THE DEBATES

OF THE

SENATE OF CANADA

N THE

FOURTH SESSION OF THE EIGHTH PARLIAMENT OF CANADA, APPOINTED TO MEET FOR DESPATCH OF BUSINESS ON THURSDAY, THE SIXTEENTH DAY OF MARCH, IN THE SIXTY-SECOND YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, 16th March, 1899.

The Senate met at 2.30 p.m.

PRAYERS.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir Gilbert John Elliot Murray-Kynnynmond, Earl of Minto and Viscount Melgund of Melgund, County of Forfar, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, Baron Minto of Minto, County of Roxburgh, in the Peerage of Great Britain, Baronet of Nova Scotia, Knight Grand Cross of Our Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, etc., etc., Governor General of Canada, being seated on the Throne,

The Honourable the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House,—"It is His Excellency's pleasure they attend him immediately in this House."

Who being come with their Speaker,

His Excellency the Governor General was then pleased to open the Session by a gracious Speech to both Houses:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In meeting you for the first time since entering upon my duties, as the representative of Her Majesty in this Dominion, it affords me great pleasure to be able to congratulate you on the large degree of prosperity which the people of Canada at present enjoy, as evidenced by the expansion of trade and commerce, the flourishing condition of the public revenues and the increased number of immigrants who have become permanent settlers amongst us. To these evidences may be added another which is even more gratifying, —the almost total cessation of the considerable exodus of our population which at one time was a regrettable feature of our affairs.

The negotiations which were set on foot during the recess between Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States in reference to the settlement of certain questions in dispute between Canada and the latter country were, I grieve to say, greatly delayed by the illness and subsequent death of two of the most eminent members of the Commission appointed for that purpose. Considerable progress had been made on several of the subjects submitted, but a serious disagreement arose between Her Majesty's Commissioners and the Commissioners of the United States on the question of the delimitation of the Boundary between Canada and Alaska; the question was referred by the Commissioners to their respective Governments, the Commission being adjourned to the second day of August next, in the hope that, in the meantime, the difficulty might be overcome.

In compliance with the Act passed last session a Plebiscite was held on the question of prohibition; the official figures of the vote will be placed before you.

I observe with pleasure that the Mother Country, Canada and other British possessions have recently adopted a Penny Postage letter rate. The satisfaction with which this action has been received by the Canadian people is a further proof of the general desire existing amongst our people for closer relations with the Mother Country and the rest of the Empire.

I am also glad to be able to state that the satisfactory condition of the finances of the country permitted a reduction, on the first of January last, of the Canadian domestic letter rate, from three to two cents and although such reduction involves a temporary loss of revenue, it is nevertheless confidently expected that the cheapened rate will prove of such service in the promotion of trade and in the general interchange of correspondence that, within a reasonable time, the revenue of the Post Office Department will be restored to its former figure.

Much information has been obtained since you last met relative to the extent and value of the deposits of gold and valuable minerals in the Yukon and other parts of Canada. The returns from the Yukon have so far proved sufficient to meet the heavy expenditure it was found necessary to incur for the purpose of preserving law and order, and it has been thought expedient in the public interest to authorize the construction of a line of telegraph for the purpose of maintaining speedy communication with the people of those distant territories.

A measure will be submitted to you for the better arrangement of the electoral districts throughout the Dominion, as also several enactments of less importance.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The public accounts will be laid before you, and also the estimates for the coming year. They have been prepared with a due regard to efficiency and economy, and the responsibilities arising from the rapid progress of the country.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:
Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I am confident that the important subjects I have mentioned to you will receive your serious consideration, and that it will be your earnest endeavour to promote the public interests and prosperity of Canada.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

NEW SENATORS.

Hon. JAMES W. CARMICHAEL, of New Glasgow, N.S., and

Hon. JOHN YEO, of Prince Edward Island, were introduced and took their seats.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATORS.

Hon. William Kerr, of the town of Cobourg, Ontario, and Hon. Joseph Arthur Paquet, of the city of Quebec, were introduced and took their seats.

THE ADDRESS.

The Order of the Day being called,

Consideration of the speech of His Excellency the Governor General on the opening of Parliament,

Hon. Mr. KERR said: Gentlemen of the Senate, encouraged and inspired by those immortal words, spoken long ago, that "England expects every man this day to do his duty", encouraged also by what I know, that I will receive the sympathy and consideration which this honourable body always gives to the youngest born of the family, further sustained by the pleasing thought that I, in a sense, speak not only for my honoured leader in this House, but for the government, acknowledged, I suppose, pretty generally, to be one of the best governments that this Dominion has ever had. With these sustaining thoughts, perhaps this House would permit me to tender thus publicly to the government my profound appreciation of the great honour which they have conferred upon me by calling me to this honourable Senate. Whether my days in this House shall be many or few, I hope, at least, they will be sufficiently long, and that my deportment and my attention and devotion to duty will be such as to afford some testimony—I would hope ample testimony—not only to the government, but, what is even more important, to my fellow Canadians, that in thus honouring me the government have made no mistake. Before asking this honourable body to assent to a motion that an Address from this House be presented to His Excellency in reply to the gracious speech with which His Excellency was pleased to open the fourth session of the eighth Parliament of the Dominion I hope and know I need but make a respectful request that this House will gladly unite with me in the expression of the great pleasure it gives hon. members of this Senate to know and to welcome His Excellency to this country in the capacity of Governor General of this great Dominion. His Excellency has the advantage of some of his predecessors, an advantage that I am sure will stand in good stead and an advantage of which we shall, in a measure, reap the benefit, because of His Excellency previous acquaintance with this Dominion, and I am sure it is the earnest wish and prayer of this hon. House that a kind Providence may watch over and protect His Excellency and Lady Minto and that their lives may be spared, and that, under Providence, their sojourn in this country in the high position to which they are called will prove a great blessing to the people of Canada, a blessing in which we trust they will also have a part. I cannot omit in this connection, and I know hon. senators will not consider that I am travelling beyond the record, if I take the opportunity of asking the members of this House to remember His Excellency's predecessor Lord Aberdeen and his accomplished wife. Perhaps no higher encomium can be pronounced upon any person than to say that he went about doing good. I think that is eminently applicable to His Excellency's predecessor and Lady Aberdeen. I rejoice in the fact that Great Britain not only sends these eminent men to preside over our destiny for a limited number of years, but in the further and important consideration that after they have left our shores they continue to exercise their beneficial influence on behalf of this Dominion, and I have no doubt that what has been characteristic of His Excellency's predecessors—will also be characteristic too of His Excellency Lord Minto.

Taking up for a short time the consideration of His Excellency's speech from the Throne, His Excellency has been graciously pleased to refer to the prosperity of Canada. It is a cause of gratification, which I am sure all hon. senators will share, that Canada to-day is enjoying a very large measure of prosperity. Perhaps it has not yet reached, in every department, to the high water mark to which it has, in some times past, attained, but I hope that by the time this session is over—that by the time certainly this parliament is over, we shall give it such an impetus that we shall bring that prosperity fully up to the high water mark. In commerce, in banking, in manufacturing and in all departments of industry there seems to be fresh life, fresh vigour giving and inspiring the people of this Dominion with fresh hope and fresh courage. I trust that that feeling will continue to grow more and more. I would not be understood as expressing the view that a government can create good times. I have never taken that view, I believe, however that a government can do a great deal towards assisting to bring about good times by lightening the burdens of the people here and there, and watching in every way, if it may be, in anticipating certain events, so to speak, on tip toe to discover what is necessary to apply the remedy. There seems to be just now, rising from the broad bosom of this vast continent, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, a pæan of joy and hope, and the music of every industry seems to fill the people with the feeling that our prosperity is of a permanent character. I am glad to know, and you will be glad to know, notwithstanding some misgiving on the point expressed some years ago, that our manufacturing industries were in great jeopardy if the administration of the affairs of this country should pass into the hands of the present government: nevertheless we are glad to find that those forebodings have not proved to be a reality; and although not a manufacturer, not a commercial man, not a banker, still, as one who has always tried to take an intelligent interest in public affairs, and from inquiry of those competent to judge, I think it is safe to assert that our manufacturing industries, notwithstanding the prophecy that was made, are in a most flourishing and satisfactory condition. My only hope is that they may so contiue. There is an element in this prosperity and the cause of it to which you will allow me to refer, and that is to the agricultural aspect of the question. Providence has sent this Dominion two magnificent harvests, and it is to these harvests we are largely indebted, under wise administration, for our present prosperity. Allusion is also made in the speech to the fact that immigration is encouraged. There is increased immigration. That is a natural sequence or consequence of prosperity. Make any country prosperous and there will be no trouble about immigration. Immigration will set in. Immigration will pour into any prosperous country as inevitably, as naturally as water seeks the centre of gravity, and one encouraging feature of this prosperity and one evidence of it is that the exodus from this country, which had grown to alarming proportions, has largely ceased, and that many of the best of the people of Canada, who left us, are now returning. Not only that, but we have in the latest arrival of immigrants from that far-off land, a cheering evidence of the prosperity of Canada. Not only that, but a cheering evidence of the appreciation of the institutions of Canada that is entertained in foreign lands, we have these Doukhobors from Russia seeking an asylum in Canada, fleeing from civil and religious tyranny to this land wherein they can work out, under the most favourable circumstances, their social regeneration and peace, and in that thought we naturally feel a great pride in the people in this country. We feel like exclaiming in the language of another "God bless our noble Canada, our broad and free Dominion, where law and liberty have sway; not one of all her sons to-day is tyrant's serf or minion."

Then another paragraph in His Excellency's speech to which I invite the attention of this hon. body will be the question of the negotiations recently going on at Washington. I am a Canadian through and through, born a Canadian, a British subject—I would say if I were in the other chamber—perhaps the phrase would not be appropriate here—a British subject to the back bone. I have always taken this view that it would be to the interests of this country to have freer trade relations with our great neighbours to the south. Hon. gentlemen may differ from me in that view, but I think they will not differ from me in this view, that not only for the sake of ourselves but for the sake of the mother country of which we form a glorious part, that it is desirable at least that all questions of irritation between the two nations of Great Britain and the United States should be settled, and that right speedily. I have never felt, perhaps, as some have felt, that what is called reciprocal trade with the people to the south of us was indispensable to our existence, nay, not even to our prosperity; and I am not prepared to take one step forward unless I am met by another step from the people to the south.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—A quid pro quo.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I know that it is said Canada for the Canadians. I subscribe to that doctrine to the fullest extent, but I subscribe with more heartiness, with more veneration, with more profound feeling when I say Great Britain and the rest of the British Empire for Canadians. But my doctrine is this: not only Canada for Canadians, not only Great Britain and her other colonies for Canadians, but I say that if, on fair and honourable terms, we can get access to the markets of 70 or 75 millions of people we ought to use all fair means and make an effort to secure that. Not only do I say Canada for Canadians, the British Empire for Canadians, the United States for Canadians: my doctrine is the civilized world for Canadians, to show their enterprise and their push. We have a vista of that kind before us, and in regard to these negotiations there have been evil prophecies. I had no sympathy with them. I never thought, knowing the commissioners, and their character and loyalty as Canadians and as British subjects, I never had any fears that the interests of Canada would be sacrificed, and I for one rejoice, as you rejoice, that when it came to that point they said "Not one step further in our negotiations without the interposition of the two governments," and I am sure that the Canadian people will endorse and approve of the action taken by the commissioners who represented Great Britain and Canada on that occasion. I will not indulge in any tirade against our neighbours across the line. Why, they are the oldest daughter, so to speak, of Great Britain. It may be a somewhat wayward and unfriendly daughter, but I hope to live to see the day when every vestige of unfriendliness between Great Britain and the United States, and especially between the United States and Canada, shall have ceased for ever. In connection with the negotiations it is difficult to fail to recognize the fact that two of the most distinguished of these commissioners have, for some inscrutable reason, been taken away by the hand of death and for the time further negotiations suspended. I am sure there is not a senator within the sound of my voice who does not feel deeply and sympathize strongly with Great Britain and the United States in the loss of those two distinguished men, who, I doubt not, fell in discharge of their duty to their respective countries, each according to his own view of the questions that came up. I do not know, hon. senators do not know, but I would hope that one effect of this sad feature of it might be that this lamentable part of the question would be to soften and make both Great Britain and the United States more tender towards each other, and it may be that Providence is working in that mysterious way; but what we have to do is this, to go right along developing our resources, depending upon our own right arm, and if we follow that line, if we can get these questions settled and these trade relations, all the better, but they are not indispensable to our national welfare, our national growth, or our national existence.

Another important paragraph referred to in His Excellency's speech to which I would invite for a moment the attention of this honourable Senate, is the vote on the prohibition question. I am glad to know that the government have redeemed their pledge and have complied with the Act of Parliament providing for the holding of a plebiscite upon that important question. I may be speaking within the sound of some here who may think that that is not sufficient information to be given. I think the friends of prohibition have every reason to feel glad that that vote was taken and that the result was at least as satisfactory as it was. The lesson that I draw from it perhaps is a lesson which hon. gentlemen have drawn from it—that pretty generally, speaking for the province of Ontario especially and for some of the other provinces, the rural sections of the country appear to be ripe for the question of prohibition, but the opposition to that measure will be very strong in, and is confined chiefly to the larger towns and cities of the Dominion. My own view is this, and I hope I am not singular in that view, that having taken the vote, let it rest where it is for the present and go on educating the people. I believe hon. gentlemen will correct me if I am in error—that as we are to-day, we occupy the proud position of being the most temperate people on the face of the globe, with a well regulated and well enforced license system. Surely our friends, who are very anxious for prohibition, should take great courage by the result of the vote and bide their time and go on educating the people to their views. If they succeed, well and good according to their view; if they do not, they have at least attained so much. I think we have every reason to feel very proud of this Dominion for the enviable position it has taken upon that question.

The speech has also referred to the indications that we are to have a redistribution bill. I am told that it a misnomer to call it a redistribution bill; that lurking under that phrase the real meaning of it is a gerrymander bill.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Hon. gentlemen have very kindly anticipated the word I intended to use. On that subject I feel very strongly. I do not anticipate anything of the kind. I should expect from the present government that has attained such a high standing in the country, that we have no more gerrymander bills from either party in this Dominion. We cannot afford to have them. I wish that that word was abolished from our vocabulary. I do not think it would be a calamity if it were. It is an exotic. It has no place in British institutions so-called. What I want is this, and what I expect the government will do, is to introduce a measure that will equalize the constituencies so far as practicable and restore county boundaries. My idea is this, that a political party had better remain in opposition for ever than to pass a gerrymander bill. As I said before, we cannot afford it. Therefore I would ask the House not to prejudge the character of that measure, but in a sense of British fair play to wait until the measure is introduced and judge of it upon its merits; and I do not feel that I am assuming responsibility in saying that it will not deserve the character which hon. gentlemen have ascribed to it. For my part, I am content to wait and deal with it, but, as one having been hitherto a warm supporter and admirer of the present administration, I hope we will never see a gerrymander bill brought into this chamber. I would not like to support one. I would not support it. I trust I have sufficient independence not to take a course of that kind. I have only to refer to two or three paragraphs of His Excellency's speech and then I shall conclude. It would be expected that that part of His Excellency's speech at the opening of this session relating to the penny postage letter rate between this country and Great Britain and the other parts of the empire should receive some consideration. I need not ask the hon. gentlemen, for I am satisfied they are prepared to admit, that that is a step in the right direction, and to give credit to the government, such a measure of credit as they are entitled to for that bold—for it was a bold step, but a step in the right direction, and a step the fruit of which will be salutary, the fruit of which already appears, and that followed by the domestic penny postage rate seems to have rounded out the step. I need hardly say that, I think the people of this country, however some hon. gentleman may differ from me, will give the government a fair measure of credit for adopting the penny postage letter rate. And now I hope hon. gentlemen will allow me to say that I think that the Postmaster General has administered his department not only with boldness, but with satisfaction to the people of this country as well as to the satisfaction of Great Britain and that in taking that course, he has entitled himself to have placed to the credit side of his public career, a very large item of credit for his conduct in that matter. If I could have imagined such a thing and accomplished so much, I would have felt that I was acting for an ungrateful people if they did not give me full credit for a step of that kind. One consideration more on this point. It is our wish, it is our desire, it is to our interest to draw Canada as closely as possible to the mother country, and I do not know of anything that has occurred in my lifetime—which has not been very short so far—that has done more to bring the Dominion of Canada immediately to the presence of Great Britain than has the giving of preferential trade to Great Britain, followed by the effect of the Premier's visit to Great Britain during the Jubilee, a visit which I never can refer to without speaking of it as the Premier's conquest of Europe, because of what followed. That, taken together with preferential trade, the visit of the Premier to Great Britain during the Jubilee year, and the commanding position that was assigned him and accorded him there, and this penny postage rate—these three circumstances have done more in my opinion—and I ask hon. senators to give my poor words a little consideration before pronouncing judgment, and if they will do so, as I know they will not be premature in any judgments they pronounce—they will consider that my view of the matter is substantially correct. I have detained the House longer than I intended to do. I have felt a great deal more at home in this House than I thought I would, because when I look across at the hon. leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition in this Senate I find a very warm personal friend whom I knew and who knew me long before, I fancy, he or I knew any one in this chamber, and from the first hour of our acquaintance I have received from him, what I am sure and shall hope and expect to receive in the future, nothing but kindness; and I am only glad to find that I am called upon to speak in the presence of one so sympathetic and so fair, always fair, and loving British fair-play. Now, I think you see my view with regard to the position of Canada. Her prosperity in every way, as evidenced by our immigration and her desire to trade not only with Great Britain and the islands of the sea and our neighbours to the south, but wherever trade is to be had. And I cannot better express the view that is in my mind than by a quotation, which you will pardon me for making, from a speech of our former Governor General, Lord Dufferin. In describing the position of Canada with regard to the Empire his language runs substantially in this way: "In a world apart, secluded from all extraneous influences, resting at the foot of her majestic mother, Canada dreams her dream and forebodes her destiny—a dream of ever-expanding harvests, of multiplying towns and villages, of expanding pastures, of constitutional self-government and a confederated empire; of page after page of honourable history, added as her contribution to the annals of the mother country and to the glories of the British race; of that temperate and well-balanced system of government, which combines in one mighty whole as the eternal possession of all Englishmen, the brilliant history and tradition of the past together with the freest and most untrammelled liberty of action in the future. That is the position which that brilliant Irishman considered that Canada occupied at that time. Now, shall we, hon. gentlemen, prove worthy of that heritage? If we do, we must not rest and be thankful; we must not be satisfied, as I take it, with present achievements. Our watchword must be "forward." We may well take up the sentiment that "new occasions create new duties."

"Time renders ancient good uncouth;
They must upward still and onward
Who would keep abreast of truth.

Lo, before us gleam the camp fires.
We ourselves must pilgrims be,
Launch our Mayflower and steer boldly.
Through the desperate winter's sea.
Nor attempt the future's portal.
With the past blood-rusted key."

Now, hon. gentlemen, I have only to invite your attention to the concluding paragraph of His Excellency's speech to this House, and it is this: with confidence he relies upon our doing all we can to promote the prosperity and the happiness of the Canadian people. I am sure that the legislation and the deliberations of this Hs., whatever it presents, will show that so far as this House is concerned, we appreciate our great heritage and we appreciate our solemn duties and so far as in us lies we are bound to perform them. I therefore have great pleasure in moving the address, in reply to His Excellency's gracious speech, as follows:—

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to offer the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious Speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament, namely:—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir Gilbert John Elliot Murray-Kynnynmond, Earl of Minto and Viscount Melgund of Melgund, County of Forfar, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, Baron Minto of Minto, County of Roxburgh, in the Peerage of Great Britain, Baronet of Nova Scotia, Knight Grand Cross of The Most Distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George, etc., etc., Governor General of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:—

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious Speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU—The leader of the Senate being disappointed in respect to the seconder of the address, I have this afternoon, at his solicitation, as I felt it my duty to do, consented to perform that duty, and so hon. gentlemen will not expect from me anything more than a very brief speech.

I am pleased that Her Majesty has sent as Governor General to this country a nobleman with whom the country had previously a favourable acquaintance, and I have no doubt whatever that he will follow the settled practice of our constitutional system in the discharge of the duties of the very high office which Her Majesty has confided to him.

I may, with the mover of this address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, express my pleasure at the great prosperity which has marked the progress of the country since the accession of the present government to power. The trade of the country has enormously increased, every branch of industry has been stimulated, a strong feeling of self-reliance has grown up amongst the people of Canada of every creed and of every nationality, and I have little doubt that the country has entered upon a career of prosperity hitherto unknown in the Dominion.

We have a large accession to the immigration to Canada. Our immense territories are being rapidly occupied by industrious and peaceful settlers. Many have come from the centre of Europe, and from the confines of Asia, who are a vigorous and hearty people who have been devoted to agriculture in their own country, and who are exactly the kind of settlers that the Dominion requires. We are pleased to see that many who had left Canada for the neighbouring republic, are again returning, and will largely contribute to convert our foreign population, amongst whom they mingle, into real Canadians.

The discovery of rich deposits of gold in British Columbia, and in the Yukon country, has stimulated the immigration of a mining population, who will, by their industry and by the investment of capital, greatly add to the wealth and prosperity of the country. The discovery of gold in the Yukon country—a country most difficult of access—has necessitated a new charge upon the public revenue. It was necessary to establish government institutions there, to provide for the protection of life and property, and to furnish, as far as possible, the means of ingress and egress to the country. This, of course, will necessitate a very considerable additional charge on the revenues of Canada. But it will also add, in even a larger degree, to the resources of the country, out of which the additional expenditure will be met.

The government have found it necessary, in accordance with the long-settled policy of the Liberal party, and with the sanction of the country at the last election, to alter the law in relation to the distribution of seats in the House of Commons, in conformity with the principles laid down by the late Sir John Macdonald in 1872, and then accepted by both parties—that in the establishment of electoral divisions for the return of members to the House of Commons, the county boundaries should be preserved intact. I understand a measure is about to be submitted to give effect to that principle, and to restore the policy which prevailed before 1882. Although this is a measure which concerns the House of Commons, it is nevertheless most desirable that a principle long ago accepted as the basis of representation in the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and agreed to here prior to 1882, shall be recognized, in order that a permanent basis for representation may be had.

