains a question how far we will go.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not my intention at the present time to enter into a defence of the policy of the government upon the agreement which has been entered into. I, of course, take a different view from my hon. friend opposite, because I think the agreement is one that will be found to be in the public interest. However, details may be discussed later. As I understand from the hon. gentleman, his friends about him, or the majority of them, are prepared to vote for the second reading of the bill, and we can consider then any propositions that may be submitted for discussion in Committee of the Whole. With that understanding I rest content.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I have listened with attention to the discussion on the subject, but I have failed to hear from the advocates of this measure any argument to show in what great respect this agreement is better or more beneficial than the bill we rejected in 1897. If the government consider it a measure that should be passed, they should have been prepared to show that it is a much better measure than the one which we rejected on a previous occasion. I have failed to hear any senator attempt to prove anything of that kind. The hon. gentleman from Cobourg (Mr. Kerr), when he first addressed the House on this subject, admitted that this bill was $700,000 better than the first measure which was proposed here. But he subsequently sheltered himself, in making that statement, behind the view which had been expressed by the leader of the opposition. He had not the courage of his own convictions to say that, from his own examination of the question, he saw that it was that much better. I have looked into the measure with some care and consideration for my own information, and I find that it is not only that $700,000, better than the measure which we rejected in 1897, but that the whole arrangement is considerably better. Notwithstanding all that, I doubt very much whether the measure is one which is to the advantage of this country. It is an expenditure of the public money to an amount of at least $7,000,000 which we should not have undertaken at the time that measure was proposed. I consider, further, that the agreement which was made with the Grand Trunk, as it was first presented to this House, was not such an agreement as any business man would have chosen to lay before any body for consideration and endorsement. The more the agreement is looked into, the greater are the defects found within it. The hon. leader of the government himself has had to suggest an amendment to the measure. The hon. leader of the opposition has also had to propose another amendment which would make it less objectionable. Besides that, there are other objections to it. As the agreement was presented to us in the first place, its effect would be to prevent the extension of the Intercolonial at any future period beyond Montreal, and we know that there are gentlemen in this country—men of influence and position—who speak of its extension beyond Montreal and who think that at some future time it may be extended to Ottawa, Toronto or some other centre of trade; but with the existence of the agreement as it came before us in the first instance, it would have been impossible to extend the road beyond Montreal, because all its trade to the west would have to be delivered there to the Grand Trunk Railway. I am not now going into the details of this measure. I merely rise for the purpose of saying that my position is something like that of the hon. leader of the opposition. I feel that in voting against the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) for the six months' hoist, I am not pledging myself as to the course I shall take when the measure comes to be further discussed. I reserve to myself the right of acting as the measure will appear to me after it has been amended and made more acceptable to the House than it is at present. I do not see that any great benefit will accrue to the people of this country, or to the Intercolonial, by its extension to the city of Montreal.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was rejected on the following vote.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

The order of the day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the second reading (Bill 133) "An Act to authorize the acquisition by the Dominion of the Drummond County Railway."—(Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)—

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Should I presume, as this bill has been discussed with the other measure, both bills will be considered in committee at the same time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, when we reach that bill the hon. gentleman can move the second reading and then ask to go into committee. I take it for granted that that being the twin brother of the one we have been considering, no matter what way this may be disposed of the other will be disposed of in the same way.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not see why we should let them go together.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Carried on the same division.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The two go together. Deal with this one first before going on with the other. If the Grand Trunk Bill is defeated, the Drummond County Railway Bill will be defeated too, as I understand it. Let it be put down for the second reading on Friday.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand, the sense of the House is that we should take the second reading now and let it stand with the other.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—No. The Speaker has not declared it carried. If the Grand Trunk Bill passes, I will not oppose it any further, but if this bill is defeated, the other is defeated too, because they must go together.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If any hon gentleman objects, as my hon. friend from Monck appears to do, to taking the second reading now, I am quite willing to let it stand till Friday.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The object which the hon. gentleman from Monck has in view is being defeated by postponing the second reading till Friday. It would then be impossible to consider the bills together. He is divorcing them because if the bill is read the second time on Friday, it will necessitate a reference to committee next week. I hope my hon. friend will consent to the second reading to-night.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I think the hon. gentleman from Calgary was not here when the understanding was arrived at in reference to these bills. They were both discussed together, and there is an understanding that if the one passes the other is to pass, and if one is lost the other is lost. They will both fly or fall together.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—My understanding was that these bills should travel together, and if they should be divorced now, we are defeating the understanding we came to. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman from Monck. I think we should take the second reading now. I am one of those who voted for the six months' hoist in reference to the other bill. As that bill has carried, I am willing that the other should carry immediately on a division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—The Drummond County Bill should have precedence of the Grand Trunk Bill. Supposing amendments are made to the Drummond County Bill and the government does not accept those amendments, the other bill falls. The government could not lease a portion of the Grand Trunk and not buy the Drummond County Railway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The amendments, if there should be any, will be made to the lease into which the government has entered with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. There will be no amendments made to the Drummond County Bill, because it is simply a purchase, unless there are objectionable features in the bargain, the only amendment, therefore, to be made to that is to defeat the measure altogether.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Certainly there is an amendment that could be made to the Drummond County Railway Bill without breaking the contract. The government might reserve to itself a certain sum of money to meet the claims which might be made against the government later on. That would not destroy the contract, supposing the government arranged for two or three hundred thousand dollars to meet such claims. There is no guarantee of that kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The question of priority can be discussed on Friday, if necessary.

The motion was agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY DISCHARGED.

The order of the day being called :

Second reading Bill (2) "An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, so as to make more effectual provision for the punishment of seduction."

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said :—I think that the object I had in view in taking charge of this bill is sufficiently secured by what we have already done, and I, therefore, move that the order of the day be discharged.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (157) "An Act respecting the Manitoba and South Eastern Railway Company."—(Mr. Power.)

Bill (166) "An Act respecting the Temiscouata Railway Company."—(Mr. Wood.)

Bill (139) "An Act respecting the Nova Scotia Steel Company, Limited."—(Mr. Power.)

Bill (104) "An Act respecting the Dominion Permanent Loan Company.—(Mr. McMillan.)

THIRD READINGS.

The following bills, reported from Committee of the Whole House, were read a third time and passed :

Bill (146) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Department of the Geological Survey."—(Mr. Mills.)

Bill (153) "An Act to amend the Unorganized Territories Game Preservation Act, 1894."—(Mr. Mills.)

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, 13th July, 1899.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE VOTE ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EXTENSION BILL.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Before proceeding with the orders of the day, I would ask the House to have my name added to the minority on the vote on the Grand Trunk Railway agreement and the Drummond County Railway Bill. I was in one of the committee rooms when the vote was taken, otherwise I would not ask to have it added. I told one of the messengers to give me notice when the vote came on ; besides, I left the door open with the expectation of hearing the division bell, but no division bell was rung on the occasion—a thing very unusual on so important a question. I can only, of course, have my name added by leave of the House and I hope the House will consent to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I will move that the hon. gentleman's name be added to the minority.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the name is to be added, would it not be better to have it done as a matter of course? If a motion is made, it will appear on the minutes and will show that the hon. gentleman was not present. Of course, if the addition of the name would have the effect of changing the vote, it would be a very serious matter.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If there is any objection I will not ask it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Let it go without a motion—by common consent.

BANQUE DU PEUPLE BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

The order of the day being called :

Consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to (Bill 6) " An Act respecting La Banque du Peuple. "

Hon. Mr. FORGET moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to Bill (6) " An Act respecting La Banque du Peuple." He said :—As I gave some explanations on the second reading of this bill, and as it has been fully discussed in the general committee and in the sub-committee, and their report has been made to this House, I will refrain from making any more comments on it, unless some hon. gentlemen would desire more information, in which case I shall be pleased to give it.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the adoption of the report. My opposition to this measure will be at a later stage. I simply wish the House to understand that I do not approve of the report. But the hon. gentleman did not mention that there was any amendment to the report.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The hon. gentleman moved concurrence in the amendment.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—With the permission of the House, I would like to make a few remarks on the bill before the motion is carried. I have studied this bill very carefully, and, being a resident of Montreal, have been cognizant of the circumstances under which the unfortunate necessity for such a bill has arisen. Nothing can exceed the disastrous character of the collapse of the Banque du Peuple, and it is impossible to deny that the directors have incurred a very serious moral responsibility in regard to it, while as regards their personal financial responsibility, that is absolutely unlimited. I have always considered that they were brave men—perhaps their bravery was that of the boatman who, when he saw some tyros out sailing a boat in a stiff breeze said they feared nothing because they knew nothing. These gentlemen undertook a responsibility which was in the highest degree dangerous, as it pledged their whole existence financially to the solvency of the bank. With reference to the manner in which banks are conducted by the average board of directors, I have the opinion—it may be a wrong one, that if a bank is managed by a dishonest man, no board of directors can prevent its collapse. The very method of direction by a constituted board is such that it can be evaded successfully by a dishonest cashier or manager. If that be so, and it is my opinion most clearly, the collapse of the Banque du Peuple does not necessarily imply dishonesty, or even dereliction of duty, on the part of the board beyond a certain limit. I have the opinion from a long personal acquaintance with one or more of the directors that they cannot be accused of dishonesty or malfeasance of office. Granted that the bill is of an exceptional character, setting aside the law of the case to meet special circumstances, this House will remember that we were asked some years ago to postpone the impending suits for the purpose of giving them a chance to wind up the affairs of the bank successfully. We sanctioned the postponement, and I think that we did so wisely, though it might induce some special hardships on some creditors and depositors. No doubt it did. We have to deal, however, with the question which we have presented to us every now and then—a choice of evils. We have to face a condition of things and do that which, in our opinion, is the less of the two evils. That is our position at the present moment. In my opinion, if this bill fails to pass, the remaining assets of the bank will be dissipated in law and will reach neither creditors nor depositors. On the whole, therefore, I favour the passing of the bill with the amendments already suggested and perhaps one or two others which I shall take the liberty of mentioning. The amendment proposed in committee, which has just been presented to the House, saves the securities which at the time of the passing of this Act any judgment creditor could possess. That is all right enough. I trust the House will adopt some clause like that; but in addition to that, while what I have said hitherto has been in the direction of deprecating too severe a judgment on the board of directors, nothing can be plainer than the necessity of providing that they shall not profit by their own lack of care, and while it is suggested, and possibly with some ground for it, that having a vast accumulation of assets, many of which are of doubtful value, and the value of all of which is a matter to be solved only by results—in fact the estimate with regard to which can only be a matter of opinion—I think the settlement at the rate of 45 cents to the depositors and creditors which they have accepted, and I think wisely accepted, may be considered as a finality as regards them. But, acting on the view that the directors should not be permitted to profit in any shape, and that there should be no ambiguity or uncertainty about the fact that they are bound, doubly and trebly bound, to give their best attention to this question and to work out these assets to the best advantage, and in no respect or manner to profit by any surplus which might, in the course of time, be realized from their disposal. I would, therefore, suggest to this honourable House that a clause be inserted calling upon the directors to dispose of the assets within a certain time. The ninety days which they are given to pay up the balance of the 45 cents and obtain a clearance from the depositors and creditors is all right enough. That is perfectly fair, but to call upon them to dispose of all the various properties within that time would be simply to say that they must be sacrificed and thrown away coûte qui coûte. I think that is absurd. They should be given a couple of years to wind up and dispose of all the properties and realize on all the assets, and at the end of that period they should be called upon to account strictly for the results of their stewardship, they having no benefit, if they fail to realize the estimate put upon them, and if there is any surplus, it should be handed over, in my opinion, to the shareholders who have put their money into this concern. It would seem at first sight to be a fair proposition that the depositors and the creditors should get that surplus. I do not think so, and for this reason: when a man fails and has a settlement with his creditors, he has to give a good deal of time to the settlement of the estate, and if there is any surplus, it goes to him. The creditors do not profit after having accepted a compromise. My sympathies are very largely with the shareholders. At one clap they found their capital disappearing and nothing left of it, and if there is any surplus, they are entitled to it, in my judgment. I happen to know some of the properties intimately. I have this morning gone over the statements in the possession of this honourable House, giving the details of these properties, and I am inclined to think that the estimate, while it may be exceeded, is not an unfair one. One property in particular, a property which was occupied by a manufacturing concern, and one of the largest of the assets, I find is estimated at 22 cents per superficial foot. I may say that I owned a property closely adjoining it which I disposed of the other day, at 22½ cents per foot. That being so, and knowing the locality of some of the other properties, I think that the estimate on the whole is a fair one. I would not like to delude the shareholders into the belief that there is a great probability of a surplus for their benefit, but if there should be any surplus, it should go to them. With these suggestions, I think that the House will do well to adopt the bill. My knowledge of some of the directors, as I have already said, inclines me to the belief that they are very unfortunate, but not guilty except to the extent that every man is certainly guilty who neglects a duty that he assumes. With these remarks, I venture to commend to this House the adoption of the bill, not only with the amendments suggested in committee, but with the further suggested amendments which I have pointed out in the few remarks which I have ventured to make.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to accept the notice that I gave yesterday, which is just on the lines of the hon. gentleman's remarks?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I accept it to a certain extent, so far down as the words "pro rata." The further suggestion that the following gentlemen should be named for the purpose of administering such assets seems to me rather unworkable. They might refuse to do it.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—He might die.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—He might disagree with the directors with regard to his remuneration. There can be no possible objection to associate some person with the present board of directors, but I do think it would be wrong to take the matter of the responsibility of winding up this estate out of the hands of the present board. They cannot possibly benefit. I would take very good care that they do not benefit to the extent of one stiver by any results, and I would judge them wrongly if I were to suppose that they would not strain the utmost of their ability to wind up the estates—they are bound in their own interest to do it—and to pay the surplus if it can be realized.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. FORGET moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—With regard to Hon. Mr. Desjardins, his name was suggested to me by a party here interested in the bill, and for that reason I embodied his name in the notice I gave. However, I am willing to meet the hon. gentleman half way on reasonable grounds any time, and I think he had better postpone the third reading till later on, when we can get together and agree upon a motion.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—There can be no possible objection to the name of Mr. Desjardins. The question is in what respect, and to what extent you would associate him with the directors.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I would suggest that he be an advisor with the other directors.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Yes, and if the Hon. Mr. Desjardins would not accept the position, I would ask the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court to name a man.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Then we can name Mr. Desjardins, and if he does not accept we will go to the expense of having the Supreme Court name a gentleman. We may as well frame the amendment now.

Hon. Mr. VILLENEUVE—There are already three advisors of the bank. I have no objection to Mr. Desjardins. The directors, however, have not been acting alone. They have had Mr. John Crawford, Mr. Boyer and another gentleman very well known in Montreal The directors have done nothing whatever without the consent of these gentlemen. As far as the proposition made by the hon. gentleman from Kennebec (Mr. Drummond) is concerned, I have no objection to a certain extent, but it must be remembered that the assets of the bank are nearly $500,000 and the claim at 45 cents for depositors amounts to $700,000. So that there is not the least chance that there will be a cent left for the shareholders. I hope the House will not embarrass the directors and advisors, because there is certainly nothing to be divided. They are over $200,000 short to meet the claims of the creditors at 75 cents. Therefore, all this legislation will go for nothing. They have to meet within three months, $700,000, and they have only got $500,000. What is the use of trying to legislate and naming other inspectors to see whether there is anything left for the depositors? There certainly will be nothing left, and the directors are paying $195,000 of their own money. If they have done wrong they are suffering for it, and they will give $250,000 out of their own pockets to pay the amount the depositors are willing to accept from them. They certainly have a claim over the shareholders to anything that might be left, but I am positive there will be nothing left, and I do not see why we should legislate.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—If what the hon. gentleman from Montreal (Mr. Villeneuve) says is correct—and I know that it is—there will be nothing left and it is not worth discussing. It makes no difference if we have nothing to divide. But I should be very glad to avail myself of the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Kennebec (Mr. Drummond). The depositors in accepting 75 cents are done with the matter, and if there happens to be a little money over, I should say let it go to the shareholders. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Montreal that there will be nothing left over, and it is not worth while discussing it.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I move that the following be added as clause 5:

If, on the liquidation of the present remaining assets, it is found that the sum, together with the security above referred to, has realized more than sufficient to pay the 45 cents, any surplus remaining shall be divided among the shareholders of the said bank, and the said directors shall be bound to keep a strict account of said liquidation, and to produce the same in detail before each meeting of the creditors and shareholders to be called every six months after the passing of this Act and for the purpose of administering such assets the Honourable Alphonse Desjardins, shall be named as associate with the directors at such renumeration as may be agreed on, and on his refusal, some other person to be named by the court on application by the directors.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. FORGET moved that the bill be read the third time, as amended.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

NIAGARA, ST. CATHARINES AND TORONTO RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM moved the third reading of Bill (69) "An Act to incorporate the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I yesterday gave notice that on the third reading of this bill I would move an amendment, which I then gave notice of. I now wish to make an alteration, and move the following :—

That the said bill, as amended, be not now read a third time, but that it be further amended by substituting the following for the first subsection of section 8 :—

8. The company may, upon such terms and conditions as are agreed on with the purchasers of the railway right, franchises and other property of the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company, acquire such railway right, franchises and other property and own and deal with the same in as full and ample a manner as the said Niagara Central Railway Company could have done had the recent judicial sale of said company's property not taken place.

In making this motion, I do not wish to do it as we have done on another occasion, by referring the report back to the committee, a course which the House has pronounced against emphatically. But when this bill passed the committee it controverted a principle which was laid down very emphatically by the committee a short time ago, the principle of not allowing railways to parallel each other. In this case we have a railway seeking to perpetuate a charter where they run alongside of two railways. When the principle was enunciated and the House approved of it, as they did the other day, it seems a curious thing that the members of the committee who voted against the reconsideration of a bill which the committee has reported against on that principle should yesterday have reported favourably a bill to authorize a railway to parallel two other lines. One railway is the Grand Trunk, the other is the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they provide a service that is sufficient for all purposes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is wrong in his statement. There are simply the two rails and there are three railway companies which use the one track.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Then there are three railways instead of two railways.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have running powers over the road.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The people of that section have a service by both lines of railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Three lines.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—A controversy took place between the parties who represented this bill, for and against, as to whether this was not in effect seeking a new charter, and it was argued very strongly by the promoters that this was not a new charter at all, but that they already got rights. Against that it was pointed out that if they had got those rights, there was no reason why Parliament should be asked to give them new rights, or a renewal of them, and it was left a matter which I think many of the members of the committee did not understand, as to whether they had the right at all to renewal, or whether this was in the nature of a new bill.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I did not want to stop the hon. gentleman while he was speaking, but I think he is out of order. He has given no notice of this motion. This is the third reading of the bill. He is out of order entirely. I want that point decided first, claiming the privilege afterwards to reply to my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—We have just been amending a bill where no notice was given.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman springs this on the House now at the third reading of the bill, and I say that he is out of order. I want the ruling of the Speaker. I have every confidence that the Senate will pass the measure, but there is no use taking up the time of the House discussing it if the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the question is decided I should like to explain just how the question stands. Before the committee's report came up in the House yesterday, the hon. gentleman from Brandon gave notice of an amendment as follows :—

That when the bill from the House of Commons (No. 69), "An Act to incorporate the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway Company," is called for a third reading, he will move to amend the bill by striking out all the words in clause 8 after "same" in line 4 thereof.

It was pointed out by the counsel who represented the promoters of this bill, that if that amendment were made the railway company would have nothing but the railway, twelve miles I think it is, between St. Catharines and Niagara, whereas the people who are getting this Act of incorporation had purchased at the judicial sale all the property, rights and franchises of the Niagra Central Railway, and that this amendment, if it carried, would not leave them in possession of what they had purchased at the judicial sale. The amendment which the hon. gentleman has asked leave to substitute for the amendment of which he gave notice is to strike out the first subsection of the 8th clause altogether and substitute for it the subsection which he has read, and which gives to the company proposed to be incorporated by the bill before the House not merely the railway but all the rights, privileges and franchises which were owned by the Niagara Central Railway Company at the time of the judicial sale. The effect of that amendment is to put the purchasers who are seeking this Act of incorporation in exactly the same position in which the Niagara Central would have been if they had got this legislation before the judicial sale took place ; and that is only fair and reasonable. It is not altogether proper to refer to what took place before a committee, but hon. gentleman will remember that it was stated on behalf of the promoters that the object of this bill was to put the new company in the same position in which they were placed by the judicial sale. The sale had to be, it was thought, under the provisions of the Railway Act, ratified by this Parliament. It would be much better for the promoters of the bill that this amendment should pass than that the amendment of which the hon. gentleman for Brandon gave notice should pass, because in the one case the new company would have all the rights, whatever they may have been, of the old company, and in the other case the new company would have probably only the twelve miles of railway.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I am satisfied now that the point of order is not well taken. This question was discussed fully before the committee. The hon. gentleman tried it before the committee and was largely outvoted. He does not want the part of the country where I live to have anything but the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway. He wants a monopoly for the Grand Trunk along the whole Niagara peninsula. We had before the committee a statement from the member from Lincoln showing that the action of the Niagara Central Railway Company had saved them 50 per cent in the freight from Thorold to the Suspension bridge. Well, if it has that effect it is a benefit to the people. I am not in opposition to the Grand Trunk. I should like to see that railway prosper, but I want the people to have something else beside the Grand Trunk. These people have done a great deal of improvement on this railway even for the short time they have had it. Some of the railway was built on wooden trestles from Thorold to St. Catharines. The company is now substituting steel trestles. The people want an outlet from St. Catharines to Hamilton, but the Grand Trunk wants to choke them off; however much I may respect the interests of the Grand Trunk and wish to see them prosper, I want the people of this country to prosper also, and have fair play, and not have more money taken out of them than should be taken. I am surprised at hon. gentlemen speaking as they do. If we take the action the hon. gentlemen from Halifax and Brandon suggest, you will give this company a law suit. They cannot go on with their improvements ; they must go to law, and the people must suffer in the meantime. I appeal to the Senate to support us in this matter and give us a chance to get to Hamilton, Toronto and elsewhere as long as the company give satisfaction to the people and a better rate than could be got without this road. The chairman of the committee knows how this question was discussed in committee—how it was gone over clause by clause. I should like to get an expression from him on this question, as to how the vote in the committee took place. The chairman is privileged to tell us what he thinks about this matter.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—It is laid down as a rule, a very proper one, that anything that has passed in committee, unless there is some grave fault in it, should not be referred to in the House. The hon. gentleman from Monck says there was a large meeting; that the question was thoroughly discussed and a decision arrived at. Two great railways are opposed to this little railway, because, they say, it will parallel their roads. We should hesitate, even if it was a little wrong, before we condemn this little railway. I do not believe in paralleling a railway where there is very little commerce, but between Niagara and Hamilton and Toronto, where so many people travel to see the falls, I do not think we should allow these two roads to monopolize the traffic. We should not allow them to monopolize the traffic, as they will do if this bill is defeated, because they would have the settling of the rates themselves. I say that this railway, small as it is, and in spite of its powerful enemies, should have the privilege conferred upon it by the Railway Committee, after the long and exhaustive discussion that took place upon it.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I concur in the remarks of the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Almon) with regard to this House overruling the action of the committee, because we know they have carefully looked into all the facts in connection with this measure and made a report to this House, and before we change that report we should have very strong reasons for our action. As I understand this matter, the reasons given for asking for the change in clause eight of this bill, adopting the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. gentleman from Brandon was simply because this railway parallels other lines of railway running between Hamilton and Toronto. The amendment proposes to give the new company precisely the rights that the old company had, and there appears to be a question as to whether the right of the company to build this extension has expired through lapse of time. The view I take of this question is that undoubtedly the old company originally possessed this right. Supposing that right had expired, and this new company which has purchased the rights of the old company came to Parliament and asked to have the time for that extension continued. I think that it would be almost unprecedented on the part of this Parliament to refuse this extension. While I entirely agree with the principle which the hon. gentleman from Brandon has laid down, that we should not incorporate two roads paralleling lines which already exist, yet where we have granted that privilege and where capitalists have expended their money and constructed part of the line for us, to reverse the policy on some technical point, like the point referred to here, that the road is not finished in the proper time, and say we would not allow the new company to build a competing line, would be very inconsistent action on the part of this Parliament. For my part, as I understand the question, I cannot support the amendment. I think the bill as it came from the committee should receive the support of the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I agree with the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland. The proper time to consider the principle embodied in this amendment was when application was made to Parliament for the original charter. There can be no doubt of it. It was then the business of Parliament to consider whether they would grant a charter for the construction of this road, and whether they were not acting in a manner detrimental to the interests of those roads that had already established lines between Toronto and the Niagara frontier. But having granted the charter, and the construction of the road having been in part delayed through no fault of the present proprietors, it does seem to me we would be taking advantage of a technicality to the detriment of the company if we were to refuse to carry this bill as it stands. This is practically, in effect, an extension of time for the construction of the road. I understand litigation has taken place which hindered and delayed the company from going on and completing their road. Now all the mischief that was contemplated, all the wrong that could have been done, would have been done under the original charter. This is affirming the continuance of a power that these parties at this moment, I understand, possess, although the time which the charter has to run has very nearly expired. It may be that a wrong will be done to the existing lines between Toronto and the Niagara frontier by the completion of this road, but a wrong will be done also by refusing to those parties an extension of time for the completion of the road they have undertaken. If Parliament has done an act which is mischievous in its effect, and if a wrong is to be done to existing companies that have completed lines, Parliament can hardly undo fairly what they have done in this case without compensation to those who hold the present charter. There is no proposition of that sort. The proposition is to prevent parties retaining the power which we have already conferred upon them, and under which the road would have been completed if litigation had not occurred which hindered them from going on.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If I may be allowed, as other hon. gentlemen have done, to violate the secrecy of the proceedings of the Railway Committee, I may mention that the vote on this bill was 13 to 10, so that it will be seen that there was not a full committee, and the indignity to the committee is not seriously to be considered. What is the position? The hon. gentleman from Monck speaks of the Niagara peninsula as if it had insufficient railway accommodation. As I understand it, there are three railway companies now running trains between Toronto and Buffalo—the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. I should suppose that those companies would afford a reasonable amount of accommodation to that particular district. Then, coming from the west, there is the Canada Southern and its connections and the old Great Western Railway. So that I do not think the ground can be taken that the people of that section of the country have not a sufficient amount of railway accommodation. This St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company was first incorporated as far back as 1882, if not further back. It was regarded, and has been regarded from the first, as being more or less a speculative undertaking. Since 1882, the company have built twelve miles of railway, and, as I understand, they have not built a mile for the last twelve years. They were incorporated originally by the legislature of Ontario. In 1895 or 1896 they obtained from this Parliament the right to build extensions to Toronto, and I think that at that time certain members of this House, looked upon the Act of 1896 as being a sort of speculative charter—a charter which was bought for the purpose of selling—and the fact that no work has been done on the road since the Act of 1896 which authorized the extension to Toronto goes to show that that is really the character of the undertaking. The hon. Minister of Justice says that to pass this amendment and not to pass the bill just as it come to us, would be a wrong to the parties who bought at the judicial sale. What did those parties buy at the judicial sale? The judicial sale took place in April of the present year. If the right to make the extensions has lapsed, it lapsed in the autumn of 1898, and the purchasers at the judicial sale were quite aware of what had taken place, and the fact that those purchasers paid only $36,000 for this twelve miles of railway and the other rights and franchises of the company goes to show that they did not think they were getting a great deal, and if the parties who have bought this road got this twelve miles of railway and the right to extend to Fort Erie for $36,000 they ought to be making a good bargain. I fail to see that there is any wrong done to the parties buying. They knew just where they were and knew the position of the whole question just as we know it now. The position has not changed since the judicial sale.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is true, but the time is not out yet.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In reply to the question of the hon. Minister of Justice, the two years expired not later than the autumn of 1898—that is if those two years have expired at all—and when those parties bought at the judicial sale, they would be just in the same position as if they bought to-day. If the charter had not expired when they bought, it has not expired yet, and this amendment of the hon. member from Brandon gives the purchasers just what they bought at the judicial sale. The amendment reads:

> The company may, upon such terms and conditions as are agreed on with the purchasers of the railway, rights, franchises and other property of the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company, acquire such railway, rights, franchises and other property, and own and deal with the same in as full and ample a manner as the said Niagara Central Railway Company could have done had the recent judicial sale of said company's property not taken place.

That amendment does no injustice to any one. It gives the purchasers just what they bought, and I think from the past history of this company it is not unreasonable to suppose that the people who own the road are not capitalists who can undertake to build a road, and we are giving a sort of speculative charter which may be used simply for the purpose of forcing a purchase of that charter by the Grand Trunk or Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not think that Parliament ought to do anything to help along a transaction of that kind.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Has the amendment been changed since it left the Speaker's hands?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

The amendment was lost on a division. The bill was then read the third time and passed as amended.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill (148) "An Act further to amend the Dominion Lands Act."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When this bill was before the committee, I took the liberty of pointing out to the hon. Secretary of State what I thought was an omission, and a very negligent one in regard to sub-clause f-2 of clause 4. At the risk of wearying the House, I may possibly have to repeat what I said upon that occasion. I pointed out to the House that this clause provided that any persons, their servants, their tenants or their agents, who go upon public lands—that is upon Indian lands, because it deals simply with Indian lands—immediately previous to the extinguishment of the Indian title, and make a residence, so long as that residence is anterior to the extinguishment of Indian title of those lands, they would be entitled to secure from the Crown a patent for 160 acres. One can very well understand how that can be abused. Perhaps some hon. gentlemen may not be as familiar with the extinguishment of Indian titles as those of us who come from the North-west, and under whose attention this particular matter of legislation is very often times brought. Before it is possible for the government to extinguish an Indian title, hon. gentlemen can very well understand that considerable negotiations have to be entered into, and very great publicity, and great notoriety, in fact, given to the circumstance that the title is about to be extinguished. Hence the extinguishment of an Indian title is known to everybody in the country, and it sometimes takes perhaps a couple of years to accomplish. In this connection, we have to take into consideration that the Indian reserves are of the choicest lands in that country. Immediatly the public become notified that a certain reserve title is about to be extinguished, there is nothing to prevent hundreds of persons coming upon the wing, without having any stake in the country, without being citizens, without being in any way entitled to consideration at the hands of our government, going upon those lands, and though they are there only one month before actual extinguishment of the title takes place, they have a positive right by this statute to say to the government "We ask you now to issue us patent for 160 acres of land." The government have passed most restrictive legislation in regard to bona fide homesteaders. The government require the homesteader to go upon his land and pay a certain fee to secure an entry, and reside upon these lands six months in each year for three years and make costly improvements upon those lands, and yet at the same time by this legislation we give the right to aliens, or to anybody else who might come into the country without having any qualification, without having any claim upon the government, to go upon those lands and demand from the government 160 acres, despite the fact that they may not have been upon them a month. I ask is this reasonable legislation? Is this careful legislation? Is this protecting the interests of the country? Is this conserving the public interests in any sense? I can scarcely think that the government have any object in introducing slip-shod and ill-digested legislation of this nature, and it occurred to me when I pointed out the fact to the House that the Secretary of State would give some attention to placing a limitation of occupation of those who go on Indian lands; but I find no attention whatever has been given to the suggestion. Under the laws which obtain in the provinces, persons before they are entitled to lands by reason of undisturbed occupation must, in some cases, be on the land for twenty years, in others, ten or twelve years, and here you permit aliens to come in and occupy these lands without having any claim on the consideration of the government and give them a right to 160 acres of land, though they occupy them but for a month. I hope my hon. friend will not persist in putting this clause through without attaching to it some limitation. I would be satisfied with the same limitation as attaches to homesteads, namely, three years occupation of the land, or I would be satisfied, if this were to meet present exigencies in connection with the extinguishment of the Indian title in the north, that it should be limited to cases arising in connection with that particular reserve. The Secretary of State, in making reference to the Act the other day, referred to particular cases in connection with Indian titles to which I now refer. I am satisfied that it should be made applicable only to bona fide cases in connection with that reserve, but that we should put a sweeping law on our statute-books, giving anybody an opportunity to go on Indian lands and demand a title without any term of occupation, I object most emphatically to. I would further point out that this might possibly result in Indian difficulties. If you give license of this kind to persons to go on Indian lands, you at once place on the statute-book a clause which may result in an upheaval between settlers and Indians because persons anxious to get possession of these lands could put any number of their employees on them and get possession in the way I have indicated.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The suggestion made by my hon. friend would, of course, have very great force if they applied to reserves in the settled parts of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but this clause clearly applies to lands which are a long way beyond settlement, where certainly there are no white men at present living. It applies to a section where the Indian title has not been extinguished.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is not my hon. friend aware of this fact, that in the most populous districts of Manitoba and the North-west there are Indian reserves to-day, the title of which may be extinguished at a very early date? I would point out the Sarcee Indian reserve, six miles from Calgary. The Blackfoot reserve about fifty miles east of Calgary. The Piegan Indian reserve near Macleod, the Blood reserve a few miles out of Macleod. The Stony reserve about forty miles west of Calgary, and I might go on and name a dozen reserves occupying some of the finest lands in the North-west, the title of which has not yet been extinguished but may at any time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But they will not be extinguished. I quite understand that the hon. gentleman has in view portions of the country where land has been reserved. This bill is not intended to apply to such reserves. Of course, white settlers would have no right to go on Indian reserves and would have no claim whatever. Indian reserves are lands which have been practically dealt with. In extinguishing the Indian title, certain reserves were made. This clause was never made to apply to these particular reserves; it was intended to apply to places where the Indian title is to be for the first time extinguished.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That may have been the intention, but as it reads it applies to all reserves.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the hon. gentleman's interpretation, but the department would not put that interpretation upon it. They interpret these regulations according to the spirit of them. This bill grows out of the necessity for making a treaty with Indians who are a long way above Edmonton, between Edmonton and the Yukon Territory. Travellers, as we know, have gone into that country by way of Edmonton, and we have discovered, for the first time, that there are numbers of Indians and half-breeds there, and why look upon the invasion of white men, crossing the country and looking after gold, as a tresspass on their liberties, and therefore we have sent a commission there for the purpose of extinguishing their title. This clause has no reference to reserves in the North-west, where the Indian title has already been extinguished. If the clause is misleading, as my hon. friend thinks it is, I am quite ready to accept any suggestion to put a limitation to it. It would seem rather absurd to do so, if its interpretation is limited to the cases which have been described where Mr. Laird and other officers of the department and commissioners are now engaged. The commission will be engaged probably from now until November in this new country, extinguishing the Indian title, laying off reserves and making other arrangements. The Indians in that part of the territory had never been settled with. They never until now have been an element in our settlement of the North-west, but in consequence of people taking the new route to the Yukon via Edmonton, a considerable number of Indians have been found there, and they, knowing that Indians elsewhere have had concessions made to them, are insisting on their rights. This clause has been introduced to enable the commissioners, if they found anybody in possession of a place with improvements, to recognize the fact that they are entitled to 160 acres. I have no objection, if my hon. friend thinks there is danger of a considerable number of persons following up the commissioners and taking up land, of adopting a limit, but I think there is no danger of that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Knowing the fact that the commissioners have gone a considerable distance beyond the field of settlement, quite a number of persons have followed them for the purpose of securing half-breed scrip. These persons could occupy the land and get possession under this clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Instead of saying "at the time of such extinguishment," I will score that out and make it read "in undisturbed possession on the 1st January last."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That will be satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I would not approve of anybody following the commissioners to get possession. I did not suppose, as we are freely giving lands to immigrants coming into the North-west now, that anybody would be disposed to go so far north as that to secure land.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did not refer to land so far north. I referred to reserves in the older parts of the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sure the department never had the idea that this clause would refer to such reserves, but to make it clear I move the amendment which I have suggested.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was read the third time and passed.

THE USURY BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (J) "An Act respecting Usury."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—In order that the members of the committee may understand how the bill stands, I would draw their attention to the fact that it is set forth on page 500 on the minutes of our proceedings, and if the hon. gentlemen would strike out the first clause, which I have moved to amend, and replace it by clause 2 of the bill originally submitted to this House, they will have the bill as it stands before them. Clause 2 is amended to read:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of chapter 127 of the Revised Statutes, no person shall stipulate for, allow or exact any interest or discount at a rate greater than twenty per cent per annum; nor after the maturity of any negotiable instrument or the expiration of the term of payment under any other contract or agreement shall interest be recoverable at a rate greater than ten per cent per annum, unless by the express terms of the negotiable instrument, contract or agreement the contrary has been provided.

This bill covers only transactions amounting to less than $1,000. Loans under $1,000 cannot be made to carry a larger rate of interest than 20 per cent, and when the loan matures and suit is entered, from the date of suit the judge will only allow 10 per cent. I see the hon. junior member from Halifax (Mr. Almond) smiling at the idea that a bill against usury will still allow borrowing and lending at a rate as high as 20 per cent.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I may tell the hon. gentleman for his information that a similar bill has just been passed through the House of Lords, and has been sent to the House of Commons providing that upon sums under $10 a party may claim and exact 25 per cent per annum, upon sums from $10 to $50 a party may claim 20 per cent per annum——

Hon. Mr. AMON—I did not know that the House of Lords deals with dollars and cents. I thought it was with pounds.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes, and I am reducing their pounds into dollars. As the hon. gentleman can see, he will be quite able to return to Halifax and present many good arguments why such an apparently high limitation should be fixed, because on short loans the sum of twenty per cent interest for a week or a month is not very considerable.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would suggest that my hon. friend substitute $500 for $1,000 in the clause.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That is the way it strikes me.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have no objection to that. The loans generally which are usurious, and which simply destroy all chances for the future for young men, range from $50 to $200.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I will submit to the change so far as it goes; at the same time, I have very little confidence in the good effect a Usury Bill will have. Usury is one of those things which it is difficult to provide a remedy for by law. My idea from the outset has been that the only way we can effectually check this evil would be by leaving it to the discretion of the judges before whom such suits are taken to say whether the rate of interest charged is reasonable or not, and if they found it was not reasonable, to give them power to reduce it to a reasonable amount. That, I think, would very likely meet the evil which we are trying to remedy by this bill. I consider this is a measure which should have been introduced by the government and carried through as a government measure. It is scarcely the kind of legislation which a private member should be responsible for and be at the trouble of carrying through the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will remember that the Insolvency Act, when Sir John Macdonald was at the head of the government, was carried through Parliament by Mr. Abbott, who was a private member.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I must say that I concur in the first portion of the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island with regard to the almost insurmountable difficulties in framing a bill to deal with the evil that this measure is intended to meet. I think we all agree as to the desirability of endeavouring to frame some legislation which will meet the evil that no doubt exists to some extent, particularly, I believe, in the city of Montreal from which the hon. gentleman comes, and probably in other large commercial centres. I must say, however, with regard to this clause, I am at a loss to discover any principle whatever on which the hon. gentleman is proceeding. From the very first this bill has been changed from time to time in every respect. At one time the limit to the rate of interest is 20 per cent, then it is 10 per cent. In this clause, as amended, it is proposed to make the maximum rate of interest 20 per cent, and when suit is commenced to reduce it to 10 per cent. I fail to see anything to justify action of that kind. Take the case where a loan has been made at 20 per cent; if the lender is justified in getting 20 per cent for that loan, what possible reason is there, when the man who makes the loan begins a suit to recover his money, that the rate of interest should be reduced one-half? I cannot see anything to justify that. The proposition now is to limit transactions of this character to sums under $500. I am unable to see any principle by which that sum is fixed.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—The principle is interest.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The hon. gentleman has referred to legislation which has passed the House of Lords. I do not know whether that bill has been printed and in the possession of members or not. If so, I have not seen it. I saw the report which was made by the commission which investigated this subject in the mother country, and as I understood from the character of that report, they confined that legislation to a class of people whose business was money lending. It applies only to transactions with such people. There is a principle involved in that, and I can understand why it might be wise legislation. But there is no such principle underlying this bill. It is general in its character. It affects private transactions of all kinds, and there is not a man here who cannot, from his own memory, bring up cases where legislation of this kind would really be an injustice. They may be exceptional cases, but such cases do exist. In the last clause of this bill you exclude from the operation of it the Yukon Territory. I am informed by a gentleman from the western parts of the Dominion that there are numberless transactions in British Columbia and the North-west where higher rates than 20 per cent are paid for money, and with advantage to both borrower and lender. It may be said that in such cases as that the law will not be enforced, but I must ask hon. gentlemen who are in this Senate and legislating on subjects of this kind if they consider it prudent action by a body of legislators to place on the statute-book an Act which makes a class of transactions criminal and assume at the same time that the law will not be enforced. It is not a consistent or prudent action, and I do not think it is a course of action which this body should pursue. While I sympathize with the hon. gentleman and have given this subject as much thought as I could since it came under my notice with a view to trying to suggest some amendment which would accomplish the object he has in view, and not be open to the objection which applies to the bill as it stands, I have so far been unable to see my way clear to frame a clause which will meet the case. I think the true course to pursue under the circumstances, is to let this bill stand over for another year. If a bill has been passed by the House of Lords during this session, as the hon. gentleman has stated the evidence which was taken before the commission on which that bill was based is very voluminous and contains no doubt a great deal of very valuable information. I believe the commission spent some two years in studying the question with a view to framing legislation which would remedy the evils they sought to remedy by legislation, and at the same time not do injustice or injury to any other interest. This subject should receive more careful study before we attempt to legislate upon it. We should have some well defined principle underlying our legislation, and while I sympathize heartily with the hon. gentleman and am willing to assist him in any way in my power I cannot give my support to this bill as it stands.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not seem to me that passing an Act which provides that in case of a loan not exceeding $500, not more than 20 per cent interest can be recovered, we are doing any very improper thing. Looking at the matter, at first blush at any rate, I do not think any member of this House can feel that that is likely to do any injustice to either the lender or the borrower. This measure has received a great deal of consideration. I do not suppose that the hon. gentleman who introduced it is of opinion that it is perfect, but it is a fair start in the right direction, and the public, who do not know so much about the objections and difficulties in the way, would be disappointed if the Senate failed to do something with this measure. We had better pass it in its present very harmless and modified form, and let it to go down to the House of Commons the members of which represent the various sections of the country, and if the gentlemen in that chamber, in their wisdom think that the bill is likely to be seriously harmful to the interests of any of their constituents, let them amend it or reject it. But after all the time that has been given to it by the committee and by the House, we should do wrong to reject it merely because we think there are defects in the measure. I do not see that it is calculated to do any serious harm to any one, but it is calculated to prevent serious mischief which is now done in Montreal and other cities.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I may say, in answer to the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland, that there are reasons for all the figures which we have mentioned in the clause now under discussion. The hon. gentleman wants to know why 20 per cent interest can be charged upon a loan, and why, when a suit is instituted, it should be reduced to 10 per cent. Those who think as I do believe that a short loan at 20 per cent is at times justifiable. But that short loan may resolve itself into a long loan, and it has chances to become a long loan when the suit is instituted. We come to the relief of the borrower and say that the courts will only grant 10 per cent interest from the date of the institution of the action. As to the amount which is covered by this bill, $500, as suggested by the Minister of Justice, the hon. gentleman asks why that sum and not another? Because the usurers whom we want to reach lend to needy people, as the preamble says, and those needy people are likely to require sums below $500, and we want to touch as little as possible, liberty of trade. We limit it in order to protect these needy people. This is why I accept $500 as the limit, because I know this bill will protect hundreds of young men who are to-day in large cities struggling at the bottom of the ladder and who fall a prey to those sharks. My hon. friend has asked why we exempt from the operation of this bill the Yukon Territory and not British Columbia. A suggestion was made in committee that that province should also be exempted, but we left the question open to consult the members representing that province in this House. I did consult Mr. Macdonald and Mr. Templeman, and they were willing that this bill should operate in British Columbia as well as in the east. As the hon. gentleman represents New Brunswick and does not complain for his own province, I suppose he can allow British Columbia interests to be guarded by its representatives here. My hon. friend says the British bill affects only one class of people, the money lenders. There are conditions which prevail in Great Britain which are not found here. If you say that this bill will only affect money lenders who have to register, the man I reach will not register, and you have to define what a money lender is, and we cannot define it in a clearer way than is given in the English bill, which says that a money lender is a man who does the business of lending money. Those people will refuse to register, because they will not lend at 20 per cent. When I explained the bill on the second reading I said they would not lend at 25 per cent. All those who will read the work of the commission before the British House will see that all the money lenders say they are out of the business at 25 per cent. They will refuse to register, and may use five or six names and lend money at usurious rates, and when you arrest one he will plead: "I did not do the business of lending money." This is why I want to reduce the amount to $500. Let us put everybody on the same footing. The hon. gentleman from Westmoreland asked if there was any principle in this law that I could rely upon. Yes, I put every citizen of Canada upon the same footing. I do not say a money lender shall register himself. If I were to make registration necessary, his neighbour might lend money at usurious rates, because he does not make a business of doing so. I put everybody on the same footing and limit the application of the clause to all sums under $500. I think 20 per cent is enough. The hon. gentleman from Halifax thinks it is monstrous to pay 20 per cent. If the majority of the committee think 20 per cent sufficient, we will give power to the judge to reduce it to 10 per cent.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think this bill may act against the usurer, but will be very much in favour of the small lawyers. If a man borrows money and goes into law immediately, knowing that the interest will be reduced from 20 to 10 per cent, it will be against the usurer, but the pettifogging lawyer will gain a great deal of practice by it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The first objection we are met with is that lawyers are likely to make money. I wonder what would be the condition of things if the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton was to prevail, that discretionary powers should be given to the judge. If it was discretionary, then there would not be a case where the defendant would not put in a plea asking the judge to reduce the interest.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend must feel gratified at the expression of members of this chamber desiring to remove the difficulties in his way. I do not think there is any difference of opinion in regard to the desirability of removing the abuse which my hon. friend from Montreal has pointed out. The difficulty which has always confronted me in the consideration of this bill is that to meet a certain abuse, my hon. friend has prepared a general measure extending to every commercial transaction throughout the country, and the difficulty has always been to frame such measures as would meet the abuse in question, and yet, at the same time, in no way invade trade and commerce, and such transactions as take place every day in the line of business. I never could understand why my hon. friend did not, in some way or another, attempt to apply the English bill to the abuses which he so forcibly pointed out in this House. To say that the English Act, which has received the consideration of the best minds in England, which has received most careful and judicious attention for the last two years at the hands of a very able commission, could not be applied to almost similar conditions or parallel cases, perhaps on a smaller scale existing in this country, is to my mind saying that we cannot do here what they can do in England. It would not be difficult to take the English Act and frame an interpretation clause so broad and comprehensive as to cover every class of abuse pointed out by my hon. friend. The English Act only extends to usurers, and my hon. friend will concede the fact that all the abuse he desires to meet is that of usury. The English bill provides that the usurer shall take out a license, so that he is in that subject to public authority. If the energy which has been shown by my hon. friend in promoting this bill were directed to preparing a clause to cover the particular cases he has in view, I am satisfied that such a clause could easily be made, and it would at once remove from the arena of controversy the various difficulties which members of this House and business men outside at once perceive in regard to this bill. I can assure my hon. friend that I am quite prepared to support any legislation that will strike a blow at the abuse to which he refers, namely, usury, but I have very serious hesitation in supporting a measure which, by its provisions, extends to every class of business throughout the entire Dominion. In England they thought it wise to give two years consideration to the preparations of such a bill. Surely it would not have been out of place for my hon. friend to have asked the government, particularly the Department of Justice, to have taken up this subject and deal with it as a government measure. I am satisfied if such a measure had been introduced by the government, after having received that attention which the Department of Justice particularly can give to subjects of this nature, it would have received the support of this House, especially in view of the expressions of support which my hon. friend from Montreal has received from both sides of the House in regard to the object which he has in view. I would furthermore say, that if my hon. friend had given the same energy and exercised the same effort in regard to the introduction of an Insolvency Act, he might possibly have surmounted many of the difficulties which he has pointed out, under which many people in Montreal and other parts of Quebec, and possibly Ontario, labour. The inconsistency, which I took the liberty of pointing out to this House, in the clause which we are now dealing with still obtains, namely, that you provide for a repudiation all the solemn engagements of a contract that interest shall be charged at a particular rate. You at once offer an inducement to the borrower to bring the lender into litigation. It does not carry out the object which my hon. friend has in view. My hon. friend says that if a provision of this kind is not passed, the lender will continue to lend without taking any particular steps for the recovery of the principal and interest, for the purpose of securing the fixed rate of interest during its currency. My hon. friend will at once see that this provision will not meet that difficulty. I understand that was the difficulty which my hon. friend pointed out, and which was a justification for the reduction of interest after the issue of the writ.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I only stated that I thought it was fair that when the judge rendered judgment against the defendant, and it seemed to appear that the defendant was unable to pay the amount, that the judgment should not hang over his head at the exorbitant rate or 20 per cent, but that it should be reduced to 10 per cent. I know of hundreds of cases of judgments hanging over the heads of young men where the interest runs from 60 to 100 per cent per year.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I know of no law which will allow a larger rate of interest on judgments than the legal rate of 6 per cent. Notwithstanding the contract which may have fixed the rate of interest at a larger or smaller amount, the judgment bears interest at the legal rate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I cannot say as to the other provinces, but in the province of Quebec, when a note bears a rate of interest of 5 per cent per month, payable in three months, the court renders judgment condemning the party to pay the amount with 5 per cent per month as long as it is not paid. This is the law as it exists in the province of Quebec. My firm represented the defendant in a case not three months ago, where our client was condemned to pay the amount. The judge failed to mention the rate which the defendant was condemned to pay. Inscription in appeal was taken, and the judgment was reformed in order to allow the plaintiff to collect interest at 5 per cent per month for thirty years, as judgments are only prescribed by that space of time.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Does my hon. friend think we can pass a law in this House to meet cases of that kind? Is it not beyond human capacity to do that? Should not money be like any other commodity, and find its level, and not be limited by any law? I have studied this matter very carefully and feel that the object which the hon. gentleman has in view is a very good one indeed, but he is failing in that object and in naming the amount of interest that will be allowed we are actually making a bid for people to charge that rate of interest, instead of leaving it as it is to-day like any other commodity. The maximum rate of interest that will be charged in making a good many loans that would not be thought of under the existing law.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I may give the experience we have had for a number of years. The banking rate of interest is fixed at 7 per cent. Will my hon. friend say that it has kept the rate of interest at that level? When a man has a mortgage to offer, he can borrow at 5 per cent.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That supports my argument. The maximum figure in the bill will be the figure charged, namely, 20 per cent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman does not understand the bearing of my argument. Seven per cent is the rate allowed to banks, but it has not maintained that rate, inasmuch as the tendency of money is to go down. It is not Canada that governs the value of money. It is Great Britain. She controls our market, and so long as the rate of interest goes down in Great Britain, our rate follows immediately. We know that the value of money is regulated, not by our own market, but by the outflow of money from Europe. We are gradually coming down to the level of the British market as to the value of money. The value of money will not rise simply because we put 20 per cent in this clause. If a mortgage is offered as security, loans from $5,000 to $20,000 can be obtained at 5 per cent. When we passed the Pawnbroker's Act, allowing the pawn-broker to collect 24 per cent, it did not have the effect of raising the value of money. It cannot have the effect my hon. friend fears. The banks lend at 7 per cent when we have security to offer.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If money is a commodity in the market, regulated the same as any other commodity, why should a limit be put upon it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Because it is the universal sentiment that if it goes beyond a certain limit, we have the right to check it as an immoral act. The principle of the bill which I laid before this chamber was involved in the preamble, and the chamber seemed unanimously of opinion that if we could check the evil we should do so, and how can we check the evil without making some such restriction?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I will put a case to the hon. gentleman. Supposing I come to the hon. gentleman and borrow $100 for ten days. I want that money and I am going to sacrifice a great deal to get it, and he charges me two dollars for the use of the money. It looks small, and it is really small. It is insignificant compared with the good it is going to do me if I can borrow that money for ten days. If we calculate we will see that it is between seventy and seventy-five per cent per annum. Is it reasonable that I should be prevented from making that bargain? There was no fraud. It was perfectly understood between the gentleman from whom I borrowed the money and myself that he was to charge me $2. According to this clause he would be liable to a penalty.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Liable to a year's imprisonment and a thousand dollars fine.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If my hon. friend wants a hundred dollars and is in bad straits, I pity him if he has to go to the money lender to get it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It should be confined to money lenders and usurers.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If we could close the door to usury, I am quite sure my hon. friend would be able to get his money from some honest citizen who would not take his best blood out of his veins.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—The hon. gentleman deserves a good deal of credit. When he spoke of the rising and falling of money in Great Britain, I think he had better copy Great Britain one step farther. It took them two years to prepare a bill of this kind. We have had a great deal of talk about this bill pro and con. It took us about ten years to get rid of the old usury law, and I think it would be better for the hon. gentleman to take another year to consider this matter and see what the English Act is. Then we would be able to pass a good bill and not hurt anybody.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I cannot accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman. I have examined the English bill.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—While I applaud the motive which actuates the promoter of this bill, I cannot help thinking that it is impracticable, and that it cannot be carried out in Canada without interfering with and deranging our laws of interest and our laws against usury. Supposing a man wants to lend at a usurious rate and takes a note for $100, while he pays but $50, and after getting the note he goes to the bank and discounts it and receives the face value of the note, what has the maker of the note to say to the rate that is included in that note when it comes to its maturity? Will he be able to say to the bank "Oh, but you who advanced this money advanced but half the amount of this note."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The bill provides for that.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—Let the bill provide just whatever you like, if the holder of that note, although he only gave half the value for it, transfers it to another for anything he likes, sells the note, the party buying the note will be entitled to recover the amount of it. What protection then is there against the usurers? There is none at all. I think, with all due deference to the promoter of the bill, and in deference to the opinions expressed here to-day by several hon. gentlemen, that it will be much wiser to let the present bill stand for the present session. I do not think it has received all the consideration that it deserves. It will be very entangling and very embarrassing, and any measure affecting the laws relating to money and interest and bills and notes, and all those loans of that character are of so much importance that we should be in no hurry in passing them. The hon. gentleman from Calgary speaks of the English law in reference to a kindred measure there. I think it would be wise for us to take time and examine the relations that may exist between the conditions there and here. I certainly must vote against the bill in its present form, although my heart goes out to the promoter of the bill and his motive, which is to reach those cormorants that will live upon the necessities of the poor. I therefore would urge my hon. friend from Montreal to allow his bill to stand for another session. It then will come out that such a bill is proposed. Our judges and our commercial men will, in the meantime, have an opportunity of giving consideration to the measure and giving us advice touching the measure. I believe that will be a wise course. I feel that there is in a bill of this nature no party politics. It is a measure we are interested in giving effect to if it can be done reasonably and profitably. I therefore submit to this House that the wiser course would be to let the bill stand till a future session.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The discussion which has taken place already shows more clearly to the House the difficulties which surround this bill and, in my opinion, confirms the position which I took before, that there is no underlying principle on which this legislation is founded. The hon. promoter of the bill, in speaking of that feature of the case, said that when you pass the limit named in this bill the action became immoral. I am at a loss to understand how a loan becomes immoral when you pass a certain limit. It does seem to me in some cases 19 per cent would be a great deal more immoral than 20 per cent in others. The case which has been referred to by the hon. gentleman from Glengarry and which is, I was going to say, an every day transaction, it is almost an every day transaction, where a person wants $100 for a week or two and who is perfectly able to pay at the end of the time and is willing to pay two or three dollars for the use of the money for that short time. It is an open and legitimate and every day transaction, and it does seem to me unwise to pass an Act of Parliament which makes such transaction criminal, subjecting the borrower and the lender to a large fine or imprisonment. In order that the sense of the committee may be taken on this subject, I shall move that the committee rise. I desire to impress upon the House and the hon. gentleman that it is not because I am hostile to the object that he has in view, but it is desirable, under present circumstances, that this legislation should be postponed until next year, and that in the meantime most careful thought and consideration should be given to the subject in order, if possible, to frame a bill which will meet the evil that the hon. gentleman desires to obviate without doing the injustice that this bill, if passed in its present shape, is liable to do.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I should be sorry if any course should be taken with this bill, which the hon. gentleman has endeavoured to make as perfect as possible, although it requires a good deal of amendment yet, that would prevent its being so amended that it can go before the country. If the bill does not pass this session, I think it will be a very good point to put it in such shape that we could approve of it for the present, and it could then be distributed, as was done once before——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As was done with the Loan Companies Bill last year.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—So that the country would know what has been done in this matter, and would have an opportunity of forming an opinion on the merits of the bill. As the bill is now, between the report of the committee and the amendments which have been proposed, nobody can tell what it is, but if the House would agree to have it so far put into shape, as was done in the case mentioned by the Minister of Justice, it could go before the country and give time for an expression of opinion and suggestions to be made between now and next session. I should be sorry to see the committee rise and do nothing further than that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope the hon. gentleman from Sackville will accept the suggestion that has been made. If we pass the bill through committee and get it into the shape in which the hon. gentleman from Montreal wishes it to go before the country, it will give the public an opportunity to understand it.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I have no objection at all. I do not wish to defeat the object that the hon. gentleman has in view. I think a great deal of good could be done by the circulation of the bill during the recess, and thereby get as much information as possible on the subject.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it the understanding that it is not to be pressed to the third reading?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the House chooses to reject it at the third reading, well and good.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would suggest, in the event of anything of the kind being done, that the bill be circulated amongst banking institutions, boards of trade and other institutions for suggestions next year. For that purpose we may just as well leave the bill as it came from the Banking and Commerce Committee, because if we commence to deal with it here, I do not know how far we can go with it. The bill has been severely overhauled time and again, and if we were just to pass it as it came from the Banking and Commerce Committee, and then circulate it as suggested, it would answer the purpose as well as if we went over it again.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not understand that my hon. friend wants to do that. He wants to carry the bill through committee. He is suggesting to the committee the form in which he thinks the clause will most satisfactorily carry out the result he aims at. Unless some hon. gentleman has amendments to suggest, while the clauses are under consideration, it seems to me it would be fair to the hon. gentleman to let him get his bill through committee and bring it before the House for third reading—not to carry it through the committee with the intention of doing nothing further. The House may come to that conclusion when the bill is before them for the third reading. That is not what is in the hon. gentleman's mind. He thinks there is a great evil and that by passing this bill the evil will be met. Some hon. gentlemen are under the impression that there is danger of inflicting mischief on others who are outside of the hon. gentleman's intention. That is a matter which may be very fairly considered. I have given some attention to this question. Some hon. gentlemen have said that the government ought to take this matter up. There is a limit to what a minister or a government may undertake during a single session. I have given some attention to the subject with a view to aiding the hon. gentleman in the preparation of his measure. I have no hesitation in saying, myself, that I should like to see the bill confined to the money lending class. With a view of accomplishing that object I submitted the question to gentlemen in my own department, who are skilled in drafting, and who have been in the habit of considering such questions. I have placed their suggestions in the hands of the hon. member who has charge of the bill. Some of those suggestions might meet my own individual opinion. Others of them—for instance, the definition of a money lender—my hon. friend is not satisfied with. I agree with him in that there is the greatest possible difficulty to give such a definition of a money lender as to include that class that you intend to reach by this bill and include nobody else. That is a very difficult thing indeed to undertake, because there is not a hard and fast line separating those who are in the habit of lending money from all other classes of the community. It seems to me that if you reduce the amount of money to be loaned that would come within the purview of the bill, that for the present you would perhaps accomplish the object which the hon. gentleman has in view without interfering with any other class of the community as well for the present moment as in any other way, and then we could consider the subject further when we come to see the bill in operation. Hon. gentlemen know right well that you never can tell what are the precise defects of a measure until it comes to be practically tried, and it is far easier to perfect a measure that has been once made law and has been brought into practical operation than it is, by mere study and deliberation, to make it before it is put on the statute-book at all. So I suggest to my hon. friend that he may as well go on with the measure getting it through the committee, hearing all the objections which may be made, and if some of the suggestions commend themselves to my hon. friend's mind as improvements in this bill that we might, when we come to the third reading, go back into committee to make some of those amendments if he thought them necessary, or they might be made in the House of Commons when the bill goes there for consideration.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My idea is this; and it is to be considered in connection with the history of this bill since it was introduced in the Senate this session. My hon. friend introduced it as a public bill in the hands of a private member. Such bills usually go to a Committee of the Whole House. It was thought fit, however, to get better and closer consideration for the measure, that it should be sent to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. My hon. friend knows that that committee gave careful consideration to it, and referred it to a smaller select committee. That committee no doubt gave the bill all the consideration they could, and reported a bill which differed in very many respects from the measure as it was first presented by my hon. friend. It was laid over by the committee because they felt that they could not really come to a satisfactory settlement of the question, and for other reasons which need not be explained here, one of which was, and it had a great effect on my own mind, the present state of the law in England, and that they were grappling with this question there and they have not yet got through with the bill there. The matter was dropped, but my hon. friend brought it up again in the House and had the bill referred back to the committee. It was again considered there, and has been reported to the House in an amended form, and my hon. friend has accepted suggestions since the bill came to committee. We have not got further than the first clause. If we arrive at this view—and I think it would be a proper one because we all recognize the importance of coming to right conclusions on such questions as this—that we should report the bill, why not report it just as it came from the Banking and Commerce Committee, where it received so much consideration. If we go on with it, there will be a great difference of opinion and we will not probably arrive at an agreement soon, but if we go on in a perfunctory manner, with the idea that we will merely get it through and have it printed, I do not think it will come out in such a good form as it was in when it came from the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There are not so many changes. After the second clause there are no other changes in the bill as it came from the committee except in clause 5; inasmuch as we say ten per cent is the rate the court will be permitted to fix, the same rate will have to be fixed upon judgments rendered before the passing of the Act. So when we are done with the clause under consideration we have the bill as it came from the committee, and if it is not passed this session I would urge hon. gentlemen to at all events discuss the second clause and pass this bill if the majority of the Senate think we should do so.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—My object in making the proposition which I have now submitted is this : there was a motion made that the committee rise, which would virtually kill the bill and, so far as the public are concerned, very little would be known as to what the Senate had been doing in reference to these very grievous complaints and great evils which exist. We could place ourselves in a position by which the country would know what efforts have been made in the direction of remedying these great evils, and it occurred to me that to allow the bill to pass through the committee, without taking the third reading, would answer the object we have in view. Now, if I may venture to say without disrespect, I think the Minister of Justice was proposing to go one better, and that the bill should not only go to the third reading but should pass the third reading. I am not prepared to urge that course, though I have no objection to it myself. I desire very strongly indeed that we should not allow the bill to drop without being able to show to the country what efforts have been made in the direction of curing the evils which my hon. friend desires to meet. It would be a great pity to allow things to drop by the committee simply rising.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—After this bill comes out of committee, if it does come out at all, I am absolutely in the hands of the Minister of Justice. It is for him to say whether it shall go to the third reading. I am absolutely indifferent after that, because if the government does not adopt it in the House of Commons, it certainly will not pass this session, so that if we come out of the committee with a favourable report on this bill it is in the hands of the Minister of Justice. Even if the Senate passed it, I am quite sure it could not pass through the House of Commons unless it had the support of the government.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend desires the passage of this bill, he should adopt the lines of the English bill. I have heard no reason why a definition cannot be framed by this House to cover the class of cases referred to in Montreal or elsewhere. My disposition would be to move an amendment along that line. Highly as I value the opinion of my hon. friend from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) I should be disposed to give my attention to the best form of the bill rather than accept it with its present crudities. Since the committee reported the bill, various other amendments have been made which seemed to destroy its consecutive nature and order.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do not think it is possible for this House to know now where it stands. I certainly do not understand it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What I would suggest to my hon. friend is this ; I am satisfied that the committee should give their best possible attention to the framing of this bill. It seems to be the opinion of the House, and I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should have the bill printed to put us in possession of something intelligible, so that we will not have to refer to the minutes and various other sections of literature to ascertain what we are dealing with.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—My hon. friend is a lawyer and knows exactly how the bill stands. It is simply the second clause, as reported from the committee, which is replaced by another. The hon. gentleman understands it exactly. I credit him with sufficient intelligence to know exactly how the bill is. If he has any amendments to propose, let him propose them. I move now that the second clause be adopted.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I do not understand the bill, and we have to go to search in three or four places before we know what the clause means. We are not all lawyers, and I, for one, cannot see how the bill stands, unless it is reprinted.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I think the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Allan) is a very good one, and I should be very sorry not to adopt it. I do not want to appear to do anything hostile to the object the hon. gentleman has in view, but, as I said before, I do not see that I can give my support to this bill as it stands—that is, if it is to become law. The hon. Minister of Justice suggested that the bill might become law, and we could find from the practical operation of the Act where it should be amended. That might be a good suggestion under some circumstances, that is, if the bill were framed properly, but when it contains so many objectionable features, we should not go so far.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We intend to go that far. The bill is in the hands of the House, and if they do not wish to pass it on the third reading it can be rejected.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am not sure that I will be here when the third reading takes place. If the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from York can be accepted, and it is understood that the bill is to be printed and go to the country to be considered next year, I would quite willingly adopt that suggestion, and in any way I can make it as perfect as possible under the circumstances, but if, on the other hand, the suggestion is that perhaps in a thin House the third reading is to be pushed through, I shall feel it my duty to press my motion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Then we are voting on the motion to rise?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I think the hon. gentleman misunderstands the temper of the House. What I am afraid of, and I state it very frankly, is, that that motion may carry and the bill drop. I do not want to see that. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that throughout this whole matter I have always expressed the greatest sympathy with him in his object, and I shall be glad to help him carry it out, but I want to see the bill put in such a shape that, rather than see it extinguished by the committee rising, the country may have an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it, and the hon. gentleman may have an opportunity and the credit of carrying a very useful measure. But if he says we are to divide on the question of the committee rising, I have nothing more to say.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—All I know about this bill is, lately I was in Montreal and it was reported there that the bill had fallen through and there was great rejoicing in the camp of the usurers. Afterwards it was said the bill was to be brought back to the House, and instead of rejoicing there were words used which were not parliamentary.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I am disposed to support the view advanced by the Minister of Justice, and I am very happy on this occasion to fall in with his opinion for once. The statement made by the hon. member who introduced the bill was to this effect, that there were hundreds of judgments standing against parties, to-day, in the province of Quebec where the debt was carrying five per cent per month or more. If the bill does nothing else, I think we should pass it to prevent the collection of that money, because it simply means ruin to the parties under that obligation, and it is an unjustifiable charge. If there is no other good feature in the bill, we are justified in passing it to meet such cases. With the experience of a year's trial of it, after seeing how the Act operates, we can ascertain what defects are in it which it is impossible for us to see at the present time, and the best thing the Senate can do is to pass the bill in its present shape, and send it to the House of Commons. If it becomes law, let it go into operation for a year and then Parliament can make such improvements as may be found necessary another session.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I have been participating to a great extent for the last hour and a half in a parliamentary pantomime. I have seen members rising and apparently addressing the Chair, and except in two or three cases, not a word has reached us in this end of the chamber. But my hon. friend at my right (Mr. Prowse) has risen and says that he supports the proposition of the Minister of Justice. I had no idea what he was supporting until he said he was very eager to redress a wrong and by legislation to set aside the judgments of the court. There are many objectionable features in this bill, but I have not joined in the discussion because, as I said before, I had not heard what was said, but the point to which my hon. friend refers is the one, of all the points of the bill, to which I most strenuously object. I hope he is not justified in saying that he follows the Minister of Justice in an attempt to set aside the judgments of the courts by legislation. If there is one principle more sacred than another, it is this, that legislation must not be permitted to lay its hand upon matters that are past. It is technically called ex post facto legislation, and whatever else we do we should not set an example of that kind to the country. There may be hard cases. It is cruel, and it is unjust, that men should be ground down by judgments based upon such extravagant and outrageous charges for interest, but they are suffering the consequences of their own acts, and it is more tolerable that many men should suffer the consequences of their own acts than that such a principle should be introduced into the legislation of this country. For my own part, I hope my hon. friend was mistaken when he said he was able to follow the Minister of Justice in that direction.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The matter before the House is the second clause of the bill which has nothing to do with courts at all.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Oh, yes it has.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It only provides that after the issue of process, not more than ten per cent shall be recovered. We had better not anticipate as to what becomes of this bill after it passes through committee. That is a matter for the House, I think the House should deal with this measure as it deals with other measures. If it is a measure which deserves to go through committee, let it go through the committee, and make such amendments as desirable and report it to the House, and then the House can express its final opinion of the measure at the third reading. If the majority of the House do not think well of the measure, they can reject it. If they consider the measure a proper one, we can pass it. In any case the bill will then be in a definite form, and can go through the country and be read through the country and understood, so that when we come next session to legislate on this matter we shall be able to do so with the knowledge of what public opinion is on the subject.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I submit, with all humility, to the rebuke of the hon. senior member for Halifax, and I confess I was out of order in speaking of a matter concerning the 5th clause when we are at the 2nd clause, but I simply referred to the remarks of my hon. friend on my right. For my own part, I am in favour of adopting the second clause. I sympathize with the object of the bill, but I do not think we are acting for the advantage of the parties in whose interest this bill is prompted in passing it immediately. Let us consider it and pass the clauses through committee, and at the third reading we can dispose of it in a way that is just as summary and as effectual as by adopting the motion that the committee rise.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am sorry my hon. friend will not accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from York, that we should go on with the understanding that the bill should not be read the third time, but that it should be distributed for general information, I think that would be much better than to force a division.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is the House that will decide whether there will be a third reading, and if we are satisfied with the work the committee has done, we may pass the third reading, and if not we can reject it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—An impression might be created by some hon. gentlemen that all the difficulty in connection with this bill comes from usurers. Those who were present at the Banking Committee will know that the most serious objections come from the banking associations and not from the usurers, and these representative men were by no means opposed to the passing of some bill that would have possibly met some of the extortions that we know have been practised in the country. They simply dealt with the bill as we all have. I think my hon. friend will make a mistake if he does as he proposes to do, invite a division upon the question that the committee rise, because very likely that motion shall carry, not because we are favourable to his bill, but because we feel that we are not prepared to crystallize into legislation our views at this time. For this committee to go through in an academic way and discuss the bill clause by clause, and then come to a conclusion that we should not report the bill, I think would be a waste of time. The bill has received a great deal of consideration and the hon. gentleman received assistance from the sub-committee and all the members of the Committee on Banking and Commerce. That being the case, why should we not have an understanding that the bill should be reported from this committee, as it came from the Committee on Banking and Commerce after it had received full consideration from that body, with the understanding that it would just be distributed to the boards of trade and financial institutions with a view to elicit the best possible information for dealing with the question next year. If my hon. friend would accept that view, that he would not push the bill to a third reading, and that we could report it in the best form possible without too much loss of time, I think a much more satisfactory solution would be arrived at than to force a vote on the question as to whether the committee rise or not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does the promoter of the bill refuse to give an assurance or let it be understood in the House that he will not force his bill to a third reading?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am in the hands of the chamber, and more especially the Minister of Justice, because it will be within his power to say if it should be pushed to a third reading by making it a government measure or not. If it is not to become a government measure, it may well be adjourned instead of having its third reading. This is not the time to discuss the third reading. If the committee report a bill which commends itself to the House we can pass it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend's own course in regard to this bill convinces me that he has not arrived at any solid conclusion himself. He has changed from first to last, and that shows that, great as the consideration which he has given to it is,—and it is no doubt more than any other hon. gentleman has given to it,—he has not arrived at any firm conclusion about it.