There will no doubt be many other measures of practical importance submitted for the consideration of the Parliament during the present session, and may I not say in advance that this House, in the consideration of these questions, will be content to exercise that authority which constitutional usage has marked out as the legitimate sphere of its operation, and within which, it alone can exercise a legitimate and beneficial influence upon public affairs. I have now the honour to second the motion for the adoption of the address.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Fortunately the speech is not of a character which requires much deliberation or a lengthened debate. Before entering on any of the subjects which are presented for our consideration, I may be permitted to congratulate my hon. friend (Mr. Kerr) whom I have known for a great many years, on the temperate manner in which he has moved the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is what I would have expected from him; and in addition to that, it has been done in language with which no possible fault can be found. That it has been tinged by, shall I say political prejudice—perhaps I had better say political opinions, which I know he has held so many years—is beyond a doubt. I was forcibly reminded, in listening to his remarks upon some of the topics which he discussed, of that sentence uttered by Tallyrand, that language was given to men to conceal their thoughts. This was more particularly impressed upon my mind when I heard his remarks in reference to the vote upon the Plebiscite; knowing, as I do, that he has been not only a strong advocate of temperance, but what some people would call a fanatical prohibitionist. He has been a prohibitionist and temperance man all his life. However, considering the peculiar position in which he is placed, the difficulty that he had in sustaining the action of the government after the vote which had been taken, I think I may say candidly, that he performed his duty admirably, that is, by complimenting the people upon an opportunity having been presented to them to consider the question and vote upon it; but he took very good care not to express any opinion upon the action which the government has indicated, both by letter and in the interviews which have taken place for their future course. However, I shall, when I reach that point, refer to it at some greater length. I must, with my hon. friends who moved and seconded the address, congratulate the country on the selection which has been made of a Governor General. Lord Melgund, as we knew him when in Canada, took a very deep interest in the prosperity of the country. He showed his devotion to Queen and country by offering his services at a time when his life was placed in jeopardy, and I have no doubt that as Governor General he will perform his duties to his country in the same way as he performed his duties as a private citizen and soldier, and I hope with my hon. friend that he may long live to enjoy, not only the position which he holds now, but to enjoy life and prosperity for many years to come. That the country is at present prosperous is beyond a doubt. No one denies it, and no one feels more gratified at that fact than Her Majesty's loyal opposition. I may with propriety add that if the forebodings which my hon. friend indicated existed in the minds of the people prior to the accession to power of the present government, have not been fulfilled, it is because from the Premier down to the humblest member of his cabinet, they have not fulfilled a single promise that they made the people during the election and for years previous to it. Had the promises which had been made, had the pledges which had been given to the people that they were going to rout out every vestige of that, to them, hated policy of protection, then that prosperity to which my hon. friend has drawn attention and the manufacturing industries, which are now in a flourishing condition, would not be in existence to-day. There were one or two industries which were struck violently in the tariff by placing them on the free list, and those industries have gone out of existence. They have not only gone out of existence, but the prices which were paid for the articles which were formerly manufactured by them in Canada and which went into consumption, more particularly by the rural or farming population, have increased, I will not say in value, but they have increased in price to those who have to purchase them, and for the very reason that was predicted by every man who holds opinions similar to mine, that protection does not ultimately increase the price of an article. To the extent that Canada is placed in the same position in relation to the United States as one of the States of the Union, just so in proportion will the combinations which exist in the States control and rule the markets in Canada. It has been so in by-gone days, and it is now being experienced in the article of coal oil. The stronger hold the Standard Oil Company gets of the trade of this country, the more will they increase, as time rolls round, the price of coal oil to the consumer. This is a position which I know will be combated by some hon. gentlemen opposite, but experience has taught us this fact in the past and experience will prove it to be true in the future. I am glad, with my hon. friend, to know that immigration is increasing, and I hope that ere long the whole of our vacant lands will be settled, and that this country will present to our neighbours across the line a power numerically that we do not possess to-day. But we have something to say, and the country will have something to say, as to the character of our immigrants. I believe some of them are very good. There are others who are not. Some of them are like the man who is going to be hanged: he has not been in the country long, and the probability is that three more of those assisted immigrants will follow him to the gallows. That is not the kind of immigrants we want in this country. Some of the immigrants will make good settlers, from what I can learn, and have read of them. Some of them are peaceable, industrious and frugal people. I was a little amazed, but I could not help thinking with what joy the present Minister of Commerce must have suggested this sentence in the leaders to His Excellency:

Every one knows that for years the constant theme of the hon. gentleman was, that this country was becoming depopulated. We all know that the Anglo-Saxon race is of a roaming character, and that they will move from place to place. I am glad to see, in looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns, that a large proportion of those who left Canada, more particularly Lower Canada, are returning to their former home. I find, if I am to judge from the Trade and Navigation Returns, or the entries of the settlers' effects, that in British Columbia and in Quebec the largest portion of the immigrants have settled; but there is something that strikes me as very peculiar, and I could not help asking myself this question: Is it possible that for one whole year not a family has left this country? Now, we know, most of us, personally, that such is not the fact, and yet, if you look at the Trade and Navigation Returns for last year, you will not find an entry of a single dollar's worth of a settler's effects entered in the export list. When you examine the Trade and Navigation Returns of former years you will find among the exports that there are settlers' effects as exports from the country, and the effects of the immigrants who come into the country are entered as imports.

In the latest returns to which I have had access, which are for the year ending 30th June last, there is not a single dollar's worth of settlers' effects entered as going out of the country. If that is true it must be a source of gratification and joy to the people of Canada, but I must be permitted, with all due deference to the statistician who prepared those reports, to doubt their accuracy so far as they effect that particular item. I doubt it for the reason that I know to the contrary and that those around me know to the contrary, that there have been families leave the country, whether in great or small numbers I do not know, but I call attention to the fact that not a single entry appears under that head of exportation of settlers' effects. It may be an unintentional omission, or the entry may be made under another heading. I would be sorry to say that it was intentional, but there is the fact. In referring to the negotiations which have taken place in Washington it might be egotism if I were to say that I am not at all disappointed at the result so far as it has gone. I must express my very deep regret at the death of the two gentlemen to whom my hon. friend has referred. No one could ever have met Lord Herschell, the English representative, without being impressed, after a few minutes conversation, with the brightness of his intellect, and no one could have had half an hour's conversation with him without being impressed with the idea that there were few men in the Empire better fitted for the position for which he had been selected.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Lord Herschell was a strong Liberal, a man who has taken a very prominent part politically as a Gladstonian, who was in Gladstone's government, a Home Ruler, and had the most advanced ideas in English politics, yet a strong Conservative Premier like Lord Salisbury disregarded the opinions which he held upon English politics, and appointed him to a position which he knew, from personal intercourse and association with him as a public man, he would fill not only with dignity to himself but with benefit to his country. I do not know of anything that has occurred for a long time which could affect those who knew the gentleman so much as to read of his sudden death. I was deeply impressed when I read a short paragraph from what is said to be the last speech he made, or one of the last remarks he made, which was that it was too bad, that he should have "spent six months in negotiation and to have it result in nothing more than a broken leg." Afterwards, of course, his life was sacrificed in the interests of his country.

The next paragraph refers to the plebiscite. If hon. gentlemen will look back at the debates in this House, as well as the debates in the House of Commons, they will see that it was predicted that the result would be nothing more than the expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars, and such has been the result. Whether those who are termed temperance people, or the prohibitionists whom my hon. friend I know to a certain extent represents, are as pleased as he says they are at the result, remains to be seen—no, it does not remain to be seen in the future; all you have to do is to listen to the utterances of these gentlemen and read the letters which they write to the press, to be convinced of this fact, that my hon. friend has misjudged them, that in his desire to defend the "best government," as he terms it, that ever existed in this country, he has forgotten the utterances of the secretary of the Alliance, and the letters which have been written from different parts of the country. I would commend, not only for his perusal, but for his serious attention a letter which has just been printed, a manifesto which was printed and circulated in the province of Quebec by Major Bond, the son of Bishop Bond, in which he points out the cruelty of attributing to the Premier of this country, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, of whom he has been a very great admirer and is yet, as far as I know to-day, unless he has changed his opinion on the subject of prohibition, as evidently my hon. friend opposite has, in which he says it was a cruelty to attribute to him the position of having attempted to humbug the people by submitting the question of prohibition to them, without the slightest intention of ever putting the will of the people, as expressed through the ballot box, upon the statute-book. His language is very strong, and he quotes from the speeches delivered by the Premier on this question to show that he could not, in honesty or in fairness to the people, do other than carry out the will of the majority of the people. The secretary of the Alliance in Toronto has expressed a similar opinion on this question, and he combats the position taken by the Premier in this way: he says if a certain percentage of the votes is to control your action in a question of this kind, why do you not apply the same principle to yourselves, who represent but a minority and a small minority of the whole electorate of the Dominion? I observe the Minister of Justice smiles. He thinks it absurd to ask him to give up his position, I know, because he represents a majority of those elected; but if the non-voters upon the prohibition question are to be considered as opposed to the principle, then logically the non-voters and those who voted against the late government, being in the large majority, would place them in a minority, and under our system of government the majority is supposed to rule. It is the essence of responsible government that we should be governed by the majority. It might not be uninteresting, if it were not so long, to read a letter which has just appeared in the public press—perhaps my hon. friend has not read it.

Hon Mr. MILLS—Perhaps my hon. friend would not object to my asking whether he concurs in that line of argument?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When I am placed in the position of my hon. friend and, assume the responsibility of legislating upon the question of prohibition, I will give a frank and fair answer. I am not in that position just now, and consequently I am not called upon to do it. I told my hon. friend last session, when this question of plebiscite was before this chamber, that it was a fraud ; that it would result in a fraud, that it was the most cunningly devised scheme that was ever concocted by public men to get rid of a difficulty and cheat the people of the country. That is what I said then and that is what I repeat now, that when I am asked to legislate upon this question, if my hon. friend will introduce a bill to prohibit the importation and manufacture of spirituous liquors, then I will tell him what I think about it. In the meantime I propose to deal exclusively with the position of the government upon the question. Even at the risk of being tedious, I will read to the House this letter ; because it is admirably written, forcible in style, and will be interesting to my hon. friend who moved the answer to the Address. I know it will if he has not read it. This is written by a Queen's Counsel, Mr. J. G. Bulmer. I have no doubt the hon. senior member from Halifax knows him. I believe he is a prominent man there, and for the edification of those who have not read it I will take the liberty of reading it. I do so to show my hon. friend that he is mistaken when he says the temperance people are delighted and pleased with the manner in which the government fulfilled their promise to the people when they submitted this question to them. Perhaps he has forgotten that the Dominion Alliance people, nor the prohibitionists, ever asked for this plebiscite. On the contrary, Mr. Spence, at the convention held in this city, told them that while they would accept it and vote for prohibition, it was not asked for by them, and consequently they would not consider themselves responsible for any vote which might take place upon it. But upon the assurance by the Premier and of others that the will of the people would be carried out, they went to work in order my to secure a majority. We all know that hon. friend opposite (Mr. Mills) is opposed to prohibition. I have in my desk an extract from a speech in which he said he was totally opposed to prohibition, believing it to be impracticable in this country or in any other country ; and, entertaining those views, I hold him responsible, as one of the government, for submitting a question to the people that he believes, if attempted to be carried out, would be impracticable. In doing that he was not acting honestly and in accordance with his own conscience. Why did he not do as my late chief, Sir John Thompson, did in an interview with a temperance delegation in one of the committee rooms? When they waited on him he pointed at once, like an honest man, to the difficulties that presented themselves, and the utter impossibility of successfully adopting a principle of that kind.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—He made no promises.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, on the contrary, he intimated that he would not do it, knowing that it could not be enforced. However, I am getting away from Mr. Bulmer's letter. It is very well written and highly interesting. He commenced it with a quotation which reads this way :

"Ah ! May God grant me life, and may Jesus pardon me, I will raise a gibbet a hundred yards high, I will take hammer and nails, and I will crucify this Beauharnais called Buonaparte, between this Leroy called Saint-Arnaud and this Fialin called Persigny."

Editor Citizen.—The above was used by Victor Hugo in exile as a shout of defiance at the third Napoleon after the infamous December days of 1851, in which he had broken all pledges and by the coup d'etat assassinated the French republic. It is not only a description by a master of the man of the hour, but it is a description of one Frenchman by another, exactly applicable at this moment to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and probably represents the feelings of a hundred thousand voters in Canada. In his letter Sir Wilfrid Laurier has tested his party as an engineer tests a bridge ; he has loaded it with infamies ; will the party stand it? Even party honesty recoils with a sort of dread anxiety before the outrage on which they are entering, and a leading man of their party in the local legislature said to me yesterday. "This is too bad." Yes, it is too bad, and any one raising the cover a hundred years hence for the purposes of history will smell the stench. It is the most terrible attempt at a thrust backward which Canada has ever received, and the moral obliquity of the act surpasses a hundredfold all the questionable acts committed in the name of politics by both political parties since 1867. That letter leaves everything in ruins, as complete as though the thunderbolt which rent had been answered by the earthquake which scattered. A party platform, the solemn promise of the leaders, the encouragement and support of the party press, the debates in Parliament, the pledges of hundreds of representatives elected since the adoption of the platform at Ottawa in 1893, all are now repudiated. We are told by the leader of the Liberal party, to-day in power and governing Canada, himself, by twenty-nine per cent of the whole vote of the Dominion, in effect, that before we can have a solemn pledge carried out we must have above fifty per cent of the whole vote of the Dominion, in other words, a liquor vote of fifteen per cent shall govern Canada. Surely the impudence of this argument following the repudiation of the platform is only surpassed by the hypocrisy of the party pledge preceding it. The truth is, the party have been playing the game of government as a species of state swindling—a conjuring feat on a large scale, and the Conservative party can say to men like myself, who worked for the Liberal party at the last election, and went up and down the province for months assailing the Conservative party because of the royal commission, "What a joke they have played on those idiots." Yes, they have; but I have to remind the men composing the rank and file of the Liberal party in Canada, that there is a scene in Homer where Nemesis appears behind Thersites national politics with such violations of principle as this is not politics at all—not even the depraved politics of the violent partisan, but a herd of provinces, through their representatives, hunting together for their food.

IN A POLITICAL CUL DE SAC.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier has led his party into a place of annihilation, and made that terrible choice a political battlefield without an outlet. To-day 2,000 pulpits, 5,000 societies, 100,000 voters are busy denouncing the government and the supporters for this base betrayal, while the religious and independent press are sounding the tocsin of a free democracy from one end of Canada to another. Who is to stem this tide; whose voice will the people hear? Can any one say anything for them, that the death roll will not appear through the whitewash? Never was Sedan more certainly a mortar into which the German army went pounding, than will be the ballot-box a retort for the destruction of the Liberal party. If I knew the day in June, 1893, that the plebiscite was adopted into their platform, and the day that the Dominion elections will be held, I should be able to show that that which was knitted together on those two days came apart the day of the election, that the party which began at the convention under the black flag of a lie, ended at the ballot box under the white flag of disgrace, that the monstrous fabrication of the convention burst asunder the day of election.

Nothing that the Liberal party can do will from this day forward to election day divert public attention, not if they created for us a fresh Klondike every month, if they made every citezen as wise as Solomon, blameless as St. John and safe as an angel in the courts of heaven; to vote for such a government would still be a damnable crime, while its lever of power was the liquor traffic. It is too late to deliberate; the gauntlet is thrown down; we must take it up, as the Wesleyan says to-day "through the hundred and twenty constituencies in Canada giving majorities." This letter of the Premier is an infamous and insolent challenge to the democracy of this country, and it is true that for a time it kills us; but happily such deaths as these, like the deaths of the gods, are only for a time. When we are able, through county conventions, held in every county in Canada, by public meetings held in every center of population and school-house in the land, articles in every paper and sermons and speeches from every pulpit and platform, to rouse this country as it never was before, then our masters at Ottawa will begin to see rising in the gloom behind them the enormous head of the people. Let us get ready for 1900 by giving the world an exhibition of a country "where the citizen is always the head and ideal, where outside authority enters always after the precedence of inside authority, where the populace rises at once against the never ending audacity and insolence of elected persons." My only object in writing this letter is to rally into one unique thought the courage of the country. On the body of Charpentier, who perished at the barricade at the Petit Carrew, in Paris, was found a note book with a single line. "Admonet et magna testatur voce per umbras." In that spirit I write this letter. J. T. BULMER, Halifax, March 15th.

I read this more particularly to show how incorrrect my hon. friend is in stating that the temperance people and prohibitionists are highly delighted with what the government has done.

This letter is a very good indication of the feeling of those who, as I believe, were betrayed by the government whose sole object was to evade and get rid for a time of a troublesome question. I might elaborate on this question for an hour. I have extracts from the speeches of the Minister of Agriculture and a number of extracts from the speeches of the Premier himself, in which he indicated, in the plainest possible manner, that if a majority of the people were in favour of prohibition, his party would carry out the pledge which they had given, and introduce a bill to enforce prohibition. He did not say, I frankly admit, a majority of the votes cast; he said a majority of the people, but when we use that expression in the working of our institutions and in our mode of government, it means a majority of those who cast their votes at the poles.

My hon. friend the Minister of Justice shakes his head. I know that he is to a certain extent a theorist—I know, more than that, that he is a good constitutional thinker, and he knows, and every man within the sound of my voice knows, that when we go to an election of any kind, whether it be municipal or of a grave political character, affecting the whole country, the majority of the votes cast are those which are supposed—I will not say supposed—that the majority of the people rule and control the future action of the government or the municipality which has to deal with the question. If such were not the case, what would you do in the case of an election of a member of Parliament where there are hundreds on the poll books who never poll their votes; and where some, as I know, in the House of Commons sit with a majority of two or three, and yet have all the advantages of a member who has a thousand majority, and are recognized there as legitimate and proper representatives of the people, just as much as if each of them had been elected by acclamation on the supposition that every man in his constituency was in favour of his election. In the present case every province, but one, has pronounced by a large majority in favour of the principle of prohibition. I am not going into the reasons which led the people of the province of Quebec, who evidently hold different views from those in other sections of the country, to oppose prohibition. That is a question that may be discussed hereafter, and probably we might leave that entirely for the other House to deal with, but here is a fact: every single province in the Dominion has pronounced in favour of prohibition, except one, and because you have not a majority in the whole of the provinces, the temperance people, whom my hon. friend says are so satisfied with the "best of governments" that ever existed, have to—I do not desire to use strong language—abandon all hope of legislation. However, the prohibitionists have shown that they are not satisfied with the action of the government. I may be permitted, before I sit down, to refer again to the Washington Commission. It escaped my mind at the time. My hon. friend expressed great delight at the result, so far as we know it. He was delighted, as a Canadian, a loyal British subject, at the position taken by the commissioners, as I understood him, upon that question which led to the postponement of further consideration of the Alaskan boundary. On that question, if we understand it, the United States commissioners demanded that even if they submitted the question to arbitration as to where the boundary between the two countries really was, those portions of the country in which there are settlements and which the United States have had possession of for a long time, should still remain United States territory.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think you may drop the words "for a long time."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend makes the case stronger. Does any one who has watched the course of events, or has paid the slighest attention to the debates in the House of Commons for the last session, and who knows the position taken by the Premier on that question, wonder for a moment that the United States commissioners took that position? The Premier made the declaration in the House of Commons when debating this question last session, that those portions of the country which had been settled and held by the United States would still be retained by them, and that he would not withdraw the expression when solemnly asked to do so by Sir Charles Tupper, for fear it would be taken advantage of. He positively refused. The principle was laid down that because the United States had possession, because they had made a settlement, we should not even claim it as British territory. Is it to be wondered then, that the United States commissioners should say: "Well, you have admitted this fact decidedly in your speeches in the House, and certainly you should have no hesitation in making that restriction in any reference to the commission." When you look back to the history of this country—when you trace the utterances of the leaders of the Liberal party and more particularly of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, his chief and others. in their declarations throughout the country, of their willingness to concede almost anything that the United States would ask of them in order to get that panacea for all the ills and evils that they said afflicted this country, unrestricted reciprocity, is it any wonder, when the United States have those expressions lying before them, that they should demand from our commissioners that which no British commissioner would think of surrendering? I am glad my hon. friend from Quinté division, desended, as I know he is, from good U. E. Loyalist stock, resents any such propositions, from whatever party they emanate. It would be presumption in any of us to attempt to discuss this question intelligently without knowing really what the terms are and what the points are upon which the commission have come to any decision. May I ask the hon. Minister of Justice if it is true that the Canadian commissioners, headed by the Premier of this country, have consented to leave the interpretation of the treaty of 1818 affecting the fisheries, a question on which no one doubts our rights, to arbitration to ascertain whether that should be permitted to continue to exist? Are the United States people to take the Premier's declaration at Chicago, where he said that the old treaty was barbarous in its character, that it was entered into at a time so different from the present, that while it might be applicable at that time and quite correct, it was not applicable or correct at this date? Is it possible that a treaty which leaves no possible doubt as to the rights of Canada to those fisheries, should be left to arbitration to-day, to tell us what it means? If that concession is made, it is a concession to which no Canadian should submit and should be resisted as we would resist any such condition as I have referred to in connection with the Alaskan boundary. Until we know those facts and what the points of difference are, we cannot, of course, discuss the question intelligently. I am only calling attention to that which has appeared in the public press as one of the concessions which Canada offers to make to the United States in connection with that great question. We all know the value of the fisheries, the wealth they have brought to Newfoundland and to Canada, and we also know the importance of maintaining inviolate the rights that we possess under all circumstances. I give expression to these, my own views, I believe them to be the views of the Canadian people generally, and I shall be glad to get information from the Minister of Justice—that is if he feels at liberty to furnish it, knowing the delicacy which surrounds him in speaking on questions of this kind, unsettled as they are, in any speech which he may make in this Sanate and which will receive publicity. I understand that thoroughly, and consequently do not look for that answer which I should like to receive upon this important question, and upon other questions upon which they say a settlement has been reached. However, if concessions of that kind have been made; if the rumours which have appeared in the public press are to be taken as correct upon these points, I hope that if a treaty of that kind ever comes before us it will be rejected by the Parliament of Canada, as the United States rejected treaties into which they had entered with Great Britain in the past, and treated with ignominy—I will not say with contempt. I am not so much enamoured as my hon. friend is with what he calls the concession and great advantages of the penny postage. I know that it is popular —and perhaps it would be impolitic for me to express an opinion upon it—particularly with the commercial community. It is popular with those who do a great deal of correspondence. I know in my own small business that the tax upon newspapers is about compensated by the saving in postage, but it is only an adjustment of taxation and no more. If you relieve the commercial community, as this does, by one cent on every letter, the deficiency has to be made up by somebody else, and the deficiency will have to be taken out of the pockets of those who do not have any correspondence, and consequently that portion of the community for whom in the past you have been so very solicitous—the agriculturists who we have been told, were not only degraded but ground down to the very lowest depths, will have to assist in making up that deficit if the theories which hon. gentlemen opposite have preached for years be correct, that they, through the National Policy, have been taxed and are taxed at the present time. You say, pertinent to this, that you have carried out your promise of free trade. There is only about one and a half per cent difference between the present tariff and the old tariff which hon. gentlemen opposite denounced. In some articles protection is higher than under the old tariff, even with the 25 per cent preference to the English manufacturers. Hon. gentlemen opposite began, like a fakir who wants to sell his goods: he marks his price high and then states in his window that he gives 25 per cent reduction for cash. You took some articles which bore a 25 per cent duty in the old tariff, and raised the rate to 35 per cent, and then said, "we will give a 25 per cent preference to Great Britain." Now subtract the 25 per cent from 35 per cent, and you have a protection left of 26¼ per cent left, being one and a quarter per cent better for our manufacturers than the old National Policy tariff which hon. gentlemen have condemned for the last eighteen years; and my hon. friend (Mr. Kerr) rejoices at the fact that the manufacturers are reveling in delight at the idea that they have not been yet run out of existence. I cordially approve of the protection they enjoy. Every one knows that I am, and have been a protectionist, and the older I grow the stronger I am in my convictions on that point. If my hon. friend will go on and re-impose the duties on the industries which he has destroyed, he shall have my hearty support. I admit, in connection with this, that the unification, if I may use that term, of the postage throughout the whole world is an idea at which we should all rejoice, but in adopting it in Canada with our sparse population as compared with other nations, we are just removing the tax from one particular subject and putting it on another; for the $700,000 deficit this year arising from a deficiency in postage—provided the statements I have read are correct— must be paid by some one. I notice in the Address a point to which my hon. friend did not call attention, the proposition to build a telegraph from Skagway to Yukon. I remember the speech of my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, last session, in which he portrayed the dire consequences that were to follow if a railway or tramway was not built from the head of the Stikine to Teslin Lake —the flag was to be pulled down, miners were to starve, the country was to pass over to foreigners and other direful consequences were to follow. Nothing in the world would save that country to Canada unless that tramway and the ice road up the Stikine River were built. My hon. friend has concluded to build a telegraph line commencing in what he termed, although we deny it, United States territory. My hon. friend said last session that all the trade of the Klondike would be lost—that that country itself would be lost if we could not have entrance to the Yukon by some other route than Skagway, Dyea or Pyramid Harbour. Now, if the existence of the country was at stake through the failure of the Stikine-Teslin railway project into the Yukon district, how much worse will it be when you build a telegraph line to Dawson from Skagway, a port now held by the United States, and where every single telegram that is sent from this country to that portion of the north-west will have to pass under the surveillence of United States officials? If it was so very dangerous to establish railway communication with Dawson via Skagway, it must be equally dangerous now. I am not finding fault with the proposed construction of that telegraph line; if I had any fault to find it would be that you did not commence the construction of a telegraph long ago. I think that was the most essential thing to do in order to assist the trade of that country. I believe telegraphic communication from one portion of the British Empire to the other would do more for the unification of the Empire than any other scheme or policy that can be adopted. Trade follows the electric wire and without such communication you cannot develop trade or commerce such as you would establish if there were telegraphic communication with all portions of the country. I am very glad that the government have adopted that scheme at last, but it is totally inconsistent with the declaration which they made twelve months ago as to the absolute necessity of being able to get into that country without touching United States territory. We believe, looking at the map as far as I understand it, that Skagway belongs to Canada, but it is in possession of the United States, and so long as they hold it, just so long will they compel British subjects to submit to all the customs regulations and whatever surveillence they think proper to impose upon telegraphic communication. What my hon. friend should have done, I venture to give him this opinion, although I declined to give him an opinion of what should be done under other circumstances.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We had that before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Your opinion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That does not relieve you of having taken another position and having made other promises. Had the Premier and the government, instead of acknowledging the supremacy of the United States at Skagway and other disputed points, asked them to enter into a modus vivendi under which the matter would remain in abeyance until an arbitration had settled the question, instead of acknowledging their right to that country as was done, we would have been in a much stronger position to-day, and would have shown better statesmanship than the government has done under the circumstances. Notwithstanding these facts, however, my hon. friend (Mr. Kerr) considers them the best government that ever existed in Canada. I was a little amused at the interpretation which my hon. friend gave to the question of gerrymandering. It is an exotic, he says; it is a United States invention, I may say a unique invention, and there was no person who introduced it into this country but my hon. friend's friends, and they have been using it ever since. We have been denying it. I am not prepared to admit the statements which have been made as to redistribution of seats in the past. I deny that they have been of the character designated. What is intended to be done in this matter, as in the matter of the commission, I cannot say. We are debating the question in the dark. We know that the Confederation Act—if you refer to the 51st and 52nd clauses of the Constitutional Act under which we are governed,—makes this provision, that every ten years there must be a redistribution of seats upon the principle of representation by population as near as practicable. I do not say that that can be done exactly. If you redistribute the seats now in accordance with what is indicated by the hon. gentleman who moved the Address, adhering to county boundaries, I say it is practically impossible—for I have studied that question a little in the past—if you are going to have the representation based upon that old platform of the Liberal party in Canada, which has been preached ever since the Hon. Geo. Brown's time, of representation by population. Neither do I think, and I do not know that it is necessary in the election of representatives to the House of Commons, a body which has to deal with the affairs of the whole Dominion, or even practicable to have the constituencies limited by county boundaries. We know very well that it is not the case in Ontario. If you look at the Hurons you will find that townships are actually divided, in the constituencies for the Ontario Legislature. When you talk about the population, all you have to do is to look at the past and examine the Redistribution Bill in Ontario. I refer to that more particularly, because my hon. friend (Mr. Kerr) is an Ontario man. He will find that they have not adhered rigidly to population or county boundaries, because they retained Niagara with 5,000 and Cornwall with 7,000, while other constituencies have three sand four times as many. What I should like to know from my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) when he arises to address the House, is, upon what principle, if he thinks it advisable to give the information, this redistribution is to take place. Is the whole of this country to be redistributed in order to adhere to the county boundary lines and in accordance with population, or are you to commence at the eastern portion and divide it up, giving each section a representative by population, or is it for the purpose, as I should say is indicated by the letter, a copy of which was telepraphed from British Columbia the other day, to deal with it from a strictly party standpoint, which is the meaning put upon the word "gerrymander" by my hon. friend? I read the other day with some surprise an answer made by the Minister of Justice. I hope he will state that it is not correct. In communication with his British Columbia friends he told them frankly that he knew very little about the geography of the constituencies in that province, and asked them to apply to the Reform Associations and supply the information when required. Does not my hon. friend know enough of politics to know that information so sought, and information so received, would not be reliable? There are other sources of information which the hon. gentleman might apply to without seeking it from a Reform or any other association. It is the last place that I would apply to if I wanted an unbiassed opinion. Take British Columbia at the present moment and see what position they are in. Thousands and tens of thousands of people are rushing into the Atlin and other mining districts of the province. Is British Columbia to be distributed on the basis of a mining population? You know that the mining population in any locality may consist temporarily of thousands and thousands of people. Two or three years ago I went through the Crow's Nest Pass. I went to what is called Wild Horse Mining Camp. There were ten to fifteen thousand of a mining population there at one time, but only about half a dozen people when I was there. Is the redistribution to be based on a population of that kind, or in what way? Perhaps the hon. gentleman will enlighten us on that subject before the debate is closed. Then you must bear in mind that even if they cut up the whole country at the present moment to suit themselves, or in accordance with the population or the county boundaries, they will have to do the same thing again two years hence, if they are in power—I might parenthetically say that I hope they will not be—that is after the next decennial census. If they succeed in carrying the country two years hence or a year hence, whenever they go to the people, they will have, under the constitution, to redistribute the whole country, and here, just a year before taking another census, we are asked to redistribute the constituencies of this country in order to please them, or to convince the people that they were sincere in their declarations that what had been done in the past was not correctly done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend says hear, hear. I knew he would say that. When that question comes up we will discuss it at much greater length, and on facts which we should have before us. The last paragraph is exceedingly pleasing, where it says that the estimates for the year are to be prepared with a due regard to efficiency and economy, and the responsibility arising from the rapid progress of the country. This is a stereotyped expression, I admit, but when I put that in juxtaposition with the increase of expenditure during the last two or three years, and with the declaration of the Minister of Public Works when defending his extravagance during the last two or three years, when he said: "Wait till you see our estimates for next year, and then we will show you how we can spend money." We wait with some little anxiety to see what these estimates will be, and how far these promises are to be carried out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is in the other chamber.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is in the other chamber, it is true, but as members of this chamber we have to deal with it, and as citizens of the Dominion we have to foot the bill, as well as those of the other chamber, notwithstanding the restriction my hon. friend would place upon the powers of this chamber to deal with it when it comes before us. There are many other points to which I would like to call attention, but I have spoken as briefly as I could. I merely desired to call the attention of the House to some of the positions taken by my hon. friend who moved the address, and the position which the government take upon these questions, must be my only apology for having occupied your time so long.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may begin by congratulating the mover and seconder on the very able statements they have made and the very clear explanations they have given of the principles and policy of the government disclosed in the Speech from the Throne. I also may say that I entirely agree with them in their statement that this country is entitled to be felicitated upon the appointment by Her Majesty of the present Governor General. I have no doubt that His Excellency will be found to discharge his duties upon the principles of government which have long been established in this country and which are invariably followed in the parent State. Let me say further I must also congratulate my hon. friend the leader of the opposition on the moderation with which he has discussed those questions upon which he entertains very strong opinions and upon which I have no doubt he differs from the administration. My hon. friend began his speech by stating that he entirely agreed with the views expressed by the mover and seconder of the address that the country was prosperous, that it was in a highly prosperous condition, and he also agreed with them that the emigration from the country had ceased, and that a large number who had gone abroad in former years were immigrating to Canada again. There are reasons for these things which I will not discuss at the present time. But we know right well that when people emigrate in large numbers from a country they do so with the expectation of bettering their condition, and if everything was quite satisfactory at home such an emigration would not take place. When people immigrate to a country they assume that the condition of things in the country towards which they are directing their journey is more prosperous than the country which they had left, and so I take it that the emigration of former years and the immigration of to-day are indications that we are in a more prosperous condition at the present time than we were at the time that those persons expatriated themselves and sought homes in other sections of Christendom. My hon. friend has also discussed the tendency, as he calls it, of the Anglo-Saxon to roam over the world, but that tendency at the present time is checked in Canada. I do not know that the Anglo-Saxon is a nomad and that he delights in finding a home somewhere else than in the country of his birth, but he is an enterprising man ready to push his fortunes wherever he thinks a fortune can be made, and not disposed to remain at home if in his opinion his condition will be very much bettered by going elsewhere. I do not know that the Anglo-Saxon in this regard differs much from the Celt, or from any other race in the civilized world. This much is perfectly clear: for some reason or other, which my hon. friend has not attempted to explain, the condition of things has improved and the country is more prosperous at this time than it was when my hon.

friend and his former colleagues had the direction of public affairs, I know right well that my hon. friend does not expect me to claim any credit for this, but I am perfectly sure that if my hon. friend were in my place and the condition of things had improved so much for the better, that, however disposed he may be to thank Providence in his heart, he would in his utterances be disposed to take a very considerable portion of the credit to himself. My hon. friend, therefore, ought not to be surprised that the government does claim, to some extent at all events, the merit of having contributed as far as governments can, to the change which has taken place for the better. There is another thing which my hon. friend will not be disposed to dispute, and that is that there is abroad in this country to-day a spirit of self-reliance, a disposition on the part of the population to rely upon their own exertions and their own energies and to look less to others for the prosperity which they trust lies before them, than in any other period of the history of this country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Why do you not lower the tariff?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend asks why do we not lower the tariff. What has that to do with this question?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Self-reliance.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The people are exhibiting self reliance, and the tariff, I may say to my hon. friend, will be lowered, though I do not think my hon. friend will be pleased to see it lowered, because my hon. friend wants a grievance. He wants something of which to complain. He wants to direct his criticisms against the administration, and that opportunity would not be afforded him if the Government moved faster than they are moving at the present time. Therefore, my hon. friend would be in greater distress than he has known since he has been in Parliament, because the principal ground of his complaint would be taken away. Let me say this: that not only does the country exhibit great self reliance by the energies that the population are putting forth, by the enterprises in which they are engaging, by the objects in which they are investing their capital in order to create fortunes for themselves, but there is also growing up between Canada and the parent State a stronger feeling of unity, a stronger desire to become one and indivisible than existed in former periods of the history of this country.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Dominion of Canada, perhaps, is something like a boy growing up to manhood? He in time takes an interest in the fortunes of his father. He learns that he may contribute something towards the increase of that fortune and he desires to become a partner, not merely governing the local territory of which he is in charge, but sharing in those larger enterprises and those international enterprises in which, if he grows, he will have a permanent interest. An so to that extent he will be disposed to cast, in a larger degree, his fortunes with the old gentleman than he was inclined to do before; and so there is a disposition on the part of the people of this country to say "we have a great regard to our father John Bull and we wish permanently to unite our fortunes with his." My hon. friend has also adversely criticised the government with regard to a number of matters. He has spoken of the negotiations with the United States and has asked—not with a great deal of persistency, and I am obliged to him for it—information with regard to those negotiations. My hon. friend knows there were a number of questions of difference that had arisen between this country and the United States. There were questions of difference with regard to their rights in our Atlantic waters in respect to the fisheries. There were differences arising from the unrestrained destruction of fish in the inland fisheries on the borders of the two countries, creating dissatisfaction with us, because we were making regulations for the preservation of the fish, while before the eyes of our fishermen destruction was going on without restraint upon the United States side of the boundary. Then there were differences with regard to pelagic sealing which had been arranged to some extent by the convention of Paris, and which had been settled in the main in favour of our contention, but they were maintaining that from the manner in which pelagic sealing was being carried on, even under the Paris regulations, the herd of seals in the Pribylof Islands was being destroyed, and it was necessary that some convention should be had between the two governments in order that that herd might be preserved. That was a subject of irritation on one side if not on both, and so it became necessary to come to a more perfect understanding with our neighbours in respect to that. Then there was the dispute to which my hon. friend has referred, this question of boundary: and the United States contend the boundary is, where we think it is not. In our opinion, under the convention with Russia of 1825, the convention of St. Petersburg, the location of the boundary is not where the United States contend it is. In our opinion the proper location would give us, at all events, the upper portion of the Lynn Canal, and if our contention is right Dyea and Skagway are located in Canadian territory. Now, let me say this: my hon. friend has referred to some other matters connected with this which I will discuss later. He has referred to the communications which took place on this subject. We thought, and we think still, that the rule which the United States urged on behalf of Venezuela and which the British Government at their instance accepted, is one equally applicable to the disputed boundary between the United States and Canada. The United States insisted, when the boundary came to be settled under the treaty stipulations with Venezuela by the commissioners appointed for the purpose, that if upon the location of the boundary a settlement made by the British should be found on the Venezuela side, and that it had been made more than half a century ago, the boundary should be so located as to embrace that settlement within British territory. In our opinion the same rule should apply in settling the disputed boundary between Canada and the United States, that if there should be any town which was built up more than half a century ago upon our side of the boundary by the people of the United States, that should go to them according to the rule laid down between Venezuela and Great Britain; but our United States friends, as I understand it, were not prepared to accept that proposition. They propose that any town, no matter how recently built by them in Canadian territory, should go to them in any event. That was one of the differences, as I understand it, on that question. Then there was also a difference of opinion, which I need not discuss at the present time, in regard to the manner in which a commission or board of arbitration should be constituted for the purpose of settling those difficulties. My hon. friend has referred in this matter to the death of Lord Herschell. I may say that I think we all equally lament the death of that distinguished statesman and jurist. Lord Herschell was a man of far more than ordinary ability, and far more than ordinary industry. He had devoted himself with great energy and great zeal and with extraordinary intelligence, and had studied all the disputed questions that required a settlement between Canada and the United States. No man could be better qualified by his attainments and by his ability for the commission appointed to consider these questions than the late Lord Herschell. He gave them special attention and I cannot but feel, as I am sure every hon. gentleman here does, that it was a great misfortune to this country when Lord Herschell died. His services would have been invaluable to us, not only in the settlement of the questions in controversy, but the special attention which he had given to all those subjects, the thorough acquaintance which he had acquired with respect to them, as well as his interest in this country and familiarity with it, which nearly eight or nine months had given him, would have been of invaluable service to Canada in future years had Lord Herschell's life been spared; so I cannot help but feel, as I am sure every one here does, that it was a calamity to this country when Lord Herschell died.

My hon. friend has referred to the penny postage. He thinks that it is an advantage simply to merchants. I do not agree with that view, and I think if my hon. friend will reflect for a moment he will see that its beneficial influence is very much wider than he has stated. Merchants may, to some extent be benefited by the system of penny postage, but the people who will perhaps avail themselves of it most are those who have relations scattered abroad throughout the Empire and in the neighbouring republic. It will result in very much more frequent communication between the scattered members of different families and, in my opinion, will become an important bond of union between different sections of the British Empire as well as between the Empire and the English speaking population of the neighbouring republic. All the ties that spring up between one section of the Empire and another ; all the acts of state and public utterances which bring people, whose union and good understanding is desirable, closer together are advantages, and this I regard as one of the measures contributing silently and unostentatiously to a closer and stronger union between different portions of the British Empire. Let me say this, that our union is a peculiar one. We know the union of the neighbouring republic sprang up. A compact was entered into between the colonies. The powers which belonged to the British Government passed to the central government ; the powers which belonged to the colonies passed to the States, and so their constitution did little more than regulate and define the boundaries which separated these respective powers, and they were enabled, without much difficulty, to frame a written constitution. Let me say you can have no such constitution between the different portions of the BritishE mpire. We are differently constituted : the different portions of the Empire are not in contact with each other, and the union which exists and which largely consisted at one time of the supremacy of the central authority, now more largely consists in the extension of interests, in commercial relations, in closer business contact and, when necessity arises, in international controversies, and granting to a dependency a voice in any international board for the settlement of those difficulties in proportion to the interest which it has. Now, that is a union which you cannot provide for by a written constitution. It is a union which must grow, and it is the business of public men in every part of the Empire to look abroad and to see where the opportunities exist for the extension of that union and the strengthening of its bonds, in order that in time an Imperial constitution, similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom—similar in principle to that by which we are governed, may spring up between the different portions of the Empire. It is not a union in which there is a legislative body, for which it is necessary to make legislative provisions. It is a union consisting largely of administrative relations, of the settlement of treaty relations, of understandings ; it is a union based on convention and usage and common sense, not on law, and which will in time become a far more perfect machine than it is possible for the wisdom of statesmen to create. Now, my hon. friend I thought undervalued the importance of more friendly relations with the neighbouring republic. My hon. friend did not speak against such union, I know perfectly well ; but I thought he undertook to minimize the observations made by my hon. friend who moved the Address. Now, I think they are of very great consequence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What I desired to point out was I would not submit to great concessions even to obtain that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Neither would I. We may have a little difficulty in drawing the boundary, but there are somethings on which I think concessions ought never to be made, and other things on which concessions may be made, and if experience shows they do not work as satisfactorily as you anticipate, they may be withdrawn. While I have no desire to see any political relation between this country and the neighbouring republic ; while we should maintain our autonomy here, an autonomy consistent with the continued unity of the empire, I am in favour of friendly relations and a friendly understanding with our neighbour across the boundary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So is everybody.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Now, it is one of the benefits that have grown up within a recent period, a period extending back but a few months, that more friendly relations do exist. I have myself met many men of prominence in the neighbouring republic during the past summer and this winter, and I know there is a very great change for the better in their feeling towards Canada and towards Great Britain. When the United States gave up the old colonial idea of living to themselves, of being a world by themselves, of avoiding entangling alliances, meaning thereby not merely political alliances but intimate commercial relations, they attained their majority. They have gone abroad in that they have undertaken to acquire outside dominion, and in doing so have given hostages for their good conduct in time to come, and they will not occupy that isolated position which some regarded as independence, but which I regard as leading to ill-nature and to its exhibition. I say, therefore, that in the extension of United States territory and in the better understanding that has arisen between the Imperial Government of our Empire and the United States, we have hopes that their shell will be softened and that they will be disposed to deal with us from feelings of self-interest on fairer terms than they were disposed to do under other circumstances.

My hon. friend has referred to the question of prohibition. Well, I am not going to discuss that, because while he read to us the opinions of others, whose opinions perhaps might be of very great consequence——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They are Liberal opinions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend would have satisfied himself, and I am sure others on this side of the House more, if he had devoted a little more attention to the exposition of his own which he declared, like Desdemona, he was determined to conceal. My hon. friend, however, was not very successful, for he reminded us of the views expressed, which are in entire accord with his own, by the former Prime Minister, the late Sir John Thompson. And he said Sir John Thompson informed these people he did not favour prohibition, that he was opposed to it, and that he intended to stand on that ground. My hon. friend says that our position was a fraud ; that in fact our course in proposing a vote on the subject of prohibition was a fraud. But my hon. friend forgot that he himself supported it with alacrity. If my hon. friend held last session the views that he has uttered with so much perspicuity to-day, he ought to have resisted the proposition. He ought to have fought against fraud here. He ought to have endeavoured to prevent the triumph of fraud in this House. But my hon. friend thought the government was marching to their execution, and fraud or no fraud, villany or no villany, my hon. friend was ready to submit to anything and to do anything, for the purpose of allowing the government to commit suicide.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, I would not do that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then my hon. friend read letters, but he did not tell us whether he adopted them as his own views or not, and I did not see that they had much relevancy unless he adopted them. These letters stated that the rule with reference to the plebiscite vote was exactly the same as the rule for the election of members to the House of Commons. I dissent from that view. The object is different. You must have a House of Commons. You must have representatives of the people constituting one assembly, and you accept the return of those who have polled a majority of the votes. How did this vote stand? My hon. friend will see we were not electing anybody. There was no act of necessity connected with this vote. The object of the vote, as I take it, was for the purpose of seeing whether the state of public opinion was such that it would justify the government in legislating. We had no doubt but what a measure might be carried through Parliament, especially if hon. gentlemen thought it was going to kill us. But my hon. friend will see that beyond that there is the question of the enforcement of the law, and I say that a measure put upon the statute-book that you cannot enforce is very much worse than no measure at all. When you look at the vote how does it stand? You had 21 per cent of the electors of Canada declaring against prohibition ; you had 22½ per cent declaring in favour of prohibition ; and you had nearly 56 per cent who did not vote at all, who certainly were not enthusiasts in favour of prohibition. On the contrary, I would be inclined to draw the inference that they were, on the whole, hostile to such legislation. It being six o'clock, and as I have yet some further remarks to make, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, 21st March, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON rose to inquire :

Whether the suspension of the deliberations of the international conference, between Great Britain and the United States, until the 2nd of August next, will prevent the consideration of the establishment of free trade relations with Great Britain?

He said:—The object of the question is to ascertain whether the suspension of the conference means the tying up of domestic legislation in Canada or of legislation we may have with Great Britain.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not see any connection between our trade relations with Great Britain and the negotiations with Washington. I am not at all aware that the one can have any influence on the other. It is not intended that any negotiations with the United States shall alter the policy that the government adopted with respect to Great Britain.

THE ADDRESS.

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech on the opening of the fourth session of the eighth parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLS said:—When the House rose last evening at 6 o'clock I was discussing what my hon. friend opposite, the leader of the opposition, had said in respect to the plebiscite taken upon the subject of prohibition. I did not think that there was any similarity between an election for the return of a member to the House of Commons and the vote taken to ascertain the state of public opinion upon a question relating to a proposed sumptuary law. If it becomes necessary to hold an election for a member to the House of Commons, it is necessary that there should be a member returned, a representative for the constituency that at the time was vacant. It is necessary, whether the vote be large or small, that that return should take place, and it has always been regarded in the public interest that the one who has polled the largest number of votes, whether they form a large or a small percentage of those who are entitled to the franchise, shall be returned as the representative to the legislature. But that view can have no relevancy to a vote taken in respect to the propriety of legislation upon a particular subject. Let me say to the hon. gentleman that it has not been the practice in this country, nor is it generally consistent with parliamentary government, that a vote shall be taken upon a specific measure. The rule is that each party may state what their views are on questions of general policy, and those who are returned in the majority to the House of Commons shall exercise a controlling influence in favour of that policy to which they are committed. Now, whether the rule be a sound one or not, it was thought that that principle was not applicable to the case of a sumptuary law. In such a case, whether the measure is one which is proper to put upon a statute-book, depends largely on the state of public opinion, and whether the public will sustain such a measure by their active sympathy and support, if it should be made law. Now, the vote is taken not to decide whether prohibitory legislation is a good or a bad thing in itself, or whether it is a proper thing to adopt, but if the law can be enforced. That is a consideration upon which the people may pass by a popular vote, but it is also a consideration upon which the administration and Parliament must subsequently decide. But assuming that to be so, assuming such legislation is proper, nevertheless it is important to know whether the state of opinion in the country is such as to justify the administration in bringing such a measure forward. Now, I say, the object of the popular vote on a question of that sort is and must be mainly for the purpose of ascertaining the state of public opinion. Now, what does the vote disclose? I find that there are on the registered lists of voters 1,223,849 names. Of that number, 278,478 voted in favour of prohibition; 264,571 voted against prohibition. That is, the total vote polled was 543,049, indicating the number who are actively in favour of such a measure and the number who are actively opposed to it, the vote being taking the whole Dominion collectively together, very nearly equal. Now, I find there were 646,800 votes, not polled, a good deal more than half. I say, looking at the whole question, at the result of the vote that was taken, in my opinion it does not indicates such a state of public opinion as would warrant the government in undertaking to legislate on the subject. Then you have the further consideration that you would require in case such a vote was adopted, to alter the taxation to the amount of six or seven million dollars. You would have to remove the tax from all the prohibited articles as a source of revenue. You would have to devise other means of taxation than those which already existed and in place of the tax which you repealed. And if that were the case, every administration, as long as it retains its senses, must consider what would be the effect of that alteration of the taxation upon the public opinion of the country, and whether, if such a system of taxation had been proposed as part of the question submitted, the vote in favour of prohibition would even have been as large as it is. Let me suppose, as an abstract proposition, that we had carried through a perfect measure, we had provided another system of taxation, that we had imposed taxes upon tea, coffee and sugar, and a per capita tax or such other tax as might be required to make up the six or seven millions of revenue that would have been displaced, and we had asked for the vote of this country upon a perfected measure of that sort, I think we were bound to consider what would be the probable vote given upon a measure of that sort. I have no hesitation in saying that there would necessarily be a good many people who would vote for an abstract proposition in favour of prohibition that would not vote to pay a few dollars of the taxes that are at present paid by the men who drink. That I have little doubt about, and all these matters are to be taken into consideration. If instead of 278,000 votes there had been over half a million votes in favour of the proposition, it would have indicated a very different state of public opinion from that which exists, and a state of public opinion that might have justified the government in going forward and meeting the wishes of those who desire to see a policy of prohibition adopted.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Take another plebiscite.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has also spoken about the proposed telegraph line from Skagway into Dawson, and he seems to think in some way or another, that that is contrary to the policy which the government adopted last year, and inconsistent with the contention which my hon. friend beside me and myself on behalf of the government made in this House last session. I do not see that. I am unable to see how my hon. friend arrives at such a conclusion. I was of the opinion that if we opened a line of railway into that northern country within our own territory with a view of extending it as soon as possible to a seaport within our own limits, it would have been the right policy to adopt. I am still of that opinion. I think it was most unfortunate—my hon. friend I dare say holds a different view—that that policy was frustrated by the vote of this House. There can be no doubt whatever we have turned, by our action, the whole trade both from Canada and the United States to the ports of Dyea and Skagway. We no doubt arrive somewhat nearer to our own territory by going to these ports, but we place the trade at its initial step under the control of the United States, subject to their policy. We are building up considerable towns on United States territory that could not live without our trade if that trade had been diverted into another channel. That is an accomplished fact. A railway is being constructed which will facilitate, no doubt, communication with that country, and what we propose to do in the meantime is to construct a telegraph line, located in that same district, for the purpose of holding more ready communication with that distant portion of our Canadian possessions. We do not suppose for a moment that that is to be our permanent line into that territory, but it is the one that can be most readily constructed, and which will furnish at the earliest day facilities for intercourse, to enable us to communicate with the territory, until we are able to begin at a point connected with the telegraph system in Canada as it now exists and extend a line from that system into the Yukon country. No doubt that must be done, and it must be done with as much expedition as possible, but in the meantime a line can be constructed in the course of a short period of time which will place us within a few days communication with the ports on the western coast. It will take a vessel a few days to pass from Dyea or Skagway to Victoria, and that link, of course, in our telegraph communication will be wanting, but nevertheless it will enable us, in the course of a week, to communicate with Dawson and with the mining district in the Yukon country. At present our communication is very slow and extremely uncertain, and that slowness and uncertainty will be overcome temporarily by the construction of this section of telegraph line. My hon. friend referred to the proposed bill for the redistribution of seats, and spoke of it as a gerrymander bill. It is not a gerrymander bill; the object is to repeal a measure of that sort. Unfortuna ely many years ago the system of gerrymandering constituencies so as to give a minority an opportunity of returning a majority to a legislature was adopted by our neighbours over the way. That system was carefully excluded from this country until 1882, and in 1882 my hon. friend opposite and his colleagues undertook to solve the problem in the United States way. We propose to put an end to that. It would be advantageous perhaps from a party point of view—although I think it would be demoralizing to the public sentiment of the country—if we were to retaliate and adopt the policy of those who controlled the government of this country in 1882. But we do not propose to do that. We propose to put an end to the gerrymandering system. We say that you shall pay regard to county boundaries, that these shall not be broken, that, where a county is entitled to more than one representative, you may divide it into two divisions. If entitled to more than two, into three ridings, but you must make your electoral division within the limits of the boundaries established by the county. Now, across the boundary in some of the newer states of the United States Union they have a special provision in their state constitutions that there shall be no gerrymander, and to secure the result they provide that when the census is taken and a new distribution of seats takes place, the county boundaries shall be unbroken, and the fragments of different counties shall not be put together for the purpose of forming a constituency. In adopting this rule over the way, and in adopting that rule here, we are simply following the ancient tradition of the United Kingdom. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in the United Kingdom there is no such thing as constituencies made up of fragments of different counties. You have the borough divisions and you have the county ridings, but each riding forms a portion of a single county. It does not form a portion of several counties, and in that way the historical traditions of the representation of the county has been preserved and it has exercised, as stated by Mr. Gladstone and by Lord Salisbury, a healthful influence over the representation in the future. Constituencies that a century ago were represented by the great Earl of Chatham, when Mr. Pitt, by his son, Mr. Pitt, by Mr. Fox, have a pride to-day in referring to the fact that in times gone by these men who played so important a part in the House of Commons and in the government of the Empire were representatives of their district, and it exercises a healthful and beneficial influence over them in the selection of representatives to-day. The effect of such a historic tradition is advantageous to the community, for whatever we may do in the way of legislation and especially in the way of constitutional legislation, should be aimed to draw people upwards and not to drag them down. The principle, hon. gentlemen, will find set out by Sir John Macdonald, in a speech addressed to the House of Commons in 1872. He points out that it is important, where men are in the habit of co-operation for any public object, for the administration of justice, say as jurymen, in their agricultural associations, in their municipal organizations, that the same men, thus forming an acquaintance with each other, thus becoming personally acquainted with the abilities of the more promising men amongst them, should have an opportunity of selecting such for their representatives in the House of Commons. But if you cut off a township from one county and attach it to two or three townships in another county, you may take off from the county the most promising, the most influential, the most useful man of the county and put him in a constituency where outside of his own township he has no acquaintance whatever. No matter which party he may belong to, you doom him to private life, you deny him that opportunity which his abilities would enable him to secure and which his abilities entitle him to, if you respected county boundaries, and if you gave him the chance to which he is entitled. I say that in proposing to return to the principle of observing county boundaries in a distribution of seats, we are not introducing anything novel. We are not gerrymandering the country. We are undertaking to undo what has been done in that regard and give every man, whether in or out of Parliament, a fair chance for his life, the opportunity of making his own fortune. Now, my hon. friend says that if we adopt that principle we do not secure equal electoral divisions, but I tell my hon. friend that when this subject was under discussion in 1893 I went over the whole ground with some care then, and I think I satisfied members of the House of Commons on that occasion that the inequalities which exist at the present time between the constituencies with the largest population and those with the smallest is greater than would exist if the principle of respect for county boundaries were observed. There is no difficulty in showing that undoubtedly that is so; and it is, therefore, of immense consequence in this country, if we by any possibility can do it, that we should adopt a rule which would be accepted for all time to come, so that no matter which party might control the affairs of the country after the census, that we should be assured of one thing, the county boundaries would be respected and that whatever alterations were made in constituencies would be made within those county limits. I think that is a safe rule. It has been said by my hon. friend that we disregard the principle of representation by population in adopting a rule of this sort. Let us observe what the British North America Act provides for in that regard. It does not provide for representation by population in electoral districts. That we have never had. It cannot be contended for a moment that was adopted in the distribution of 1872, or 1882 or 1892. In every one of these cases the inequality shows that there was very little attention given to the subject of representation by population between constituencies. That is not what the Act calls for. It is representation by population between the provinces, and each province is given representation in proportion to its population. Now, one constituency may have a larger population than another. That is of far less consequence than to undertake to break up the division which exists by the common co-operation of the people within county limits. I need not pursue that question further, because the measure will be before this House and we shall have an opportunity of fully discussing it. I simply point out that there is no gerrymander contemplated, none intended—that the intention is as far as possible to place the two great parties of the country upon a footing of equality for the elections and to restore the principle of county boundaries with that end in view.