The amendment was lost on a division.

On clause 2.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I move that six per cent be inserted in the bill as the rate to be charged after judgment. I furthermore wish to make the amendment that the loan shall be within a period of 30 days—that that rate of interest will apply only to loans made within 30 days.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Does the hon. gentleman mean by that that in all written contracts, mortgages and so on, that may bear eight per cent interest, that after suit only six per cent can be charged?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Yes. That brings us back to the difficulty. I wish to have six per cent substituted for the ten, but it only applies to loans made within thirty days.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—What does the hon. gentleman mean by that?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That no loan shall extend beyond thirty days. It merely applies to temporary loans?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Supposing a man borrows $500 for three months at ten per cent, what then?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—He connot do it. My first motion is to substitute six for ten.

The amendment was lost.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I think there is an amendment which should be made to clause two which reads as follows:—

Notwithstanding the provisions of chap. 127 of the Revised Statutes, no person shall stipulate for or exact on any negotiatable document, contract or agreement the principal of which is under $500 a rate of interest or discount greater than twenty per cent per annum and the said rate of interest shall be reduced to the rate of ten per cent per annum from the date of issue of process.

The amendment I propose is to substitute the words "date of recovery of judgment" for the words "issue of process."

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the suit ran over two years, the party would be entitled to twenty per cent.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER, from the committee reported that they had made some progress with the bill and asked leave to sit again.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have gone over the bill which my hon. friend is promoting, and have suggested to him that it should be confined to those known specially as money lenders, and that we should give a definition that a judge possessed of commen sense will confine to those who are actually of that class, and we can then go on and deal with the subject very nearly on the lines which my hon. friend proposed to deal with it and it will leave, so far as all the rest of the community are concerned, the freedom which they at present enjoy in respect to the lending of money. I trust that the committee will see its way to facilitate the bill going through on that line.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am glad to say that, as far as I am concerned, if that can be done, it will be perfectly satisfactory. I shall have no objection to the bill at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Would the hon. gentleman withdraw his motion temporarily?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I withdraw my motion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I suggest as clause No. 2, the following, which will define money lenders who will be covered by the operations of this bill:

The expression money lender in this Act shall include any person who carries on the business of money lending or advertises or announces himself, or holds himself out in any way as carrying on that business, and makes a practice of lending money at a higher rate than 10 per cent per annum, but does not include pawnbrokers.

The reason for the exclusion of pawnbrokers is self evident, inasmuch as they have an Act which governs their operations.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I know in my county a farmer who is a money lender, and has been a money lender for years.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—At a higher rate than 10 per cent?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Yes, any rate he can get.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—That is the man we want to catch.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—He will fall under this Act. The bill gives him a right to charge up to 20 per cent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that the object of fixing a high rate is this: the ordinary money lender, who is lending on good security, does not lend at so high a rate; but the man who makes it a practice of lending at a higher rate than 10 per cent, may very well come under the definition of money lender.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—But the man I refer to wants the best security. The trouble is, a law of this kind gives him an opening to raise his rates.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Does that man lend on good security at ten per cent?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Yes. As I said before, if a man lends $50 for ten days and gets $1 for the use of it, that is sixty or seventy per cent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He does not come within the clause.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the exception made at the end of the proposed clause, is it not possible that, if the exception is left in that wide form, a pawnbroker may do business apart from pawnbroking? Would it not be well to insert "as such" after the words "registered pawnbroker?" A man might do a money lending business apart from his pawnbroking.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As such he is a pawnbroker, and if he is lending money outside of his pawnbroking, that would not give him an exemption.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why mention the pawnbroker at all? He is covered by the Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is subsequent to the Pawnbrokers Act, and you want to intimate there that you are not repealing or interfering with the Pawnbrokers Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then put in a clause saying that this does not interfere with the Pawnbrokers Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is substantially what you are doing. I do not undertake to controvert the minister's view, but it is a very desirable thing, in making laws which are to be used by the public, that they shall be readily understood by the average man. If you say that this shall not apply to any registered pawnbroker, the average man might think that it would not apply to the pawnbroker when he was doing business in another character, but if you add the words "as such," they can do no harm and will make the meaning clearer to the ordinary reader.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I would be disposed to take the same view as the hon. gentleman from Calgary, but I have followed closely the English law, which excludes pawnbrokers. Perhaps that is an additional reason why we should exclude them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The suggestion of the hon. senior member for Halifax would answer equally well.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Then we will add the words "as such."

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I should like to have the amendment I suggested adopted. I think it is in the right direction.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The man who brings suit for the recovery of the money would delay as long as possible, after suit was entered, before he obtained judgment.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I think, upon reflection, it will be seen that the man who institutes the action would have no object in delaying judgment. When he institutes the action, it is with the object of recovering the debt. On the other hand, the man against whom the action is taken might put in a plea merely to delay the getting of a judgment. A man who had borrowed fifty or one hundred dollars perhaps would rather pay 10 per cent on that for a year or two and he would delay the recovery of the judgment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I will accede to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, because the defendant has it in his power to consent to judgment right away if he wishes. Then the words "from date of judgment" will be substituted for the words "issue of process."

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 3.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I move that clause three be the fourth clause in the bill with the two modifications I have suggested.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Why not say "by a usurer?"

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We have given a definition of the person we wish to reach by the bill and we call him a money lender. We wish to adhere to that phrase right through.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We might put in the words "but not including taxable conveyancing charges."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That is for chattel mortgages and deeds?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Would the term "money lenders" include the small companies who carry on that business?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes. A corporation is a person in law.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 6.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I very much doubt our right to pass legislation of this nature. It is dealing with property and civil rights. We are not dealing with the interest; we are dealing with the principal.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Where power is expressly given to the Dominion Parliament to deal with a subject, they may exercise any power incidental to that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Upon a second glance, I see that the bill does not deal with the question of the principal. It is with the question of interest. I would like an explanation of what is meant by "due and exigible."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It means matured.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But if it is exigible, you must have an execution.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It may be exigible, but not by virtue of the judgment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I never saw the term applied in that way.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have taken it out of the translation of our own civil code.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The term in the other provinces means recoverable under an execution?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is the meaning with us, but in Quebec the rule is different.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—We will substitute the words "due and payable."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The object of that clause is to reduce the rate of interest, on judgments already recovered, to ten per cent?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suppose it is not drawn in such a way that where the judgment bears less than ten per cent it will have the effect of raising it to ten per cent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No, we use the phrase "where a greater rate is charged than ten per cent."

The clause as amended was adopted.

On the preamble.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think it is dignified to mention the exact amount in the preamble. I think the words "as much as five per cent per day" should be left out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, they will be struck out.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (118) "An Act respecting the Great Northern Railway Company, and to change its name to the Great Northern Railway of Canada."—(Mr. McKay, in the absence of Mr. Landry.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (71) "An Act to incorporate the Algoma Central Railway Company."—(Mr. McMillan, in the absence of Mr. Casgrain.)

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (R) "An Act further to amend the Penitentiary Act."

(In the Committee.)

On the schedules.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This bill has passed through the committee except the schedules. We can only adopt a schedule in brackets, but I have revised it and reserve the consideration of amendments until further consideration of the schedule. I have gone over this schedule with one of my officers who has had very large experience, who has been for twenty years in the department and has spent two years practically as warden of a penitentiary. He takes charge of the penitentiary when the warden is ill, or when the warden has not been permitted to act. I refer to Mr. Foster. Of course this is providing for a charge on the public revenue and could only be adopted primarily in the House of Commons, but we sometimes consider those matters here, and they are printed in the bill in brackets.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is that a departure from the printed schedule on page 482.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. All the changes I have made appear in the schedule. That schedule was prepared by my secretary from the old schedule and I did not carry it through the House before, simply because I wished to consult Mr. Foster. The salary of the warden of Kingston penitentiary is placed at $2,600.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In the preparation of this schedule, why are the penitentiaries treated separately?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because they differ so much in the numbers of those confined in them, and as a result the responsibility is so much greater on some than on others that the salaries are graded accordingly. The number of convicts during the past year in Kingston was 605, St. Vincent de Paul 418, in Dorchester 225, Manitoba 88, and in British Columbia 110. In Kingston the warden's salary, with free quarters, was fixed at $2,600. That is the maximum. It may be that, or it may be something considerably below that. The deputy warden, with free quarters and light—and he is to act as chief keeper in any prison having 300 convicts—receives $1,500; chaplain, $1,200; surgeon, $1,800. The accountant, who has to act as the warden's clerk, in a prison having under three hundred convicts, received $1,200, the warden's clerk when acting as such $800. The storekeeper who is to act as custodian in any prison having three hundred inmates, $900.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—How does that apply to Kingston with an average of 600 convicts?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Kingston has 600, and the number is not likely to fall much below that. Still, if it were, I would take power to assign to him other duties than those he is performing. The steward gets $900, chief keeper $1,200, hospital overseer and schoolmaster $1,200. The office is combined. The engineer gets $1,200, chief trade instructor $1,200, trade instructors $700 each, keeper $600, guards $500, messenger $500, stoker $500, teamsters $500, matron, who is to act as sewing instructor, $600, deputy matron $400, temporary guards $400. Those were the officers of the Kingston penitentiary. I ask the committee to assent to that list.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have been comparing them, and I find that there is a general increase.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not very general.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I find there is a general increase over the maximum in the Act of 1895. I find that the maximum for warden in 1895 was $2,000, in any penitentiary, and it is now made $2,600 in Kingston.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And is that what it was before 1895 ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes. I think the schedule of 1895 was quite a reduction in the schedule of 1887. But looking over the whole list, it involves a very considerable increase. I do not know that this is altogether the place for discussing these matters of expenditure very closely. We are putting these in brackets as if we had not considered it at all, but as we have it here, I notice, taking the position of accountant, for instance, that the salary was $1,200 for accountant and warden's clerk, by the Act of 1895, and now it is for $1,200 for accountant and $900 for warden's clerk. It makes a clear increase of $900. I notice also the hospital overseer and the schoolmaster were grouped together at $800, and now there is $800 for each of them. I find in many other instances it is the same, and though on the whole we have not a right to question expenditures here very closely, still while we are dealing with it at all, we may as well recognize there is a very large increase.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that there is not a large increase. The chaplain is put down at $1,200. The present rate is $1,200 although in the list of 1895 the figure is $800, but they have been getting the $1,200.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—How could they get it ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because that Act did not apply to any who had previously held office, and with nearly 700 convicts in the penitentiary, two chaplains, one a Catholic and one a Protestant, who do their duty, find themselves pretty actively employed. Then, there is the chief keeper. He is the officer who has been there for a good many years. He is an active officer and we are giving him not more than he has been receiving, but we are giving him more as chief keeper than he was receiving, because for some years he has been holding two offices, chief keeper and another, and has been receiving compensation for each. This standing alone would not give him a better salary than that he has been already receiving. The chief keeper is a Mr. Hughes, a brother of the member, and not being a political friend, of course my hon. friend cannot for a moment suppose that there is any political reason for giving him a better salary than that which he has been receiving.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Is there only one chaplain in Kingston penitentiary ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are two chaplains.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—And the $1,200 is divided between them ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, each gets $1,200.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I presume there is a similar provision made in all penitentiaries for two chaplains.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, in most of them at any rate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hospital overseer of St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary is down for $750 ; the one at Kingston is getting $800.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would just call my hon. friend's attention to this : the hospital overseer gets $750, and the schoolmaster $800, but if the two positions should be united, the one man will get $1,000. That is at St. Vincent de Paul. I wish to take this power, because some times it would be advantageous to unite two offices, and some times we find one eminently fitted for one office and not for the other.

The schedule for the Kingston penitentiary was adopted.

On the St. Vincent de Paul schedule.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are 200 fewer convicts in St. Vincent de Paul than in Kingston.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I would suggest that the hospital overseer should get $800. He acts as druggist of the institution and has a certain standing and aptness for the position, which should entitle him to the same salary as the hospital overseer at Kingston. The hospital overseer should be on the same footing as the steward. It is true, in Kingston the number of convicts is larger, but the qualification of the officers should be the same: that is, the official who attends to the patients in the hospital must know all about drugs and be qualified as a druggist, so it seems to me that $800 would not be a large sum.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—If hospital overseer means druggist, why not call him that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—He has other duties as well.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The principle of recognizing the number of inmates in a penitentiary in grading the salaries of the officials is a right one. I do not see any provision for matron or deputy matron in St. Vincent de Paul, or in any penitentiary except Kingston.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I understand the overseer does all that work at St. Vincent de Paul.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—Have all those officers residence in the institutions, with light and fuel?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The warden has, and the matron and deputy matron have. We sometimes have a deputy matron at Dorchester. Sometimes we have not, because there are not enough female convicts.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is no provision made for any.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We have none in Manitoba or British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Have you none in St. Vincent de Paul?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. The female convicts are sent to Kingston penitentiary.

The schedule was adopted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say the cost of penitentiaries has been growing less as will be seen from the following figures:

Prison population in custody 30th June, 1897 and 1898:—

	1898.	1897.
Kingston	605	611
St. Vincent de Paul	418	396
Dorchester	225	198
Manitoba	88	77
British Columbia	110	101
	1,446	1,383

INCREASE OF POPULATION.

The average daily population for each for the last five years has been as follows:—

1893-4	1,179
1894-5	1,250
1895-6	1,314
1896-7	1,353
1897-8	1,415

Net expenditure during past five years:—

1893-4	$ 452,904 58
1894-5	441,422 56
1895-6	345,129 78
1896-7	311,825 13
1897-8	279,277 68

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the principal reduction has been in Kingston, and that is owing to the manufacture of binder twine.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They are becoming revenue producing any way.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not yet. If we can manage to let a number of them out on tickets of leave, they will cost us less.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Could not the government employ the convicts in making good roads in this country? I know that they are employing them in the United States with very great advantage.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (147) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the Department of the Interior."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This bill authorizes the employment of temporary skilled or technical employees in the surveyors branch of the Department of the Interior.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It seems to me that the effect of this bill will be to open the door very wide in the matter of making such appointments, in contravention of the Civil Service Act. It is possible there may be good reasons for it, but they do not seem to show themselves in the wording of the bill. If there were any skill required which was not available, there would be some reason.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The reason is the Auditor General will not pay, under the existing law, any one when first placed on the list, more than $400 a year. It is quite impossible to employ capable assistants at that figure.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How have you secured the assistance of such officials up to this time?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The occasion did not arise until lately. It was not discovered until recently, when an officer left and we could not fill his place for $400 a year. Third class clerks are abolished now, and a clerk entering the civil service must begin at $400 a year, and there is no provision by which such an official can be paid a higher salary.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—How long can such an official be employed?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Six months is the limit of the term.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under this bill the minister assumes the responsibility without Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There must be an Order in Council to allow a payment of more than $400.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under this bill the minister, on the recommendation of the deputy, can employ or secure such service irrespective of an Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I think not; the Auditor General would not pay without an Order in Council. It must go to the Treasury Board.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When this bill is passed, the Auditor will have no hesitation whatever in paying. Under the language of the bill the temporary officers may be made permanent officers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Practically a large number of officials of the government are retained from year to year. I presume there are persons on the temporary list who have been there for the last twenty-six or nearly thirty years.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Because it would be cruel to put them off?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, but because their services are needed. A very large number of the officers in the Department of Railways have been on the list for a number of years. Take Mr. Ridout for instance, he has been on since the seventies.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This opens the door very wide no doubt. In the first place they may be appointed without any examination, and continued as long as their services are required, and may be paid more than $400 a year. There is no limit.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Quite true.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Except in the discretion of the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Quite true.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think it is opening the door very wide and departing from the Civil Service Act to an extraordinary extent. We are appointing persons temporarily who have not passed any examination. There may be cases in which that is necessary. Then we provide that any of those now temporarily employed may be continued indefinitely, and we provide later on that they may receive more than $400 a year.

Hon. Mr MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—It would have been much better to have made an amendment to the Civil Service Act itself by which there would be some provision made for persons that are required in these different departments. We know now that a very great number of the young men of the Dominion have passed civil service examinations, and that there are scores in every province of the Dominion who have passed that examination and qualified for entering the government service in any department in which their services would be required, and why it should be necessary for us to pass a special Act of this kind and give certain officers power to employ persons without having passed this examination, is something that I cannot see any sufficient reason for. I think it is a mistake to depart at all from the requirements of the Civil Service Act, that we should require to keep the Civil Service Act of Canada as closely as possible within the bounds of that Act, and I do not see any sufficient reason for the proposed changes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The first clause of this bill provides, when it becomes necessary, for the employment of temporary assistance in the surveyor general's branch of the Department of the Interior, for the performance of services requiring technical, scientific and professional qualification—it is only in that branch. The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island will see that a young man may have passed the civil service examination and may not have the scientific qualifications necessary for an officer in the surveyor general's branch of the department. He may not be a good draughtsman or surveyor. The minister may, upon the requisition of the deputy minister, employ as such temporary assistants any persons who are reported to him by the deputy and surveyor general—they have to join in reporting—to be possessed of the general qualifications requisite for such services. I think that, with these requirements, that the deputy and the surveyor general shall report that these temporary assistants are qualified, that they have the special qualifications required for work in the surveyor general's branch, there is not any very serious danger. Then the second clause of the bill simply provides that any person who is now temporarily employed, and who perhaps has been employed for the last ten or twelve years, and who is reported by the deputy minister and the surveyor general to the minister to have the special qualifications requisite for such work, may be continued in such employment as long as his services are required. If the man has been there and giving satisfaction it seems to me it would be improper and cruel to turn him out. The last clause provides that if there is a good officer who is doing important work, he may be paid more than $400. So far, I do not think there is anything very objectionable about the bill, limited as it is. But the Secretary of State made reference to the fact that third class clerks had been abolished. When the bill for that purpose went through the House, I for one opposed the measure, and I was under the impression that the present government had proposed at the last session to submit a measure to Parliament for the reintroduction of the old third class clerk, and I should like to know from the Secretary of State whether they have done it, or whether they propose to do it shortly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been discussed several times, and I think one member of the government has been requested to prepare the bill. I suppose pressure of work prevented it. I think it is on the notice paper, and I do not think the bill is brought forward yet. It is rather a complicated subject.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The first clause of this bill provides that the minister may appoint a person to an office temporarily, on the deputy minister and the surveyor general reporting that he possesses special qualications for this technical scientific work. Under the Civil Service Act as it was years ago—and I think it still remains the same—on the report of the deputy minister that the persons to be employed possessed special qualifications, and that there was no person on the list of those who had passed who was qualified, that such an appointment should be made, and I think that this clause should go that far. It was not only necessary for the deputy minister and the surveyor general to report any person as suitable, but they had go further and report that none of those who had passed the examinations were available for the appointment. If that were done, then there would be no abuse, but in the way the door is proposed to be opened here, I think it is quite possible for the deputy minister and the surveyor general to report some person who may be a favourite with them, and have him appointed, while there may be any number of persons possessing the qualifications who have passed the examinations and are ready to accept the appointment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—At the request of the hon. Secretary of State I shall read to the House the explanation given in the other chamber by Mr. Sifton :

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 147) to amend the Act respecting the Department of the Interior. He said: The reason for the introduction of this bill is almost precisely similar to the reason which caused the introduction of the bill which I have just explained with regard to the Geological Survey. The Civil Service Act passed in 1895 recognized the appointment to positions in the service of certain gentlemen who were then in the service; but upon the death of one of them, Mr. Dufresne, who was a computer under the chief astronomer of my department, an attempt was made to fill his place, whereupon the Auditor General took the ground that we had no power to appoint a technical officer except by complying with the regular requirements of the Civil Service Act. We had either to appoint a temporary officer at $400, or appoint him a second-class clerk. We could not secure the services of a gentleman qualified to fill the position at $400 a year, we had no second-class clerkship vacant, and we had no desire to create a second-class clerkship for that purpose. I can perhaps explain the matter better by reading a memorandum from the chief astronomer of the department, explaining the position of affairs with regard to these officers.

There are at present employed in this kind of work (that is, technical work in the office of the surveyor general) 25 or 30 men at salaries ranging from $600 to $1,500, who were appointed previous to 1895. In 1895 the Civil Service Act, section 47, was amended so as to abolish the class of temporary technical officers. By this amendment and a recent ruling all employees at Ottawa come under the provision of the Civil Service Act as either permanent officials or as temporary or extra clerks. The latter may be continued in employment at the same, but not at an increased, salary, but no others can be appointed to fill vacancies or to provide for necessary expansion, except at the salary of $400. There is no provision for any appointment between $400 and $1,100, the salary of a second-class clerk. The practical difficulties of this are as follows:—In case of vacancy, the salary of $400 is quite insufficient to secure men of the education and training required; otherwise, the only alternative appointment in the classified service, at $1,100 or upwards, would be usually inexpedient in the case of a new man untrained in the office routine, apart altogether from the restrictions upon a permanent appointment which would in the general case make that impossible. In case additional assistance is required for the time being in any branch, no salary can be paid higher than $400, which, as above stated, is insufficient. The business plan of training young men to their work would exactly meet the requirements of the department as to this class of service, but it cannot be followed under the present law; for no young man of education such as would fit him for taking hold of this kind of work would be likely to accept $400 a year, with the chance of rising to $600 after seven years, and no prospect of receiving more, however long he remained in the service, unless fortunate enough to secure entrance into the necessarily limited permanent service. The present law works badly as regards those now in the service as temporaries, for, without chance of increase of salary, a strong incentive to energetic work is wanting.

The Minister of the Interior continues:

The cases that arose were first that of Mr. Dufresne, who was employed in the office as computer. He died in February, 1898. Mr. Louis Gauthier, one of the temporary technical clerks, was shortly afterwards transferred from the surveyor general's office to fill his place, and Mr. Langlois, a surveyor, was at the same time appointed in theu srveyor general's office in Mr. Gauthier's place at a salary of $900 per annum; but under the construction of the law, the Auditor General, backed up by the Department of Justice, held that we could only pay $400 in these cases. We have also a number of these technical officers who have been in the department for several years, and it is impossible to give them an increase of pay under the present rule. At the present time an additional computer is required in the astronomer's office, and we cannot get a man to take take that position at $400. The bill is intended to enable the minister to employ temporarily in professional or technical work, a person who is reported by the deputy minister and the head of the branch in whose branch he is to work, to be qualified for the work.

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, I gather, was satisfied with the explanation, and the motion was agreed to without further discussion.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Judging from what is said here, as they have twenty-five or thirty employees in the office, the proper course would be to appoint one of the junior clerks to the position and to bring in a new man when there are so many in the service.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER, from the committee, reported the bill without amendments.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (154) "An Act further to amend the Customs Act. He said:—This is a bill authorizing the Governor in Council to make regulations permitting the export of deer in accordance with the law of the province. According to the law of the province of Ontario, a person is allowed to kill two deer, but any one coming from the States is not allowed to take the deer away. This bill is for the purpose of allowing them to take the game with them to the extent of two carcasses.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It limits them to that number?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it is in accordance with the law of the provinces. The export is under the federal power, and the federal power concurring with the province, will permit deer to be exported to that number. At the present time they are not allowed to export them at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understand that this bill permits of the export of deer by the carcass, but, as I understand my hon. friend, it will only admit of that being done to the extent that the Game Protective law of the province will permit of the killing of deer. Tourists or sportsmen who come into the different provinces of Canada are subject to the Game Protection laws of the various provinces, and having exercised whatever rights they have under these laws, it is proposed to go further and allow them to take the spoils away with them?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not come from a province where there are any deer, and I have no suggestion to offer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am pretty much in the same position as my hon. friend. There are no deer in Nova Scotia. We have introduced a few from the province of Quebec and are trying to cultivate them. But we have moose and cariboo, and I suppose the latter will come under the description of deer. We have looked upon the prohibition of the export of the carcasses and hides of moose and cariboo as one of the greatest safeguards of our game, and while I do not say anything about the province of Ontario, I am quite satisfied that the allowing of the exportation of the carcasses of deer is a great mistake. It is going to open the door to a very considerable destruction of our game, and although this Act may be operative only in the province of Ontario, and possibly in the province of Quebec, it means that perhaps next year a measure will be introduced to allow the exportation of moose carcasses, and I think that as it is now the people who are interested in preventing the destruction of moose and deer have just as much as they can do to prevent the number from being unduly reduced. If you take away the protection which is now afforded by the customs law, which forbids under severe penalties the exportation of the carcasses and hides, you are going to lead to a destruction of these animals which is likely to be very mischievous and very injurious to the province. As it is now we find numbers of sportsmen coming from the United States into Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and Quebec, and I presume into Ontario, for the purpose of hunting. They enjoy themselves and spend a good deal of money, and they do not materially reduce the number of moose and cariboo and other deer in the country ; but if you are going to allow the exportation of the carcasses of deer, you will find that pot hunters will export large quantities. It will be very difficult to limit the exportation to deer shot by honest hunters, and as far as I am concerned, I shall be sorry to see the bill pass.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As I understand the bill, the exportation is limited to deer legitimately killed. The customs must be satisfied that the person exporting had the authority to kill the animals. If you issue a license and allow a sportsman to kill two deer, it would be strange if you did not allow him to take them home. It is a little incongruous. Of course, the officers of the customs must be satisfied that the person had a license and did not kill beyond the number mentioned in his license.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not at all share the apprehensions expressed by the hon. gentleman from Halifax in regard to any particular abuse which may arise from the passage of this bill. If I understand it rightly, the people of the province of Quebec, and some of the other provinces, in their desire to promote the tourist business, and likewise sportsmen business in the province, are desirous of the passage of this bill. The hon. Secretary of State says that when the government license men to shoot animals it is not an unreasonable thing that they should permit them to take away with them the trophies of the hunt, or chase as it may be, and it certainly is an inducement to visitors and sportsmen from the United States to come over and spend considerable means in Canada, that they should be permitted to take away the animals with them instead of possibly permitting the carcasses to rot in the woods. It seems to me that so long as you put a limitation upon the number of animals which each sportsman may shoot or export, you sufficiently regulate the matter.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I must confess that I sympathize a good deal with the views of the senior member from Halifax, and I shall be sorry to see the door opened which may lead to further destruction of our game, because I am aware of the difficulty that has existed in Ontario in placing matters upon a sound footing there. I recollect some four years ago reading over the report of the game wardens for the province of Ontario, and astounding as it may appear, it was stated in one of these reports that in Muskoka and the neighbouring districts there had been three thousand deer shot in that year, and at that rate we should very soon get rid of a large portion of our game. By the enforcement of our laws since then, things have improved very much indeed, though of course the restriction of the two deer to one man is easily got round by the people shooting deer. As for the fear expressed by the senior member for Halifax of the deer rotting on the ground, if not allowed to be taken out of the country, I do not think there is the slightest danger of that, because you can always find an exceedingly good market for deer in Canada. Sportsmen can always if they wish sell their deer to dealers in game in Toronto. It may seem strange if you allow Americans to come in and shoot two deer, that you should not allow them to carry them away, but I am afraid it is going to open the door to pot hunters and to additional trouble in the enforcement of the law, which the game wardens and those who have charge of the preservation of game will find it very difficult indeed to deal with in Ontario.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned.

BUFFALO AND FORT ERIE BRIDGE COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (96) "An Act respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Bridge Co.," with amendments.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM moved the adoption of the report.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I understand that a report has been put in by the chairman of the Railway Committee upon the Fort Erie Bridge Company's Bill, which has been standing for some time without being reported upon. This report was put in at an early hour this afternoon, earlier than the House usually meets, and I intended to give notice of a motion which I proposed moving in this matter. I am told, however, that an hon. gentleman has moved that the report be concurred in. I am sure there is nobody in the House who would wish to take advantage of anything of the kind. It is a matter in which there has been little discussion, and I think reasons could be given why the report should be referred back to be considered by the committee, and I would ask the House if they would allow me to put my notice of motion on the paper in order that it might come up in the regular way.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I cannot see how the House can do it without the consent of the hon. gentleman who moved the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I intend to move that this report be referred back to the committee.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It has been adopted by the House.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—It came on earlier than this House has been in the habit of meeting, and I was not in my place.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman should be here.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I do not think the hon. gentleman would wish to take advantage of any such contretemps as that, or refuse to allow the notice to be laid on the table.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not wish to take advantage of anything. I am perfectly willing that the hon. gentleman should move to refer it back, if the House desires the committee to be discussing the question from time to time and voting on the one bill from day to day at the whim of the hon. gentleman, just because he does not happen to be in his place. I have no objection at all to his putting his motion on the paper, and if I had I could not prevent it. He can put anything on the paper.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do I understand that my hon. friend will consent to this bill going back to committee?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not consent to anything at all. This thing has been discussed over and over again. I am not going to be led into a trap by any sophistry.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When my hon. friend talks about a trap, I presume there is the less probability of his falling into one. As far as this bill is concerned, I apprehend hon. gentlemen are here for the purpose of doing business and not taking any technical advantage in regard to an important measure, affecting not only the Dominion but the United States, and which this legislation concerns. This was a bill which came before the Railway Committee, and my hon. friend opposed the bill. The promoter of the bill asked that an amendment be made to it, as it came from the House of Commons. The bill provided for the construction of a bridge across the Niagara River. The advertisement called for a particular site or location for the bridge. The House of Commons passed the bill providing for the construction of the bridge at that particular location. Legislation was obtained from the United States Government of a similar character, so that the bridge became an international one. When it came before the Railway Committee of the Senate, the promoter of the bill asked that the site be changed. My hon. friend pointed out to the Railway Committee that inasmuch as the advertisement in the Gazette and in the local papers pointed to a particular location, the committee could not well deviate from that location. The Railway Committee passed every clause of this bill with the exception of that which related to the location. Members of the committee supported the contention of my hon. friend from Monck in regard to the change of location. I voted against the bill on that particular ground, inasmuch as, notice having been given for a particular location, I thought the promoters of the bill should adhere to it. Consequently, the bill was defeated on that particular ground. The promoter of the bill is here to show the authority for the legislation in the United States, with the plans and engineering evidence of a most expensive character, showing that they are willing to accept that particular location, and asking that the bill as it came from the House of Common be confirmed. I ask if hon. gentlemen in this House, after many thousands of dollars being expended in preparing plans and procuring that legislation and entering into contracts, are to reject this bill now that the promoters are willing to accept the Commons bill. It was their solicitor suggested that greater latitude should be given for location. This report has been adopted without members of this House having knowledge of it. I did not know the report was to be introduced so early in the sitting, and I hope no advantage willbe taken of an omission of that nature to reject important legislation of this character. Surely the House owes it to the committee and to the House of Commons, who passed the bill, to give it due consideration. I ask my hon. friend, in the public interest, and in the interests of those who are promoting the bill, to let it go back to the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understood the hon. gentleman from Brandon to suggest that the hon. gentleman from Monck agree now that the bill should be referred back to the committee. I think that is asking rather too much. What the hon. gentleman from Brandon might reasonably ask of the hon. gentleman from Monck is that he shall consent to waive what has been done this afternoon. The hon. gentlemen from Brandon and Calgary were not present, and consequently, notwithstanding the resolution which was adopted by the House just now——

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I rise to a point of order. I do not think there is any motion before the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is a motion made by hon. gentleman from Brandon.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I have the statement from the Clerk of the House that there is no motion before the Senate, and the hon. gentleman from Halifax is one of the first men to keep others to the rule of order. I am calling attention to the fact that there is nothing before the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I thought the hon. gentleman from Brandon had a motion in his hand.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I asked the hon. gentleman from Monck to allow the proceedings which had been taken, whereby this report was adopted, to be withdrawn and permit my motion to go now on the table as a notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I have only one word to say as to the remark that was made as to the time when the report was presented to the House. It was presented in the regular order when reports of committees were called for. I knew, from something that was said in the committee, that the hon. gentleman from Brandon intended to make some motion in connection with this bill, and I expected that he would be here to move it. My attention was distracted for a moment, and the report was concurred in. Considering the absence of the hon. gentleman, and his absence is to be reasonably accounted for, from the fact that we have recently adopted a rigid rule to assemble at three o'clock instead of three fifteen as formerly, I think it would be only fair that the concurrence in the report should be abandoned, and that the consideration of the report stand for another day. That would reserve the right of everybody and would not debar the hon. gentleman from Monck from urging his views with the energy and persistence with which he urges anything he brings before the House. It would be unfair to take advantage of an accident owing to the absence of a party who desired to make a motion.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—If the Speaker decides that there is anything before the House, I shall make a few remarks in explanation of what has fallen from the hon. gentleman from Calgary.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman made a verbal motion, which I thought was accepted by the House. Since it has not been accepted, the hon. gentleman has put it in writing:

That the bill from the House of Commons, No. 96, entitled: "An Act respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Bridge Company," be referred back to the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, for further consideration.

That is the motion before the House.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—My hon. friend from Calgary says there was just one objec tion to this. There are several objections to it. The gentlemen who have this charter have had it for eight years. They have been trying for eight years how not to do it, and I am not willing that they should have two years more to play the same game. The first charter was granted to build a bridge from Fort Erie to Buffalo. The next time they came before Parliament, they went two miles further down the river. Where are they now? They go down now until they get across Grand Island. They are going away from Buffalo altogether. It is a curious way to build a bridge from Fort Erie to Buffalo, to go down the river twelve miles, cross the river there, and come up the river twelve miles again. They are not satisfied with the ferry at Fort Erie, but they got a charter from this country a short time ago to lease a ferry from Buffalo to Crystal Beach, four miles above Fort Erie. They are trying how not to do it all the time. This was explained clearly. I understood to-day the whole thing was abandoned, and all they wanted was a report of this House, so that they could get any money that was not expended in printing the bill before Parliament. I am in the hands of the House, but I say I want the yeas and nays taken on this, and when my hon. friend from Calgary begins to tell me what is in the interest of my people and of the people of the Niagara district, it is something new to me. He might better tell me what is in the interest of the people of Calgary. I cannot accept the motion, and I call for a division on it.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—The motion, as presented to the House now, cannot be entertained. It is simply a notice that the hon. gentleman from Brandon will move that the bill be referred back to the Standing Committee on Railways for further consideration. The report has been adopted. It seems to me that the regular course would be for the hon. gentleman to consent to the cancellation of the order of the House adopting the report, and then, when it comes up for consideration on Monday, or at some future day, would be the proper time to show why it should not be concurred in, but that the bill be referred back to committee.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—When this bill came up from the House of Commons it was read the first and second time and referred to the Committee on Railways. That committee asked for the postponement of that bill for six months. Notice of consideration was given by one of the senators, and that report has been brought before the House to-day and the House adopted the report. Is there anything before us now?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out the irregularity of the report. It does not show the ground upon which the bill was rejected. The rule provides that the committee must state the grounds upon which they present their report. Notwithstanding that, by a special order of the Senate, I submit this House can send that report back to the committee. If the House will pardon me I might say that the reason for delay in the construction of this bridge has been the difficulty of securing the necessary legislation in the United States. Since the rejection of that bill, I have seen the authority, signed by the Secretary of War in the United States, granting unwillingly from the United States Government for the construction of the bridge. Evidence will be submitted showing that contracts have been made for the construction of the bridge. I hope the people interested will not be thwarted by any paltry reasons such as have been alleged for this bill being thrown out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Calgary is slightly in error with respect to the position he takes. The report has been adopted and it is too late to take an objection of that kind, that the report was not technically in order. From what I know of the hon. gentleman from Monck, I do not think he would take advantage of a mere technicality; and of course it is a sort of technicality and surprise that the resolution was read when the hon. gentlemen interested in this bill were not present. I am sure that the hon. gentleman from Monck would rather have the deliberate opinion of the House expressed on the question, and if he agrees that that resolution which he moved shall be rescinded, then the notice which the hon. gentleman from Brandon intends to give brings the matter up on Monday, and we can have the decision of the House. Just how I shall vote on the question I do not know, but it would not be fair to take advantage of what is a mere technicality, and I do not think the hon. gentleman is the man to do it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I am not going to take any advantage at all. The matter has been before the committee and I think the promoters of the bill got two votes, the large majority were against them. Counsel promoting the bill were there, but there was no counsel on the other side, and the Senate took my explanation of the bill and postponed the consideration of it six months. I am in the hands of the Senate, but knowing as I do what these people are doing, and what their intentions are, I cannot, in the interests of the people of the Niagara district, consent to do anything of the kind. Of course I can be voted down, but I will not be deprived of the right of saying that it shall not go back to the committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the point of order raised by the chairman of the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, is well taken. The House has adopted the report, and this motion is to refer the bill back. There is no such bill before the House. It seems to me the hon. gentleman's motion should be for a reconsideration of the vote which has just been taken, with a view of sending it back for further consideration. Then that would bring it strictly within the rule of Parliament. While I am on my feet, I may add that the reason why I voted with the hon. gentleman in the committee to throw this bill out, was because I understood that they had been dilly-dallying—that is really the only word that I can use to express my meaning—with this charter, for the purpose, probably, of selling or speculating with it for a number of years past. And for that reason I thought it was well that this continual renewing of charters over and over again, where nothing has been done, should not be countenanced. Since that time I have learned that these gentlemen who are connected with the enterprise only obtained the permission and consent of the United States Government to construct this bridge across the Niagara River about a year ago. If that be true—and I have every reason to believe it from the documents placed in my hands—the reason which induced me to vote against the renewal of the charter has disappeared. If they could not go on with the work for the reason that the Congress of the United States had not given their consent, then they are not to blame. The gentlemen who are interested say that they have spent thousands of dollars in connection with this work on the United States side of the river, and unless there are objections from a commercial standpoint, that it would impede navigation or be detrimental to the general interests of the country, or if my hon. friend from Monck has reasons to give which would show that it is not in the interest of the people generally to make this connection, nor in the interest of that section of the country with which he is much more familiar than I am, I should be inclined to reverse my vote. I give this explanation because the whole aspect of affairs has been changed. I do not know what the Speaker's ruling would be, but I quite agree that you cannot send back to the committee a bill which has no existence. If the hon. gentleman moves for a reconsideration, I think he would be strictly in order and the House would either adopt that view or vote with the hon. gentleman from Monck to kill the bill altogether.

The SPEAKER—I believe the proper course is the one suggested by the hon. leader of the opposition. The motion first suggested could not be made.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman can give the notice now. He cannot make the motion.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I give notice that on Monday I will move that the adoption of the report of the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours on Bill (96) be reconsidered for the purpose of recommitting the same to the said committee for reconsideration.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—It is not the report that is to be considered, it is the vote adopting it that has to be reconsidered. We must first get rid of the action of the Senate in adopting the report, and that being done, then it will be in order to consider the report. But that is not embodied in the second motion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The motion is for the reconsiderstion of the adoption of the report.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. If the Senate say they will not reconsider it, then there is an end of it.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to ask my friend the Minister of Justice what steps the government propose to take with regard to an amendment to the Dominion Election's Act to meet some of the difficulties that present themselves in the application of the Dominion Franchise Act to the province of Prince Edward Island, as the Dominion Franchise Act does not in some important respects, work harmoniously with the Dominion Elections Act. I have already called my hon. friend's attention across the floor of the House to the subject and we have had some personal interviews on it, and perhaps my hon. friend will be kind enough to state what action the government propose to take in regard to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that he mentioned this matter some days ago to me, and put in my hands a bill with a view of making the amendments which he thinks are necessary in the Franchise Act. I have been extremely busy myself. I referred the matter to my colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is more conversant with the state of the law in the province of New Brunswick than I am, and I asked him to consider the bill which the hon. gentleman had put into my hand. My hon. colleague informed me that the great objection to the draft of the bill relating to the Dominion Franchise is that while it enables the petitioner to object to votes that have been recorded and ask for a scrutiny of the votes, it gives no equivalent power to the other candidate. Under the proposed bill that the hon. gentleman submitted, he had in view solely the position of the defeated candidate, and that objected votes might be considered on a scrutiny and thrown out if found to be bad, but that would only apply to the objected votes on the one side. My hon. friend will see that if you were to suppose that the objected votes at an election in forty polling divisions average three in each, that would be 120, and the candidate who makes the objection might be able to count out enough votes to secure the seat, whereas if a scrutiny had taken place with regard to all the objected votes, so that the seated and the unseated candidate would stand upon a footing of equality, the result might be very different to what it would be if it was only carried on on the one side. There was that very serious objection to the bill which my hon. friend prepared. Then the provision of the hon. gentleman's bill is, under the law as it stands, a provision carried, I think, in this House at the hon. gentleman's suggestion, that a deposit of only $100 is required, whereas a security would be at least as expensive as a controverted election, and there is nothing that could be accomplished under a scrutiny that might not equally be accomplished by filing a petition. My hon. friend will see that a recount, or a scrutiny of the votes might give to the one candidate or the other a wholly inadequate period of time within which to make the scrutiny completed. What was thought by my colleague would be more effective would be to strike out the provision which had been carried here at the hon. gentleman's instance, and to make a further amendment with regard to the bill. There are other defects in the Franchise Act, besides the one to which my hon. friend has referred, and while I cannot speak for the government with regard to the matter, because I have not discussed it with my colleagues generally, only with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, with special reference to the proposal of my hon. friend opposite, I think that in all probability amendments will be proposed that are necessary to correct the defects that have been suggested in the Election Act of the present time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I presume that I would scarcely be in order to make any observations, but I will make a motion which will put me in order. I am very sorry the hon. Minister of Justice has been so much engaged—as I know he has—and therefore not able to give his personal attention to this matter, because I am satisfied if he had considered it he would find that the objections which he mentions as against the draft of the bill which I placed in his hands have no force. On a recount being demanded under the Franchise Act, as provided for in the bill of last year, all the votes would be open to scrutiny. It would not be onesided, and both candidates would certainly come in, and in that case there would be a complete and full inquiry into the objected votes. If the hon. gentleman had been able to look into this bill himself, he would have found that that is thoroughly and entirely provided for. The other objection, with regard to the amount of deposit, is a good one. I think $100 would be entirely too small an amount to deposit for a recount that might involve a very wide inquiry into the character of the votes, and that a larger amount would be necessary to be stated in the bill, but that is a matter of detail. As against the proposition which my hon. friend's colleague has made, if I understood him aright, that this matter of settling the question of qualified voters under the Dominion Franchise Act of last year should be settled on a petition to the Supreme Court judges, instead of by the County Court judge, at a recount, I hope my hon. friend, on full consideration will see how much better it is that this question should be summarily dealt with by the County Court judge in place of involving it in an election petition. If you involve it in an election petition, you would find every other legal ground, in connection with the election, would be fought out in connection with it, and the result would be that it would defeat the object we must all have in view, which is that the exact count of the qualified voters should be had, unmixed with questions of bribery and corruption, or any legal question affecting the general conduct of the election. Not only that, but in all our election laws the principle obtains that the County Court judge settles such matters. Under the Dominion Franchise Act, the county judges were the revising barristers, or where they were not, an appeal was had to them. The matter of preparing a list altogether appertained to the County Court judge, and in matters of recount, the County Court judges decided, and their decision was final. I think it is very much better that this simple matter of ascertaining which candidate has the majority of good votes should be settled summarily before a County Court judge. My hon. friend is quite right that the deposit of $100 is not sufficient, because this would involve a much more expensive inquiry than usually obtains under a recount, and I would be willing that a larger amount should be fixed. Perhaps hon. gentlemen do not understand the point thoroughly, because the hon. Minister of Justice and myself, having a general knowledge from the conversation we have had on the subject, have started in abruptly. Under the Franchise

Act of last year, it was provided, there being no voters' list in the province of Prince Edward Island, and open voting prevailing there in provincial elections, and it being very difficult to dove-tail, as it were, the Franchise Act into the Dominion Elections Act, it was provided that objection might be taken to voters, and the ballot marked, and the corresponding mark placed in the poll book, and that the votes so marked should be placed in a separate envelope, and that they should come up on a recount. All this was done well enough, but in the haste in passing the amendments, we failed to appreciate the fact that we were not giving the County Court judge complete satisfactory jurisdiction, and it is doubtful, as the law stands now, whether the County Court judge could really go into the merits of those votes. I think it is almost certain he would not have power to summon witnesses. It is simply to remove these difficulties that it is proposed now to legislate, and in order that this matter may come before Parliament, not of course blocking the way of any substantial amendment the government may make in the same direction, but simply to bring this matter before Parliament in a proper manner so that it may receive full and proper attention, I beg leave to introduce a bill intituled: "An Act further to amend the Elections Act, as respects the province of Prince Edward Island."

The bill was read the first time.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

THIRD REPORT.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the adoption of the third report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—As an old Speaker, I rather object to the seventh paragraph of this report. A somewhat similar proposition was brought up in 1897, and I think it was then decided that the Speaker's messengers should be under the control of the Speaker alone. I think hon. gentlemen are aware that in the matter of the Speakers of both Houses, it is not supposed that they are only here during the session. The Speaker's chambers are at the disposal of the Speaker during the recess if he has to come here. Under these circumstances, I do not think the Speaker's messengers should be put under any one but the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—This matter was discussed in the committee, and the committee had, as we all know, the Speaker's comfort and privileges at heart. The point arose in this way. It was pointed out that during the recess the Speaker's messengers were here, not subject to the control of anybody, the Speaker being away. They were not under the control of the housekeeper, and when the housekeeper was asked if they were in the habit of attending the House during the recess, he said they come occasionally. He had no control over them and could not tell them to do anything. It seemed an anomalous position that these messengers, whom we are all anxious to have under the control of the Speaker during the session, or whenever he really wants to use them, should at other times be under no control at all, and be at large, free from any duties, and yet drawing full pay. When this clause was adopted here, I, as chairman, was authorized by the committee to instruct the housekeeper that these messengers were to be subject to the orders of the Speaker at any rate whenever he wanted them, that he was to have the first call on their services, but outside of that, it was considered the housekeeper should have some control of them— that they should not be without control and yet draw salary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I object entirely to this new departure. It has never been adopted before by the Senate, and it is extraordinary that it should be brought up on the present occasion. The Speaker is here from time to time; he has property of his own here, and is in communication with his own messengers from time to time, and considering that there are only two messengers allowed to the Speaker, it seems to me discourteous to the Speaker to interfere with the control that he has over them. As a matter of fact, in past years many of the Speakers, when travelling, had their messengers away with them. The present Speaker is not likely to do that, but I mention it to show the very large powers exercised by the Speaker over messengers under his control.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What becomes of those messengers when the Speaker is not here?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are under his direction, looking after his property here and subject to his control and demand.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—We do not interfere with them at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall take a vote on that clause.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As the chairman of the committee has said, it was not desired to interfere with the rights and privileges of the Speaker. It was distinctly understood that if the Speaker wished to make use of his messengers during the vacation, he was at liberty to do so, and this report was not to interfere with his rights in any respect; but this was the position which faced the committee, that there were two permanent messengers, who are generally known as the Speaker's messengers, who are paid out of the public funds, and who, during the whole recess, practically were their own masters and were at liberty to do just what they pleased. His Honour the Speaker has no employment for these messengers during the recess. He may tell them to have an eye after his rooms, but that does not give them occupation all the time; and they are paid their salaries; and the committee thought that, inasmuch as they were paid respectable salaries out of the funds of the country, the country should get some value for the money during the recess. The hon. Secretary of State has said that this is a new departure. The hon. gentleman is in error in that respect. If hon. gentlemen will turn to a report of the Internal Economy Committee in the session of 1894 they will find the matter dealt with there. In that case I think a sub-committee had been appointed, and particular pains had been taken with the whole question of the Senate staff, its organization and the duties of different members of the staff. I think it will be found set forth in the report of the committee adopted by the House that session, that during the recess, when the Speaker did not require the services of these messengers, they were to be under the orders of the housekeeper. It was desirable that they should be under somebody's orders. Of course, at that time the same report provided that the Serjeant-at-Arms should have a general supervision over all the inferior officers, and that the housekeeper should act under him. Paragraphs 15, 16 and 17 of the report adopted on the 3rd of July, 1894 are as follows:—

With a view to improving the discipline in that branch of the Senate service, your committee recommend that the door-keepers, messengers and pages be placed under the supervision of the Serjeant-at-Arms, who shall have power to suspend any member of that portion of the staff for a fortnight, any longer suspension to be by the clerk.

The housekeeper or chief messenger to continue to direct the staff of messengers, subject to the supervision and control of the Serjeant-at-Arms.

The staff of permanent messengers is decidedly larger than is necessary for the performance of the work done out of session. Your committee recommend that no further appointments of permanent messengers be made until the number of such messengers is reduced below five (including the keeper of the wardrobe, the bank messenger and the Speaker's messenger), and that thereafter the number of such messengers shall not exceed five.

By a report made in 1897, these paragraphs, 16 and 17, were rescinded, and the messengers were all put, apparently, under the control of the housekeeper. Speaking for myself, I am not particularly wedded to that paragraph in the report; but it is only fair to the committee to state the grounds upon which they acted, and to disclaim any desire or intention whatever, to interfere in the slightest degree with the rights and privileges of His Honour the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—In the Debates of 1897, since then, I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen to what was said at that time:

The Hon. The Speaker—I believe the House is taking away the privilege which has been granted the Speaker before me. It was always understood that the Speaker's messenger was under the control of the Speaker. He may, for instance, come here during the recess, and my predecessors have always had the service of their own messengers even during recess. I see no objection to the Speaker's messenger rendering services as a messenger when he is not called upon to serve the Speaker, but I would suggest that the position of Speaker's messenger should remain as before. If you make this change the Speaker's messenger would now be in a worse position than he has been under the old arrangement.

Then the Hon. Mr. Miller, who has been a Speaker, corroborated what the hon. the Speaker said.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Miller said that the Speaker had been in the habit of taking their messengers away with them to their own homes, and used their services during the recesses.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not present in the committee yesterday, but in conversation with some of the committee on this question I learn that it was thought that the messengers, during the absence of the Speaker, had nothing to do, and that it would be better for them if they could be utilized by some one here. The housekeeper was supposed to be the best person, in order that their services should be utilized when necessary. The recommendation in paragraph 7 of the report arose as much from the fact that it was proposed that one or two additional messengers should be placed upon the staff, but by adopting this mode of dealing with the messengers, that would not be necessary. I am quite sure that not a member of this House who has had the pleasure of knowing His Honour the Speaker, and particularly since he has been in the Chair, would think for a moment of doing anything that would be a reflection upon him, or would interfere with his prerogatives, or do anything which would annoy him. How would it do, in order to carry out the views of the committee, to change this motion, making it read that they be placed, instead of replaced —because that implies they were formerly not under the direction of the Speaker during recess. The contention has been that that rule prevailed some time ago, while other senators, who have had a good deal of experience, contend that it did not. Supposing it were changed to read "placed under the control of the housekeeper during the vacation, subject in all cases to the order of the Speaker," so that in all cases the Speaker would have full control, as he has now. When he is in the city they would be under his control absolutely. If he is not in the city, and he requires their services at any time, he would have power to order the messenger for his own services when he wanted them. Both views might be met by such an arrangement. If the Speaker objects to this altogether, I do not hesitate to say, as one, that I am quite willing to concur in the view that he may hold; but if the Speaker will accept my suggestion, it will place him in the position he ought to occupy, having full control of his messengers, whether he is here or not, and at the same time, effect the economy that the committee had in view.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think the question of economy comes in, because during the recess there is no work for the messengers here. It is taking away from the Speaker the power and control he has had over the messengers. In 1897, when that was objected to, the clause was struck out, and I think it is unfortunate that the clause was introduced into this report. I move that the clause be struck out.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—It has been suggested by the leader of the opposition, and the House, I am sure, would gladly concur in it, that the Speaker's wishes be met in this matter, either by striking out the clause, or by accepting the wording of the amendment of the leader of the opposition. I need not repeat what I said before about our desire to do everything in our power for the comfort and convenience of our Speaker.

The SPEAKER—I am exceedingly grateful for the courtesy granted to me in explaining, not my wish, but what I think about this matter. In 1897, when the same demand was made, I was pleased to see my predecessors, the hon. gentlemen from York (Mr. Allan) and Richmond (Mr. Miller) rise in their seats and protest against it, alleging that it had always been the custom to have the Speaker's messengers under his control, even during the recess. I am not speaking to-day for myself, because, unfortunately for me, my occupation of the Chair will not be long now, but I cannot let that clause pass in duty to my successor. It has always been the privilege of the Speaker to have his messengers under his control. It has been the case with my predecessors, and I believe it ought to be transmitted to my successors. But it is not this alone; it would be reflecting, if not on my administration, on my messengers. I may state to the House that I have in both, trusty and faithful servants. If it had been true that they refused to do anything they were required to do, I would be the first to blame them. To prove that they are always willing to do what they are requested outside of my service I may say that during the present session, the doorkeeper being ill, my own messenger offered to replace him, and I deprived myself of his services during the session while the House sat, to allow him to take the place of doorkeeper. The messenger is not obliged to do what he is doing, but I was quite pleased at his offer and I am pleased to say to-day that my messengers will do anything they are asked to do for the service of the House. I would prefer, now that my seat in the chair will soon be at an end, to postpone any action until my successor is appointed, and if, during the recess, a report is made to me that the housekeeper asked my messengers under my control for assistance, and they would not help him, I would be the first to order the messengers to obey the housekeeper; but I do not believe the privilege my predecessors have enjoyed should be taken away from me. It is not correct that during the recess the Speaker's messengers do nothing. Besides other duties, one is clerk of the restaurant committee, and, as such, has, after every session, to take the inventory of all the goods belonging to both the restaurant and the Speaker's rooms, which are under his care and for which he is responsible. If he was removed and placed under the control of anybody else but myself, he would not be responsible. With all due deference to the Senate, since my wishes are consulted, I would ask that the condition of things be allowed to remain unchanged.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I wish to thank His Honour the Speaker, for the kind expression of his views, and I have great pleasure, with the permission of the House, to ask that clause 7 of the report be struck out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That motion has been made by the Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would come better from the chairman of the committee.

Clause 7 was struck out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the report is adopted I should like to call the attention of the House to clause six, which recommends the appointment of two permanent messengers. I have no personal objection to the two persons named in the report, but I think it is entirely a new departure. We have servants here who have been with us for ten years, whose rights are interfered with by the nomination of others who come here lately. I desire to call the attention of the House to that fact, and for my part, I protest against any promotion which is not according to seniority. If we are to do away with the principle of seniority in promotions, let us know it once for all. If the persons who are entitled by seniority to have promotion are not fit to do their duty to the Senate, their services should be dispensed with altogether; but if they are fit to be retained in their positions, they should be promoted according to seniority. I want it to be well understood that I have nothing personally against either of the men mentioned in the paragraph, but I want the rule of promotion by seniority adhered to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This paragraph was adopted by the committee, who had all the information before them. If I had been asked to supply the names myself, perhaps they would not be exactly identical with the names which appear in the report. But I do not think this House is the place in which to enter on a discussion as to the relative merits of the different messengers. The committee decided the matter by a considerable majority, and I do not think it is desirable that there should be a discussion of the matter here.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not see why a report is brought here to be adopted by this House if we have not a right to discuss it, and see if the House shares in the opinion of a majority of the committee. I move that the report be referred back to the Committee on Internal Economy to reconsider item 6 and to make promotion according to seniority.

The amendment was rejected, and the report, as amended, was adopted.

SECOND READING.

Bill (140) "An Act respecting the Canadian Railway Fire Insurance Company, and to change its name to the Dominion Fire Insurance Company."—(Mr. Clemow.)

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EXTENSION BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed, in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (138) "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal."

On the first clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman intend to move his amendment?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Although this was printed in the minutes, I really did not propose it, but read it as an amendment that I was ready to accept, and I am ready to accept it at this moment:

Insert after the word "company," on line eight, "and subject to the condition that, within ninety days after the passing thereof, the Grand Trunk Railway Company do execute a further agreement with Her Majesty, in amendment of and in addition to the traffic arrangement referred to in the 40th clause of the said agreement set forth in the schedule to this Act, to the effect that Her Majesty may terminate any of the traffic arrangements referred to in that clause, including the one already executed and any alterations thereof, and any subsequent one which may be made as an amendment or addition thereto, at any time upon Her Majesty giving to the Grand Trunk Railway Company twelve months notice in writing of such termination, and that after the execution of the said amending agreement as aforesaid, it shall always be held to be a part of the agreement confirmed by this Act.

"Provided that this Act shall not go into force unless nor until the said further agreement shall be executed as above provided for, and a copy be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State, whereupon a proclamation shall be made by the Governor General and published in the Canada Gazette, bringing this Act into force."

Hon. gentlemen will see how far this is a modification of the agreement as it now stands. The agreement which is a schedule of this bill, and further agreement which has been entered into as a traffic arrangement between the Grand Trunk and the government, provides for a traffic arrangement for a period of ninety-nine years. Objection was made, during the discussion, to this long period for the traffic arrangement between the Grand Trunk and the government, and the amendment which I have read, as hon. gentleman will see, reserves to the Crown the right of giving notice to terminate any traffic arrangement made under the authority of clause 40. That would leave any administration free, if they thought the traffic arrangement proved to be unsatisfactory, to have it altered upon such notice. That I am ready to agree to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must express a little surprise at the opening remarks of my hon. friend, when he says that this notice should not have appeared as it is, as he only intimated to the House his willingness to accept that amendment. In other words, he anticipated, I suppose, that those who are opposing the bill principally upon the ground, at present, of the existence of that 40th clause would move to have it struck out. The hon. gentleman having, as I supposed, and as the whole House supposed, given notice of an amendment, I took the responsibility of placing upon the paper an amendment which I intended to move in opposition to that of my hon. friend. That amendment goes a good deal further, in some respects, than his, but I have, after mature deliberation, come to the conclusion that it is better to eliminate from the amendment which I have placed upon the paper some portions of it, for the reason that I do not think the Senate should ask either a company or Her Majesty to be placed in a position of what I might term, unfairness. While we are dealing with any company we should act fairly with them, at the same time reserving exclusive right to the Crown to terminate any agreement which might be found not to be in the interests of the government road, which has, in the past, been an incubus I might almost say, from a pecuniary standpoint, upon the country. While I use that word, I use it exclusively in connection with the financial operations. We all know that it was one of the conditions that induced the maritime provinces to consent to come into the confederacy. We also know that the British government refused pointedly and distinctly at that period of our history to guarantee our bonds, or assist in any way pecuniarily in the construction of that road, unless it was constructed for military as well as commercial purposes. Had the wish of the Canadian people at that time—more particularly those of the maritime provinces—been carried out, had their suggestion been adopted, had the view which the late Sir Leonard Tilley and the Hon. Mr. Macdougall held, been adhered to, the road never would have been built on the north shore, but by the valley of the St. John, thereby securing commercial advantages, and the commercial interests of the country, which have only been secured by the construction of what is termed the Canada Pacific Short Line. The British Government, in lending its influence and inducing, as far as it could, the Canadian people who enter into a confederacy, intimated that it was necessary, not only in the interest of the colonies themselves, but also in the interest of the empire, that the road should be constructed in such a portion of that confederacy, when accomplished, that it could be utilized for military purposes, if unfortunately the day should ever arise that it should be required. That is about as short a history of the inception of this road as I desire to give. The objection I have to the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Justice is that it is not definite enough in its proposition. It does not repeal the 40th clause, which binds the country to a certain condition of affairs that should not exist. While it does not repeal that clause, it does go far enough to give the power to Her Majesty to terminate the present or any other traffic agreement into which they may enter, but it is indefinite, to my mind, though I know that some will say that it is not indefinite, particularly the last portion of it where it says:

Upon Her Majesty giving to the Grand Trunk Railway Company twelve months notice in writing of such termination, and that after the execution of the said amending agreement as aforesaid, it shall always be held to be a part of the agreement confirmed by this Act.

Whether the previous part of the clause would enable them to make a number of changes, or at any time and become a part of the Act, or whether the arrangement which would be made at the present moment would be a continuous arrangement is an indisputable point. This proposition of the hon. minister abrogates the present arrangement in toto, and compel the two parties to enter into a new agreement. In my first remarks upon this subject I expressed the view that the present arrangement was to the advantage of the Intercolonial Railway, but what I objected to, and what I think the majority of the Senate objected to, was the binding of the country to an arrangement which they could not abrogate without the consent of the Grand Trunk, for ninety-nine years. I also expressed the opinion at the time—and the more I study the question the more I am convinced of the correctness of that view—that at the present moment the traffic arrangement in reference to the east and west bound freight is in the interest of the Intercolonial Railway, but it may not be so a few years hence. It may interfere—which is a very great objection to my mind—with any other roads which may be constructed having their terminus in Montreal, and more particularly in the city of Quebec, especially when the bridge is built, if it should ever be built, and when we find that a million dollars is to be placed in the estimates for that purpose the presumption is that it will be built. Those are the principal objections that I have to this proposed amendment. I think, in matters of this kind, we cannot be too definite in our proportions. If any one will read the amendment which I propose to make, eliminating that portion which I know is objectionable in reference to the binding of the country for the unconsigned west bound freight for all time to come, will be considered the most acceptable, being more definite and more easily understood—that I hope the minister will consent to accept it instead of his own proportion. My amendment reads:

1. The agreement set forth in the schedule to this Act between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, hereinafter called "the company," and Her Majesty, except the 40th clause thereof (the said agreement, excepting that clause, being hereinafte called "the main agreement") is hereby declared to have been and to be valid and binding in all respects, subject to the following qualifications and conditions and to the happening of the following events, that is to say:—

You will see that it is continuous. It legalizes whatever has been done in the past in reference to traffic arrangements, and it continues the present arrangements, for reasons I have already given, until the following events shall take place:—

(a) The main agreement to be confirmed by the shareholders in the regular way.

Hon. gentlemen will observe that this amendment I propose to make is a substitution for the first and second clauses in the bill, or in other words, makes almost entirely a new bill, less the first four and a half lines. Then it goes on to say:

(b) The making of an agreement within ninety days after the passing of this Act between Her Majesty and the company (which agreement is hereinafter referred to as the new agreement) to the following effect, that is to say: That so long as the main agreement remains in force and irrespective of any traffic arrangement between the parties as to any other matter, and without any further consideration from Her Majesty than the continuance of the main agreement, percentage division via Chaudière Junction shall be suspended and Montreal shall be the junction point for all traffic originating throughout the company's system or connection west of Montreal and offered for shipment for any points on the Intercolonial Railway or reached by its connections, and the company shall route all such traffic via Montreal and the Intercolonial Railway, and all traffic controlled by the company originating either in the city of Montreal or on the Montreal joint section and destined to points on the Intercolonial Railway, shall be considered Intercolonial traffic, and the company shall forward it by the Intercolonial route; and also, that except as to the said provisions for so routing traffic as aforesaid (which provisions are to remain in force concurrently with the main agreement), the traffic arrangement now existing and referred to in the said 40th clause and every other traffic arrangement between Her Majesty and the company made at any time in lieu thereof or supplemental or in addition thereto or irrespective thereof or otherwise howsoever in respect to traffic on or to or from the Intercolonial Railway, shall be terminable on three months' notice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is very short.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a point I am not wedded to. I think I can give reasons why it is long enough. The amendment proceeds:

Shall be terminable on three months' notice from Her Majesty; and also, that the said 40th clause is to be of no effect and not binding on either of the parties, and that except as otherwise provided for by the new arrangement, the supplemental traffic arrangement referred to in the said 40th clause shall remain in force.

That is so explicit that there is no misunderstanding it. No circumstances can arise which does not give to the government of the day, whether the present government or any future government, the right within a certain time, as I have intimated, three months or longer, of terminating any traffic arrangement which may exist at the time. This abrogates the 40th clause altogether. In reading the 40th clause you will find it has no reference to anything except the former traffic arrangements, the supplemental traffic arrangement, and any traffic arrangements which may be made hereafter, but it contains this extraordinary proviso, that once a new arrangement is entered into between the government and the company, it remains law for the whole ninety-nine years irrevocable, unless at the joint will of Grand Trunk Railway Company and the government. If it proved to be in the interest of the government and not in the interest of the Grand Trunk the Grand Trunk would ask to have it abrogated. Then the government would be placed in the position of throwing away the rights and privileges which they had. On the contrary, if it was beneficial to the Grand Trunk Railway and detrimental to the maritime provinces, then the Grand Trunk would say "we will not consent to an abrogation," hence no change would be made as the 40th clause says that any change must be made by "mutual consent." This amendment gives the government power to abrogate the agreement without giving the Grand Trunk Railway any similar power. If hon. gentleman will read the last four lines of paragraph b they will find they are very important, dealing with this 40th clause. It says:

That the said 40th clause is to be of no effect and not binding on either of the parties, and that except as otherwise provided for by the new arrangement, the supplemental traffic arrangement referred to in the said 40th clause shall remain in force.

These are the differences, and are material, in the explicitness with which they are put. It wipes out from the agreement the 40th clause, to which objection was taken when it was under discussion. The remainder of the amendments are immaterial, because they are only carrying out what is pointed out in the second clause of the bill as it is before us. The amendments read:

(c.) A copy of the new agreement to be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State, after which such new agreement shall be always held to be a part of and embodied in the main agreement.

2. It shall be lawful for Her Majesty, and for the company, to do whatever is necessary to the carrying out on her part, and on its part, of all the provisions contained in the main agreement according to the true intent and meaning thereof.

That is a clause which will be found in all traffic arrangements and in all amalgamations between companies, and I think it is equitable in principle. Then paragraphs 3 and 4 read as follows:—

3. Upon the main agreement being approved by the shareholders as aforesaid, the line of railway and the property described in and leased by the main agreement shall be and become part of the Intercolonial Railway, and shall be operated as such in so far as may be consistent with and subject to the terms of the main agreement.