My hon. friend referred to the question of taxation. He says "you have violated all your principles; you have disregarded all those theories of taxation which you have been promulgating for twenty years" I do not think that my hon. friend is warranted in that contention, I never proposed that there should be less taxation than is required for the public service. I have always maintained that the tax should be with that object in view.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—But that all that was collected for taxation purposes should be diverted into the treasury.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is my opinion, and I think it is desirable to carry that principle out, so far as we possible can. The great difference between my hon. friend (Mr. Boulton) and myself on this point is that he seems to think that unless you move on a direct line you are not moving in the direction that you claim you intend to travel. On that point I differ from him. There are many questions connected with taxation. There are many prejudices associated with it, on the part of people having important interests that it is not our business to shock—that it is not our business to make war upon. We trust to the force of the progress of the country and the gradual adoption of principles which those who are inclined to dread them will see have not associated with them the evils which they anticipated. Now, let me say that in this respect I, to some extent, hold to the view expressed many years ago by Mr. Lowell, that the movement of a party is something like that of a great river. There are many great bends and sweeps in the course in which it moves forward until it reaches a broader level, and so it is with those who have the charge of public affairs. We are moving onwards towards the point at which we aimed. We will certainly, if the country sustains us, and I believe it will, ultimately reach that destination, but we purpose doing it without revolution. We purpose doing it without undertaking to run over mountains and carry the country down precipices. We deviate from a straight line so far as that is necessary to guide public opinion, to avoid public excitement and to secure by quiet means, by means which in the end it becomes obvious to everybody will lead us to the point which we intend to reach. It is not our business to provoke agitation. It is not our business to lead any portion of the people to suppose we were making war upon vested interests. It is our business to govern the country as we find it. There are many things perhaps that if we had come into power earlier would have been different—would have been, from my point of view at least, better; but we had to deal with the position of things as they existed when the change in the political sentiment of the country took place, and when the public confidence placed us where we are, and we propose to pursue the course which we had marked out for ourselves, consistent with the principles of good order and of quiet, and to carry with us the confidence, so far as we can, of every class of the population. It is said by a distinguished writer, that the foolish and the dead never change. We are neither foolish nor dead, and we intend to bring about those changes which we believe will be to the advantage of the country, and which will contribute to its material growth and to its prosperity.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When I say I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech of the hon. mover of the Address, I feel confident that I express the opinion of every hon. gentleman in this House. By saying that I do not at all intend to convey the impression that I agree with everything the hon. gentleman said, but from his own point of view, and in the performance of a very delicate and important duty in this House, I must say that he performed his work very well indeed, and I would almost go so far as to compliment the hon. gentlemen on the government side of the House in calling our friend to this House, because I am satisfied from the address he has made that he will be a very valuable member of the Senate. I would almost go a little further on that point and say that in the matter of filling seats in this House the present Premier of Canada and his colleagues have shown a very great regard indeed for the honour of the Senate and the interests of the country, for we have added to our members gentlemen of ability and standing and influence in the country. I will go a little further to say that in the appointment of a gentleman to fill the seat made vacant by my lamented colleague in this House, Senator Arsenault, no better appointment could have been made from the ranks of the Liberal party in Prince Edward Island than the hon. gentleman who has been called to that place. It would be difficult to find any one better fitted to adorn a seat in this House than the gentleman who has been appointed by the government to he Senate either in the ranks of one party or the other. But that leads to a reflection not altogether so creditable to gentlemen opposite. It is rather humiliating to them and to the whole of us that they could not be in a position to call so estimable a gentleman, to the Senate of Canada without stultifying themselves before the people of the country, because as a political party they have put themselves on record as declaring it immoral to hold out prominent positions of this kind before members of the House of Commons. It is no fault of the hon. gentleman who has been called to this House. He is blameless in the matter. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House believe that no wrong is done in calling a member of the House of Commons, who has ripe experience to this House; but hon. gentlemen opposite laid down a different doctrine. My hon. friend (Mr. Mills) shakes his head. That is the way with our friends. One of these gentlemen propounds a doctrine and they are understood to say Yea, yea and amens to it; but afterwards, when it does not suit their purpose, we find one after another shirk the responsibility attaching to their doctrine. The present Postmaster General went so far in the House of Commons in 1896 as to introduce a bill providing that no member of the House of Commons could accept a permanent position, with emoluments attached, from the Crown, until after he had ceased to be a member of the House of Commons for one year, and he made a speech in support of it, in which he repeated the views that had been expressed on the platform and in the country and which were announced scores of times in my own province by representative Liberals as an accepted doctrine of the party. We hold to no such view as that. I do not agree with the principle laid down by the Postmaster General and supported in a very remarkable speech by him in the Commons and endorsed very fully by a gentleman who spoke on that occasion, and who held up his hands in horror at the evil that he saw rampant in the land in dangling positions before members of Parliament—I speak of a gentleman who was then a member of the House of Commons but who has since been appointed to a judgeship in the province of Ontario. The first paragraph of the address refers to the prosperity at present enjoyed by the Dominion of Canada. Hon. gentlemen who have already spoken have referred to this prosperity, and admitted that at the present time we enjoy it in a very large measure. While agreeing with that view, I will go so far as to say that, compared with the prosperity prevailing all over the world, Canada stood as well in the bad years of 1892 and 1893 as it has stood in the good years of 1897 and 1898, that is, compared with the rest of the world, What was the condition of affairs in 1892, 1893 and 1894? We went through a tremendous crisis which swept down almost all the banking institutions of the United States. The United States suffered extreme distress. The same distress, although not so poignant, was felt in Great Britain and in fact all over the commercial world. Although we were not wholly exempt from that wave of depression, while we felt it to some extent, yet I contend we came out of that ordeal at that time and stood well compared with the rest of the world. My hon. friend the leader of the House says that we have to take immigration as an evidence of existing prosperity. I am not going to deny that the influx, in very considerable numbers, of settlers is an evidence of prosperity. The prosperity that we enjoy may be one of the reasons that induces them to come, and it is certainly very gratifying to know that we are receiving a considerable number of settlers from abroad. But I have looked a little into the public documents and find no evidence before me to warrant the belief that we are receiving at this time, or that we have been receiving within the last year for which we have any particulars, a very much larger number of settlers than we received even in the years which we all admit to have been bad—1892, 1893, 1894, and so on. My hon. friend beside me, the hon. leader of the opposition, remarked that he was not able to turn up in the Trade and Navigation Returns, any item of settlers' effects going out of the country during the last year. I have been a little more successful in that respect. It is not found under the heading of "settlers' effects," but "household effects." When they come into the country, they are called "settlers' effects;" when they go out of the country, they are adroitly called "household effects," but they mean precisely the same thing. Settlers' effects in the customs return, either going in or coming out, is almost the only statistics we have to show what the movement of population has been. I find the settlers' effects coming into Canada from the United States for the year 1898 were of the value of $2,334,457, a very respectable showing, indeed, and that in the same year the household effects going to the United States amounted to $886,622. Going back to 1894, I found that in that year the settlers' effects coming into Canada from the United States were $2,665,893, or nearly $300,000 more than is shown by the Trade and Navigation returns of 1898, about which we hear so much, and I find that, comparing the household effects going to the United States in these two years, there is practically little difference. In 1894 they were $940,000 and in 1898 they were $886,000. Therefore, as far as the customs returns furnish us information—and I do not know of any other source of information that we possess—we have nothing to show that the flow of population into and out of the country has been materially different in 1898 from what it was in the year 1894. I have taken these two years for comparison, because we know that in 1894 there was a depression all over the world, and in 1898 the boom of prosperity had set in, not only in Canada but in other countries as well. Now, with regard to the flow of population and the prosperity enjoyed in the country, I am not one of those who have ever believed that it is a very bad thing that some of our people people should go out and share in the enterprises of the great world beyond. I am not at all satisfied that this is a bad thing. We rather pride ourselves on the distinguished Canadians abroad. We like to give a president to the first National Bank of Chicago, and a principal to Cornell University. We are proud of the young men we send out and that out of those who go abroad a goodly number find responsible positions in the countries of their adoption. I therefore think that the statement in the first paragraph of this address, which says that there has been almost a total cessation of the exodus of our population, has been made without any substantial foundation upon which to rest. I happen to know that from the province in which I live a good many of our people have gone, and they are still going. Crossing on the ice boat the other day two young men were even at that season of the year, taking that hazardous trip to go to the United States and seek employment. Some of my hon. friends who took the steamer to Georgetown told me that some half dozen young people were on that steamer also going to the United States. There, however, is just this difference between the state of things in past years and at the present moment. When the Liberal party were out of power they decried this country. My hon friend sitting opposite me, as well as his friends all over the country, during all those years denounced this country. They exaggerated the exodus of our population. They cried blue ruin from one end of the country to the other, and it would not be at all surprising if during those years a greater exodus of the population had taken place, when the leaders of the Liberal party were telling the people that there was no hope for them if they remained in Canada, that they were being burdened with bad laws and taxation and that their only hope was to get out of the country. That was the cry of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Circumstances are changed now and we hear nothing of blue ruin to-day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You are trying to preach it now.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, I am glad of the change. It has brought to an end this practice of one of the great political parties of decrying and belittling their own country. But it does seem a sorry reflection to have to make with reference to the great leaders of one of our big political parties in Canada that in order to make them loyal and true to their country it has been necessary to give them office. It is not a very pleasant reflection. The price may have been high, but a very desirable object has been attained when these gentlemen have been called off in this policy of denunciation and condemnation of their own country. References have been made to another very important paragraph in the Speech which refers to the negotiations that have been carried on for a long time, over six months, I think, between Great Britain and the United States, with a view to settle the questions pending between the two countries. In regard to that I would say that the present government have been extremely fortunate in the opportunity that circumstances gave them in dealing with these great international questions. We know what has happened within the last two years, more particularly within the last year, in the way of drawing the two great members of the Anglo-Saxon family together; of removing hostile or unfriendly feelings that existed between them. We know that a great deal has been accomplished in that direction, and it was very fortunate for the hon. gentlemen composing the government that these events occurred, removing some of the great difficulties which stood in the way of the settlement of the international difficulties in years gone by, and I will go so far as to say that, as far as circumstances beyond the control of gentlemen in the government were concerned, everything was in their favour; but as far as they had anything to do with shaping the circumstances themselves, everything was against them. We remember the very first step that was taken by the Premier in regard to this matter, to say nothing of the course pursued when they were in opposition. We know of their trips to Washington and of their Boston speeches, and their propaganda in Canada in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, and commercial union and we know of the celebrated interview which the Premier of Canada gave to a Chicago paper shortly after he assumed the government of Canada, all of which was to convey the impression on the minds of our neighbours that when these gentlemen came into power, and they came to treat, the United states would have almost everything their own way. The Premier of the country used almost those very words to the Chicago reporter: that the late government had been hostile to the United States, that the present government had been friendly to them, creating an impression in the United States which they were not slow to receive, that the time was come for obtaining most important concessions from Canada in the settlement of the questions pending between the two countries. Then after a visit to Washington on the part of two gentlemen connected with the government, we have the jubilee proceedings in England, and the so-called preferential tariff. Experience has proved that the preferential tariff has given no preference to Great Britain, that it has proved really advantageous to the United States, the best evidence of which is to be found in the enormous extension of the imports of this country from the United States since the adoption of that tariff as compared with the imports from Great Britain. The fact remains however that while that tariff has not benefited British trade, but has worked advantageously to the United States trade, yet it was at the time apparently an unfriendly act towards the United States, which could not help rendering difficult the task of the representatives of this country when they undertook to frame a treaty. I go back and say that as far as these gentlemen at all attempted to shape events leading up to negotiations with the United States, they put nothing but difficulties in their own way, and all the advantages that came to their help in the matter of these negotiations came from sources and influences to which they contributed absolutely nothing. I remember all that we were promised about what the "sunny ways" were going to do. Who in this House has not heard the fable of the sun compelling the traveller to take off his coat, while the north wind had the opposite effect. The sunny ways were to be applied to Uncle Sam, and great things were going to be produced in that way. I am afraid that Uncle Sam has proved somewhat of an iceberg, as the sunny ways have not been as effectual as it was believed they would be. We cannot congratulate the government on the result of the long and protracted deliberations, and I must say that I believe there was a general feeling of satisfaction, a feeling of relief in Canada among their own friends, amongst the people generally when the commissioners came home, because the tenacity with which they persisted in endeavouring to make a treaty, the length of time which was applied to it, indicated clearly that in their intense desire to do something there was a great element of danger that the best interests of Canada would be sacrificed. I feel that the people of Canada to-day are much better pleased that they came home without a treaty, than with the kind of treaty that the public believed they would have if they had succeeded in coming to a definite conclusion with the United States. This does not say much for the power of sunny ways, or the boasted influence of this Administration aided as they were by all the power and influence of the British Government represented by a statesman of the greatest ability and of world-wide reputation, one of the ablest jurists in the world. Notwithstanding all the influence that he was able to bring to bear, they were not able to settle the questions pending before them. A sad commentary on all the boasts that were put forward about what the sunny days would accomplish when dealing with the United States, is the remark of Lord Herschell when lying on what proved to be his death-bed, "I have spent six months and all I have got for it is a broken leg." There is another paragraph of the speech to which my hon. friend has devoted a good deal of attention. That is the plebiscite upon the question of prohibition. My hon. friend, feeling the extreme difficulty of his present position, actually tried to get others into it. It is a comfort in misfortune if you can draw some others into the same position as yourself, and he actually tried to draw the hon. leader of the opposition into it, because he had not divided the House in regard to the Plebiscite Bill, hon. gentlemen know very well that the government have to take that responsibility entirely to themselves, and that they cannot shift it upon the shoulders of the temperance people of Canada, because the temperance people, as my hon. friend very well knows, did not ask for a plebiscite: asked for prohibition. They asked for they bread and the government gave them a stone. They pleaded that a plebiscite was not necessary, but the members of the present government when in opposition, in the Ottawa Conference of 1893, decided that they would take a plebiscite on the question, and they created an impression on the country that they would act in good faith with all parties and that the decision of the majority would rule. I am confident I speak the sentiments of the majority of the people when I say that that impression was created, righteously, created that the majority would prevail when the vote was taken. I believe my hon. friend the leader of the House is almost the father of the plebiscite idea, because he moved a resolution in 1889 in the House of Commons on the subject and supported that resolution in a speech, and I will read some extracts from that speech which show that my hon. friend clearly meant at that time that the view of the majority should prevail. The hon. gentleman said:

> I quite admit that on the great majority of public questions it is desirable that Parliament itself should assume the responsibility of legislation; but Parliament has already pronounced its opinion that prohibition legislation is desirable, but it has said that in its opinion public opinion is not prepared for it. That may be the opinion of some honourable members of this House; but it is possible to settle that question, and to ascertain what public opinion is beyond all controversy by taking a vote of all those qualified to vote at an ordinary election.

The hon. gentleman said it was possible to take a vote of the people on the question which would settle beyond controversy what public opinion was. Now that vote has been taken. Take my hon. friend's view of the result of that vote and the importance to be attached to it, and I ask, is that a settlement beyond controversy? Does he not controvert the result himself? He controverts the result by his speech on the question in this House.

Hon Mr. MILLS—It is beyond controversy now. When my hon. friend says it is settled beyond controversy, I say yes, because over 690,000 people refused to vote.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend is inaccurate in his figures, for he counts all the names on lists made three or four years before, many of whom are dead.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend think there are no living people yet on the list?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, but there are not 690,000 living people. He counts the dead and the absent on old voters' lists in order to make it appear that the majority of the people declined to vote on this question. My hon. friend was not so sensitive about the constitutional soundness of the position that a majority of votes cast should rule when it affected his own right to sit in the government of Canada. A very large number of people refused to vote on that occasion, and a very large number of people voted against my hon. friend and his party, and only about twenty-eight per cent of the whole electoral list voted in favour of my hon. friend and his colleagues, and yet my hon. friend is so well satisfied with the result that he believes they have the right to govern the Dominion. I have not finished reading the extract. He continues:

> If it is found ready to sustain prohibition legislation, we shall be prepared to legislate in accordance therewith.

He pointed out that what was meant by a plebiscite was something which would settle the matter beyond controversy, it was to be settled with mathematical accuracy. My hon. friend could have meant nothing else and the conclusion he now draws does not point to a settlement of the controversy. There is a good deal of controversy in the statement made by my hon. friend to-day that a minority should rule Canada—that 21 per cent of the voters on the lists should rule Canada, and when my hon. friend pointed to a plebiscite as being a means to settle the question and find the condition of public opinion without controversy, he never meant that the minority should rule. In 1887 the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was addressed by the temperance people of Charlottetown before his candidature and asked to state his views on prohibition, and he answered by a letter which was published, a part of which I shall now read to the House. It is as follows:—

> In reply I beg to say that some weeks ago at a public meeting in the market hall I expressed myself as ready and willing to vote for prohibition whenever I was satisfied a majority of the electors desired it, and I went further to say that in my opinion the proper and best course to test the public opinion of the Dominion would be by a plebiscite on prohibition.

The hon. gentleman was distinct in saying that the majority of the people should rule in that matter, and he was prepared to carry out what the majority of the people would indicate if a vote was taken by way of a plebiscite, but Sir Louis Davies, like the hon. leader of this House, is now in the government and he finds there is a great deal of ground for controversy. I dare he will find a great many various meanings attached to the word "majority." I have no doubt whatever—in fact I know that the Hon. Sir Louis Davies's letter, was understood andaccepted by the temperance people as unequivocally promising that he would vote for submitting the question to a plebiscite, and would be guided by the views of the majority as expressed when the vote was taken.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman, supposing as a result of the plebiscite there had been only four or five thousand votes in favour of prohibition and three or four thousand against it, does my hon. friend say that the vote of the majority should lead to legislation?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend is putting a very extreme case but the absurdity is no greater applied to one side than to the other.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has not answered my question.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have answered that it would be absurd with so small a vote as that, but my contention is that the vote was not small—that the vote was 23 per cent of the actual strength on the voters' list compared with 28 per cent which the hon. gentlemen received when they appealed to the country for support at a political election, and hon. gentlemen know very well that in a political election, where personality comes in and powerful political organizations are at work, it is very easy to bring out the vote compared with a vote on a bare abstract principle. We know very well that the whole influence of the government—at least in one province—there were provinces where it was not safe to exert it—was thrown in order to secure a large vote against prohibition in the interests of the government, and I have not the slightest doubt that the affirmative vote, large as it is, 278,000, of men who went out purely to vote for a principle without supporting any political platform or personality of candidates—and in many cases without the spur of opposition—would have been larger had Govertment influence not been exerted. Hon. gentlemen know how powerful the spur of opposition is, and I have no doubt in Prince Edward Island if the opponents of the measure had only gone to the meetings and opposed the temperance people, the affirmative vote would have been doubled. It was the apathy and indifference which is sure to arise out of the fact of their being no opposition, that made the vote as small as it was, although it was a respectable vote in Prince Edward Island. The opponents of prohibition were wise in their generation in not holding meetings and showing their hand in Prince Edward Island, for if they had the result would have been doubly as favourable to prohibition as it proved to be. I have no hesitation in saying that the government have performed a part in regard to this matter of prohibition that is very far from creditable to them as a government and to Canada as a portion of the Empire. I think hon. gentlemen will search in vain for an instance in which the people of any country have been trifled with to the extent that the temperance people of Canada, among the very best people of the country, have been trifled with in regard to this question of prohibition. An election was called, the advocates of prohibition did not ask, as I said before, for a vote on this question. The government, for their own purposes took this course to dodge the question, but they endeavoured to create an impression that having submitted the question in this form they were more favourable to the principle of prohibition than there opponents were, and in that way they received a very large vote that they would not otherwise have received in the elections. When the object was gained, of getting the votes of the Conservatives who believed in prohibition, we began to see a shying back on the question of prohibition, and at times it began to look as if we would not have the plebiscite itself. A year ago it looked as if the hon. gentlemen opposite would be glad to see the question shelved. I could see at the time a desire that some catastrophe would occur in order that they might shirk the taking of the plebiscite, a hope that something might turn up to get them out of the difficulty in which they were placed. They put the question before the people and members of the administration went from town to town in the province of Quebec and made speeches in which they condemned the whole question of submitting it it to a plebiscite. Mr. Geoffrion said the government had, in a moment of weakness, promised a plebiscite, but they would not give prohibition. Mr. Geoffrion made the statement (I have never heard it questioned) that the government had actually made up their minds at that time that no matter what the vote was there would be no prohibition. Their object was to keep the vote as low as possible in order that they might escape from the promise they had made. We have the spectacle of the people of this country being put to a vast amount of trouble, a very considerable amount of public and private expense incurred, people called away from their employment at a busy time of the year and all this was done while it had been already practically determined that that vote should be treated with the utmost contempt.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no justification for that statement.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—How can we otherwise interpret the speech of Mr. Geoffrion at Beauhornois? He said there, before a ballot had been cast, that the temperance people would get their plebiscite but they would not get prohibition. If the matter had not been settled, why should Mr. Geoffrion make that statement? There was a time when hon. gentlemen opposite were professed economists, but that was some considerable time ago, and we do not hear anything about it now, but the expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars on the plebiscite vote for a purpose that had no utility, in their own estimation before the vote was taken, and which they have treated with the greatest contempt since——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think there was a commission on one occasion that cost something.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is always the way with my hon. friend. When my hon. friend finds that he has done something very foolish and very wrong, and which he cannot possibly defend, he quotes somebody who has done something bad at some other time, just as if the mistake of another government is going to condone the offence of his own government on the present occasion. I never was one of those who thought it was a useful course to appoint a commission, but there was this much to be said in its favour: it was an effort to get information, and certainly if you look at the voluminous character of the report, there ought to be information there. It certainly cost the country a great deal, but if it was ten times as foolish and bad as it was, it affords no palliation whatever for the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite in resorting to that dodge of the plebiscite which they never believed in, which they evidently never intended to carry out to an issue, no matter what the vote was, and which they now treat with the utmost contempt. After nearly 300,000 people recorded their votes in favour of prohibition, the hon. gentlemen say that expression of opinion is not strong enough, and they are not going to do anything. A good deal of exultation has been expressed in government circles over the Imperial penny postage policy. They have not been at all slow in claiming that they have accomplished it for the whole empire, though they do not say so in the speech from the Throne. I am glad of everything that tends to bring the different members of the empire closer together, but when anything is done in that direction it should be done wisely and carefully, and in such manner as will cost the people of this country as little as possible in the matter of self respect as well as in dollars and cents. I have no hesitation in saying that in self-respect Canada has lost a good deal in this postal matter. The proclamation "I, William Mulock" had to be withdrawn in a day or two, and the expedients he had to resort to cover up that bungle, all came under the eye and observation of the statesmen of the empire and of the other colonies, and it is not at all creditable to Canada that such a bungle as that should have been made. Then the stamp itself, I do not think is of such a character that we should go into exultation over it. A good story is told, and it is an actual occurrence, that in the office in Charlottetown a man came up and inquired for a postage stamp which he wanted to put on an English letter, and he was handed the new stamp. He looked at it for a moment and said "I did not ask for a lobster label; I want a postage stamp." He actually mistook the red spots indicating the parts of the Empire for the claws of a lobster. Whatever position we occupy now with regard to penny postage and domestic postage rates throughout the Dominion of Canada, the government have not got it for us by any statesmanship of their own, they drifted into it. It was not apparent at all at the first suggestion of the question that it was the intention of this government to adopt the two-cent rate for Canada, Indeed, their actions disclose their intention up to the last moment of following a different course, and at the last moment they adopted a two cent rate of postage all over the Dominion of Canada. While it is a very nice thing to be able to send letters cheaply, as we are able to do now, we must remember that the Post Office Department has been a losing department up to this time. I believe the Postmaster General claims that he has made it nearer self-sustaining now than it was under the former administration. We will wait until we see all about that. I find it safe in dealing with these gentlemen not to take things on trust, as in the case of the settlers' effects, and the reference to the exodus. It is well to await results before we come to conclusions about the great reforms the Postmaster General claims he has affected. We know the adoption of the two-cent rate for Canada will effect a very serious diminution in the receipts of the Post Office Department, and that will have to be made up by a tax in in some other direction. We have now a tax on newspapers. The poor man has to pay on his newspaper for what the merchant saves in his correspondence. A merchant may save $50 or $100 a year in the reduced rate of postage and that will be divided over the farmers in the enhanced cost of newspapers and other things taxed to make up this deficit. I am not at all satisfied that it is a wise movement or that any great reform has been effected in the management of the Post Office Department. The advisers of His Excellency the Governor General have put into his mouth the following words :

> Much information has been obtained since you last met relative to the extent and value of the deposits of gold and valuable minerals in the Yukon and other parts of Canada.

I must say I was very much pleased, indeed, when I saw this paragraph. I was delighted to know that hon. gentlemen opposite had got much information on the Yukon country, for my recollection of these gentlemen and their position before parliament a year ago, made me believe they needed information with regard to that country. There was almost worse than Egyptian darkness in the government circles when they introduced the Teslin Lake Railway Bill. We remember the speech made by a distinguished member of the cabinet on its introduction in the House of Commons, and we remember during the discussions on that bill the gentlemen in the government, although they claimed to know things they could not tell us, yet as far as they were able to communicate their information, they knew absolutely nothing, and it turned out we had to take their statements exactly as they gave them to us, that even the information that had been given to them through their own officials, and which had reached them months before, they had not made the acquaintance of until after they had undertaken to deal with the question in parliament. Mr. Ogilvie's report they scarcely knew anything about until it was brought to their attention in this House. I am delighted to find that hon. gentlemen opposite have received, as they say themselves, much information regarding the Yukon country, and I hope the result of this enlightenment will be to give us better legislation with regard to that country than were offered to this House during the last session of parliament. I was reminded when I read this statement about the flood of information that had come in upon them, of a story I read in one of Smollet's novels. His Majesty, the King of England, had been greatly disturbed by disquieting rumours which had come to him from America. The French were said to be in full march from Cape Breton to Grand Pré, a most alarming state of things indeed, and the King's mind was greatly disturbed. He communicated the information to his Prime Minister, the Earl of Bute, who went forthwith to find what light he could gain about this alarming information. He met a gentleman very soon after, and to him he mentioned the disquieting information that the King had received. His friend at once replied : "Tut, tut ! there is nothing in that. Cape Breton is an island, and the French could not march from there at this time of the year." "Is Cape Breton an island ?" said the Premier. "I must go and tell His Majesty at once. He will be delighted to hear it." I hope part of the information that these hon. gentlemen have received is that Wrangel is on an island and is part of the United States. They seemed to be last year under the impression that the mouth of the Stikine River was British territory and that Wrangel was under the control of this country. I hope and trust that a part of this great light that has come upon the government in regard to the Yukon country will deal with the geography of the country, so that hon. gentlemen opposite will be a little better informed on the subject than they were last year.

My hon. friend the leader of the House has dealt very extensively with the question of the redistribution of seats, a bill in relation to which has been promised to us in the speech. My hon. friend, like the mover of the Address, seemed to be very nervous and uneasy less anybody should think that anything like a gerrymander was contemplated by the government. Call it by some other name, he says ; we do not want you to dub our bill a gerrymanner at the outset. It reminded me of the old phrase about orthodoxy and heterodoxy ; orthodoxy is my doxy and heterodoxy is another man's doxy." If the bill were presented by a Tory government it would be a gerrymander; but the same measure, or one of the same character, if submitted to parliament by the Liberal administration, is a great effort of statesmanship and must not be called a gerrymander; it is a redistribution of seats. That is, I think, about the extent of the uneasiness of the hon. gentlemen. My hon. friend the leader of the House only indicated one point of the proposed bill, and that was that county boundaries should not be interfered with. He went on and drew upon views expressed by Sir John Macdonald in 1872, that it was not desirable to break up existing relationships in any geographical tract of a country known hitherto, it may be, as a county: that the people become associated in municipal, agricultural and educational affairs, and a great many other things and that the breaking up of these relations was undesirable, and the hon. gentleman amplified how it was undesirable, and I agree with agood deal of what he said. There is no question there is a great deal of force and truth in that, but myhon. friend went on to say that the present bill was intended to be a repeal of the gerrymander. I suppose he meant the redistribution of 1882 in the province of Ontario. He seemed to forget that he was urging an argument, and a very strong argument, against the bill. If the bill were passed on the line that is now indicated, that would throw back the constituencies of Ontario to the boundaries which existed in 1881, before the passage of the Act in 1882. If he were to do that it would be twenty years from the time of that change until the new change would be brought about, and all these conditions that the hon. gentleman has described have grown up within those boundaries since that time almost as strongly as they had in the old county boundaries before the redistribution of 1882, and there will be just as much disturbance in breaking up the boundaries that were established at that time. Twenty years is a great deal in the life of a county or constituency. Changes have taken place, other institutions have been moulded, to conform with the division that was made in 1882, and any Act you pass that will deal in a very severe manner with existing bound aries will have all the evils attached to it that attached to the original Act, whether it was good or bad.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are only attached for electoral purposes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend is ignoring altogether the argument of the hon. gentleman beside him.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He said that within political boundary would grow affiliations of another character, municipal and educational and so on. Men would come together and work together, and the breaking up of these associations and the change of these boundaries would disturb the affiliations. There will be a severe disturbance if the hon. gentlemen make radical changes now. I am not going to defend the Redistribution Act of 1882. I know nothing about it. I have heard it condemned by Liberals and in the Liberal press, and have heard equally strong condemnaions of the gerrymander by the governmentt of Sir Oliver Mowat in Ontario. I have been told that as far as the redistribution in Ontario for provincial purposes is concerned, they did not even hestitate to cut townships in two to carry out their objects, and there never was known to be a township cut in two by Sir John Macdonald. I am not discussing the question whether one party was worse than another: very likely there have been wrongs done on both sides, but I have no hestitation in saying that the argument addressed by my hon. friend to this house that the disturbing of boundaries which had existed for a long time and in connection with which affiliations of different characters have been formed, is attended with very great evils, and that the very argument he has used as against the original disturbance will apply with equal force against a new disturbance at the present moment, and I will go further and say that the principle laid down by the hon. gentleman that county boundaries must be adhered to is not a sound principle. I know our own position in the province of Prince Edward Island. We under the last census lost one of our members, and had only five members to return. Previously we returned two members for each of our three counties, but under the census of 1891 we lost one member. Our metropolitan county is just entitled to two members out of the five, and in the outlying counties there was a difference in population: one had 27,000 and the other 34,000, speaking roughly. That was the position of the outlying counties. Three members had to be returned in these two counties, and it was impossible that it could be done by following county boundaries without a manifest unfairness as far as the distribution was concerned. In the distribution of 1892, our province was divided into five ridings, beginning at one end and cutting it into five almost equal ridings. There is not a difference of 2,000 in the population of the ridings, every one of these ridings was a close battle ground between the parties at the general election of 1896, there was no large majority to spare in any of them; 300 odd was the largest majority in any of these large constituencies, having a voting strength of over 5,000 each, and that showed most conclusively that the redistribution was made on the fairest possible lines, because every one of the five constituencies became a hard and hot battle ground between both political parties. If my hon. friend has given us a correct interpretation of his bill—and we are bound to accept his statement—county boundaries is to be the prevailing consideration, and you will have to break up the present fair distribution in Prince Edward Island, and give one of those outlying counties one member while the other will have two, in place of dividing on the fair lines contemplated by the British North America Act. It is quite true, as my hon. friend has said, that the British North America Act does not provide as an enactment that the principle of representation by population shall prevail as between the different constituencies within a province. My hon. friend was quite right when he said that. It provides that the principle of representation by population should prevail as between the different provinces. The conference that brought about confederation was interested in working the problem as between the different provinces, leaving to the Parliament of Canada and the representatives in parliament of the different provinces to provide for an even and fair distribution of parliamentary seats within each province. But although it may not be stipulated in the British North America Act, the very fact that representation by population was provided as between the provinces, even although it was not made to extend by any enactment whatever to the constituencies that were in the country, clearly indicated that it ought to govern and was expected to govern with regard to the different constituencies in the country, and I have no hesitation in saying, from what I know of some of the other provinces, the neighbouring province of New Brunswick for instance, that it is impossible that they can maintain county boundaries and recognize that principle. I know they have been maintained up to the present time, but I know very well it is not right, and some time or another justice will have to be done. Take the county of Albert with a population of 7,000, a little agricultural county without population of any consequence; then the adjoining county of Westmorland, containing several towns and a population of 40,000. The county of Albert has a member in the House of Commons as well as Westmorland, and under the proposed system that would be absolutely perpetuated, because there are counties enough in New Brunswick to absorb the representation, without giving any one county except St. John two members: and therefore the little county of Albert would have to continue under this principle with one member, and the great county of Westmorland will increase much faster with its railway facilities than the other county, and even now it has six times the population of Albert, yet it can have only one member as against one member in the smaller county. Under this principle which has been announced by the leader of the House, you will still have to acknowledge county boundaries, and the most insignificant county may have as full representation as the largest county. The principle announced is not a sound one, and it is not one that will stand 20th century discussion at all, and I am sure before the bill is passed that hon. gentlemen will think that it is not a very good principle to ask parliament to agree to.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I cannot allow the debate on the Address to close without expressing my views upon the various questions that are brought down. I must first unite with others in extending a welcome to the Earl of Minto, who has been appointed as successor to Lord Aberdeen in the distinguished office of Governor General of Canada, a position that is becoming more and more important every year, calling for the appointment of such men as Lord Minto to act as the constitutional link between Her Majesty the Queen and the government of Canada. May that chain that has been wrought so skilfully and that has done so much good service in preserving the constitutional liberty of the people of Canada never be broken. Hon. gentlemen I come from a distant part of the country, where the population is not so consolidated as it is down in the East, where we have not the same means of communication and have not the same opportunity of expressing our views upon the great public questions which affect us materially, and therefore it has been my habit since I have had a seat in this chamber, always to speak on the Address, where you have great liberty and license in discussion so far as the subject will permit. I may say this House has suffered during the last year from deaths rather more than usual, and we have had to welcome several new senators to take seats in this House. I am very glad, indeed, that the government did not put into practice the views that some members of the Liberal party have expressed, with reference to the total abolition of the Senate, and letting it die out gradually by refusing to make any further appointments. This augurs very well as to what the idea of the government may be as to this House. I desire expressly to welcome to this chamber a life long friend and neighbour of mine in the town from which I come, Cobourg. I refer to the Hon. Senator Kerr, who has been honoured by the government with a seat in this House. He has been a good neighbour, a kind friend, an upright, honest man, and a resident of Cobourg from his youth to the present day. To that extent I think the House is greatly benefited by having him appointed here by the government. We are called upon to discuss the policy of the government as enunciated in the speech from the Throne. This is the fourth session which has been held under this government, and they have now had that much time to decide what policy they propose to pursue, and how far they are going to carry out the pledges that they made to the country during eighteen or nineteen years of opposition. The speech as it has been prepared is put before us. The stereotyped expression generally used in criticizing the speech, is that it is strongest in what it does not contain, or written to conceal thought rather than express it. The first thing is that we enjoy a very large degree of prosperity. I am very glad indeed that the government is able to put that in the Address. But the question of prosperity is comparative. To some people and in some localities the country may seem very prosperous; in other localities and to other classes the country may not seem so prosperous. So it all depends on how you feel and how you are individually prospering. My arguments have always been that under protection the distribution of wealth goes on unevenly, and the system of collecting wealth for a few has been the result of a protective policy, no matter what country it may be. That is a question in which also I have the warm support of the liberal party. I am only speaking of what they argued for before the country during the time they were in opposition. At a later period I will discuss as to how far they have put into operation the views they held and the promises they made to the people. So far as the province of Manitoba is concerned, I think it is always a matter of very great interest to the people of Canada to know how far we have prospered. Unfortunately, I am sorry to say, last year was not as good a year as the public were led to believe, or we ourselves anticipated it would be. A hot wave passed over our province in the beginning of July, and in some localities produced very disastrous results. You must understand that in Manitoba we have different localities. Around the city of Winnipeg the bottom lands are only 700 feet above the level of the sea When you go west, where I reside, 200 miles west of Winnipeg we are 1,000 feet higher, and they are two different classes of soil, and the higher lands suffered to a considerable extent in consequence of the drought I speak of, while the lower lands, which promised a very large crop, did not suffer from the drought and had more moisture than we had, but they suffered from severe rain in the fall of the year during harvest to such an extent that a great deal of the wheat, was dampened and losses were sustained by the farmers in consequence of damp wheat which was not exportable, and had to be sacrified at a low price and in some cases was really unmarketable. Damp wheat is not always an evil with us, because it is very good feed for stock, and farmers can turn it to profitable account in that way if they have the stock on hand to do it, but in Manitoba the tendency is to cultivate the land beyond its capacity to farm with safety and economy, and therefore they are not in a condition to meet such a difficulty when it presents itself. For that reason I do not coincide exactly with the remarks made in the Address so far as the prosperity of Manitoba is concerned? Our merchants are suffering from the very causes I have spoken of. Our eastern creditors here, I have no doubt, suffer from the same causes—that is those who sell us machinery and all that we require for our operations during the year. I always think it is a great deal better that we should speak plainly and not pretend that facts exist where they do not exist. That there are evidences of a very large volume of trade is unquestionable, but that is the result of the development of the country. It is the northern half of this North American continent, and it is only by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the railway construction that has been going on for several years past, that the vast undeveloped regions of Canada have been opened up, and it was the good luck of the Liberal party to come into power just as the consummation of all these efforts was being found a success. We have added to our commercial life the development of the Klondike, which, as hon. gentlemen know, has attracted world wide notoriety, and brought thousands of adventurers and people to the country. I may say it was a boom which resulted from the discoveries of precious metals. The hon. Secretary of State, in his speech on the Yukon Bill last year, said there would be a population of 200,000, but it has fallen far short of that. There were exaggerations put forward at that time in order to get the bill through. There has been a great deal of development from that country, but we distinguish between permanent and boom development, We are also thankful indeed to see that the mines of the Rocky Mountains, where development has been going on for some time by the aid of different United States railways to the south, and now has been further stimulated by the building of the Crow's Nest Pass are turning out successfully. Our dairy commissioner's efforts have borne good fruit in many ways, so that the country has undergone great development during the past year or two. There have been two or three efforts at immigration, such as the bringing in of the Doukhobors and Galicians in very large numbers during the past year. That adds to the demands of commerce, trade and transportation. The people in the west fear the emigration to such a large extent of a foreign element which it will take generations to assimilate and who are of a different class. I would hold out a warning voice in that respect. But all these things, one after another have contributed to the increase of the general prosperity as shown through the blue books of the government upon which the government have felt justified in putting that statement into the speech. But we have to judge by results. Those who come into the country are well supplied with means, and everything else of that kind. After they have settled down, and have to depend upon their physical power and the resources that present themselves to their individual efforts for their individual support, then comes the test as to how far the country is prosperous when those conditions prevail. In the west of course we are situated in an inland country and we have difficulties to overcome that do not present themselves elsewhere. We have transportation rates, and we have a very heavy taxation through the protective tariff that is put upon the country which draws the money out too rapidly. Those are questions I will deal with when I come to discuss the matter later. Speaking of the total cessation of the exodus of the population which has already been referred to by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, it is only by the census that we can tell exactly how the emigration has been during the past ten years. It would be a very sorry account indeed if the next ten years do not show something better than the past ten years. The past decade were a disappointment to the whole country in regard to the increase of population. I hope when the census of 1901 is taken that the remark which is put herein the Speech from the Throne will be borne out by the facts. A reference is made to the negotiations which were set on foot during the recess with regard to a treaty with the United States. That has been a matter of considerable controversy for a great many years past. The United States have been opposed, as a general rule, to the negotiation of treaties Very few treaties have been in past years negotiated. President McKinley of the United States did formulate a series of reciprocity treaties, under a former administration, by which he hoped to capture the markets of foreign countries with their manufactures and products on a one-sided scale, but I think the treaties he then caused to be put on the statute-book came to nothing. The South American Republics and other nations would not treat on that basis ; they claimed that there had to be an equality of treatment in order to secure permanence of any treaties they made with other countries with which they desired to trade. These countries found that if they negotiated a treaty with the United States they would be repelling Great Britain, who had always been a good customer for their raw materials and had given them good manufactures in return, and they were not going to forego their commerce with Great Britain for any close treaty with the United States. It is a difficult thing to negotiate a treaty with the United States, where Canada is concerned. Where Great Britain is concerned it is not so difficult. The people of the United States are 70,000,000 and the British islands occupy a powerful position in the world both commercial and fiscal and every other way ; therefore, a treaty with any other country and a treaty with Canada are different things. We are situated beside each other with a boundary 4,000 miles long between us. We speak the same language, produce the same articles, without any difference, and there is a rivalry between the people on the two sides of the boundary, which keeps up a selfish agitation that no Canadian shall be allowed to work in the United States or sell in the United States or compete with the people of the United States. That has been the policy which has been enforced. Unfortunately the democracy of the United States has arrived at that condition that the leaders of the people have always legislated with an eye on their own circumstances. They want to know how it will affect them. They do not consider the interests of the country so much as how to retain their individual positions. Therefore, it is a matter of difficulty negotiating a treaty with our neighbours. They call us thrifty, we call them sharp, we have, therefore, never got very far. I do not think myself that there is any use in trying to get a reciprocity treaty that is of any particular value, and we can do very well without one. So far as the settlement of questions that the government had to deal with is concerned, it has been a failure. In fact it appeared to me to be a battle of protectionists rather than a treaty of friendship that was being moulded. What I am personally anxious about, in accordance with the question I put on the paper this afternoon, is whether or not this treaty is going to tie us up in carrying out any domestic policy that we may have with regard to our own affairs and with regard to our commercial relations with Great Britain. I have heard it stated that the government do not want to make any move because this treaty is in view, because it may have an injurious effect on the people of the United States and that the treaty will fail. I do not think that we should put ourselves in that position. We are perfectly independent of the United States. We can get on very well without a treaty, as we have for a great number of years, and it is not wise for us to forego any advantages we possess as Canadians until the people of the United States are in a position to be more amenable to what is fair and just as between two neighbours. For that reason I think it is a pity that the treaty was not closed up when Lord Herschell ceased to be the chairman of the commission by his unfortunate death. This treaty might be kept on the boards for one or two years, so long as it does not affect our national arrangements with other countries or with Great Britain itself, the fact of it being kept open is perhaps a good thing. The door is always open then to friendly negotiations ; but we should not legislate with a view that our action might have some effect on this treaty. We should be perfectly free to enter into a free trade arrangement with Great Britain—more than that, we should let the people of the United States know that we intend to have free trade with Great Britain and the freest intercourse with all parts of the British Empire before we ask them to make another treaty. That is what I believe the people of Canada are desirous of accomplishing—the freest commercial relations possible with all parts of the British Empire, irrespective of what other nations may think or say. We do not want to negotiate a treaty and hold our peace, and then have the United States Government say, your policy was so and so when you negotiated this treaty ; now that you have secured this treaty you are going to make Canada a back door by which our policy may be legislated out of existence. We do not want to do anything of the kind, we want to let the United States know fairly and squarely that we are part and parcel of the British Empire; that we intend to have the freest commercial intercourse with all parts of the British Empire and that any treaty we make with the United States must be subject to these conditions. I think if that position is taken by the government it may interfere with the Reciprocity Treaty, but if the government is prepared to purchase reciprocity with the United States at the sacrifice of these conditions they would be taking a most undignified position—a most disastrous step, so far as the maintenance and the well being of our commercial relations with our best customer and our independence on this continent is concerned. That is the view I hold with regard to this treaty. There is no one more anxious to see the most friendly relations established with the people of the United States than I am. There should not be one solitary difference of opinion between us. There should not be one solitary thread of protection on either side of the great boundary or anything to interfere with the freest intercourse, but it must be that freedom of intercourse that enables us to pursue the same free intercourse with other parts of the world, and especially with our fellow subjects in the British Empire. I will not refer to the question about the disputed boundary between the Dominion and Alaska. It is very unfortunate that we occupy the position that the long strip of land running down the coast should belong to the United States and that there should be any doubt as to what is Canadian territory and what is United States territory. It is an unfortunate position, but it is a question which must be settled by the governments. The United States settlers go in there and the Canadian settlers go in there, having no line to guide them and are apt, of course, to say this is United States territory or this is Canadian territory, just as their individual desires, hopes or humours may lead them. I think that the delineation of that boundary should be taken in hand at once if a friendly feeling is to be maintained, and prevent jars of any description. The Senate had a commission last year to inquire into the Yukon Bill. It distributed a very large amount of information through that channel by the various experienced men who came before it and gave us an account of what they knew about that country, and the possibilities of developing it, &c. The Lynn Canal is an arm of the sea which runs into the interior of the country, and it is the head of that canal that is the point in dispute. We claim that the head of the canal runs into Canadian territory. If there was any generosity or liberality on the part of the United States people they would say the country behind the Lynn Canal is all Canadian territory, whatever wealth is developed there comes out through this port naturally, but they say; "We will not give you access or ingress through it except subject to our laws and on such conditions as we impose from time to time." We are made subject to the officials of the United States which may be made very offensive indeed if they choose to do so. The fact that immediately behind that barrier the whole territory is Canadian territory, that all the wealth there is in Canadian territory, and there is just this one little port through which it has to pass—if the United States would say, we recognize that position; we will make friendly arrangement that miners of both countries shall have free access and be on the same terms in the development of that country and in consideration of that we will give you a seaport at the head of the Lynn Canal through which you can conduct your own trade. If the people of the United States were approached in that way, I think that would be the outcome of it. I cannot see any other reason, except the most selfish reason, in that—selfish for a small community which makes trouble between two nations and prevents a friendly negotiation. That is the way in which I think this question should be settled and in which this question might be settled. We have, of course, within our own hands, a better remedy than that and that is to open up the whole of that gold bearing region by a railway from Edmonton, which is the proper course to pursue, and build across the continent on the old government line which found an outlet at Port Simpson. That gives us an ocean port on the southern part of the territory and we could develop the whole region by railway communication. We have that alternative, but in the meantime until we can make arrangements for the construction of a line of that kind we have to depend on the navigation which, I am happy to say, has turned out in a very satisfactory way indeed, that is, compared with the Stikine and other routes. I observed that a steamer went from Seattle to Skagway and back again in six days, that is three days going up and three coming back, to an open port all the year round. Nothing could be better than that. It touches at Vancouver, so that Canada is not obstructed in that trade. Moreover, we have our own steamers, we have the same right to go to Skagway as the steamers from Seattle; the only thing we have not got are coasting rights. But the fact that we can send a vessel to Skagway and return in six days shows the feasibility of that place as a port of entry and the simplicity of the navigation in the depth of winter. Compare that with forcing our trade up the rapid Stikine River for 150 miles, and then over 200 miles of railway to Teslin Lake, and it is obvious that there cannot be two opinions in the country as to the advisability of taking the shorter and better route. We have the very best evidence of the friends of the Liberal Government themselves as to the truth of what I am saying—that is Mr. Wade, who was one of the government officials who went to the Yukon to assist Major Walsh in the government of the country, in a lecture before Toronto University he referred to the ease with which communication could now be had. He said a few hours railway travel now over the White Pass will land you on the bosom of a series of beautiful lakes which will, through the River Yukon, convey you to your destination without trouble, without hardship, and without adventure. These are Mr. Wade's own words in a lecture to the people of Canada on the facilities of that route and the capabilities of the country. Can you have a better justification than out of the mouths of members of the Liberal party themselves as to the action of the Senate on the Yukon Bill. Then we have another statement made by a former colleague, the Hon. Mr. Martin, Attorney General of the province of British Columbia. What does Mr. Martin say with regard to that? He said: "Never was there such a blunder; never was such an infernal piece of business as the attempt to force Canadian trade and develop connections with the Klondike region over the Teslin Lake and the Stikine River." There are two sentences out of the mouths of the government's own supporters—out of the mouths of the government's own friends. And Col. Domville is another, a supporter of the present government. I forget exactly what he said, but he spoke very much in the same strain. He says he will not support it again. I am satisfied that any one who takes an unprejudiced view of the question in the commercial interests of the country in the interests of the transportation of the country will never dream of putting the Stikine route against the route by the way of Lynn Canal and Skagway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You would not favour the Edmonton route as against that?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Certainly. Put me on a railway coach that will take me to my destination and I am satisfied. I do not want to cross the continent and then be transported on an ocean steamer and then on a railway and then on a steamer, when I can reach my destination by railway without change and in comfort.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So that my hon. friend in advocating this route by Skagway and Dyea is advocating a route which he thinks will not compete with his pet scheme?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, I do not think it would for eastern commerce, for commerce from the cities of Montreal, Toronto and eastern Canada, and the commerce of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. I am quite certain the cheapest means of communication and the largest amount of trade that will be developed for the benefit of Canada will be by a railway via Edmonton. If you are going to construct railways in that country, and I would strongly advocate it, instead of giving away lands as you proposed last year to private parties, giving away such lands as you describe in the Speech from the Throne which we are now discussing:

> Much information has been obtained since you last met relative to the extent and value of the deposits of gold and valuable minerals in the Yukon and other parts of Canada.

Who was it saved those valuable minerals as an asset for the people of Canada? It was the Senate. Those assets are still available, and they are not misplaced and improperly distributed for the benefit of a few private individuals, in the same way the Crow's Nest Pass, as I see it stated, was "the locking up of those coal lands is the most damnable piece of legislation ever perpetrated in Canada."

Those are the words uttered by the provincial secretary of the province of British Columbia which is now one of the provincial Liberal Governments of Canada. Those are the utterances of the Attorney General and the provincial secretary of the province of British Columbia. That kind of legislation is going on. It has been permitted and is advocated by this government. I say it is a species of legislation which is only boom legislation. It is booming the resources of Canada at the expense of the people in order that large profits may be made by private individuals, while the assets of the country are sacrificed. The Hon. Mr. Coffin said in regard to Crow's Nest Pass that the money and lands given away to private parties were sufficient to build fifteen such railways. And so it is with the Atlin Lake District; they are sufficient to build half a dozen railroads from Edmonton right into the Yukon. I say, utilize those assets, form a company and farm those mines for half the output so that the country will be enriched by them to enable the government to develop its resources fully. The policy of the government is a boom policy, giving away the gold bearing lands to private individuals for private profit and creating a boom in the country from which there is bound to be a reaction. A government should never encourage much less create a boom. I might just say this with regard to the hon. Minister of the Interior, who is very largely responsible, I have no doubt, for the promotion and development of that western country on these lines. He is a young man who settled in Brandon when Brandon was in its infancy, when it was first boomed into life by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It went ahead at a very great rate, and the population of 3,000 settled there in a very short time. It is one of the nicest towns in Manitoba, and if it had been carefully managed on sound financial lines it would not be in the difficulty it is to-day. But I am sorry to say that the city of Brandon has got into financial trouble, and has become practically bankrupt. The banks have refused to honour their cheques, and the corporation has applied to the provincial legislature to guarantee their bonds for fifty years for $529,000. The municipalities forming part of that judicial district wanted a court-house, and they have paid into the city of Brandon, the last fourteen years, $100,000, which should have gone to pay for this court house, but the court-house has not been paid for, the city is bankrupt, and there is a liability standing against it of $529,000, I refer to this, because the Minister of the Interior was living in Brandon, and was one of its public men. He was there to help to manage the affairs of the city in a proper manner. He was Attorney General of Manitoba and responsible that sound laws should be on the statute-book to prevent such an occurrance as that which brings misfortune to Brandon and to other parts of the country which have to depend on their credit to maintain a sound financial position. It is in consequence of the very system he is seeking to perpetuate and place on the people of Canada to-day what you call a species of boom—booming the thing along, instead of proceeding at a steady pace, building only in proportion to the natural wants and conditions essential to its own prosperity. But instead of that it is by a perpetual boom until there is bound to come a reaction and a time when the boom must end. So it is with Canada. The same thing is going on in Canada, or attempted to be foisted on Canada. In the same way we are to be boomed up, borrowing more money, giving away the assets of the country, and then after everything is done people will have to sit down and figure out how they are going to live on the resources that remain, and there comes a crash. That is the effect of a bad policy, and it is to resist that policy I say that every man who has the interest and welfare of the country at heart should post himself. And when questions come up that this government and parliament have to deal with, I hope that we will take a retrograde step and alter our legislation to such an extent that we will not incur an increased indebtedness such as we see going on for a great many years and at a great rate since the present government has come into power. The present government when in opposition denounced the increased debt and everything that they are themselves now doing, imitating the policy they denounced in their predecessors, so far as they attempted it. The hon. leader of the government in this House has to apologize to the Senate for not moving at a faster rate than what he said, and what his government said, and what his friends when in opposition said, they were going to move at. Only put us on the treasury benches, we will show you how we will alter things how we will increase the revenue, and divert the taxation of the people into the treasury. Are they doing so? They are increasing the revenue certainly, but they are maintaining a protective tariff as high as that of the late Conservative government, there has been no reduction in any shape or form whatever. I will just give you the figures to show you to what extent they have made that reduction. I have before me the Trade and Commerce Report which any hon. gentleman can see, for the six months ending the 31st December last. This is the result:

For the six months ending 31st December, 1897.

Dutiable imports	$34,350,025
Duty collected	10,146,267

Tariff taxation, 29½ per cent.

For the six months ending 31st December, 1898.

Dutiable imports	$43,524,049
Duty collected	12,520,677

Tariff taxation, 28¾ per cent.

For the six months ending 31st December, 1897.

Dutiable and free imports added	$59,968,812
Duty collected	10,146,267

Tariff taxation, 17 per cent.

For the six months ending 31st December, 1898.

Dutiable and free imports added	$75,104,715
Duty collected	12,520,677

Tariff taxation, 16⅔ per cent.

Conservative tariff for the 12 months ending 30th June, 1897.

Dutiable imports only	$66,242,150
Duty	19,874,890

Tariff taxation, 30 per cent.

For the six months ending 30th June, 1897.

Dutiable and free	$106,715,205

Tariff taxation, 18⅝ per cent.

Now, that twenty-nine and a half per cent tariff taxation is computed by the amount of money collected on the imports that came into the country with the 12½ per cent off during last year. Take the 31st of December, 1898, with the 25 per cent preferential tariff off and you have 28¾ per cent. Now, there is 28¾ per cent of tariff taxation collected off the necessities of the people during the six months ending December 31st last, with 25 per cent off in favour of Great Britain. These are the figures that have been put into our hands by the officials of the government themselves. There is no fake about it at all. These are the actual figures, which any one can find for himself. What was the percentage under the late government? For the whole year ending June 30, 1898—that is the last return we have—we have not the Trade and Navigation Returns yet, but we have the Trade and Commerce Reports which show the exports and imports and duty collected. What was done under the Conservative government, which was denounced for twenty years, in which it was called all names under the sun. Sir Richard Cartwright used to say it was like a man trying to lift himself by his boot straps and everything like that. The dutiable imports were $66,000,000 for the whole year. Duty collected $19,874,000, and the tariff taxation was 30 per cent; so that we have under the late Conservative government a taxation of 30 per cent on the necessaries of life, and under the free trade Liberal government we have a tariff taxation of 28¾ per cent. There is a reduction of 1¼ per cent only of the taxation upon the necessaries of the people and it must not be forgotten, to use the Liberal party's own arguments, and to use arguments of the members of the government now on the treasury benches, that in addition to that 30 per cent that goes into the treasury of the country there is another 30 per cent that goes into the pockets of private individuals. So that while the people are being taxed sixty per cent upon the necessaries of life, or in other words being taxed thirty per cent on all, whether it is imported or manufactured in the country, according to the Liberal party's own theory or argument—an argument I thoroughly agree with, an argument that can be proved beyond a question, and has been proved by them over and over again—that the policy of protection has the effect that thirty per cent goes into the revenue, and another thirty per cent of the value of the people's industry into the pockets of private individuals. What have they done to reform that condition of things? They have been in power three years and have held four sessions of Parliament, and there is not one word put into His Excellency's speech as to any indication of what the government are prepared to do, but on the other hand, we have the most distinct evidence so far as public utterances of the ministers of the Crown are concerned, as to what they are satisfied with. We have the utterances of the hon. the Minister of the Interior in two or three different speeches, and naturally we watch his utterances out west probably more than we watch the utterances of the other ministers, because he is specially the mouthpiece in the cabinet and the guardian of western interests. What did he say in Perth? What did he say in Toronto? What did he say in Woodstock? He said the tariff is now a fixture, that the people are satisfied, that the government have complied with all the conditions called for by the utterances of the cabinet ministers and the platform of the Liberal party in 1893; they have performed all those conditions, and the manufacturers are flourishing and everything is lovely. There is the representative of the farming interest of our western country, and if hon. gentlemen would only read the papers they would see the indignation with which these utterances are received. There is only one paper of any importance out in that western country that is supporting the hon. minister, and that is what used to be the Canadian Pacific Railway organ, the Winnipeg Free Press. It is known to be the Canadian Pacific Railway organ, a publication which belongs to Canadian Pacific Railway shareholders, or to private individuals owning the company, and to all intents and purposes it has been loaned to the minister for value received during his term of office as an advocate of his interests. It has fallen short of the mark. It has lost prestige and has not accomplished the intended object. While it has been a good paper politically, it has failed in its object, and the other organ, the Winnipeg Tribune, owned by Mr. Richardson, a supporter of the present government in the House of Commons, in every day's issue is denouncing the Minister of the Interior. The Liberals of the city of Winnipeg are divided in their opinion as to his merits and as to what he means by his utterances. Then we have Mr. Mulock the Postmaster General. He said in Toronto that the tariff was a fixture, and there was no more to be said. I have not followed the utterances of other ministers, but we get glimpses of what they have to say from time to time in the western country, and the gist of the whole thing is that they are quite satisfied. That some terms have been made with the manufacturers, with the hon. Mr. Bertram of the city of Toronto, that ten years is to be given them without any reduction of the tariff and they are begging for a little longer time at the present moment. I want to tell the government that in the western country we are simply and solely an agricultural population, an inland population, and in addition to the other difficulties which we have to contend with we have long transportation to export our goods to the seaboard, and we import no free goods in our western country, comparatively speaking. I will read to the House a list of the free goods:

Animals for the improvement of stock; we have not imported them to any extent and any improvement of stock we have obtained from the eastern provinces.

Articles for the use of the army and navy; we import nothing.

Broom corn, nothing.

Anthracite coal: we import a little of that. It is free.

Coffee: we import coffee to a small extent.

Indian corn: that is rather a competitor than anything else with agricultural produce—not that I wish to make any complaint about it, because the fact that five million dollars worth were imported last year is an evidence that it has been useful, but at the same time it is a competitor with agricultural products. If it has any effect upon the farmer's produce that effect is to reduce the price of coarse grain.

Cotton waste, we have nothing to do with.

Raw cotton is imported for manufacture.

Dyes, chemicals are imported for manufacture.

Fishing nets, &c.: we are an exporter of those.

Fish: we are an exporter of those.

Fruit, pine apples, &c.: the city of Winnipeg imports some of those.

Fur skins: we are an exporter of those.

Grease for making soap: we have nothing to import for our soap factories.

Hides and skins we export.

Gutta-percha, &c.: imported for manufacturing purposes.

Bolt cloth imported for manufacturing purposes.

Metals, brass and copper, imported for manufacturing purposes.

Steel rails, imported for railroads.

Iron, tin, &c.: those are imported for manufacturing purposes.

Oils are imported for manufacturing purposes.

Raw silks imported for manufacturing purposes.

Tea is free with us.

Tobacco we do not import in its raw state.

Wool we are not an exporter of exactly, but it is a part of our farm produce.

I have gone over the list, and hon. gentlemen will see to what extent we import free goods. Binding twine is now put on the list, and barbed wire, but tea, and steel rails and coarse lumber are the only things, I think, that we import free into that western country, and, therefore, we practically have to bear the whole brunt of protection: that is to say, we export so much produce from the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories and all that comes back to us in return for that export is taxed twenty-eight and three-quarter per cent by the free trade government. That is to say, we are taxed one-third of the value of our exports for these purposes.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—How are you worse off than any other portion of the Dominion?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am only arguing for our western country. If you are satisfied it is all right.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Do you want to get everything free and tax us?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, I want to lift the tax off you. I do not want any man in Canada to be taxed upon the necessities of his living or labour. I do not want to see a man taxed for his clothing. I do not want to see any man taxed for his iron, coal oil or for any of the necessities of his industry, because it is industrial labour that creates all the wealth of the country. You are fortunate in the city of St. John; I know you have all you want at the present moment; you have that harbour in splendid shape, and the Canadian Pacific Railway pouring in a fine lot of traffic.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—We pay more taxes in a year than the hon. gentleman's district does in seven.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You are greatly mistaken, sir. You are at the mouth of the broad river of Canadian Commerce, weare at the source, you foolishly want to tax us on our necessities by protection and thereby dam back the stream by hampering our industty, while the Canadian Pacific Railway is bringing traffic from the United States to your port at a lower rate than they will carry it for us. We are therefore subject to two sources of taxation. As it is six o'clock I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 22nd March, 1899.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATOR.

Hon. PETER MCSWEENEY, of Moncton, N.B., was introduced and took his seat.

THE STANDING COMMITTEES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved:

That pursuant to rule 79, the following senators be appointed a Committee of Selection, to nominate the senators to serve on the several standing committees, namely:—The Honourable Messieurs Scott, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, DeBoucherville, Lougheed, Miller, King, Clemow, Power, and the mover, and to report with all convenient speed the names of the senators so nominated.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When the hon. Minister of Justice gave notice of this motion yesterday, I understood him to say that the committee was to consist of the same gentlemen who composed it last year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The name of Mr. King has been substituted for that of Mr. Macdonald of Victoria. If you will remember, last session the present governor of British Columbia had his name placed on the committee.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—That was two sessions ago.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, he had his name placed on the committee instead of Mr. Macdonald's and Mr. Macdonald's name was afterwards substituted. The formation of the committee is such that I think one of the western senators ought to be placed upon it. I find four senators from Ontario on this committee. It would be as well to substitute Mr. Macdonald's name for one of those. I think Mr. King should be on, being the only representative from New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The motion will be found at page 31 of the routine proceedings.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—On page 32 the substitution is made. The resolution reads:—Hon. Messieurs Scott, Bowell, DeBoucherville, Lougheed, Miller, Macdonald (Vict.), Clemow, Power and the mover. I have no objection at all that my name shall be dropped and Mr. Macdonald's name put on.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is the committee limited in number?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it is.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do not wish my hon. friend's name to be left out, but this is the third attempt that has been made to drop my name by members of the government from that committee. It first commenced by the wish of Senator McInnes, who was then in this House, to be on that committee, and he got the whip of the House of Commons, Mr. Sutherland, to see Sir Oliver Mowat and tell him to leave my name off the committee. Sir Oliver Mowat did that, but upon the matter being brought up in this House, as it is brought up now, my name was reinstated. Last year my name was left off in the same way, and when the attention of the House was called to the fact, it was reinstated. If the House desires that my name should be off the committee, I am perfectly willing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no; no one desires that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do not think the House will agree to my name being put off the committee in any unfair way. I have done my duty on that committee without fear or favour, and I am entirely in the hands of the House.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—As Mr. Miller is not likely to be here, I think it would be well to add Mr. Macdonald's name if the committee is limited to that number. That would be the proper way to get over the difficulty.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in his suspicions. The motion was drawn up by the Clerk and placed before me with the names in blank, and he brought me a copy of the proceedings of last year showing the committee appointed then. I simply copied those names and put them in as they there stood. So that my hon. friend will see that he is wholly mistaken. In fact, his name was not before my mind at all when I thought of the list. I simply in a hurry copied the names.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend has copied them from the votes and proceedings as originally moved.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If you leave Mr. Miller's name off you have no representative from Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—You have Mr. Power.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no objection in the world to substituting Mr. Macdonald's name for Mr. Miller's, because perhaps Mr. Miller will not be here, or we might add Mr. Macdonald's name.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the better way if you can do it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The rules, I find, restrict us. So that as Mr. Miller is not likely to be here while we are striking the committees, we might make the change.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I should not like Mr. Miller's name left of the committee. I am willing to retire.

Hon. Mr. ALLEN—I had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Miller yesterday, and I quite expect to see him in his place before the end of the session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it is understood Mr. Macdonald's name will be substituted for the name of Mr. Clemow who will retire.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, the motion will be made in that way.

The motion was agreed to.

A PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Before the Orders of the Day are called I would like, if it is not out of order, to ask my hon. friend the leader of the House, if he could give us his views on the question of the adjournment of this House. This committee has been appointed, and it can be called together and the other committees struck, and after that there will be nothing to come before us for several weeks. It would hardly be worth the while of those who live at vast distances like myself to go home unless we could get the adjournment until Monday, 17th April, and I would, with great deference, suggest this date to the hon. leader of the government in the hopes that he may see his way clear to meet the views of those of us who live at long distances and who are not able to come down here except at great sacrifice of business and time and who have not the same advantages and facilities of reaching the Capital as our eastern brethern.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say, as soon as the debate on the Address is over, I will be able to answer the hon. gentleman's question, and endeavour to meet the wishes of the House in that regard. I may say also to my hon. friend that I expect to introduce a good many important measures in the Senate. I do not think any of them will meet with much controversy, but I hope before the adjournment to give notice of their introduction and so in this way facilitate business when we meet again.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day having been called—