4. This Act shall not come into force until after the deposit of the said copy in the office of the Secretary of State as aforesaid, nor until the Governor General shall, after such deposit, make a proclamation, to be published in the Canada Gazette, naming a day on which this Act is to come into force, after which it shall come into force on the day so named.

The senior hon. member for Halifax and also the hon. Minister of Justice indicated when I read a portion of clause b that three months was too short a time. I do not think it is too short a time. There may be circumstances arising from the construction of other railways, or the placing on the Atlantic of a fast line of steamers, or improving the connection between European ports and the city of St. John, which might necessitate negotiations with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, in order to have this agreement amended and a new arrangement entered into, in the interest of traffic generally, and in the interest of the carrying trade of the country, not only of the Grand Trunk, but of other companies. The winter season coming on, it may be necessary, in the interest of the maritime provinces and the trade of the west, that new arrangements be entered into in reference to the traffic which arrives at the cities of St. John and Halifax. Is three months not sufficient time to enable a corporation like the Grand Trunk or the Intercolonial to know whether it would be advantageous to either one or the other, and more particularly to the country—because that is what we have to look after most at the present moment—to terminate the arrangement, and three months should be ample time. However, if the House considers that not a sufficient time, it is a matter which, other points being agreed upon, might be considered. But twelve months is altogether too long. I am one of those who think—whatever I may have thought in the past—that the agreement with the Canada Pacific Railway for running powers and concession, which were made by the government of which I then was a member between Halifax, St. John and Moncton, should be abrogated. I do not find any fault with it. on the contrary, that is one of the acts of the present government with which I fully concur. But they could not do that under twelve months. I say it should have been done in less time. When I find that an agreement that I myself may have made, is not in the interest of the country, I would like to have it abrogated as soon as possible No government is infallible, and while it may have been justified in the opening of a new route to give greater concessions to those who are interested in it and those who put their money in it, that does not exist to-day and consequently there should be a shorter period at which that could be terminated.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would like to make a suggestion with respect to one word in paragraph c. I think the word "always" should be struck out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman. I will strike it out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say to the hon. leader of the opposition that I do not think this arrangement stands exactly in the same position as the arrangement to which he refers in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that there are reasons, in the nature of things, why it is safe to make a longer arrangement with the Grand Trunk in respect of traffic than it was possible to make with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Grand Trunk formerly extended to Rivière du Loup. It was found necessary, in the public interest and to further carry out the arrangement which had been made by the articles which led up to confederation and in conformity with the 145th clause of the British North America Act, to bring that road up to Quebec as a better distributing point than Rivière du Loup, because at Rivière du Loup the Grand Trunk was the only railway that was connected with the Intercolonial Railway. By bringing it up to the city of Quebec, there was a possibility of establishing a further connection. Several hon. gentlemen have said, in discussing this question, that we need not have undertaken to acquire the road between Lévis and Montreal, but that we might have been content with leaving the western terminus of the Intercolonial Railway at Lévis. I understand the hon. leader of the opposition, when he addressed himself to this question, to say that he agreed with the policy of the government in bringing the Intercolonial Railway up to Montreal as a better point for the acquiring or obtaining of traffic for the Intercolonial Railway than if the western terminus had been left at Lévis. Supposing a bridge were built across the River St. Lawrence at Quebec, that bridge will be mainly used by the Canadian Pacific Railway, but in the nature of things, the Canadian Pacific Railway will never use that bridge for east bound traffic going to the maritime provinces, because they have a road known as the short line extending from Montreal to St. John, and it is their interest to bring as much traffic as possible to the city of Montreal, with a view to its being carried to the city of St. John, and delivering whatever is for the interior portion of the maritime provinces to the Intercolonial at St. John and not elsewhere; so that if the bridge were built across the St. Lawrence at the city of Quebec, not only would no traffic west of Montreal be carried over that road into the maritime provinces, but a great deal of traffic between the cities of Quebec and Montreal on that line, would be carried westward to Montreal, if it were for the maritime provinces, to be delivered to the Intercolonial Railway at St. John. Hon. gentlemen know that the Grand Trunk stands in a different position in its relation to the Intercolonial to that occupied by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Canadian Pacific has an Atlantic terminus at the city of St. John. The Grand Trunk has no Atlantic terminus in Canada. Its Atlantic terminus is in the city of Portland, and the Grand Trunk, if it were carrying the traffic to the maritime provinces over its own line, would in all probability carry that traffic to the city of Portland, and send the traffic by boat from the city of Portland to the seaboard towns of the maritime provinces. Under this arrangement that the government are making, the confirmation of which is now being sought, the government having acquired running powers for $140,000 a year over a section of the Grand Trunk, which becomes a part of the Intercolonial Railway route to Montreal, have agreed to deliver over all their east bound traffic intended for the maritime provinces to the Intercolonial at Montreal, instead of carrying it down to the Chaudière Junction, or Lévis, as formerly, and so the Intercolonial is receiving to-day a large amount of traffic from the Grand Trunk system, and that is shown by the fact that that traffic for the past twelve months amounted to $721,000 whereas the traffic received from the Canadian Pacific Railway system amounted to but $91,000. So hon. gentlemen will see how much more intimately connected the Grand Trunk and Intercolonial Railway are as a common system, as constituting a single line, than any other two railway organizations that exist in Canada, or at all events much more intimate than any other railway system is with the Intercolonial in this regard. I am quite sure hon. gentlemen will admit that the Intercolonial Railway has a great interest in establishing intimate relations with the Grand Trunk and securing Grand Trunk traffic at the city of Montreal. I may say that no hon. gentleman on this side of the House, and no member of the administration, in favouring the agreement with the Grand Trunk system, desires to do injury to any other railway organization in the country. Everybody recognizes the ability, energy and enterprise with which the Canadian Pacific has been managed, and no one desires anything else than prosperity for that line, so that it is of great consequence to us that this agreement should be carried into effect. I know that it has been said here that the Intercolonial is a mere local line, that it never can be made anything else, and because it was constructed as a military road, that therefore it is useless to try and make it a commercial undertaking. I do not agree with the view. The railway, if any hon. gentleman will look at the 145th section of the British North America Act, and look at the resolutions which were carried at the Quebec convention, providing for the union, will see that the various provinces entering into the confederation pledged themselves to the construction of that road not for the purpose of providing a military system, for the defence of the country, but providing a commercial means of intercourse between the maritime provinces and the provinces of old Canada, without which means of intercourse a real union could never be established between the various provinces. Now, that was the position taken, and for the purpose of carrying that into effect it was perfectly true that the government of the time being agreed to the location of the Intercolonial Railway where it is. It is true that four members out of twelve, at that time, favoured the construction of the road down the banks of the St. John, but the majority of the government preferred the other line. We were told so in the other House. Sir George Cartier especially favoured the line where it is at present located, as opening up for industrial intercourse a section of the province of Quebec that otherwise would be likely left without railway communication altogether. The Minister of Railways has undertaken, by improving the grades of the road, by using heavier rails than those used before, by using engines that can draw a train of 1,100 tons of freight instead of a train of 450 tons, to make this road a commercial success. Without these efforts, and without coming up to the city of Montreal, it would be impossible to secure that growth of traffic and travel which, by coming to the city, may be secured. I need not, at this stage of the proceedings, enter into a discussion of general principles by which the policy entered upon may be defended, because the bill has been read the second time and the House is in committee considering the proposition which is embodied in the first clause of the bill, and also the amendment which the hon. gentleman leading the opposition in this House has moved. My hon. friend opposite says that his amendment is better than the one that I suggested. I ask his candid attention to that. I trust that my hon. friend would like to make the provision as clear and as precise as possible, and that he will not adhere obstinately or pedantically to the proposition simply because he has submitted it to the House. Let me ask my friend's attention to what is the most important clause of the amendment which he proposed —that is, clause b :

(b.) The making of an agreement within days after the passing of this Act between Her Majesty and the company (which agreement is hereinafter referred to as the new agreement) to the following effect, that is to say : That so long as the main agreement remains in force and irrespective of any traffic arrangement between the parties as to any other matter, and without any further consideration from Her Majesty than the continuance of the main agreement, percentage division via Chaudière Junction shall be suspended and Montreal shall be the junction point for all traffic originating throughout the company's system or connection west of Montreal and offered for shipment for any points on the Intercolonial Railway or reached by its connections, and the company shall route all such traffic via Montreal and the Intercolonial Railway, and all traffic controlled by the company originating either in the city of Montreal or on the Montreal joint section and destined to points on the Intercolonial Railway, shall be considered Intercolonial route ; and also, that except as to the said provisions for so routing traffic as aforesaid (which provisions are to remain in force concurrently with the main agreement), the traffic arrangement now existing and referred to in the said 40th clause and every other traffic arrangement between Her Majesty and the company made at any time in lieu thereof or supplemental or in addition thereto or irrespective thereof or otherwise howsoever in respect to traffic on or to or from the Intercolonial Railway, shall be terminable on months' notice from Her Majesty ; and also, that the said 40th clause is to be of no effect and not binding on either of the parties, and that except as otherwise provided for by the new arrangement, the supplemental traffic arrangement referred to in the said 40th clause shall remain in force.

Now that is the provision as the hon. gentleman has proposed it for altering the agreement, by striking out the clause that is referred to and which is only before the House as a proposition from the executive department of government. If you make the amendment which the hon. gentleman has proposed, upon what does he assume that the authority to go on and make further agreements with the Grand Trunk rests? "To alter or to amend the agreements." Under the 40th clause the hon. gentleman will see :

In consideration of the rents and covenants hereinafter reserved and contained Her Majesty represented by the general traffic manager of the Intercolonial of the one part and the company by its general traffic manager of the other part have entered into a mutual traffic arrangement in writing of even date herewith which traffic arrangement is hereby declared covenanted and agreed to be and form a part of and be supplemental to the contract and shall be read herewith and shall be binding upon the parties hereto during the continuance of his leasing contract, except so far as the same may be altered with the mutual consent of Her Majesty and the company. When and if the traffic arrangements shall be so altered from time to time, such amended contract shall be substituted for the supplemental contract of this date.

Now, it is part of the power of the executive government to make any contract or agreement with regard to administration where Parliament has not intervened, but if there is any expenditure connected with it, then it becomes necessary, of course, that parliamentary sanction should be had. But if the hon. gentleman strikes out this clause —it may be in the amendment which he has proposed, because I have only examined it since he has put it in my hands—and this clause b is adopted, does he not intend that the government shall come to Parliament every time a new arrangement or alteration or amendment of the contract is made, for the purpose of receiving sanction, before that can come into effect?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not say so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend does not say so, but we are now legislating for the purpose of enabling the Railway Department, or Her Majesty, represented by the department, to enter into a traffic arrangement or agreement. Does not my hon. friend think that it is necessary that the clause should make it perfectly clear that that traffic arrangement is to operate without first coming to Parliament, and without first having parliamentary sanction for it?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would you not have power entirely irrespective of special legislation, to enter into any traffic arrangement with the Grand Trunk?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Entirely irrespective of the 40th clause I mean,—under the general powers?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As a matter of administration of the government of the country, the power is solely in the Crown where Parliament does not intervene, and it continues in the Crown when Parliament does not expressly or impliedly take away that power. What I would call my hon. friend's attention to—and I am not now discussing what precedes or follows clause b, but I wish to call his attention to the fact that in the amendment that I read to the House, the provision is more clearly expressed. Let me call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the words :

> And subject to the condition that, within ninety days after the passing thereof, the Grand Trunk Railway Company do execute a further agreement with Her Majesty, in amendment of and in addition to the traffic arrangement referred to in the 40th clause of the said agreement set forth in the schedule to this Act, to the effect that Her Majesty may terminate any of the traffic arrangements referred to in that clause.

Now that is perfectly clear and explicit.

> Including the one already executed and any alterations thereof, and any subsequent one which may be made as an amendment or addition thereto, at any time upon Her Majesty giving to the Grand Trunk Railway Company twelve months notice in writing of such termination, and that after the execution of the said amending agreement as aforesaid, it shall be held to be a part of the agreement confirmed by this Act.

I think that that accomplishes precisely what the hon. gentleman proposes to accomplish by clause b, and in my opinion it is more explicit than the clause which the hon. gentleman has submitted to the committee.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I think the clause which was suggested by the leader of the opposition is a little more comprehensive at least in one respect. The words which the Minister of Justice has just read refer to the existing traffic arrangement and any alterations thereof, and any subsequent one which may be made as an amendment or addition thereto. It must refer to that particular traffic arrangement. In the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition, it includes all that, but includes besides any traffic arrangements made irrespective thereof, or otherwise howsoever. That is an arrangement separate altogether from the one now existing. It is more comprehensive, in that respect at least. I could not understand from the hon. gentleman's remarks why the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition was not, in every respect, as legal and as binding as the amendment proposed by the hon. Minister of Justice. In many respects it follows the wording precisely.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I know that.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—If the hon. gentleman will look at the last clause of section b, it repeals, it is true, the fortieth clause of the main agreement, but it continues in force the supplementary traffic arrangement referred to in the said fortieth clause. Then the same principle is followed precisely with regard to bringing the whole agreement into force, that it comes into force when the supplementary agreement is signed between Her Majesty and the company. The method followed is precisely the same, and when publication is made in the Canada Gazette so that one of the amendments is legal and binding, I cannot see why the other is not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not saying that it is not. I was discussing it with a view to seeing precisely what the operation of the clause whould be, and I was also anxious to know precisely what the object of striking out the fortieth clause was. If you leave the power with the Crown to make an agreement unimpaired by your proposed amendment, what is the object of striking out the clause? You are undertaking to leave the government free to terminate at any time the agreement which it has entered into on giving notice for a certain time. That, of course, is an enlargement of the power of the Crown, because it removes the disability that the contract entered into imposed upon it. But my hon. friend who has made the motion may be able to say what precise object he has in view in striking the out fortieth clause, because if the power is unimpaired there is nothing to prevent it being restored. The objection to the 40th clause, as I understood, taken by the hon. gentleman was with reference to the ninety-nine years lease or traffic arrangement; but if you strike out that provision and enable the government to terminate the traffic arrangement at any time upon three or six months notice, the leaving in of the 40th clause does not in the slightest degree impair the agreement as it would stand under the new arrangement. The 40th clause, as I understand it, was only important with reference to the agreement that it was a traffic arrangement for ninety-nine years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the position taken by the hon. gentleman is correct, there certainly cannot be any necessity for the 40th clause. If the deductions which he draws from the amendment before the committee are correct, there can be no necessity for it. The 40th clause, he says, is only for the purpose of confirming an agreement which has been made.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that it confirms any agreement, and if you were to make an alteration and impose disabilities on the government, or enlarge their powers, it would confirm their agreement under the new powers just as it confirms the agreement under the old powers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The power given to the government, under the arrangement that I propose, enables them to make an agreement whenever necessary. The 40th clause is objectionable in sentiment, and obnoxious to those who read it in the light I read it. The hon. gentleman's position is untenable in this respect, that it is useless. Supposing that the 40th clause remains and has the power, which the hon. gentleman points out, of ratifying any other agreement, the present amendment gives the power to the government to change and alter the traffic arrangement at any time, and while this exists it becomes the law of the land, and it is not necessary, therefore, to have this 40th clause, and for that reason there is a very material difference. Railway men, and even those who are not railway men, who have paid attention to traffic arrangements, know that if you have an interchange of traffic and have agreements for running powers, these traffic arrangements must necessarily be subject to change whenever it is necessary, in the interest of the parties, to change them. This amendment gives the government special power. If the bill before us is to become law, they have the same power as two railway companies have, without the intervention of an Act of Parliament, to make traffic arrangements, what necessity is there for having that 40th clause in the bill? It has no effect and is of no use. Having the power fully, as the Intercolonial Railway has, the government should certainly not object to be given that power, because they can be held responsible by the people through Parliament at any time. The hon. gentleman occupied a good deal of time in discussing the question as to whether these different arrangements have to be approved by Parliament before they become law or can be exercised. There is no such provision in the amendment. I make no such proposition as that, in the matter of traffic arrangements, as it would at once be looked upon as an unnecessary restriction to both parties. Consequently I never thought of going as far as that, because it might prevent an advantageous arrangement being made at any time during the whole of a recess between the sessions of Parliament. Therefore, I came to the conclusion that it was better to leave this matter exclusively between the Intercolonial Railway authorities and the Grand Trunk authorities, to enter into other arrangements whenever they deem it advisable. A good deal of extraneous matter was introduced into the hon. gentleman's speech, to which I do not think it necessary that I should refer, further than this: he puts down this proposition—is it at all likely that the Canadian Pacific Railway would bring freight from Montreal to Quebec in order to send it across the bridge to the Intercolonial Railway to be carried to the maritime provinces. Nobody supposes they would ever think of doing so, but there is traffic which arises, intermediate traffic, which it would not be to the advantage of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to carry to Montreal and send to St. John. Supposing there is traffic arising at Three Rivers, would they be likely to take that east or west—more particularly if the consignee wished to send, say lumber via the Intercolonial Railway. They would have to deliver it to the Intercolonial Railway. The hon. gentleman has forgotten the existence of the Lake St. John Road, which is doing a very large business, particularly in lumber of a particular class which might be required in the maritime provinces—pine, which they have not themselves to any great extent. During the winter season, when they want to make shipments from the Lake St. John district, which is a large lumbering district, of the best quality of lumber, they take it to Quebec. If they want to ship it now, after the close of navigation they would have to bring it to Montreal and take it thence to St. John. But if a bridge should be constructed at Quebec, there is a large amount of traffic that would arise in that way which would be given to the Intercolonial Railway and there is a project afoot, and we must look ahead and not legislate merely for to-day, by which it is probable that the Lake St. John Railway will, I do not say in the near future but before the ninety-nine years have rolled round, reach the Pacific Ocean. It is the nearest way to it; and in investigating this subject I have learned, what I never supposed was the case, that large areas of the country through which the Northern Road, having its beginning at Quebec, will run, is fit for settlement, and will ultimately be brought under cultivation. We have been under the impression in the past that because that country is so far north it is uninhabitable. That is a mistake. Calgary, for instance is 3,400 feet above the sea level. In the Edmonton district, which is much further north, and at a less altitude, the crops are surer, and the land is better than further south, and there is every reason to believe that northern Quebec is well fitted for settlement. Whether that is so or not, it is what we learn by reading the reports of those who have explored that country. Looking forward to the future, I have no doubt in the lifetime of many of those who are present to-day—not probably in my lifetime considering my age—that road will be constructed. It is advocated at present by men of means and enterprise. Therefore, so far as that objection is concerned, I do not think that argument has any force whatever. That you can make a commercial line of the Intercolonial is beyond a peradventure, provided always you are willing to carry freight four or five hundred miles further for the same price that it is carried to Portland and St. John. If you wish to supply a cargo of wheat in the winter, say for Europe, you will first ascertain to what port you can take it cheapest. If you can take it to Halifax or St. John as cheaply as to Portland you may take it there.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend object to inserting "shall be terminable on six months" notice instead of "three"?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no objection to that, if you accept the amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I quite well understand that this bill is going to pass, because I notice that the government and the opposition leaders agree together, and it is impossible for a few independent men to defeat a bill of this kind. Many of us are going it blind, because amendments are introduced here that nobody has seen but the leaders of the two parties in this House. The hon. gentlemen behind the government, with one or two other exceptions I suppose, are as much in the dark as we are on this side of the House. I do not see any difference in this bargain to induce me to vote differently from the way I voted two years ago. There has been no information furnished with reference to the cost of working this road, and when the Minister of Justice spoke about the compact at confederation, and that this Intercolonial Railway was intended as a bond of union between the provinces at the time of confederation, he forgets that the circumstances then were entirely different from what they are now. I admit at that time that the road was necessary as a part of the scheme of confederation. But the railway was built in the wrong place, by the north shore, making the distance from Montreal 251 miles further than by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the winter port. The government is now trying, by making expensive improvements and putting on expensive rolling stock to make the road compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is impossible to do it. The building of the road by the north shore was the device of schemers who worked in their own interests rather than in the interests of the country. Some persons wanted it by the River St. John, which would have been a preferable route in the interests of Canada. Had they built it that way then, we would never have had this contention to-day. My rule has been, when I made a bad bargain, to get rid of it as quickly as possible, but here we are extending the road to Montreal, and when we add to the original expenditure of $55,000,000 on the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, the $11,000,000 of deficits on the operation of it, and the eight or ten millions more it will take to extend it to Montreal, you have about $76,000,000 of debt caused by the Intercolonial Railway, and for the last $10,000,000 we incur it will never pay interest. The country will spend that amount of money and will never get a dollar in interest out of the road. The working expenses will be equal to all the increase of traffic that will come to the road. On that ground I am opposed to this measure in toto. I am willing that the road shall be operated from Lévis to St. John, or Halifax, as a government road, but I am opposed to the goverument incurring further expenditure and imposing further burdens on the people of this Dominion when no benefit is to be derived from the expenditure. We are living in an age of progress, when time and transportation are important factors to the trade of the country. I am aware that the government can equip this road properly. No company can do it better, but the result will be that the government will have to pay the deficits on it, whereas if it were run by a private company, they could conduct business more economically than the government. The result of this extension will be to place a burden on the people. We have three lines already, the Grand Trunk Railway, the Drummond County Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway from Lévis or Quebec, to Montreal, and I am sure that they are sufficient to carry the trade that is likely to pass through that country. I do not care what bargain is made with the Grand Trunk; they will not divert trade from Portland to Halifax. They will transport the most of their freight by the shortest possible route. I enter my solemn protest against this measure, as not being in the interests of Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We are now in committee on the bill, and the discussion should not be a general one. The merits of this transaction were fully considered two years ago, and further considered during the present session, and we have now the first clause of the bill before us. To this the hon. leader of the opposition has moved an amendment. With the best attention I have been able to give to his amendment, and to the amendment which the hon. Minister of Justice, on behalf of the government, is prepared to accept, I can find no substantial difference, and I do not think it is worth while for this House, at twenty minutes to six, to split hairs over their meaning. Looking at the fact that this agreement has already been executed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, it would have been better not to have stricken out the fortieth clause, but to have provided for a new agreement, but I really think there is no object to be gained now by discussing the matter. Let us put the bill through and be done with it.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I quite agree with my hon. colleague. I think we should devote ourselves to ascertaining whether this is a sham fight or a screaming farce.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I do not wish to discuss the details of the bill, because it appears that it is to be carried this time, but I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the motion which is before this House now has never been presented to us before. We have had no notice of it, and it is not recorded on our minutes. We have only heard of this important amendment within the last hour.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On the schedule.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is one clause of the schedule which gives an option to the government to pay four per cent for the cash. The 35th clause provides that:

> If Her Majesty should determine to use any such works or improvements and the minister should so declare, such works and improvements are hereby understood and agreed to form part of the leased premises; and the proportion of the actual cost of such works and improvements to be borne by Her Majesty shall be ascertained by calculating interest at the rate of four (4) per centum per annum upon the amount of such actual cost; and Her Majesty shall pay the proportion of such interest which the combined engine and car mileage of the Intercolonial Railway for the year preceding over such portion of the company's line upon which such improvements have been made bears to the total combined engine and car mileage upon such portion; Her Majesty, however, shall have the option of paying such share so ascertained in cash.

I understood from the speech of the Minister of Railways in the House of Commons that he proposed to pay the four per cent instead of cash, on the ground that if he paid the cash it would then form a portion of the capital cost of the railway, and that in case the railway should fall into the hands of the sheriff or the bondholders, through the bondholders asking for payment of their bonds, we would then lose the three per cent which had been paid for the betterments, and rather than run the risk of losing that amount of capital, he proposes to pay four per cent upon it, which is at least one or one and an eighth, or probably one and a half per cent more than we could borrow the money in the English market for. Could the government not be secured by making a provision that in case they paid cash for the whole amount of their share of the betterments, they could have a lien upon the road in case of any default such as that indicated by the Minister of Railways. I throw out the suggestion. I frankly confess that I do not look forward to any such contingency, but looking to the future, we never know what is going to take place. The country will see at once that there is a material difference between paying cash for half the amount, and paying four per cent. You can easily calculate four per cent upon $100,000. If we pay the cash there is an end of it, whether it is greater or smaller. There is another point to which I will call the hon. gentleman's attention. Take the 37th clause, which I confess I had overlooked until lately, and it strikes me that it is a very important one. It reads :

Thirty-seventh.—That if it should be found in practice that any right or interest of either party has not been yet fully protected or provided for by this agreement in accordance with the true object and intent thereof, then both parties shall negotiate and agree upon in an equitable manner a new and other clause to provide for such omission, and each party shall give and execute to the other any and all further documents in writing that may from time to time be required for the better securing of each of their rights and privileges under the said contract and for the better carrying out thereof.

That gives an almost unlimited power to the government and to the Grand Trunk Railway to enter into any other arrangement which they may deem necessary in their view, which they may consider to be equitable, and change nearly the phase of this agreement to a very great extent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The completing of an agreement between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway is a complicated matter. The agreement deals with a complicated subject, covering a very large area of matters and the 37th clause is only intended to apply to those improvements which may be unforeseen or omitted altogether, and for which it may be necessary to enter into a further arrangement or agreement between the company and Her Majesty in that regard. It is not intended to disturb any of the clauses that exist in the agreement.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This clause is one which should be very well considered, and to my mind at least it opens the door to a new agreement between the Grand Trunk and the government. It seems to me that under this clause, if the Grand Trunk should complain that in practice it had transpired that this contract was working inequitably, they could call upon the government to execute a new clause, which would either more clearly set forth the intention, or remove any objection if it had been found in practice that any of those provisions had been inequitable. I can understand that it is impossible to foresee what may occur, and it is a wise clause, but any new clause agreed upon should be subject to the ratification of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the government were to make a corrupt or bad bargain, it would be open to the censure of Parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That would depend upon who was in power and what Parliament it was.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This gives power to make a supplemental bargain. We know what supplementary traffic arrangements can be made, and we know what supplementary estimates may mean. It does seem to me that any arrangement made in future, which is not contemplated by this bill, should be subject to the ratification of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend is unreasonably suspicious that the government may do something contrary to the spirit of this agreement. Anything provided for will not be disturbed. It is only some new portion of the agreement which may arise, and it must be a matter of trivial detail, and it is not likely to be invoked at all.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I differ entirely from the hon. member for Prince Edward Island as to the necessity for this clause. I do not think it can do a great deal of harm, but it is entirely unnecessary. There is a provision in the bill for any difference of opinion which may arise with regard to any point settled by this agreement to be settled by a reference to arbitration, and I think that is the proper way to settle any difference of opinion if such should arise. If any conditions arise which render necessary any alterations in the agreement, it should be done by private arrangement between the parties, but a bill should be brought before Parliament bringing it into effect.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This will be a trifling matter, and it is in almost every contract between two railway companies. The government have no greater power than one railway company would have in dealing with another.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Could it not be settled by arbitration ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We could settle it in a twentieth part of the time and for a one-hundredth part of the expense.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I call the attention of the hon. minister to section 35. He thought I was mistaken in the view which I held, but on reading it over carefully I think I am correct. The clause reads :

Thirty-fifth.—That if at any time hereafter the business or traffic shall in the opinion of the parties hereto necessitate or warrant the laying of double tracks between and including Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, or that additional siding accommodation should be considered necessary for the proper and and efficient conduct of the joint business.

In my judgment those words, used in the connection in which they are, refer only to the portion of the line between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, and no provision is made for additional sidings or accommodation or improvements of any kind between St. Lambert and the terminals at Montreal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is already a double track across the bridge into Montreal.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am referring to additional siding accommodation or any improvements at the terminal facilities which might be needed by the Intercolonial Railway. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the agreement of 1897 he will find the words used there are very clear, and I am at a loss to understand why the same language has not been used in this clause. The first part is just the same. It reads :

The laying of double tracks between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, or the making of more extensive yard improvements at Point St. Charles, or intermediate points between that point and Bonaventure station, or the laying of additional tracks between such points as shall warrant or necessitate any such further expenditure.

The wording of the section is the same, but in the second agreement those words which I have read are left out. I do not see why they should be omitted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was thought that the accommodation existing at the present time was ample for a long time to come, and if long years hence further accommodation is required, it can be provided for by coming here.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Does the hon. minister say that the improvements between Point St. Charles and Bonaventure station of a permanent character are to be paid for by the Grand Trunk and Intercolonial Railway in accordance with the mileage use they make of that part of the road? It is very clearly provided for in the agreement of 1897, but it does not appear to be provided for in this agreement.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is better for the country if it is not.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon gentleman is quite wrong, if he will excuse me for putting it in that blunt way. The clause reads :

If at any time hereafter the business or traffic shall, in the opinion of the parties hereto, necessitate or warrant the laying of double tracks between and including St. Rosalie and St. Lambert.

That is one thing, then it goes on :

Or that additional siding accommodation should be considered necessary for the proper and efficient conduct of the joint business.

That means anywhere.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I appeal to any lawyer in the House to say if it is not so.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think the word "or" should be struck out and the word "and" inserted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This contract is of too important a nature to rush it through without full consideration. The hon. leader of the opposition called the attention of the Minister of Justice to two matters ; one of them was the option of paying interest at four per cent or paying in cash for these betterments, and the other was in reference to the 37th section and the possibility of a new clause being added. These two subjects came before the House at once, and my hon. friend the leader of the House, replied to the criticism on the 37th clause, but we have not had his view on the other point. I think my hon. friend the leader of the opposition pointed out a matter that should receive our consideration. If there is any doubt in the minds of legal gentlemen in the House, such as the Minister of Justice, that the Minister of Railways is right in refusing to pay a capital sum in place of paying interest, if they think there is anything in his contention, or if the government is likely to continue that plan, we ought to protect the capital payment we make on these betterments so that they would be paid back to the government should the mortgages be foreclosed. I am not a lawyer, but I do not think that the Grand Trunk Railway is in such a position that there is the slightest danger in paying cash, but as the hon. Minister of Railways has announced his determination of paying interest at four per cent instead of paying in cash, I think we should have an explanation now. If my hon. friend will tell us he is prepared to advise the Minister of Railways that he thinks he is quite safe in paying cash for the betterments, I think that advice would be taken and that would end the matter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think it is quite safe.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I trust the Minister of Railways will be guided by the hon. gentleman's advice.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the 41st rule be suspended in so far as the same relates to this bill.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I would object to that.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I would object to it also. An important amendment has been submitted to us for the first time to-day, and we have had no opportunity of considering it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then I move that the bill be read the third time on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THIRD READING.

Bill (167) "An Act respecting the Manitoba and South Eastern Railway Company."—(Mr. McMillan, in absence of Mr. Power.)

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (133) "An Act to authorize the acquisition by the Dominion of the Drummond County Railway."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 4.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This clause provides for the price to be paid the company, less any sum which the company received as authorized by chapter four of the statutes of 1897. This clause provides for the deduction of the subsidy voted in 1897 in the event of the government taking over the road.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would like to ask, for information, if this bill will come into operation and the government have to assume the responsibility of taking over the road in the event of the Grand Trunk agreement not coming into operation. Let us assume that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk should repudiate, or refuse, to enter into the new agreement; is the one contingent on the other?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then the government would positively have to acquire the Drummond County Road in the event of the other agreement falling to the ground?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does the hon. Secretary of State not think the one should be made contingent upon the other?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I quite agree with my hon. friend from Calgary, but the agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway was of such a character that it was not supposed that any such contingency would arise, and the Grand Trunk would have to give their consent to any changes made in this House. Then, if the Grand Trunk does not consent, this bill will not be adopted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Should there not be a clause in the bill that it should not be in operation until the Grand Trunk agreement becomes absolute?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suppose there is no objection to that. At the third reading, a clause of that kind might be placed in the bill, if there is a remote possibility of such a contingency arising. It is within the bounds of possibility, but it is highly improbable. It was only acquired in connection with the extension from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, and without that extension, it would not have been acquired at all. The two things are practically the one arrangement. The hon. gentleman's suggestion has force in it, if it is within the bounds of possibility that the other arrangement would fall through, but the Grand Trunk Railway Company are prepared to carry out the agreement.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would make more complete legislation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We can easily insert a few words that this bill would not come into operation until the other measure is sanctioned by the Grand Trunk.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is it not better to make the amendment now and read the bill the third time to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Minister of Justice can draft a clause in two minutes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. Mr. Dickey has drafted an amendment which I think would answer the purpose. It is as follows:—

This Act shall not come into force until after the approval of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada shall be given to the agreement mentioned in the bill passed during the present session entitled "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal," within 90 days after the passing of the said Act and until after the Governor General's proclamation shall be made and published in the Royal Gazette bringing the said Act into force.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Two lines would do the whole thing.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think that it had better stand until to morrow.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Would it not be better to settle the Grand Trunk matter before this comes up? There may be difficulties arising with the Grand Trunk agreement, and I think it would be far better to dispose of that before we go into this. I wish to move some amendments to the Grand Trunk Bill, and I cannot do it till to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The bill can stand for third reading to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Then we can do whatever we think proper with respect to both bills to-morrow?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—As I am opposed to the bill I shall not move any amendment, but to-morrow I propose to move the six months' hoist.

YUKON TERRITORY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (U) "An Act to amend the Yukon Territory Act." He said:—I propose to make some changes in the bill, but will do so in committee. I wish to make certain alterations in the law as it now stands, providing a substitution for section 8 in the Act of last year, authorizing the Governor in Council and the Council of Commisioners in the Yukon Territory to make ordinances for the peace, order and good government of the country. I propose to give to the Governor in Council, and to the commissioners, power to make those ordinances in all matters of ordinary local concern, and to give to them power to regulate tavern and shop licenses in that territory. I do not think that this can be regarded as an infringement of the principle of taxation, because it is not a burden imposed upon the population generally, but payment for a privilege that is specially enjoyed, so we confer upon the council the power to regulate tavern and shop licenses.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—What about the Scott Act?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A tavern does not necessarily mean a place where intoxicants are sold. It may be a hotel where there is nothing stronger than tea and coffee consumed. Provision is made that the Governor in Council and the commissioners shall not have power to impose any duties of customs or excise, or any penalty exceeding $500. The bill as printed says $100, but that, in the Yukon country, is considered altogether too small an amount, from the reports made to us; so we propose to give the power to impose fees to the extent of $500.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do you propose to repeal the North-west Territories Act as it now exists, or is in operation in the Yukon Territory, regarding the prohibition of the sale and importation of liquor?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, we are not repealing anything that is contained in the North-west Territories Act, except in so far as may relate to police regulations which may come within the general purview of the sections which I have read.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then the Yukon council would not have power to introduce a licensing system under which they may license taverns?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They may license taverns without authorizing them to sell intoxicants.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Because the law, as it now stands on the statute-book prohibits the sale and importation of liquors in the Yukon Territory.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is nothing in this.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Except by implication. The question is whether, by implication, you do not permit the council to pass a license system and thus override the present prohibition.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not intended to give them power in any way to interfere with the legislation of Parliament, but to give them power to make those police regulations which may be necessary, from a municipal point of view, for the good order of the community. We also provide that nothing in this clause shall be construed to prevent the Governor in Council or commissioners in council giving municipal corporations power to tax property to raise a revenue for municipal purposes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You have already given them the same powers as are enjoyed by the North-west Territories, and they have power to incorporate municipal institutions. It seems to me the words introduced here may possibly be misleading. They already have power to erect municipalities in the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is a substitution for section 8 of the Act. I propose to give a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of British Columbia. About this I might say I have had a good deal of hesitation; whether it might not be better to give an appeal directly to the Supreme Court of Canada from the Yukon Territory instead of interposing the jurisdiction in the Supreme Court of British Columbia. Of course, the Supreme Court of British Columbia is nearer the Yukon Territory, but when you get parties on their way as far as Victoria, they have already incurred the greater portion of the expense that would be necessary in a journey all the way to the Supreme Court, and there is some advantage, not a little indeed, in reaching a final conclusion at as early a period as possible without too many intermediate steps. While I am proposing the second reading of the bill in the form in which it is here given, I have not made up my mind absolutely—and I mention it in order that the matter may be considered by gentlemen in this House—as to the propriety of giving an appeal directly from the court in the Yukon Territory to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (86) "An Act further to amend the Insurance Act." He said:—This bill proposes to make certain amendments in the Insurance Act, which is now on the statute-book as amended in 1894. Many of the details are somewhat technical in character and are easier to explain when the House is in committee on the bill. I may say that the material change is due to the fall in the value of money. For many years past the insurance companies have valued their securities on the basis of four and a half per cent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Their reserves you mean.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The securities that they have. In valuing the policy they estimate the assets on a four and a half per cent basis. The bill provides that for all policies issued after the 1st of January next, the basis of valuation shall be three and a half per cent. Of course that somewhat affects those who are holding policies in the several companies, and to meet the objections of such persons it is provided in the bill that as far as all existing policies, and policies issued up to the 1st of January, are concerned, the rate will be on a basis of four and a half per cent up to 1910. From 1910 to 1915, that valuation, as far as these policies are concerned, is reduced to four per cent. After 1915 they will be placed on the basis that all policies issued after the 1st of January next will be on, that is three and a half per cent. The other material change is to make uniform the classes of stocks and securities in which the various companies may invest. Heretofore, as insurance companies have secured charters, it has been specially provided in those charters that they shall be permitted to invest in securities that have been named. It is thought advisable that uniformity shall be established, and in doing so the list of securities has been somewhat widened; not widened, however, as much as the privilege now enjoyed by four companies that hold very old charters—the Canada Life and the Sun Life and the British America and the Western. This bill applies to all companies, but those four companies are permitted still to enjoy the privilege that was granted them by Parliament of a very large class of securities in which they may invest their surplus funds. The other companies will comply with the uniform list of securities mentioned in the bill. As that list has been very much widened, however, I believe the companies generally acquiesce in the proposition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There was an important change made in the House of Commons when this bill was under discussion there. It has reference to railway bonds as securities.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The provision is that it is limited to railways that pay a dividend on stock. That is the only material change that was made.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (40) "An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, with respect to combinations in restraint of trade." He said:—This bill came up from the House of Commons some time ago, and in that House I understand was adopted by a very large majority. It is also a bill that we passed ourselves some years ago, so that it has special claims on the favourable consideration of the Senate. It is a very short bill. It simply says that section 520 of the Criminal Code is amended by striking out the words "unduly" and "unreasonably." Section 520 of the Criminal Code, which it is proposed to amend, reads as follows:—

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding $4,000 and not less than $200, or two years' imprisonment, and if a corporation is liable to a penalty not exceeding $10,000 and not less than $1,000, who conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any other person or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company unlawfully
>
> (a.) To unduly limit the facility for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article or commodity which may be the subject of commerce.

The word "unduly" is to come out there.

> (b.) To restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity.
>
> (c.) To unduly prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity, or to unreasonably enhance the price thereof.

The words "unduly" and "unreasonably" have to come out there.

> (d) To unduly prevent or lessen the manufacture, &c., of any such article of commodity.

The word "unduly," the removal of which is the substantial object of this bill, does not seem to have any business in these clauses. It would strike one that any person who conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any other person or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company, to do these things which are condemned, should be responsible to the law without the prosecutor having to prove that the act was done in an undue degree, because the question of its being in an undue degree would rest with the court, to a great extent, and perhaps the sympathies of judges are not always with the general public. They are just as likely as not to be with the corporation who do those things, and I think the law ought to be clear, and its interpretation, in a matter of this kind, ought not to rest in the discretion of the judge. I do not propose to trouble the House upon this subject at the length which its importance deserves, but I shall call attention to two or three facts in connection with it. The other chamber appointed a Select Committee on the 29th February, 1888, to examine and report upon the nature, extent and effect of certain combinations said to exist with reference to the purchase and sale or manufacture and sale in Canada of any foreign or Canadian product. The powers of the committee were further extended by resolution on the 8th March, 1888, to include the alleged combinations of fire insurance companies doing business in Canada. This committee reported on the 16th May. I do not propose to read the whole report to the Senate but to read some important passages in it.

The committee entered upon the discharge of the duties imposed upon it on the 6th March, 1888, and held 26 meetings, having continued the investigation to the 8th day of May instant. The time at the disposal of the committee was not sufficient to examine into the nature and extent of alleged combinations other than those hereinafter specified. Sixty-three witnesses were examined and a full investigation made on the following subjects.

The subjects examined were sugar and groceries; coal, biscuits and confectionery; combination against Canadian watch case manufacturers, barbed wire, binder twine, agricultural impliments, stoves, &c.; coffin makers and undertakers; oatmeal millers; combinations of egg dealers; barley, and Canadian Fire Underwriters Association. The committee made one report as to an important combination. That was the grocery combination. I read from appendix number three to the Journals of the House of Commons for 1888. What I have just now read appears on page 1½. The committee wind up their remarks about sugar and groceries in this way:

Thus facts prove this Grocers Guild, with its several combinations to be obnoxious to the public interest, in limiting competition, in enhancing prices, and by the familiar use of its growing and facile powers tending to produce and propagate all the evils of monopoly. Certain dealers are refused admission into its ranks, others are admitted and afterwards expelled, others again are placed under its ban, who, from concientious scruples or in a spirit of independence refuse to join them. Merchants who have been buyers on equal terms and with equal facilities as other merchants, suddenly find themselves under the power of this combination.

Thus, establishments, which in some cases are the growth of half a century of toil and honourable dealing, and rich in valuable experience and public confidence, are threatened with extinction. No reasonable excuse, much less justification, exists for many of these arbitary acts of agreement. The wholesale grocery trade had been for many years in a flourishing condition; failures were almost unknown. The alleged demoralization of the sugar trade was but the same condition of this trade that had existed for many years owing to the custom of selling sugar at a low rate of profits. The reason given for fixing prices on many other articles as that they were being sold at too small a rate of profit. Fixed profits were agreed upon and afterwards increased and in no instance lowered, though values generally had fallen. It was seen that an association formed at first to arrange uniform terms of credit and discounts and to prevent the dating ahead of invoices, &c., soon and rapidly extended its operations to more and ambitious schemes. The power used cautiously at first soon grasped with a firmer hand and at length the simple plan that they may take who have the power governed the operations of these associations.

The next important matter which the committee deals with is that of coal combinations, and they find that the combination as to coal is mischievous. As to certain things there were no combinations. There were no combinations as to agricultural implements or as to barley. They did find that there was a combination amongst cotton makers and undertakers and amongst manufactures of cordage and binder twine.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—There is a combination, certainly amongst undertakers.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then they show that there was a powerful association for the purpose of raising and maintaining the rates of insurance. This is a matter in which the public are very much interested, and this combination undoubtedly continues to do its work and does it thoroughly. The rates of insuranee are fixed, apparently, without any regard to the necessities of the case or the facilities for fighting fire which are provided by different localities. In fact, it sometimes seems that the more money a city spends for the purpose of rendering the destruction of property by fire improbable, and the more perfect the appliances for fighting fire are, the higher the rates are put by the insurance companies. That, I may say, has been the experience in the city from which I come. The committee's report condemns these combinations amongst insurance men, and they wind up in this way:

Another tangible effect of the combination for the regulation of rates, is, that rates being equal in all companies the tendency is, for insurers to place their risks either abroad or with foreign companies doing business in Canada, and possessed of larger capital and of longer standing than the native companies. This is rapidly tending towards the freezing out of purely Canadian insurance companies, and opens up no very bright prospect for the shareholders whose money is invested in Canadian joint stock insurance.

Those were the conclusions which were arrived at by the committee of the House of Commons as to the insurance combination.

The concluding paragraph in the report of the committee is of a general character and is to be found at page 10, and reads as follows :—

The committee find that the evils produced by combinations, such as have been inquired into, have not by any means been fully developed as yet in this country, but sufficient evidence of their injurious tendencies and effects is given to justify legislative action for suppressing the evils arising from these and similar combinations and monopolies.

The legislative action which we find in the Revised Statutes is not, in its present form, useful for the purpose indicated. Of course, every hon. gentleman knows that this subject of trusts and combines has been considered by several legislatures of the United States as well as by Congress. I have in my hand a report made by the special committee of the Senate of the state of New York on the 6th February, 1893, on coal combinations, and that committee found that there had been substantially a combination, that certain railways which carried coal to the seaboard, and other points outside the coal-producing district, had combined, or had all got into the hands of one concern, and as a consequence the price of coal had been raised, although promises had been made that the prices would not be changed. The report reads :

Your committee repeat the recommendations made in their last report that the attention of the Governor be directed to the dangers that threaten the people of this state from this and like combinations, and that the Attorney General be directed to pursue the remedies in such case provided by law.

While, in the opinion of your committee, as advised by counsel, the evil in the present case may be restrained at least in part under existing laws of this state, by proceedings either to set aside the leases, or, if necessary, to annul the characters of those corporations of this state which are involved in the combination, yet by reason of the fact that the chief parties to the combination are foreign corporations and without the jurisdiction of our courts, no adequate remedy against this or similar mischievous combinations can be had except under federal law and through the courts of the United States.

And the same thing which is true of the States of the Union, is more true of the provinces here. The provincial legislatures are not in a position to deal with the railway companies which are, in nearly every instance, chartered by the Dominion, or if they are not chartered by the Dominion, are chartered by the United States, and consequently are without the jurisdiction of the local legislatures. The committee of the House of Commons discovered that, in the matter of sugar and groceries and in the matter of coal, all necessaries of life—and in a country like Canada the latter in a special manner is a necessary of life—prices had been raised to the consumers by these combinations. I say that coal oil is also a necessary of life. Although in cities it may not be an absolute necessity of life, in the rural districts it is. Candles have gone out of date, and gas is not to be had, and up to the present time, at any rate, electric light is rather too expensive. The plant is too expensive to have electric light in general use in the rural districts of the country. We find that during the last few months some sort of combination was made between the Standard Oil Company and two or three railway companies doing business in Canada, the effect of which was to keep up the price of coal to the consumer. Hon. gentlemen have probably noticed quite recently that railways have been taking other steps in the way of combining. There is a despatch from Chicago published in the local journals here recently which I shall venture to read to the House. It is as follows :—

Chicago, July 11.—After considering the matter four days the presidents of all the big railroads between Chicago and the Atlantic seaboard have agreed that on and after August 1, Chicago shippers must pay from three to five cents more on the one hundred pounds for the transportation of their grain to the eastern markets. More than this, the chief executive officers of these roads say that with the new tariff there will be no more secret deals with big consigners, that the man with a carload of grain must be given the same rate as he who can promise a train load, and those rates must be the ones printed for public inspection.

The new tariff on wheat, oats and flour from Chicago to New York city will be 17 cents per 100 pounds, compared with the present rate of 11½.

On corn the advance will be from 10½ to 15 cents.

For export shipments from Chicago via New York the advance on corn will be from 10½ to 11, and on oats from 10½ to 13. For wheat shipped to the European markets the rate will be 17 cents per 100 pounds, the same as now.

On provisions both export and domestic, rates will be 25 cents, an increase of five cents in the export rate.

Hon. gentlemen see that these four great United States railway corporations have arrived at an understanding at any rate, the pernicious effects of which will be twofold, and there is no reason for supposing that the Canadian roads may not enter into the same combination. The consumer of agricultural products who lives in the east will have to pay a great deal more for the material which he wishes to consume, for his flour or oatmeal, or whatever it may be. That is a very important fact and it is a fact which is to be deprecated, because the worker and the man who may have a large family and has just enough to do now to maintain that family and educate his children, will have to pay more for the necessaries of life and his salary will not be increased, and he will be placed in a much more disadvantageous position than he is now. On the other hand —and perhaps this effect is really as serious as the one to which I have referred—the farmer out on the prairies in the western country, who toils from early in the morning until night to raise wheat or other grain, finds that after this product is sold a larger proportion of its value will be taken for carriage than has been the case in the past; and we know that at one time in portions of our North-west it was complained that the Canadian Pacific Railway left the farmer only enough of the value of his wheat to enable him to maintain a bare existence and no more. During the last two or more years wheat has ruled high and the rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway have been somewhat reduced, partly I suppose as a result of the competition of other roads, and partly as a result of the agreement made two years ago with the government in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass extension of the road, under which rates were to be reduced. So that one can see how a combine between the men who control the railways can damage very seriously the consumers in the east and the producers on the farms of the west. Our duties are to the great classes, the consumers and the farmers, and not to the railway companies. The railway companies are generally very well able to take care of themselves, and we ought to try and take care, as far as we can, of the interests of consumers. I do not believe that any legislation which we may pass here will effectually and absolutely prevent these combines. Things that cannot be done directly may be done indirectly, but they cannot be done as effectually when done indirectly as when done directly, and it is our duty, having regard to the evidence submitted to us, and having regard to the action of the House of Commons in passing this measure by a large majority, to pass it here. Unless it is shown that there has been a conspiracy, or combine, no one is liable to any penalty or damage for transacting his business in a fair way. I have indicated the results which have followed from combinations to limit the facilities for transporting, also for producing manufacturing, supplying, and so on, articles or commodities. There is a paragraph dealing with unduly, preventing or limiting the manufacture of any commodity, or unreasonably enhancing the price thereof. We had an example in the Consumers Cordage Company, and in the Canadian Cotton Company. In the neighbourhood of the city of St. John they had rope works which gave employment to a great many men. The rope works passed into the hands of a combine with direct headquarters in Montreal, and indirect headquarters in the United States, and that cordage factory was closed up. The men who had been earning their living there, and their families were sent adrift and had to look for other employment. The same thing has happened as to the cotton factories. Several factories in the country have been closed up. The districts in which these factories were situated have suffered serious loss, and the working men in the factories have suffered loss also. I think that an amendment which should be made in paragraph c as well as in the other subsection d has been covered by some of the reports I have read.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does not the hon. gentleman think that most of the cases to which he has referred, particularly those mentioned by the Committee on Combines, come within the meaning of the clause as "unduly and unnecessarilly?"

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps they do, but this is in order to remove any doubt.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before we accept this bill, we should consider what we are doing. In the first place I am opposed on principle to combines where they unduly exist for the purpose indicated in the clause of the Criminal Code of 1892. What struck me forcibly was, while the hon. gentleman was reading from the reports of the Combines Committee, that most of the cases to which he referred were covered by the law as it stands upon the statute-book at the present time. What I feel is this, you are enacting a law which, like some others, will be very harsh in its character if literally interpreted, and will therefore become a dead letter. Let me call attention to one or two points. These penalties are very severe. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding $4,000 and not less than $200 or two years' imprisonment. If two companies enter into a combination they become liable to a penalty not exceeding $10,000 and not less than $1,000 provided they conspire, agree or arrange with any other person or company unlawfully to do certain things. This makes it unlawful to unduly limit the facilities for traffic, or for manufacturing any commodity which may be a subject of trade and commerce. This might be applied to lumber. That is one branch of trade that suggests itself to me now. When the United States market or the English market becomes glutted with lumber, the lumbermen meet together and enter into an agreement which may be called a combination under this law, and say they will cut only so many logs this year, in order that they may have some remuneration for the labour and capital which they have put into their lumbering operations. They limit, in that case, the production, and by limiting production, they create a better market the following year for the article which they produce, and consequently, enhance the value of it. Would that be considered unduly limiting production, or would it be considered a legitimate mode of carrying on business? If a private individual is carrying on the lumber trade—I mention this branch of business particularly, but there are others which come within the same category—whether it be in the planing or sawing, and he knows that the market is overstocked, he has the right, individually, to limit the production, and thereby limit the output and increase the price, because in proportion to the stock in the market would the price be, providing there is a demand for it. Now, you make it a criminal offence, with a heavy penalty, if two companies carrying on this business, however small or however large, come to an understanding between themselves that they will not send as many men to the shanties during the winter, and will not produce only a quarter or half of what they produced the year before. The result would be, they would not have the usual quantity of lumber to put on the market, and thereby they would decrease the quantity of stock in the market, and enhance the price. Would that be considered an undue exercise of power which every prudent man would act upon, and would they be subject, under circumstances of that character, to the heavy penalties and two years' imprisonment indicated in this law? There are combines that I would like to see brought within this law, but it seems to me this bill carries it too far. It reaches not only the large and ruinous combines, and the class of people referred to by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, but it applies to any two individuals—to grocers or merchants who enter into an agreement to increase the price of any commodity. Take the millowners, where the market has been overstocked, and the prices are actually below the cost of manufacture. By an understanding between themselves they stop producing for a while to allow the surplus stock in the market to be consumed, in order to enhance prices in the following year. If you could devise any way which would meet the large combines that are to some extent a curse to the country, without striking such cases as this to which I have referred, I shall be very glad to give it my humble support, but you are going too far when you ask us to adopt such a measure as that indicated by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I know there is a strong feeling in the country against what are called undue combines. I am as strongly against that as any one else, but you should not go so far as to place every two or three men doing business in a village or anywhere else in a position to be subject to the penalties which you propose by this bill to impose upon them. This is the view I take of it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—This not a new bill. A measure similar to this was passed in the Senate a few years ago, and went to the House of Commons in charge of the late Mr. Robert Reid in this House and passed unanimously. It was sent to the House of Commons, but the member in whose charge it was placed was away, and it did not get through the committee that year. The hon. leader of the opposition appears to take strong grounds in favour of combines.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I do nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—He takes the case of the lumbermen. There is one thing about the lumber trade. If they combine to reduce operations they do not cut so much timber, and it keeps on going unless it is destroyed by fire. If you look to the country south of us, you see the effect of combines. The whole business of that country is in the hands of combines. We ought, in reason, to try and prevent them from getting a foothold here. I have no doubt there are combines in this country, and even if this bill is passed, I do not believe it will crush them altogether, but we ought to do as much as we can to keep that evil out of the Dominion. I have much pleasure in supporting the hon. gentleman from Halifax in his laudable attempt to keep combines out of Canada. On a former occasion, when a bill similar to this was before us, I spoke at considerable length on the evil effects of combines in the United States. They have invaded this country, and certainly the hon. leader of the opposition cannot think it a desirable thing that they should get control here.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know precisely how far my hon. friend from Halifax proposes to go in this matter. We struck out in the Code, when we had it before us, the word "unlawfully" from the 520th section, but we retained the word "unduly," and the other words to which my hon. friend refers. The question that we have before us in this clause is whether there is any legitimate field of action. Because if you strike out the word "unduly," then the clause will strike at everybody who does any one of the things mentioned in any one of those subsections; so we have to consider whether there is any one of these things mentioned in the subsections which would be a legitimate and proper thing to do, apart from legislation on the subject. I know that at the present time parties in the county of Essex are engaged in the production of tobacco.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Growing tobacco.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. It is a plant that thrives admirably in that section of the country, and I think Mr. Walker, and a gentleman who was formerly the member for the House of Commons from that county, took an active part in persuading the farmers to go into the cultivation of tobacco, telling them that, in their opinion, it would yield them a better return than any other crop to which they could devote their attention. They have produced a very large quantity — very much more than it is possible to find a market for in Canada. The efforts made by Mr. Walker and the other gentleman to whom I referred, Mr. Louis Wigle, in persuading farmers to engage in that business did not violate anything in this section. They persuaded them not to refrain from doing, but to do certain things. That was a legitimate thing to do and did not interfere in any way with the law. The result has been, on the whole, disastrous, because the farmers have a large quantity of tobacco on their hands for which no market at the present time can be found. I should like to put this question to my hon. friend from Halifax, because he has been considering the matter and I have not; supposing his amendment to this section were made, and a number of farmers were to meet together for the purpose of restricting the production of tobacco for the present year, in order that they could work off the supply which they have already on hand, it would not be an undue attempt to limit the production, but it would be an attempt to limit production but if you strike out the word "unduly," in the statute it would be an offence. Then you would make any association or combine of the farmers to restrict the production of tobacco in their own interests an offence for which they would be liable under this section.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Though they were doing it for their own protection.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The word "unduly" distinguishes between what may be regarded as legitimate, and what might be considered an illegitimate combine. That is what the insertion of the word "unduly" was intended to meet. The whole section is framed upon the assumption that there are certain things which are aimed at in the section which, within certain limits, are legitimate and justifiable proceedings, but if they are carried to an undue degree, then they come within the inhibitions of the statute, and render the parties liable to penalties. The law undertakes to draw a distinction—whether proper or not, at all events that is the idea which seems to run through the section—by the use of the word "unduly" to draw distinction between that freedom of action which is perfectly legitimate and lawful in certain cases, and another line of action which the law is intended to prohibit. When you lessen production you lessen competition; and you may possibly enhance prices. I took the tobacco industry as a single instance, but there are a great many others to which I might refer. For instance, in the western portion of the province of of Ontario when we had access to the United States markets, there was a valuable market for the sale of apples in Chicago and the western cities in the prairie section of the United States where the fruit crop is not very abundant. Those orchards, in years of great yield, produce a very much larger crop than a market can be found for. Supposing you had a combine of farmers who undertook to cut down a portion of their orchards with a view to enhancing the price of the crop that remained. One man may say it is no use doing this unless my neighbours follow my example, so they meet together and agree as to what percentage they shall cut down.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Apples are perishable.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so. Suppose the farmers meet to decide what proportion of their orchards to remove so as to get a better price for what the remainder would produce. If you strike out those words from the section, would that be a violation of the provisions of the statute as it would remain? I have mentioned these matters for the consideration of my hon. friend. I am not at this moment going to resist this proposal, because I have not given it adequate consideration, but I am not to be supposed, if not opposing it at this moment, to commit myself to the amendment which my hon. friend suggests to the law as it now stands.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Will the hon. gentleman allow his speech to go to the public as he has delivered it? Better campaign literature we could not get in the Northwest. The idea of talking about combines of farmers to stop tobacco culture and growing apples. It is preposterous. There is no such thing as a combine of farmers to cut down apple trees or to stop growing anything. We want to produce all we can fairly. The combines that we condemn are the combines which are running up the price of every commodity the farmer has to buy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman from Monck (Mr. McCallum) must have misunderstood what I said. He commenced his speech by saying that I favoured combines. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I said I am opposed to combines when they unduly exist.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I suppose the hon. gentleman from Wolseley is in the same error with respect to the speech of the Minister of Justice?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I could mention another case which it would be difficult to deal with under this amendment, that is the case of the salt wells in western Ontario. Hon. gentlemen will remember some years ago it was found that large beds of salt existed in western Ontario. A great many persons were attracted by this industry, and a number of salt wells were put down. By degrees those wells were so multiplied that the price of salt fell, and it was found that the industry could not be worked at a profit. The result was the owners of salt wells came to an agreement that they would not put out more than a certain quantity of salt each year, for the purpose of keeping up the price in the market. As these amendments are worded, the well owners would be liable to heavy penalties. I think that would be hardly fair.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—The combine to which I object particularly is the combine between the leader of the opposition and leader of the government trying to stifle the wishes of the country, in the matter of the Intercolonial Railway extension. The press of Halifax and the Citizen here, state that we only opposed the bill for the purpose of assisting the Canadian Pacific Railway. We all have a suspicion who influences the articles in the Citizen. But there is a pious paper called the Montreal Witness which, in commenting on the action of the Senate, forgets the commandment "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour." Now, how did those members of the Senate, who are directors and stockholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway, vote on that question? They voted with the combine. How did the hon. gentleman from Hamilton (Mr. MacInnes) one of the directors of the Canadian Pacific vote? With the combine. How did the hon. gentleman from Ottawa (Mr. Scott), who is the legal adviser of the Canadian Pacific Railway, vote? He voted with the combine, and if you look at the names of those who voted with the combine and see the number of shares that they hold in the Canadian Pacific Railway, you will see that they all voted together, while we who are opposed to the policy of the government, are supposed to have done so under the influence of the Canadian Pacific. I want to know if the facts I have stated are correct, what motive but the interests of the country induced us to vote as we did. Besides, we are voting to preserve the character of the Senate, and to say that we are not swallowing ourselves—not reversing our decision of two years ago. We voted against a combination, and now we are supposed to be eating our own words.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask the hon. senior member from Halifax whether he has considered what effect this will have upon the Criminal Code which we passed through this House, and which we amended a short time ago? I think we left the word "unduly" in the Code and struck out the word "unlawfully" so as to make it more intelligible. Supposing this bill passes now, and the Criminal Code bill passes also, what will be the effect? I may add, I am very glad to know that there are some questions, among the multitude of those which arise in political life, on which I can agree with the hon. leader of the House. I only regret that there are not more on which we can agree.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am afraid that the chances of the Criminal Code Amendment Bill being passed are not just as hopeful as we might wish. It is very difficult to get the House of Commons to give attention to a great measure like that towards the end of the session. I have some fears—I hope they are unfounded—that that bill will not become law, but in any case the word "unlawfully" is unnecessary and objectionable here, and it is better to have it out in any case, and if we can strike out the word "unduly" also we shall still further improve the law. The cases put by the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. leader of the government—that is the case of the lumberman, and the case of the tobacco grower, and the case of the apple grower, are cases which I scarcely think, as a matter of practice, would arise under this enactment. If hon. gentlemen would turn to the Criminal Code they would find that section 520 is a portion of part 29, which deals with offences connected with trade and breaches of contract. The apple growers agreeing to diminish their orchards would not be an offence connected with trade, or with a breach of contract. In old times, before the days of combines, people who were raising articles for the market found out very soon when it ceased to be profitable to produce these articles in large quantities, and they diminished the product. It is not necessary to have a combine, or agreement, for that purpose. When lumber gets down in price, the lumbermen find it out, and naturally diminish their output, and it is the same way farmers, although with respect to grain it is hardly true. As the hon. gentleman from Wolseley says, the farmer in the west raises all he can, and trusts to Providence for the price afterwards. The first words of section 520 must be looked at. The person who is guilty of an indictable offence is one who conspires or agrees with any company to do these things. Now if a tobacco firm in Essex goes to a town, the farmers going there would naturally talk over matters, and finding that tobacco growing was not paying, and without incurring any penalties, they could practically come to an understanding that they will not raise so much tobacco. They would not have a meeting, they would not have a written agreement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend think it would be a happy state of things when it would be a criminal offence for farmers to meet together for such a purpose?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I doubt very much whether the law would apply to such a meeting of farmers. At any rate, unless the farmers did have a formal meeting and enter into a regular agreement, they would not come under the operation of the law.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—What does my hon. friend think about the insurance companies?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is one of the things we have to complain of. I do not know how it is in the upper provinces, but in the maritime provinces the business of fire and marine insurance also, is done almost altogether by foreign companies, and the representatives of those companies meet and fix the rates of insurance without any regard to the risks at all. The idea is simply to make the rate as high as the insured will stand.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Do you not think that under the present law these men could be prosecuted? Are they not doing that unlawfully and unduly?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, they are not doing it unlawfully. The objection to the word "unduly" is that these insurance people would claim that taking Canada altogether, the rates were not undue.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—All the insurance companies charge the same rates all except three companies which have started lately, which are not in the combine, and the chances are there will be more of them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They will break down likely.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I take the English companies. The English companies have large amounts at risk in Canada. In the province of Nova Scotia they have considerable amounts at risk. The percentage of loss in that province is small. I know that in Halifax it is very small. There are parts of the country where the percentage of loss is considerable. These English companies say "we shall make the people of Halifax and the people of other parts, where the appliances for extinguishing fire excel, pay for the losses which take place in other parts of the country where the appliances for extinguishing fire are not good." Suppose a case of that kind comes before a court, and it is shown that the appliances for preventing fire in Halifax are good, and that these people have unduly raised the rates, they come before the court and say "Well, we do not do business in Halifax alone; we have to look at the business we do all through Canada, and looking at the business we do all through Canada, we are not making money, and the rates are not unduly high." The probability is that the court will hold that the rates are unduly high.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know that in Ontario there are companies doing business—I will not say what companies, I think they are English companies doing business here—and when a water motor is put into an establishment to run the machinery they increase the rate of insurance, because they have an arrangement that when motors are used the insured must pay extra insurance. Would not that be unduly raising the rate? I think so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have to look at what would happen. There is not the slightest probability that any one would attempt to come down on the farmers of Essex, or the farmers of King's County, or the farmers of any other part of the country, because they declined to grow what they found unprofitable. It does not need any combination, or written agreement, or anything of that sort, on the part of the farmers to enable them to restrict their product, but it is of importance that insurance companies and railway companies and, to a certain extent, manufacturers, like the cordage manufacturers and the cotton manufacturers, should be prevented from combining with one another to the injury of the public and the injury of the locality in which they are situated. As the hon. gentleman from Monck stated, this bill was passed by the Senate several years ago, and has been passed on several occasions by the other chamber. This word "unduly" was inserted about ten years ago; and the members of the other House, who are brought more directly in contact with the people, find the sentiment of the country is still in favour of having some attempt made to lessen the mischief which is done by those combinations. We cannot prevent them altogether. Indirectly, they can do these things, but we ought to make it as difficult as possible, and prevent these things being done as far as we can.

The motion was agreed to, on a division, and the bill was read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (118) "An Act respecting the Great Northern Railway Company and to change its name to the Great Northern Railway Company of Canada."—(Mr. Landry.)

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I give notice that on Wednesday next I will move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for further consideration of Bill (B) "An Act further to amend the Exchequer Court Act," which was dropped from the order paper.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That was the bill which was not reported from Committee of the Whole?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

EXPROPRIATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I gave notice that on Wednesday next I will move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for further consideration of Bill (D) "An Act to amend the Expropriation Act."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is this the regular course to be pursued in a case of that kind? The bill was virtually dead, the committee having risen without reporting. Should not the motion be to restore it to the order paper, and then take such proceedings as you may deem advisable afterwards? I merely ask as a matter of precedent and rule with the House. I think that is the course usually pursued, that if a bill is defeated in the committee, and not reported to the House, the motion should be to restore it to the order paper, and make such motion as is deemed advisable.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think that the proceeding is regular. There were two courses open, either to introduce a new bill or to restore this bill. There was no report made from the committee to the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Consequently the bill was killed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Now we are asking to put it in the position it was in before, and proceed with it in committee and a report can be made to the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think my hon. friend is wrong. Once a bill has been disposed of——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It has not been disposed of.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend said there were two courses open, either to reintroduce the bill, or to do what he has done. The rule of Parliament is that once a bill has been defeated, involving any principle, you cannot reintroduce it during the same session of Parliament. The course that has been pursued before was that when there was no report from the committee the bill was dead, so far as the House was concerned. It strikes me that the motion should be to restore it, and then send it to the notice paper, and then send it to the committee afterwards. I merely point this out and do not raise it as an objection.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think my hon. friend is mistaken on both points. In the first place, it is open to introduce any bill, a clause of which has been defeated in committee, and which has not been reported. That I need not discuss, because it is at this moment an academic question. I am not proposing to do it, so it is not necessary to decide that point. What I am asking is that the bill shall be restored to the order paper for the committee, because the House is not seized of it. There was not anything defeated except in committee, and if the committee chose to reconsider what it did, the House has not before it the question of the defeat of any clause by the committee at all. The committee, of course, no doubt will take cognizance of their former action, but I am asking that the bill be placed before the committee in exactly the position in which it was when the committee were last considering it.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—One peculiar thing about the matter is that the hon. gentleman who moves to have this bill restored to the order paper, is the same hon. gentleman who moved that the bill be killed in committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I simply moved that the committee rise. It is not killed at all.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—It is a case of suspended animation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If it were in the position of a defeated bill, the proceeding which I am proposing to take could not be taken. It is because it is not killed that I am making this motion.

THE REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (126) "An Act respecting representation in the House of Commons." He said:—This is a very important measure connected with our constitutional system, but one which does not concern the constitution of this House. The principle of this bill is one which was very carefully considered in 1882, and again in 1892, and upon which the opinion of the country was taken at the last election. The principle upon which the bill that I am asking this House now to read the second time, is based upon a very ancient part of our constitutional system. It is interesting, in order to ascertain the principle upon which we should proceed, to notice something of the history of the House of Commons in the mother country. In the earlier stages of the existence of that body, there was no elective assembly. The freemen, who were the tenants of the Crown, appeared as the Commoners for the purpose of giving their assent to taxation. The work of legislation, so far as it existed, was in the King and the Lords. The Commons did not, for a very considerable period of time, take any part in legislation. The fact that they were the proprietors of a great portion of the property of England, and that it was a recognized principle of the constitution that a man's property could not be taken from him without his consent, gave to the Commons, in matters of taxation, a very important power, and the possession of that power enabled the Commons ultimately to win a status in respect to the ordinary business of legislation. At first, when subsidies were asked from the Commons, they expressed their readiness to grant those subsidies, or supplies, upon the condition that certain reforms, which they deemed necessary, should be conceded, and those reforms which were asked for by their petition were usually granted and when granted were put into the form of law, not with the assistance in any way of the Commons, but by the great officers of state after the session was over, and those early acts are found in the ancient rolls of Parliament. It was found by experience that very frequently the concessions which had been made were not, in fact, those which had been asked for, they were illusory, and so the Commons ultimately, instead of petitioning, asked for a substantial voice in the work of legislation itself. It was not until the 48th year of Henry III. that a Representative Assembly took the place of the general assembly of the King's tenants. Before that, whether the Commons were a large or small body depended upon the interest which they took in the questions which were likely to be brought forward for consideration, but after the principle of representation was introduced, then the representatives sat in the second chamber as the elected men, representing the freemen of the counties and the boroughs. In the early history of English representation, we find that the writs were sent to the sheriffs of the counties. The county or borough was the unit which was represented in the House of Commons, so that there was always a very close relation existing between the municipal organization and the district which sent a representative to Parliament. In the great baronies of the United Kingdom, no representatives were sent to the House of Commons. The parties held their estates from the lord of the district, and they attended his court, and not the court of the King, and so we find such counties as Chester, Durham and Pembroke that were represented in the Court of the Barons, were not represented in Parliament at all, and the county of Cornwall, when the King's eldest son was Earl of Cornwall, sent their representatives to the Court of the Baron of Cornwall, but afterwards when there was no eldest son, and the King himself held the duchy or earldom of Cornwall, then the free men of the county were counted the King's tenants and sent their representatives to Parliament, the same as any other party. Besides this, it was not Parliament that created the constituency; that was the prerogative of the Crown. We find Edward VI. creating many constituencies in that section of England which was thought to be strongly Protestant, so as to increase the power of the Protestant portion of the people of the United Kingdom in Parliament, and when Mary succeeded him, there was a corresponding increase of the representation by the Crown in that section of England in which the Catholic population were numerous and influential, and it was not until the time of Charles II. that the last constituency was created by prerogative. Newark is the last instance in which the Crown called into existence a constituency and issued a writ to give that constituency representation in Parliament. There were great changes taking place in the commerce of the country. New towns were springing into existence, and old towns were falling into decay, and in those cases, the Crown withheld its writ from the decayed boroughs and towns, and bestowed its writ upon the new districts which had become commercially important. When union took place between England and Scotland, and it was agreed that each should have a certain representation in the Commons of Great Britain, this prerogative of the Crown, was necessarily left in abeyance; it could not be exercised, and so after the union, no such constituency was called into existence; but in all the colonies, the Crown retained the prerogative of calling into existence constituencies, dividing the province or colony into electoral districts, giving to the freemen who had come to the colony, the right of election, and so the people of the province or colony had representation in a provincial legislature. It was admitted that Englishmen carried with them common law rights, so far as they were suited to their circumstances, in every district in to which they went for the purpose of settlement, and so they carried with them the right of representation. The Crown appointed an agent or governor to represent it, and gave him a commission authorizing him, as such agent, to call upon the people to elect representatives to an assembly, because the Crown alone had no power to change the law. It had no power to supply those local defects which experience showed it was necessary to provide for in every new colony, and it had no power of taxation, the power of taxation resting with those whom the people might return to the local legislature, but in all the old colonies that existed before the American revolution, except where such power was conferred specially by charter, the Crown did not recognize the right of the legislature to create electoral districts. Wherever such a measure was carried through the local legislature it was disallowed, nor did it permit the legislature to limit the period for which that legislature was called into existence. It continued to exist indefinitely—vacancies occurring, by death or otherwise, were supplied by a new election—until the Crown chose to exercise its prerogative to dissolve the legislature, and this it did whenever a fitting opportunity occurred. Since the union of England and Scotland a very important influence has been exercised in consequence of that union, and in consequence of the abeyance of the prerogative in respect to the creation by Parliament of electoral districts. I say a very important influence has been exercised over all the colonies, and this power, which was considered a prerogative of the Crown and which the Crown jealously guarded, has for a century been regarded as an ordinary power of the legislative assembly which the Crown shares in its legislative capacity, and which it does not any longer exclusively possess and exercise as a matter of prerogative connected with its administrative authority.

When the British North America Act was carried, it did not alter the character of the institutions which existed in the various provinces that were united. The British North America Act restricted those powers, so far as the legislative authority and the administrative authority, as an incident to that legislative authority, is concerned. The form of government which existed in each of the provinces that had an existence prior to the union, continued to exist after the union. We had responsible government in Old Canada; and in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick responsible government prevailed after the union exactly as it did before. The British North America Act did not destroy the governments of the provinces, and create new institutions. It perpetuated the existence of those that already existed, and left them unimpaired so far as this was possible. There was a legislative union between Ontario and Quebec, then Upper and Lower Canada. That legislative union, by the British North America Act, was dissolved, and the dissolution of that union made it necessary to make special provision to repair the two edifices that were created out of the one that had existed before. Their separation from each other, rendered certain repairs necessary, and those repairs were made. But that is a very different thing from wiping out of existence those political institutions that existed, and creating them anew. If hon. gentlemen will look at the British North America Act, they will find that it provides for certain changes taking place. The union between Upper and Lower Canada is dissolved, and the two provinces, Ontario and Quebec, spring out of that former union. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are perpetuated. The executive governments are perpetuated. There is no change intended in any of them, except in so far as necessary, to give them a complete autonomy, where the separation, to some extent, impairs that autonomy. When hon. gentlemen look at the terms of the British North America Act, they will see it states that it is desirable, not to call into existence provinces that did exist before, but to call into existence something that did not before exist, the federal government, the central authority. It does not pretend to call into existence the provinces which existed under that central authority. It does not pretend to call into existence their governments. It assumes they had an existence. You could not otherwise federally unite provinces. They could not express a desire to be federally united unless it was intended that their previous existence was to be continued and perpetuated. Let me call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the terms or words used in the preamble to this Act, which are as follows:—

Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion.

Now to be federally united, it was as necessary that the autonomy of the provinces should be perpetuated as that for certain purposes they could be coalesced into one Dominion under one government. Then this government is to be similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Would the hon. gentleman just repeat his last statement, as I did not hear it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say that it was necessary that the provinces should be federally united under a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. The constitution, to be similar in principle, is not necessarily federal. It is not to the federal feature of the constitution that reference here is made. It is not to the nature of the governments that are to exist in the provinces as such that reference is made, but it is to this one Dominion that is to exist over them, by which they are to be bound together in one political family, and that constitution, considered in itself, separated from the consideration of the form of government which would go to the provinces, is to be a government similar in principle, is to have a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. It is to have the same executive head. That executive head is to be advised by a political body similar to that which advises Her Majesty in the United Kingdom. That executive head is to be advised by a body having the same relation to Parliament, holding its office, continued in existence, upon the same terms and conditions as the advisers of the Crown are continued in the United Kingdom; and it is further declared:

And that whereas, on the establishment of the union by the authority of Parliament, it is expedient not only that the constitution of the legislative authority in the Dominion be provided for, &c.

The constitution of the legislative authority in the Dominion is to be provided for, and also the nature of the executive government therein is to be declared. There is a distinction made between the constitution of the legislative authority and the constitution of the executive. Her Majesty is the executive head. Her powers and prerogatives are the same in every part of the empire. Certain powers and prerogatives attach to her, as the head of the new government which has been called into existence. The Imperial Parliament does not bestow those powers upon her. The Imperial Parliament does not undertake to legislate in order that she may possess them. She already possesses them. They exist in her by virtue of her sovereign authority, and so all the Act does, so far as the executive authority is concerned, is to declare what that executive authority is. But that is not so with regard to legislative authority. This, prior to the passing of this Act, had no existence. It is by virtue of the Act that it is called into existence, therefore it became necessary to define what the legislative authority was and that legislative authority is set out and bestowed, by the authority of the Imperial Parliament, upon this Parliament, and upon this government. But Her Majesty, as executive head of this government, has no power conferred upon her by this Act, but that power is declared by this Act. In order to preserve this federal feature of the government of Canada, it is provided that, as between the provinces, the representation in the House of Commons shall be based on population, and that population is to be ascertained first after the union in 1871 and every ten years thereafter.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no authority to change the constitution in that regard. As between the provinces, there is a special provision made for the representation. The population, as ascertained at the census, is the basis of representation of each province of the Dominion for the succeeding ten years. But hon. gentlemen will see that that is a wholly distinct thing from the question of redistribution of seats. The question of redistribution of seats does not depend upon the taking of the census. It has nothing to do with that provision. It has no more to do with the census in the Dominion than in the province. Every province in the Dominion may amend or alter its representation. Let me suppose for a moment that we had a law at the union which was continued down until the present time, determining that no one except a freeholder should be an elector. Supposing that Parliament afterwards were to determine on an extension, and let me suppose that the number of freeholders was small in proportion to the population in some sections of the Dominion, and very large in proportion to the population in others. Now, it might happen, after you extend the franchise, that you might find it necessary to alter the distribution of the seats. There is nothing in the British North American Act that restrains any province from distributing the seats in the local legislature. There is nothing in the Act which interferes with the distribution of seats within a province in the Parliament of Canada, and as a matter of fact, let me say to hon. gentlemen, that this has been recognized and acted upon in more than one instance since confederation. In the redistribution of seats after the census of 1871, a division was made of the county of Huron that was regarded as very unfair by one of the representatives of that county. A bill was introduced transferring the township of Tuckersmith from one division of Huron to another division. That bill came before the House of Commons for consideration, and was carried through that House. No one suggested that, because there had been a redistribution immediately after the census, there could not be a further consideration of the subject. It went through the House of Commons without a question. We had in the House of Commons at that time some very eminent lawyers, John Hillyard Cameron, Edward Blake, Sir John A. Macdonald and others. No one, in all that assembly, for a moment supposed that Parliament had not power to redistribute the county of Huron as if no division had taken place. That question came before this House and this House rejected the measure, but not because a redistribution had been made under the census of 1871. Not at all. Any hon. gentleman who remembers the discussion that took place on that occasion, knows right well that the objection made here was, that, in the alteration of the representation of the constituency, the government ought to assume the responsibility of making that alteration, and the Senate would not support a measure on that subject which had not emanated from the government and for which the government had not made itself responsible. Let me mention another instance. Any hon. gentleman in this House, I have no doubt, will readily recall the changes that were made in 1892. Very important changes were made in the representation. Seats were redistributed, and places found for the additional members that certain provinces were entitled to. A redistribution of constituencies for the members from other provinces was called for under the constitution, it became necessary to diminish their numbers, but in the redistribution that took place, upon further consideration, the measure did not suit the government who were its authors, and in the following session, if hon. gentlemen will turn to the statutes of 1893, they will find there was a further measure amending the Redistribution Act, altering the boundaries of some constituencies which had been established under the redistribution of 1882.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Was that to make room for the new members?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, not at all, but because some mistakes had been made it was thought that a more perfect redistribution could take place.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—It was a mistake in the printing of the statute.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it was a further reconsideration of the subject by the House, and an amendment to the bill of the previous year.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It was all based upon the census.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So is this. Hon. gentlemen will see that. When the hon. gentleman says it was based on the census, no one pretends to say that you can give to any province a larger representation than that which it was entitled to under the census previous to the Redistribution Bill. It is not based on the representation as it then exists. By the census of 1891 the province of Ontario was found to be entitled to ninety-two members. Under the present bill nobody proposes to give it more; but I say this, and I am perfectly sure that the view which I express will be upheld without question and without division in any judicial body in this country, or in any judicial body to which we may appeal, that it is open to Parliament, if so disposed, to introduce a new distribution bill every year, so long as it does not depart from the principle which the census furnishes it.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It is a bad practice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is a question for consideration. In this matter I adopt the maxim of the Turks, that it is better to change every year than to be always in the wrong.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That is good.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I need not enter into a discussion of section 51 of the British North America Act. It is perfecly clear that it contemplated a redistribution of seats in accordance with the practice which prevailed in England, and that is that the division shall be made by a commission to whom the question of divisions may be referred, and not by Parliament itself.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I believe in England it is the custom to disfranchise boroughs where great bribery has been used. I want to know if West Elgin were disfranchised by the government, would another member be given to another constituency?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the practice that prevailed under the constitution of England were adopted, and a constituency were disfranchised for bribery, then the representation that that constituency had might be bestowed by Parliament upon some other constituency if Parliament were so disposed.

On the completion of the census, in the year 1871, and on each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides.

Now, what is meant by "such authority and in such manner"?

In England the manner is considered by Parliament It says who shall constitute the commission. It says how many seats each constituency shall be entitled to, and it leaves to that commission the division which is to be made in the constituencies that it is found necessary to alter, and upon which it is proposed to confer further representation. Now, let me say here a word with regard to county boundaries. The principle is one that has always been recognized in the mother country, and I mention that as an important matter for the serious consideration of those who have any regard to British precedents and to the practise in the Parliament of the United Kingdom. It is important, because there is such a thing as historic continuity in a county. A county that has been represented by a man of eminence, who has distinguished himself and conferred honour upon the constituency that sent him to Parliament, is one of whom the constituency may be proud, and after he has served his time, and disappeared from the political arena altogether, such a constituency has a natural aspiration to be represented by another man, if not equally distinguished, by a distinguished man. And so the principle, as it is stated by Mr. Gladstone, of continuity in a constituency does a great deal to aid the constituencies in aspiring to possess better representation than they would otherwise likely acquire. Under our constitution—and let me here say that in this federal union of the provinces, we have a constitution similar in principle to the English—it never was intended that you should draw a sharp line between the province and the Dominion, and to say that no interests that exist in the provinces shall be known or recognized as such in the Parliament of the Dominion. So far as union is concerned, this federation represents one body. We have provinces which are inseparable portions of that union composed of municipalities with decentralized power, and I say it never was intended, if these could be conveniently used by us or be made available by us, that we should deny ourselves the opportunity of doing so. If you turn back to the articles of confederation, you will see that, as they left the hands of the Quebec convention, and as they were taken over to England by the delegates who went from the various provinces to assist in the convention, in London, the division of each province into constituencies was for all time to be left to the local legislature of the province—that that division was not to be effected by us. Some representatives in London, who held in this country strong views in the opposite direction, succeeded in persuading their co-delegates to join them in conferring upon the Parliament of Canada, and withdrawing from the legislatures of the provinces, the power to distribute the seats in the Dominion. That was done, and the British North America Act represents the modified view, the changes, in this regard, that took place in the United Kingdom. But the principle of representation by population, between the provinces, was retained, and the organizations that existed were intended to be recognized so far as it was found practical and convenient, and so, when electoral districts were established for the return of members to the House of Commons, there were but two or three instances in which the principle of county boundaries was disregarded, and that was because two or three counties, lying nearly side by side, having very nearly the same population, the parties not wishing to decide to which of them the additional representative that it was necessary to bestow upon the provinces, should go, undertook to create constituencies in two or three instances in which the representative was given to a constituency made up of parts of two counties. That was done in the case of Kent and Lambton, and in one or two other instances, but in the vast majority of cases the principle of county boundaries was recognized. There was an obvious reason for that. Under the municipal organization, under your various local institutions, you have the people of the same county meeting together in their agricultural societies. You have them meeting together as jurymen. You have them meeting together in their county councils. You have them associated for various purposes. They become acquainted with each other; they know the capacity of each other. If a man exhibits ability in any one of these spheres, he becomes marked out to his neighbours as a proper man to represent them in the future, and so he may be chosen. But when you make up a constituency of parts of two or three counties put together, the people of whom never meet for any other purpose except once in four or five years for the purpose of an election, you have people who have no particular sympathy with each other. The very ablest men among the whole of them may be a man residing in a single township taken from another county, a stranger to all outside of his own township, who has no chance in that constituency to represent it. I have gone into many of those constituencies, organized in the way I have mentioned under the Act of 1882, and under the Act of 1892, and I found the people to-day as much divided from each other, as much strangers to each other, as void of sympathy with each other, no matter whether they are Conservatives or Reformers, as if no such union, for a political purpose, existed. They meet in convention once in four or five years, when the necessity for an election arises. They never meet at any other time. They choose their candidate; they generally choose that candidate from the section that has the most numerous population. The weaker sections have a very inferior chance of furnishing a representative, and a constituency so situated is a constituency without any of those organic elements which are recognized under the English parliamentary system as essential features in a healthful and proper representative institution. This matter was very fairly considered, and very fully discussed, in 1872, and the Prime Minister at that time, Sir John Macdonald, who introduced the Redistribution Bill of 1872, referred to this very subject. I ask those who have respect for his memory, and who admit that he was a man of unquestioned ability, to give their attention to what he said on the subject. I shall read from the parliamentary debates the exact words used on that occasion.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—From the official report?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—There was none published then.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There was a report made in 1872, and I am quoting his exact words from a quotation which appears in the Hansard of 1882.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I suppose my hon. friend is aware that Sir John Macdonald put himself on record very differently at a later period.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know that. I am just as well aware of it as the hon. gentleman. I am going to discuss that later. I have nothing to conceal. My hon. friend was not in the House at that time, but some of his friends were. I regarded that as a very unjust bill, but this House never questioned it. There had been no election on the subject, and there was no issue made of it prior to the distribution which took place. I shall now read from the Hansard of 1882, when this opinion was quoted, and I have myself read it in the original, and know that it is perfectly correct. It will be found on page 1205:

With respect to the rural constituencies, the desire of the government has been to preserve the representations for counties and subdivisions of counties as much as possible. It is considered objectionable to make representation a mere geographical term. (Hear, hear.) It is desired as much as possible to keep the representation within the county, so that each county, that is a municipality in Ontario, should be represented, and if it becomes large enough, divide it into ridings. That principle is carried out in the suggestions I am about to make. That rule was broken in 1867 in three constituencies, viz.: Bothwell, Cardwell and Monck; and I do not think, on the whole, that the experiment has been a successful one. I do not think it was unsuccessful as far as the representatives of these new constituencies themselves were concerned, as they are well and ably represented by the gentlemen who now hold seats for the constituencies; and I hope that if I am returned again to the next Parliament I shall meet those hon. members. But it is obvious that there is a great advantage in having counties elect men whom they know. Our municipal system gives an admirable opportunity to constituencies to select men for their deserts. We all know the process which happily goes on in western Ontario. A young man in a county commences his public life by being elected by the neighbours who know him to the township council. If he shows himself possessed of administrative ability he is made a reeve or deputy reeve of his county. He becomes a member of the county council, and as his experience increases and his character and ability become known he is selected by his people as their representative in Parliament. It is, I think, a grand system that the people of Canada should have the opportunity of choosing for political promotion the men in whom they have most confidence and of whose abilities they are fully assured. All that great advantage is lost by cutting off a portion of two separate counties and adding them together for electoral purposes only. Those portions so cut off have no common interest; they do not meet together and they have no common feeling except that once in five years they go to the polls in their own township to vote for a man who may be known in one section and not in the other. This tends towards the introduction and development of the American system of caucuses, by which wire-pullers take advantages for their political ability only and not for any personal respect for them. So that as much as possible, from any point of view, it is advisable that counties should refuse men whom they do not know, and when the representation is increased it should be by subdividing the counties into ridings.

* * * * * *

I omitted to state that it is not intended to divide either Ottawa or Hamilton. Although we have adopted in old Canada the principle of electoral divisions, it has not been considered in England a proper mode of representation, inasmuch as it totally excludes minorities, and in some constituencies in England they have introduced the system we now propose for the purpose of protecting minorities. It is therefore proposed that Hamilton shall return two members.

* * * * * *

He did not intend to discuss the details, but agreed that the principle of the division of the counties adopted was judicious, making the electoral divisions conterminous with the counties; and that it was not well to urge the doctrine of population too far, although it should be regarded as far as possible. The principle of representation by population had been properly disregarded, the changes having been made evidently for political reasons, and he was not surprised that the bill had been brought down at this late stage of the session, when there was scarcely time to discuss it.

These words the hon. gentleman who, for so many years, led the Conservative party, spoke in 1872 when the bill was under consideration. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield says that Sir John Macdonald changed his mind on this question. I do not think he did; he changed his practice, but he gave a reason for that change of practice that Sir Oliver Mowat had gerrymandered some constituencies for the local legislature, and he proposed to follow his example. There was no principle recognized in the division of 1882. I have in my possession the map which was prepared for the division for 1892, with the vote of every polling division upon it, and with a careful estimate of what the political effect of the division should be, and the same in 1882. Hon. gentlemen knew right well that no such calculation can be made by the present government in respect to this bill. A certain number of counties in the province of Ontario are entitled to return under it one member and they are left undisturbed. There are certain other counties that are entitled to return more than one member, and a division of each was made prior to 1882; they are left undisturbed. Then there are other counties which it is necessary to divide, some to return two, some three members, and the division of these counties is left to three eminent judges, the Chief Justice of Ontario, Sir George Burton, the Chancellor of Ontario, Sir John Boyd, and Mr. Justice Falconbridge. Mr. Justice Falconbridge was well known before his elevation to the bench as an active member of the Conservative party.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—He was never in Parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Neither was either of the others. I do not know that Chancellor Boyd ever gave a vote.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You are going to bring him into politics now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know what his politics were. I know what Judge Falconbridge's was, and I believe the Chief Justice of Ontario was a Liberal, but as to Sir John Boyd's politics, I say I do not know that he ever voted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not make any difference. He is an honest man any way.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He is, and I am not calling in question the honesty or uprightness of any of those gentlemen, I think they will make a perfectly fair division. We are acting upon the interpretation which we gave in 1892 to this, the provision of section 51 of the British North America Act, which authorizes Parliament to make this division through some constituted authority, and that authority we have undertaken to constitute in such a way that it will enjoy the complete confidence of well-informed men of all parties. It is sometimes said that in acting upon the principle that county boundaries are to be preserved, we are departing from the principle of representation by population. I do not think so. I think we are acting on that principle. Of course, you cannot have a pedantic equality in all the circumstances, but you are giving to the largest constituencies the largest representation.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Toronto for instance.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Toronto has five members.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—With 200,000 people.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Montreal has 250,000 people, and the late administration gave Montreal only five representatives. My hon. friend did not question that. Montreal has some eight representatives from rural districts outside. In anything that affects the well being of the city, these men are as much the representatives of Montreal as if they represented a constituency in the city, and the same with Toronto. Toronto has to-day four or five members sitting in the House of Commons who are elected by outside constituencies. Are not these men as much devoted to the interests of Toronto, when a question comes up for consideration, as if they were returned for some division of Toronto? Every hon. gentleman knows right well that there is some advantage to these men, and some advantage to the country, under this system, of taking men of professional or commercial distinction from the city to represent rural constituencies. There is some advantage in that, and if the city were to insist upon full representation according to its numbers, the probability is that outside constituencies would cease to select urban residents as their candidates. I say, then, that there is an advantage in that system. There is another thing which cannot well be lost sight of, and that is, very often, in new districts, you have a large area with only a very moderate population, and the difficulty of canvassing—the expense associated with it, the difficulty of a member remaining in touch with his constituency, is such that it may very well be that while you have more than the unit of representation in the city, you have less in some of the rural districts. But this principle of representation by population was not a principle that was adhered to or recognized in the bill of 1882, or in that of 1892. Let me take Essex, for instance. The county of Essex had at the census of 1881, 46,000 people. Twenty-one thousand or a little less than 21,000 was the unit of measurement. Now, giving the county two members there were 4,000 of an excess of population. If you were to undertake to give representation by population then, one township should have been taken from the east end of Essex and attached to Kent in order to reduce the number represented in Essex by the two members representing the community. Any hon. gentleman who will go over the census will see that in such a Redistribution Bill as that of 1882, and again that of 1892, there was not the slightest regard had to the principle of representation by population, and the breaking up of county boundaries and the departure from the principle laid down by Sir John Macdonald in 1872, was not due in the slightest degree to any such consideration. No such motive had the slightest influence upon those who made the division at that time. For instance, in the province of Nova Scotia, Inverness had nearly 26,000 inhabitants, Halifax City with two members had 68,000 inhabitants; that was 34,000 for each member. Halifax would have been entitled to three members if you were going to adhere strictly to the principle of representation by population. Then there was the county of Victoria with 12,470 represented by a member, and Queen's had but one-third of the number of inhabitants that was given a single representative in the city of Halifax. Then let me take Westmorland, in New Brunswick. Westmorland had nearly 38,000 population with one member; Queen's had 14,000 of a population with one member; Sunbury 6,500 with one member. That was the condition of things in these provinces after the Redistribution Bill of 1882, so that it is preposterous to argue that the Redistribution Bill at that time broke down county boundaries and united fractions of different counties for the purpose of giving to the country the principle of representation by population in the constituency. Then when we come to the province of Quebec, we find that Drummond and Arthabaska had over 37,000; Rimouski 30,000, Hochelaga 36,000, Montcalm 13,000, and so on. I mention these cases for the purpose of showing that no such principle as representation by population was recognized in 1882, nor was it in 1892. Then let me take Ontario. If you were to adopt the principle of representation by population in the arithmetical sense, and to break down county boundaries and to undertake to form constituencies of equal population, you would destroy all that organic life which pertains to a constituency made up of people who are in the habit of acting together, for various public and other purposes, as jurymen, as members of agricultural societies, as municipal councillors, and as voters in municipal elections and elections for the local legislatures.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN — Sir Oliver Mowat did not pay much attention to these rules.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think he paid a good deal of attention to them. I will have the maps here for the information of my hon. friend. In some cases there are departures from the rule, but the cases are very few. But, Oh, the number of cases in which the rule was departed from in 1882 when fifty-five constituencies were altered, in the province of Ontario alone, and this House made no protest against the wrong that was being done. Let me mention a few cases. North Leeds, 12,400; South Grenville, 13,000; Frontenac, nearly 15,000; Monck, 15,000; Lennox, 16,000; Cardwell, 16,000; Kent, 36,000, East Simcoe, 28,000; South Simcoe, 26,000; East Elgin, 26,000—those are instances to show that the principle of representation by population was not that which governed those who prepared that measure. Under that measure and taking the census of 1881, which was the basis of that measure, you have eight constituencies representing a population of 111,000. That is 13,870 instead of 21,000. You have eight other constituencies representing a population of 115,000 or about 15,000 to the constituency. You have eight others representing 213,000, or 26,600 to the constituency. So that in one case the first eight constituencies, that ought to have five members, have eight, and in the other case, which ought to have five members, had eight. And so you have the other eight, that ought to have had eleven, under represented by eight. I am quite sure every hon. gentleman will see that in that measure the principle of representation by population did not govern, so that the reason for the measure was something wholly different. Let me mention some of the facts, and my hon. friend sitting opposite me I hope will bear testimony to the accuracy of the statement which I make——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Wait till I hear it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not asking the hon. gentleman to testify in advance. The county of Kent was entitled to two representatives at least. It had 54,000 people. 42,000 was the number that, according to population, should be represented by two members It had 12,000 to spare. Then two was the smallest number that the county should have returned. A portion of Kent was attached to the county of Lambton, that had 2,000 people less than Kent, and the remaining portion of Lambton was given two members, that is, Lambton, that had 2,000 people less had three townships taken off, and the remaining portion given two members. That portion of Lambton taken off, and a portion of Kent taken off, formed the county of Bothwell. Then there was a portion of the county of Bothwell, the townships of Orford and Howard and the town of Ridgetown that gave a Liberal majority of upward of 400, were taken off the county of Bothwell and added to the county of West Elgin which was already largely Liberal. Why were those townships taken from the county of Kent and put onto the county of West Elgin?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—What was the population of West Elgin?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—42,000 odd, a little more than was necessary to entitle them to two members.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—West Elgin?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, Elgin. The town of St. Thomas, if taken off East Elgin and put into West Elgin, would have given them enough for two members. Of course East Elgin had no prescriptive right to the town of St. Thomas.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It has had it since the union of the provinces, I think.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend says that because the town of St. Thomas which is a part of the county of Elgin, was in the first instance put in East Elgin, that that was an insuperable bar, as I understand him, to Parliament putting the town of St. Thomas into West Elgin, although it is of the same county. But to take two townships and a town out of the county of Kent, that never was in West Elgin, that did not act with West Elgin, and forms no part of West Elgin, for no purpose whatever, to take that off the county of Kent and put it in the county of Elgin was a most proper thing to do.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—If the hon. gentleman will look at the populations of East and West Elgin, as constituted, with those two townships, he will find they are nearly on a par.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is in trouble again—I am speaking of the municipal county of Elgin—the county that under the law in known as the county of Elgin, contained at the time 42,000. Now, 21,000 is the unit, a one-ninety-second part of the province of Ontario; so that the county of Elgin had a sufficient number to entitle it to two members and a few hundred to spare. If the county of East Elgin was unduly large, and the county of West Elgin unduly small, there was a simple way of rectifying that inequality and of equalizing the constituency, and that was by taking the town of St. Thomas out of East Elgin and putting it into West Elgin.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—There was just as much difference between East and West Elgin, if you take half of St. Thomas which was a municipality by itself, just as much as one of the townships was, you might as well take the city of St. Thomas and divide it into two as to take one of those townships which my hon. friend mentions from Kent. They are all on a par.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I happen to know personally of the matter and my hon. friend does not.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Yes, I was thirteen years in the county.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.—I am glad to hear it, and I hope my hon. friend will see the injustice of the proposition he is now putting forward. Take the city of St. Thomas, West Elgin had about 14,000. It is a larger constituency than a good many of those that were left, even as it was. East Elgin contained 28,000. At that time St. Thomas had about 7,000 people, and if you take St. Thomas off East Elgin, you would reduce its population by 7,000. If you put 7,000 with 14,000 it would make 21,000, and if you take 7,000 from 28,000 it would leave 21,000. So that if you transfer the town of St. Thomas, according to the population at that time from East Elgin to West Elgin you would have two constituencies as nearly as possible equal.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It was a municipality by itself, and we would have to cut it in two.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The town of St. Thomas had 7,000 at that time.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Under one municipality.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is only one municipality in St. Thomas, and taken off East Elgin and put on West Elgin it would have made two constituencies about equal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend the Minister of Justice is finding fault because Elgin was not divided in the manner in which he thought it ought to have been divided.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It is the only way it could be divided.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have had a good many interruptions, and if I interrupt my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, I hope he will not lose his equanimity.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not if the hon. gentleman only interrupts once, which is all I have done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend speaks of the wrong that has been done. It is quite right to take off two townships and put them on East Elgin, but it would be wrong to take one township from East Elgin and put it on West Elgin. Let me see what these gentlemen did besides that. They found East Elgin had too large a number and they took South Dorchester off East Elgin and put it on East Middlesex. They took the township of Euphemia off Lambton and put it on West Middlesex. They took the township of Stephen off South Huron and put it on North Middlesex. I need not go over the whole of the divisions, but as I have pointed out already, it is clear, beyond all question, that they were not made for the purpose of equalizing the constituencies. They did not equalize them. They left the difference as great between the constituencies after the changes were made as before. They cut up county boundaries and they brought people together once in five years for elections that otherwise did not meet at all. Besides those principles upon which I think we ought to proceed and those practices which I think we ought to avoid, there is this fact, that upon this question Parliament has a mandate from the country. The present administration, and those who support them, went to the country upon this question, as one of the questions on which they asked an expression of public opinion. There was the question of the adoption of the provincial franchise; there was the question of the restoration of county boundaries and the principle of representation by population within those limits, as far as it could be conveniently adopted. Those have been adhered to in this bill. We have also, as I pointed out, not taken into our own hands the redistribution of seats. We have not come to Parliament, as the government did in 1872, in 1882 and in 1892, with a measure carried through the House of Commons by a majority altering the boundaries of constituencies of those who were politically dominant for the time being, and coming to this House and receiving, within a remarkably short period of time, the ratification of that measure, without any protest by any hon. gentleman who supported the administration. I think, with the undoubted expression of public opinion in the country—the returning to Parliament of a majority of fifty members supporting the principle of this bill—that this House will not consider it any portion of its duty, to call in question the propriety of the measure, and to object to its becoming law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

BUFFALO AND FORT ERIE BRIDGE COMPANY'S BILL.

REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved:

That the resolution adopting the report of the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours upon the Bill (No. 96) from the House of Commons, intituled: "An Act respecing the Buffalo and Fort Erie Bridge Company," be rescinded and that the said report be referred back to the said committee for reconsideration.

He said :—In the absence of the hon. gentleman from Brandon I have been asked to move the resolution which appears on the motion paper in his name. I am happy to say that the misunderstanding which prevailed between the promoters of the bill and my hon. friend from Monck has been happily explained away, and I understand my hon. friend will consent to the motion passing.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—As far as I am concerned, if the House consider it right and proper that we should grant this motion, and will carry out the understanding they have come to—and I have every reason to believe they will—I have no objection whatever. We will see in committee what they will do.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (J) "An Act respecting Usury."—(Mr. Dandurand.)

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EXTENSION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the third reading of Bill (138) "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal."

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I understood yesterday that this bill was to be postponed until the Drummond County Railway Bill was taken up. I have given notice of an amendment that I intended to move to this bill. I thought it was understood that the consideration of this bill should be deferred until the Drummond County Railway Bill had been considered, because if the Drummond County Railway Bill were rejected this bill would be unnecessary, and vice versa, Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that that rule would apply to either bill.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—This has been an exceptional bill all along, and we considered both bills together.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is what we are doing. We are going on with the other bill immediately. It would be impossible to do otherwise than to pass one first.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Was not the converse proposition, as laid down by the hon. leader of the opposition, adopted; that if the Grand Trunk Bill passed, the Drummond County Bill passed de facto?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was the fact.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I might mention to my hon. friend that the Grand Trunk Bill might be passed, and they might utilize, under lease, the Drummond County Road, or they might make other arrangements by continuing the Grand Trunk to Lévis and Quebec, but if the Drummond County Railway should be purchased, and the Grand Trunk not leased, then you would have a road beginning nowhere and ending nowhere. The understanding yesterday was that the Drummond County Bill should be laid over until the government had prepared another clause to the bill, providing that it should not come into operation, nor the purchase be completed, until the agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway had been concurred in and agreed to by the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I move :

That the clause compelling the government to transfer to the Grand Trunk Railway at Montreal all unsigned western bound traffic, be amended by adding thereto, with "approval of the shippers, consignors or owners of freight destined for western points."

I gave notice correctly, but it was published incorrectly. The notice was that when the third reading of the Grand Trunk Railway Bill was called, I would move this amendment. But in the minutes it appears as an amendment to the Drummond County Railway Bill. Everything is wrong here. My intention was to give the parties having unconsigned freight in Montreal the option that their freight should not be transferred to the Grand Trunk without their consent. I think it is only reasonable. A great deal of freight goes to Montreal unconsigned. Under this arrangement all the unconsigned freight would be handed over holus bolus to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I look upon this clause as a combine of the worst kind, and I want to remove that feature from the bill. Therefore I say that it should be amended in accordance with my motion. If they do not object all right, but parties should have the power to approve or disapprove of their freight being transferred at Montreal. I do not think it will injure any one, but it will remove that hideous feature of the case—being a combine of the worst kind between the Grand Trunk and the Dominion of Canada. I do not think there is any precedent for it. I do not believe, if the records of the whole world were searched, that we would find an arrangement of this nature. It would be a great adventage if this amendment were accepted, and it could do no harm. If those parties having unconsigned freight think proper to object to their freight being transferred to the Grand Trunk, they should have the same privileges as owners of the consigned freight. I think the amendment will be an improvement to the bill, and I cannot see that it will injuriously affect any interest.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman should have moved it at the third reading.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—This is the third reading.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not proposing to raise a question of order. The hon. gentleman can move his amendment, I suppose, at the last motion, that the bill do pass. though I have never known it occur. I wish to say a word or two on the merits of the proposition. The hon. gentleman thinks there is nothing like giving a dog a bad name. He says this is a combine of the worst kind. If there was no railway competition below Montreal, I could understand that there might be some force in the hon. gentleman's contention, but the fact is that we have at the present time at least one railway competing with the Intercolonial Railway, and there is no possibility of the rates being made unduly high, so that I think the combine argument fails. When you get to Lévis, there are two or three roads, and shippers who wish to have low freight can use some other road.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I rise to a question of order. There is nothing before the House which the hon. gentleman can discuss. We had better have the motion, if it is in order, put in the Speaker's hands.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The bill has been rattled through the House so fast that nobody can understand it. Some thought that we were dealing with the Grand Trunk and some with the Drummond County Railway Bill. As far as the hon. gentleman's argument is concerned——

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. If I cannot discuss the motion, the hon. gentleman has no right to reply to my remarks.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I am only explaining.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is all I was doing.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I did not understand, and I do not think any member of the House understood what was before the House. I may not have made this motion in time, but I was following what I understood, rightly or wrongly, was the arrangement of yesterday. I merely want an opportunity to put this before the House and let the House vote upon it. I want to have it put on record that I took this course. As far as the hon. gentleman's argument is concerned, there is no force in that at all, because this is freight at Montreal going west.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—The hon. gentleman can move that the bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It has been read the third time.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—In order to give the hon. gentleman from Rideau an opportunity to put his motion before the House, I move that the bill do not now pass, but that it be amended as he has suggested.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend cannot make that motion.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—Yes, he can.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The bill has been read the third time, and the House can only accept or reject it at the passing.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I remember some years ago a motion was made that a bill do not pass, and the bill was defeated. If a similar motion carries here, then the bill can be referred back.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I merely want the thing to be understood fairly and squarely. I do not care how you do it. I hope the leader of the government will not take advantage of my failure to understand the position of the bill.

The SPEAKER—This motion is in order only with the consent of the House. If it is the pleasure of this House, I can put the motion, but not otherwise.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—If hon. gentlemen do not consent you will have a hard time with other bills.

The SPEAKER—Is it the pleasure of the House that this bill pass?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yeas and nays.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend, on reflection, I am sure will see that the proposition he made was not one that was tenable. It has reference to all freights not consigned. Freight might be from Russia, Sweden, Germany or elsewhere, sent to Canada. On the hon. gentleman's proposition, that freight would have to be detained in Montreal until you could communicate with the consignor.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That would be the effect of it, and it would not be reasonable at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. gentleman is out of order. The motion was put and the yeas and the nays asked for, and nobody has a right to speak after the members are called in.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following vote:—

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill (133) "An Act to authorize the acquisition by the Dominion of the Drummond County Railway."

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the bill be not read the third time, but that it be amended by adding the following clause:—

This Act shall not come into force until after the bill of the present session, entitled "An Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal," is brought into operation by the Governor General's proclamation, as required by the said Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I yesterday gave notice that I would move the amendmend which appears in my name on the notice paper. I might say this was made at the suggestion of my hon. friend from Amherst, who observed the omission in the bill. I beg to withdraw it in favour of the amendment moved by the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Does the hon. gentleman opposite think there is the slightest danger of the Grand Trunk Railway refusing to accept the bill which has been passed? The government have given everything the Grand Trunk Railway Company have asked, and the shareholders will hold up both hands in favour of it. I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but I venture to predict that as soon as this bill passes the stock of the Grand Trunk will go up.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Buy some of it now.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I do not intend to vote against this amendment, but I should like to understand it. The Grand Trunk Railway Bill has passed, and I do not see how this can affect it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think, personally, the amendment is necessary. I have no doubt the Grand Trunk arrangement will be carried out, that it will receive the necessary support of those interested in the company, but some hon. gentlemen in the House seemed to think it was necessary to make assurance doubly sure, and suggested the amendment, and for the sake of facilitating the passage of the bill I concurred in that suggestion, and so we proposed this amendment. Of course if the Grand Trunk stockholders or shareholders were to decide against the arrangement which the managers of the company have made with the government, it would not go into operation, and the proclamation would not issue, and in that event it is simply provided that the other provision as to the Drummond County Railway should not come into operation either. I have no doubt that both will come into operation when they receive the sanction of Parliament, but as this amendment was asked for by some hon. gentlemen who supported the bill, I thought it was only courteous to them that we should agree to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I do not think that this amendment which has just been passed changes the position of the bill very much. Still it may satisfy some. But there is another point on which I am not satisfied. It is admitted, I think, by every hon. gentleman that if the contract with the Grand Trunk Company was broken we would find ourselves with the Drummond County Railway on our hands, beginning nowhere and ending in the same way. The question is, can this contract with the Grand Trunk be broken? Supposing the Grand Trunk does not well and faithfully perform all the covenants and agreements undertaken by this contract, would the government have a right to break the contract? I think it is the essence of a contract that if one party does not comply with all the conditions, the other party can break the contract. In that case, as it is not a contract with the Drummond County Railway, but a sale, the government will remain in possession of the road. I understand that the objection might be made, if the House reject the Drummond County Bill where will the government be? They will have no communication with the Grand Trunk. That is an entire mistake, because the Grand Trunk already has a road from Richmond to Point Lévis in better condition than the Drummond County Road.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—The reason why I think it is in better condition is that the time tables show about the same time for the two, although one is longer than other.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—There is a difference of three-quarters of an hour.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—On one express it is about the same thing. At all events, it is easily understood that at this moment, when the Grand Trunk is almost a necessity, there may be some understanding, but the Grand Trunk from Richmond to Point Lévis is certainly one of the best roads in America. It has been built without regard to expense. Everybody who travels on it knows what condition it is in. If we reject the Drummond County Bill, we will still have the same connection with Point Lévis by the Grand Trunk, and I am sure they would be glad to make another arrangement with the government to take that road, and by taking that road they would prevent the destruction of that country. That road is serving a large section, which will not be as well served if it is a local road. I think that we should not pass the Drummond County Bill. I therefore move that this bill be not now read the third time, but that it be read the third time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. MCCALLUM—I wish to say a word of explanation as to why I shall vote for the six months' hoist. I do not propose to sanction this arrangement when I take into consideration what has been said by the members of the House about it. The hon. gentleman from Brandon said this measure was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity. He may have changed his mind about it, but I have not changed mine. The leader of the opposition said it was a damnable bill. What change has come over these hon. gentlemen? Have they been sufficiently satisfied so that this new bill is acceptable to them after all they have said about it? It is not satisfactory to me, and I shall not vote for it. I am just as anxious as anybody to get the Intercolonial to Montreal, but at the same time I have not been satisfied about this matter. Therefore I do not think I should be doing my duty if I gave a silent vote on this question, because it is well known, from the discussion which took place here and what people have stated, that this is the same arrangement that we had two years ago. For that reason, I do not intend to vote for it. Other people may have new light. I should like to know from where the new light has come. I have not been able to see it and I have tried to look for it. Probably I am not so bright as some people who get light, but if I had characterized the bill as conceived in iniquity and brought forth in sin, and as a damnable bill, I would want considerable light before I would support it. I have opposed it from the beginning, and I have not changed my mind at all. We hear of contractors like the hon. gentleman from Glengarry going over that road who say that they could build two roads for what we are paying for this. I spoke the other day of something being for the boy in it and helping the machine, there is no doubt in my mind there is something being done in that way. Of course I think so, but I cannot think too loud. They may be operating the same as MacNish, and I have no doubt we will have a MacNish who will confess the whole thing by and by when we get it before the courts. I have given sufficient reasons why I should not vote for the bill, and I hope I will satisfy the people of the country when I record my vote against this bill.

The amendment was lost on the following division: —

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (154) "An Act further to amend the Customs Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This bill is promoted by one of the provinces of the Dominion, and perhaps other provinces, to enable sportsmen from the United States who take out a license in Canada under certain conditions to take back with them a part of their spoils. I think in most of the provinces they are limited to two deer, and this authorizes the Governor General in Council to make regulations for the carrying out of the proposal to allow them to take the carcasses out of the country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Unless this bill is restricted in its operation I should be inclined to cast my vote against it. If I understand the bill, it is to change the Customs Act so as to permit the exportation of deer. Is it only to the extent to which they may be shot in the different provinces? If it goes beyond that, then it would be dangerous.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not beyond that. It is at the instance of the provinces.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a matter of little consequence to me. I am not wedded to what the provinces want. When I had the honour of being in the government, we forbade the exportation of deer, cariboo, moose and that character of game for the reason, that the Canadian woods were being depleted of these animals. Foreigners used to come in by hundreds during the shooting season and export deer by thousands until you could scarcely get a deer in our woods. I am speaking particularly of Ontario. Then the Federal Government passed a law prohibiting the exportation of deer. After that the provinces took the question into consideration and passed Acts for the preservation of game. In Ontario no one is permitted to shoot more than two deer. If the licensee, whether he be from the United States or Europe, obtains a license, do I understand that under the law he is restricted to the killing of two deer, and that if that be the case will he be restricted under the operation of this Act to the exportation of two deer?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know the law in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, but in the province of Quebec a huntsman can kill two moose, two cariboo and three deer within what is termed zone No. 1. In zone No. 2 the right to kill is extended to four moose instead of two, and is restricted to two cariboo and three deer. In all cases, however, deer are prevented from being shot. What I should like to know, before proceeding any further, is whether the wording of this Act would prohibit the exportation of more than two deer in Ontario, and two moose and two cariboo or three deer in the province of Quebec. Perhaps some gentleman from the maritime provinces could tell us the law in those provinces. The bill reads:

For regulating the number of deer and parts thereof which may be exported in any year when shot under provincial or territorial authority in Canada.

That seems to me to restrict the exportation to the number they can shoot at present, but if the law were changed in either of these provinces, and they were permitted to kill deer indiscriminately, then they would have the right to export indiscriminately, and whether that should be restricted, or whether we should wait until that event occurs, is a question for the hon. minister to consider.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—As far as I can learn, this bill is sought for more by the agents of steamboats and hotels and railway companies and others who are interested in that way, who think that by the passage of this law, allowing those coming in from the United States to shoot to carry off their game, it will be the means of affording additional attractions to travellers, and so increase the number of people visiting the different parts of the country, and bring no money to the railways and hotels. I do not believe that any sportsman really wants a bill of this kind. I am sorry to say that I was unable to obtain an opinion from those I wrote to in Toronto since this bill was introduced. I know that they are true sportsmen, but, unfortunately, they are all out of town. My objection to the bill is that it would tend to increase the number of pot hunters, who would come to the country to shoot and take away game with them for the purpose of sale. In Ontario, the law as it stands limits the shooting to two deer for each person, but even with that limit there are ways and means found of getting round the regulations, and it is extremely difficult for the game wardens to prevent evasions of the law, although in the last few years they have been doing their best to enforce the law and do their duty. The results have been that in may parts of Ontario the deer have increased. If this bill is passed, I think it will add to their difficulties, and we shall have a number of people mere pot hunters coming in for the sake of shooting and selling the deer. As to the objection made by my hon. friend that the deer, if not allowed to be taken away would be left to rot on the ground, there is no danger of that. Any one who shoots a deer, can easily dispose of it. As far as I am concerned, I should be very sorry if the bill passed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may say, for the information of the hon. leader of the opposition, who asked something about the law in the lower provinces, that in Nova Scotia the exportation of moose hides and carcasses and cariboo hides and carcasses is strictly forbidden by customs law, and while this bill does not expressly mention moose, I think the term "deer" would certainly cover cariboo, and might cover moose. As one interested in the preservation of game in Nova Scotia, I should be very sorry to see the bill passed. The community, as every hon. gentleman knows, is divided into two classes on the subject of game. There are those who want to make the most possible money out of the game just to-day, and there is the class who wish to preserve the game so that the game may afford amusement and profit to future generations, as well as to the present generation. It seems to me, hon. gentlemen, that in the present instance the Minisster of Customs has been perhaps, to a certain extent, unduly influenced by the people who are always in the majority, who want to make a little money here and now It is perfectly true that if you could guarantee that this alteration of the law, when it went into operation, would not be abused, there might not be a great deal of fault to find with it. But, as a matter of fact, there will be all sorts of abuses and frauds connected with it. That has been the experience of every one who has had anything to do with the enforcement of the game laws. Pot hunters, and others who are anxious to make a little money out of game, are ready with all sorts of tricks and subterfuges and even fraud in order to succeed in their object. A difficulty will occur at once. This enactment proposes that the Governor in Council may make orders for regulating the number of deer and parts thereof which may be exported in any year, &c. You will have this sort of thing happening : each man, as I understand it, in the province of Ontario who procures a license is allowed to shoot two deer. Then you will have a man come and ask to export two deer, a man who has been hunting and perhaps has not shot any deer, and you will find the pot hunter who has killed a dozen deer making use of people who have not shot any to export the whole dozen. I am satisfied that it will be almost impossible to prevent the evasion of this law. I do not think there is any large class of the population who are asking for the change. With respect to the game of the country, Providence put it here in the first place for the use of the inhabitants of the country, and I do not think that, for the purpose of meeting the views of a few gentlemen who come here, a large diminution of the game should be encouraged. If there was a provision that a man who had shot a deer might take the horns away with him I should not so much object, but when we come to admitting hides and carcasses the inducement is too great. It is not a measure on which the fate of which the government depends, and I propose to use my right as an independent member to vote against the bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As I explained, the Minister of Customs was very much impressed with the representations of sportsmen who come into the country and spend a good deal of money. I speak only of the province of Ontario, for I have no knowledge of the game laws of the other provinces. A sportsman is allowed to kill two deer. These sportsmen spend very large amounts of money in the country purchasing equipments, food, tents, &tc., and employ guides and others, and they represented that it seemed very hard that, having paid their money for their licenses, they would not be allowed to take away the deer they were allowed to kill. I see the force of the argument that the privilege under this bill may be abused. I presume it would all depend on the arrangement made by the Customs Department. All this clause does is to allow the Governor in Council to make such an arrangement as will enable them to permit the number of deer a sportsman is allowed to kill to be taken out of the country. I quite see the opportunity for abuse.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—As I understand it, every man is obliged to take out a license?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—For which he has to pay $25. He is supplied with tags by the Customs department, so as to furnish evidence that the deer was killed by the same person who had the license. I think if a man shoots two deer under such circumstances he should be allowed to take them away. Under the present arrangement, it is impossible to deceive the Customs Department. They are obliged to present the tags at the customs when making the entries. Am I right?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I think every precaution is taken to prevent more than two deer being killed and taken out of the country by any one sportsman. If you come to the conclusion that sportsmen should not kill any deer, then make restrictions, but if you think two deer is a reasonable number to kill, you shoul allow the sportsmen to take away two deer, because it is better to have them taken away than to leave them to rot in the woods.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They are not allowed to rot in the woods.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—What can they do with them?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Sell them in the country.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—As long as a customs tag represents a deer, what difference does it make in whose hands it is?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me the opposition to passing the bill is illogical and inconsistent, when we take into consideration the rights of the provinces in regulating the game laws. If the provinces have the right to protect these animals and to deal with them exclusively, I see no reason why the power should not be vested in the Governor in Council, when any particular province makes such representations, to permit the exportation of property which admittedly belongs to the province. It seems a most selfish ground to take, and is simply a dog-in-the-manger policy. The animals belonging to the province, the power to deal with them is vested in the province.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The legislation forbidding the exportation of these hides and carcasses was introduced at the instance of the provinces acting in their legislative capacity. Now, is there any evidence that the provinces in the same capacity, have asked to have this prohibition removed?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, I can very well understand a province becoming overzealous in regard to a particular matter, and legislating without fully contemplating the results which might arise from a particular line of policy, and afterwards seeing the mistake they have made in asking the Dominion to pass restrictive legislation. I understand from the Secretary of State that this legislation has been asked for by the provinces.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The province of Ontario I spoke of.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman said certain United States gentlemen have made representation to the Minister of Customs.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I take it for granted the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State is correct, that the province of Ontario has desired this legislation, and it is legislation of a nature which should be passed. Prohibitions of this nature should be of an elastic character—should be possessed of such flexibility that the right should be granted when certain grounds are submitted to the Governor in Council to induce the Governor in Council to use and exercise the right. If the power is vested in the Governor in Council, all the ills which have been pointed out by my hon. friend from Halifax cannot possibly arise. I certainly shall support the bill.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—The province of New Brunswick gets a revenue of six or seven thousand dollars a year from licenses. They charge outsiders about $20 each and give them the privilege of killing so many moose, and it seems very strange, when you give them the privilege of killing so many, that you do not allow them to take them away. In many instances moose has been left to rot. Six or seven thousand dollars is quite an object to the government. Every deer costs from fifty to a hundred dollars to the man who kills him. I think it is a great mistake to prevent the exportation of these animals.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We must not confuse the functions of the provinces in this matter with ours. The preservation of game in this province belongs to the province. It does not belong to us, and I do not think it is any portion of our duty to undertake to frustrate the policy of the province, even though we may think that policy is not the wisest or the best policy to pursue. The propriety of permitting foreigners to come in and shoot game, which may have the effect of greatly diminishing the abundance of game of any particular kind in the country, is fairly open to question, but in the provincial legislature and not in the Parliament of Canada. What we are undertaking to do here is, not to decide whether it is best or wisest for us to permit people from the United States or any other foreign country to come in and obtain licenses to kill game in any one province in accordance with the provisions of the law; but where a province has granted to a party from abroad a license, and he has killed game in the country under that license, and in conformity with the law, whether we should allow him to take that game away with him or not. I cannot myself see any good reason why we should not allow him to take with him to his home what the local legislature have, under their license, allowed him to kill. If it is found by experience that an immense number of foreigners would come into this country and obtain licenses for killing game, and that the result of permitting them to take the game away was simply to greatly increase the number of licenses, that is a matter which at a very early day would come under the attention of the local legislature in each province, and they might amend their laws, but as long as they legislate in the direction in which they do, I do not myself see any reason why the Dominion should not permit the parties to take with them the game which they have killed. The laws of the several provinces may be very different with regard to the preservation or killing of game. It largely depends upon its abundance or its scarcity, and if this matter of the exportation is regulated by the Governor in Council, it would be possible to adjust the regulations to the particular law of each province so as, in that regard, to permit the parties to enjoy the fruits of their skill as hunters, and for which they have already paid.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—You can limit the number of licenses, can you not?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, because that is under the control of the local government. If I understand it aright, the Ontario Government charge a license to foreigners coming in, no matter from what part of the world, of $25.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Not only foreigners, but from the province of Quebec.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And their own people too.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They charge $25 to every one except the settlers in the rear counties, who are allowed to shoot so many every year for food. It has to be shown that the hunters who hold licenses have killed only two deer, and tags must be attached to them, showing that the license fees has been paid. If that is strictly carried out, the danger of exterminating the game would be avoided altogether. If the Minister of Customs were to adopt such regulations as would compel the exporter to produce a copy of his license under which he shot the two deer, there could not be much danger arising from the passage of the bill. The only fear that I have is that that law might be evaded, and by some means injury done to the game such as existed prior to the passage of the law preventing the exportation of game. When that clause was placed in the Customs Act it was done at the instance of the different provinces and at the instance of the game clubs, and all who were interested. The province not having the power to prevent the exportation of game, applied to the Dominion Government of the day, to place such a law on the statute-book, so as to prevent it. Now I understand these same provincial governments have asked to have the law so amended as to permit the exportation of that quantity of game which the laws in each province permit a sportsman to shoot. If that be the case, and it is not carried beyond that, I do not see how any harm can arise. I do not think it is the foreign sportsmen who have urged this so strongly on the government. It is the railway companies, and hotel keepers, that have more to do with it than any one else, and they say that during those periods in which the sport can be followed, people come to this country and spends immense sums of money. As my hon. friend from Moncton said a moment ago, a sportsman comes in and spends $400 or $500, and all he gets are two deer if he can shoot them for two or three weeks sport. That is the class of people we want to see in this country as much as possible. It is in the interest of the carrying trade, in the interest of those furnishing them with food and supplies for that time, and if it can only be guarded so as not to have the effect indicated by the hon. gentleman from Halifax I do not see any harm in the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was very stupid in me that I did not notice earlier the most objectionable circumstance connected with this measure. It is this: it is stated by the hon. Secretary of State, and I suppose there is no question that the statement is correct, that this enactment is intended to pave the way for allowing sportsmen from abroad to take with them the number of deer which they are allowed to kill, but the enactment before the committee is not limited to those people at all. Under this enactment the residents of Canada can shoot and export. In our province the man who is domiciled in the province is not obliged to get a license, and I think it is the same way in New Brunswick. All over the province of Nova Scotia you would have the residents of the province, who have not been in the habit of killing moose or cariboo, as soon as the market was open for those animals in the United States going into the slaughtering of those animals wholesale, and if the measure is one intended for the purpose indicated by the Secretary of State, I think he ought at any rate to amend this enactment by inserting after the word "person" in line 12, the words "not domiciled in Canada," so as to limit it to outsiders. Otherwise, we should have a wholesale slaughter of our large game, and all the efforts which we have been making to protect them and prevent them from being exterminated would be defeated.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—A gentleman from British Columbia has told me that there is no restriction in that direction now. What I fear is that under this bill, whereas at present the great majority of those who come to Canada from the United States are real sportsmen, who come for the excitement and pleasure of sport and to whom the mere value of a carcass is a trifling consideration, under this bill the number of pot hunters who come to take animals away for the value of them will be greatly increased.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall be glad to accept the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman for Halifax, to insert the words "not domiciled in Canada." Of course this does not give the authority. It simply empowers the Governor in Council to make regulations, and with the strict gentleman at the head of the Customs Department, you may rely on it that the regulations he would make in matters of this kind would be sufficiently stringent. I should like to correct an expression of the hon. leader of the opposition in which he said I spoke with the approval of the provinces. I spoke merely of the feeling in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The hon. gentleman from Toronto has just made a remark that he believed there was no restriction in British Columbia in respect to the quantity of game that may be killed. I believe I made such a remark the other day, and the hon. gentleman was possibly misled by it. I find by the statutes of British Columbia that licenses may be granted to parties not domiciled in British Columbia at a charge of $50, and that under that license they may kill not more than ten deer, five cariboo, three mountain sheep, five mountain goats, two bull wapiti and two bull moose.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is a liberal allowance.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Although the charge is high, it is a liberal allowance of game. There is one thought suggested by the British Columbia Act on which I should like the opinion of the Minister of Justice. Our law makers have arrogated to themselves the power to prohibit the exportation of game from the province. I understand that is also the law of Manitoba, that if you kill game there you cannot export it from the province. The 4th clause of the British Columbia Game Protection Act says:

> No person shall at any time purchase or have in possession with intent to export or cause to be exported or carried out of the limits of the province or shall at any time or in any manner export or cause to be exported, &c.

Assuming that the province has that power, that this law is intra vires of the province, what effect would this proposed amendment to the Customs Act have on the British Columbia law? If the provinces give licenses to sportsmen, it is only fair that those sportsmen should be permitted to take home with them the spoils of the chase, that is only fair and right. Still you see it is rather an anomalous condition of affairs, so far as British Columbia and Manitoba are concerned. If the law there is law, you cannot in those provinces export the animals, even if you pass this bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have long been of the opinion, as a layman, that the provinces have no right to prevent the exportation of any game—that, in fact, the law which the hon. gentleman has read, and also that of Manitoba is ultra vires. That is my impression as a layman. The Minister of Justice could tell us better what he thinks of it.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I do not see how the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from British Columbia could be carried out. He must know that frequently of the basket of fish which a fisherman brings home, a certain portion is caught by himself and a portion with a silver bait, and you cannot tell how much game, under a license, a man may have shot and how much he may have bought.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know that it is any portion of my duty to expound the law to the Senate Chamber. It is sufficiently difficult to do that to the Crown, when the subject specially comes up for consideration, but I have an opinion upon this question and I can state that opinion as a senator. My opinion is that the legislation of British Columbia, in that regard, and of the province of Manitoba, are very close to the border which separates laws which are intra vires from those which are ultra vires. I take this by way of illustration. The Crown is the proprietor of all the lands in British Columbia that are not in the possession of private individuals. Where the Crown has not parted with its title, so far as wild game is concerned, it stands in respect to that game in much the same position that any proprietor would be who finds game on his property. It is largely by virtue of its proprietory rights that the powers of legislation arise, and when it undertakes to legislate what shall become of it after it ceases to be game, the matter is then somewhat altered. Supposing a proprietor who owns a park permits a party to shoot game in his park, and gives him a license to do so upon condition that he will not sell any portion of the game outside of the county or district in which he is, he makes a contract, and it may be that that contract may be enforced—that he may be able to enforce that contract against the party who has killed the game, because that was one of the conditions on which he was allowed to shoot or kill the game, but he could not make any general regulation that would bind the party, and what the province may do under a contract or license between themselves and the individual hunter, is a different thing from a general regulation which it may undertake to enforce as law. I do not think that a province could undertake to prohibit the exportation of game as a law, but they might enforce a contract into which they have entered with the individual who obtained the license. The same point was well discussed some years by Bether and Keating, as law officers of the Crown, when they asked whether the Hudson Bay Company, under their charter, could prohibit persons trading with the Indians in the Hudson Bay district. They said the Crown could confer upon them no power to establish a monopoly of trade, but they might do that as proprietors. Being proprietors of the country and having the fee simple, they might treat everybody as trespassers who undertook to land upon their territory and deal with any of those who were resident within their territorial limits. This question stands very much in the same position.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Must the game be shot by the sportsman who has the right to to shoot it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—How will you prove that he did shoot it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He must satisfy the customs.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I have seen parties of five or six trying to shoot for about ten days and they could not kill a deer, but they got their guides to shoot them, or bought them from settlers, and I do not know what they did with them. Could you prove that these gentlemen had not killed those deer?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They would have to satisfy the customs officers at the point of export that they had a license, and that they had killed the deer. The customs officer may be deceived.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I belong to a club where we have 200 miles of shooting and some Americans are members of the club. I daresay there are about a dozen of them. Outside of two, I never saw one shoot a deer yet, but they had some deer. They bought them. Whether they exported them or not, I cannot tell.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They could not export them.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—They brought them to the railway station and shipped them to Montreal.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC, from the committee, reported the bill with an amendment, which was concurred in.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed on a division.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (162) "An Act to incorporate the Belleville, Prince Edward Bridge Company."—(Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)

THE REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Mills for the second reading (Bill 126) "An Act respecting Representation in the House of Commons."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said:—In rising to address the House on this, to my mind, very important question, I must adopt the rule usually followed by young members, of asking the indulgence of the House for some little time in discussing the question. I am sure that every hon. gentleman who listened to the speech, or the first three-quarters of an hour portion of the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice in introducing this measure, did so with interest and I might say with pleasure. It was instructive in its historical character, giving, as it did, a short résumé of the history of the introduction of the franchise, and also of the establishment and organization of constituencies. I regret exceedingly that I cannot express the same opinion of the latter portion of his remarks. The first portion, being historical and somewhat theoretical, the hon. was perfectly at home. When he came to deal with that which is practical, and which is brought into operation almost every day of the year, then it struck me that he was, if I might be permitted to say so, rather out of his element. The hon. gentleman laid down the principle first, that this was a measure with which the Senate, as such, should not interfere, regulating, as it did, the electoral districts of the House of Commons. It is only another illustration of that policy which the hon. gentleman and the party with which he is connected have been invoking since they have been in power, that is, the policy of denying to others the privilege which they claimed they had the right to exercise when they were in the position which we now occupy. If it were right for the present hon. Secretary of State, when he was leading the opposition in this House, to move a motion to destroy a bill which came before us legitimately and based upon the constitution which governs us, the hon. gentleman ought at least to allow the same privilege to be exercised by those who are dealing with a measure which is ill-timed, and which is presented to us at a period not provided for by the constitution under which we live, and by which the country is governed. However, that is a question with which I will deal at a later period. My hon. friend also discussed for some length of time the policy adopted by the Imperial Government when they were dealing with the question both of the franchise and of electoral districts. If my hon. friend had pointed out this important fact, that England is governed principally by precedent, and that we in Canada are controlled and limited in our legislation by a written constitution, particularly as affecting these questions, he would then have presented the question to the Senate in a much more enlightened and intelligent manner—at least, that is the view that I hold upon this question. The Imperial Government has the right, at all times, to change, alter and amend as they may think proper. We in this country can only go so far as the constitution permits, and when we step beyond that we are doing that which we have no constitutional power to do. The next point my hon. friend dealt with, and at some length was the question of representation by population, and the question of boundary lines. These are the only points, as far as my recollection serves or my notes indicate, with which the hon. gentleman dealt during his hour and three-quarter speech, and those are the portions to which I shall draw the attention of the members of the Senate as briefly as I can.

Hon. Mr. POWER---It was an hour and one quarter speech.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That will give me three hours if I deal with each point an hour at a time. In the first place I am led to believe, looking at the bill, that it is not introduced so much for the purposes which were indicated by the hon. Minister of Justice, as to gain a temporary political advantage over his opponents at the next election. Taking the speeches of those who have spoken on this question in defence of the measure, we can come to no other conclusion. Who the author of this bill is, I am not prepared to say, but judging from the fact that the hon. minister himself was in Ottawa during the absence of his colleagues, I attribute the authorship of it to himself; and I am led to that belief from the fact that, if the reports in the newspapers be correct, the hon. gentleman was in correspondence with his party friends in different parts of the Dominion in order to ascertain what their views were as to the division of the electoral districts. I make this statement from what I read in the British Columbia newspapers, in which it was stated that members of the Liberal party had been in correspondence with the hon. gentleman, and that his reply to them was, to consult the different Reform associations in the province and acquaint him with what they desired to have done in the matter of redistribution.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me to interrupt him at this point, and to say that I believe that I wrote but one letter on the subject, and that was in reply to a member of a Reform association in British Columbia, Vancouver I think it was. He had written to me.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am only speaking of what I read in the newspapers. My remark was that he had replied to applications made to him as to what they were to do, and he told them to consult the different Reform associations, in order that he might be in a better position to so draft his bill as to give them that assistance which they desired in the elections. Looking at the papers, we find that the master mind of the present administration, Mr. Tarte, when touring through the province of Ontario, told the people what they, the ministry, intended to do. He said, at a banquet given on 28th, April in Brantford:

> I have no hesitation in saying that, knowing Ontario as I do, when the gerrymander is undone—and we will undo it—when the gerrymander is undone we are going to take the life out of them in Ontario as we have dons in Quebec.

Knowing the people of Ontario as well as I have known them for a great many years, I am very much inclined to think that a threat of that kind, coming from the hon. Minister of Public Works, will have very little effect when they have an opportunity of expressing their opinions at the polls.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Unless they have a machine.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No doubt the machine may be in operation, unless the government—as I hope they will—adopt the measure that has been introduced in the lower House, to try and prevent its working. If they do not do it, let us hope our own provincial legislature will attend to the matter, although I have very little confidence in them, because they have resisted every attempt on the part of the leader of the opposition, Mr. Whitney, to place a law on the statute-book to prevent the operation of that "threshing machine," which no doubt they will "hug" whenever an opportunity presents itself. I find that Mr. Mulock, the Postmaster General, in introducing the bill, stated as follows:—

> It has not been the custom in the Canadian Parliament to make changes in the constituencies except in the session immediately succeeding the decennial census, but it has happened that, ever since confederation, the census and the succeeding redistributions have always taken place while our political adversaries were in power.