Resuming the adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech on the opening of the fourth session of the eighth parliament.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—In resuming the speech that I was making upon the Address to His Excellency, I was discussing the trade question, an important subject that has not been alluded to in the Speech from the Throne, a subject which, I think, should have had a prominent place, so far as pledges and promises that were made by the government in relation thereto in the past. I was discussing, when I left off, the question of the taxation of the producers of the country, especially relating to the province of Manitoba, from which I come. I was interrupted by the hon. gentleman from St. John's, in which he made the statement that his province pays more taxes in a year than the hon. gentleman's district does in seven years, to which I replied that you are at the mouth of the broad river of Canadian commerce, we are at the source of the stream. You foolishly want to tax us and thereby dam back the stream by hampering our industry, while the Canadian Pacific Railway is bringing traffic from the United States to your port at a lower rate than they will carry it for us. We are, therefore, subject to two sources of taxation. If we were to put an export duty on the traffic going through the port of St. John for revenue it would be just the same principle of taxation as the hon. member from St. John, as a supporter of the present government's policy, wants to continue in posing upon us. Now, the statement that was made by the hon. gentleman from St. John's is quite incorrect, because the difference between the port of St. John and the province of Manitoba is a vast one. The country is divided into two classes, the producers and the manufacturers and monopolies. We in the province of Manitoba are entirely producers, as I explained yesterday, the tariff as it stands at present and which so far as any utterances which we have had from the members of the government during the recess that tariff stands still at $28\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, which is just one and a quarter, or, as stated in the other House, one cent less than the tariff which was in force while the former government was in power. I wish to tell the hon. gentleman from St. John that last year we exported $16,000,000 worth of wheat and cattle. Now, everybody knows, that understands the trend of trade and commerce that the exports are repaid by returning imports, or should be and while $16,000,000 does not appear in the Trade and Navigation Returns as exports from the province of Manitoba, yet they were exported from that province to various parts of the world and the eastern provinces. They are virtually exports from Manitoba, and although the Trade and Navigation Returns do not show that we import anything of consequence, because it comes from the eastern manufacturer or importer at ocean ports, still the fact remains that we did export produce and cattle to the value of $16,000,000, and that the pay which came back to the people of Manitoba for that $16,000,000 worth of exports, came back taxed at the rate of 28¾ per cent by the Liberal government. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that if my statement is correct, and it is open to refutation both in regard to the quantity of exports we made or the returning imports—we exported 21,000,000 bushels of wheat, $1,500,000 worth of cattle and a considerable amount of other produce, and the returns show exactly what duty was paid on what comes into the country. As I explained yesterday we import of course a portion of the goods that come through the ocean ports from abroad, and also goods manufactured in the eastern provinces. The protective tariff which has now become the policy of the Liberal government apparently, according to the Liberal party's own argument that they used for eighteen years, is that not only do we have to bear the tax of 30 per cent on the produce that comes within the boundary, but that other tax which does not go into the revenue of a similar amount on protected articles. In that way we arrive at a proper conclusion, and it is open to any hon. member of this House to state that I am saying what is not correct, that if we pay 28¾ per cent on the $16,000,000 we exported, we are taxed for the necessities of life to the extent of 28¾ per cent on that $16,000,000. In other words, the population of Manitoba is bearing the burden to the extent of $5,000,000 on the surplus they have produced in consequence of the taxation I am speaking of, and in addition to the legitimate cost and expense of producing that surplus. Hon. gentlemen will understand that I am only doing my duty in criticising the Conservative party, as I have done for several years past on their policy, and the Liberal party which to-day in the most unwarrantable way is imitating and following. It is a dangerous policy to pursue, because since 1878 when the readjustment of the tariff was made by Sir John Macdonald by placing higher duties, Canada has grown to an enormous extent. To the west of the great lakes there was, comparatively speaking, no population; there was no connection with the west, no export from there, no growth or industry of any consequence. It was only following on the footsteps of the Canadian Pacific Railway that the people of Manitoba began to produce a surplus and to export. Therefore, you have to deal with the population now that sees and feels the injustice of the burden of 28¾ per cent being put on their industries by the people of eastern Canada in regard thereto and in saying to the people of eastern Canada, I say it advisedly, because we find not only the Conservative party in the readjustment of the tariff in 1878 which grew and grew until it became a highly protective tariff, was a policy instituted for a certain purpose, but now we find the Liberal government, which we thought would do so much for the country in reducing the burden of taxation, has adopted a similar policy. The people of the west say this is a nice state of affairs when we can find no relief from either party from an oppressive tariff hampering their productions and impoverishing themselves and their families to that extent. I present their case to hon. gentlemen in its nakedness and tell you what it is going to lead to. Do you suppose that the population of western Canada will submit to such a burden of taxatian imposed on them. I pointed out yesterday that we import no free goods of any kind or description—that every single thing we import is dutiable and bears that burden of taxation. Any one who knows the trend of taxation knows that exports go out of the country and the necessities of the people's industries come back in some form or other, and while the protectionists east say there is some relief from the burden of taxation, from the fact of certain industries being established in their midst, there is nothing of the kind in the western country, and the naked fact presents itself to you, and I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman from St. John to that fact, who said they paid in in St. John's seven times as much taxes as we do. The burden of the tax on the people of Manitoba and the North west Territories to-day is $5,000,000. That is to say, if all the goods we require for our necessities were relieved from the burden of a protective tariff to-day, we would be $5,000,000 better off. The result of it is seen. Although we exported that enormous amount of produce in 1897, in 1898 the crops were not so good. There has been a reverse in that respect owing to climatic and other causes over which we have no control. We do not complain when we sustain a reverse in consequence of natural causes, but we do complain at man's stupidity who desires to tax that country for individual and personal benefit. In consequence of shortness of our crop and dampness of our wheat, matters over which we have no control, a considerable amount of financial difficulty is likely to result, because we have to make up in the coming year's crop the lee way of a poor crop in the past, because we have nothing to support our population there except agriculture. Now, the same thing affects the producers of eastern Canada that affects us. The producers of the country are the ones who create the wealth. Every hon. gentleman knows very well there are four sources from which the wealth of Canada is derived. One of them, the main one, is agriculture. Next in proportion is lumber, the next mines, and I think the last fisheries of the country —or rather the fisheries come next in volume, and then there is a small export in manufactures which has increased up to the present day to $10,000,000. Professor Robertson who has taken charge of the agricultural interest has told us that the productions of the soil in Canada amounted to $699,000,000. The production of the lumbering districts in Canada is $66,000,000. The product of the mines in Canada is $37,000,000, and of the fisheries $25,000,000. The manufacturers only represent productive power—that is to say new wealth—is only created to the extent that they are able to export, which is $10,000,000. Now, hon. gentlemen will see that the policy which is being pursued today is taxing the $699,000,000 worth of agricultural produce in Canada which is the backbone of the country, the wealth producing source on which the prosperity of the country mainly depends; you are taxing that to the extent of 28¾ per cent, and what for? In order to give the monopoly to our manufacturers to the exclusion of the rest of the world. So far as I am personally concerned, the readjustment of the tariff that was instituted in 1878, which I regret to say grew into a protective policy, we let pass. It accomplished a certain amount of good, but Canada has increased since 1878 to an enormous extent. We have to deal with half a continent. The power of the national government extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and we have to take all these large interests into consideration. For that reason it is a difficult country to govern. It is utterly impossible for people where the weight of power is constituted at present to sit down here and say what is good for Manitoba, for Yukon, for British Columbia or Prince Edward Island. It is utterly impossible for us to say that we can regulate fairly and squarely between each section of Canada as to the just proportion of the revenue which they should bear by imposing whatis called a scientific method of forced taxation. I just wish to say that, as far as we are concerned, the people of the west are practically a unit, both Liberals and Conservatives as to the necessity of a change of policy in regard to a protective tariff. What we want, we are quite willing to bear any share of the burden, that is our proper share but not to impose upon us an indirect tax in that way which extracts from the people of Manitoba in proportion of what they export a burden of 28¾ per cent is impoverishing every man in that country more or less. There are individuals cited as examples who have greater experience and other advantages they, however, do no represent at all the average farming power of the people of that country. Therefore, I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to that fact. We in the province of Manitoba are taxed 28¾ per cent. The bulk of the produce sent from Manitoba went to England. England is a consumer of our No. 1 wheat, either through the flour we export or the wheat we export. Although owing to our system of grading and mixing at Port Arthur, the British market seldom gets one fine wheat most of which goes by Buffalo and New York. A small proportion of the wheat we export remains in eastern Canada to be mixed with soft wheat to raise grades of flour, but the bulk of the export of wheat and cattle goes to England. What we say out there is: Why won't you allow England to come and trade freely in Canada, allow England to send goods back in return for the produce we export? Why do you not submit to competition in that regard? What right have you speaking as a country extending for 4,000 miles, a greater difference than exists between the Atlantic coast of Canada and the shores of Great Britain, why should not we extend our free trade relations to Great Britain, as well as our free trade relations to Ontario, Nova Scotia or anywhere else? It is protection that is holding the country and this present government. It is corporate power that is influencing the policy of the government. It is a monopoly of individuals who desire to divert the profits of these great Producing industries into their own pockets that is holding the present government as it held the late government. That will lead to difficulties and trouble. We ask very fairly, are we not part of the British Empire? Have we not a right to expect that Great Britain and Ireland should have the right to send out their goods and their materials free from a taxation of thirty per cent, in order that the development of the country may go on, on lines on which each individual, no matter what part of the country he may be situated in, may pursue his occupation unencumbered. The principle of taxation is this, as it prevails in England, that all the burden that is put on the people of Great Britain in the shape of taxation goes into revenue. The Liberal party in this country argued for twenty years, and argued correctly, that under the protective tariff one-half of the taxation went into the revenue and the other half into the pockets of protected industries. The question is, how long is this going to be continued? Are you going to raise a spirit in one part of the population of Canada which will gradually grow until, perhaps, it is too late to overcome it, and say we are going to continue this any way until there is a burst up in some direction or another. I say it is an unwise policy. I say the responsibility rests with the Liberal party, that that condition should be made to cease at once—that the doors of Canada should be open to Great Britain and to British trade upon the most perfect freedom, the same as exists between one part of Canada and the other. I do not say that it is absolutely necessary to throw the tariff right down upon the first of July next, but to enact a statute and say as Sir Robert Peel did when free trade became the commercial policy of England in 1846—we put this on the statute-book, and in four years every vestige of protection shall be expunged from the commercial life of Great Britain. If you were put in the same way an Act in our statute-book, a measure saying Great Britain as free to trade in Canada on the same terms that she allows us to trade in England you will do more for the building up of Canada and for the development of the resources of Canada, for the welfare of the people and or the building up of the British Empire than any Act which is possible for you to pass in any other shape or form. We know that Great Britain is our great customer for agricultural products, our biggest customer for nearly everything except lumber which is almost equally divided between the United States and Great Britain. We keep back her imports by taxation, and consequently keep back the volume of the producers trade, and keep down the value of his production. I do not suggest lowering our tariff to the United States except on a reciprocity basis. The United States want nothing of any consequence that we produce. They want some of our lumber which they are getting through free logs and the duty on lumber at an unfair advantage; they want some of our fish. They do not want any of our iron ore or agricultural produce and the consequence is our exports to the United States are small while our imports from the United States are very large, and we have to draw money from England to pay for our exports and hand it over to the United States to pay for our imports, adding a double cost of Exchange to the tax. They have by internal competition between the southern and northern iron mines developed their iron industry to 15,000,000 tons a year and they say they will increase that to 20,000,000 tons a year, and iron has fallen in the United States to something like $9 a ton.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It is going up now though.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is, but the moment the price goes up competition regulates the output, and all the more reason for us to make it free to Great Britain. What I want to say is this: We are between two countries, Great Britain, which produces 12,000,000 tons, and the United States, which produces 15,000,000 tons. Iron is one of the things most heavily taxed in Canada. We were paying under the Conservative government a tax of $2,750,000 per annum on our iron goods. Under the present government we are paying $3,500,000, or we raise to-day about $3,500,000 on the tax on iron. In the agricultural industry iron is the chief article we use.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Do you say the duty on iron is more than it was?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, it is the same on all iron goods.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The duty is cut in half.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If you refer to the Trade and Navigation Returns you will find my statement is correct. I have before me the Trade and Navigation Returns for the whole year, and the hon. gentlemen will find that in round numbers that what I state is absolutely correct, that is to say that in the Trade and Navigation Returns for the six months ended 31st December last the duty collected off iron goods and iron is $1,705,000. I doubled that for the coming six months, which makes it about $3,500,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Double the quantity was imported.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—So far as the percentage is concerned there is no difference. The percentage of taxation is exactly the same. I am not saying the duty is increased.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If you cut duty from 50 to 25 per cent and the people buy more, you say the taxation is increased.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, the duty on iron and iron manufactures have not been cut in half; I leave it to the hon. gentleman himself if he did not sit on the opposite side of the House year after year condemning the gentlemen who occupied the Conservative benches on the iniquity of that tax.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Now you are defending them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; I say about 50 per cent duty was cut. If the people import double the quantity they did in former years, how can you say that is evidence they are being taxed higher? The moment you bring down the duty people are prompted to buy more. It is no argument that there is an increase in taxes because people buy more.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There is no practical result from the reduction in the duty. Make iron free and there will be no doubt about the figures.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have the list on my table of the articles on which taxation has been raised.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—But supposing you have another list on which you raise the duties. You just put down a hoe and spade and something of that kind as reduction. I tell you that the agriculturalists of this country use more than half of the iron goods that is produced and manufactured in this country. If they bear half the taxation on iron and the proportion of duty collected on iron under the present tariff is equal to the protection that was under the Conservative tariff, where is your reduction? Where is your honesty? Where is your public morality? You are demoralizing the population when you get up for eighteen years to educate the people up to a certain idea and make promises you are going to carry out a certain policy when you get the opportunity, and here you are sitting on the treasury benches and apologizing to the country for not carrying out that policy. And why? Because you have the protectionists in your ranks and have selected them from that class instead of the class that you preach for, instead of the people you were supposed to be coming to legislate for in that way. That is the position that the government allow themselves to be placed in. If there is anything in this world that demoralizes the population it is when they have lost faith in political parties. But they say "my vote is no good. It is not worth the paper it is written upon, and it is a good deal better that I should take $2 or $5 for my vote and look upon it as an annual or quadrennial investment rather than that I should hold to any ideas of patriotism or political protection for myself or anything else." That is the effect of legislation and political life of that kind, educating the people up to a certain standard, and then after you have attained power you go back and say I cannot do it. Now, Mr. Mulock says it is to be for ten years and Mr. Sifton says it is a dead issue, and Mr. McMullen says it is to be for thirty-eight years. These are the utterances of public men and it is by the utterances of public men in the cabinet that we have to judge what policy is to be pursued. I stand here, not fighting the Liberal party, and I do not stand here to fight the Conservative party. I stand here to do my duty to those people who are feeling the burden of taxation in the way I have expressed to you. The hon. leader of the Senate said yesterday that the Canadian people were self reliant. I interposed the question "Why do you not abolish the tariff then?" His reply to me was "I can quite understand the hon. gentleman prefers that the government should not reduce the tariff, so that he would have the opportunity of criticizing them." I want to tell the leader of the government that I have no desire to criticize the government upon that question. I would only be too thankful if I could afford them my support. I promised them my support if they could carry out the policy of free trade with Great Britain, and I am quite prepared to extend that support, however humble a support it may be.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We have given you twenty-five per cent reduction on the imports of Great Britain and you say you are worse off than before.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is the burden of taxation we have to bear. I am pointing to the fact that 28¾ per cent is the burden of protected taxation, wherever it comes from.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is quite right; although the government lowered the duties on some articles, yet they have a higher duty than before.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Will the hon. gentleman permit an export duty to be put on flour to raise the forty millions?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I will put it on as an export duty from the port of St. John for the hon. gentleman, but I do not think I would go further than that, he would then find out for himself what an oppressive tax on the industry of the country meant. I have before me the mineral report where I want to point out what effect the policy has had on the production of iron. It is made up to the 31st December, 1898, and I find that iron ore has been produced in Canada during the past year to the extent of 58,000 tons, and at a value of $152,000. Pig iron has been produced to the extent of 77,000 tons at a value of $912,000 that is valuing it at the protected price of $12 per ton. Of the ore consumed in the production 42 per cent was Canadian and 58 per cent American ore. The people of Canada are paying to the United States producers $2 per ton bonus for the ore that is imported into Canada. Do you call that developing the resources of Canada? More than half the iron ore that goes into the production of the iron in Canada comes from the United States. 77,000 tons of iron are produced in Canada, and in the United States they produce 15,000,000 tons, and Great Britain produces 12,000,000 tons. What figure do we cut in a reciprocity treaty when we can show only 77,000 tons as against a rapid increase in the production of iron in the United States and England? How can we hold our own under such a policy as that? How can we say that it is protection that is being afforded to-day upon some of the iron smelted in works at $7 a ton. That is what the Hamilton Smelting Works is receiving the benefit of in the way of indirect duties and direct bonuses, and direct protection from the Dominion of Canada and the province of Ontario, and yet notwithstanding that $7 a ton is imposed for their benefit, and the whole result after fourteen years of protection is only 77,000 tons. How can you expect Canadian industry to develop? How can you expect the resources to develop under such condition as that? I say you are pursueing a wrong policy altogether. I say Great Britain is manufacturing iron to the extent of 12,000,000 tons, that she requires something like 25,000,000 tons of ore. In order to produce that she has to go abroad to Spain for a portion of her ore and to Norway. She never comes to Canada for any of her ore. And why? Because we put a tax of 30 per cent upon any effort of industry on the part of the people of Great Britain to develop our resources. That is the effect. No nation in the world can come here and utilize our resources for their benefit if they are taxed 30 per cent upon the only means they have to pay for the cost of these resources. Now, hon. gentlemen, if you were to open your doors to Great Britain and to say to Great Britain: you can trade in Canada just as freely as we in Ontario can trade with Manitoba, that it would be one line of communication from the Atlantic ocean to the shores of Great Britain, you would see a marvellous growth in the industry and development of the national resources of this country, which is the backbone and wealth of the country, as would astonish you.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Why did she not ask the United States to reduce her duties in favour of Great Britain? She takes more from the United States in one year than she takes from us in three.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We are discussing our own affairs.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—And these are our own affairs.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We have nothing to do with the United States.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—But England has.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We have to keep our skirts clear of the United States. When the people of the United States come down to discuss free trade questions upon the same basis or same plan that we are now discussing it, then it will be time enough for England to take up the point you speak of. I am now discussing the interests of Canada with Great Britain, and I say there is not a single solitary industry in Canada that will not benefit by the policy I recommend. I say I would admit all British trade absolutely free to the port of Montreal or St. John or Halifax, or to any of our ports. I would admit coal, coal oil and iron free from any part of the world, and lower our tariff to the United States when they will lower theirs. Those are the great raw materials which are the backbone and foundation of any industry, and there is not a single manufacturer in Canada that will not benefit by the result of such a policy. If coal oil was free it would come here in tank vessels from Batoum in the Black Sea, the seaport for the coal oil from Baku in Russia, and would here compete with the Standard Oil Company which is a monopoly. That company delivers its oil in England in tank vessels for five or six cents a gallon. If iron was free we would have the cheapest iron in the world to work with. There will not be a single manufactory closed. They will be increased to a very large extent, because there are conditions that prevail when that commercial policy is put on a sound basis which will enable us to compete as successfully in any market of the world as Great Britain herself, as long as we work on a protective policy the conditions are altered. But place it on a level with Great Britain give us the benefit of cheap coal oil and cheap coal and cheap iron, for the prosection of our manufactures, and you need not be afraid of Canada not being able to hold her own. To that extent I quite agree with the leader of the government in saying that the Canadian people are self reliant, but self reliance goes to the winds when the halter or rope is tied round the neck of a man or his legs are shackled, there can be no self reliance then. Remove the shackles and then the self reliance will produce some result. I desire now to read to the House an article that has been written by my brother in Chicago which I see published in the issue of the Economist of the 11th March. My brother is the vice-president of the First National Bank of Chicago. He went into that bank 35 years ago, one of five clerks, and he stands now next to the top, next to the president of that bank, with 185 clerks under him. He stepped into the vacancy created by Mr. Lyman Gage when he became a member of President McKinley's cabinet.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, hear; good for Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is the record of a Canadian. In addition to that, he has been elected vice-president of the National Bankers' Association of the United States for the state of Illinois. The representatives of the financial world of the population of 70,000,000 people elected him as vice-president for the great state of Illinois, where I believe the greatest amount of banking business is carried on of any state in the Union. His bank is the largest in the west, and deals largely in foreign exchange in connection with the large export of farmers products. I mention this to show that what he is talking about here, he is talking about from the standpoint of a practical financial man, and viewing the commercial policy of his country from a financial standpoint, while I am viewing the policy of the government of Canada from the standpoint of one of the workers in the agricultural districts of our country. It is not a very long article, and I think it is worth while embodying it in our Hansard, and, being my brother, I am sure hon. gentlemen will have no objection to that:

To the Editor of the Economist:

SIR,—While so much is being said about imperialism, expansion, open-door policy, freedom of trade, &c., I notice the keynote of the whole discussion is the enlargement of our export trade, nothing being said about the equally important matter of the enlargement of our import trade. Exports without imports would rapidly impoverish a people. We are congratulating ourselves at the present time upon our large surplus exports, and justly so, as it not only means that as a nation our people are actively employed and that their labour is not only supplying all of their own wants but is also supplying the demands of other countries to an extent that the wisest of us a few years ago could not imagine or foretell; to the extent that the exports of the country are settled by an equivalent in imports, all is well, but when such exports exceed imports to any large extent, and settlements of balances growing therefrom have to be effected in gold, the seeds of trouble in the future of trade are sown. At the present time, being a debtor nation, we are able to utilize a large part of our present credit balance in liquidation of debts due in foreign countries, and in the buying back of our own securities. The surplus then remaining has to be paid us in gold, which is serviceable to us only in the arts and sciences, in creating resources for future years when the balance of trade shall be on the other side and in the accumulation of such stores of that metal as may be profitably used in finance and for the increasing demands for current circulation as money.

Export trade is undoubtedly most desirable and necessary, as it means that we are using all our energies in producing those things that other people want over and above satisfying the wants of our own people of such goods as are exported, but unless the nation that wants can produce things that the other desires, those wants will have to go unsatisfied from its inability to effect the exchange.

The first duty of a nation in the way of trade is to satisfy most economically the wants and necessities of its own people. Once these wants have been satisfied, traders finding an excess of goods on hand for which there is no demand at home then look abroad to seek buyers outside the boundaries of their own country, and especially in such states as are best able to buy. That ability to buy from us is brought about in the same way that our ability to sell to them is and arises from the fact that such states have accumulated a surplus of goods over and above what their own people require to sustain them with food, clothing, and the other comforts of life.

For instance, Nation "A" has a surplus of food products, petroleum, machinery, &c., but a deficit of silks, velvets, cutlery, spices, &c., while Nation "B" has a surplus of the latter articles and a deficit of all or some of the former. When such conditions prevail, trade between "A" and "B" can be profitably carried on upon the most advantageous terms. Sometimes it happens to make the trade exchanges it requires the indirect assistance of "C" and "D" nations, as "A" has something that "B" does not want, but that "C" does, and "B" has something that neither "A" nor "C" wants, but "D" does, &c., ad infinitum. Thus international trade, as it exists to-day, was begun, and thus it is carried on.

If it takes the state of Illinois 1,000 hours of labour to produce a crop of wheat worth, say, $100, and 1,500 hours of labour to produce clothing to an amount equal to the same value, while in the state of New York it requires 1,500 hours of labour to produce the same amount of wheat, but only 1,000 hours of labour to produce a like amount of clothing. Illinois, therefore, to produce her wheat and her clothing, expends an energy of 2,500 hours of labour, while New York does the same. Now, finding that Illinois has facilities for producing wheat cheaper than New York, and that New York can manufacture clothing cheaper than Illinois, is it not manifestly for the interest of both that Illinois should produce the wheat and New York the clothing? Would not each state then have its wants for these two articles provided for by the labour of only 2,000 hours instead of by the labour of 2,500 hours, which is necessary if both produce each of these things themselves?

At the present time our trade balance for the past two years has been in the neighbourhood of about six hundred million dollars a year in our favour; that is, we have been giving of our labour to other countries an energy equal to the amount named without getting in return anything that in itself is conducive to the comfort and welfare of our own people. Gold, outside its use for liquidating debts and for its use in the arts and sciences, is valueless to us, except for its power to buy commodities necessary to sustain life under the most comfortable conditions, and when those commodities are bought they figure in our trade reports as imports. If, as a people, we are able to produce everything that we require and more too, there is nothing that we should require to buy from other nations, and the gold coming back in settlement of such exports would be worthless to us and our expenditure of labour to the above named extent would be wasted, as far as we are concerned. I use the word everything in the most comprehensive manner, meaning thereby ordinary and extraordinary wants, luxuries, pictures, &c., and whatever is in any way conducive to the highest development of the manhood of the nation.

Supposing that this surplus of exports not only continues in the future, but continues in an increasing ratio, what would be the result? Would not the ability of the importing countries to satisfy this large surplus year in and year out soon become exhausted, and as soon as exhausted would not this surplus of exports of necessity cease?

It is self evident that if we were to import nothing and export yearly for the next ten years say twelve hundred million dollars, or a total value during that period of twelve thousand millions, the whole world has not got gold enough to liquidate the debt, and, as is later on shown, that vast sum would be absolutely valueless to us and represents only a waste of energy and impoverishment of our resources. It is not, therefore, correct that our power to export to other nations must be commensurate to the power of those countries to export to us? We may have temporary deficits or temporary surpluses from time to time, but the equilibrium has sooner or later to be reached and our ability to produce for others must be equaled by their ability to produce for us.

It is necessary, therefore, in seeking markets for what we have to sell, that we also seek markets in which we may buy. Otherwise such trade relations cannot long be mutually profitable, and will sooner or later of necessity be gradually dissolved.

At the present all eyes are on China as a country that can be exploited to advantage, and with that end in view alliances are being created to compel the door of trade to be kept wide open to all comers, the main thought being that it should be kept wide open to admit the product of outside nations; not thinking of the natural counterpart of the proposition, namely, that the doors of other nations should in like manner be kept open to the Chinese.

If instead of keeping our doors wide open to admit her products, we fine ourselves by means of a heavy tariff on what we import from her, do we not curtail to that extent our power to export goods that she might otherwise take.

While China is undoubtedly a country rich in resources, a large amount of such resources is lying dormant and undeveloped. The wants of the Chinese in the past have largely been supplied by the products of the labour of their own people, and such things as they could not produce they did without, with the result that as a people they were illy fed, illy clad and illy housed, and that as a country the people, perhaps, are less well cared for, and, therefore, less prosperous than those of almost any other nation, except those still lower in the scale of civilization than China is. If we can by diplomacy, or otherwise, induce China to open her doors to the commerce of the world, and at the same time create within her boundaries a general desire for those things which she does not produce, her merchants will soon point out the way by which those wants will be supplied, namely, by increasing her labour in creating things other countries want, and that nature has enabled her people to produce more economically than others can. Her people will soon find that wheat flour and canned meats are desirable things to have, and the desire will soon become so strong that they will begin to labour harder in order that they may be obtained. As soon as one want is supplied another will be created, and so imports and exports will go hand in hand to the benefit of all concerned. As her people become better fed and better clad they will be better fitted to provide for the wants of other countries, and thus by the production of increased labour will be able to purchase in an increasing degree such things as are desirable for her and that other countries can advantageously furnish.

It is often said that a country that exports most largely and imports least is the one that is regarded as the most prosperous. It appears to me that general prosperity to all countries is greatest when exports and imports most nearly balance each other as there is in the case no waste energy in the way of labour for the purchase of things not wanted.

As a general proposition, subject, however, to individual exceptions, under similar conditions it may be stated that anything that unduly inures to the benefit of one party operates to the injury of the other. If, therefore, unduly large exports are of great advantage to one country they are apt to be detrimental to the other. Trade cannot long be carried on under such unequal conditions though the one country for the time may seem to be faring well under it. Such a case would seem well to illustrate the story in the fable where "the countryman deliberately killed the goose that laid the golden egg," as after the impoverishment of its valued customer trade would soon find that it would have been wiser to have so treated him that the power to trade would have been fostered instead of destroyed.

It is at present advantageous to us to have the large yearly trade balance in our favour which we now enjoy, because we are debtors for foreign loans contracted in the past. When this debt is satisfied, credit balances are only serviceable or useful as a reserve with which to liquidate future unfavourable balances when crops fail and exports are insufficient to meet the larger imports of such goods as are necessary to our welfare.

While I have stated that trade is on the best footing when the outgoing trade and incoming trade are of nearly equal value, as there is no loss of energy on either side, the history of England affords an example of a country prospering under adverse trade balances; that is, balances created by an excess of imports over exports, and it is claimed that by so doing she is taking advantage of the energy of other nations to help to sustain her. The man whose yearly income is greater than his outgo is surely in better shape than he whose position is reversed. The nation is like the individual. The nation that has a large export balance year by year or whose outgo is larger than its income is by parity of reasoning less well off than the one whose yearly income of imports is larger than its outgo of exports. Of course, in the first case there is an income of gold to settle the trade balance, but if that gold is useless, except in the arts and sciences, I maintain that my statement is correct. It is, of course, assumed that all debts have already been liquidated and all wants supplied by the labour of the country in question and by such labour of other countries as was necessary to supply the amounts of goods those countries contributed.