If that policy is to be adopted, where is this redistribution of seats to stop? If it be right, because one party has succeeded, that they may immediately change the electoral districts and gerrymander them, or so arrange them as to give them political influence, it opens the door for a redistribution at any time upon a change of ministry. I hesitate not to say that the constitution never contemplated anything of the kind. If you read the speech of the Postmaster General carefully you will find that the political element pervades every sentiment in it. He went so far as to point out the different members of the House of Commons who were to be beheaded when this bill becomes law, as I shall point out in a very short time. The mode of redistribution in Toronto and London was intended, and could have been for no other purpose, than to behead the gentleman who represents East York and the gentleman who represents West York in the House of Commons. The principle of adhering to boundary lines is so ridiculously absurd when applied to the bill before us, that one can scarcely understand why the minister based his whole argument upon that particular point. I might have added to my remarks in reference to the minister communicating with members of the Liberal party, that it is stated, and I believe upon very good authority, that some of the—shall I call them machinists—who cannot be secured at the present moment to give evidence in the courts in the election trials now affecting West Elgin and Huron, were in the city, namely, Capt. Sullivan, and also a Mr. Hewitt: is it true that these gentlemen were here in communication with the government, indicating to them how they should distribute the electoral divisions in Ontario. I speak of Ontario more particularly, because scarcely any of the other provinces are affected by this bill. Quebec is affected to a slight extent, and I shall refer to Quebec by and by. But here are two well known heelers. Here are men who have been proved in the courts of Ontario to have carried on a systematic policy of bribery and corruption, who have absented themselves from the courts of law; whether they have got out of the province or not I do not know. But they are outlaws to all intents and purposes, and one of them, if not the other, has already been disqualified for eight years on account of his actions in South Ontario. If those are the men with whom the hon. gentlemen consult about their arrangements, it does not redound much to their credit.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman charge the government, or any member of the government, with consulting these men?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I said they were here, and merely ask the question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a most improper insinuation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not mean it as an insinuation. I mean to say that their being here under the circumstances, it is not at all unlikely that they did call upon the hon. gentleman. Whether he accepted their advice or not I do not know. I have not sufficient confidence in the members of the government——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I beg to say to the hon. gentleman that I know not these men. I have not read the proceedings, I have been too much engaged to know what has happened in Ontario. I never saw either of the men whose names he has mentioned, and if that has been said I say that it is a most atrocious calumny, utterly unworthy any man stating elsewhere or repeating here.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Knowing the party, as I have said, for the last 40 or 50 years, knowing what has transpired within the last 12 months, in the different courts, and the intimate relations existing between those in power and those who committed the crime of tampering with ballot boxes and bribing, I should not be at all surprised to find them in close union in any matter affecting the franchise, or any other political matter. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, he says he knows nothing about them and has not read the proceedings. It is not a question whether he read the proceedings of the courts. I merely mention this incidentally to show the parties who were here, and supposed to be in consultation with the government upon this question, who had been in the different constituencies doing that which they should not do, and for which some of them have been disqualified, and if they can be got hold of in the witness box again, may possibly suffer for their crimes in some dungeon; at least if they do not, they ought to. My hon. friend was very particular in denouncing the statement—not particularly denouncing it, but in trying to prove that he and his party were not in favour of—perhaps I had better not say that—that the party only advocated representation by population in so far as it affects the different provinces.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When I referred to this question of representation by population, the hon. gentleman said a short time ago that, so far as the constitution was concerned, it only referred to the provinces, and that the representation of each province must be based upon its population, but that question of representation by population was not to be considered in the arrangement and redistribution of seats in the provinces.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am rather surprised to hear my hon. friend's reply, because we all know that this country at one time was almost in a state of revolution upon that question, and it is well known also that all parties, or nearly all parties, were at a later period of our history in favour of that principle. It is true Sir John A. Macdonald, as leader of the Conservative party, never laid down the principle that representation by population should be the sole basis of representation. He took very much the view my hon. friend did the other day, when he said that no binding rule of representation upon that basis could upon any principle be adopted, and in that I fully concur, as I did in the remarks which I made in 1882 in reply to the Hon. Edward Blake when he criticised very severely the redistribution of seats at that time. I then stated that the redistribution of the seats, in Ontario particularly, and in other sections of the province, was based upon the population of the different districts as nearly as it was practicable to do so. It is utterly impossible—and more so if you confine the representation to county lines—to adhere to that principle of representation by population, and it was upon that basis and solely that the Act of 1882 was framed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear!

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And that was the reason why the different townships were taken from one district and one county and added to another.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Without party consideaation at all?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend was not the party who was dealing with the question. If he had been, I am quite sure party would have been paramount in his mind. I have no desire whatever to shirk the responsibility attached to that Redistribution Bill, and I state further, that when it was found that we had to so readjust the representation as to give to Ontario six new members, we found it necessary to make those changes which I have indicated, as we had to gave one or two places an additional member. On this question of representation by population, as Sir John Macdonald's name has been mentioned repeatedly in connection with this branch of the subject, I desire to read one or two extracts from speeches delivered by him. In 1872 he said :

In determining the mode of distributing the new seats, the government took into consideration the principles which have guided the establishment of the elective system in the provinces ever since they have been provinces; and it will be found that in them all, while the principle of population was considered to a very great extent, other considerations were also held to have weight, so that different interests, classes and localities should be fairly represented, that the principle of numbers should not be the only one.

While he lays down that general principle, he first starts out with the declaration that the principle of representation by population was considered to a great extent. Then, so far did the party which my hon. friend leads in this House go, that he supported a motion made by the hon. member for Lambton, the then leader of the party, the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. I find in Hansard that I made these remarks, to be found on page 1377 :

At that time, so much in love with the principles of representation by population were hon. gentlemen opposite, that they denounced the government for not demolishing the small boroughs of Brockville and Niagara. They supported it to such an extent that the hon. member for Lambton moved the following resolution affirming that principle:—

"That the six additional members to be allotted to Ontario are due to the increased population of that province, and should be allotted with reasonable regard to the population. That the bill be referred back to a committee of the House with instructions to amend the same by allotting members for Ontario in such a manner as to give, as far as practicable, representation to those parts of the population which, by the present division would be excluded from their fair share of political power."

My hon. friend opposite voted for that motion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes; a proper motion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He voted for a motion affirming the principle of representation by population, which he now says is not necessary and should not be exercised in a pedantic manner. Then the hon. gentleman himself repeated almost verbatim the other day what he said in 1882 in reference to the county of Kent and the adjoining counties, and he gave the population of these different counties, showing how they could be divided so as to have, as nearly as practicable, an equality of population. I merely mention that to show that in the discussion of this question, he affirmed directly by his vote, and indirectly by his utterances, the principle of representation by population. There are other extracts to which I could call the attention of the House on this question, but I do not deem it necessary to do so. Then the hon. gentleman says that the Act of 1882 did a great injustice to the Liberal party. Is that true? Let any one examine the returns of the elections in the province of Ontario, and it will be found there is no foundation for that statement. We have heard a great deal about the gerrymandering of Bothwell, about the gerrymandering of Lambton, and other sections of the province. Let him point out to me any single instance where a Liberal, in 1882, lost his election through the gerrymander. I find that Mr. Clancy made this statement in the House of Commons, and it was not answered. Mr. Clancy said, in one of the most instructive speeches made in that House during the whole debate:

> I defy him (that is the Postmaster General) now to point out a single constituency in the forty-eight now under consideration in which a Liberal candidate was defeated as the result of the redistribution of 1882.

That is the challenge thrown out in the House of Commons by the present representative of Bothwell, and it has not yet been accepted. In addition to that, he gave the names of the different parties who had been elected in these gerrymandered constituencies, as they are termed. Was the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie defeated? He retained his seat until he eventually left Lambton and went to East York. The gentleman who succeeded him, now Judge Lister, was elected by a very large majority. A Liberal was elected for the other riding of Lambton until the electors of that constituency became disgusted with the action of the Liberal party when in power, on account of their dealing with the oil interests, and so on, and returned Mr. Moncrieff; but since then another Liberal has been returned. In that division the gerrymander has not affected any portion of the county. Was my hon. friend defeated in Bothwell? He carried it every time until last election. True, there was one return made by a returning officer in which he was deprived of his seat for a very short time. Just as soon as the courts could intervene and show that the return was improperly made, the hon. gentleman secured his seat. Go through the whole of the constituencies that were changed at that time, and I am quite prepared to repeat the challenge made by the hon. member for Bothwell in the other House, that nothing can be found to justify the charge made by hon. gentlemen opposite. What is more, Mr. Clancy gave figures showing that these gentlemen were elected by larger majorities than they had before. But as time rolls on changes take place. New electors rise up Young men come of age, and my hon. friend was defeated, as others have been.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, that is not the way it was done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How was it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Ballots were put into the box and ballots were taken out, and I have some of them in my possession that were found afterwards.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman makes a statement now that he should have made as soon as he found out the fraud. If the statement made by himself now, be correct, he is equally guilty with the guilty parties for not having punished those who perpetrated the fraud. The man who knows of a fraud being committed and does not bring the parties to justice, becomes a party to the fraud, and it is no credit to the hon. gentleman that he has not had these parties punished. I must, on behalf of the gentleman who defeated him, repudiate, so far as I can, any insinuation that he was a party to such frauds if they ever existed. If this kind of machine work and ballot stuffing was carried on to defeat him, I regret exceedingly that the hon. gentleman did not do what the opposition at the present time are trying to do, bring the guilty parties to justice. If he did not do so, he has only himself to blame for it. My hon. friend laid great stress on adhering to the boundary lines of counties. Does this bill in any particular, from the whereas in the beginning to the finish, show any indication of having been based on that principle? If there ever was an abuse of the words boundary lines, we have an evidence of it in this bill. What do we find? You go to the city of Toronto which has some 160,000 inhabitants, having added to the electorial division a portion of West York and a portion of East York, giving that city a population of some 200,000. Why? Because as the hon. gentleman says, these outlying suburbs, as they used to be, are a part of the municipal division and boundaries of the city of Toronto. There is a carrying out of the principle which he has advocated. Why have they done that? Perhaps it would be improper to accuse them of any political intention, but unfortunately people outside will draw conclusions. Yorkville, which is taken from East York and added to the city of Toronto, gives a large majority to Mr. McLean, the representative of that division whose majority in the last election was very small—I think only one or two. That taken out of East York places that constituency in a position where the hon. gentleman no doubt expects to elect a Liberal candidate. Take Parkdale, that section of the city of Toronto which now forms, for election purposes, a portion of the west riding of York, and attach it to Toronto and you add another 20,000 people to the city of Toronto and take 200 or 300 of a Conservative majority away from Mr. Clarke Wallace.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—These are parts of the city of Toronto.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know that, but only for municipal purposes, but was not a part of the city of Toronto until it was attached by law, the same as the north part, Yorkville. Under the pretense of keeping the municipal boundaries together they have attached these two. Then you go to London and you find that they have brought a certain portion of Middlesex, which is largely Liberal in its tendencies, into the city. It being a somewhat closely contested constituency, they expect to defeat the gentleman who represents it now, or any Conservative candidate who may contest the riding. If they had carried out that principle in all the electoral divisions throughout Canada, I could not have had much fault to find with them; but New Edinburgh, which has a Conservative majority and is attached to this city for municipal purposes, is still left in the county of Russell, which has a large Liberal majority and can over-balance the Conservative majority in New Edinburgh; but if they attach New Edinburgh to Ottawa, it might ensure a couple of Conservative representatives instead of two Liberal ones as they have at present. What have they done with the county of Lanark? The north riding of the county of Lanark is composed of part of the county of Carleton. Why? Because Carleton had a large population of between 30,000 and 40,000, while Lanark had only 13,000. Fitzroy and Huntley were taken from that county and attached to North Lanark in order to equalize, as far as possible, the population of the riding. The county of Russell has also part of Carleton attached to it. Why has not Gloucester township been taken away from Russell, and attached to the county of Carleton to which it belongs for all municipal and judicial purposes, Frontenac is in precisely the same way. That has part of Addington attached to it. Leeds is another which is composed of part of Lanark and part of Leeds. The only places in which the hon. gentlemen have applied the principle of representation in accordance with county boundaries, are those two cities to which I have referred, and from which they expect to reap the advantages to which I have called the attention of the House. Then there is another incongruity in the bill. I should like to know why Toronto has to be divided into five electoral divisions. Why is West Toronto to be deprived of the right of electing two members, as they do now, while they leave Ottawa, Hamilton and Halifax in the same position as they have been? There is only one answer to it, that there is no political advantage they expect to accrue from interfering with them. Otherwise, we have every reason to believe that it would be done—at least, you can draw no other conclusion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend divided Toronto but left Hamilton and Ottawa undivided.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We never laid down any such principle as the hon. gentleman does. I am speaking of those who lay down a policy by which they are to be guided in the management of the affairs of this country, and I point out that they have only followed that policy in such cases as they expect to derive a benefit from it. We laid down the principle of so arranging the electoral divisions as we thought was in the interests of the country and the locality itself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And of the Conservative party.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If we had made any profession of that sort my hon. friend would have been quite right in denouncing us for objecting to the policy he is pursuing to-day. My objection is that the government profess what they do not carry out. We did not make any such profession and consequently were not liable to such a charge.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Let the hon. gentleman show any case where we did, and I shall be happy to reply to it. I should like to give the House some figures in justification of what I said a few minutes ago in reference to the results of the so-called gerrymander. The government of to-day are in power having a majority of representatives at their back from the province of Ontario, while the Conservatives majority polled, during the election of 1896, some 16,000 over that polled for the Liberal candidates. Now, if they came to power with this villanous gerrymander, as they termed it, existing at the time, and obtained a majority of representatives with a minority of votes, what right have they to complain of the result of that gerrymander.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They are trying to make things fair for the Conservatives.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In what way?

Hon. Mr. POWER—By removing this obnoxious state of things.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—By removing a majority of the votes, the hon. gentleman means.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—"Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, if they could only do that "it wad frae monie a blunder free them." In Ontario in 1891 the total votes polled was 191,252 Conservatives, and 166,335 Liberals. That gave a Conservative majority of 24,717. It is true the Conservatives were retained in power in 1891. Now you come down to 1896 and you find that the Conservatives polled 413,000 votes while the Liberals polled 397,114, giving a Conservative majority in the province, as a whole, of 15,885 votes; yet the Liberals have a majority of one or two members in the House of Commons from Ontario. My hon. friend from Halifax says they want to so readjust and redistribute the constituencies in Ontario that the Conservatives may have justice done to them, and if they have, why then these gentlemen will go out of power, and that is a consummation I have no doubt the hon. gentleman devoutly wishes to occur. These are the facts in connection with the votes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg to say that that alleged fact is disputed. I had occasion to make the figures the other day, and I shall give them to my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That does not include the whole province.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Figures will sometimes lie in spite of the proverb.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It depends on who manipulates them, hence I shall not be surprised at any figures that may be presented. My hon. friend took great credit to himself for divesting the government of the power of dividing the different constituencies which they have declared shall return certain members to Parliament, thereby depriving themselves of that responsibility which should attach to all governments, the force of which I am sure my hon. friend will recognize. He says, "We have magnanimously divested ourselves of power which might be exercised in the interest of our party by giving it to the judges." I do not think any one who knows the three judges referred to will object to any of them. I believe them to be honourable and learned men, who will do what is right. But that was not always the hon. gentleman's faith. The hon. gentleman held opinions quite to the contrary. He held opinions upon one occasion, that the government of the day should not divest itself of the responsibilities attaching to the division of constituencies, and that it should not be left in the hands of judges, and the hon. gentleman so voted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. My hon. friend will find that I supported that proposition and brought it forward in the House of Commons in 1892. That was the first time it was raised.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In discussing this question in 1892 the Hon. Mr. Laurier then, Sir Wilfrid now, in discussing the action taken by Mr. Gladstone when he had under consideration the extension of the franchise and also the redistribution of seats in England, said:

In some quarters the suggestion has been made that the duty of redistribution should be referred to a commission of judges specially appointed; in other words that Parliament should divest itself of its powers in this most important particular. Sir, I am bound to say at once that this is a proposition which my friends and I would not favour either upon this or any other subject. I am bound to say that we would not entrust to any this duty and privilege which properly belongs to Parliament. Moreover this proposition implies a singular want of confidence in parliamentary institutions. It implies that in a matter of this kind the majority would never be able to rise above the low temptation of strengthening themselves at the expense of their opponents.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will find a later discussion of that when the proposition was supported. That was from a misapprehension of the point to which he referred.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is too plain, to be a misapprehension.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think this language is so plain and such good English that it is utterly impossible for any mortal to misunderstand it. Mr. Laurier goes on to quote from the utterances of Mr. Gladstone, of Lord Salisbury, and of those who carried on the negotiations between these two great statesmen as to the conference for the purpose of redistributing certain electoral districts in England. Then he goes on to say:

The contest of rival claimants in such a matter is just as much a judicial contest as any other controversy between party and party; and therefore it was quite proper that contest should be judicially adjudicated upon, but apart from this judicial question if it were admitted that there may be questions as to the solution of which Parliament can be conveniently superceded by another body that would be, I think, fatal to parliamentary institutions.

Yet these gentlemen are doing the very thing Sir Wilfrid condemned. He continues:

I may say that if the majority of Parliament cannot be trusted to do justice in a matter of this kind to refer the matter to a commission, would be begging the question and not solving it, because what would happen? If the majority of Parliament could not be trusted to do justice in such a case, the commission would be appointed by the same men who, according to that could not be trusted to do right.

I have no doubt the hon. gentleman had himself and his friends in his mind's eye should they get into power. He has now adopted the principle of divesting himself of that power which he says is destructive of the rights of Parliament. He continues:

The commissioners would be stamped with their own image, swayed by their own spirit, and no greater justice could be expected from the commissioners than from the body that appointed them. No, we stand upon the authority of Parliament itself, but we submit while Parliament should exercise that power, it should be exercised in a spirit of moderation, fairness, equity and justice.

Then he continues, as I have indicated, to quote from the correspondence which took place between Gladstone and Salisbury, and wound up as follows:—

This was the principle followed in England by Mr. Gladstone and accepted by Lord Salisbury, and this is the principle which I propose to the House. Before I sit down I will move this amendment:

"That all the words after 'that' in the said motion be omitted and the following inserted instead thereof: 'That Bill No. 76, an Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons, to be referred to a conference of commissioners to be composed of both political parties, to agree upon the lines or principles on which a Redistribution Bill should be drawn.'"

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear; that is one mode.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. Minister of Justice voted for that also.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He sustained the position taken by his leader at that time in denouncing a reference to a commission of judges, and he voted for a motion to refer it to a commission appointed by both parties, in order that the two leaders of the two great parties of this country might, with the assistance of others, come to a right and equitable decision as to the proper division of the electoral districts. If it were right then, let me tell him he is not right to day. In 1892, these gentlemen gave utterances to these sentiments and placed upon the records of Parliament a motion adopting the principle which I should like, I frankly confess, to see adopted in this country. However, we, the Conservative party, acted upon the principle laid down by Mr. Laurier, that neither Parliament nor government should divest itself of the power which legitimately belong to them under responsible government. I should like to see this principle adopted, and in future, in case we are asked to deal with questions of this kind after the next decennial census, I hope they will adopt that system and they shall have, as far as in me lies, my humble support.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—They will not be in power.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps they will be if we pass this bill for them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend, when he was speaking asked to receive the same courtesy and noninterference that I would except myself, and I told him that I would accept that proposition, and as I interrupted him only once during his speech, he has had more than his share of interruptions. But I have no objection if the hon. gentleman will only ask relevant questions and not something which has nothing to do with the point which I am discussing, I shall try and answer him at least. That is the principle which the hon. gentleman laid down in reference to judges, and the divesting of this House of power, but he now seems to have a confidence in the judges of the provinces that his party has not always exhibited in the past. I have lived long enough to have a recollection of the manner in which the party denounced the action of judges, more particularly when their decisions in the courts were not of a character to please them. Many hon. gentlemen will remember the violent attacks made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries upon Judge Tuck in New Brunswick, because his decisions were not what the politicans of the day thought they ought to be. He gave a decision which was strictly in accordance, I believe, with law, and which was justified by every one who knew anything of law; that there had been a mishap in the action of the returning officers and other officials is beyond a doubt, but that Judge Tuck was right has not been questioned except by politicians who wish to denounce him. Then if the hon. gentlemen turn to the Globe newspaper of not very long ago—not longer than 1892—they will find that that paper denounced in somewhat virulent terms even the judges of the Supreme Court in this Dominion. Why? Because they would not do what the Globe and its party thought ought to be done when a question of appeal came before them, in the Northumberland election case, when Mr. Hargraves was unseated. Who does not remember the denunciations of Judge Elliott in London because he gave a decision in reference to the voters' list? And my hon. friend was one of those who thought he ought not to have given that decision, but it has been justified ever since by the Superior Court judges. In the Ontario Legislature, Mr. Stratton, a very prominent member of the House, a gentleman who expects to be called to the ministry of Ontario just as soon as a vacancy occurs; when the question of the right of constables to vote, being paid agents at the different elections, and it was proposed to refer that question to the judges, said of them in 1898:

> What the Attorney General is asking us to do, is to provide for cases where the decision of a possibly partisan, narrow-minded, trial judge might construe the law of the land different to what it was intended, and to prevent long and tedious delays in appeal.

The question arose in that case as to what the rights of these constables were. Mr. Stratton thought that if it was referred to the courts, which the Attorney General asked them to do, that a narrow-minded judge might put an interpretation upon it that Parliament never intended. Any one who has watched the decisions of the court, any one who has had anything to do with the preparation of bills that have passed through both Houses of Parliament, knows that on many occasions the intention of Parliament was in a certain direction, but that the wording of the laws was such as to justify the judges in giving decisions just contrary to what Parliament intended, and it is the only manner in which justice could possibly be administered, yet this Liberal leader of the party had no hesitation in denouncing judges in the manner in which I have indicated. Then he went on to say:

> But the learned judges took a lofty stand. They say they have no regard for the expense this province might be put to, and they must have a few days fishing. Nero fiddled while Rome burnt, and the judges go fishing while the opposition is trying to rob a great many of the electors of the province of their franchise. The law is not intended to rob constables of their votes.

This is the language used by Liberals towards the judges of the country when they do not act in accord with their particular ideas and views upon political questions. My hon. friend referred to amended acts and acts affecting the electoral divisions in the Dominion between the decennial census and if I understood him aright, he gave these illustrations in order to prove that we were acting not only within the constitution as it stands upon the statute-book, but were following precedents set by the late Conservative government. I must be excused for referring to these facts because I do not wish, nor do I believe that the members of the House wish, to have appear upon the records of this Senate a declaration of the kind made by the Minister of Justice whose duty it is to know what the provisions of these Acts are. You might excuse it in a gentleman who has not the same standing at the bar. You might excuse it in a layman like myself, if I were to make a statement of that kind, but there is no excuse for the Minister of Justice to instance these cases as a justification for the course which he is pursuing. The bill in 1887, to which reference has been made, was clearly one to correct clerical errors which had occurred in the bill redistributing the different constituencies, particularly in the province of Quebec and also in Ontario. In one case the error was of character, which, had it not been corrected, would have deprived Ottawa of a representative; and in some constituencies in the province of Quebec, the amendments were necessary in order to bring certain portions of territory within the electoral district which had been left out altogether. In the Act of 1887, Sir John Thompson explained this very clearly when he said:

The Representation Act, as published in the Revised Statutes, continues the old enactment that the House shall consist of 211 members, and a subsequent chapter deals with the representation in the North-west Territories; but it is proper that the second section should be amended to make it conform with the present number of members of the House. There is also a difficulty arising from the fact that, since the representation in the House was last distributed, the boundaries of some municipalities have changed, and, therefore, if the Act reads as it now does, from the day the Revised Statutes were brought into force, the boundaries of some of the constituencies would be different from those boundaries as established by the Act of 1882. The bill contains a short clause declaring that the meaning of the Representation Act is that every county, town, township, village or other territorial division, shall be as it stood prior to the bringing into force of the Revised Statutes.

Clearly showing that in the Revised Statutes blunders had been made, and that it was necessary to introduce a bill in order to set them right. In the committee on the bill, you will find, if you refer to page 1227 of the Hansard that the same hon. gentleman made this statement:

The object is to correct a clerical error in the Revised Statutes. Notwithstanding the addition made of the four members for the North-west, under the Act of last session, the Representation Act was carried forward into the Revised Statutes with the word "211." The object of section 2 is to preserve the Representation Acts as they existed prior to the Revised Statutes. Of course the Revised Statutes repealed the previous legislation. It is not intended that the boundaries, as previously established, shall be changed.

That is, the boundaries as established by the Act of 1882, which had been omitted in the Revised Statutes and remained as they were. Yet my hon. friend and those of his friends in the other House have given these as instances of a change in the electoral districts to justify the course which they are taking. Judge Ouimet also spoke upon this question in 1893. His remarks will be found on the occasion when the other bill was introduced on page 1617. He says:

The description of the county of St. Hyacinthe remained as it was according to the original establishment of the county in 1864, but since then the parish of Ste. Marie de Madeleine has added a certain part of the parish of St. Jean Baptiste, and it is in order to include about twenty farmers there that the amendment is moved. As it is now, these farmers are in no county.

This is the character of the legislation which has been quoted as justifying the present redistribution between the period of the decennial census. I might also read an extract from Mr. Bernier's remarks—not the hon. senator, but the Mr. Bernier who represents the county, and took the same view that the present Judge Ouimet did and justified the action which was taken. He said:

The reason given by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) are perfectly true. The changes made by the motion are only a matter of detail; they are rendered necessary in order to allow a certain number of electors of the parish of St. Jean Baptiste to exercise their right of vote, which they would be deprived of should the law remain as it is. The electors are included in the parish of Ste. Marie de Madeleine.

And then he goes on to give us some particulars in connection with it. I find Sir John Thompson again spoke upon the question. He said:

This is a short bill which I introduce for the purpose of amending the Representation Act of last session in certain particulars which are of a clerical character, and which merely relate to the correction of the boundaries, without making any change in any of the principles on which the Act was founded. The first section is more accurately to define the boundary lines of the electoral district of Nipissing.

A portion of the country with which Parliament was not very well acquainted. The result was there were some difficulties arising in the boundaries of that constituency. All of these bills were introduced solely for the purpose of correcting clerical errors in the Revised Statutes, and did not recognize the principle of the redistribution either in part or in whole, of the different electoral districts as provided for under the 51st section of the Confederation Act.

At six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL resumed. He said:—When the House rose at six o'clock I had completed the evidence which I produced to show that whatever changes have been made in the electoral districts since the general distribution of 1892 were for the purpose of correcting clerical errors that had crept into the statutes, owing in a great measure to the consolidation of the laws published in the Revised Statutes. I omitted, however, in referring to the question of representation by population, to mention one of the cases to which the Minister of Justice referred in which he made, what he thought at least, a case against the late government that is the case of the county of Elgin. I turn to the speech which I myself made in reply to one that had been delivered by the Hon. Mr. Blake then leading the opposition in the House of Commons, I shall not inflict upon the House the whole of that speech, but if any one desires to know the exact distribution of the seats in accordance with population, I refer him to that speech which he will find in Hansard of 1882, pages 1378 to 1383. I shall confine myself to the case mentioned by the hon. gentleman opposite, that of Elgin. I find in my remarks the following language:

> We now come to the Elgins. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) thought that East Elgin, having a population of 28,147, and West Elgin having but 14,214 should not be interfered with except by taking the town of St. Thomas from the east and adding it to the west riding. Perhaps if there had been no other readjustment necessary in order to equalize the population, the suggestion by the hon. gentleman might have been accepted, but as Bothwell and Kent, Lambton and Essex lie in the same group, it was necessary, in the readjustment of West Elgin, to readjust the others, and regard was had to population. Well, the result of the readjustment is that East Elgin instead of having 28,147 has 26,304 and West Elgin having but 14,214 has now 23,480, so the two Elgins, have a population of 23,000 and 26,000 instead of 28,000 and 14,000 respectively. East Elgin is represented by a Conservative and West Elgin by a follower of the hon. gentleman opposite.

Now these are the facts in connection with the constituencies of Elgin and the adjacent counties. What I desire to point out in justification of this is, that in the readjustment we had to provide constituencies for those which had been obliterated. It will be remembered by those who were in the House at the time that in these different redistributions, the government of the day abolished the constituency of Cornwall, which had a small population. I could give the figures of every constituency which was changed. It will be found in the speech to which I referred. We also abolished the town of Niagara. We also, in the last redistribution, abolished the county of Monck, all three of them being Conservative constituencies. We did not, in any case, abolish a constituency which had been represented by a Liberal, and the reason we abolished these small constituencies was that they had but a small population, and we desired to give to the great growing west, the north-west of Ontario, a representation which they had not previous to the redistribution. Take the Nipissing district for instance, the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was the means of opening up a vast territory into which population began to flow. That portion of the unorganized part of Ontario had at that time no representation in the House of Commons; hence Monck was abolished in order to give that large area with fifteen or twenty thousand inhabitants that were in there—I am speaking from memory as to the number of inhabitants—representation in the House of Commons which they had not before. So that part of the Nipissing territory, which was not in any constituency previous to the readjustment, was created a constituency and the eastern portion of Algoma was attached to it. I thought it well to give this explanation for fear that some hon. gentlemen who were not in the House at the time, and were not acquainted with the facts might think that a grave injustice had been done. I notice also in connection with this question of representation by population, that when the hon. Minister of Justice, then Mr. Mills, in the House of Commons, made his motion in reference to a subdivision of some portions of the western section of Ontario, he made no reference whatever to county boundaries. He simply laid down the principle by which he thought the division should be made, but nothing is mentioned in the resolutions about county boundaries.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But it is mentioned in my speech.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps so. I am speaking of the resolution. There is another important fact in connection with this question of redistribution and county boundaries. Of course, my hon. friend will say, when I refer to the divisions which have been made in the province of Ontario by the Ontario Government, that he is not responsible for it. I acquit him of being responsible, individually, as a member of Parliament, but he is an ardent supporter, and has been an ardent supporter of the Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat ever since he has been in power, and upon no occasion has he denounced the action of that gentleman in dividing the constituencies in that province. I do not know whether my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, would have done the same, but I hold him responsible for it at any rate. While the hon. Minister of Justice was an ardent supporter of Sir Oliver Mowat, we know that Sir Oliver Mowat has proved himself to be not only an ardent supporter but a great admirer of my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, and I presume he feels proud of having such a supporter and admirer.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then I take it for granted that the action of Sir Oliver Mowat is the action of the hon. Minister of Justice, as he has always ardently supported and defended his policy.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the division of constituencies we will see how far he had any regard whatever to county boundaries. Take the county of Huron; the Ontario law goes on to say:

Shall consist of the townships of Tuckersmith, Osborne, Stephen, Hay and Stanley, that portion of the township of Niagara south of the line known as the cut line and Huron road and the town of Seaforth and the village of Haytown and Exeter.

Here is a case in which in two instances it cuts the township in two. If he cuts the township in two how can the principle the hon. gentleman has laid down to guide us in Dominion matters be carried out? He has told us that the county boundaries should be maintained in order that the electors may be enabled to select from among themselves the reeves or school trustees in that division. Here is a case in which one township has been cut in two, a part of the township going to one riding and a part of the township to the adjacent riding.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Both in the same county.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, but has two representatives the one man would have the interest at least of the one part of the township under consideration when dealing with legislative matters which might not be supported by the other. Then take that part of the township of Hallett, which lies on the east of the road commonly called the Gravel Road. There is another case in which the township is cut in two. Another provision is that Colborne and that part of the township of Hallett which lies west of the road commonly called the Gravel Road, and that part of the township of Goderich north of the Gravel Road, and cut line and township of Goderich. Then there is another case. Leaving the county of Huron and travelling down to the county of Brant we find this provision:

The north riding of Brant shall consist of certain townships and the northerly portion of the township of Brantford.

The northerly portion, mark you.

The northerly portion of the township of Brantford and the town of Paris; the south riding shall consist of the township of Burford, Oakland and the southern portion of the township of Brantford and the city of Brantford.

Here is a riding cut out from two or three townships east, west, north and south, and yet the hon. gentleman has been supporting the principle of electoral divisions by county boundaries. The hon. gentleman says it is in the same county. Admit that it is in the same county, the interest of one portion of a township may not be the interest of another just in the same manner that one township may not have the same interest as the other township. In the matter of representation in the Ontario Legislature I admit that there is a very great force in the arguments which the hon. Minister of Justice has advanced in favour of county boundaries. Why? Because the local legislature dealt exclusively with every question of a municipal character. If it is a question of the school funds, if it is a question of changing and altering the municipalities, that belongs to the local legislature and not to this Parliament, thence the interests of a township, or of a county would be more solidified, if I may use that expression, then they would be if they were sent to this Parliament. In the speech which I have just quoted and which I delivered in 1882, I laid down this principle, and I reaffirm it, and the more I think of it the more I am convinced of the correctness of that position under that policy. The question of county boundaries as affecting the representation in the House of Commons has no force whatever, for this reason: that we deal with questions of a Dominion character, and not of a local and municipal character, we deal with questions affecting the fiscal, the financial and the commercial policy of the country, and the man who lives on this side of the line, as well as the man that lives on that side of the line, casts his vote, we suppose, at least, upon principle. If the question is the question of the national policy, if it be the question of a fast line of steamers, if it be the question of a pacific cable, or any other question which affects the whole Dominion, does it matter where the man lives, he casts his vote for or against the principle involved, and the question of boundary line has no more to do with it than if he lived at Timbuctoo.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the capacity and character of the man would have nothing to do with it on the same theory.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The character of the man I suppose would be made up in political matters or commercial matters, according to his light on the questions to which I have referred. It might not be so if he had a machine to hug. That might be quite a different thing. Then he might not be actuated by principle. He would be actuated by something of a baser character. It does not matter where a man lives if he is casting a vote on a great question.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—We elected a Quebec man for Saskatchewan.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Sir John Macdonald was elected for Vancouver and the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was elected for Saskatchewan district, but he did not accept it because he was elected somewhere else, and if my memory serves me correctly, Sir George E. Cartier was elected for St. Boniface. Those gentlemen, like my hon. friend opposite have been defeated on various occasions. Mr. Gladstone and other great men have been defeated. I do not consider that any reflection upon any individual, but as my hon.friend suggested, these gentlemen represented constituencies in different parts of the Dominion, and they could represent the people upon the great questions of the day and the policy which each party was advocating just as well as if they had been elected in the town in which they live. My hon. friend said also, that the great advantage of county lines is to enable the people in the immediate vicinity to elect those from among themselves who had municipal experience, and yet ten or fifteen minutes afterwards he told us that many of the constituencies desired to be represented by men of talent—men of character and greater political calibre than those who lived among themselves, and he instanced Montreal as having fifteen or twenty representatives who live in the city, and who represent rural constituencies, and he told us that there were eight or ten in the city of Toronto who represented rural constituencies, and that the reason why Toronto was not given her quota of representation in the House of Commons in proportion to the population was because she had residents in the city who represented rural constituencies; ergo, they represented the city as well as they did the country constituencies. If that be correct, and it is correct as a fact, what have county boundaries to do with the selection of these men? They were not selected because they lived in the county; they were selected because the party machine, in some cases, forced them upon the party who were willing to accept them. I do not know, but I think my hon. friend did not live in the constituency he represented.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I was gerrymandered out of it by the measure you are defending.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not in the first place. If the hon. gentleman was gerrymandered out of his residence, he retained his seat, so that the gerrymander did not affect his seat in the House of Commons. I did not live in the riding which I represented for twenty-five years. I lived in a city in the same county, but not in the riding, so that the argument, as far as that is concerned, is, to my mind, valueless. My hon. friend gave as a reason why this Redistribution Bill was introduced—that it was one of the planks of their platform at the last election.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They claim that they have carried out all the promises they made.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We have been engaged in the business.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—As far as the Senate would allow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the government of the day had carried out the pledges that they made at the election we might have some respect for that declaration. Did they not pledge themselves to give us free trade as it is in England? Did they not pledge themselves also to abolish the "robbers great and the robbers small." Did they not tell us that this country was cursed with a protective policy which they were going to wipe out of existence? How have they carried out that pledge? By increasing the duties on some articles in the tariff. Take the duty on carpets, for instance. It was 25 per cent under the old tariff. They raised it 10 per cent, and then, like the fakirs, brought it down, and said to the importers, "You shall have 35 per cent with twenty-five off," leaving the duty 26¼ per cent instead of 25. We shall have before us in a day or two a bounty bill, granting bounties for the next five years larger than ever the Conservative party proposed to give in order to protect one industry.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—That was a bad example.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELLL—The hon. gentleman smiles. I am glad the hon. gentleman is in good humour. Is that a $52,000 smile? If we increase it on other things we will have a smile that will please the whole of us.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What about public works to be given only to the lowest tender?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not dealing with that. The hon. gentleman is better acquainted with that question than I am. However, I will drop that portion of the subject with this broad declaration: If they had carried out their pledges, we might have some respect for this. No doubt they made this pledge, but I do not think they ever anticipated, when they made it, that they would have attempted a redistribution until after the census. The leader of the present government said in a speech that he made upon this question, that the law provided for a redistribution after each decennial census, hence he never contemplated any such abortion as we have before us to-day. After making the motion to which I referred this afternoon, the Hon. Sir Wilfrid, then Mr. Laurier, used this expression:

> So it seems to me that the proposition involved in the amendment ought to commend itself to the judgment of every man in the House who appreciates British precedent, British institutions and, above all, British fair play.

That is a noble sentiment.

> The periodical redistribution of seats in this House is a standing order of our constitution.

There is no question about that and that is the ground upon which we contend that no general redistribution should take place until after the decennial census. The Confederation Act provides that on the completion of the census in the year 1871 and in each subsequent decennial census the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—"Shall be."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Did I not say that.

Hon Mr. MILLS—Yes, but I am emphasizing the word for you.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad the hon. gentleman did, because it is imperative, and that is what I desire to impress on my hon. friend. With the permission of the House I will read a further declaration of Sir Wilfrid's on the occasion I have referred to:

> The periodical distribution of seats in this House is a standing order of our constitution. It is not a matter as to which the government are free to act, which they can repudiate or can accept; if it were so it would be open to each party to deal with it in the manner best suited to its own interests, in the conception which both parties hold of their own rights. But it is not such a matter? The government in introducing this bill are simply carrying out an organic disposition of constitutional law, and we submit that it would be a monstrous consequence if, when the government are carrying out an organic disposition of the constitutional law they were to carry it out in such a way as to steal an advantage over their opponents.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear; that is what you did.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He lays down the proposition that it is imperative with Parliament to deal with this question of redistribution after each decennial census, based on the population of each province. If Quebec, which is the pivot on which the whole principle revolves, increases her population and the other provinces do not, then the other provinces lose representation just in proportion to the decrease in the population, while Quebec retains the same number that she did at confederation. Now, if it were intended that any redistribution should take place between these periods, why does the Act not say so? If you turn to the Confederation Act you will find that special power is given to the local legislatures to change, alter and amend their electoral districts just as they please. It says, in reference to the provinces:

In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the class of subjects next herein enumerated; that is to say, the amendment, from time to time, notwithstanding anything in this Act, of the constitution of the provinces, except as regards the office of Lieutenant-Governor.

There they have the power to abolish their legislative councils, deal with the local parliament, to increase or decrease their representation as they think proper. That is not the case with the federal power.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not as to numbers. We have not the power, except periodically, to alter the representation as to number from each province. That is the only restriction.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman had kept quiet for a moment I would have told him so. I say the Confederation Act does not say in plain words that you shall not change your electoral districts, but it makes a provision for redistribution as to the numbers, based upon the population of each province as compared with the unit of the province of Quebec. And just in proportion to the increase in each province, so in proportion would the representation take place. Now, if it were intended that there should be any manipulation of these constituencies between these periods, I take it for granted the law would have made that provision, as it has done in the case of the provinces. There is one hon. gentleman who shakes his head. Why should it not be so? Does any one suppose for a moment that the fathers of confederation, when they were discussing this question, ever contemplated a change in the electoral districts just before every election? Supposing we recognized this principle. Here is a change just on the very verge of another election, and, what makes it still worse, a year afterwards the census must be taken and another redistribution takes place, so that, in many cases, the representative of the people would not be representing those who elected him, and it would be placing in the hands of every government that comes into power the right to so manipulate the constituencies, as to be to their party advantage, just as was pointed out by the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the extract from his speech which I have just read.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was what was done in 1882. The election occurred in 1882, immediately after the redistribution, the same year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So it must be with you. That was only carrying out the imperative requirements of the Act. Where is the point in what the hon. gentleman says. The election took place after the decennial census, simply because the time of Parliament had expired and it could not be helped. So it will be with my hon. friends if they retain power sufficiently long, or if they should dissolve, as they might do immediately after the census if they pleased, if anything justified it in the interests of the party to which he belongs or in the interest of the Dominion; but there is this absurdity, if I may use the expression without being offensive, of that interruption. The hon. gentleman wished to impress on my mind that the law says it shall be done, and in that case they had no alternative but to go to the people.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My point is this: The hon. gentleman intimated it could only be for some very atrocious reason we would propose to redistribute before the election.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not say anything of the kind. What I said was that a party in power might do so, and if I express my own individual opinion, I would say you were doing it now for no other purpose than to benefit yourselves politically at the coming election, and the instances I have given of the manipulation of the constituencies of Toronto and London, and leaving other constituencies alone, is the very best evidence of the intention of the government in the law that they have proposed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are correcting an outrage.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is well to correct all errors. It is well to correct an outrage, but in correcting that outrage I hold it is not the duty of any one to commit one tenfold worse. You had better bear the ills you have than fly to others that you know not of. Is the hon. gentleman correcting an error by adding two suburbs which are in two of the York ridings, for electoral purposes, to the city of Toronto, and for what purpose? For the purpose of cutting off the heads of McLean and Clarke Wallace, and no other reason, and then in order to carry out the principle which he admires so much in other constituencies, is going to divide up the city into five constituencies. What I contend is, that the action of the government of to-day is a direct and positive violation of the spirit of the constitution. I do not say that it is a violation of the letter of the constitution, but I do say that if the fathers of confederation had ever contemplated the possibility of an outrage such as is contemplated to day, they would have made provision in the British North America Act to prevent it. Sir John Macdonald said, when he was replying to the Hon. Edward Blake upon this point :

> Legal power is right, but the expediency of exercising that power is a different affair. The only matter in which the House of Lords cannot interfere is the Supply Bill. We know that when the Senate threw out the Tuckersmith Bill, the hon. gentleman did not deny the constitutional right of that House to interfere in the matter, and they interfered readily and well on that occasion, because they prevented a breach of the British North America Act by so doing.

This is what one of the best constitutional authority that we have had in the Dominion says. He lays down this principle, he says that the legal power exists, but that it is inexpedient to treat every question upon that ground, and he winds up by saying that the rejection by the Senate of the Tuckersmith Bill, which most of you understand without my explaining, prevented a breach of the British North American Act. How did they prevent a breach of the British North American Act? By rejecting a bill which changed electoral districts from the position which they occupied under the general Redistribution Act. Sir John Macdonald also made these remarks in 1887, to be found at page 840 of the Commons debates :—

> The principle was set early in our legislature, that there should be no readjustment of the constituencies either in regard to the boundaries or otherwise, except every ten years after the taking of the census, and I think it would really be well that we should adhere to that rule. Occasionally by the addition of a rural portion of a county to a town, there may be a little inconvenience, but it would be much better that that inconvenience should be borne rather than we should have little bills brought in on every alteration of the boundaries of any municipality except either urban or rural—to alter the bounds of the constituencies for electoral purposes.
>
> We would have continual taunts of gerrymandering thrown across the floor.
>
> We had better leave the matter as it is so that the electoral districts shall remain both as to boundaries and otherwise as they are until the next readjustment.
>
> Depend upon it, we would bring upon ourselves a great deal of trouble and a great many objections from both sides of the House by making any other alternations in the boundaries of constituencies, because if the argument of convenience is adopted in one case that argument will apply to another, and various reasons will be given why it is convenient to alter the boundaries of constituencies.
>
> The boundary of a constituency should not be altered except once in ten years.

That is the principle that was laid down by one of the first statesmen in the Dominion, and it is the principle on which we should continue to act until after the next census.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Was that Sir John Macdonald or Sir John Thompson?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Sir John Thompson held, as Sir John Macdonald did, that except as a matter of convenience or necessity, it would be well to adhere to county boundaries where possible. Take my own county; you could not very well split it up with other counties. It was divided into three ridings at confederation, but not exclusively on the basis of population. My own constituency was the smallest, numerically considered ; to-day it is the largest of the three, because it has a large territory which since has become settled. So it is with all new sections of the country. I remember distinctly when Muskoka was set apart as a separate constituency. It had only about eight or nine thousand inhabitants, while many others lying south and east had much larger population, but it was growing rapidly, and to-day it is one of the largest constituencies in Western Ontario. In dealing with this question the hon. member (Mr. Blake) spoke long and very earnestly on the question of redistribution. He used not very moderate language towards his opponents, but he wound up his speech with these words, which are so applicable to the present case as applied to my hon. friend opposite that I take the liberty to read them for his edification. I have no right to assume that he has not read the speech himself, but the sentiments are so applicable to the case now under consideration that he can truly apply them to himself. They are the views which most of us hold to-day as to the reasons for changing the boundaries of the various constituencies in Ontario particularly. He said:

> Full deliberation is needed for another cause—because this measure is exceptional in its character in this: All other measures of legislation which you bring before Parliament, you submit, when the time or trial comes, to the constituencies which sent you to do their business; you submit to the same men and the same set of tribunals throughout the community; you go before them and you say: "Five years ago you entrusted me with power to act as your representative; such and such things have I done, I bring them before you as the fruits of my labours in that capacity,—and I ask you who sent me to judge whether I am deserving of your continued confidence or no." But this is a measure, Sir, which proposes to alter the jury, to alter the tribunal, to provide for a different set of jurors to try those who are to come before them very shortly for trial upon the events of the last four or five years. No longer are we to appeal to the same set of men before whom we fought the battle four years ago,—no longer are we to say to them: "You returned me by such and such a majority, or you defeated me by such and such a majority, and I appeal to you, on the one hand, to continue your confidence, or, on the other hand, to reverse your vote of want of confidence on the issues which have been raised during those four or five years." No, it is proposed to provide for a different set of jurors, to whom hon. gentlemen, afraid to appeal to those who sent them here, propose to appeal to vindicate their conduct.
> I commend that to the careful consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite, to whom it is specially applicable now.

There could not be language found that suits the present occasion so well as the language used by Mr. Blake, and I apply it with all the force I can to the position in which we are placed to-day, and also to the hon. gentleman. I do not propose to continue my remarks further. I have laid down what I believe to be the correct principle on which this Parliament should act, and that is, not to interfere with the electoral divisions until after the decennial census has been taken. If this bill now becomes law, the hon. gentleman will have a different jury to whom to appeal, and immediately afterwards there will be another jury provided for those who are to contest the succeeding elections. That should not be the case. I hold that this Senate has the right to deal with this question as it thinks proper, and I resent the doctrine laid down by the hon. Minister of Justice that it is a matter not affecting this branch of Parliament, and therefore we should not deal with it, if it were right for the hon. gentleman opposite in 1882 to make a violent speech against the Redistribution Bill of that session and move the six months' hoist, is it criminal in us, now, to treat this bill in the same way? If he had a right, occupying the seat that I do now, and holding the position that I hold to-day in reference to the opposition, to move the six months' hoist, what right have these hon. gentlemen to declare that this House has no authority to interfere with a question of this kind? The hon. gentleman in 1882 used this language, which is somewhat edifying:

> In my judgment no greater blow has ever been aimed at confederation than this bill; and nothing has tended more to shake the autonomy of the Dominion; no free man can accept it.
>
> I say that when the liberties and privileges of a people are infringed upon by an accidental majority in Parliament the minority so trampled upon will seek redress.
>
> The people whose interests are affected will not stand it.
>
> They will not submit to or tolerate it, and this Senate has now a great duty to perform in the premises if it is to be truly a safeguard for the minority.

These were tolerably strong words, and was followed by a motion for the six months' hoist. Now, I propose to follow the example of my hon. friend to some extent. I do not propose to be so discourteous as to move the six months' hoist, but I shall move something else which I think will have about the same effect, and give a reason for it. But I will paraphrase my hon. friend's remarks before making the motion.

In my judgment no greater blow has ever been aimed at confederation and the basis of the whole electoral system, than this bill; and nothing will tend more to shake the autonomy of the Dominion; no free man having any regard for himself or his country can accept it. I say that when the liberties and privileges of a people are infringed upon as now proposed by an accidental majority in Parliament secured through false pretenses, the minority so trampled upon will seek redress. The people whose interests are affected will not stand it. They will not submit to or tolerate it, and this Senate has now a great duty to preform in the premises if it is to be truly a safeguard for the people of Canada. Believing that to be the case, I propose the following motion in amendment to that made by the Minister of Justice :

That it be resolved, that it is inexpedient to proceed further with the bill now under consideration inasmuch as it is provided by section 51 of the British North America Act, that the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons shall be readjusted upon the completion of each decennial census subject to and in accordance with the rules in the said Act set forth, and as the next decennial census will under the provisions of the Confederation Act be taken in 1901, a readjustment of constituencies in the Dominion made previous to such census being taken would, in the opinion of this House, be a violation of the spirit of said Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The language that I used in 1882, which my hon. friend has quoted, was simply justified by the circumstances, and I adhere to the views I then expressed, that never in the history of this country was a more dangerous Act introduced and passed by a political party than the one to which reference has been made. It was an entire departure from principles that had always prevailed in Canadian history. Before confederation, hon. gentlemen will seek in vain to find any instance, except the three particular cases to which Sir John Macdonald himself alluded in 1872, where there was a departure from county boundaries, and in the Confederation Act the counties were set forth with great particularity. The county of Lanark was divided into two ridings. The county of Leeds was divided into South Leeds and North Leeds ; Northumberland was divided into two ridings, Northumberland East and Northumberland West ; Ontario was divided into Ontario South and Ontario North; York was divided into East and West York ; Wentworth into North and South ; Elgin, East and West ; Wellington, East and West, and so on. The hon. gentleman has quoted the British North America Act to show that this is a departure from the principles laid down in that Act. I dispute that. The Act reads perfectly plainly. It has reference to the distribution of the members that represent the several provinces. It has no reference to the internal arrangement of any one province. The language is not capable of a second interpretation. It reads :

On the completion of the census in the year 1871 and on the subsequent decennial census the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted, not of any one province, but the four provinces.

Shall be readjusted by such authority in such manner and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides.

Quebec is given a fixed number, and the other provinces a number varying according to the population of those provinces, and the proportion which it bore to the population of Quebec. That is perfectly clear, and the hon. gentlemen themselves have always acted on that principle. No later than 1893, after the Act of 1892 had been passed, the government of which my hon. friend was a member, rearranged the constituencies a second time, because the first arrangement did not suit them. My hon. friend referred to Nipissing as if that stood alone ; but I have the Act under my hand here, and not only Nipissing but Hochelaga, Ottawa City, Chambly and Verchères were in the same position. The Act says it shall consist of Longueuil, Chambly, St. Lambert, St. Basil, and so on.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—A repetition of the old Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, not at all. It would be here if it were. It was altered and it reads :—Paragraphs so and so are hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor. The electoral list of Rouville shall consist of so and so, L'Ange Gardien, St. Jean Baptiste, St. Hilaire and so on. Bagot in the same way, and the electoral districts of Richelieu, St. Hyacinthe and Provencher was changed. No better evidence can be offered than the fact that the hon. gentlemen themselves arranged the constituency. No later than 1895 they introduced a bill changing two constituencies, Verchères and Joliette, and yet those gentlemen attempt to argue that it is a disturbance of the constitutional Act to now rearrange the counties in one province. The British North America Act is perfectly plain upon the point. It had reference only to the readjustment of the representation in the several provinces. It had no connection whatever with the readjustment of boundaries of electoral districts within the province, so long as they did not disturb the number. We make no disturbance in the number of representatives from Ontario. The number bears exactly the same relation to the other provinces that it did before the introduction of this bill. It does not disturb that at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If this clause has no reference whatever to any change or any arrangement within the province, and the province gets ten new members, how is he going to dispose of them ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That can only be rearranged after a decennial census, but there are no new members added here.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If eight or ten members come to a province, they have to be distributed over the province, and how is that to be done?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We make no disturbance of the number representing each province. We simply readjust the boundaries of those counties which were gerrymandered in 1892; that is all we do. The hon. gentleman who introduced this motion brought into the debate very many subjects which I do not propose to discuss, but I think some were manifestly unfair and done with a view of reflecting on the members who form the government of this country. He spoke about the men who had committed those atrocious frauds in West Elgin having been down in Ottawa, and no doubt the inference was endeavoured to be thrown out that they had conferences with the government. That is exceedingly bad taste. In the first place, this government did not equire any advice on the subject. They laid down the principle. Nobody can give them any advice. Hon. gentlemen may smile, but if they just reflect for a moment, we simply said: "We will restore the county boundaries, as they existed before 1892."

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The government did not consult Captain Sullivan.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, we left that to the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There was nothing to consult him on. There was no one to consult with. We decided that, as the gerrymander existed west of Toronto, the eastern portion of the province should not be disturbed. We wish only to undo the gross irregularities that had been perpetrated under the Act of 1882; limiting it entirely to this, because it was very well recognized that the gerrymander was not carried out to the same extent in eastern Ontario that it was in western Ontario. When we laid down that principle, we did not require anybody's advice. We had no control over it. We simply said "The county of Huron returns three members: we will allow the county of Huron to continue to return three members. We will exclude those townships which have been brought in, and will take in those townships which have been excluded, restoring simply the county boundaries, and eaving it entirely to an independent body to say how it should be divided." Is that not fair to both parties? Can anybody point out the possibility of our foreshadowing whether any substantial gain would be obtained by the Liberal party by so doing? No one could tell. It was absolutely impossible. We had no opportunity. We laid down the principle that if a county had only the requisite number to elect one member, it would only have one member. No one could tell what the effect of that was to be on the county. If the county was entitled to two members, and had at the present time two, we said "Leave it to the county itself, and let it have two members; let the county be divided as the judiciary may decide." And the same way with regard to the counties of Grey, Huron and Bruce, and those counties which are entitled to a larger number. I maintain, therefore, that nobody could give us any advice. We did not leave any option with ourselves. Anybody reading the bill will see that it is laid down on a strict, absolute principle and is not susceptible of any alteration. The judges have simply to divide those counties as they may think proper. They do not go outside of that. The hon. gentleman has endeavoured to show that this House, in the discussion of what was known as the Tuckersmith Bill declared that it should not have been introduced at that particular time. I took part in the debate on that bill, and the rea on the bill was thrown out was a very simple one. Mr. Cameron's election was contested. It was making a considerable difference to Mr. Cameron whether Tuckersmith township was excluded or not in reference to the election to be held if he were declared to be unseated, and he was so declared. This House held that while the matter was sub judice the constituency should not be disturbed. The question of readjustment had nothing whatever to do with it. It was not mentioned in the debate. I challenge any hon. gentleman to look up the debate. The whole point turns on the fact that it was improper, while the case was before the court, that Mr. Cameron should be allowed to interfere with, or disturb the county boundaries, because it was at his instance the legislation was inaugurated. That is the real truth of the bill.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It was not right.

Hon. Mr. AIKENS—I do not think that was the real reason. The reason was because the township of Tuckersmith had already voted, and after it had cast its vote, then they wanted to attach it to the constituency represented by Mr. Cameron for the purpose of electing him.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is what I say. The Senate held that if Mr. Cameron had to go back to a new election, the constituency should be the same as the constituency in which the vote was cast before—that there should be no alteration of the boundaries between the first and second elections.

Hon. Mr. AIKENS—That was the decision of this House, but that was not the argument used by the hon. Secretary of State at that time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I know that. I am bound to say that I think this House was right, although at the time I may have taken a different view for the reasons I gave. No doubt there was an attempt to gain a party advantage. In looking back on the occurrences of some twenty-six years ago, or more, I think that the verdict of this House was a proper one, that while the member had to go back to his election, the constituency should not be disturbed. My point in the argument is that the question of the readjustment of representation had nothing whatever to do with the motives which prompted this House to throw out the bill. I lay down this principle, that the Act of 1882 was a violent departure from the rule that always had prevailed in Canada. Before confederation the county boundaries were invariably preserved at all events in Ontario, and I believe also in Quebec. The question of representation by population has been drawn into this debate. It has nothing whatever to do with the representation in the province. I took part in the question, and my hon. friend opposite took part later in the fifties, 1856 to 1859. It was the prevailing question, and it was the question which no doubt forced on the confederation, and it was due to the fact that the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada were each represented by 65 members. Bruce, Grey, Huron and Wellington were filling up rapidly, and the population of Ontario had grown very much faster than that of Quebec, and therefore the agitation arose in Upper Canada for a larger representation, and that was representation by population. It had no reference to the several constituencies within either province, but it had entirely reference to the greater population of the one province and the less population of the other. That was the whole point in the representation by population agitation that afterwards led to the union of the provinces, and that opinion is confirmed by the fact that when the union formed Upper Canada was given a larger representation. The representation of Quebec was fixed at 65, and that was to be the standard from which the representatives in the other provinces was to be derived, but had no possible connection with the internal arrangements, and as I have shown, the late government felt no hesitation in altering boundaries within the provinces. It did not disturb the number of members which represented the province, and therefore they were quite right and quite justified in altering the boundaries if they thought it was a proper policy to pursue. What I maintain is that the Act of 1882 was not only a departure, but that it was framed entirely with a view at annihilating the Liberal party in this country, and that was the reason for the strong language I used on the occasion of my moving the six months' hoist. I say, too, that in the arrangement of the boundaries in 1882 the individual members of the House were consulted as to what townships they wanted in the constituency, or what townships they wanted excluded from the constituency, that the principle that my hon. friend alluded to of equalization of the population was not a feature at all in it, as I will show by reading some extracts from the Act of 1882. The electoral district of Brockville with 15,000 population, was taken out of South Leeds with a population of 23,000. There was no attempt there at equalizing the numbers—a small one and a large one. The population of Cardwell was only 15,300. It was formed out of part of Peel, Simcoe and Dufferin had only 15,000 and it adjoined North Wellington with a population of 24,000 and South Wellington with the same population. There was no attempt there at equalization. Then Durham West, with a population of 15,000 adjoins Ontario South with a population of 19,000. Frontenac, with a population of 13,000, adjoins South Leeds with a population of 22,000. Grenville South, with only 12,000 adjoins Dundas with 20,000. North Leeds and Grenville with a population of 13,000 adjoins Carleton with a population of 21,000. Lennox with 14,000 adjoins Addington with 24,000. Middlesex West with 17,000 adjoins Middlesex East with a population of 25,000. It would seem, therefore, in the division that the question of population did not enter, because if they were desirous of having an equal number of population with the number in these adjoining constituencies it would have been an easy matter to make the alteration, and more particularly as the lines laid down by the hon. leader of the opposition would lead one to the conclusion that according to his view municipal boundaries should be abolished entirely and electoral districts formed out of many districts as were defined, abandoning a principle that had prevailed not only in Canada at all times, but also in England even to this day. You never hear of their going outside their county boundaries in England to make up a district; on the contrary, instructions are given, when new electoral districts are formed, that they must not go outside county boundaries and must not even divide parishes. Peel with a population of 15,000, adjoins West York with a population of 41,000. There was a chance to have made a better distribution if the motive had been the equalization of population, but hon. gentlemen see that those figures are conclusive, and that the redistribution had no reference to equalization of population. Then, again, I ask the hon. gentleman what justification is there for taking a township out of a county and then returning into that county a township from another district of equal population? Take, for instance, the county of Oxford with a population of 49,000. It can be easily divided into two ridings, as it always had been for the last half century up to 1882. Blenheim with a population of 9,600 was taken out of Oxford and replaced by East Thorpe with an equal population of 9,630. Now, is such legislation defensible to take a township of 9,000 out of a county and replace it with another township of equal population? Surely there was some motive in that. The general conclusion was—and it was pretty well discussed and practically recognized in that particular county—that it was simply a desire to "hive the Grits."

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It was in the county was it not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, not at all. Two townships were taken out and two more put in. I have a map here, which the hon. gentleman can look at if he desires. Blenheim, with a population of 5,000, is taken out of Oxford and put into Brant. Burford, with a population of 4,600, was taken out of Brant and put in Oxford. What was the sense of that?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Does the hon. gentleman want my opinion?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I will give it by and by.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was to "hive the Grits." I do not think any fair minded man would say that it was a justifiable thing to do, to take a township out of one county and place it in another, and to take from that other county a township of similar population to replace it. What was the object of it, unless to give the riding a different complexion?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And a Liberal township was taken out of Perth and put into Oxford.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That continues on the list. I do not desire to weary the House with details, but I merely quote that to show the principle that guided the hand that drew up the Act of 1882—that it could only be prompted by personal motives.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—To prove that, it would be necessary to show the population of the district from which that portion was taken, and to show the population of the district in the part of Oxford County in which it was placed.

Hon Mr. SCOTT—I can give my hon. friend the population of those counties. The populations were, Brant 36,000, but up to that time it had been divided into two ridings, North and South Brant. Oxford was a county that had about the fair number for an equal division. Oxford had 49,857, which would have made a division of 24,000 odd for each member, which is about the number that the larger counties in Ontario contain. But certainly no more glaring instances can be given than those which I have just quoted. Take Brant, which I gave a moment ago. What could be gained where you take 5,600 out of Oxford and put them in Brant, and take 4,939 out of Brant and put them in Oxford? That certainly would require some explanation. It could not be to equalize the population.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—They took out more than they put in.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As I said, the principles that have guided the government in framing this bill are not open to cavil. It cannot be charged that any political motive was in view, because no one could tell what the result would be. It could not be a gerrymander. In the case of the city of Toronto, we simply take the city as we take the various counties. We made no change in the city of Toronto. We did not alter it at all. We said, "Whatever population the city comprises within the municipality of Toronto, shall be divided so that the city of Toronto shall have five members."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why did not the government add New Edinburgh to the city of Ottawa, of which it is a ward, as they did the two outlying districts to Toronto.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was felt the gerrymander was more gross west of Durham, taking the line west, and it was felt that it was not desirable to disturb the eastern portion of Ontario. We only propose to remove those portions of the Act of 1882 that were most gross and indefensible.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Why did the government deal with the city of St. John and the county as they are doing if that was their only object?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are parties in the city of St. John that have a double vote, they vote for a member of the city and member of the county, if I am well advised.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is not by the Act of 1882. That arrangement is 100 years old.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was the rule, and it was thought to be an anachronism. Our attention was called to it in taking the recent plebiscite, where it appeared that persons in St. John had a double vote which did not exist anywhere else in the Dominion, and it seemed only reasonable to place St. John city and county on the same plane as before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There was no gerrymander of the city of Toronto?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg pardon. The city of Toronto, as constituted under the present bill, is confined entirely to the city of Toronto. The county of York is confined to the county of York.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman stated that they confined their operations to the gerrymander in the west, in order to correct what they thought was a wrong; the city of Toronto, to which he was referring, was not gerrymandered in 1882 nor in 1892. It remained precisely the same.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We did not desire to interfere with the principle we laid down.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What was that principle?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The principle was that there should be no disturbance of county boundaries, and we have not disturbed county boundaries.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I gave a dozen illustrations.

Hon Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman cannot point out a single case. The one principle prevails through the whole bill. It is not open to criticism, and in the course that we followed we adopted the principle that hon. gentlemen are so often desirous of quoting and that is the principle that prevails in England. We thought that that was certainly the fairest way. I have in my hand a copy of the instructions given to the boundary commission when the last rearrangement was made in Great Britain. It was made on the principles we adopted in this bill. They proposed to have the division by certain officials, who are known as commissioners, and I will read a paragraph from the instructions given to those commissioners and those are the instructions that the judges will no doubt act upon when they are making the division:

The duties of the commission will be the following:—

1. With respect to counties:

In the first place to examine the survey maps of the Ordnance Department and determine from them and other documents in the possession of that department and of the Local Government Board, and from other available information, the boundaries to be assigned to the several divisions of each county to be divided. In forming the divisions, the population of the several divisions excluding that of the parliamentary boroughs, should be equalized so far as praticable, and care must be taken in all those cases where there are populous localities of an urban character to include them in one and the same division, unless this cannot be done without producing grave inconvenience, and involving boundaries of a very irregular and objectionable character.

Subject to this important rule, each division should be as compact as possible with respect to geographical position, and should be based upon well-known existing areas, such as petty sessional divisions, or other areas consisting of an aggregate of parishes. In some instances, however, it may be found necessary to include separate parishes, but a divisional boundary must never be allowed to intercept a parish.

Now these are the instructions given to the commissioners who lay out the electoral district in England. There is no departure whatever from the county boundaries, and in the division of the various counties they particularly desire that even the parishes shall not be divided. I say, therefore, that the proposal made by this government is beyond cavil, beyond challenge. You cannot class it in the category with the legislation of 1882 or 1892, because it is on a fixed principle, and it is fair to both parties. No man can forecast what the division will be. Take the county of Bruce. The whole county is to be divided into three ridings. We have no control over the divisions. It is as fair to the Conservative party as to the Liberal party. The same with the other counties. The judges will endeavour to have the population as nearly equal as possible, but nobody can say this government had anything to gain by passing an Act of this sort and leaving it entirely to a court to say what the boundaries of the various subdivisions shall be. The hon. leader of the opposition argued that the electoral districts might exist in this Act wholly irrespective of the county boundary, and he instanced the subjects of legislation which come before Parliament and pointed out that they were not matters of a local character and therefore it should not matter how the electoral district was formed. That is not the principle which has prevailed in England. We look to follow English precedents. They are grand principles to adopt, and they are not open to question, and yet in England, where the questions certainly are as broad, and a good deal broader than in Canada, they scrupulously determine and adhere to county boundaries as the only fair principle that can guide them. It cannot be said that this government in seeking to obtain this legislation is hoping to gain an advantage over its opponents because they cannot possibly foresee what the result may be. It was not so in 1882, when it was notorious that members of Parliament were consulted as to their particular constituencies. If a member had a township in his county which he did not wish to have included, he simply had to say "Cut that township out and give me a township from another county." That was the principle which governed. We have not consulted anybody in this. There was nothing to consult about. There was a broad well defined principle laid down, and that has not been in any iota departed from, so I challenge anybody to maintain for a moment that we could have gained anything by consulting anybody, because we could not depart from the principle. It was arbitray and positive and very plain, to be read by anybody. Hon. gentlemen know very well that the Liberal party in this country felt that a great wrong had been committed in 1882 and they felt it was incumbent upon them, whenever they obtained office, that they should at all events produce before the Parliament of Canada a bill proposing to obliterate the Act of 1883 as far as its more gross features were concerned, and to submit in lieu thereof one that could not be challenged as far as its fairness goes.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—My hon. friend the Secretary of State, asked me for an explanation. It is strange to me why we have this redistribution or gerrymander at all. The people of this country wonder at it. What is the necessity for it? Are these gentlemen afraid of the people? If they have not the fear of the Lord before them, they have the fear of the people. They do not wish to appeal to the same constituencies that returned them to power, and my hon. friend the Secretary of State has admitted here to-night that he did an injustice, for party purposes, in the case of the Tuckersmith Bill. Hon. gentlemen have heard him say so. He is doing an injustice now for party purposes, and yet the government tell us there is no gerrymander in this business—that they leave all to the judges. I have every respect for the judiciary of this country, but I say to the government of the day, when they are bringing down the judges from the bench to take part in a political matter they are doing a great injustice to the judges themselves and to the country, because it will destroy the confidence the people have in the judiciary if they are to become political agents to divide the counties. The Minister of Justice tells us there is no community of feeling between the people unless they live inside of one county. What has that to do with it? Have we not all to bear a share of the expenses of governing this country? Have we not all to come under the same tariff, are we not all governed by the same laws? The local legislature governs in local matters. The hon. minister said, when he introduced this bill, that the government had promised the people they would do it. Let us consider for a moment how many of their promises to the people they have carried out. When the hon. the leader of the opposition was speaking, this occurred to me, and he might have taken it for an interruption, when I asked him what were the pledges. They were going to reduce the expenditure of this country. I believe the Minister of Justice said they could reduce the annual expenditure by $2,000,000.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—$4,000,000.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They were going to reduce the expenses in every way; they were going to reduce the public debt, and their policy was to give all contracts only by public tender and to the lowest bidder. Have they done that? Have they not departed from everything they promised to the people, and in order to use Captain Sullivan and others and the machine to get back into power again, they propose this bill. Hon. gentlemen talk about the population to-day. What can they tell us about the population? It is merely a matter of guess. The latest census is that of 1891, and we do not at present really know what the population of Canada is. Let them wait till another census is taken, and I think from what I see in this House, they will have to wait; let them try to carry out some of the pledges they made to the people of this country before introducing this bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is one of them.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It is a very small one. The hon. gentlemen did not promise when they were going to do it; they are doing it now for party advantage. They leave it to the judges to divide the counties, but the government lay down the scheme as to how it shall be divided.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—They do not divide St. John, N.B.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Of course they they do not. Their aim is to get additional strength for their party and I am not here to help them in that. I have faith in the electors to do what is right and in the country if it is properly governed, but I have not very much faith in the gentlemen that are governing the country to-day, and why? The people of this Dominion have no faith in them because they have violated every pledge they made before they attained power. They have violated their pledge to reduce the public expenditure. They have violated their pledge to let contracts only by public tender and to the lowest bidder, and they have violated every other pledge but this one that they made to the country. They advocated free trade and turned round to protection. That was an advantage to the country, but it was a violation of their promise. They have been a spendthrift government, and they are afraid of the wrath of the people and now they want to gerrymander the constituencies in order to retain power. If the people sustain them at the next election they can rearrange the constituencies as they think proper after the next census, but while I am here and have a voice, I shall not support legislation of this kind. Let them wait their time out as they should do. If they are afraid of the people I am not. The people of this country know what they are doing. They will weigh the government in the balance and will find them wanting.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

Bill (162) "An Act to incorporate the Belleville Prince Edward Bridge Company."—(Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)

EDMONTON DISTRICT RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (158) "An Act respecting the Edmonton District Railway Company, and to change its name to the Edmonton, Yukon and Pacific Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved that the bill be read a third time to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—However great my respect is for any report that comes from the Railway Committee, of which I am a member, I cannot in justice to myself allow this report to pass without calling the attention of this honourable House to what I consider a serious mistake. The question is as to the want and absolute lack of description of the line of railway. We are dealing here with a company that is obtaining from us privileges to build a railroad starting from where we do not know to different places with which we are not at all acquainted. Their line of railway is described in the bill as follows:—

1. The Edmonton District Railway Company, hereinafter called "the company," may lay out, construct and operate from some point on the line of railway which it is already authorized to construct, a line of railway either to the Yellow Head Pass or to the Peace River Pass, and thence by such route as is found or deemed most practicable to a port in the province of British Columbia, or to connect with the line of railway which the British Pacific Railway Company is authorized to construct, and may also construct and operate a branch line to some point on the navigable waters of the Yukon River.

In this description there is nothing definite. We do absolutely not know where we start from and where we are going to land. It is said that the road is to commence on the line of railway which it is already authorized to construct. Now, the railway which the company is already authorized to construct starts:

From some point within the town of Edmonton in the district of Alberta, North-west Territories of Canada; thence in a southerly direction to a point in South Edmonton on the Calgary and Edmonton Railway, and to connect therewith; also from some point within the said town of Edmonton, thence in a north-westerly direction via the village of St. Albert to a point on the Athabasca River at or near Fort Assiniboine with a branch to Stony Plains; also from some point within the said town of Edmonton, thence in a north-easterly direction to a point at or near Fort Saskatchewan, together with a branch to a point on Sturgeon River.

The new railroad is to start from some point between these two points. I have been looking into this former railroad from which, at any place on it, this new railroad is to commence, and I find it runs from Edmonton some ten degrees of longitude west, and some twenty degrees of latitude north, which, as they are running diagonally, would mean a railway about 1,000 miles in length. This new railroad is to start somewhere between these two lines, but neither the committee nor the House are told at what point it is to commence. The length is probably 1,000 miles, from the best calculation I could make, but I could get no exact data as to the distance. A new road starts from some point on that new line, westerly, either to the Yellow Head Pass or the Peace River Pass. Is there any hon. gentleman here who can tell me the distance between these two passes? You will bear in mind that this company is given authority to build westerly at either of these two passes, holding them in the meantime. For two years no one is allowed to touch those passes. It does not say which pass it shall go through, but it may take either of them. I find those passes are some three or four degrees apart, meaning that the space is enormous, and this space is held by the company until they begin, if they begin at all, to construct that railway. Their former railway is not as yet begun. They obtained a charter for a privilege they knew nothing about, and now come and tell us that their road was no good and they are starting on a new venture. They enlarge the areas very much. They are authorized exclusively, to build, because it is not likely we will give the privilege to any other company, should another company, in the meantime, come with a bona fide offer to build a railroad through any of those two passes. Having passed the Rockies at either of these passes, which they hold in the meantime, they are authorized to build then by such route as is found or deemed most practicable to a port in the province of British Columbia. No port is specified. They can start from Vancouver up to opposite Mount St. Elias, an immense distance. They can choose any port and even complicate us with the United States, if they wish. They have the whole Pacific Coast of British Columbia wherein to choose their port. They have also been granted by the committee of which I am a member—I am sorry on this occasion to have been a member of it—the right to connect with a line of railway which the British Pacific Railway Company is authorized to construct. What is that line? It is some line likely to the south of that, but it is a line which traverses the whole of British Columbia, and they have the privilege of striking that line within a distance of 1,000 or 1,500 miles at no specified point. They may also construct and operate a branch line to some point on the navigable waters of the Yukon River. They can strike the Yukon River either at the Pelly River or at the boundary, a range of perhaps a thousand miles. While it has been, and rightly so, the custom for the House and committee to know what they are about, to have maps showing the members of the committee what powers are sought for, in this case it is true we had the map, but nothing definite at all, and this company is given an area in extent equal to all Europe if you except Russia. That would not, of itself, be the greatest objection, but the company has shown that it was not prepared, the first time it came before us, to construct the railway—it was not shown they had any intention to construct it, since they have done nothing, and now they have come and admitted that the road was impracticable. They are in a position now to prevent other companies from doing any service in those regions because they have embraced, I may say, the whole of British Columbia. I call the attention of the House to this state of facts, and move that the House refer back this report to the Railway Committee with instructions to have a better definition of the line.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—If noise were considered an argument, the hon. gentleman would have succeeded very well in making the protest on this occasion. I will only say that this bill is one that passed the House of Commons, where the map of the district was laid before the members. The hon. gentleman from Alberta, in the other House, lives at Edmonton, where the railway starts, and there is no doubt he was paying attention to the matter, and the bill passed with his entire concurrence and satisfaction. The same map was laid before the Senate committee, and examined by them before they passed the bill. This bill simply provides for an amendment to change its name, and it is of no importance. We can all understand that in a great country like the North-west Territories, it is impossible to locate a line of railway within a mile or two. If it comes within a reasonable distance of a certain point, it is doing very well. This railway is intended to develop that western country. My hon. friend has never been there, nor have the persons he refers to ever been in that locality. No company could go in there and make a survey of the ground before they got their charter. It costs thousands of dollars to do it. They know where they want to go, and whether they go by a straight line or a circuitous route, circumstances will determine. I do not see any point in the hon. gentleman's argument, except that he wants to stop the development of that country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There was no division in the committee. The hon. gentleman stood alone.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—There was no division in the committee and why should the hon. gentleman make this fuss now? I think the committee was quite able to deal with all the matters, and I have every faith that the House will adopt the report.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is a question of order in the motion. My hon. friend moved that the bill be referred back to the committee, with instructions to do something which the committee has the power to do without any instructions from the House. The committee can only be given instructions to do something which it would not have the power to do. Consequently the motion is out of order.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman insist upon his motion?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Is the point of order raised by the hon. gentleman from Halifax well taken? I fail to see anything in the point of order, because there is nothing in our usages to show that it is well taken. The House has the right to send back a report if it considers the report incomplete, or the House can give the committee any instructions that they deem proper. My hon. friend's argument would go so far as to say that a report can only be referred back to a committee when new powers are given to it. If the committee had not the power originally to deal with the bill, it would not have the power afterwards, when the bill was referred back to it. The committee must have the power originally to deal with the bill. The bill may be sent back with special instructions. I do not understand that my motion is out of order.

The SPEAKER—The question was on the motion for the third reading of the bill for to-morrow. The hon. gentleman moved in amendment that the bill be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, not for further consideration but with the instruction to obtain from the company a better definition of its line. An instruction can be given to a committee only to confer on it a power which, without such instruction, it would not have. The committee having been satisfied with the information it had, the House cannot instruct the committee to get a better definition of its line. I consider the point of order well taken. Under the circumstances, I do not think the hon. gentleman can make the motion. The question is now on the motion for third reading to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

BUFFALO AND FORT ERIE BRIDGE COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (96) "An Act respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Bridge Company," with amendments.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved concurrence in the amendments. He said:—The essential amendment in the bill fixes more definitely the location of the public work dealt with in the bill itself. The other amendments are largely of an immaterial character.

The motion was agreed to.

THE REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day having been called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Mills for the second reading (Bill 126) "An Act respecting Representation in the House of Commons," and on the motion in amendment thereto of the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON said:—I ask the indulgence of hon. gentlemen for a short time while I give my reasons for supporting the amendment offered by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, as I feel it my duty, before giving my vote upon this very important question, to submit my reasons for doing so to this House. I have heard it alleged that the Senate of Canada has no right to reject a bill of this character, which deals entirely with the organization and the constitution of the House of Commons. On that view I think, on close inquiry, there will not be a serious difference of opinion among the members of this House. I take the ground that we have the most undoubted right to reject this measure if we think proper to do so, and if we come to the conclusion that it is not framed in the public interest. In taking that position it will not be hard to support ourselves by the very best of authority, and I turn to the opinions of eminent English statesmen in the case of the Franchise Act in 1884. It is in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that on that occasion the House of Lords refused to agree to the Franchise Bill of that year, a bill of very great importance indeed, a bill that proposed to give the franchise to 2,000,000 of Englishmen, a measure, too, the principle of which was universally conceded in the country and in the House of Commons by both political parties, as well as in the House of Lords itself, but for reasons which were made plain at that time the House of Lords rejected the bill. On that occasion, two very eminent men placed themselves on record in this way. The Earl of Kimberly, who had charge of the bill, made use of these words:

> Your Lordships have undoubtedly the most perfect right to reject the bill, and to reject it with the direct view that the result may be a dissolution of Parliament.

Lord Rosebery, another Liberal and supporter of this bill, said:

> Every member of this House who has spoken upon this bill has taken it for granted that this House has a perfectly indefeasible right to reject it.

The declaration is here made as plain as language can make it, both by Earl Kimberley and Lord Roseberry, that the House of Lords had an undoubted and indefeasible right to reject the Franchise Bill, a very much more serious bill in its consequences to Great Britain and Ireland than the measure now before us is in reference to the people of Canada. I may make this statement, before going any further, that this House is called upon to consider this question under very peculiar circumstances. It would be hard to find a parallel for the circumstances under which we are called upon to consider the bill which is now before us. Just at this moment, in another place, there is under consideration, or before another branch of Parliament, a measure aimed directly at the independence and co-ordinate powers and dignity of this honourable House, and yet one of the ministers comes down to us with a bill which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition convinced us yesterday is of the most extraordinary character. We are called upon to legislate under a menace. I think it will be impossible, in constitutionally governed countries, to find an instance where the executive have treated a branch of Parliament as the executive have treated us at this moment, in bringing down a measure so indefensible and so unconstitutional as this, and at the same time with a menace on their lips with regard to the independence and co-ordinate powers of this House. You cannot find an example of the kind in constitutional annals. If you want a parallel for this you will have to go back to the last days of the Roman Republic, when dictators and tyrants placed bands of armed men in the public assemblies and courts of justice to intimidate the tribunes of the people and the defenders of personal liberty. What is most remarkable in connection with this measure is that when it was introduced in another place, and on being recommended to this House by the hon. gentlemen representing the executive on this floor on the present occasion, there was no reason given in support of it except one of party advantage. The hon. gentlemen have been unable to show, and have not claimed for this bill, that it is anything other than in the interests of a party. They say the object of this bill is to correct a wrong which they allege was done to the Liberal party seventeen years ago, and for this purpose they are bringing in a bill which is going to disturb a large number of constituencies of Canada. I take the ground that whatever wrong has been done by Redistribution Bills in the past, time has removed the wrong which they could inflict on any party. If you look at the voters' lists of any constituency in Canada of eighteen years ago, and compare them with those of to-day, you will find the old names have passed away and new ones have taken their places. Not only do men come and go, but there is a change which takes place in the opinion of those who do not come or go. No matter how cunningly—no matter how wisely in the interests of party, a redistribution may be made at the time, it will cease to have any sensible party effect, after the general election held soon after the period of the passage of the bill. If hon. gentlemen will tax their memories and go over the constituencies which have been gerrymandered, as alleged, in years gone by, they will find that the strong party proclivities of those affected by the changes carried out at the time, have long ceased to exist. Therefore, if this measure was, as my hon. friends who have defended it from the other side of the House say it was—if it was a measure intended to remove the effects of the redistribution of years ago, or repeal the redistributions of 1882 and 1892, its only effect to-day would be to produce disturbance which will be in the interest of the party that the hon.

gentlemen represent in this House and before the country. I will take the liberty of quoting a few observations made by Sir Louis Davies in 1892, when he was opposing the Redistribution Bill of that year. I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that the words then used by that hon. gentleman are almost entitled to rank as a prophecy. His words will be found in Hansard of 1892, page 3241. He says:

> Experience has shown to us that if the dominant party for the time being, when legislating on a matter affecting the very foundation of representative government, ignore the existence of their opponents and say we will arbitrarily proceed to decide in this way or that way, the result has been and may be again almost to annihilate one of those parties; and when the party which is excluded for the time being happens by a combination of accidents to be returned to power, that party will be, perforce, driven to adopt the same unjust and unfair system, and will introduce another Redistribution Bill not founded on justice or on the lines of the constitution and intended to give the people a fair means of representation, but intended to promote the interests of the dominant party alone.

The words of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries are as I said entitled to rank as a prophecy. He has described what has happened since the party got into power, and even the way they got in, by accident, and having got in, they were going to pass a Redistribution Bill, not on the line of the constitution, not in the interest of the public generally, but in the interests of their own party. All that is about to happen. So far, it has happened exactly as the hon. gentleman predicted it would, and I have only to point out to the House the remarkable acumen of that hon. gentleman in making so very accurate a prediction of what would happen. One of the objections which I have to offer against this bill is that it is not general in its character. When you introduce a Redistribution Bill, except after a decennial census, if such a bill is introduced and passed—admitting for the sake of argument that it is constitutional to do so at any other time than after the decennial census—the bill should be general in its character. It is possible that a Redistribution Bill passed for the purpose of dealing with a change in the population of the provinces might be justified on the ground that it did not go much further than to provide seats for the new members which one province might get, or to so arrange the constituencies as to locate and readjust the number of seats in the province that would lose members. It is possible there might be some justification for such a measure as that, but when you introduce a bill under other circumstances—supposing it is right to do so—it ought to be general in its character, which this bill is not. This bill only provides for dealing with a part of the province of Ontario, with the province of Prince Edward Island, with the city and county of St. John and a few minor alterations in the province of Quebec with which I am not very familiar. That is the whole extent to which this bill goes; but I hold it is not only not general in its character but that it is unjust in its provisions. One would have thought that the government, whenever it came to deal with this question, would have been prepared to rise to the high plane on which they have been treating such questions as this in the past. One would have expected that the hon. gentlemen from the fact that they laid down very high sounding rules on this subject would have acted in a non-partisan way. I turn to the Hansard of 1892, when I find that the leader of the then opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in the House of Commons moved the following resolution:

> Resolved that the bill be not now read a second time, but that it be referred to a conference or committee to be composed of both political parties to agree upon the lines or principles on which a Redistribution Bill should be drawn.

I should like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Justice why his government did not pursue that course when they came to deal with redistribution on the present occasion? Why did they not act on the lines they laid down in their resolution of 1892, and confer with the opposition about a bill? Did my hon. friend make any proposition to the opposition party, either in the House of Commons or in this chamber, with regard to the lines on which this redistribution should be made?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I thought my hon. friend was going to rise and say that he had done so, but he has gone back into his seat and has not made any sign whatever. My hon. friend is very fond of talking of English methods and precedents. I wish to point out to the hon. gentleman, what he knows very well, that in 1884 and 1885, when the last redistribution was made in England, it was brought about by a conference and union of both parties.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to the hon. gentleman, in reply to his inquiry, that we proposed that on a former occasion when the hon. gentleman beside him and his colleagues were in office, and they declined to confer with us and declined to give us any voice in the matter.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says that when he was in opposition that was proposed. It was proposed by the resolution I have read, and he condemned the government of the day because they did not embrace that proposition and agree with it. But now, when he is clothed with responsibility in the matter, he makes no proposition to the opposition in regard to it. He simply proceeds on the very lines that he condemned the Conservatives for proceeding on in 1892. It is a matter that is well known by hon. gentlemen that in 1884-85, propositions were made to the opposition by Mr. Gladstone and his friends in the English government. Propositions were made to the opposition, and it is a matter of history, and it redounds to the infinite credit of English statesmen, not only to the credit of Mr. Gladstone and the men that were associated with him, but to the credit also of the men in opposition—it is a matter of history to-day that Sir Stafford Northcote and Lord Salisbury actually attended cabinet meetings, and consulted with gentlemen delegated by the government to deliberate with them. Lord Salisbury and Sir Stafford Northcote attended at the place where cabinet meetings were held day after day for the purpose of consulting and conferring with regard to the preparation of the Redistribution Bill of 1885. It is a matter altogether beyond cavil and beyond dispute that the lines on which that bill was drafted were lines agreed upon by leaders of both parties and that the bill, as presented to Parliament, was one which had met with their entire support and concurrence and that they unitedly used their influence in carrying that bill into law, and the result was that they gave so good a measure at that time, by the co-operation of both parties, that there has been very little heard of redistribution from that time forward. It was at that time a most important and pressing question. Two million of men were being enfranchised, and they were people mainly belonging to the rural population. The urban population had a better representation than the rural population, but when 2,000,000 were being enfranchised, it was felt that the rural districts should have a larger voice in Parliament. Up to the time of that bill there was one member of Parliament to every 78,000 people in the boroughs, while in the city the representation was one to 42,000. Earl Kimberly, when he introduced the bill of 1885 in the House of Lords, stated that he was able to announce that, as the result of their labours, they had brought the unit of representation in regard to the boroughs and in regard to the rural districts, exactly on the same basis, giving a member for every 52,800 of population for the boroughs, and a member for every 52,700 population in the rural districts. The result was of such a gratifying character that it met with universal support, and passed both Houses of Parliament with a great deal of ease, and there has been no serious demand for redistribution from that time to the present. If we did not know these hon. gentlemen, we would have expected that they would be prepared to make propositions to the opposition, and when they came to deal with the redistribution of seats they would follow the English models about which they are very fond of talking but which they are very slow to imitate. I asked my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, when he was talking about the principle of this bill, if he would kindly tell us what the principle was, and my hon. friend, notwithstanding his resources in debate and great information and plausibility as a speaker, absolutely stammered and did not tell us what it was. I think he went so far as to say that it was to do away with the gerrymander, to reverse the gerrymander of 1882 and 1892.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—To go back to the old system.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I take the ground that it does not do so. If the hon. gentleman puts that forth as a principle, that principle is not observed in framing the provisions of this bill. A careful examination of this bill convinces me, to use the memorable words of Macauley, that it represents something not to be found in the heavens above, in the the earth beneath or in the waters under the earth. With reference to the question of representation by population, I have heard it stated, although not exactly in set terms, by the gentlemen on the other side of the House, that representation by population is one of the principles underlying the bill. Let us look at that for a moment or two. Take the city of St. John, upon which their hands have been laid. We find that in the city and county of St. John, which was formerly one constituency, with the double right of voting, with a larger exercise of the vote on the part of the city than the county, two constituencies are now created with the same right of voting, one having 11,000 population and the other 39,000. This is the handiwork of the hon. gentlemen opposite. They carve the city and county of St. John and make it two constituencies, one part with 11,000 of a population and the other with 39,000. I can remember very well in 1872, when the first Redistribution Bill was brought in under the British North America Act, that the Hon. Alex. Mackenzie condemned Sir John Macdonald because he did not adopt the principle of representation by population within the provinces, and he made a very long speech, which is partially but sufficiently reported but which makes it clear that that was the great objection which he had to the redistribution of 1872. In 1882 an attempt was made to approximate, at all events, to the principle of representation by population.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend agree with Alexander Mackenzie's view or Sir John Macdonald's view?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I agree with the view that, as far as possible, there should be a close approximation to representation by population in Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then my hon. friend must condemn the state of things at the present moment.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do condemn it. I say there should be changes, but entertaining that view, I am not prepared to support changes by which we are drifting away further from representation by population than we have been for the last twenty years. That is the effect of this bill, and I think I will be able to convince the House, not only by the case of St. John, but by the case of Prince Edward Island, and many other instances, that this bill is a wide departure from and a retrograde step as far as the principle of representation by population is concerned. In the past, hon. gentlemen have taken a very strong ground on the question that there should be single constituencies. My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, I think held that view very strongly, not very long ago. He was entirely opposed to the principle of double constituencies. I observe that he makes no sign of dissent. I am always very happy to have the hon. gentleman put me right when I am wrong. I observe that he makes no sign, and I infer that he admits the accuracy of what I say, that he was not very long ago a redoubtable champion of single constituencies. In case that my hon. friend should forget that such was the case, at all events, so as to stir up his pure mind by way of remembrance, I will read a few words which he uttered in 1892 on this question of single and double constituencies, and if my hon. friend will take the trouble to turn to Hansard for 1892, he will find these words:

> There is another point which is important, and it is that there should be single constituencies. It is not proper to have two constituencies united into one. In the first place it is extremely inconvenient. In the case of a by-election in this city why should a candidate be called upon to ask the suffrages practically of two constituencies in order to obtain a seat in Parliament? The same may be said of Pictou, Halifax and Hamilton as well as of Ottawa. All these constituencies ought to be divided, and in no case should there be two representatives for the same constituency.

The hon. gentleman was strongly of that opinion in 1892, and he gave very good and substantial reasons for the faith that was in him on that occasion, but that faith appears to have died in the hon. gentleman's heart, and he appears to be of a different opinion now. What does he do? We find him doing away with double constituencies in Toronto and in St. John. It is true it is proposed to do away with two double constituencies, Toronto West and St. John leaving seven other double constituencies. There are two on the Pacific coast, Hamilton and Ottawa in Ontario, and three in the maritime provinces, leaving seven double constituencies, and to be sure of making things even, he restores two double constituencies in Prince Edward Island, so that it makes the same number as we had before the bill was introduced. My hon. friend seemed to think that the principle of single constituencies was one worth making a strong stand for in 1892, but his valour seems to have oozed out at the palms of his hands and he thinks differently now. I will have many other occasions before I resume my seat to show where my hon. friend seems to have changed his views, but he will not find any fault when I say that he has not changed his opinion, I presume he has only changed his practice. That was the hon. gentleman's explanation when I pointed out to him yesterday that Sir John Macdonald had changed his views with regard to the importance of county boundaries between 1872 and 1882. My hon. friend's retort was "Yes, Sir John Macdonald did change—he changed his practice, not his opinions." That is the hon. gentleman's way of accounting for things of that kind. He surely will not object if we arrive at the same conclusion with regard to himself—that he has simply changed his practice; his opinions remain as they were. There is a subject upon which, I have no doubt, I will find my hon. friend very sensitive indeed, that is with regard to established boundaries, and especially county boundaries. The hon. gentlemen opposite are very fond of saying that this bill respects county boundaries, and is for the purpose of restoring county boundaries wherever they have been departed from in past legislation. With regard to that subject, I have to say that my hon. friend made a very careful selection of the parts of Canada and the constituencies to which to apply his great principle of county or municipal boundaries. My hon. friend spends a good deal of his time in Ottawa, and it could hardly have escaped his attention that at this moment he is leaving New Edinburgh, a part of Ottawa, outside of the city in which it is municipally included. In close proximity to Ottawa, I could point out other constituencies where county boundaries remain broken up, and where other lines are drawn. He is content to leave them as they are, but in his great desire to restore county boundaries, he applies it to western Ontario and Prince Edward Island, and there he stops. My hon. friend is not quite consistent on this question of county boundaries any more than on other questions on which we have examined his record very closely. Sometimes it would almost appear as if the hon. gentleman regards county boundaries as a fetich that he would be inclined to worship. We find him going to Bothwell, Kent and Lambton, and displaying wonderful antiquarian skill in restoring and tracing an old boundary that had been obliterated politically thirty years ago, between the counties of Kent and Lambton. Hon. gentlemen from Ontario know this as a fact. At the time of confederation, in order to find seats for those additional members Ontario was entitled to, three new counties were formed in 1867. Bothwell was one, Monck another, and Cardwell was a third. Bothwell was formed by three townships from the county of Lambton and four townships from the county of Kent, seven in the whole, having the county boundary running right through the centre of the constituency. The result of that was to find a seat for my hon. friend, and I believe he came to Parliament as the representative of that constituency shaped and formed in 1867, and remained as its representative from that time until 1896, when he was defeated by Mr. Clancy. There was only one break during a very short period, when by an irregularity, my hon. friend was kept out of his seat for a little while. He was only kept out of his seat, however, until that irregularity was corrected by the courts, and for the whole of the twenty-nine years my hon. friend continued as representative of the county of Bothwell. But at the last election my hon. friend was defeated. He explained yesterday that his defeat was due to ballot stuffing at the time. I was at a loss to understand why my hon. friend should have shown such animus against Bothwell as to obliterate it from the map of Canada. I was surprised that a gentleman who had enjoyed the confidence of Bothwell for twenty-nine years, and was enabled, on the strength of that confidence, to take an active part in the politics of Canada, should blot the name of Bothwell from the map of Canada; but the explanation that he gives is that stuffed ballots were used to defeat him in 1896. He did not say that was why he proposes to abolish Bothwell, but that it was why he was not elected. The inference is that Bothwell is treated as a rotten borough in England is, when disfranchised for corrupt practices. I am rather inclined to think it was not exactly for this reason. My hon. friend, I fear, has had his pride wounded by his defeat. The vision of James Clancy has been pursuing him ever since, and when he has the opportunity, he is ready to exclaim with Lady Macbeth, in her delirium, when she thought she saw the blood of the king on her hands, "Out, out damned spot!" I know my hon. friend is not profane, only when he is Shakespearean. I have no doubt he would give the quotation, and he will pardon me for quoting it. That is his sentiment, no doubt, with regard to Bothwell. Bothwell has turned its back on the hon. gentleman, and he has turned his back on Bothwell.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Since the hon. gentleman is good at drawing inferences, how does it come that while I represented Bothwell in 1882, I proposed the abolition of Bothwell and the restoration of the boundary of Kent?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am a little too well up in what the hon. gentleman did in 1882 and 1892 to be caught. I think I can convince him that his memory is short as to what he proposed to do in 1882.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not at fault at all, but the hon. gentleman's candour in debate is at fault, that is the trouble.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not hear the hon. gentleman's remark. My hon. friend as I was remarking, has been displaying great antiquarian taste. He has been exploring and restoring the old boundary of Kent and Bothwell which had been wiped out thirty years ago, and he determines that he will obliterate Bothwell, and resolve the elements of the county back into their places, some four of these townships going back to Kent, and three of them to the county of Lambton. I wonder, when my hon. friend was in this antiquarian mood, that he did not go a little further back, because I am sure with his skill, which we all recognize, in such matters, if the hon. gentleman had made an inquiry a little more ancient than that, he might have found some boundaries recognized by the Hurons or the Eries in the western peninsula of Ontario, and if he had gone still further back and taken the testimony of the rocks on the coast of Lake Erie, he might have found some marks to assist him in arriving at antideluvian boundaries. He found this boundary, anyway, which had been obliterated by the Parliament of Canada for electoral purposes thirty years ago, and he determined that Bothwell should exist no longer. My hon. friend referred me to what he had done in 1882, showing that he had made an effort in 1882 to do away with Bothwell.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I did not say that

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to tell us what he did say?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said I was in favour of the restoration of the county boundaries. If the hon. gentleman will look at one of the speeches I delivered on that occasion, I proposed that the boundaries, in every instance, should be restored. Failing that, we said Kent and Lambton were entitled to five members, and that these five members should be elected, that is Kent, Lambton and Bothwell, and I moved a resolution to that effect.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I will read the resolution and the hon. gentleman's explanation will be more intelligent after it is read. I want the resolution given in the Debates.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It will go twice there; I will read it myself.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman moved the following resolution:

Resolved that the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be resolved that the municipal counties of Kent and Lambton, comprise the electoral districts of Kent, Lambton and Bothwell, with a population of 106,341, making for five members an average of 21,268 per member. That the electoral district of Lambton comprises 42,616 and may properly be divided into two ridings.

I find, by an examination of the census returns, that this population corresponds with the population given by these returns in 1881, for the county of Lambton, less the three townships which had been placed in Bothwell.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The resolution continues:

That the electoral district of Kent comprises 36,626 and may, by the restoration from Bothwell of some of the municipalities of Kent, be divided into two ridings of about 21,000 each, leaving Bothwell with 21,000.

The hon. gentleman was going to leave Bothwell with about 21,000.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will the hon. gentleman tell me how he was going to get this 21,000 for Bothwell without making it up by part of Lambton and part of Kent

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not propose to make it anything else except a part of Lambton and Kent. The government had proposed the bill. We favoured county boundaries. We were unable to secure county boundaries, and then the hon. gentleman's leader declared that they were adhering to the principle of representation by population. I denied that, and that was a proposition to establish representation by population in these two counties.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I notice my hon. friend is not so valiant now as he was a few minutes ago on this question. The hon. member actually proposed, by this resolution, to leave the electorial district of Bothwell, consisting of three townships of Lambton and some townships of the county of Kent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We are exactly in agreement now?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Notwithstanding my hon. friend's valiant declaration a moment ago, that he had in 1882 proposed to abolish the electoral district of Bothwell, we have here the evidence in the hon. gentleman's resolution, not only that he proposed to retain it, but that he proposed to retain it in violation of the principle of county boundaries.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear. We could not help ourselves.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend will be a little more careful, I hope, when he makes an interruption again, because he has enabled me, by his interruption, to bring out the point more clearly than I could otherwise have done. My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, has now to admit before this House, that he himself in 1882 tried to form a constituency for himself known as the electoral district of Bothwell and in violation of the principle of county boundaries.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, that was to include part of the counties of Lambton and Kent. I will now leave that part of the subject. This fetich of county boundaries that the hon. gentleman professes to worship so very earnestly, after all is only to be worshiped and to be observed by him just when it suits his purpose. When he wanted to make the county of Bothwell, in 1882, to suit himself, he was ready to violate that principle and he has not changed in that respect to the present moment, for at the present time, when he is dealing with the representation of the province of Ontario, he leaves this principle of county boundaries to be violated in a large number of the counties in Ontario, and he does not propose to touch them. Therefore this bill cannot possibly be proposed in the interest of establishing county boundaries. There is another point upon which my hon. friend and the Secretary of State touched—I am not quite sure which of them dealt with that point or whether they did not both deal with it—and that is the importance of judicial divisions by independent authority. I am trying now to find out what principle there is behind this bill. In order to give my hon. friends some opportunity to show what principle underlies this measure, I am going over these points that might form, if any of them are to be found in it, the principle governing a Redistribution Bill. I am now taking up the division of counties and cities by independent authority. In 1892 I know the leader of the hon. gentleman, as has been shown by the leader of the opposition in this House, speaking in the House of Commons, condemned the policy of delegating powers, which Parliament should exercise itself, to any body of judges or others for the purpose of carrying out the redistribution of seats. The leader of the government, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, took that ground in 1892, but this principle is proposed, to a partial extent, to be introduced in dealing with some of the constituencies affected by the present bill. But while it is proposed to call in judicial authority for the purpose of dividing some constituencies, as I have already explained, and as hon. gentlemen know very well, a large number of constituencies are not proposed to be divided at all, but when hon. gentlemen come to deal with the city and county of St. John, the Hon. Mr. Blair, the minister representing that province, says "I can do that better than the judges and I will do it myself," and he does it by an amendment of the bill in the Commons straight and direct, creating one part of the county, with 11,000 population, a single constituency, and the other part of the county, with 39,000 of a population, another single constituency, side by side. So this principle of judicial authority in dividing the constituencies so strongly presented by the hon. gentlemen in the government, as a very valuable principle, they have departed from in the case of the county and city of St. John, and not only that, but they create two double constituencies in Prince Edward Island, and determine there that they shall not be divided at all. In dealing with these double constituencies in some parts of Ontario, they say they shall be divided, and divided by judges. In New Brunswick they say "We will divide them ourselves," and in Prince Edward Island they say they shall not be divided at all, and still the hon. gentleman talks to this House about the principle of the bill. I should like the hon. gentleman to show me any one principle that is observed and carried through in the bill before us. I have already touched on another point which hon. gentlemen were anxious to put forward as a principle of the bill, and that was the repeal of the redistribution of 1882 or 1892, or both, and I have already pointed out that it does not do that, that while it deals with some constituencies which were dealt with in 1882, it leaves a great many others untouched, and in such cases, whatever was wrong in the redistribution of 1882 is not remedied or corrected by the bill before us. I take the ground that Parliament has not a right to pass a measure of this kind, except after the taking of the decennial census. I hold that we have not the constitutional right to do it. I feel rather diffident about discussing a question that is, in many respects, a legal one, very closely, but I will take very great care to support the opinions I give on this question by excellent authority —authority which I am sure the Minister of Justice will not dispute. My hon. friend, in introducing the bill the other day, took a long time—I think about an hour —in instructing the House on some of the elementary features of the British constitution. He began away back in the reign of Henry Third, and traced the growth of representative institutions in the mother country up to a comparatively recent period. His speech embraced also a review of the old American colonies and Canada before the date of confederation; and, if I understood the object of this very long and tedious disquisition, if it had any bearing on the subject before the House, it was to prove that this Parliament had an implied power to pass such a bill as this independently of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend shakes his head. I understand if he has changed his practice, he has not changed his opinions on this subject at all events, and it will be my duty to place before the hon. gentleman some views of his own on that matter which I know he will receive with very great respect. In 1892 another hon. gentleman, a prominent member of this government, Sir Louis Davies, made a statement in Parliament with regard to redistribution. He said:

> Now, sir, it is said by some that there must be an inherent power in Parliament to do this. (That is to pass a Distribution Act) I deny it. This Parliament is the creation of an Imperial statute is bound by the limitations expressed in the statute; it has no power to legislate in defiance of, or beyond, or inconsistent with any of the limitations in that statute.

That was the opinion expressed by Sir Louis Davies, in 1892. I now come to what my hon. friend the Minister of Justice said on the same occasion (Page 3206 Hansard of 1892.) He says:

> What does the 40th section say? It says:
> Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall have," &c., &c.
> Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, provides how? In what way? Arbitrarily? No, sir, provides in the way pointed out in section 51. It is authorized to provide in that way. It is not authorized to provide in any other way? Now there is no rule of constitutional authority better settled than this that you cannot set up an implied power against an expressed one." * * * *
> That is the way (quoted the 51st section) which you are to exercise that power. There is the express provisions. There are the directions given and this Parliament is required to act in consonance with these directions and in conformity with this grant. It has no right to go outside this grant.

These are the words of the hon. gentleman himself, and I may venture an opinion surely when I am supported by a gentleman of such great eminence as a constitutional lawyer as the hon. Minister of Justice. These are the views of two members of the present government on that subject, and if my hon. friend did not mean, by the nature of the disquisition which he gave on the growth of representative institutions in Great Britain and the colonies up to the time of confederation, if he did not mean to found an argument in favour of Parliament dealing in the way he proposes in this bill—that is, apart from the 51st section of the British North America Act, I fail to understand the meaning of his words. But, according to my hon. friend's own language in 1892, there is no power or provision for dealing with the redistribution except as provided for in section 51 of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says "hear, hear," and notwithstanding that, he brings in a bill in entire violation of section 51 of the British North America Act. There are four sections in the British North America Act which deals with this question. Section 40 I have already partially read, but in order that we may have them all before us, I will read all the sections:

40. Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall, for the purposes of election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into electoral districts, as follows:—

51. On the completion of the census in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner and from such time, as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules:

1. Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members.

2. There shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such census) as the number sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained).

3. In the computation of the number of members for the province, a fractional part not exceeding one-half of the whole number requisite for entitling the province to a member shall be disregarded; but a fractional part exceeding one-half of that number shall be equivalent to the whole number.

4. On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census, to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards.

5. Such readjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing Parliament.

52. The number of the members of the House of Commons may be, from time to time, increased by the Parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this Act is not thereby disturbed.

91. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the order, peace and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say:

Then we come to section 92 which says:

92. In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say:

1. The amendment from time to time (notwithstanding anything in this Act) of the constitution of the province, except as regards the office of Lieutenant Governor.

While it is laid down as the law with regard to provincial legislatures that they can amend their constitutions, in the enumeration of the powers of the Federal Parliament, there is no corresponding power mentioned. There is a general power conferred by section 91 to make laws for the peace, order and good government of the country, which probably would be quite sufficient to give power to pass Redistribution Bills, unless express provision was made in another section of the British North America Act for the same purpose; but I think my hon. friend will be very loath to contradict me when I say that, if, as my hon. friend admitted a few moments ago, and as he said in 1892, section 51 gave express and complete powers with regard to making readjustments involving redistributions—if that is provided in an express provision, then the general provisions like section 91 will not apply. My hon. friend may take another view, but I doubt very much whether he will assume the responsibility of taking any such position as that. Of these four sections, 91 gives a general power; 40 creates an undoubted power; 51 specifies the power created by section 40, and section 52 further specifies the powers granted in section 40. Again, I am supported by the Minister of Justice himself on another point. I think it has a most important bearing on this question. In the original resolution for the union of the provinces, it was provided that the provinces should have the framing and shaping of electoral districts for federal purposes. That was the original plan provided by the resolutions; but during the London conference a different view prevailed, and the advocates of retaining power in the hands of the local legislature were induced to give way and accept section 51 instead of the resolution giving the powers to the local legislatures. Now, in order that I may put my views here beyond any possibility of controversy, at least by my hon. friend, I will read what he said himself in 1892. The Minister of Justice said on that occasion:

In looking at the articles of confederation which were adopted prior to the union I find that by the 23rd article it was agreed that the legislature of each province should divide such province into a certain number of constituencies, and define the boundaries of those constituencies. That seemed to be the plan. There was some distrust as to the use which Parliament might make of its power; and if the hon. gentleman will look at the discussions which took place on confederation he will find the view expressed that you might hive the French; you might divide the province of Quebec in such a way that the English speaking section would have a majority of the representatives on the floor of this House. You might, from jealousy, of the rapid growth of a particular province so divide its constituencies as to prevent an adequate expression of its opinion in consequence of its increased population.

My hon. friend the Minister of Justice is speaking, and he is here paraphrasing the doubts and difficulties and objections which were felt by the provinces in giving the control of the distribution of seats to the federal power. He proceeds:

To guard against such contingencies it was proposed in the first instance that the legislatures of the different provinces should divide the provinces for the Dominion Parliament. That, however, was abandoned before the delegates went to England; and when the British North America Act was formed for the purpose of carrying into effect the articles of confederation—the Quebec resolutions which were agreed upon—this 51st section was substituted for them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Therefore, if my hon. friend is right, it was the intention of the framers of confederation that this 51st section, and this 51st section alone, should settle any redistribution of seats within the provinces of Canada. My hon. friend himself has put on record here that this means was found of settling the difficulty, the provinces demanding that they should have the control of the shaping of the constituencies after confederation, and in order to settle that and to meet that objection, section 51 was put in. That section reads:

On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides.

My hon. friend went on to say:

That is clear. It does not say that there is an additional way or that the Parliament of Canada might do so and so.

I hope the hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," still.

It does not say that there is an implied or expressed power in the Parliament of Canada to act in some other way. It provides this specific way, and I contend, and I shall endeavour to establish, that this is the only way provided by the constitution for altering the representation in the House of Commons.

And that is the view of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. Yet he introduces a bill providing in another way to redistribute the seats of the constituencies of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I will glance again at these sections. Let us look carefully at the words of section 51. If section 51 makes special provision for redistribution section 91 does not apply. I take that position. My view is that section 51 makes special provision, and ample and entire provision, and therefore section 91, which is simply a general one, does not prevail against a specific section such as section 51 is, and if section 51 involves redistribution within the provinces, section 40 can only create a power to be exercised under section 51. If section 51 provides a means of complete redistribution within the provinces, as well as a readjustment of an interprovincial kind, then section 40 has no bearing further than to create the power which is exercised under section 51. I will ask this question: Has Parliament power, at any other time than on the completion of a census, to pass a Redistribution Act? I take ground that it has not. If section 51 applies to interprovincial readjustment only, all the elaborate provisions of the first clause are unnecessary and a simple arithmetical problem is all that was required. Let us take that clause and read it again. It says:

On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What does the hon. gentleman understand by "such authority?"

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I will come to that in a moment. I have a view of that subject, whether it will agree with the hon. gentleman's view or not I cannot say. Probably I will be able to quote my hon. friend on that point.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He has changed his mind since then.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Section 51 provides for an interprovincial readjustment, as well as for a redistribution within the provinces, and if it did not so provide, and was not intended so to provide, all the rules and regulations it contains would not be necessary. It would be a simple question in arithmetic which a school-boy could work out, and what would be the need of constituting an authority for it and providing for the manner in which it was to be done if it was a simple question in arithmetic, as to the proportion of the population of Quebec to the other provinces of Canada? It is clear to my mind that there was something more than that meant. It was intended that there should be a redistribution, as within the provinces, for without that readjustment could not be carried out. Now, the context does not qualify or cut down this clear contention which I make with regard to section 51, and it is not stated, directly or indirectly, that it is confined to interprovincial readjustment. A readjustment, if it is to be had at all, must be effective, and my hon. friend will, I imagine, claim that section 51 provides for an efficient readjustment. It provides that representation between the provinces shall be readjusted by such authority,and in such manner, and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides. If it were not an efficient readjustment, it would put the provinces in this position: it would be found from the census, as it was by the last census, that Ontario was entitled to four members more than she had before, Prince Edward Island to one less, New Brunswick to two less, Nova Scotia to one less, and some other changes in the other provinces. This readjustment, to be affective, must allocate seats for the new members, or fit the constituencies to the reduced representation, and how is that to be done except by a redistribution within the province? How were we to find seats for four new members for Ontario without redistributing the seats in the province of Ontario? How were we to repair the gap made by the loss of one in Prince Edward Island, unless some provision was made as to where that one man came out, and that meant a redistribution in Prince Edward Island. Hon. gentlemen would see that the redistribution would be a nullity, and would result in chaos unless it provided at the same time that there should be a redistribution within the province, and my contention is that the 51st section is complete in these respects. My hon. friend asked me a few minutes ago what meaning I attached to the words "by such authority." I have tried to decide in my own mind, by consulting the best authorities and find what the words meant, and I will try to make my own meaning and conclusion plain to hon. gentlemen, whether they will accept them or not, I cannot say. I find that Clements who is a writer on the constitution of Canada and expounder of the British North America Act says that two of the fathers of confederation alleged that it was the intention of the authors of confederation, at the passage of the Confederation Act, to create an independent authority for the purpose of dividing the constituencies and making these redistributions under the British North America Act. That is the opinion given by Mr. Clements, and I do not know whether it is correct or not. I find that Mr. Joseph Pope, in his confederation papers, speaks of its being intended to name judges in the Imperial Act, that there had been some intention at the time to name judges for this purpose in the Imperial Act. However, we know that no judges were named in the Imperial Act, but we find these words "by such authority," in that Act, and I would ask my hon. friend the Minister of Justice to tell me if he can why these words "by such authority," should be put in that clause if it was only intended to solve a little question in arithmetic, to find out by the census results how many members another province would be entitled to, Quebec being the pivotal province and entitled to 65? If that is all that was involved by section 51, it would be a curious matter of history that the fathers of confederation contemplated a judicial authority for so trivial a purpose. We know that the contention has been seriously held, and that it will be held by my hon. friend, that it was the intention, and I think the words of the Act show that that was the meaning, that an independent authority was to be created, and I contend that that involves the whole question of a distribution within the province, because you would not have that authority constituted for the purpose of making out this little question in arithmetic. It would be like using the trunk of an elephant to pick up a straw. It was done for the purpose of making a readjustment and distribution within the province, and for no other purpose. The authority mentioned in this clause, and the rules that are there placed for carrying it out, means that there should be a complete and effective readjustment, and that involves a redistribution within the provinces, and all that is provided for in section 51, and if it is provided in section 51 specifically, there can be no authority in any other section of the British North America Act which can set aside a specific authority of that kind. I have my hon. friend's declaration which I have already read. There is another expression here, that it shall be done "in such manner." This is for the guidance of the authorities whoever they would be, that would be constituted by Parliament for the purpose of making this readjustment involving this redistribution within the provinces. If we understand this as I understand it—that this authority was to make this division of the constituencies the way my hon. friend's commission of judges are to divide constituencies under this bill—and I think that was probably what was meant—if such was the case, we can then understand what was meant by the words "in such manner," but surely Parliament would not use such words as these if it was only the matter of a little question in arithmetic to find out how many members Ontario was entitled to, because Ontario had increased in population somewhat greater than the population of Quebec. Hon. gentlemen could well understand that these words, "in such manner," in the sense in which I use them, have an important meaning. In such manner, for instance, as to the difference between urban and rural populations, there should be a direction and instruction to the commissioners. My hon. friend the Secretary of State told us yesterday that instructions were to be issued to these gentlemen, and if they follow the English practice, these would be some of the instructions. I have taken them from the instructions issued to the English commissioners that divided the constituencies in 1885 "in such manner" with regard to urban or rural population, in regard to wealth or industrialism, the number of persons enjoying the franchise, municipal boundaries, county boundaries, about which my hon. friend is so anxious, and the historic traditions of constituencies —all these would be instructions, and "such manner" is set forth in the Act, so that such instructions might go to the commissioners. All this is clearly meant and involved in section 51, and section 51 implies that an authority shall do this thing and describes the manner in which it shall be done. If these words had reference to more than this little problem in arithmetic, and if they meant to go further and deal with the redistribution in the provinces, the whole ground is covered, and there is no reason why this bill should be before us. If that view is right—and I have the complete support of my hon. friend himself—Parliament should not deal with redistribution in any way except under section 51, and I think hon. gentlemen will not disagree very much with me when I say that it is entirely inconsistent with section 51 that Parliament should deal with the redistribution between the provinces at any other time than after a decennial census. The machinery contemplated, and the wording of the Act all point to more than a readjustment between the provinces. It provides for all that would be involved in the redistribution, and that includes allocating the seats that would appertain as a result of the census, either as an increase or a decrease, to the different provinces and involves the whole question of redistribution within the provinces. My view is that Parliament decides the principle. The power is given in section 40. Section 51 decides that the Parliament of Canada should settle the principle of readjustment, and the authority to be constituted under the Act for dividing the constituencies would apply the principle as laid down in the Act under the instructions that they would receive from the government, or from Parliament. The principal clause of this section 51 has two objects. It is the exercise, first, of the power of the adjustment and, second, the manner of readjustment, and the time from which such exercise shall take effect. It can be fairly and clearly divided under these two heads. Firstly, the exercise of the power of readjustment, and secondly, the manner of and the time from which such exercise shall take effect. Parliament may, provide for the manner of readjustment. Section 51 provides that it shall take effect after each decennial census. It declares that readjustment shall be made after each census, and it follows that the power of readjustment can only be exercised once in a decennial term, and that is immediately after the census. I will again support my opinion on this point by quoting from gentlemen in the government. First I will quote my friend Sir Louis Davies. Turning to page 3246 of Hansard, 1892, Sir Louis Davies said :

> You have no authority arbitrarily to cut and carve as you please. The law does not give it to you. A limitation has been placed on your power. It does not say you "may" do so and so, but you shall. The imperative is used, and you shall do so, once for all, but from time to time, after each decennial census you shall readjust.

That is the view of Sir Louis Davies, a legal gentleman of high attainments and a member of the government who is sending down this bill. He declares emphatically that Parliament has to do it "once for all" after each decennial census. He continues :

> You shall readjust by such authority and in such manner and from such time as Parliament provides.

I will quote once more from my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. I suppose I have entirely convinced my hon. friend, or he has convinced himself, and therefore he does not find it necessary to follow the argument any further. I presume his own speeches made in 1892 on this question have convinced him, and that he will, after he reads these speeches over once more very attentatively, change his practice. He will not change his opinion; his opinion remains the same, but he will change his practice. At page 3277 of Hansard of 1892 he says :

> We are entitled to have a House of Commons; it has to be elected every five years if not sooner dissolved. Then there must be a redistribution of seats. If there were no provision for a redistribution of seats, certainly the power would be here, and be here upon the principle that we have a grant of powers, and this is a necessary incident to carry that grant into effect, but when the constitution itself does prescribe the rule by which that grant is to be exercised, when it prescribes how that power is to be carried into effect, when it tells you that there is to be a redistribution of seats by a tribunal created by you and acting under instructions from you——

He was referring to section 51, but he forgets now that its application is to be only after each decennial census. It does not say it can be done at any other time. He goes on :

> In which you prescribe the manner and the time it must be followed, and all the more because by it we have the protection against the very abuses we complain of in this bill.

And we have the protection in this clause against the abuses in the bill now before us, and the hon. gentleman was good enough to lay that down for our information. He continues :

> There is a special provision in the law for the exercise of this power, and I deny altogether that it is or can be implied in the grant which the hon. gentleman has mentioned. It has been said by a very high authority in the United States, as well as in the United Kingdom, that you cannot claim as an incident of an express grant what is an express grant already in some other way.

Here we have the view of the hon. gentleman, not by quoting a few isolated sentences from a speech of his, but by quoting and reading whole pages of what the hon. gentleman said. We have a most magnificent argument built up against the bill which he has submitted, declaring we have no power or authority except by section 51, and the hon. gentleman will not surely get up now and tell us that under section 51 he can, with any degree of decency, press this bill on the attention of the House, because it says unmistakably that readjustment must be after the decennial census. We are eight years away from the last census, and within two years of another census which will entirely disturb the equilibrium of population. Before I sit down, I want to refer to the way this bill deals with the province of Prince Edward Island. I submit to the House, and I ask hon. gentlemen to note the opinions that I will put before them and the statements I make, and I shall be happy if my hon. friend will correct me if I make any mistake or any statement which he is not prepared to accept. I will accept any interruption he may make on that subject. In 1891 the census showed that Prince Edward Island did not possess a population sufficient to entitle it to continue sending six members to this House. We are only entitled, as a result of that census, to five members. We had three counties in the province, and up to that time the representation had been allotted to these three counties, two to each of them. Speaking roundly, according to the census of 1891, Prince County had 36,-

000 population, Queen's, 45,000, and King's, nearly 27,000. The unit of representation would be 21,900 for Prince Edward Island. It was plain, therefore, that something had to be done. It was not a wanton act of the government to go in and interfere with the allocation of seats in Prince Edward Island. The Parliament of Canada was compelled to go in and make some alteration in such a way as would find five just seats for the five members Prince Edward Island was entitled to send to Parliament. It was found that Queen's County had exactly the right number, for two representatives or so near it that it was not necessary to approach any nearer, Prince County had somewhat less than would entitle it to two, and King's something more than necessary for one. When we look at the voting strength, which is a very serious consideration, we find that the difference between these two counties King's and Prince was only one thousand. The voting strength of King's was 7,120, of Prince 8,128, just 1,000 different in the voting strength of the two counties. It was quite a difficult matter to readjust the province and do it in a way that would be fair and just, and would not give ground for a reasonable or just charge of a gerrymander or a distribution in the interest of one political party. What was done was this: Three townships were taken off the lower end of King's County, that borders on Queen's in a block, and this left King's within a few hundred of the population required; then three townships of Queen's that lay adjacent to Prince County, were put into Prince, and then Prince and Queen's counties each were divided in two. That was done with great fairnesss, and I have watched the political press of the province and attended a good many political meetings, and read the reports of political meetings, and I have yet to learn where any public man in the province, with the full responsibility of his utterances and before the people who knew the facts, challenged the fairness of that redistribution in the province itself. It is true, in the Parliament of Canada, when the bill was going through, some charges were made, but if such statements were made in the province of Prince Edward Island, I should like to see them. They would be on record if they were made. The fact is the lines were drawn fairly; the townships that were most contiguous and convenient to Queen's were the townships taken from King's, and the same thing was done on the other side of the county and the divisions were made so fairly that they were not challenged in the province. What was the result of that? King's was left with 21,694; East Queen's 23,464; West Queen's 22,210; East Prince, 20,723; and West Prince, 20,978. Not one of these constituencies had much more than 1,000 either above or below the unit of representation, and I defy any one who will take the census of Prince Edward Island to go over the province and divide it more fairly as regards population without dividing the townships, than was done under the Act of 1892, or to do it with less friction and with less ground for a charge of unfairness. Hon. gentlemen propose to undo that. My hon. friend, in his worship of this fetich of his, county boundaries, says it must be done. But I ask why should it be done in a province like Prince Edward Island, where there are no municipalities to disturb. I am quite aware that in England a great deal of importance is attached to county boundaries, and properly so. These counties were formerly kingdoms. The people speak different dialects. They are sharply distinguished from each other, and that is continued to the present time. There is this historic difference: there are powerful and great influences in England that have no existence in Canada whatever. Wherein do the people of Carleton differ from the people of Lanark? Wherein do the people of one county of Quebec differ from the people of another county in Quebec? We are the same people. There is not the same historic continuity within our counties that you find in England. In England they carry out the system, but there is no reason why we should do it in Canada, and much less in Prince Edward Island, where you have no municipal life and therefore there was no violence done to any municipal arrangement in that respect. In the case of Prince Edward Island there is no justification whatever for undoing what was done in 1892, it was done on population, done by a fair division. It was done in such a way that it challenged the censure and public condemnation of the opponents of the government in Prince Edward Island, and that censure and condemnation never came. It was done in that way in Prince Edward Island, and done too, by carrying out the principle of representation by population, which we all know is a good principle, as far as it is practicable to carry it out. It was carried out almost to the letter, and we are asked now to go back to a division which will entirely violate the principle of representation by population. It will give to 8,198 voters in Prince County two members, while it will only give one to 7,120 voters in King's County. Is that representation by population? Is that just or fair? And yet that is the measure the hon. gentlemen are submitting to us as an improvement on the Act of 1892. My hon. friend will also have to answer for this, that while he divides the counties in Ontario, and calls in judicial authority, he insists that the counties in Prince Edward Island shall be kept intact. My hon. friend's argument against double constituencies in 1892 comes in here. It is possible that in the counties of Queen's and Prince, taken as double constituencies, there might be found a majority of Liberals, but if you divide these two counties in any way, by independent authority the chances are largely in favour of the Conservatives carrying a seat in each county. Judicial authority could hardly divide these counties without giving the Conservatives this opportunity. King's would be a still stronger Conservative constituency than before, and if the hon. gentlemen would apply the same principle in Prince Edward Island that they are applying in western Ontario, of dividing the counties by judicial authority, they know they would have a chance of finding themselves in this position, they could not elect more than two men at the most from Prince Edward Island in the next election, while their opponents would get three. It is, if possible, to prevent that that they are passing this Redistribution Bill, and making it apply in such an unjustifiable manner to the province of Prince Edward Island. Here is what Mr. Gladstone said, in introducing his Redistribution Act in 1884, dealing with the city of London. He had discussed the counties where there had been time honoured boundaries, and which he respected. He came now to the city of London and he said:

> The metropolis it is proposed in a great measure to recast. The boroughs in the metropolis are generally well suited for being so dealt with, being parliamentary boroughs only, and not being also established municipalities they have no common historic life attaching to them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says "hear, hear," and yet in dealing with Prince Edward Island, where there are no municipalities, he violates this principle and does not deal with them as Gladstone did with London. Gladstone said "We find there are no municipal divisions in London and no municipal life," and therefore he felt free——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is municipal life all through Ontario.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend, when he is beaten on one point, turns to another which has nothing to do with it, I have met my hon. friend in discussing Ontario matters and have found he was dodging there also. My hon. friend finds my position is unassailable with regard to Prince Edward Island and that it entirely knocks the argument from under this bill, and he tries to draw a herring across my path and refers to Ontario. I mentioned a few moments ago that the population of King's County was nearly 27,000, and Prince County 36,000, and that there would be a representative for Prince County for every 18,000, if the counties were fairly divided in two, and that in King's County one man would represent 26,000 or 27,000 population, and I pointed out that a still greater inequality would exist if we took the voting strength into consideration, which is an important consideration; that King's County had 7,120 voters and would have but one member, while Prince County, with two members, had only a little over 8,000 voters. I will turn again to Mr. Gladstone, and show you what he says on this point, showing he recognized the voting strength of a county as a very important feature. He says:

> The city of London I am afraid, all circumstances considered, cannot equitably be exempted from some change. Its population is a population of 50,000. With a population of 50,000 odd its electorate is remarkably large, and its largeness of electorate combined with its history, marks it out for some exemption from the application of the rigid rule of population.

He gave the city that is the borough of London, not the great city which is the capital of the empire, two members, because it had a large electorate in proportion to population, and because there was a continuity in its history.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says "hear, hear," but he ignores the strength of the electorate in dealing with Prince Edward Island, and he ignores altogether the historical continuity in the case of Bothwell, although he had represented it for twenty-nine years himself. Notwithstanding its historic continuity and his own connection with it, he wipes it from the map of Canada altogether. The county of Bothwell deserves a better fate from the fact that it sent a gentleman of his standing, character and ability to the Parliament of Canada for twenty-eight or twenty-nine years, and I have no hesitation in saying that on that ground, if on that ground alone, Bothwell deserved a little better treatment than it is receiving from the hon. gentleman and his colleagues. I have no hesitation in saying that, for I have great respect for the gentleman's ability, and notwithstanding his inconsistent course with respect to this bill—notwithstanding his change of practice with regard to the matter of redistribution, I have a great respect for the hon. gentleman, and I think that in dealing with this question his colleagues, even if he were too angry to do justice should point out to him that his own history is connected with the history of Bothwell, and he certainly should not blot it from the map of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was blotted before.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It was not. I do not think I would be justified in taking up any more time. However, I have taken the pains to consult the speeches of my hon. friend, I have read them with a great deal of attention, and I find that every time he turned to this question he furnished strong arguments against the bill that he has now in his hands. I have been greatly influenced by his former views and by the views of his colleague, Sir Louis Davies. I shall not sit down without quoting from the views of Sir John Macdonald, a gentleman whose opinions on any constitutional question will be accepted as entitled to greater weight than those of any other Canadian, a man whose services in connection with this country, whose great experience in the bringing about of confederation, and his wonderful career afterwards in the working out of problems connected with it, entitle his views to greater consideration than those of any other man living or dead. In 1882 reference was made to the Tuckersmith Bill, on which I shall say a word or two before I sit down. Speaking of Mr. Blake, who sat opposite him at the time, Sir John said:

> Legal power is right but the expediency of exercising that power is a different affair. The only matter in which the House of Lords cannot interfere is the Supply Bill. We know that when the Senate threw out the Tuckersmith Bill, the hon. gentleman did not deny the constituted right of that House to interfere in that matter, and they interfered rightly and well on that occasion, because they prevented a breach of the British North America Act by so doing.

That shows that Sir John Macdonald regarded the passage of a Redistribution Act, at any time, except after the decennial census, as a breach of the British North America Act. I daresay my hon. friend will be prepared to say, that Sir John Macdonald sat in Parliament and perhaps led Parliament when some minor changes were made to the redistribution of seats. I am aware that such was the case, and it is consistent with the views that I am presenting to the House, that Parliament can only deal once and for all with the question of redistribution after each decennial census, but it must perform all the functions it is called on by the British North America Act to do at that time, and if it only performs its functions in part it will then be its duty, notwithstanding anything to the contrary, to take up and complete that work. For instance, in the Act of 1892, owing to some typographical error, the city of Ottawa was mentioned as only being entitled to return one member, hon. gentlemen know that, according to section 51, Ontario must have its proportionate number of members, and if Ottawa had only one, Ontario would be short of one representative. If Parliament gave Ontario only 91 seats when it was entitled to 92, the work would have been incomplete, and Parliament must complete its work. In the same way some clauses were inserted with regard to the boundary of the district of Nipissing, which I understood were introduced to conform with some decisions which had been rendered with regard to the boundary between Ontario and Quebec. Clearly, in these two cases it was not unconstitutional or inconsistent with the power Parliament should exercise after every decennial census, to repair such omissions and clerical errors as those. If Parliament had done anything more, their doing it would not make it legal. If Parliament has done what it had not legal right to do, it does not weaken or abrogate the law or give us any right to do what is wrong now. I am happy to say that on that point also I shall be able to sustain my view by the words of my hon. friend himself. In discussing this question in 1892 my hon.

friend the Minister of Justice spoke of what had been done in 1872 and 1882, and said :

The question was not made the question of discussion. The particular provisions of section 51 were not considered, and I do not think that we are in the slightest degree bound by the want of attention on the part of Parliament on two previous occasions. In the case of the Queen vs. the inhabitants of Houghton, which is reported, I think, in the first volume of Ellis and Blackburn, Lord Campbell said that Parliament may mistake the character of a measure, and that in the preamble of a bill it may recite as law that which is not law at all, and the mere recitation of a mistaken view of the law will not make it law. And, so in this case, Parliament, acting on a mistaken construction of that provision of the Act, will not make that mistaken view of the law a correct view—will not give them a power which they did not possess in 1882.

All through those quotations which I have made from my hon. friend's speeches, he was contending that Parliament was bound strongly by the words of the 51st section of the British North America Act, and that they could not redistribute in any other way than under that section, and that that required them to constitute an authority for the division of constituencies, and that if they were to proceed in any other way, they were wrong. If my hon. friend was right about that, in regard to the authority which should divide the constituencies, then I am right in determining that Parliament could only do it once in ten years as provided by the 51st section of the British North America Act. Reference has been made to the Tuckersmith Bill, and I notice that my hon. friend, interrupting the leader of the opposition on that question, did not altogether state correctly the reasons for which that Tuckersmith Bill was defeated at that time. Sir John Macdonald, it appears, looked at it as having a constitutional effect, and he valued the action of the Senate in defeating the Tuckersmith Bill because they had preserved the constitution of Canada from an infraction, but the popular reason was that the late Mr. M. C. Cameron, after having been elected at the general election of 1874, had his seat protested and he was likely to have to go back to his constituents again. To strengthen himself, he provided by a bill, which his friends passed in the House of Commons, that the township of Tuckersmith, containing a very large Liberal majority, should be taken from another constituency of Huron and added to the constituency he represented, and which he would have to face in a partial election. The electors of Tuckersmith had already exercised their franchise and influence in the formation of that Parliament, and here was an attempt made to put these men into a constituency where they would be able again to exercise all their influence as electors and return another member to Parliament. It was proposed to give this Liberal majority in Tuckersmith a double power in being represented in Parliament. That was the popular argument that was used against the bill, and it was undoubtedly a good one, but Sir John Macdonald evidently did not look upon that as the most important ground ; he took the ground that it was an infraction of the constitution because Parliament had no right to pass a Redistribution Bill, except after the decennial census. I hope I have made my views clear ; whether they will be concurred in by the majority of the House is not for me to say, but from the consideration I have given to this measure, and from the fact that the Senate has been threatened by a resolution aimed at its integrity and independence and its co-ordinate power as a branch of this Parliament, from the fact that almost hand in hand with this, I was going to say disreputable bill, but I will say this obnoxious bill that has been presented to us, there is from the same quarter a threat held over our heads that if we do not pass this bill they will take our lives—I would reject the bill. An organ of Mr. James Greenshields said that if the Senate did not pass this bill they took their lives in their hands. If all the members of the Senate think and feel as I do, that would furnish an excellent ground for showing our independence by recording our votes against this bill. In reference to that subject, I have only to refer to some words which were uttered in 1884 when the Franchise Bill was rejected by the House of Lords. Here are the words Lord Balfour used :

If it was the case they would be met by hostility; they would not in the slightest degree abate that hostility by passing the bill on the present occasion. On the next occasion when their Lordships threatened to throw out a bill these threats and menaces would be renewed and the only result would be that hostility would be changed into contempt.

He warned his friends that if they yielded to the storm raised by the Radicals they would not abate their hostility. If hon. gentlemen agree with me that this bill is an obnoxious one, or even if they should have some leaning towards the measure, as some may have from the fact it may put some of their friends in a better position in some way they should vote against it as an answer to these indecent threats. I am appealing to men on both sides of the House. I think that the menace held out to interfere with the independence of this House, along with all the other reasons should stiffen and strengthen our opposition to this measure. Here is what Lord Carnarvan said on the same occasion to which I have referred:

> But the House of Lords cannot consent to legislate under a menace, I hold it for certain and I hold it deliberately that it would be better for us to cease to be, in the fulness of our traditions and with our unstained honour than to pretend to exercise functions of which we are the trustees but which we cannot fulfil.

These were the sentiments of a nobleman of the highest character and spirit, and these should be the sentiments of this House on the present occasion, and I shall be deeply grieved if I do not find in the ranks of those who are not politically connected with the opposition some at least, and I hope not a few, who will feel it their duty, on these grounds as well as on the ground of the utterly indefensible provisions of the bill generally, to record their votes against it and in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was somewhat impressed by the argument of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, and the quotations which he made from speeches made by prominent members of Parliament to sustain the view which he now takes of the British North America Act. It impressed me a good deal, but I think the House ought to be careful about accepting as very high authority quotations taken from former speeches, made either by the gentlemen who are speaking at the time, or by other gentlemen. Naturally, in looking over a volumn of Hansard, an hon. gentleman will select those portions which suit his purpose, and he will ignore the portions which do not suit his purpose. That is natural and proper, and is always done. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield has afforded several illustrations of the truth of that. I shall just refer to one circumstance in connection with the debate in 1892 on the Redistribution Bill of that year. The hon. gentleman gave us the arguments used by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Justice, but he carefully suppressed—I am using that in no offensive sense—it did not suit his purpose to tell this House, made up as to a large majority of good Conservatives, that the hon. gentleman who in 1892 was Minister of Justice, and who is regarded by hon. gentlemen of the opposition as the highest constitutional authority of his time in the country, had taken a totally different view.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I know that would have no effect on hon. gentlemen opposite.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Sir John Thompson, who was then Minister of Justice, pointed out that the theories of the present Minister of Justice and the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries were mistaken.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The question argued both by Sir Louis Davies and myself was on a point altogether distinct from that which the hon. gentleman has pressed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is just as good for this point as for the other.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am simply calling attention to the fact that this House should exercise care in accepting arguments that are based upon quotations. I am not going to quote Sir John Thompson just now at length; I shall quote him further on, but I shall quote enough to show what he thought of those arguments. I quote from column 3262 of the Commons Debates of 1892, and this is the way Sir John brought his argument to a close:

> I repeat very shortly what I have said on the construction of section 51. I contend we had the power before section 51 and outside of it altogether; that we are not to interpret section 51 as taking away from the general power or making any repugnance in the Act and that, above all, the section is not to receive that construction unless that construction is plain and necessary. But if it were intended by the Parliament that passed this statute that although we should have the power to increase the number of members in the House—and that is another point against the hon. gentleman's argument, that there is power given to increase the number of the House from time to time, provided the proportion of representation is not disturbed as laid down by the Act—the question of redistribution is something we are prohibited from doing, there is not in the whole Act from beginning to end a single negative provision as regards the right of this Parliament to do that work.

Sir John Thompson summarizes there what he had been saying.

We should consider the question before us. I do not see that there is any great object to be gained by going back and talking about iniquities of former administrations in the province of Ontario, or the present Liberal administration in the Dominion of Canada. I do not think there is much object in dealing in detail with the iniquities of former Conservative governments of Canada. Our object should be to deal with the measure before us : to deal with that, and deal with it in a temper and frame of mind suited to a business proposition. Before I deal with the measure I may say that it would not strike any ordinary observer that there was anything out of the way in this bill. The first principle of the measure is that, as a rule, you adopt the boundaries of counties and provide that a portion of one county shall not be taken with a portion of another county to make a constituency. That seems a reasonable proposition. That is the principle of the bill, and, as I say, I think it is a good principle. Then the second principle of the bill, which is a still better one, and a most admirable one, I think, to have introduced into Canada, is the principle that when you come to divide up these counties into constituencies to return members, the division shall not be made at the will of a party majorty in Parliament, but shall be made by an irreproachable and unimpeachable tribunal. That is the proposition. I say that these two principles taken by themselves, both seem to be fair and reasonable, and I do not think, notwithstanding all that has been said, that it has been shown that there is anything unfair or unreasonable about the government measure, which really does not do more than embody those two principles. There may be certain details ; no measure is perfect, there may be one or two details in this bill which are capable of improvement, and if there are, I think the Senate might make the necessary improvements ; but the principles of the bill are sound and good, and I do not think, under the circumstances, that we should hastily decide to reject it. Whether the measure is good or bad, we have, of course, to deal first of all with the question raised, not directly altogether, by the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition. That amendment does not deal with the character of the measure in itself. Speaking broadly, he takes the ground that this House should not pass this measure because the measure is contrary to the spirit of the constitution. As I understand, the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition, it is that. That is the first question to be considered, and I shall briefly refer to the British North America Act on that subject. The constituencies of this country were determined by section 40 of the British North America Act, which says that "Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, shall, for the purposes of the election of members to the House of Commons, be divided into electoral districts as follows." Hon. gentlemen will notice that there is a general power given to the Parliament of Canada to provide otherwise, and this same expression is used in other cases. Section 41 reads :

> Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces at the union relative to various matters enumerated shall continue to be in force.

And there is also a provision of paragraph 47 :

> Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, in case of the absence for any reason of the speaker.

Those were temporary provisions intended to make things work until Parliament had got to business ; and I may say, in the speech of the Right Hon. Sir John Thompson, from which I have quoted, he lays great stress upon that fact, so that I take it that section 40 does not tell at all against the contention that we have a right to pass this measure. What does section 51 say ? I might say hon. gentlemen that I was of the same opinion as the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon gentleman from Marshfield. I had not read the Act carefully and I was under the impression, until some time before Parliament met, when I came to study it a little more carefully, that Parliament had the power to redistribute only after the decennial census, but when I came to read section 51 over carefully, I was forced to the conclusion that I had been mistaken. What does it say ? It is contended by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield that this section 51 gives in detail the various steps that are to be taken in redistributing, and not only in apportioning to the several provinces the number of representatives which they shall each have, but in deciding how the constituencies shall be divided in order to give to a province the additional members which it is entitled to, or to take away from it the members which it loses. One of the things which struck me about section 51 is that it does not do anything of the kind. The section applies solely in its language to the readjustment as between the provinces, and if any hon. gentleman takes the trouble to read it he will observe that. It reads as follows :—

On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time as the Parliament of Canada, from time to time, provides, subject and according to the following rules :

Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members.

There shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population, ascertained at such census, as the number sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec, so ascertained.

In the computation of the number of members for a province, a fractional part not exceeding one-half of the whole number requisite for entitling the province to a member shall be disregarded, but a factional part exceeding one-half of that number shall be equivalent to the whole number.

On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada, at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province, is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards.

Such readjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing Parliament.

Hon. gentlemen will notice that in every provision dealing with the redistribution of members among the provinces, there is nothing as to any regard being had for the unit of population in the subdivision of the provinces, and nothing said as to what authority is to subdivide the provinces. There is nothing said at all about the subdivision of the provinces ; and it is unreasonable to suppose that, if the Parliament of Great Britain when passing this Act had intended that this section should govern the subdivision of the provinces into constituencies, it would not have said a word about it ; but there is no word in that whole section which refers to anything but the redistribution of members between the various provinces. These paragraphs are simply intended to show how you are to find out how many members each province shall have after the census, and there being no provision in this 51st section for the dividing up of the provinces into constituencies, that power must be given under some other section. As I have said, starting with section 40, it contemplates that after the Parliament of Canada gets to work it may redistribute and alter the electoral districts. Then the 91st section, as the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has said, set forth that the Dominion Parliament can make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

And Sir John Thompson took the ground that under that section also Parliament had the right to deal with the matter of the subdivision of the provinces into constituencies. I do not propose to argue this constitutional question much further. The 51st section of the British North America Act does not assume to deal with this question of the subdivision of the provinces. There are other sections which give the power to Parliament to do it, and we can assume, I think, that Parliament has the right. If Parliament had not the right, we would naturally suppose that the question would have come up before. Take the Tuckersmith case. I took occasion to-day to look at the debates on the Tuckersmith Bill in this House, and I read the report of it and also the report of the debate in the other House, and all that the hon. gentleman who then led the opposition in this House, the late Sir Alexander Campbell, said about the Tuckersmith Bill was that he thought it was rather hostile to the spirit of the constitution. He did not make that statement in a positive way, but gave it as his opinion that it was hostile to the spirit of the constitution and did not claim it was hostile to the letter of the constitution. When the matter was before the House of Commons, the leader of the opposition there did not take the ground with any positiveness that this measure was unconstitutional. He took the ground that this measure should have been introduced as a government measure, and I want to give the House just what he said on the constitutional question. He said :

By the British North America Act of 1867 there was to be a readjustment of representation once in ten years. That principle should be carried out rigidly, and the time of Parliament ought not to be taken up by bills of individual members whenever the bounds of their constituencies did not happen to suit them. It would be a very unfortunate thing if this practice was going to obtain. All parties were interested in the maintenance of the constitution, and this innovation should be resisted. If ever there was a government which could resist the introduction of measures of this kind, he thought the present government could, because the loss of twenty or twenty-five constituencies would not affect them.

Mr. DORION—We approve of the measure, we do not resist it.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—Said he was very sorry to hear it, because he thought the principle of readjustment every ten years was one which would commend itself to the majority of members in the House.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Would the hon. gentleman read what Sir Alexander Campbell said in the Senate?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The remarks of Sir Alexander Campbell in the Senate were not as strong as what I have just read. Sir John Macdonald said that he thought the principle of readjustment every ten years was one which would commend itself to the majority of the members in the House of Commons. He dealt chiefly with the impropriety of a private member introducing this measure, and he objected to the character of the measure because it would enable the gentleman who was about being unseated to go back to a different constituency from that which had elected him, and it would add Liberal votes to the constituency. Sir Alexander Campbell put the matter almost altogether on the ground that it was objectionable because it was intended to secure the return of a member who was about to be unseated. He said:

They knew there was a petition pending against the return of the gentleman who occupies in another place the seat for the south riding. Now, assuming he would be obliged to return for election next month, the effect of this bill would be to give him 200 votes more than he otherwise would have. Was that fair? He had not listened to but had read the debates in another place, and there it was avowed that the object of this bill was to give so many more votes to this gentleman if he should be obliged to run this election over again.

An hon. gentleman made some mention of a machine. It just depends upon whose machine it is. There have been Conservative machines doing reckless things in the province of Ontario, and there is some rumour now to the effect that there is a Liberal machine too.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is not certain of the latter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, not yet. We are of the other.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—One is a presumption and the other is a fact.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before six o'clock I dealt at not very great length with the constitutional aspect of the question, I referred to the sections of the British North America Act, and I think made it reasonably clear that section 51 did not limit the right of Parliament to deal with the distribution of seats within the several provinces to the year after the decennial census, as had been contended by the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island. I may say that the view which I take of this constitutional question, and which is taken on this side of the House, has been borne out by the fact that never since 1872 has the position been seriously taken that Parliament had no right to deal with the question of representation as regards the distribution of seats, except under the 51st section. That ground has never been seriously maintained. I have not read the debates which have taken place in the Commons during the present session, but as I understand, it has not been seriously contended by any lawyer that the 51st section of the British North America Act alone governed this question. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield is the only constitutional and legal authority who maintains that view. I said at the beginning, when quoting from Sir John Thompson, that I proposed to read something further from him, and with the permission of the House I shall read something further: at column 3260 of the Commons Hansard for 1892, Sir John Thompson says:

Mr. Speaker I agree with the hon. member from Queen's (Mr. Davies), that it is incorrect to speak of the inherent powers of this Parliament, because this Parliament is a creation of statute, but, Sir, we have a clause in our constitution which gives us the equivalent of the inherent powers possessed by other assemblies. When this Parliament was created, unlike other creations of statutes it was not given a limited and narrow authority which had to be drawn from the statute itself but in lieu of the inherent power possessed by other Parliaments, we have section 91 of the Act which says that this Parliament may make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the legislature of the provinces. I only state this as a reminder for those members of the House who are not versed in legal matters, that this section plainly gives to this Parliament all powers in relation to the government of Canada "for the peace, order and good government of Canada" which are not given expressly to the legislatures and that while, as regards the legislatures, we must look to this Act to find their powers we have all the powers given to us except those given to the other bodies. That clearly includes the power of dealing with the representation of the country in this House, and the corollary as regards the provincial constitutions is the gift of power to provincial legislatures to alter their constitution, under which those legislatures have sometimes abolished one chamber, and sometimes increased, and sometimes decreased the number of members who sat in one chamber or the other.

I shall not trouble the House to read further, except to say that he goes on in that same line and upholds the view which I have expressed already, and he regarded section 51 as providing that notwithstanding that the Parliament has the power to deal with the question of redistribution at any time, it shall be their duty every ten years to readjust the representation as between the provinces. I think that there is nothing in the constitution to prevent Parliament from passing this bill. It is a measure which comes within the purview of Parliament; and, as I said before, that has not been seriously contested in the House of Commons by any lawyer there. It has been referred to, but no stress has been laid upon that argument. Then the question for us is as to the merits of the measure. We have to look at the measure and consider whether, on the whole, it is one that we should pass. But really there is something further than the merits of the measure. The first thing which must strike every hon. gentleman is that this is a measure which affects the House of Commons and does not affect us. It is, to a certain extent, domestic legislation, as regards the House of Commons. I do not mean to say that this House has not the power to reject any measure which comes from the House of Commons, but measures of this character which affect, in a peculiar manner, the House of Commons, and do not affect the Senate, are measures which the Senate should be very slow to meddle with. There is a sort of parliamentary etiquette which provides that a House such as ours is should be slow to meddle with a measure which affects the other House alone. This is a measure somewhat different from the franchise. It does not alter the constitution of the parliamentary constituency as a whole. It may alter or affect the boundaries of certain constituencies, but it does not affect, as a radical change as the franchise does, the whole community; and I think it is our duty to look at this measure, not in the spirit which was indicated by the last speaker, who said that we should bear in mind that the government who were trying to push this measure through had in reserve another measure, with which they threatened us if we did not pass this measure. We should not trouble our heads about other measures. They may or may not come, and if they come, it will be time enough for us to deal with them then. Our first duty is to deal with the measure before us as an independent House of Parliament, and to remember not to deal with it in the spirit in which some gentlemen seem to deal with it—that it is a measure which we are bound to pick flaws in if we can, that if we fancy that we can detect any evil spirit, any spirit unfriendly to the Senate, or to the party to which the majority of the members of the Senate belong, we are forthwith to kick the thing out of doors. That is not the spirit. We should deal with it in a reasonable and fair spirit. We should remember that it is not a measure which affects us. It is a measure which may be regarded as a domestic measure, affecting the domestic affairs of the House of Commons, and that it is prima facie our duty to pass it. If there is anything seriously wrong with it, let us amend it, but let us not reject it, unless we are satisfied that it is a thoroughly objectionable and evil measure. Although the leader of the opposition, and the hon. gentleman from Marshfield did use strong language about the measure, I do not believe that there is any member present, and I am satisfied that there is almost no member of the House of Commons, who believes that it is a measure which deserves strong condemnation. Some members may have thought that in its results it might prejudicially affect themselves, but no one thought this was a highly objectionable or pernicious measure, and consequently it is a measure which this House ought to pass. As I said at the beginning, the impression on the minds of the majority of the members of the House of Commons is that the Redistribution Act of 1882, supplemented by the Redistribution Act of 1892, perpetrated an injustice to one of the great parties in the country. Whether that was altogether true or not, I am not now going to consider at any length. My own impression is that that statement is true, that the measure was intended to give advantage to one party. I do not think it did. I do not think that as a rule measures of that kind have the effect which is contemplated, but that is not really the thing which we have to consider. We have to consider that fact, of course, that the majority of the House of Commons think that the existing scheme for the subdivision of the constituencies is an unfair one. We are bound to pay some respect to the opinions of the majority of the House of Commons. The government acting on behalf of the majority of that House, and acting on behalf of the country at large, submit a measure, as they have a right to do, and the question is whether, looking at the object and looking at all the circumstances of the case, that measure is one which is very objectionable. Looking at the measure itself, it cannot be considered a very objectionable one. Something has been said about the English Act, and the hon. gentleman from Marshfield seemed to think there was a striking contrast between the manner in which the question of redistribution was dealt with in England in 1884, and the manner in which it is being dealt with here. I fail to see that there is any marked difference. In England certain general principles were laid down by Parliament, as I understand it, and then, these general principles having been agreed upon between the two parties, certain distinguished gentlemen outside of Parliament were selected to make the redistribution in accordance with the principles which had been agreed upon. The following were the commissioners, Sir John Lambert, chairman; Mr. Pelham, barrister at law; Sir Francis Sandford, Mr. Joseph John Henley, Col. Owen Jones, R.E., and Major Hector Tulloch, R.E. The two engineer officers were put on because one of the duties of the commission was to run lines subdividing the constituencies. Some of these gentlemen had been in public life and others had been in the public service as civil servants, and the last two named had been in the army. These gentlemen were given instructions, which were read by the Secretary of State to the House the other evening, telling them how they were to proceed and that they were to have regard for county boundaries and other matters which I am not now going into. The first principle which is laid down in this bill is a principle which was laid down in the instructions to these commissioners, that regard shall be had to county boundaries. As I said before, on the face of it that seems a reasonable principle to adopt. In the province from which I come, we have had county boundaries and nothing else since the union in 1867. Before the union, in the last session of the old legislature held in the spring of 1867, the number of representatives was reduced, and the counties were left as they had been. Each county was given two members, except the counties of Halifax and Pictou, which were given three each, and there has been no change in that respect during all the years that have intervened. I do not mean to say that the fact that the Liberals have been in power in Nova Scotia during all those years except four, has had anything to do with the fact that the constituencies were not interfered with. We have had no ground for complaint in Nova Scotia. In New Brunswick I think the rule has been practically the same—I am not speaking of the local legislature now, but of New Brunswick as it was divided up for the purpose of Dominion elections. It seems to me, notwithstanding the fact that that view did not commend itself to the last speaker, that in this country the preservation of what one may call the individuality of the county is an important thing, even more important than in England. I do not know exactly how it is with the counties of Prince Edward Island, but I know that in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the counties, as a rule, are municipalities in themselves. The same is the case in Ontario, and I think in Quebec. In England the counties are not municipalities. The counties exist for certain purposes, but in England there was no general municipal government in 1884. There is now under the County Government Act of 1888, but at the time of that redistribution in England they had not county government to the same extent that we have it here, and the individuality, the separate life of the county was not as marked as it is in Canada. Looking at the fact that since the year 1867, the separate individual existence of counties had been recognized in dealing with the representation of the people on the whole, the principle of county representation and of following the county lines is a very satisfactory one, and one which deserves to be adopted. It gets rid of a great deal of difficulty and illfeeling. That was the old principle here in Canada. It is the principle which has prevailed in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and no one quarrelled or found fault with it. There is no reason why it should not have been continued. It is gratifying that now, when the existing condition of things comes to be remedied, the government should have decided to go back to that system of the individuality of counties, and provided that no constituency should be part in one county and part in another. The other principle involved in the bill is that when you come to the place where a difficulty might arise and where a political tribunal, such as a committee of the House of Commons or Parliament itself must fail to do justice, in the subdivision of counties for electoral purposes where counties have to be subdivided. I think it is a fortunate thing that the Minister of Justice, who, I understand, is responsible for the outlining of the bill at any rate, should have introduced this impartial tribunal instead of a parliamentary committee or the Parliament itself. It is a guarantee that if this measure becomes law, hereafter a redistribution of seats will not be a thing to be looked forward to with dread by the party which happens to be in opposition at the time, and shall not be looked forward to by members of the party who are in the majority as an occasion when they will be able to dish their opponents, and provide the means of remaining in power still longer. I am not now making that a matter of accusation against one party more than the other. I say that is the temptation. It is human nature. If a number of men who are going to have an election have in their hands the power of reconstructing the constituencies, as a matter of course, the constituencies will be reconstructed in what the majority believe to be their own interests; and I think it is in the interest of the public at large and the interest of Parliament that that condition of things should cease; and that is one of the admirable features about this measure. I have said enough to show that, as members of the Senate, it is our duty not to reject the measure under the circumstances. Referring to the speech made by the hon. gentleman who immediately preceded me, there were three or four points which struck me as somewhat singular. One of the points was that the gerrymander of 1882 had been ineffective and, apparently, the hon. gentleman felt that, because it had been ineffective, it should be allowed to continue in operation. I gathered from what the hon gentleman said that he admitted it was a gerrymander, and that it was not fair to the opposition of that day, and the conclusion I should naturally draw from that condition of things is that things should be put upon a fair basis. But the hon. gentleman thinks it should be allowed to continue.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—To whom does the hon. gentleman refer?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I spoke of the hon. gentleman who had immediately preceded me, the hon. gentleman from Marshfield.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I certainly did not say that the redistribution of 1882 was unfair. I said if there was anything unfair time had corrected it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I got the impression that the hon. gentleman said it was unfair; perhaps I misapprehended him.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They gave Middlesex four representatives. The Reform majority in the county immediately preceding the election was 1,100, and in the next election three Conservatives and one Liberal were returned, and that is what the hon. gentleman calls fair. It was outrageous.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentlemen from Ontario know where the shoe pinches. As I said before, the measure was unfair, particularly in Ontario, and most particularly in western Ontario. The hon. gentleman said that this measure should be more general in its character. There may be some force in what he says. If this bill now before the House has any fault, it is that it does not go far enough as regards the province of Ontario. To have been a complete measure, it should have undone the work of 1882 and 1892 altogether, and put all the counties of Ontario on the same basis. It is not always the wisest and most judicious thing to do that which is logically the best. You must not always follow things to their logical conclusion. The hon. leader of the opposition smiles, but he knows how it is himself, and he knows that one of the reasons why English liberty has survived so long, and why English parliamentary life is what it is, is just because English people have not insisted on being too logical. They have not run things into the ground. They go as far as convenience and practical justice require. It happens that it was in western Ontario the worst deeds of the Acts of 1882 and 1892 were done, and that in eastern Ontario there was not so much done; and, further, eastern Ontario at the present time is probably somewhat over-represented—that is, according to the census of 1891, and it might involve a good deal of difficulty to rearrange things in eastern Ontario.

The hon. gentleman referred to the province of New Brunswick. Well, the condition of things which exists as to St. John are not satisfactory. An elector in the city of St. John votes for two members, and the elector living outside the city votes for one member only. That that difficulty might have been got over in another way is true; and I suppose if the Senate were to amend that particular part of the bill it would not imperil the existence of the measure, and if it is felt that the county of St. John has not been dealt with in the best and wisest way, then we might amend the measure with respect to St. John. I do not think it is necessary for me to undertake to defend the hon. Minister of Justice against the charge of ingratitude to the electoral district of Bothwell which the hon. gentleman from Marshfield put before the House in such an effective and thrilling manner. But the truth is that, inasmuch as the electoral districts of Cardwell and Monck are treated in the same way as Bothwell, there is not very much force in all the keen things that were said about blotting out Bothwell.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They blotted half of it out to start with.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The voters of Bothwell would vote in the counties to which they belong under the new measure. A great deal of stress has also been laid upon something which was said by the hon. gentleman who led the opposition in 1892. Hon. gentlemen know that we may take expressions out of speeches made years ago and make any one of us appear inconsistent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is the misfortune of having a Hansard.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a matter of fact, in that session of 1892 Mr. Laurier voted for a resolution which embodied the principle involved in this bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, quite the contrary.

Hon. Mr. POWER—His sober, second thought differed from his first impression when the government measure of that year was introduced.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, no; it is the difference between being in and out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield laid a great deal of stress upon the words "such authority" in the 51st section, and he seemed to think that the conclusion to be drawn from the use of these words was that the redistribution should not be made by Parliament but should be made by some other authority. The remarkable thing is that while the hon. gentleman thinks that now, he supported a party which never adopted that ground at all. In 1872 they did not think this work should be done by an authority separate from Parliament. They did it themselves. Parliament did it. They did it in 1882 and they did it in 1892. So that while the hon. gentleman thinks he must hold the government to-day bound by what a gentleman who was not then a member of the government, but who afterwards became a member of the government, stated in 1892, the hon. gentleman is not prepared to be bound himself by what the government which he supported did by solemn legislative act in 1872, 1882 and 1892. I wish to make one observation with respect to the authority of the late Sir John Macdonald as an expounder of the constitution. I have quoted the opinion of Sir John Thompson in connection with this 51st section, and there is no decided opinion of Sir John Macdonald's on record with respect to the matter, but even if there had been, I should suppose that the authority of Sir John Thompson, who was recognized as a constitutional lawyer as well as an able public man, would be worth more than the opinion of the late Sir John Macdonald. The late Sir John Macdonald had on different occasions constitutional questions with Sir Oliver Mowat, when he was Premier of Ontario. I suppose half a dozen of these constitutional questions arose between the two governments, and in every single instance Sir John Macdonald was worsted by the Little Tyrant, as he used to call him, Sir Oliver Mowat; and I do not think that the mere fact that Sir John Macdonald on a certain occasion used an obiter dictum to the effect that we should only readjust every ten years, should weigh very much with this Senate when you set against it the wording of the British North America Act and the express and deliberate opinion of the late Sir John Thompson on the other side, and the consensus of opinion amongst lawyers. If this bill passes what will happen is this: in the first place, certain changes which were made in the province of Quebec and in the province of Ontario—chiefly these two provinces will be undone, and all the counties in Ontario and Quebec will be units for election purposes. Then a commission made up of judges above suspicion and reproach will be appointed; and where a county is entitled to more than one representative they will subdivide that county.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is to give them an air of respectability.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That will be the course in the present instance.

Hon. M. PROWSE—Is that policy proposed for Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There will be two counties returning two members each, and one county returning one member.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—But no judges to divide the ridings.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, the counties never were divided; and the same is the case in Nova Scotia, the county of Halifax returns two members, Pictou returns two members and Cape Breton returns two members. In Ontario the practice has been to divide the counties.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not always.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But as a rule.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, quite the contrary.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think, on the whole, the balance of convenience is in favour of dividing the county. The next point I feel strongly about: I do not really think that, as regards the Liberal or the Conservative party, the passing of this bill is of any material consequence as far as the next election is concerned. I honestly think it is of little consequence.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Then why pass it?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is desirable that a new and better system than we have had should be adopted for readjusting the representation in this country.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Wait until after the next census.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If we pass this measure now, we make a good start. Then, after the decennial census of 1901, it does not matter which party is in power, after the example set of respecting county boundaries, and of having a judicial, or impartial tribunal established to subdivide the counties, no party will ever attempt to gerrymander constituencies again, and I think that that will be a great gain to this country?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What about St. John?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have told the hon. gentleman that if the majority of this House think that the measure is unfair with respect to St. John, they may amend it. It is only one constituency in about 200.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—There is no voice against the measure—no fault found with it down there.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am speaking of the rejection of the measure as a whole; and looking at it and its effect on the next election, I do not think the passing or non-passing of this measure will be of any material consequence; but I think it is going to be of consequence in another way. If it is rejected, then, after the next decennial census, when the Liberal party will, in all probability, be continued in power, the probabilities are that they will have a majority in both Houses—I am not going to anticipate the probabilities—but if the Liberal party have a majority in both Houses, the measures passed by that party may not be as generous and as fair as this one; and if, on the other hand, the Conservative party should be in power, I presume that after that decennial census they will act as badly as they did in 1882. That is a contingency not to be desired, and that is the chief reason why I am anxious to see the measure pass. Another reason is, that I have some respect for the light in which this House is regarded throughout the country; and if this House thinks it its duty always to fly in the face of the majority in the other House, no matter whether the action of that majority be wise or unwise, then it is an unfortunate thing for the Senate. The common sense of the people of this country tells them that this measure, which was largely the work of the Minister of Justice—a man who is good nature and fair play itself—is, on the whole, a fair and proper measure, and the country will not approve of the action of this House if they reject it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There was one portion of the remarks of my hon. friend from Halifax in which I was particularly interested, and that was his appeal to the House that this subject should be treated in a charitable and in a christianlike spirit, so to speak. I can assure my hon. friend that in the very short discussion of this subject upon which I propose to enter I shall give it the most gentle treatment of which I am capable. I was not surprised at the appeal, also, which my hon. friend made to the House, that no short citation of speeches made on former occasions should be read or used in connection with this particular discussion. My hon. friend had doubtless recalled the fact that when he expostulated about the treatment of this bill by this House, he pursued a very hostile course with regard to the Redistribution Bill of 1892, and when my hon. friend furthermore appealed to this House——

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not know what I did in 1892; I have forgotten.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend is responsible on this occasion for what he did then. But my hon. friend did appeal to-night most feelingly to this House that they should not exercise a function, which is their right, to deal with a measure relating to the readjustment of the constituencies coming from the Commons, inasmuch as that House had entirely to do with the question. In referring to the Debates of 1892, when the Redistribution Bill of that date was before us for consideration, my hon. friend not only spoke very strongly against the bill, but my hon. friend recorded a good sturdy robust vote upon the six months' hoist moved by the present hon. Secretary of State, then the leader of the opposition and sitting upon this side of the House. I was also particularly struck by an observation my hon. friend made when he entered upon the discussion of this subject to-night, and that is that he was under the impression, shortly previous to the present session, that Parliament had not power at this time to deal with passing a Readjustment Bill until after the next decennial census had been taken, but that shortly previous to this session of Parliament he suddenly became convinced that Parliament had the necessary power to deal with the subject. If I read correctly the observations of the hon. Minister of Justice, made some years ago upon a similar subject, I cannot fail to arrive at the conclusion that my hon. friend was at one period of a like opinion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That not until after the decennial census could a redistribution be made?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I always held the contrary opinion, and I do not think the hon. gentleman will find anything in Hansard that warrants that view.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—During the discussion of the matter I may find it desirable to read some observations made in the House of Commons by my hon. friend upon the subject. The reason I do not do so now is that my hon. friend's attitude at that time has been fully discussed in this debate, and if one can read the English language aright, surely there can be no misunderstanding as to the opinions he then held. I accept my hon. friend's statement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This question was not discussed, and never even referred to in the whole of that debate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What becomes of the quotations of the hon. gentleman behind the Minister of Justice if it was not discussed?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me that if any section of the Act of 1892 was discussed it was the 51st section.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, but not this question. The question that was being discussed at that time was as to the meaning of the words "such authority."

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And I was of the opinion, although Sir John Thompson held a different view, that the Act had in view the English practice of appointing a commission, or a body for the purpose of giving effect to the general policy set out by Parliament, and that was the question that was discussed all through that debate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In order that we may have the subject more fully before us, I would refer to what then took place, as one's recollection of what took place seven or eight years ago may be somewhat shadowy. I find on page 3245 of the Hansard of that year the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who preceded my hon. friend in the discussion which then took place, speaking particularly upon clause 51, said :

The Act does not say that the Parliament shall lay down what for all time shall be the lines and principles to be followed, but that Parliament after every decennial census shall lay down those lines and principles. Let me call the attention of the House to the section on which I base my argument. When the Quebec resolutions were passed this was not in the resolution. The resolutions provided that the legislatures of each province should, after each decennial census readjust its boundaries. Rightly or wrongly, and I think rightly, the Imperial Parliament thought the basis on which redistribution should take place should be left to the Parliament of Canada instead of to the local legislature and they inserted the following paragraph :—

On the completion of the census in the year 1871 and on each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, and in such manner, and at such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides.

So that the Parliament of Canada has to provide three things. They have to provide an authority that shall deal with the readjustment on the principles they have laid down, they have to provide the principles which shall guide the redistribution and they have to decide the time when the readjustment is to go into operation. Parliament is not to do that itself.

I fully appreciate the fact that they were then discussing the authority mentioned in section 51, and the question arose as to whether Parliament could exercise that authority.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, that is it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did understand my hon. friend to say yesterday that there was an inherent power in Parliament to deal with this subject. I do not think I misunderstood my hon. friend on that occasion. My hon. friend, as well as his friends in the opposition at that time, declaimed very strongly against there being any inherent power which might then be exercised by Parliament in regard to the readjustment of the constituencies. The present Minister of Marine and Fisheries also said :

Now, Sir, it is said by some that there must be an inherent power in Parliament to do this. I deny it. This Parliament is the creation of an Imperial statute, it is bound by the limitations expressed in the statute. It has no power to legislate in defiance of or beyond or inconsistent with any of the limitations in that statute.

Then, coming to the comments of the late Sir John Thompson upon the observations made by the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the House at that time, must, have understood that the Hon. Mr. Davies emphatically took the position that a redistribution could not be made of constituencies except after each decennial census. The language of Sir John Thompson, then reviewing the observations made by the Hon. Mr. Davies, is as follows :—

The hon. gentlemen's argument at the out set would present this anomaly in the constitution that while a provincial legislature may deal with that subject, can redistribute, can increase and can diminish this Parliament has not that power, notwithstanding there is express authority given to the provincial legislature and all other authority.

Then coming to the discussion of the subject by the hon. Minister of Justice, we find him expressing himself, and tying himself, as I submit, absolutely to the opinion that the Parliament could not go outside the 51st section in dealing with the subject then under consideration speaking of section 51, he said :

It provides this specific way and I contend and I shall endeavour to establish that this is the only way provided by the constitution for altering the representation in this House. There is power to do what? For this House to readjust by such manner and from such time——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The way of doing it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He continues :

For this House to readjust, by such authority, in such a manner, and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides the representation in Parliament.

Then again :

Now, the Minister of Justice referred to the 40th section of this Act. What does the 40th section say? It says :

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall have such and such a number of representatives. "Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides" —provides how? In what way? Arbitrarily? No, Sir, provides in the way pointed out in section 51. It is authorized to provide in that way ; it is not authorized to provide in any other way. Now, there is no rule of constitutional authority better settled than this, that you cannot set up an implied power as against an expressed one. You cannot as a matter of inference or implication, maintain that there existed power that will in effect vary, or nullify or render useless an expressed power. An implied power has its origin in necessity, and springs from some power expressed. That is stated over and over again in the authorities. Now, Sir, there is not in this Parliament any inherent power, the minister admits, because this government and Parliament are wholly the creation of a statute.

My hon. friend, in the discussion of this bill upon this occasion, seems to overlook the fact that this Parliament is the creation of a statute, and he must take into consideration the events which led up to the framing of the British North America Act, and particularly the section now chiefly under consideration. My hon. friend overlooks this fact, and did so in his discussion of the subject yesterday, when he attempted to draw an analogy between the provinces and the Dominion, and contended that the Dominion could exercise the same rights and powers in regard to a readjustment bill as the provinces could do, that immediately previous to confederation, and to consummate the federal union, the provinces were called on to yield up, or sacrifice, certain rights which they then enjoyed. Why, the very storm centre of the discussion, I might say, at the time was as to the maintaining of the equilibrium of the various provinces. The province of Quebec thought, and possibly very properly thought, that the larger and more dominant province of Ontario might possibly exercise a power which would be unjust or tyrannical, so far as the rights and privileges which Quebec had formerly enjoyed. Or there might have been a combination of provinces as against a particular province, and there is no subject in the British North America Act, perhaps, worked out so carefully as the equalizing of representation between the provinces and the manner in which that equalizing shall be maintained. No question could have been more crucial at the time than this particular subject. It must certainly have occasioned no inconsiderable thought as to the representation which should be given to Quebec, and as to that being the pivotal point on which the representation of the other provinces should turn, and will any hon. gentleman at this time say that when the framers of confederation were discussing this particular point of representation, that any one of the fathers of confederation sitting around that historical table, which we are so accustomed to look at in the paintings and engravings of the fathers of confederation, would have ventured to suggest to them that there could be a readjustment of constituencies throughout the Dominion of Canada more frequently than every ten years? Will my hon. friend hazard the expression of the thought that it then existed in the minds of the framers of confederation, that during the interval between two decennial periods there could be a readjustment or a series of readjustments of seats throughout the whole Dominion.

Hon Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend, it seems to me, makes a very bold suggestion, if he says that that thought could possibly have arisen in the minds of any of the fathers of confederation. Perhaps the only opinion we have on record of what then took place, or what would crystallize into language the opinion held by the framers of the confederation, is to be found in the language of Sir John Macdonald, contained in a speech which he made in the House of Commons in 1887. I might say in this connection, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Power), has hazarded the assertion that Sir John Macdonald was not on record in regard to his attaching himself to the belief that at no other period than after the decennial census had been taken could a readjustment be made.

I think the principle was set early in our legislation that there should be no readjustment of the constituencies, either in regard to the boundaries or otherwise, except every ten years after the taking of the census, and I think it would really be well that we should adhere to that rule.

Occasionally, by the addition of a rural portion of county to a town there may be a little inconvenience, but it would be much better that that little inconvenience should be borne than that we should have little bills brought in—on every alteration of the bounds of any municipality.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When was that language used?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That language was used in 1887, and is to be found in Hansard, page 840.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Was that in the discussion on the representation of the North-west Territories Bill?

Hon. Mr LOUGHEED—A bill was brought in to amend the Redistribution Act of 1882, owing to some clerical errors having arisen, and owing to the representation having been provided in the meantime for the North-west, and this language was used in the discussion of the subject on that occasion. In corroboration of what I have said, as to the meaning that must have existed in the minds of those who framed the Act of Confederation at that time, let us test for a moment, if we can, the absurdity of the views advanced in favour of this bill——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You repudiate Sir John Thompson's view?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, I will come to that in a moment if my hon. friend desires, but here let me say that Sir John Thompson at that time was not discussing the limitations placed upon Parliament as to the period when a bill for the readjustment of constituencies might be brought down. He was discussing the other phases of the subject dealt with in section 51, and the House at that time was discussing as to whether Parliament could exercise the authority referred to in section 51 without appointing a commission of judges or any other commission, as was then urged by several members of the House. I am safe in saying that in no part of Sir John Thompson's speech made on that occasion will you find any expression falling from his lips that Parliament could more frequently than after each decennial census make a redistribution. Sir John Thompson's argument was this, that apart from section 51, there was power in Parliament under its general powers to deal with this particular subject. He, however, did not repudiate or deny the limitations which were placed upon Parliament, and this I submit was a limitation expressly, and the only limitation placed on Parliament under section 51. There are no two opinions on this point, that Parliament had the right to delegate to an authority the power to perform the acts enumerated in section 51. By way of illustration, let us instance this case: assuming that in 1871 Parliament had appointed a commission such as is contemplated by the Act, for the purpose of readjusting constituencies according to the manner described in section 51, and that commission had reported upon a measure, and that measure had become practically crystallized into law, can it be contended seriously that Parliament the following session could have entirely ignored the acts of that commission and have readjusted the constituencies?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Absolutely different?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And have undone entirely the work of that commission?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Irrespective of any legislation repealing the work which they had already done? My hon. friend says yes. Then the touch-stone of that contention is this, there would then be two law-enacting bodies in regard to the readjustment of constituencies in the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. My hon. friend will see that the authority is for the purpose of rearranging them. It is not for the purpose of legislating in respect to them. That legislative work depends entirely on Parliament, and Parliament cannot tie its own hands. Even though it were to declare a measure was perpetual, it could repeal it the next session.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—To that commission is delegated certain work. That commission performs the work. It becomes crystallized into law; practically until something else is done it is the readjustment on which the next election would be carried out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If it has been made law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am assuming it has been made law. Then my hon. friend seriously contends, notwithstanding that law, and if Parliament was implemented by a general inherent power it was not necessary to repeal it, that the following session, Parliament might seriously enter upon the consideration of a readjustment of the Act, entirely irrespective of the readjustment which was brought down by the commission, and which was there upon the statute-book.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The commission do not bring down an Act; they make a report on what the law should be.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let us assume they make a report and Parliament does the necessary act to bring that report into operation, and it becomes the plan of redistribution for the next election.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then it is the same as any other law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend says, notwithstanding that, Parliament could entirely ignore it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Could repeal it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not talking about repealing. If Parliament has the power to adjust, in the interim between two decennial periods, then Parliament would have the right to bring in any legislation entirely irrespective of what that commission has done?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Parliament would have a right to bring in a Readjustment Bill in no way dependent upon, and in no way connected with the particular adjustment of the commission. That being the case, we find a readjustment prepared by a commission, sanctioned by Parliament, and on the statute-book, of the following session—because we are not now dealing with the repeal, because if they have the power to pass an entirely different Act, it is not necessary to repeal the Act of the commission.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by an independent Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am very sorry I cannot make it clearer. My hon. friend will see, according to his contention, there are two entirely separate enacting bodies.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That has been my hon. friend's contention.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly not, I am interrupting the hon. gentleman so that he will not argue against what nobody contends for. I held in 1892, as I hold now, that the statute known as the British North America Act, contemplated the redistribution of seats in Canada, the same as the practice which prevails in England, and that is that Parliament does not absolutely pass a law without the aid or assistance of a commission, or some authority appointed for the purpose of making the redistribution under authority which Parliament confers upon them. Parliament may either sanction in advance, as this bill does, what that commission is to do and make it a part of the law, or it may sanction it by a subsequent measure, but after it is sanctioned, whether that sanction is given in anticipation, or whether it is given subsequently, the moment it is a completed Act it is the same as any other Act of Parliament, and is open to repeal. For instance, supposing this bill becomes law, and a commission is appointed under it, and a readjustment takes place, Parliament might take up the matter next session and deal with it. It is not limited by anything in the British North America Act, nor by anything done by the commission. That has no legislative power at all. It is simply a commission acting under the authority of a statute, discharging a specific duty.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think I can show that my hon. friend's explanation is the very best refutation of the argument he sought to establish at the introduction of this bill. He started out by saying there is a defined power under section 51 by which Parliament has the power to delegate to an authority the preparation of the Readjustment Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We shall read the section:

> On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time as the Parliament of Canada provides, subject and according to the following rules.

My hon. friend will concede, I presume, that Parliament could not appoint that commission more frequently than every ten years. My hon. friend will concede that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I do not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend contend that such an authority as provided for in section 51 can be provided for more frequently than every ten years.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly, as often as Parliament shall think proper.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They can only do it after each decennial census. Let us read that again:

> On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, &c.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—"Shall be readjusted."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, "after each decennial census" not twice after each decennial census, but only once after each decennial census. Then my hon. friend says Parliament can step in session after session, irrespective of section 51, because his argumant is based entirely on there being powers outside of section 51 to pass a Readjustment Bill. What I say is this, that entirely irrespective of the commission or of the authority, to urge Parliament has additional powers to pass a readjustment which, with all due deference to what has been said on the other side of the House, I submit would be ridiculous.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Looking at the specific provision of the section, does my hon. friend think that Parliament can act except through a commission?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then he thinks that acting without a commission is a perfectly valid act?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Whence does that power come?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under section 51.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Parliament can be its own authority for that particular act, but my hon. friend's contention has been that there is a certain specific right given under section 51, and under some other sections—I have not quite satisfied myself yet as to what particular section my hon. friend is nailing his contention to—but in some section Parliament has the authority to pass a Redistribution Bill, entirely irrespective of the Redistribution Bill contemplated in section 51. Do I understand that to be my hon. friend's argument—that outside of section 51, and under some other section of the Act, Parliament has the power to pass a Redistribution Bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My opinion is that section 51 is ample for us.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If that be the case, my hon. friend must contend that Parliament would have the right, more frequently than each ten years, to authorize a commission to prepare a Redistribution Bill. The first census took place in 1871, and the subsequent decennial census in 1881. Could Parliament, before that period, have changed the readjustment in the schedule to the Confederation Act?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly. Let me put this case. Supposing in the northern part of Ontario, in consequence of mineral discoveries, in the vicinity say of Hudson's Bay, in two or three years after the readjustment a population of two or three hundred thousand grew up, does the hon. gentleman say that that population must wait for five years, or five years after that, before it could get representation?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why five years additional?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because the Act provides that the redistribution of seats shall not come into operation until after the expiry of that Parliament, and that Parliament may have been elected for five years.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We are now dealing with the four provinces mentioned in the Confederation Act. Does my hon. friend say that, in the interval between 1871 and 1881, he could have granted representation to that rapidly growing population?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Although Parliament would have no power to alter the number of representatives, it might readjust the representation. It might unite two constituencies into one for the very purpose of giving the new population representation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Act at that time contemplated additional representation for the unorganized portions of the Dominion, hence representation was afterwards given to the Territories entirely irrespective of the representation fixed in the schedule to the Act, and therefore that subject, I submit, had been duly thought out at the time. Then, furthermore, the Act refers to the readjustment. What is it to be a readjustment of? Is it to be a readjustment, say, of the adjustment that took place in 1872, or what is it to be a readjustment of? If my hon. friend is correct in his contention, that session after session a Readjustment Bill could be passed, then the readjustment would not be a readjustment of the distribution which takes place immediately subsequent to the preceding decennial census. It would be a readjustment of a series of readjustments which took place in the interval.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that readjustment is used with reference to the relative representation of the different provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In conclusion, all I have to say is this: That any one reading the Confederation Act surely cannot seriously come to the conclusion that the framers of that Act, at the time of its passage, ever contemplated that there could be a disturbance and upheaval of the representation of the constituencies in each province every successive session; because, if you can do it at this period, you can do it every session during the interval of the decennial period.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under these circumstances one can very well appreciate the necessity of this House, if it possibly can, laying down a rigid rule, in the language of Sir John Macdonald in 1887, that at no other period than that succeeding the taking of the census should there be a readjustment, or redistribution, or disturbance of constituencies.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There was a departure from that very case by himself.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What case?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The representation to the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—To what constituency does my hon. friend refer?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I refer to the North-west Territories Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—A provision was made in the British North America Act for the Territories representation, entirely apart——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend will turn up the amendment to the British North America Act, he will find that special legislation was obtained from the Imperial Parliament for the purpose of giving the Territories representation, and it was the exercise of an express authority in the Act by which the Territories were given representation. Under these circumstances I feel it my duty to support the resolution moved by the hon. gentleman from Hastings, that the opinion of this House at any rate should be that it is not in the public interest that there should be a disturbance or readjustment of the constituencies until after the census of 1901 is taken.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I shall try and follow my hon. friend in the discussion of the legal aspect of the measure which is before us, and which the leader of the opposition tries to solve by the amendment which he has presented to this House. There are two or three objections which so far have been adduced against the measure brought down by the hon. Minister of Justice. The first one is directed against the constitutionality of the bill. The amendment does not declare in express terms that the measure is unconstitutional. It does not say that it goes directly against any section of the British North America Act, but it declares that it is against the spirit of our constitution. Now, what are the powers with which we are vested? What is the great principle underlying the whole fabric of our constitution? It is that the powers of this Parliament are plenary. Their sole restriction is in respect to provincial rights, and to any Imperial statutes. Our present constitution is a written one, but article 91 declares, and it has been cited already:

> That it shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

So if it is true that we have a written constitution, and that we must operate under its terms, the terms are very wide. The terms declare that we can make laws for the "peace, order and good government of Canada." It is true that we may find limitations within the bounds of that constitution. Are there limitations preventing us from legislating on the readjustment of county boundaries? What does the constitution say on this matter? It provides for a readjustment every ten years and after each decennial census of representation on the basis agreed upon by the contracting parties and all the enactments found in the Act have no other purpose but the carrying out of the contract entered into by the various provinces for the purpose of confederation. And if the hon. gentlemen will read clause after clause concerning the readjustment of representation, they will see that there is not an iota in any of those clauses which provides for anything else but the carrying out of the contract entered into by the provinces. The provinces declared that they were willing to enter into a confederation under a certain ratio of representation, and our constitution simply provides for the execution of that agreement. The sections which speak of the representation of the provinces are sections 8, 37 and 51. Section 8 provides:

In the general census of the population of Canada, which is hereby required to be taken in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and in every tenth year thereafter, the respective populations of the four provinces shall be distinguished.

And why shall they be distinguished? Clause 37 gives the answer, and it reads as follows:—

37. The House of Commons shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, consist of one hundred and eighty-one members, of whom eighty-two shall be elected for Ontario, sixty-five for Quebec, nineteen for Nova Scotia, and fifteen for New Brunswick.

Then lause 51 goes further into the details and says:

51. On the completion of the census in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time, as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject to and according to the following rules.

And the rules are laid down as to the proportion of members for the diverse provinces. As the hon. gentleman will see, these articles concern the proportionate representation of provinces and provide for the machinery for the carrying out of the contract entered into by the provinces which assure to each province a certain ratio of representation in the federal House. Nothing further is mentioned except in article 52, which throws further light upon the subject. It reads:

The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the Parliament of Canada provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this Act is not thereby disturbed.

So that, even when the preceding article declares that Quebec will have sixty-five members, the Parliament of Canada can increase even the representation of that province provided the proportion between the provinces is maintained.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That will be after the census. That is immediatly after the census at a particular time, and then again ten years afterwards.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The section I have cited does not say so.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Does the hon. gentleman say they can change the representation of the provinces any other time than after the census?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—They can change the representation from time to time provided the same ratio is maintained between the provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman is omitting the first line of article 51.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to argue that the Parliament of Canada has power to give to the province of Quebec, say, seventy-five instead of sixty-five members, and then apportion to the other provinces upon the unit of the province of Quebec?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That is my contention.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is what the Act says.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Read section 52.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There is nothing in the clauses which I have cited which mention in the slightest degree the county boundaries, or enact anything concerning the county boundaries. No one will contend that, because there is no proviso specially giving us power to change the county boundaries, that we have not the right to do so. It follows that, in order to increase the number of members per province, we have a right to touch county boundaries, but there is nothing in the Act which speaks of the change of county boundaries within the provinces. The hon. gentleman from Hastings (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) in his remarks stated that he found in the powers given to the provinces that such a power was given them and it struck him that no such powers were given to the Federal Parliament. The reason is very easy to find ; the provinces have nothing but the express rights which are given them and in order to allow them to increase their representation or change their county boundaries, that power had to be given them in the constitution There was no necessity to go into these details with the Federal Parliament, because we naturally have the right, by virtue of section 91, to make all laws for the "peace, order and good government of Canada," and under this general article which I have just cited, we have the right to interfere with county boundaries, provided we do not change the ratio of representation of provinces as settled after each census. According to some hon. gentlemen the Act passed after each census would be a finality ; we would be estopped from legislating upon the subject for the following ten years except under one contingency : if clerical errors appeared in the Act, we could pass laws to correct those errors. Three or four times since 1872 Parliament has enacted laws to correct apparent errors as the hon. member from Hastings has said but if it is such an important act, that our powers are at an end for ten years, I wonder what kind of finality it is if we can, year after year, discuss bills which, on the pretext of correcting clerical errors, will change county boundary lines, will take a municipality from one county and transfer it to another. We had not many years ago, a Finance Minister who transformed a whole tariff reform bill from line to line under the pretext of clerical errors which were in it. Under the pretext of correcting clerical errors, Parliament could tamper with county boundaries from county to county, thus affecting the electoral map of a province in twenty or more constituencies. But this Parliament has done more than correcting county boundaries. This Parliament has passed a law, chapter 10 of 58 and 59 Victoria, by which it deliberately violated the principle laid down by the amendment moved by the hon. member from Hastings. This Parliament has taken two townships from the county of Berthier and placed them in the county of Joliette. There was no pretence of correcting clerical errors. The government brought down an Act declaring that the township of Courcelles and the township of Joliette were taken from one county and placed in another county. What becomes of the principle of the finality of the Act passed three years before in 1892 ? What becomes of the pertension that we have ceased to have any power to legislate upon the readjustment of constituencies from 1892 to 1902 ? Here we have an Act passed by the House of Commons and the Senate changing the boundaries of two counties in the province of Quebec. The hon. gentlemen will see that not long ago they held different views as to the sanctity of the law readjusting the constituencies after every census The opinion of Sir John A. Macdonald has been mentioned, I wonder what Sir John A. Macdonald would have done if, after being returned to power, he had had to face a gerrymander passed two or three years before, which violated every principle of justice and equity, and if he would have simply said : "I will wait five or six years till we reach another census to undo the wrong which, it is true, did not prevent me from reaching power, but which is just as much a wrong nevertheless." I wonder if Sir John A. Macdonald and his party would have countenanced such legislation, and would have felt that the powers of Parliament were exhausted and would have returned to the people with a packed jury, or with a law which packed his partisans or hived his friends into a certain number of constituencies in order to give an undue advantage to the other side ? I have no doubt if a law had been put on the statute-book after a certain census, and if my hon. friends who now oppose this measure had been returned to power, that the very following session they would have remedied the injustice done, the wrong committed upon the people of Canada in order that principles of justice and of morality should prevail in this country.

My hon. friends have a second objection, which is far more serious than the first. They say that it is a bad policy to alter the electoral districts more than once every ten years. I am absolutely in accord with them on this contention ; it is bad policy and it is inopportune to interfere with the electoral districts and to change the representation more than once every ten years, but it is not the fault of this government if it is brought face to face with the necessity of bringing down this measure. The injustice was done in 1882, and it was repeated in 1892, and to-day we are prompted to act by an elementary sentiment of justice, backed as we are by the approbation of the people.

In 1896, the members of the present government went to the people and declared in express terms that they intended to recall the Gerrymander Acts enacted during the eighteen years of the Conservative administration. With that plank in its programme the Liberal party was returned, and now its leaders ask Parliament to pass a measure the principle of which was endorsed by the people. Some hon. gentlemen have said that the laws of 1882 and 1892 were not unjust laws. Without going into the details of the gerrymander of the province of Ontario, I will give hon. gentlemen an illustration of what is a just law and what is an unjust law in the province of Quebec. In 1892 the province of Quebec was threatened with a gerrymander. Some crasy quilt work had been prepared in order to hive the Grits and to benefit the Conservative party. The lines of certain counties were being twisted to suit party ends. It was exposed in the House of Commons in such a thorough manner that it touched the conscience of Sir John Thompson, who rebelled and receded from the stand taken by a certain number of his friends in their efforts to gerrymander the province of Quebec. Yet there remained one injustice, and under that injustice the people of that province have ever since been smarting. One municipality was purposely taken from the county of Bagot to be thrown into the county of Rouville, in order to hive the Grits in that county. The county of Bagot was a close one, where the winning candidate was generally elected with a majority of less than one hundred. The Liberal parish of St. Pie, giving 200 of a majority, was thrown into the Liberal county of Rouville. What was the result? The Conservative candidate in Bagot was elected by acclamation, in 1896, and the Liberal candidate in Rouville was returned by 900 of a majority, the Conservative candidate losing his deposit. I have stated that when the bill of 1892 was brought down the province of Quebec was to get quite a large dose of gerrymander, but what did Sir John Thompson do when the dishonest intention of some of his colleagues were exposed? Instead of twisting Vercheres and Chambly in order to gain party advantage in two or three counties shoving one municipality from Chambly into Rouville, and taking another municipality from Rouville into Chambly, he decided to honestly readjust the representation in the province of Quebec, and what have we on the statute-book? We have the boundaries of Chambly and Vercheres respected. Those two counties were simply united. They were neighbouring counties. We have not heard one complaint in the province of Quebec, because those counties which, it is true, were represented by two Liberals and could subsequently elect but one Liberal, were united. The county boundaries had been respected and no one complained. Sir John Thompson took Napierville and Laprairie, which were neighbouring counties, and united them and no one grumbled. He took St. John and Iberville and united them, respecting the boundary lines, and no one complained. It is true those counties never returned a Conservative. They had elected two Liberals, but now they only return one. The county boundary being respected, no one has raised his voice against the operation of that Act with the same lines as laid down in the present bill. As I have just remarked, the only time when an injustice was done was when St. Pie was taken purposely from Bagot to make secure that county for Mr. Dupont. It was taken and thrown into Rouville. We are simply taking St. Pie and returning it to Bagot. I could have mentioned another injustice that this bill redresses: Lacolle returns to St. Johns and Notre Dame of Stanbridge to Missisquoi; they had been exchanged for party purposes. The same principle prevails all through the bill, throughout the gerrymandered counties of Ontario, and yet hon. gentlemen in 1882, in this chamber, agreed to pass the atrocious, and infamous bill which was denounced from every hustings throughout the province of Ontario and throughout the country, and they passed that bill, I suppose, under the pretext that it came from the House of Commons and affected specially the House of Commons, but they seem now to hesitate to undo a part of the wrong to which they contributed in 1882 and 1892. They think that their responsibility will be unassailable if they can raise the question of constitutionality. They believe that they can go before the country and say that they did simply and purely their duty in preventing Parliament from carrying out the wish of the people, as expressed on the 23rd of June, 1896, if they can only shield themselves behind the constitution. I am convinced that this chamber will not obtain the approbation of the population of Canada in adopting the amendment which is now before us. The people of Canada know what is right and what is wrong. The people of Canada know when an injustice is being done, and when we bring down a bill which is fair and restores county boundaries, with all the advantages which the two parties can derive from it, it seems to me that this House should pause before declaring that it will consent to pass any kind of gerrymander that the Tory party may introduce, but will not give any small measure of justice to the other party, because of an idea in their minds that that party may derive certain advantages therefrom. I heard an hon. gentleman say here: "But the Liberal party will get an advantage by this bill." There is no doubt, if a wrong was done to the Liberal party, that by undoing that wrong the party will be benefited. As the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has said, populations change, new electors come in, and no one in this House could say that the Liberal party will derive an unjust advantage by the adoption of this bill. This is a fair measure, based upon a fair principle, and I wonder if this House will say, by its vote, that, when gentlemen are appointed to the Senate they retain all the prejudices that animate partisans, and that we can only do things from a party standpoint. As I stated before, this chamber has already annihilated, annulled and set aside the contention of the leader of the opposition by passing that Act of 1895. There was no question there of clerical errors. It was purely and simply a change of county boundaries. This Parliament is supreme, and has as much power as any provincial Parliament, and we all know that provincial legislatures have at all times a right to change county boundaries. We have no right to change the proportion of representation as between the various provinces, but we have the right, by retaining the same number of members, to change the county lines within the provinces. This was done three or four years ago by this very Parliament, and it seems to me, when we come before you with a measure that was submitted to the people at the last election, this chamber should, instead of voting for a six months' hoist, send the bill to committee, and if there are palpable wrongs—if there are such injustices as we can point out in the bills of 1882 and 1892, it will be our duty to try and better the measure, and it seems to me this Senate will simply show that partisanship holds full sway within its walls if it hangs up a measure and refuses to discuss it because it will undo a particular wrong to which the Tory majority in this chamber contributed a few years past.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question with reference to the point he raised under the 52nd section of the Confederation Act. Let me suppose that Parliament should decide, eight years after the decennial census had been taken, to increase the representation of the province of Quebec by ten members, upon what basis would he form the unit of population on which the other provinces should be increased proportionately. I am presuming that Parliament took the action which he says they could take under clause 52, to change the number of representatives, providing the unit of population of the province of Quebec be retained. Upon what basis would he constitute the unit of population upon which the other provinces should receive a proportionate increase.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I quite understand the force of the objection as to the mode of raising, from time to time, the representation throughout the whole Dominion. and I do not see very well that it could be done if it was to be based strictly upon the unit of representation and except after the census, but they could raise the representation without regard to the representation proportionately to the number of members given to the province of Quebec. That is a simple question of arithmetic.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think the hon. gentleman answered my question. He could not presume a population for the province of Quebec, because it might have decreased or it might have increased. If the unit was 23,000 eight years previously, when the census was taken, and it had been reduced to 20,000 as a unit, or it might be increased to a unit of 25,000 or 30,000, dividing the seventy-five into the total population, that would be the basis on which the increased representation would have to be given to the other provinces. The only way you could do that would be to accept the census taken eight years previously, which would be unfair.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then that is the best evidence, to my mind, that the only time at which that could be done, under the constitution, equitably at least, would be immediately after, as the hon. gentleman himself admits, the census had been taken, and undoubtedly that was contemplated at the time of confederation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have no doubt it would be the opportune time when to increase that proportionate representation, but Parliament, in virtue of section 52 of the Act can increase proportionately the number of representatives throughout the Dominion without regard to the population, provided the same ratio was maintained.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, because you could not tell what the population was.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—You would have the number for Quebec, and you could increase in the same ratio the representation of the other provinces which would be tantamount to taking the preceding census as a basis.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing you gave Quebec seventy members, you would then have to take the population of the other provinces and divide it in accordance with the unit of representation in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. DANDRY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot consent to the adjournment at the present time. I have stated to the leader of the opposition why I should like this debate to go on some time longer this evening. I trust my hon. friend will proceed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The reason given by the hon. leader of the House to me a few moments ago was that he desired to have the debate proceed to-night, so as to enable him to move the adjournment and close the debate to-morrow. That is the proposal he made, but I could not vouch for any other gentleman who was to follow him. He gave a good reason for wishing to close the debate to-morrow, because a large number of members wish to attend the funeral of the late Mr. Geoffrion. I could not say whether any one would reply to the hon. gentleman to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a general rule, recognized in both Houses in Parliament, that the member who moves a substantive motion has the right to close the debate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The motion of the Minister of Justice is not the one before the House. The question is my amendment, so the hon. gentleman has no right to reply on the original motion until it is disposed of.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have only a few words to say in answer to the speech just delivered by my hon. friend from De Lorimier. At the beginning of his remarks, he told us that there were three objections brought forward by those who oppose the present gerrymandering bill and that he would answer them. He gave two of them, but he entirely forgot to mention the third one, which he fought, and as it was kept in the dark it naturally remained unanswered. We will take the answers to the two objections that he mentioned. The first objection was that the amendment declared that the bill was against the spirit of the constitution, and he combated that contention by showing that in the past the Conservatives had not taken that ground when they brought forward an Act which was passed in 1895, as chapter 10, of 58-59 Victoria. The hon. member stated that such an Act altered the county boundaries of two counties in the province of Quebec, the county of Joliette, and the county of Berthier. This Act of 1895, he contended, was directly opposed to the principle formulated in the amendment of the leader of the opposition. The hon. gentleman from De Lorimier merely repeated what had fallen from the lips of the Secretary of State yesterday. It is a repetition of the same contention. I may be permitted to affirm that the facts are not in accord with that statement. Chapter 10 of the statutes of 58-59 Victoria refers to the Act passed in 1892, and reads as follows:

Her Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

1. The paragraph lettered e of subsection 3 of section 2 of the Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons, being chapter 11 of the statutes of 1892, is hereby repealed, and the following substituted therefor:

(e.) The electoral district of Berthier shall consist of the town of Berthier, the parishes of Berthier, Lanoarie, St. Barthelemi, St. Cuthbert, St. Damien, St. Gabrielle de Brandon, St. Michel des Saints, St. Norbert, and La Visitation de l'Ile du Pads, and the township of Prevost.

This new enactment supersedes the enactment of 1892, but repeats all the words of that section E to which it refers, except the words "Courcelles and Joliette."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why? The Minister of Justice forgot to read the debate that took place in Parliament at that time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I read the statute.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman did not appreciate the statute at its value. That bill was brought in on the 20th of June, 1895, and Mr. Ouimet moved for leave to introduce it as bill number 124. "An Act further to amend the Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the hon. gentleman keep cool a moment and he will see what is coming. The report of what occurred is as follows :—

Mr. Ouimet moved for leave to introduce Bill 124, further to amend the Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons. He said : When the Act to readjust the representation in this House was passed two years ago a mistake was made in the description of the newly constituted county of Berthier, and by that mistake the north-east half of the township of Joliette, which used to belong to the county of Joliette, was merged into the new county of Berthier, and as the description of the old county of Joliette was not amended, this half township now belongs both to Joliette and Berthier. That part of the township of Joliette, together with the other part and the township of Courcelles, now formed a parish of St. Emilie de l'Energie. This bill is introduced to declare that the whole parish of St. Emilie de l'Energie shall belong to the county of Joliette. When the electoral list for the counties of Joliette and Berthier were revised last year, the revising officer in the county of Joliette did not make the electoral list in that part of the township of Joliette, but left it to the revising officer of Berthier. My first intention was just to place things in the same place that they were before, but it became very difficult to do that on account of one single list having been made for the whole. Having consulted the parties interested in the matter, and especially the hon. member for Berthier, it was thought that the best way to get out of the difficulty would be to return to the county of Joliette all that part of the township of Joliette which was taken away and also the township of Courcelles, that is the whole of the parish of St. Emile de l'Energie. It is further provided in the bill that the list which has been prepared by the revising officer of Berthier shall serve for the county of Berthier until a new list is made.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the first time.

Does the hon. gentleman say "hear, hear" now? The hon. member for De Lorimier made a great fuss on that case, pretending that the fact of the government bringing in that bill destroyed in advance the whole principle now advocated by the hon. leader of the opposition. The remarks which accompanied the first reading of the bill explain its nature and answer victoriously the contention set forth to-day. The bill went into committee. When it came before the House no objection was made, and no discussion took place. On the third reading, Mr. Beausoleil said :

As I was not in the House when this bill was considered in committee, would the hon. Minister of Public Works be kind enough to give me some explanation about the nature of the amendments which were made?

Hon. Mr. OUIMET (Translation)—The first amendment relates to No. 2 of the bill. This Act as printed reads as follows : –

The township of Courcelles and the north-east part of the township of Joliette are hereby detached from the county of Berthier and annexed to the county of Joliette for the purposes of representation in the House of Commons.

The words "the north-east part of" in the first line are struck off. Section 3 is also amended. The last three lines were struck off.

"As that district is constituted by the Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons, chapter 11 of the statutes of 1892 as hereby amended."

This gave a false notion of the limits of the county of Joliette. It includes the limits such as they are now, because this county was not mentioned in the bill. It is the old description of the county of Joliette such as defined by the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1860, and as amended by the preceding section. I may say that the bill was drawn up as agreed upon between the hon. gentleman and myself.

Amendments agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

There was no opposition at all in the House of Commons. It was understood that the bill was merely presented to correct a clerical error, because the township of Courcelles, being in both constituencies the necessity arose to have that error corrected, and so it was done. This settles the answer brought forward by the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier to the first objection he mentioned. His answer to the second objection was that though he understood it was a bad policy to alter a constituency more than once in ten years, the thing was done at this time through a feeling of justice—moreover, the government was compelled to do it, because in the last general election that question had been brought before the electors, and the electorate had voted that plank of the platform of the party. So they were bound to do justice to the electors as well as to those divisions in bringing up this bill. If such was the case, the bill would have been framed in another way, and would have simply repealed the law of 1892. There was only one injustice, the hon. member said, done in the province of Quebec. To repair that single injustice we have to-day's legislation. If you read the bill you will find that there are eleven changes made in eleven of the electoral districts of the province of Quebec. Why make eleven changes to undo one injustice?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No one in those counties complains of the changes which are made, and which simply bring parishes back into their proper counties by respecting the principle of county boundaries.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If no one complains, why does the hon. gentleman advance, as a strong argument against the amendment, that question of Berthier and Joliette? Who complained there? The government corrected an error; the member for that county acceded to what was done, nevertheless the hon. gentleman says that we have changed and altered the divisions of the counties.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—My hon. friend applies a principle to a question of fact. I say that we complained of a parish being taken from one county and added to another. I might have added also that a parish was taken from Richelieu and carried into Bagot in order to add fifty of a Conservative majority to the county of Bagot. I mentioned the principal injustice, and with the present bill we are returning the parish to the county of Richelieu, to which it belongs. There are besides a few parishes in Drummond and Arthabaska which are added to the county to which they properly belong; I said that there is no injustice in this case done to one party or the other, no one complaining, but I mentioned the fact of this bill of 1895 as being a very important one, because if the principle laid down in the amendment of the leader of the opposition is true, this is a violation of the constitution, even if no one complained.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will show a violation of the spirit of the constitution in this bill, and an amendment of the principle just advocated. Take this clause:

(i.) The parishes of St. Guillaume d'Upton and St. Bonaventure d'Upton are transferred from the electoral district of Drummond and Arthabaska to the electoral district of Yamaska.

Is that undoing a wrong done by the Conservative party?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No, but I would answer the hon. gentleman that I know this case personally, and it is simply bringing into the county of Bagot parts of two parishes which at present vote nowhere. There is a range in Upton which belongs to Drummond and Arthabaska, for which no electoral lists are made, and which did not vote in June, 1896, nor did they vote in Bagot at the last partial election.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is not answering the question. I am speaking of one parish and he is speaking of another. I am speaking of the Upton parishes. He is answering to clause k and I am speaking of clause i.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I beg the hon. gentlemen's pardon I thought he alluded to that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am speaking of two whole parishes that always vote in Drummond and Arthabaska, and which are detached now by this bill, and put in the county of Yamaska. Since confederation they have always been attached to Drummond and Arthabaska.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—They vote in Yamaska in the provincial election.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no use in trying to dodge the question. I am not speaking of provincial elections. For federal purposes I say these two parishes have always voted in the county of Drummond. Is not that the case since confederation?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I do not believe it. I know that these two parishes belong to the county of Yamaska, belong to its organization and look to Yamaska as their county. But even if the contention of my hon. friend was true, and the principle laid down in this bill was violated, it could be rectified at any time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not see why the hon. gentleman speaks so long to tell us what he does not know. He goes on speaking of things he does not know. I know that these two parishes have always voted in the county of Drummond for federal purposes, and the hon. gentleman cannot deny that, even if he does not know.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The only thing I know is that for municipal purposes it belongs to the county of Yamaska.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I question the fact that the electorate in our provinces, at any rate, have been consulted on this measure introduced by the government. In the province of Quebec we never heard in the different counties, even where my hon. friend went of such a thing a a gerrymander. We never heard anything of the programme of the government on that question. The sole question that was discussed in the province of Quebec was the school question.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And the Franchise Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That is another thing.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Those are the only two questions I heard in all the electoral campaign of 1896, and I think my hon. friend, who at that time probably had not engaged Parent, but was on the eve of engaging Parent, did not discuss any other question than those two.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—And the reduction of the number of ministers.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They were to reduce the expenses and reduce the number of ministers and introduce free trade. There was no reason in our province to discuss that question of gerrymander, and the hon. gentleman himself stated so just now when he said that there was no injustice done, from his point of view, to the province of Quebec, except the only one of placing the parish of St. Pie, in the county of Bagot. So that there was no reason for the speakers of the party to bring that question before the people, and it was not brought. It is evident that the bill brought by the government to-day is not based on that sentiment of justice to which the hon. gentlemen referred. It was not, on the other hand, asked or demanded by the electorate in general. The hon. senior member from Halifax, in his concluding remarks to-day, said that if the measure now before the House had been complete, it would have repealed altogether the enactments of 1882 and 1892, but that the usage in England was not to be logical and not to ask all that they had a right to obtain, but only for a portion of it. If this measure is not complete, I think that it is an additional reason why we should not accept it. If the government cannot come here with a complete measure of justice to all the suffering people of the community, I think it is our duty not to accept their bill. I do not desire to discuss the legal aspect of the question, and I had really no time to look over those sections cited by the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier, but I conclude by the way he answered the hon. leader of the opposition, when the hon. leader asked him in what way he would proportion the representation in the province, taking for granted that he would increase the representation in the province of Quebec to the number of seventy-five, I say the way he answered proved that he could not meet the objection, and that in his mind that clause did not give, as he pretended at first, to this Parliament, the right at any time to enact the bill before us. I think I have shown the futility of the answers given by the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier. I see no other remark that requires a reply. In answering those remarks I think I have placed squarely before the House the true answer that must be given to the objections made by the hon. gentleman from De Lorimier and the hon. Secretary of State, as regards specially chapter 10 of 58 and 59 Victoria.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (161) "An Act respecting the bounties on steel and iron made in Canada."—(Mr. Scott.)

Bill (20) "An Act to incorporate the Zenith Mining and Railway Company."—(Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (145) "An Act to amalgamate the Ottawa, Arnprior and Parry Sound Railway Company and the Canada Atlantic Railway Company under the name of the Canada Atlantic Railway Company."—(Mr. Clemow.)

THE HOUR OF MEETING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have asked Mr. Speaker not to take the chair till 3.15 to-morrow. Council holds session until 3 o'clock, and it is impossible to be present until 3.15. I hope the hon. leader of the opposition will not object.

Hon.Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think, under the circumstances, any one would object to the proposition; we might return to the old practice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. leader of the opposition does not think the government are past praying for, and therefore should be present during prayers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it is absolutely necessary they should be here in order that they should receive the benefit of the prayers. The complaint made by the Minister of Justice to me was that he was unable to be here in time for prayers, and I at once acceded to his request that he should have the fifteen minutes to unable him to get here.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I hope to see the hon. leader of the opposition present during prayers and hope that they may be affectual on his behalf.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—While we are on the question of prayers, I wonder if we could not appoint a committee to consider whether we could not limit our prayers to the same length as the prayers in the House of Commons. I suppose such a change would not affect the constitution of this country?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a religious House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—If I thought the longer prayer would conduce to the welfare of the House, I would not object, but it seems to me the short prayer in the other House has a better effect.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Hon. gentlemen seem to think that this House is composed of people who need as much prayers as we can get.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The remarks on this occasion remind me of a person who, when asked what were the words thought most of in the burial of Sir John Moore, replied, "Few and short were the prayers he said."

The Senate adjourned.

THE REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Mills for the second reading (Bill 126) "An Act respecting Representation in the House of Commons," and on the motion in amendment thereto of the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

Hon. Mr. PROWSE said:—There was an understanding last night that the hon. Minister of Justice would close the debate, and as I wish to make a few observations, I should like to know whether he would desire me to make them now or speak after him.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I also desire to make a few remarks. It is necessary now, in my own defence, and I think it would be better to make them before the hon. gentleman speaks, so that he will have the right to reply.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not know that I understand this question. I want a little light on it. The hon. minister moved the second reading of this bill, and the hon. leader of the opposition moved an amendment. The amendment is before the House now. My hon. friend says the Minister of Justice will close the debate, but I cannot see it that way. I think the hon. leader of the opposition will have the opportunity of closing the debate, according to the practice of this House. The hon. minister shakes his head, but that does not signify very much with me. I want more explanation than that. The Minister of Justice has already spoken, and now he is going to speak to the amendment. If he speaks to the amendment, of course any other hon. gentleman can speak also if he desires, and particularly the hon. leader of the opposition. I understand that the mover of the amendment can close the debate. If I am wrong, I wish some hon. gentleman would put me right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As I understand the parliamentary practice, the member who makes a substantive motion has a right to speak in reply. I have made a substantive motion in moving the second reading of the bill, and my hon. friend opposite moved an amendment, and spoke to the amendment, and he would not have the right to reply unless some other member moved another amendment, and then of course every member would have the right to speak again. That is as I understand the position. I moved the adjournment of the debate simply because I understand there are a number of gentlemen who are going away, and some are not coming back, and I was most anxious myself that we should have a division on the bill before we rose at six o'clock. That was why I moved the adjournment last night. I understand now that there are a good many who desire to speak, but I hope hon. gentlemen will not protract the discussion so as to prevent a division before six o'clock.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I may say to the hon. gentleman that I intended to say a few words, but under the circumstances I will not.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I have no objection to what the hon. Minister of Justice has said.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Under the circumstances, as I moved the adjournment of the debate, I think it better to speak at present. I shall certainly not extend my remarks any further than is really necessary and hon. gentlemen can have an opportunity of speaking after me.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—That is quite satisfactory to me.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—When my hon. friend opposite began his speech he said that he approved of the historical and the theoretical part of the address I gave to the House in moving the second reading of this bill, but he thought I was not much at home in the practical portion of my remarks. I dissent from the hon gentleman in that regard, and although it may be regarded as somewhat egotistical to say so, I think I have studied the measure, I think I understand the subject, and I think the bill which I propose to the House is one which is calculated to attain the object that was had in view on its submission if it should become law. I am sorry to say that I cannot compliment the hon. gentleman opposite, either with regard to the spirit in which he addressed himself to the House upon the subject, or the line of argument which he pursued. The hon. gentleman thought it necessary, in the course of his speech, to say that there were two political heelers who were spoken of in some Conservative journals as being guilty of corrupt practices, who had come here, and he had no doubt they had been consulted in the preparation of this bill. That was an insinuation altogether unworthy of the hon. gentleman. The hon. member has also said that he was justified in moving the amendment to this bill, although it was a measure relating to the constitution of the House of Commons, because my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, had, in 1882, taken that course, having in 1882 proposed an amendment to the Redistribution Bill that was then brought up from the House of Commons. The hon. gentleman lost sight of one very important fact, and that is, that there was a radical departure in the bill of 1882 from the principle which had prevailed previously with respect to the constitution of the electoral districts of the Dominion. There had been a doctrine laid down, which I have quoted here in this discussion, by the Prime Minister of the day in 1872, in favour of the preservation of county boundaries. He had pointed out, in the course of that speech, why he thought that the preservation of county boundaries was a matter of great importance both with reference to the securing of proper representatives, especially young men coming forward for the first time, and the preservation of the organic life of the country. The government, in 1882, the census having been taken in 1881, proposed a bill based upon what may be regarded as revolutionary principles—based upon principles that have been frequently recognized in South American republics, but so far as I know, was never recognized by any British community at any former period. That principle was to so alter and adjust the representation of the country as to pack that representation, no matter what the vote of the electorate might be, in such a way as to secure the return of a majority of the party then in power. There had been an election after 1872. There had been frequent discussions in and out of Parliament by prominent men in the administration, and supporters of the administration, but in no case was there any one who gave the slightest intimation that other principles were to prevail in the readjustment of constituencies under the census of 1881 than those which had prevailed for the readjustment of constituencies in 1872. Hon. gentlemen will remember on that occasion the government had carried through that measure which was condemned, in my opinion, by every unprejudiced political man in the country who was disposed to consider the subject and to decide according to just and fair principles between the two great political parties in the state. That measure, I say, was carried. That change took place. There was no intimation to the electorate of the country, and there was no mandate from the electorate that the views which were embraced in the matter should be crystallized into law. If there ever was a case that would have justified the interference of this body in a measure relating to the constitution of the House of Commons that was one, and so when my hon. friend the Secretary of State then invoked the interposition of this House to preserve the constitution from the violent hands that were being laid upon it, to protect the rights of the people so that the prevailing influence in the country might obtain also a preponderating influence in Parliament, he was not departing from the settled principles of the constitution when a course so revolutionary and inconsistent with the principles of parliamentary government was being adopted by the government of the day. But is there anything under the circumstances of the present bill to warrant the intervention of this House in respect to a measure affecting the constitution of the House of Commons? My hon. friend who represents the opposition in this House said I had referred to cases of Imperial practice and to Imperial precedent, but he reminded me that we were living under a written constitution and that those principles and precedents were not applicable. I deny that. We are living in some measure under a written constitution, but the larger portion of our constitution is not written. It is declared in the British North America Act that we are going to have a government for the Dominion, constituted similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. That is all it says. That is the statement as to the character of the government that is to be created. Where do you look to see whether this Parliament is similar in principle or not? You look to England's precedents, and the practice which governs it, and the lex parliamenti of England is the lex parliamenti of Canada. You look there to see what principles should govern us. There is nothing in the British North America Act telling us what is the relation between the Crown and its advisers, what is the relation between the Crown and Parliament. The constitution is silent with regard to that. It simply tells you that you are to have a constitution similar in principle, and having made that declaration it leaves you free and puts in your possession the whole constitutional principles of England, in order that you may ascertain what are the constitutional rules and principles that are to govern your conduct here. So that, when the hon. gentleman said that because our constitution was an Imperial statute, these principles and precedents had no applicability, he made a statement that is not warranted by our experience, and not supported by what we do, or what we say in these matters. In what sense, then, have we a written constitution? We have a written constitution so far as the British North America Act is concerned, but a large portion of our constitution is only pointed to by that Act. You are told where to seek it, but it is not found within the Act itself. The hon. gentleman said that I had committed a very gross offence in connection with this bill: that I had written to certain parties who were members of the Reform Association in Vancouver. I do not know that the hon. gentleman mentioned Vancouver, but he said I had written a letter—that is the only letter I had written, and from that he inferred that I had written to every association and organization in the country to assist in the preparation of the Representation Bill. Well, I did nothing of the sort. I wrote but one letter, and I wrote it for the purpose of getting information with regard to the boundaries of electorial divisions and with regard to the county divisions in British Columbia upon which I had not sufficient information, and upon which the kind of information I desired, especially with regard to the maps and so on, was not available to me here. The hon. gentleman has also referred to divisions which he said were made in West York and in East York and in the city of London. I wish to say a few words with regard to these matters. I find at the time the distribution took place in 1882 there were 66,600 people in the county of York, and that there was 23,312 in East York and 25,402 in North York and 18,004 in West York. With regard to the divisions that were made in the county of York, at that time those divisions the hon. gentleman said were made for the purpose of readjusting the population, that the principle which governed the bill in 1882 was an equitable redistribution in accordance with population. I say that that is not so. I meet that statement with a decided negative, and I shall be able to show, as I did in part show in the speech which I made upon the introduction of this bill, that there is no foundation whatever for that statement. The county of West York, that had the smallest population, had a population less by 3,000 than the unit of population, if you were to divide the province equally into 92 constituencies and it was allowed to remain so. So that whatever alterations and changes were made in the organization of constituencies, in the county of York, were not made for the purpose of equalizing population, but were made for a different purpose, and I shall show that portions of other counties were brought within the county of York in order that it might be manipulated in accordance with the political complexion desired and not with a view to the equality of the population at all. The hon gentleman referred to London. I will refer to London at a later period. My hon. friend opposite said that representation by population was the sole basis of the former bill, and therefore county boundaries were broken down in order to secure that equality. What was it the government had undertaken on that occasion? They had undertaken to put an end to two constituencies that existed, two little towns upon the frontier, Niagara and Cornwall, and to absorb these in the adjoining constituencies. There was no difficulty in that, nor did they appreciably, so far, affect the population as to necessitate any alteration in the boundaries of the counties into which they were incorporated. Then under the census of 1881, four more members were allocated to the province of Ontario. In order to allocate those four, it was only necessary to make alterations in the boundaries of ridings in four counties. It was possible to take the counties that had the largest population in excess of the representation which they had, or take the city of Toronto and three counties and to absorb those three or four members without any disturbance beyond the readjustment of the electoral ridings within the counties that received those additional members. Was that done? No. Let me say that there were fifty-five constituencies in the province of Ontario that were altered, had their boundaries changed, for the purpose of giving places to those four additional members. Any hon. gentleman who will examine the bill, and who will take the map representing the divisions that have been made under that bill, will see that there was no connection whatever between the duties devolving upon government and Parliament in consequence of the taking of the census, and the readjustment that was made on that occasion. The hon. gentleman said that we in this bill have altered the boundaries of London. What have we done? The city of London has grown; three suburbs that were formerly outside of the city have been absorbed into the city. They are part and parcel of the city. They have become a portion of its municipal organization and life, and they are as much to day a part of the city as are those portions which constituted the city of London in the first instance. But if you look at the bill as it was introduced in 1892, you will find that it proposed, on that occasion, to embrace in the city of London what is called West London, which was not incorporated into the city at all at the time. It was a distinct municipality by itself; but that municipality, in the vote in 1891, gave 231 Conservative votes and 78 Reform votes. Now, the city has grown and that is included. Hon. gentlemen will see that there are a good many more than 100 of a majority in favour of the Conservative party in that addition to the city. Then London South has grown up with a population of about 5,000, and it is also embraced in the city. That has about 100 Reform majority. Any hon. gentleman who will look at the election returns for East London, for West London and for South London will see that South London gives a decided Reform majority, West London gives a decided majority the other way, and East London is pretty nearly equally divided between the two parties. So that the relative strength of the parties in the city of London under the present bill, if it should become law, will be just about what the relative strength of the two parties was before. The population is larger, but there will be no political advantage conferred upon the one party or the other under those conditions. My hon. friend opposite referred to a statement made by Mr. Clancy, a member of the House of Commons, in which he said that he defied any one to show where any man on the Reform side had lost his seat in the gerrymandered districts. If any hon. gentleman so far gives his mind a holiday as to be in the slightest degree influenced I should be very sorry indeed, because it is not possible to give to the subject a moment's serious reflection without seeing how utterly preposterous it is. What was the position? From 1875 to 1878 we had an unprecedented depression of trade over the world. A large number of persons failed in business. When the elections came a great deal of discontent prevailed throughout the country because of the cry that Canada had been made a sacrifice market to the United States. The Liberal party were defeated by a very decided majority in that contest. The hon. gentlemen who were opposed to us came back with a majority of fifty or sixty members in the whole Dominion. That was an extreme condition of things. The Conservative party were represented by a number much larger than the ordinary normal condition of the country would warrant, at that time, and the Reform party, by a proportionately diminished number. That was a condition which could not continue. That was a condition which must change as soon as the state of things which led to it also changed. Hon. gentlemen will remember that at that time there was a good deal of feeling on the subject of increased taxation and protection. The people in the east were opposed to protection at that time, and Sir John Macdonald sent a telegram to Mr. Boyd, at St. John, informing him that it was a calumny to say that the intention was to increase taxation. All they intended to do was to readjust the tariff. That was the statement, yet hon gentlemen know right well that there was a very wide departure from that declaration. I am not saying that the declaration was not honestly intended at the time, but it was not adhered to, and what was done during the next three or four years was altogether at variance with that declaration, and with what was then asserted. The policy of extreme protection was not adopted before the elections. What was done with respect to it was not done in the fulfilment of a pledge that had been made. It was done in opposition to that pledge, in defiance of it, for another and wholly different purpose, and when the hon. gentleman came to redistribute the seats, he found that the state of public opinion was not so strongly with him as it had been in 1878. What was done? Did hon. gentlemen rely upon the conscience of the country and the contentment of the population? Not quite. They relied upon this measure, like the old lady returning from church when her horse ran away. She said she put faith in the Lord until the breeching broke, and then all hope was gone. These hon. gentlemen may have put their faith in protection, but they put also this breeching upon the population in the form of a Gerrymander Bill, and they had a good deal more faith, in my opinion, in that measure, than they had in the other. When the hon. gentleman repeats and adopts the arguments of a member of the House of Commons, that we lost no constituencies, it is no answer to our complaint of the gerrymander. We ought to have gained largely. The state of public opinion warranted that gain. The condition of things that existed in 1878, moreover, continued, and the hon. gentleman who led the Conservative party at that time knew that as well as it was possible for any man to know it, and hence we have the measure. The object of the measure then was not to give to the people representation based upon population, but to give the government a security against the possibility of defeat, no matter what might be the vote given by the population. Let me say further what happend. I shall begin with the county of Bothwell, in which the hon. member from Marshfield has taken the deepest interest and if this measure should carry we would see mourning on his hat for the next twelve months. In Bothwell you have three townships, embracing a population of 10,000 at that time, with a Liberal majority of about 400, the district in which I resided, taken from the county which I represented and put in the county of Elgin. What was that done for? The hon. gentleman claims that it was to secure representation by population, but there was a Reform majority of 400 taken off Bothwell, and other additions were made to it. The townships of Chatham and the town of Wallaceburg were added, and the result of these additions was, according to the vote polled in the previous election, that there was 300 majority against me. Now, if I carried the county, looking at the vote as it stood, in what remained of my own county, and in the additions that were made to it of 300 against me, does it show that the public opinion remained as it did in 1878?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It shows that you were popular there.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It shows more than that. It shows that the government had calculated to secure Bothwell to a supporter of the administration.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—And you are bound they will not return a Conservative now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am bound they shall not by unfair means. Three townships were taken off the county of Bothwell and put on Elgin which was already a Reform county. What was that done for? Elgin did not need them. Elgin had a sufficient population within its own limits for two representatives. It was only necessary that an equal division should be made in order to accomplish that result; but the hon. gentleman went into another county, took people who had no municipal, no judicial, no agricultural connection with the population with whom they were associated, and even now never associate with them except once in four or five years for the purpose of contesting an election.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—How could they divide them in any other way? The population of West Elgin is 14,000, whilst the population of East Elgin, with the city of St. Thomas in it, is 28,000.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—How could you divide that, because St. Thomas is in the east division.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no trouble at all. The hon. gentleman has an idea that he suggests a difficult problem. I am astonished at that proposition. The town of St. Thomas had less than 8,000 at the time the census was taken. Take 8,000 off 28,000, and put it on to 14,000, and what does it make? It makes one riding of 22,000, and another of 20,000. Is that a difficult problem?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—When that division was made, the population of St. Thomas was over 10,000.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman is mistaken, because I have the figures, and I know the constituency as well as I know myself. I mention that as to one division. I have heard of organized hypocrisies.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Disraeli spoke of them when he referred to the Whig party at one time, but this was not only an organized hypocrisy, because it was defended on hypocritical grounds, but an organized conspiracy against a fair opportunity for the people to speak out according to their convictions. Let me take another county—Middlesex. The division of Middlesex was made to give four rural constituencies, by tacking on pieces all about it. Mr. Armstrong, when the bill of 1892 was under consideration, represented South Middlesex. What did he call the attention of the House to on that occasion with regard to the county of Middlesex—that the county of Middlesex gave a Liberal majority within its limits of 1,100, and he was the sole Reformer from that county in the Parliament of Canada. Why were three political opponents returned by the minority and one representative by the majority? Does any hon. gentleman think that he can persuade men out of St. Luke's, or any other lunatic asylum, that that was done merely with a view to the consideration of the principle of representation by population? There is in this city a map that was drafted on that occasion, which shows that every municipality in the province of Ontario had marked upon it the number of Conservative and Liberal votes, and the problem which these gentlemen presented to their minds for solution was, how can we divide that province to secure a majority of seats? That was the problem submitted and worked out, and the Representation Bill brought down to Parliament was for the very purpose of securing that object and end. In the county of Perth, the township of South Easthope was taken from that county and added to the county of Oxford. Why was South Easthope taken out of the county of South Perth and added to the county of Oxford? The township of South Easthope had given a Liberal majority, at the previous election, of 192. That was added to Oxford, which was hopelessly Liberal. The hon.gentleman and his friends knew they could not make Oxford, no matter how they would organize it, anything else than Liberal, so they took out of the county of Perth the township of South Easthope and added that township, with 192 Liberal majority, into Oxford, where it could do no harm; then they took the township of Osborne from the county of South Huron and added it to Perth, which gave an additional Conservative majority of 100. You take out one township from Perth with 192 Liberal majority, and you add in another township from Huron with 100 Conservative majority, and the hon. gentleman will undertake to persuade the Senate—what does he think of their capacity when he undertook such a task?—that that was not done for political reasons at all, that it was not done to hive the Liberals into the county of Oxford, and secure South Perth for the Conservatives. It is true that they did not carry South Perth—that although they increased the Conservatives' strength by 200 odd, they did not carry it. Mr. Trow carried the constituency, but why? Because public opinion was running against the administration, and he carried it in spite of these arrangements which had been made with a view to securing his defeat. Then there was the case of Brant. Mr. Paterson represented Brant in Parliament. He certainly did no discredit to the county which he represented. Mr. Paterson had a constituency of over 20,000. The township of Oakland was taken out of his constituency, three-fourths of whose electors vote on the Reform side, and put into Oxford where it could do no harm. By this it was hoped that Mr. Paterson's defeat would be secured. Take this case: South Oxford to which Oakland was added, had 25,000 people. Brant, from which it was taken had scarcely 20,000, and so these gentlemen, to equalize the representation of the country, and to carry out honestly the sacred principle of representation by population, took the township of Oakland from the 20,000 and added it to South Oxford with its 25,000! That, the hon. gentleman will seriously argue, was for the purpose of securing representation by population. Then the hon. gentleman has referred to Toronto. Now, what do we propose by the bill, so far as the city of Toronto is concerned? Have we undertaken to gerrymander Toronto? We have simply declared that Toronto shall consist of all those portions of Toronto and people that are embraced within the corporation. We have separated it from the county in accordance with the rule and principle which we have laid down. We have given additional representation to the additional population that is embraced in the city. The hon. gentleman says that is done to defeat Mr. McLean in East York, and to defeat Mr. Wallace in West York. I deny that. It is done to pay respect to county boundaries. The division is not made. It is for the judges to make the division, and if they make it honestly, and the hon. gentlemen suffer by it, then it only goes to show in the clearest possible way, the wrong that was done by establishing the condition of things that exist at this moment. The hon. gentleman has referred to double constituencies, and he says that we are responsible for great wrong and injustice and iniquity because we do not put an end to double constituencies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I said nothing of the kind. Not a sentence that I uttered could lead any one to that conclusion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Did not the hon. gentleman complain?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I said you were not consistent in the manner in which you were dealing with double constituencies, having abolished them in one case and created them in others.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman forgets.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is just as truthful in that statement as he is in the case of the Brants, as I will show.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman talks about people being truthful. He should keep those remarks for use at home.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will whenever I have the hon. gentleman opposite me.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman spoke of double constituencies. Hamilton was a double constituency. Who made it such? Who made Hamilton, Halifax and West Toronto, double constituencies? Why was West Toronto made a double constituency? I can understand why the whole of Toronto might be left as a single constituency, and give every man four or five votes according to the number of members to be returned, but why should West Toronto be made a double constituency and East Toronto a single constituency? Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that any honest reason can be given for that? We left Ottawa and Hamilton and we left Halifax, but I very well remember a discussion with Sir John Macdonald on this subject in which he said We have in Halifax and in Ottawa a very large Catholic as well as Protestant population. If you were to separate them you might have an attempt to nominate two Protestants, one in each constituency, to the neglect of the minority, and he thought that the probability was there was less danger of religious friction if Ottawa and Halifax were left single constituencies. So far as we are concerned that is the explanation of why that course is adopted in these two cases. But we were not altering anything that had existed from the period of confederation. For instance, take Pictou: that is a double constituency, and so was every county in Prince Edward Island when it came into the union. The hon. gentleman says it is grossly inconsistent for us to divide some and not divide all. I deny that proposition. Then the hon. gentleman said that we ought not to have referred this question to the judges. To whom should it be referred?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not say so. I said that the hon. gentleman's leader had denounced the system of referring to judges. I did not say you should not do it. You voted for your leader's motion disapproving of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There was no motion disapproving of it. I have the motion and I will read it in a moment. There was a proposition—I made the proposal to Mr. Kirkpatrick myself, at the instance of my then leader, Mr. Blake—that we should have a conference of leaders of both sides of the House with a view to dealing with the question of redistribution and the question of the franchise. Mr. Kirkpatrick saw Sir John Macdonald; he acted as intermediary, and reported that Sir John would not consent to any interference on the part of the opposition. The hon. gentleman said that he would give his consent to a political commission, so I understood him, to be composed of representatives of the two parties.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What I said was this: that I was ready to support any proposition which would remove it from the government of the day, no matter which party was in power, whether it be to the judges, or to a joint commission such as they appointed in England, but I never denounced the reference to judges. I left that to the hon. gentleman's leader.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the hon. gentleman's speech is reported as he delivered it, the hon. gentleman will see that he approved of the appointment of commissioners and not of the appointment of judges.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I accept the hon. gentleman's denial. I accept his approval of the appointment of judges, and so the hon. gentleman is voting against a proposition at the present time, so far as the principle is concerned, that he declares he is in favour of. The hon. gentleman supported a leader in 1872 who had an opportunity, but did not act upon it, of agreeing to a commission. Did the hon. gentleman suggest a commission to him?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Did the hon. gentleman ever say that he favoured a commission when he was at the head of a majority? In 1882 the opportunity came again. The hon. gentleman did not in 1882 propose that there should be a commission or that the opposition should have any voice or say or any opportunity or any interference in the distribution of seats. Then in 1892 the hon. gentleman was a member of the administration that dealt with the subject of redistribution on both these occasions, and on neither occasion did he make such a suggestion as he has made now. The proper time to give assent to a proposition and to approve of a proposition is when you have an opportunity of making it effective.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The same as the hon. gentleman has now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, we are doing so now. The hon. gentleman has referred to Sir Wilfrid Laurier's speech. I care very little for what was said in a speech ten years ago. I will say this, there was nothing in that speech which, in my opinion, was at variance with the present scheme. The members who vote in the House do not vote for a speech, they vote for a motion, and there is nothing in the motion for which I voted, or for which the then leader of the opposition voted, or for which any of his followers voted, inconsistent with the proposition which I find embraced in this bill. What the hon. leader of the opposition on that occasion proposed was that the bill be referred to a conference of both political parties to agree upon the lines on which a Redistribution Bill should be drawn. That is what was proposed, and that is what is practically in this bill. We refer it, not to a commission appointed by both parties, but to judges who are outside of the arena of politics and who have an opportunity of carrying out the redistribution in accordance with the principles laid down in the bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that the only thing proposed? What was the amendment of Mr. Somerville?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—To what time does the hon. gentleman refer?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The session of 1892.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman can refer to Mr. Somerville's proposition. I do not remember it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman should know what he votes for.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I never vote for anything that is wrong.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Mr. Somerville moved an amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman can make his speech by and by.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not want to make a speech; I want an answer to a question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I wish to call attention to another subject that has been referred to frequently in this discussion, with regard to the power to deal with this measure at the present time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That will be interesting.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is pretty clear that the hon. gentleman, while he was ready to make his motion, was not altogether ready to support it by argument, because he concluded his speech by showing hesitation and doubt as to the validity of the constitutional rule which he was undertaking to lay down. The hon. gentleman told us that it was a very proper thing to observe county boundaries in the case of elections to the legislature, but they had no applicability to the electoral divisions of this Parliament. I do not agree with that proposition. It is wholly at variance with the notion that there is a continuous political organization from the very base of the community up to the highest political bodies that are constituted within it. I hold that the Parliament of Canada, and the Dominion of Canada, and the legislative authority which it exercises, are but a continuance of that political unity which exists in a smaller degree within the more limited area that is immediately below it. If the hon. gentleman will refer again to the extract from Gladstone's speech in the redistribution of 1884-85, read by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield yesterday, it is perfectly clear that he held to the view which I maintain. There is an organic life in the state which begins with the family and continues up to the highest organization within it, and you cannot separate the one from the other. You cannot divide the one wholly from the other without doing mischief, and it is because there is such an organization that it is of the highest consequence that the political community known as the town, or city, where the population is sufficient to separate it from the rest, should be known as a riding, or electoral division, and that the county, where its population warrants, should be in the same position. The hon. gentleman says that it is of no consequence that here we deal with large and general questions, and because we deal with large and general questions it is no matter where your constituents may reside, so that you may take a parish in the North-west Territories and unite it to one in New Brunswick without the slightest impropriety. I do not admit such a contention. I maintain that there is something more than mere political union with regard to the questions that are for the time being before us. We must have regard, and it always weighs as well as political influence, to the standing of the man, his intelligence, his weight with the community, and all these are best known by those with whom he resides. It is true you may elect a man outside of his constituency. You may elect a man for a distant portion of the Dominion, but who is chosen under such circumstances? It is the man who has already, by his long public service, earned a Dominion reputation. He has acquired it. He is known, in his political capacity, in every portion of the Dominion, and so people where he does not reside may take him up and elect him. But they do not take a weak man, a man yet untried, a thousand miles away from home, and return him to Parliament. He must begin his political life in a community that knows him, and if you break up his constituency, you deny to him the opportunity which it is to the interest of the state that he should possess. The hon. gentleman has also asked, how have we carried out our pledges? Well, I answer, better than most governments have done, better than our predecessors in office did—a good deal better. We promised the adoption of a provincial franchise. We carried it through the other House. We did so because of a mandate received from the people in the election of 1896. The hon. gentleman kicked a little, but he permitted it to go through this House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As amended.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That pledge has been redeemed. No hon. gentleman will deny that. Then we pledged ourselves to restore county boundaries and to put an end to the gerrymander of 1882 and the gerrymander of 1892, and this measure is before this House, at this moment, in fulfilment of that pledge. We carried that measure through the House of Commons, and we carried it through that House, not only because we were committed to the principle and approved of it, believed it in the interests of the state, and advocated it when in opposition, but because we were returned to Parliament by a majority of the electorate pledged to that, and the Parliament of Canada, not exempting the Senate, have received from the people of this country a mandate to make this bill law, and if the Senate refuses to do that, then the Senate is setting itself up in opposition to the mandate of the people of this country.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What about the rest of the pledges? That is not all.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not all, but my hon. friend said we disregarded them all. I am saying we fulfilled at least two. We have more to keep. There is not the least doubt of that, and I hope we will be loyal to our word and redress the wrongs that we promised the people of this country should be redressed. The hon. gentleman said "You ought never to change a constituency before an election. You ought to appeal to the same constituency that returned you to Parliament." On that theory there never could be a change. That is simply nonsense. There is no such rule or principle recognized anywhere. If you have a grievance it is your business to redress it, and there is undoubtedly a grievance here. Supposing the doctrine were true, as laid down by the hon. gentleman and by the hon. gentleman beside him (Mr. Ferguson), that you can only readjust once in ten years, and if a government came in, backed by a partisan House of Commons, and by an equally partisan Senate, and committed a gross outrage in its legislation, if it gave to a small minority a large majority of the House, the hon. gentleman's contention is, that the Parliament of Canada is absolutely helpless to redress the grievance. I do not admit any such thing. There is no law to warrant such a view. This Parliament is clothed with plenary powers within the limits of the constitution, and being clothed with those powers, it is capable of redressing any grievance falling within its jurisdiction. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield said that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, had a right to move this amendment. That depends on what he means by "a right." If he means that he had the legal power to do it, I am not disputing that at all. The hon. gentleman has the power, but why raise the question? Because the hon. gentleman had in his mind an impression, it may be vague, but nevertheless it was clear from his speech that the impression was there, that he was not doing right in the ethical sense of the expression in proposing defeat to this measure. Let me call attention to another matter. The Crown has the power to pardon every offender who is to-day confined in the British Empire. Does the hon. gentleman suppose for a moment because the Crown has the power, that it is at liberty to exercise it, or that it ought to exercise it? What would be the fate of an administration that would undertake a general jail delivery of all the desperate criminals that are confined in the various prisons of the Dominion? There is the power in the Crown, but that power is a power to be exercised, not under the strict law, but under the conventions of the constitution, and this House, as well as the administration, is bound by certain conventions, and it is beside the question to say that we have the power to reject this bill. What is the practice in England, in the House of Lords? If the House of Lords rejects a measure there may be an appeal to the country upon it, and if the measure is sustained by the country it is no longer necessary to create new peers in order to carry it, because the House of Lords bows to the public opinion of the country. What is the position of the Senate on this question? Is there any hon. gentleman here who will deny that it was made a part of the Liberal platform, that it was proposed in Parliament, that it was discussed in the country, that if we succeeded in obtaining a majority in Parliament we should restore county boundaries, that they should be preserved in the constitution of electoral districts? It is upon that declaration of policy that the government was returned with a majority. It was upon that declaration of policy that the government in the House of Commons proposed this measure. It does not require another election. Public opinion has already been expressed upon it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman will find what public opinion is on this question when he appeals to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has threatened me with public opinion, but the hon. gentleman has had some experience himself in that direction, of which I shall presently speak. The hon. gentleman has quoted the opinion of Lord Rosebery and Lord Kimberley that the House of Lords has the power to reject the bill. Nobody questions that. The question is, under the conventions of our constitution, under the settled usage, whether the House of Lords has the constitutional authority to do so or not, and I say they have not, under circumstances such as exist in this case. Neither has the Senate. The hon. gentleman admits that the present law is an outrage.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—To whom is the hon. gentleman referring.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman from Marshfield,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman is drawing purely on his imagination; I never said any such thing.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the hon. gentleman's speech is published as spoken he will find it there, and let me say, further, that the hon. gentleman said that time would correct these wrongs.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I said if they were wrongs time would correct them. I never used the word outrage. I have the report before me and I have read the portion referring to this, and it is not in. The word "outrage" does not appear.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman spoke of the gerrymander of 1882.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And spoke of the wrongs, and said that time would correct them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I never said that. The hon. gentleman does not want to misrepresent, but he is doing it in the most distinct manner. I said if there were any such wrongs time would correct them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman should be the last to speak of misrepresentation. From the beginning to the end of his speech there was nothing else but misrepresentations. So far as I am concerned, the hon. gentleman's speech, from beginning to end, was misrepresentation, and the only excuse I can make for him is that he undertook to discuss a legal question with which, it was clear, he was not familiar, and he quoted opinions and arguments that had been used by me in defence of one proposition, in order to support another of a totally different kind. The hon. gentleman asked why did I want to obliterate Bothwell? That I was vindictive at Bothwell, that I was wrathful because they had not returned me at the last election. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The hon. gentleman was a member of the party and of the government that disembowelled Bothwell and dismembered it, and put half of it into another constituency and attached to it, as a portion of Bothwell, a territory that was not a portion of Bothwell before, and a territory that had been part of the riding of Kent. In 1882, in discussing this in the House of Commons, I pointed out that Bothwell ought to disappear. Did the hon. gentleman quote those words? Not at all. Then, when we failed to secure the establishment of the county boundaries, and the government pretended to be in favour of representation by population, regardless of county boundaries, I pointed out, and I proposed a resolution, to give to the counties of Lambton and Kent five members, two to each, and one to the portion of the territory along their border, not because I thought it best, but because I thought it a great deal better than what the government were proposing. The hon. gentleman knew that. He had the words before him. He sought to misrepresent me. He suppressed what he knew I had said, and misrepresented the purport of the resolution which I proposed as the lesser of two evils, as though it were the proposition that I specially favoured.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman accuses me of misrepresenting him?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I do.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have to tell the hon. gentleman that I used and quoted the very words of his resolution, and that he proposed in that resolution to so constitute a constituency to be called Bothwell, to be composed of part of Lambton and part of the county of Kent, and that the hon. gentleman proposed to violate the principle of county boundaries for the purpose of creating a constituency for himself, and he submitted that in a resolution in 1882.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman's statement is a misleading statement as to the facts. If he will hand me the volume of Hansard for 1892 I will read precisely what took place.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have the volume here.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Will the hon. gentleman hand me the resolution?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have the resolution here. The hon. gentleman knows what he said as well as I do.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And that was the dishonest portion of the hon. gentleman's conduct.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As an old parliamentarian the hon. gentleman ought to know better than to use such language. If he cannot meet the question with temper and decency, I submit he ought to be compelled to do so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I am meeting it with temper and decency. The hon. gentleman is the last member in this House who should refer to what any one has said in that way.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman should leave other persons to make comparisons.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is what I said before I put the resolution:

> If the hon. gentleman wished to deal fairly, why did he not give two members to Kent and two to Lambton?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What page is that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Page 1208. I said also:

> Why not do away with the county of Bothwell altogether?

That was my proposition.

The east riding of Kent would not have been more populous than the west riding is at this moment, and if he wishes to adopt the principle of representation by population, why not give to the two counties of Kent and Lambton five members in this House?

The hon. gentleman will see that I proposed the adherence to county boundaries. I never proposed anything else. Every hon. gentleman who sat in Parliament with me knows that that was my proposition. But when we were voted down and when the ministry were pressing the measure of 1882 through Parliament, they were asked, if they were going to adopt representation by population, to begin at some point, and when they had gone far enough to embrace 21,000 people, to make that into a constituency, and go on from there, and I pointed out that that could be done. But the hon. gentleman did neither. He neither adopted representation by population, nor did he take county boundaries. What he undertook to do was to alter and arrange the province of Ontario in such a way as to secure, no matter what might be the vote of the people, a majority to sustain those who were in office.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will the hon. gentleman read his own resolution now? It will be found on page 1483.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly. I have not the slightest objection, and if the hon. gentleman is incapable of reconciling that resolution with what I have already read, then I must say he is singularly unfortunate. Hon. gentlemen will remember that this was an attempt, not to substitute our own bill or plan for the government's, but to make the government's plan conform to the rules that they had laid down. The resolution reads:

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be resolved that the municipal counties of Kent and Lambton comprise the electoral districts of Kent, Lambton and Bothwell with a population of 106,344, making for five members an average of 21,268 per member.

That the electoral district of Lambton comprises 42,619 and may be properly divided into two ridings.

That the electoral district of Kent comprises 36,626, and may, by the restoration from Bothwell of some of the municipalities of Kent, be divided into ridings of about 21,000 each, leaving Bothwell with about 21,000.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." Is there anything inconsistent in that?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Bothwell was to be composed of part of the two counties, and in no way else could it be comprised. The hon. gentleman need not attempt to wriggle.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I am not following the example of the hon. gentleman. I say now, and I said before, that I did not propose in this resolution to abolish Bothwell, but I proposed to give to the counties of Kent and Lambton, taken together, five members, and, of course, if you give five instead of four, Bothwell would have in part to be continued. There is no doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—With a county boundary line running right in the middle of it?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the government agreed to my first proposition, this would not have been presented, but it was a last resort. It was a choice of evils, and it was far better than what the government proposed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—You acknowledge it after all.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has complained about my proposal to obliterate Bothwell. So I did then, so I did in the constituency, so the constituency desired, and to-day the constituency desires that the portion of Lambton should be separated from the portion of Kent. It has always been their wish. It has never been their wish that they should continue to constitute one constituency. I know the constituency as well as any hon. gentleman in this House knows the locality in which he lives, and I say I speak the sentiments of the people of Bothwell, not merely the Liberals of Bothwell, but the Conservatives as well, when I say they favoured the dissolution of the union between a portion of Kent and a portion of Lambton, and desired that each should constitute a separate section of another electoral division within the county to which it belonged. But the hon. gentleman seems to judge me by himself. The hon. gentleman was himself, at a certain time, in a small way, a member for a constituency in Prince Edward Island. The island is not large, neither are the views of the hon.

gentleman, and the petty sort of discussion in which the hon. gentleman has indulged in this debate is, I must say, even as to him, a matter of surprise. Let me also observe that the hon. gentleman ran twice, I understand, or perhaps oftener, in the county of Queen's. The hon. gentleman was trusted and returned to the local legislature. The hon. gentleman was distrusted and he was left at home, and the hon. gentleman did not accept the fortunes of war coolly. He was distrusted again, and defeated, as I understand, by over a thousand in a constituency that is not very large.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman is just about as correct as he usually is. When I undertook to discuss Bothwell affairs with him, I posted myself, and I have shown the House that I know just as well what I am talking about as the hon. gentleman. I was not distrusted in the local legislature, nor defeated for that body. I resigned my seat in the local legislature.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am told it was for the Dominion; so much the worse for the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. minister himself was defeated in the Dominion elections.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman made a great uproar and a wail, not heard since the days of Jeremiah the Prophet over the wrongs which have been done to his constituency and his province. The hon. gentleman forgets that the province of Prince Edward Island came into the union with the consent of both parties, and the representation given to Prince Edward Island was the representation to which it was entitled. There were three counties in Prince Edward Island, and the population were entitled to six members at that time. What did they propose? Did they propose that they should have six constituenceis when they came into the union? When they came into confederation did they ask that each county should be divided into electorial ridings, and each riding should return a member to Parliament? No, that was not the case.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—They were economical—did not want to encourage expense.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They may have been economical, but they returned six members for three counties, two for each county. One of those counties is very much less in population than either of the other two, and when the census of 1891 was taken, Prince Edward Island lost a representative, and it was, upon the basis of that census, entitled to only five members instead of six. What was the fair, the natural and common sense course for the government to take under those circumstances? Why, it was to withdraw that representative from the small county, the least populous county, and to allow the other two to remain as they were. But that was not done. The hon. gentleman wanted to gerrymander the province and to secure a better opportunity of returning his friends and excluding his opponents than he would have if he left the electoral divisions as they were formed on the admission of Prince Edward Island into the union. Now, Prince Edward Island came in. What is the present proposition? That King's shall retain its one member, and that each of the other two counties shall return two members. That is strictly in conformity with the rule that has been adopted elsewhere. The county of Pictou has two members. I think there is another county in the province of Nova Scotia that has two members—Cape Breton—and the city and county of Halifax, and they have never been divided. Why this attempt to divide counties that are not large, that are densely populated, with very irregular boundaries? The hon. gentleman knows the reason, and the hon. gentleman is wrathful at any proposition to restore them to the condition in which they were at an earlier period. The hon. gentleman has talked very learnedly about the law in this case, and quoted my view, not expressed upon this question, but expressed upon the question as to the meaning of the words "such authority." I undertook, in the speeches which I made, from which the hon. gentleman quoted, to show that these words in the 51st section of the British North America Act referred to some body that was to be constituted by Parliament for the purpose of making a division, a division which Parliament was expected to ratify and to make law. The words of the statute are "on the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces" then in confederation "shall be readjusted by such authority,"—that is not Parliament—"in such manner and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides." That is a declaration clearly that this division is not to be made by a partisan majority. It was intended to be made by some body or authority called into existence for the purpose, and that Parliament was, for its guidance, to make rules or regulations. It was to be done in such manner and from such time as the Parliament of Canada may determine. The duty to adjust between the provinces once in ten years, is mandatory, to distribute the seats within the province is unrestrained. I have no doubt whatever of the authority of Parliament at any time to readjust the representation within the limits of any province. Parliament cannot increase the number or diminish the number except once in ten years. Parliament, in the increase or diminution of the number, is guided by the provisions of section 51 of the British North America Act, but that does not prevent Parliament readjusting, by virtue of its plenary powers, the representation which may be called for from time to time. Supposing within the next five years after the census is taken, you should have 200,000 or 300,000 people going into the northern part of Ontario, settling it, that towns should be built up there, does any hon. gentleman suppose that Parliament has no power to give them representation until the year 1911 and a readjustment based upon that census is made? I do not admit such a condition of things at all. It is possible for Parliament at any time to meet the requirements of any province. If the province is entitled to twenty representatives and its population doubled before the ten years expired, it may readjust its representation. It cannot increase the number, but it may give to those districts into which large populations flowed representation without waiting until the census is taken. This opinion is very clearly expressed by Sir John Thompson in the discussion which took place in 1882. He called attention on that occasion to the plenary power of Parliament and pointed out that Parliament could at any time deal with the subject. A similar view was expressed by Mr. Dickey when he was Minister of Militia, and further than that Mr. Dickey on that occasion very strongly condemned the Act of 1882. He pointed out that he was never an admirer of it nor did he favour it. The words Sir John Thompson used are these:

> We have a clause in our constitution which gives us the equivalent of the inherit powers possessed by other assemblies. When this Parliament was created, unlike other creations of statutes, it was not given a limited and narrow authority which had to be drawn from the statute itself but in lieu of the inherent power possessed by other Parliaments we have section 91 of the Act which says that this Parliament may make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

If section 51 were not broad enough to confer this power on the Parliament of Canada, unquestionably the beginning of section 91, which authorizes the Parliament te legislate for the "peace, order and good government of Canada," without any limitation except that which the granting of powers to the provinces imposed upon it, would confer upon us that power. Just one word with regard to the case to which the hon. leader of the opposition referred, a case that arose, I think, in Queen's County, in the province of New Brunswick, where Judge Tuck threatened to commit a party for contempt if he undertook to go on with a recount in the case of an election. The hon. gentleman said that no lawyer held a different view from the one which Judge Tuck held. The hon. gentleman must have forgotten the discussion which took place in the House of Commons when it was pointed out that Judge Tuck had undoubtedly exceeded his authority. Judge Tuck did so. The officer with whom Judge Tuck undertook to interfere was not a common law or judicial officer connected with the ordinary administration of public affairs. He was a parliamentary officer appointed by an Act of Parliament to discharge a specific duty for which he was responsible to Parliament alone, and the judge had no right whatever, not the most distant right, to interfere with him in any way whatever. In one of the Wellingtons, if I remember rightly, a similar case came up some years ago, and was dealt with by Chief Justice Haggarty, who held that a judge, in making a recount under the statute was a parliamentary officer over whom he had no jurisdiction as judge. He was responsible alone to Parliament, and in the Ontario elections when an attempt was made to enjoin the county judge from proceeding and Mr. McCarthy insisted upon proceeding in that case and was threatened with imprisonment for contempt, he disregarded the injunction and the case went, if I remember rightly, to the Court of Appeals, and the court unanimously held, as they could not do otherwise, that the judge in the discharge of those duties, imposed by statute, was, in the discharge of his duties as a parliamentary officer, responsible to Parliament alone.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the case of North Ontario you refer to?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. The same doctrine was laid down in England in the case of Ashby against White. It became a noted case in consequence of the fight that arose over it between the House of Lords and the House of Commons. There it was clearly pointed out what officers owed their duty to Parliament, and what were amenable to the courts for the manner in which their duties were discharged. The discussion that took place in the two Houses in that case is one of the most instructive discussions in the history of England, and the law in that case was settled, that a parliamentary officer, in the discharge of parliamentary duties, is responsible to Parliament and not to the courts, but that a returning officer was a common law officer acting under the common law, and so his conduct could be inquired into by the courts; but the return was not under the common law but under the law of Parliament, and that rule was a rule which was applicable in the New Brunswick case, and Judge Tuck had no right whatever to interfere in that case as he did with the county judge in the discharge of his duties. I am not going to further trespass on the attention of the House, except to call attention to the fact, that the motion is anything but a courageous one. The hon. gentleman professes to condemn the bill and at the same time to base his action upon the want of authority. I tell the hon. gentleman that if he thinks this House is not competent to pass this measure, why not allow it to go through and let the question as to the validity of the act be decided by the courts? It will not take long to settle that question. It is quite certain that the hon. gentleman distrusts his law and distrusts the doctrine that he has laid down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman propose, if the bill is allowed to go through, to send it to the courts to test its validity?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no doubt of it, but it is open to any one to do it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You will not grant a fiat to do it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We do not deny a fiat to any one who is entitled to it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We would not have the right to refer it to the courts. An individual would have no right. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would prefer a more courageous motion, the six months' hoist?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman, if he wished to oppose the bill, should have moved the six months' hoist.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman knows the House of Commons is committed to the question, that the public have pronounced on the question, and he thinks he can protect himself, and protect this House from the consequence of the fact, by declaring, "Well, your bill is ultra vires, and although you may have wanted it you have not the power to pass it." I deny that. We have the power to pass the bill. Should it become law it will be undoubtedly as valid as any law on the statute-book. The hon. gentleman has undertaken to evade the question instead of meeting it by a proper amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the hon. gentleman completes his speech, I should like to ask if I understood him to say that North Brant, represented by Mr. Paterson, the present Minister of Customs, had a population of some 16,000 or 17,000.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said that in 1882 the population of South Brant—I have taken it from the Hansard report—was 20,000, and that you took Oakland from that 20,000 and added it to Oxford with 25,000. That was my statement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The population of North Brant was increased by the addition of adjacent townships, the only way by which it could be given anything like a correct population. North Brant had a population of 11,894, we increased it to 17,705.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said nothing about North Brant.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will come to South Brant in a moment. North Brant had a population of 11,894. We increased it to 17,705, and if there had been a possibility of giving it more without cutting the municipality in two, as the Ontario Government did, we would have equalized it a little better. South Brant, which had 21,975 has now 19,281, so that the Brants, instead of being 11,000 and 21,000, are now 17,000 and 19,000. These are the exact positions numerically, of these two ridings before and after the redistribution, and not as stated by the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said nothing about North Brant. It is just as I stated. The hon. gentleman will see that my point was this: you take from a county that had about 20,000 a whole township and add it to a county with 25,000, in order to make it a Tory county.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Your point was that what we had done was not based on representation by population.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So I do say.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it were not a waste of time, I could give the hon. gentleman the figures of every single constituency that was interfered with, and the reasons why it was done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know the reasons.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It is not my intention to reply to or criticise the speech of the Minister of Justice, but I make one or two observations in regard to what he said before proceeding with the other remarks which I propose to make. The hon. gentleman referred to the pledges which his party had given to the country. I presume he refers to the convention which was held in Ottawa in 1893. He refers to some pledges which he claims the government have fulfilled, and one of these is the Franchise Act of last session. It appears to me that that pledge would have been better not to have been kept, because the position of the Franchise Act to-day is ten times worse than it ever was before. He refers to the pledge in reference to the question that is now before the House, but the pledge was of itself so vague in its nature and its wording, that I look upon it as no pledge whatever, and if it was a pledge, certainly they have not half carried it out, and it is attempted to be carried out very partially just previous to the time when the census must be taken. He has very conveniently passed over the pledge of prohibition, which cost the people of this country over a quarter of a million dollars, if you take into consideration the loss of time of the electors on that screaming farce. It was for no other purpose than to deceive and humbug the people of this country, and to give a little money to the political heelers of the party. It accomplished that. I wish to know whether any attempt whatever has been made to reduce the debt of this country. Was not that one of the great pledges given in 1893? How has that pledge been carried out? The debt of the country has been run up by millions, and you have to "wait until you see us next year" to see what it will be. The promised reduction of the taxation of the country, has that pledge been carried out. I do not think it has. The hon. gentleman might have saved himself a sneer about the province from which I come. We have good reason to be proud of some men who come from Prince Edward Island, as has been exhibited in this House within the last twenty-four hours. It is true the province is a very small one, but it appears there are smaller men in other places. It is no fault of the members from the island that the province is small, and it is no guarantee of the genius of a man's mind because he lives in a large house. In Prince Edward Island at confederation, as we have been already told, the island for 100 years had been divided into three counties. As has been already stated, at confederation, these three counties were left as three ridings. I think it was a great mistake. Unfortunately, confederation was brought about by the coalition of parties which generally is an unfortunate circumstance. It would have been much better if matters had been completed by one political party rather than by a combination, but it could not at that time have been effected without a combination of both political parties in the island. The consequence was, in my opinion, there was too much regard for selfish and family interests rather than for the interests of the island, and instead of our retaining six representatives in Parliament we were cut down after the last census. On the same principle that British Columbia retains their representation, we were cut down because we did not increase in population at the same rate that Quebec had increased. It would have been safer, and I think much better, for Prince Edward Island at confederation if the island had been divided into six ridings; but the old association of county lines did not appear to be effectual at that time, and the counties were left as they were, and each county was given two representatives. But when we lost a representative in the House of Commons, an opportunity offered by which the redistribution of seats became necessary, and I am satisfied that the best course was taken to arrange the seats for Prince Edward Island that could possibly be taken. The island was divided into five constituencies—divided in such a way as to give each constituency as nearly as possible an equal population, keeping in view the boundaries of townships. We had to break over county lines, which is not a material matter at all, so far as the island is concerned, and we made five constituencies, giving to each riding one member. In a small island like that, it is much better than to have only three ridings, because it has happened in Prince Edward Island before now that every man coming from that province was on one side of politics when they came up here, which is not a desirable thing. If you have your party in power, it is all very well, but if you happen to have all the representatives of the province in opposition to the government, it will be cold justice we will get and nothing more. The division made of Prince Edward Island at that time was a fair and honest one, and one that gives universal satisfaction to the people of that province. But to go back now and establish electoral districts on county lines, and to deprive King's County, from which I come, of a member and make it suit that one member, while Queen's County has two members under this present bill and Prince County two members, is a very unfair division of the province. Queen's County has a population something like 45,000; Prince, 36,000, and King's County, some 26,000. Now, the voting power of King's County approaches near to that of Prince, but King's County, under this bill, is to be satisfied with one representative, while Prince County retains the two. Why is this done for Prince Edward Island? In my opinion it is very plain to be seen. For some years past King's County has returned two Conservatives to Parliament, and Queen's County has returned two Liberals and Prince County generally two Liberals. Going back to County lines simply leaves Prince and Queen's with four Liberal representatives, and King's County has to be deprived of one Conservative member. I live in King's County, and in a portion of King's County, which has been lately attached to a portion of Queen's County, making the east riding of Queen's, and I am perfectly satisfied the people there feel their interests are ten times more identified with that portion of Queen's than with the other portions of King's County. When we have the railway, which is partially promised, to be extended to Murray Harbour, our interests will be still more identified with Queen's County than they are now. The hon. gentleman made another statement to this effect. It has been laid down that Parliament is perfectly justified in readjusting the constituencies where the population has increased to a very great extent between the last and the next decennial census. That may be all very true, but the circumstances would be exceptional in Canada. Such an increase is not admitted under the present bill, and why? There is one locality which is an exception at the present time, that is the great Yukon district, which has increased in population very many thousands. Why have not the present government in this bill given that new country a representative in Parliament? Is it because they are afraid of the results of opening a constituency there? Has the management of this government been such as to commend it to he people of the Yukon district? Can we come to any other conclusion than that is the real reason why they have not given Yukon a representative? We are told to-day the circumstances are such as would justify them in giving that district a representative. The object of the bill, we are told, is to restore the county lines. One great want is that it is not a general bill. They only restore the county lines in certain places, and they leave other sections of the country as they are at present. Where the government are going to disturb the representation of the country, they should make a general law applicable, not only for the present, but for the future. Certain principles ought to be laid down, to be strictly adhered to in the future, and in that regard the bill is a great failure. County lines is not a fundamental principle which should govern in a case of this kind. The fundamental principle of responsible government is representation by population, and that fundamental principle was strictly adhered to when confederation took place, so much so that a certain number of representatives was settled and fixed for Quebec, and just in proportion to the representation for Quebec must the representation for the other provinces be. I take it that that was the fundamental principle laid down at confederation. If it is not so, we do not know where we are. I do not say it is right for Parliament to adhere strictly to population in every instance, but I say it takes precedence of county lines or any other consideration, and where you can keep closely to representation by population it is the safest and best course to adopt. A great deal of stress has been laid on the 51st clause of the British North America Act which has been interpreted to mean that although the principle of representation by population must apply as between the provinces, it does not apply as between counties, cities, towns, villages and electoral districts and individuals in any province. If it is a principle that we should have representation by population as between the provinces, it cannot be wrong to have representation by population within the province. If it is right in the one instance, it must be right in the other. What right have ten men in one locality to have as much voice in the government of the country as twenty men in another electoral district? It is not a sound policy, and it cannot be justified except where it is inconvenient and impossible to adjust the population exactly according to the requirements of the locality. So far as making comparison between county lines in the Dominion and county lines in Great Britain there is no just reason for making such a comparison. The counties of Great Britain, from time immemorial, have been separate institutions, and were separate nations in ancient days. They have been established for a thousand years, but in Canada, and I speak particularly for Prince Edward Island, the county lines have no more to do with the associations of the past than township lines, and any adjustments which have been made of electoral districts in Prince Edward Island have been kept within township lines. We have heard a great deal about judges. They are to be brought in here to give this bill the appearance of justice and fair play. If there was any place where the government were not satisfied with the present redistribution of seats in a province, and where they would be justified in allowing the judges to redistribute the seats, it is Prince Edward Island, but no; there they confine the island to three electoral districts, giving two representatives to two of them and one to the other, and the judges are not asked to make the division, but they are to run in pairs. Why is this? One reason is because the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is a prominent member of the government and controls, to some extent, the treasury and he expects to run in one of these counties and drag another member in with him, whoever he may be. A good deal has been said in reference to the Redistribution Bill which passed in 1892. It has been characterized as a Gerrymander Bill. I do not like that word "gerrymander," I do not want to apply it to this bill, and I do not think it has been applicable to any bill we have passed. We must look at the results. Let us see what the effect has been. Has it been an injury to the present government? This government went to the country in the last election with everything against them. They were returned to power by the electorate under the present adjustment. They have been some years in power and have had an opportunity of fulfilling their pledges. They have had a majority in Parliament and in the provincial legislatures at their disposal and they are making full use of it. They have had at their beck and nod all the officials they appointed and many of those who were appointed before they came into power. Everything is in their favour for the next general election. If they go to the country with the electorate, as at present established, they ought, if they have done right while in power, to come back with a very much larger majority than they had at the last general election. At the last election, although the Redistribution Bill of 1892 is complained of as being a Gerrymander Bill, 191,052 Conservative votes returned forty-three members to the House of Commons, while 166,335 Liberal votes returned forty-four members in the province of Ontario. That is 24,717 fewer Liberals returned one more member than the Conservates.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman's figures are entirely wrong.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I have them from very good authority, and I think they are perfectly right. With such a record as that, I do not think the hon. gentlemen are justified in calling the Act of 1892 a gerrymander. If it is a gerrymander, it is a gerrymander against the Conservative party. In the same proportion the 166,335 voters ought to have only 37 members in place of 44, or if 166,335 Liberal voters returned 44 members, then 191,052 Conservative voters ought to have returned 50 members in place of 43. Not only does the same principle hold good in reference to Ontario, but all over the Dominion there was the same result. Through out the Dominion 413,000 Conservative votes were polled and 397,194 Liberal votes, and although the Liberals had a pretty large majority in the House yet they came in with nearly 16,000 of a minority of the total votes cast. That disposes pretty well of the charge of gerrymandering. That charge has been made through the country during the last ten years and has been made to do duty up to the present time. I do not take any stock in it myself, I do not desire to say more on this question further than this: I think it is a great mistake on the part of the government to introduce this measure at the present time. Ere long, whether this bill is passed or not, we shall have the census, which will be in 1901 and then the readjustment of the constituencies must take place in accordance with that census, and if the government of the day, before they go to the next election and before the census is taken would come to an understanding with their political opponents, or appoint a commission of some kind whereby reasonable and fair principles shall be laid down to redistribute the differents seats in the Dominion, and not allow it to be left open to gerrymander by one party or the other, it would be a fairer way in my opinion, and if an arrangement of that kind could be arrived at between the leaders of both political parties, such as would commend itself to the electors on both sides of politics, I think it would be found for the benefit of Canada, and it would remove the obnoxious question out of the arena of politics for many years to come.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—I hope I shall not be accused of undue temerity if I venture to turn from the living—and I may add the persuasive—voice of the representative of the law in this House to what is written and which cannot and should not be be changed. Perhaps it may not be law, and I have not the boldness to touch on that, but rather a matter of constitutional understanding. Constitutional understandings are admittedly not laws; they are not rules which a court of justice can enforce, or a violation of which a court of justice may forbid, but according to constitutional writers these constitutional understandings are as binding and as little to be tampered with, less so, even, than law itself. It is therefore somewhat relieving for one who is, happily, for his own peace of mind, not a lawyer, to be able to turn from the brain-splitting sophistries of the law, where men "confute, change hands and still confute" to a usage, a custom—a constitutional understanding which even the non-legal mind may grasp. We have had evidence of its many sided legal aspects in the discussion of this question, where men have had to change the views they expressed some years ago. Two or three years hence they will be obliged to change them again. Before going further, I would wish to say that this House should not stand in the way of the other House, wherever it is possible, by any stretch of good will, or without any violation of principle to accommodate itself, as much as possible, to the views of the lower House, and especially should that be the case when the question concerns the composition of that House. But not where principle is to be sacrificed. It is only when there is a violation of principle that this House should step in and endeavour to stop legislation. For serious as that may be, it is more serious to enact measures which, in the very near future, perhaps before and certainly very soon after the next election, may afford an awkward precedent. Our national existence is a matter of a third of a century, but a third of a century in this Dominion is equivalent, I think, to a full century in the old land, where things change but slowly.

A friend has kindly furnished me with a list of the governments we have had during the last thirty years. There have been eight, but five of them have been within the past nine years. Now it has been contended even in this House that it would be competent for any one of those governments, at any time during those nine years, to have brought in a Redistribution Bill. I contend that it is unfair to the country to subject it to that disturbance periodically. If it is competent for the government to do it to-day, the government may do it again next session, and we may have in the life of one government, especially a strong government, a Redistribution Bill every session. I think we should be guarded against anything of that kind. Not being a lawyer, yet anxious to do my duty fairly and honestly, I consulted the Act itself, and I found clause 51 which says :

> On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted, &c.

I am not entirely ignorant of legislation in this country. I have heard a great deal of the bill of 1882, and the bill of 1892 and of their gerrymandering tendencies. I turn to them and what do I find ? I do not require to go any further than the preamble. I do not go into the details of those bills, because it would be a mistake to do so. The preamble of the Act of 1882 reads : " Whereas, by the census of the year 1881," &c. I then go to the Act of 1892, and what do I find ? " Whereas, by the census of the year 1891," &c., both in harmony with clause 51 of the British North America Act. Now, what preamble can be put to this bill ? Where is the census since 1891 ? There was a reason for the preamble in the bill of 1882 and for that of 1892, and there was reason to legislate ; indeed to legislate in 1882, and again in 1892 was an obligation ; but we are asked to legislate here without a reason and if it is competent for one government to do so it is competent for another, and there will be no end to the doing and the undoing of what should be stable. Imagine, five governments, from 1891 to 1896—for Sir John Macdonald was alive in 1891—and since then there have been five leaders, and any one of those leaders might have taken it into his head to introduce a Redistribution Bill. I know nothing, and wish to know nothing, of what is styled the Gerrymander Acts of 1882 and 1892. I am not prepared to go into the details, nor shall I. But it occurs to me that they were in accordance with the spirit of the Confederation Act, an Act which has conferred such incalculable blessings on this country. It was in the spirit of that Act and in its text that there should be a distribution every ten years, but not oftener. The ground which I take is that if this bill is not a violation of the spirit of the constitution it is at any rate a violation of a constitutional understanding which is as binding as any law that any lawyer could make. Even laws are not always binding. O'Connell once said that there was no law passed by the House of Commons in England that he could not drive a coach and four through, and I think it is the same with us. I shall not ask myself if there was anything like party feeling in the preparation of the Acts of 1882 and of 1892. With party lines so clearly defined as they are here, and party exigencies such as they are, and party acerbities being such as they are, I regret to say it is not impossible, looking at the constitution of men, and it is not at all unlikely that the laws of 1882 and of 1892 were not precisely what they might have been or what they should have been, but in the ordinary course of things that evil will be remedied in the near future, and it will be remedied, I hope, within our constitutional requirements and without subjecting the country every few years to a state of unrest, uncertainty and disturbance something like the periodical elections in the United States, which thoughtful and serious men look upon as an unmitigated evil in that country. We want nothing of that kind. We want something more stable. Therefore, I decline going into the details of the bill, as I hold that this is not the time to do it.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Before the vote is taken I would like to say a few words in explanation of the stand which I shall take. The objection to this bill has been raised that it is unconstitutional. I must confess that I am doubtful as to the correctness of that view, if the constitution is to be construed in a literal sense. The clauses regarding this matter are incomplete, it seems to me. But, leaving that aside, to my mind it is highly desirable that such redistribution should not take place except upon precise and recognized principles, and not on the mere arbitrary wishes of any government.

An arbitrary act should always be a matter of disregard; it cannot be made the basis of a rule, and out of it may grow any amount of injury. This may be said of parliamentary enactments as much as of any other matter; perhaps more. Because in political matters passion is liable to interfere in a larger degree than is proper for the good government of the country. We cannot deny that partisanship is ruling to an alarming extent in Canada. In saying so I do not intend to impugn the motives of anybody, nor to cast any reflection upon party government. Under our parliamentary institutions, the existence of parties, and the government of the country by parties, is almost an essential feature, if confined within proper lines. But the danger of going beyond those lines is always there, and the general interest of the country seems to suggest that we should guard ourselves, not only against the actual but also against the possible evils of partisanship. Legislation for party advantages is most objectionable. The general welfare of the country must be the only legitimate object of any legislation. It may be that sometimes the interest of the party is identical with the interests of the country. But even then the party must not force itself upon the people by measures of a doubtful character or of such a character as to afford good grounds for believing that the primary object of that legislation is the mere advantages that may result for the party in power. In the present instance, it has been said that this redistribution scheme was for the purpose of ensuring almost a perpetual lease of power to the Liberal party and of wiping out the Conservative party, or something to that effect. The least that can be said, under the circumstances, is that such utterances have cast a cloud upon the measure itself, which should have induced the government not to try their hands at it at present. They are in power and they are sustained by a large and influential majority. That majority has sprung up from the constituencies as at present constituted. If the intention is to dissolve Parliament, they should not be afraid to go back to that electorate, which has given them such a majority. Moreover, it is within the spirit of our parliamentary institutions that they should be judged by the same electorate which has sent them to power. We are on the eve of a census. A new redistribution will then be imperative. Again the country will be subject to a new rearrangement. It is not wisdom to submit the county to what might be termed perpetual disturbance with regard to such matters. I leave aside the details of this measure. I look only at the principle involved in its introduction. That principle is that a redistribution may be effected at any time, when a party is returned to power. This is wrong in itself. That principle carries with itself the perpetual temptation to abuse the power which it is claimed exists in the constitution. Each successive government could undertake every four or five years to redistribute the electoral seats all through the Dominion without any regard for justice towards their opponents, for vested interests, or for the general welfare of the country. If once Parliament opens the door to such an evil, it will become a chronic disease, from which the best interests of the Dominion at large will suffer, merely for the sake of fostering the interests of partyism. Up to the present such a policy has not been acted upon. The instances of some rearrangements which have taken place in the past, and upon which arguments have been based, were of a local nature and rather clerical than substantial in their character. They did not involve the principle which is now propounded, namely: the power to make and the usefulness of a general redistribution at any time. The opposite policy has been the rule and has been propounded by an authority whom noboby can question in such matters. Sir John A. Macdonald, in 1887, laid down the doctrine that no general redistribution should take place outside the time following the decennial census. He said:

> I think the principle was set early in our legislation that there should be no readjustment of the constituencies, either in regard to boundaries or otherwise except every ten years after the taking of the census, and I think it would really be well that we should adhere to that rule.

Later on he says:

> The boundary of a constituency should not be altered except once in ten years.
>
> Mr. MILLS—We had no such rule as that.
>
> Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—I think we have never deviated from that principle.

We should hold to that rule. You may be able perhaps, to contend that there is nothing in the constitution to prevent the carrying out of such a measure as this, and at any time that you may choose. The constitution may be said to be silent on this subject. But I venture to say that if there is doubt it would be a wise policy to construe the constitution so as to prevent such legislation at such a time. And even if there is no doubt, Parliament should take the matter in their own hands and, by a determined stand, establish the policy that, although the constitution may allow a redistribution at other times than the session following the census, no such redistribution shall take place. The rule laid down by Sir John A. Macdonald, and then adopted by Parliament, would finally prevail, and as a matter of fact become a part of our constitution. The British constitution has become what it is by the traditions of parliamentary life and action. So our constitution might develop itself wisely by the same process, and alongside with the written part of it, we could rely upon and be guided in the future by such parliamentary traditions of our own, which would be the unwritten part of our political institutions. Holding these views, I regard the introduction of this measure as unwise and as propounding a principle which has not yet been applied since confederation, and which I consider will not secure any good results nor lead to the sound working of our political institutions. I say then that if the constitution, properly construed, admits of that principle, there is nothing to prevent us adopting a parliamentary practice and doctrine which would, as a matter of fact, become the law of the land, a law to which all governments and all parties would submit and abide by. It would become a parliamentary jurisprudence. It would fix that recognized principle to which I referred in my opening remarks and upon which redistribution would in the future be effected, thereby taking away from the mind of the people the suspicion that such redistribution is made only for the purpose of securing party advantages, removing from the political parties, from any government, from leaders and followers alike, the temptation of forcing an alteration of the boundaries of constituencies at improper times and, apparently, at least, for improper motives. In the present instance, I venture to say that it is the function and the duty of the Senate to take action, to nail down the principle involved in the measure which is before us, and to hoist at the top of our political institutions the flag of the opposite policy, namely, that, except as to clerical errors and urgent local necessities, the electoral map of the Dominion should not be touched except after each decennial census. That policy would be quite consistent with the constitution, with the intentions of the fathers of confederation, and with fairness to public men and to our political institutions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The amendment, if carried, only negatives the motion for this sitting of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, nonsense!

THIRD READING.

Bill (162) "An to incorporate the Belleville Prince Edward Bridge Company."—(Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)

A CORRECTION.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Before proceeding with the order paper, I should like to call attention to a personal affair. I observe in the report of the proceedings of yesterday that in the vote on the amendment my name appears as one of the non-contents, which was quite right. But the minutes read "The question of concurrence being put on the main motion, it was, on the same division, reversed, resolved in the negative." The main motion, I understand, was the motion to pass the bill?

The SPEAKER—It was the motion for the second reading.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Then, according to this, I would seem to have voted against the second reading.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, for it.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I do not understand what "resolved in the negative" means.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The hon. gentleman was in favour of the bill.

The SPEAKER—I would understand that your vote would be in favour of the second reading.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—No. I voted for the amendment because I thought the motion for the second reading was not unconstitutional. But I was not in favour of the bill; I was against the bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I remember very distinctly when the Speaker made the announcement that I turned round—although my hon. friend did not hear me—and said "that makes the hon. gentleman vote for the second reading, because the vote is reversed without any change." I knew the hon. gentleman was not in favour of the bill, although he was opposed to my motion. Therefore, the hon. gentleman's name should be on the list of non-contents on the motion for the second reading.

The SPEAKER—With the consent of the House the correction can be made.

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS.

INQUIRY.

Mr. FERGUSON rose to:

Call the attention of the government to the necessity for the annual compilation and distribution of agricultural statistics, and will inquire if the government propose doing anything in the matter?

He said:—In proposing to call the attention of the government and the House for a very short time to the subject of which I gave notice some time ago, I would just say that I was a little surprised in looking over the statistical year book not long ago to find on page 80 the following statement:

The Dominion Government has no agricultural statistics beyond those procured in connection with the decennial census.

It occurred to me, as I think it will to hon. gentlemen, that this is an important branch of work, in connection with the government of the Dominion and the Department of Agriculture, that should receive immediate attention. The importance of agriculture, as compared with the other employments of our people, may be gathered from this fact, that for the last year for which we have figures, the exports from Canada of farm products, agricultural and animal products, reached the wonderful figures of $76,364.755, while the total exports of products of the forests, mines, fisheries and manufactures, taken together, only amount to $62,094,872. We find that we export from Canada, of the products of the farm, a great deal more than we do of all the other main industries of our people put together. If we pursue this inquiry a little further, and refer to our census, it will be found that the products of the farm, including those consumed in our own country, transcend in an immense degree in importance all the other productions of the people, and that agriculture furnishes employment for not less than fifty per cent, probably more, of the entire population of our country. That being so, I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that it is very important there should be more attention given to agricultural work, in connection with the Dominion Government than is being given, although there is more done now than in former years, and that this particular branch of work in connection with the interests of agriculture should receive immediate attention. In going over the reports of the Department of Agriculture for years back, I find that this subject from time to time presented itself to the minds of different ministers. The first Minister of Agriculture that Canada had under the Dominion was the late Thomas D'Arcy McGee. I am not sure whether he was the first after confederation or the last under the old province of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He was not Minister of Agriculture after confederation.