Where no trade balance is involved the labour service of a country is just sufficient for its wants. When it has a large credit balance more labour is used, because in addition to supplying its own wants it has also to supply the labour necessary to produce the exports creating that balance, that balance being useless to it. When it has a debit balance less labour is used because other nations supply the labour required to produce the imports creating that balance.

As the amount of labour involved in the supply of the wants of a country is the cost of the living of that country, therefore the country that uses the smallest amount of energy to supply the greatest amount of wants, comforts, luxuries, &c., necessary to produce the highest stardard of physical and mental manhood, is in all respect the most prosperous of all the nations of the earth.

The Duke of Argyle in his "Unseen Foundations of Society" defines wealth as "the possession in comparative abundance of things which are objects of human desire not obtainable without some sacrifice or some exertion, and which are accessible to men able as well as anxious to acquire them."

According to this definition, the United States of America is, perhaps, the wealthiest nation upon earth, as it probably contains "more things which are objects of human desire" than any other country, but these things are only wealth provided they are objects of desire by those able and willing to acquire them. If the power to acquire these things is destroyed, wealth disappears and the objects desired remain in the possession of the original owner, who is unable to use them because he has already a superabundance. If this definition is correct, is not a nation wise to aid the power of the people of outside countries to acquire rather than by unwise greed on the part of its own people to destroy that power which is of such vital interest to it?

Suppose that the labour of the state of Illinois is at present just sufficient to provide for the wants of its people, aggregating a value of a thousand dollars per capita yearly, and depends entirely upon its wants being supplied within its own boundaries. Now, finding that its neighbours in Pennsylvania and other states can produce certain desirable things cheaper than Illinois can, such as stoves, oil, glass, machinery, &c., and that Illinois can produce meat, grain, &c., cheaper than they can, and after a trial of an interchange thus brought about, find that 75 per cent of Illinois labour used directly for Illinois wants valued as before at $750 and 25 per cent of labour used in exports to Pennsylvania in exchange for imports from that state has produced in Illinois a value of $350 per capita on account of the ability of Pennsylvania to furnish the things which she exports to us on a more favourable basis than we can produce them, it ascertains that the same energy used which formerly produced only a thousand dollars per capita does now, by this interchange, produce $1,100 per capita, Illinois exported $250 of labour and imported $350 of labour for it, the imports exceeding the exports by $100 per capita, and the State is the richer for it.

Now, supposing that Illinois, finding this interchange so profitable, enlarges her sphere in this respect, increases in energy and exports 75 per cent of labour products, and imports only 50 per cent of value in exchange, she has a trade balance in her favour of $300 per capita. which is paid for in gold. how much better off is she? She has increased her energy by harder labour than was otherwise necessary, and for that increase has received in return $300 per capita in gold, but as the energy first displayed was sufficient to supply her necessities, the gold received is valueless to her as long as she keeps up the same energy for the same purpose, and the surplus of energy produced by her is only a waste.

The trade of this country for the past fifty years as compiled by treasury officials is as follows :

EXPORTS.

Merchandise	$26,685,900,000
Gold	2,142,800,000
Silver	1,072,500,000
Total exports	$29,901,200,000

IMPORTS.

Merchandise	$24,836,500,000
Gold	1,141,100,000
Silver	541,700,000
Total imports	$26,519,300,000

Thus we find that during this period, ending with the year 1898, our exports of not only merchandise, but of gold and silver as well, exceed our corresponding imports by the vast sum of of $3,381,900,000 and according to this theory that excess exports is only wasted energy or loss.

GEORGE D. BOULTON.

Bearing upon the argument he uses I would draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that our exports for the past few years have been exceeding the imports, when returning imports are stimulated by borrowing they only represent so much debt created, but when the nation is living within its income excess of imports represents the profits of the international trade.

Those who wish to see what movement is going on in the United States in the discussion of a similar question to the one which I am dealing with, you will find this article very interesting reading. He is of course presenting the case from a personal and practical standpoint, but speaks as one in authority in that nation of 70 millions of people. I am quite satisfied that there is a movement in the United States to-day that will bring about the very results for which he is arguing. How far that result is removed from the present it is impossible for us to say. What we have to do is simply to regard ourselves. I see in Great Britain there is an agitation to go back to the old policy of protection. How far that policy has taken hold of or is likely to take hold of the people it is impossible for us to say, but if I understand anything of protection it is essentially a selfish policy, and if a campaign should be instituted in England for the purpose of restoring the protective duties that prevailed prior to 1846, the protection will be put on not for the benefit of Canada, Australia, the United States or any other country, but for the British population themselves If I understand anything of protection that is what will result if it takes hold of the people of Great Britain. The people of Ireland will not want to see the cattle of Canada coming in to compete with theirs. The wheat growers of England will want the full benefit of protection and so it goes on. If it came to the institution of such a policy as I have heard spoken of and argued for, to include Canada and other portions of the British Empire in the same protective circle, the people of Great Britain would say no, we are not going to open the door to Canada which has always maintained the tax of 30 per cent against our trade. They will take a practical business-like view of the question. They will say the market of the United States is a market of 70 millions of people, while the market of Canada is a market of five millions of people, both countries are taking us alike. The productive power of the United States in relation to ours is as seventy to five, with a greater variety of production. The people of England could not, without being retaliated upon and without making enemies of the people of the United States (which is the very last thing they would like to do) close the door against the United States and open it to Canada so long as both countries are acting in the same way. But it would be entirely different if the people of Canada instituted a policy of their own favourable to Great Britain, opening our doors first to them in order that they might trade freely in Canada, the same as we trade with one another, the same as they already give us. We cannot afford, in our present condition, to open the door to the United States excepting upon a reciprocal basis, and that is almost impossible to obtain from them, because it would be an abandonment of the protective policy, and when they abandon that it is going to be on some broader basis than reciprocity with five millions of people on their northern border. That is the position which exists in our trade relations with Great Britain and the United States. We want to place ourselves in a position to trade with Great Britain and to turn our trade into such channels that it will be impossible for the people of Great Britain to discriminate against us, but will rather be in their interest to include us in any policy that they may see fit to pursue in the future if we choose to accept that position. Now, what is the policy between the two parties at the present moment. The Conservative policy, as I understand it from the hon. leader of this House, is reciprocity with Great Britain. What is the policy of the Liberal party? Reciprocity with the United States. They are both impracticable policies. Both policies are simply an attempt to draw the wool over the eyes of the people of Canada. The Conservative party says, just wait now and we will have England put on a tax in favour of Canada. It may be twenty-five years before that could take place. What we are discussing is what is good for the people of Canada to-day. The Liberal party are saying we are negotiating with the people of the United States; wait until the negotiations are ended; we will get reciprocity with the United States. They are drawing the wool over the eyes of the people of Canada from that standpoint.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The Prime Minister says they do not want reciprocity.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I dare say he has found from his visit to Washington that it is impossible to get it. However, that is the policy that I judge them by to-day. That is the policy they apparently have been pursuing. The one is as impracticable as the other. We cannot ask 40,000,000 to alter their policy for the benefit of Canada when their enormous trade is with the world. The trade of Canada, I think, only represent three or four per cent of the trade they carry on with the rest of the world, therefore, it is not likely that anything we may do will influence them to change their policy. There may be some turn among themselves that will lead them to change their policy. I am pointing out to the hon. gentlemen the advantages that would flow from opening the doors to Great Britain, that they may trade freely. We would then be in a position to develop our Northwest country, our agricultural regions and everything else would profit by it. I see in the public press that lands in Prince Edward County, south of Belleville are quoted at a low price. The resources of Canada have been so reduced that the value of land in a populous part of the country in an improved fruit growing region has been reduced to a low figure.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Where is that?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—In Prince Edward County.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know land in the west of Ontario is $70 and $80 an acre.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am only quoting what I see in the public press.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It is $25 in my district.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What kind of land is sold at $25 an acre in Prince Edward County?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not know.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It is worth $20 to $25 in Assiniboia.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I doubt your figures, for last year you purchased a part of your farm for $3 an acre, and I have no doubt you would sell out if you could get $25 an acre. All I want to point out is that the prosperity of farmers is gauged entirely by the value of their land. It is a fair criterion of what the producing capacity of the land is. The result remains the same, that we are reducing the value of those very resources that creates the wealth of Canada. If we were to admit British trade absolutely free here, as I was saying before, England has to go abroad for a portion of her iron ore, she would have easily come over here instead of going to other countries for it. We could supply her with iron ore of various kinds from Lake Superior, Nova Scotia and Quebec. We might be supplying a million tons of iron ore and contributing to the twenty-two or twenty-three millions of tons she requires. Compare the wealth of Canada by the distribution of a million tons of iron ore, the gross production of our raw material at $4 a ton, with a production of 77,000 tons of iron. Compare the two one with the other and say where the practical results are going to follow. Recollect that will go on in every production of our country. The farmer is more interested in a policy of that kind than in any protective policy, that the government may think is for their benefit. The protective policy, that is the policy of the leading citizens of Montreal and Toronto so far as any evidence we have of their movements is concerned, is initiated simply because a large number of their citizens have their investments made in factories under joint stock companies. It is to preserve these interests that they consider protection necessary for the country. But I can assure the hon. gentlemen that the practical experience we gather from the world at large, and from reading what is accomplished under the free trade policy of Great Britain, that they need not be at all afraid that their investments will suffer. If they desire to sell out and do not wish to take the risk of competition they will very soon get purchasers.

There are one or two other questions mentioned in the Speech to which I should like to refer. One is the plebiscite. I have always been outspoken on the question of plebiscite. I opposed it when it was in this House and spoke and wrote against it when it was before the people of the North-west, because I conscientiously believe that anything like a prohibition of the sale of liquor would be a direct injury to the people of the country. It would be a law that would not be respected, and it is a most unwise thing for any country or any government to impose a law on the people that is not likely to be respected. It is demoralizing to the population in the worst way. So far as the attitude of the Premier is concerned, he has taken the only statesmanlike attitude he could take in refusing to put a prohibitory law on the statute-book. He has acted in strict accordance with sound principles of government under democratic institutions under the British constitution. There is a difference between democratic institutions under the constitution of the United States and the democratic institutions of Canada under the British constitution. In the United States it has been the principle of their government to give a law to any section of the people that asks it, provided they can show any kind of a vote in its favour. They say, take the law, do with it what you can, quite regardless as to whether it was going to be observed or not. The result is the population of the United States have grown up with a disrespect for law or order, when it suited them to do so. That is quite evident by reading their public press. We in Canada do not regard the principles of government under our democratic institutions in that way. We build up precedent upon precedent and take time and give the people ample time to understand what the effect of the law is going to be, what its requirements are, and keep it from the statute-book until the people have thoroughly made up their mind that the law is a wise one to enact, and that when it is enacted, it will not only be respected by the people but that the government will have power to enforce it. That is the position in which I think the question stands. So far as the plebiscite vote is concerned, the vote as mentioned in the Railway Committee rooms to-day by the Temperance Alliance, they confessed was a very disappointing one. The plebiscite has done this much good that it has convinced all reasonable and sensible men who attach themselves to the temperance movement that the prohibitory law is impossible at the present moment whatever may come in the future and that event I believe will be longer off. The vote that was polled, I gather, was less under the Dominion plebiscite than it was under the provincial plebiscite taken a few years ago. In the state of Maine I see there has been a failure of prohibition. Quite lately they have wiped the prohibition party off the state ticket in consequence of the very small vote their people poll now, and I read it is on the boards that the law is to be repealed in the state of Maine. That is the result of prohibition. For a number of years its working demoralized a large number of people and lessens respect for law in that state. It only shows how impossible it is to keep an Act upon a statute-book that has no practical effect and how unwise it is to enact it. Not only that, but we have that quotation in the Bible, a book I endeavour to take as my guide, which says the last stage of that man shall be worse than the first. After you have tried prohibition and demoralize the population and the people repeal it, the temperance people have lost ground in consequence of their agitation to put a law of that kind on the statute-book before the people are ready to receive it or to respect it. The ministers from the province of Quebec have been criticised for publicly opposing the plebiscite, I must say I had a good deal of sympathy with them. Their province has an enormous coast line open to the smuggler and they would be quite aware of the impossibility of controlling him under a prohibitory liquor law, which is really free trade in liquor if you evade the law. What can be more demoralizing to a population? Those who have the real interests of the people at heart could not regard it as a wise law. Then there are a large number of people who do not believe in the right of a section of the people controlling their habits or freedom by legislation when they are inoffensive to the public. I would suggest as a measure of reform for the temperance people to consider, and that is that the government should control the manufacture and sale of spirits throughout Canada, leaving wine and beer to the trade. That would be a practical step in temperance reform and would not be objectionable if it could be properly conducted, which there is no reason to fear. It only requires an honesty of purpose in the government and their officials. There are only eight distilleries, the government could purchase them and continue the manufacture and sale throughout the country, not to withdraw it from public use, but to check the evils connected with its consumption and keep it under control.

There is another question which is not mentioned in the speech but which is a practical question, so far as this House is concerned—that is the proposed reform of this honourable body.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—You had better leave that for another day.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I think this is a very good time to discuss it. There is nothing delicate in the subject, and there is no reason why we should not express our opinions and see what effect the proposed change would have upon the constitution of the country. We find that not only has the Premier brought into public discussion the question of the reform of the Senate, but an effort has been made to array the provinces under the same standard. My conception of the constitution of the country is this, that the Senate was wisely created an independent body at confederation, that the constitution of Canada is merely an extension of the British constitution. The constitution of Canada is identically the same as the constitution of the United Kingdom; the constitution of each province in Canada is identically the same as the constitution of Canada and Great Britain. There is a chain of connection between the various governing bodies that rests upon a very sound and safe basis. The powers may be defined as Imperial, National and Provincial with perfect freedom within their specified limits. The object of the British constitution is to have an independent check upon hasty or improper legislation, that the government of the country is merely the mouthpiece of its supporters, and if a sufficient number of supporters can be elected, out of which the cabinet are selected, which have improper designs upon the treasury or upon the resources of the country or for class or corporate legislation, it is most necessary, especially in a large country like this, that there should be an independent check which is the strength of any government, no matter how parties may vary in either chamber of the House. The people of Canada when the question as to the abolition of the Senate or of the undermining of the Senate is brought before them, the result of the discussion among themselves will be that an independent body in Canada is very esential to the safety of the country and the constitution and to the wisdom of the laws to be put on the statute-book. That is the way I feel with regard to the constitution of the Senate. So far as the motions that the provincial governments have passed are concerned, I think they are an interference and a very unwise step, got up more for a Liberal catch cry to distract the attention of the people. I should like to quote two or three expressions of opinion in regard to the upper chambers—Oliver Cromwell upon whom devolved the responsibility of reviving the Parliament he had destroyed was urged to revive it without an Upper House. His reply was that a Parliament unchecked by an Upper House could perpetuate its power subsersive to the constitutional liberty of the people. President Thiers upon whom devolved the responsibility of creating a constitution for France, in 1870, after the Commune, put it on record that he would Anglicize the French constitution if he had his way. Mr. Leckie, M.P., in the Imperial House of Commons, and Historian, is quoted as saying: Of all forms of government the despotism of a single elected and democratic chamber seems to be about the worst; and lastly we have the celebrated saying of John Burns the labour leader upon his return of a tour through the United States, with their elective upper chambers: Give me Albert Edward, limited, rather than the so-called freedom in the United States. And Sir Richard Cartwright seems to have returned from Washington lately with much the same view, as compared with the British constitution. The Ontario Legislature dispensed with an Upper House; the national government imposed no penalty on them, offered no opinion, and did not interfere with them in any way whatever. The result of the resolution which they passed lately on the subject is not worth the paper it is written upon so far as having any constitutional or official effect. It has no way of reaching the Imperial Government in an official way, except the stereotype answer that such a communication has been received. It can only reach the Imperial Government through the Governor General and the cabinet of Canada. Any official communication to be made to the Imperial Government requires to be in the form of a joint address of both Houses of the Parliament of Canada which may contain or be accompanied by a provincial representation but the consent of the Senate has to be obtained before such a joint address can be sent there. When a joint address is sent there, I think the policy of the Imperial Government is to recognize that we are a thoroughly self-governing people that there is no necessity for concurrent legislation on their part and whatever we desire or wish for will be carried out by the Imperial Government quite irrespective of any policy they may have in view—as I understand the trend of their ideas, they go in that direction—that we are a completely self-governing community that the relation of the Imperial Government to Canada is as the relation of the Canadian Government to the provinces. The Senate is the guardian of provincial interests in their national life—the representatives of the contracting provinces thought it essential to guard their future status and the basis of their compact with one another by creating an independant Senate as a guardian of national rights. This Senate would be false to its trust to allow that independence to be impaired. A provincial representation to the Imperial Government against the disruption of the of the constitution of the Senate by this Parliament would have to be heard and respected, but a provincial representation to destroy it would be unconstitutional without the co-operation of this Parliament. The imperial Government has not only the power but it is its duty to veto any legislation that we may pass that is of an unconstitutional character or which threatens the impairment or disruption of the Empire. They have the right and would have the support of every part of the Empire in vetoing any such legislation, but where it only affects us individually as a nation my own impression is that the trend of the Imperial policy is in the direction that I have mentioned, to give the freest possible scope for the people of the British Empire to carry out in their own way their own destiny and their own designs so long as it does not interfere with the constitution or is not likely to impair or lead to the disruption of the British Empire. I took the opposite ground in discussing the bill to appoint a temporary speaker. The hon. member for Barrie, and I think one or two others, did the same in opposition to the opinion of the Premier, Sir John Abbott. The Act giving the power received the concurrent legislation of the British North America Act, but a communication appeared in the cabled press to the effect that it was an undue precaution. I should like to see the constitution of all self governing parts of the Empire stick close to the British constitution. Now, that is the opinion that I hold. I would say to the people of Canada from ten years experience in this House that the Senate is a most valuable adjunct to the legislation of the country for their protection ofth eir liberties and to insure sound legislation, and that even to attempt to alter its constitution by an appeal to the Imperial Parliament would be a useless bit of legislation—that we have the power within ourselves to build up precedent after precedent and work out our own career by experience as it occurs to us from one day to another. We have within ourselves at the present moment the right to hold a conference of the two Houses and it is quite possible that it may be necessary for us to utilize that power. Supposing the Dominion Government was to make use of the budget in order to get outside of the influence of this Senate by including things in that budget which heretofore have always come as separate enactments before this honourable House; in a case of that kind it might be necessary for the Senate to ask for a conference with the government, but to ask power to have the constitution amended so that the House of Commons or the government can force the Senate to a conference, that is quite a different thing. The majority of a House containing 215 members as against a majority of a House containing only 80 members would be out of all proportion and would stultify the founders of Canadian nationality, who determined to stick close to the principles of the constitution under which they had attained to their national life.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The majority in the House of Commons, if the country was not decidedly one way—that is assuming the vote was a fair vote and the constituencies fairly constituted—might be very small. The difference in numbers could not alter the majority.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—But supposing it was the other way—supposing there was a majority of fifty or sixty in favour of the government in the House of Commons, or even a majority of thirty five, they could outvote any majority in this House at any time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend think, if one or the other party should give way, that the House elected by the people and having a large majority in favour of the government should give way?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is the British constitution, and the best of men in dealing with the public affairs of the people require a wholesome check in framing laws for the good government of the people.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, because under the British constitution the government may increase the number.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That power has been used on rare occasions, but in our case the government would have to bring forward some injury that the Senate has done to Canada and the Canadian people before they could persuade the Canadian people that it was wise to take away their independent powers. The whole value of the Senate is in its independent power.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It does not take it away.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I beg pardon, sir, I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. We know very well that in the British Parliament there have been questions brought up and sent to the House of Lords where they have been thrown out year after year. Some matters have even gone before the House of Lords for twenty years and never found a resting place, and some of them were popular. But the whole object of the Senate is to throw back upon the people, to bring to the notice of the people the sort of legislation the government intends to put upon the statute-book, and the people in their domestic relations must turn these questions over in their minds and become thoroughly imbued with what is right or wrong, and so far as this honourable House to-day is concerned, I do not think there is a more fairly representative body of all classes than we have in this House to-day. There is no inferiority mentally or otherwise. There are some people who are so foolish as to criticize weaknesses of one or two members, and others to throw ridicule upon the body as a whole. But I will just say to those people that to criticize one of the hon. gentlemen who comes into this House with a clear brain and a good record and an honourable career, to say that he has to be wheeled into this House in his chair, and for that reason expose him to ridicule, as I understand has been the case in one public journal, I would call their attention to the Scripture and remind them of the fate of those who mocked the prophet Elisha in ancient times. It is on a par with that. So far as the constitution of the Senate is concerned, I have nothing to complain of in my relations. I have found the members are endowed with a large amount of legislative experience more than exists at times in the House of Commons, and are fairly representative of Canadian life. All that we have to do is to fulfil the duties of our position honourably.

There is another question which I wish to bring before the attention of the government, in which I have a personal interest, myself, and that is the question of the repatriation of the 100th regiment, which I had an opportunity of discussing in this House at one time and another. As hon. gentlemen know, I was a member of the 100th regiment in 1858, and joined a regiment that was raised in Canada at that time. It is forty-one years now since we marched out of Canada to take our place in the Imperial service. That regiment was not recruited in Canada after its formation, and it has lost its identity in its Canadian features, although at the unanimous voice of the regiment itself they pleaded when territorial districts were formed that they might have the title Royal Canadian still a portion of their designation. As hon. gentlemen know there was a large petition sent home two years ago to the Prince of Wales, after whom the regiment was called, praying that a depot might be established in Canada for the purpose of recruiting the regiment here, to keep it up to its establishment in order that we might have a distinct and native regiment in the Imperial service, and that we might have also the depot established in some part of Canada to carry on that recruiting, and that a place or places in Canada might be established for the recruiting of that regiment, and for the occasional quartering of the regiment in Canada. It has gone on for years, and there has been a large amount of correspondence in regard to it. I bring it up in my address this afternoon because we are arriving at a critical point in the history of the question. The Imperial Government have, so far as they could in their power, shown a disposition to meet the views of those who brought this question before the Imperial authorities in a large petition which was signed by hon. members of the House, signed by members of the last Parliament and the present Parliament, signed from one end of Canada to the other, one of the largest petitions which has been gotten up. The expression of public opinion from those high in military authority is sufficient I think for the government of Canada to act upon, but there appears to be some influence of one kind or another, whether it is jealousy on the part of the organization in Canada or whether it is jealousy on the part of military organizations in the British service I cannot say. However, it has been hanging fire for some time. I will read to the House some communication that has taken place in the Imperial House of Commons that was raised during the present month when the army estimates were up for discussion. It is in the London Standard of 4th March, which has just arrived. The extract reads:

Mr. Arnold Foster asked the Under Secretary for War to make an announcement as to the destinies of the 100th regiment.

Mr. WYNDHAM—The hon. member had asked about the 100th regiment—Royal Canadians. The Inspector General's report stated that recruiting stations had been opened, but the results were of such a character that he (Mr. Wyndham) preferred not to discuss this experiment at this stage because he had hoped for much more than the results already achieved would lead them to attain. If the results attendant upon their efforts were not so good as they expected, he was in favour of the exercise of a little patience, and against the discussion of the matter until it had something to show. They wished that recruiting should go on in Canada, and that the measures in Canada to assist Imperial forces should be met half way, and that we should adapt our system to meet Canadian aspirations. They would proceed carefully to see if they could get to any common ground with Canada and of that he did not despair.

We are indebted to Mr. Arnold Foster for championing this important question in the Imperial Parliament. I am very glad indeed that he has drawn that statement from Mr. Wyndham, which is satisfactory, except as to the statement he made there as regards the recruiting. I have not heard of any recruiting station or any effort being made at recruiting for the 100th regiment. I am sorry the statement is put in that way that there should be any failure on the part of Canada to furnish the recruits, they certainly will not be obtained without some practical effort. We have in the United States army during the past year I think something like 2,000 Canadians who enlisted, which shows that the love of military adventure is very dear to them. I saw a friend from Winnipeg who has come back from there reports that there are a great number of Canadians in the American army in Manilla and he said in one company consisting of one hundred men there were thirty-eight Canadians. That shows that there is no want of material of those who would like to enlist. While that has been going on there has not been the slightest effort made in the western part of Canada, nor as far as I have heard even in the province of Nova Scotia of any attempt of a practical kind to get any recruits for this regiment at all, and, therefore, I hope the Imperial Government will not go upon any statement of that kind that has been given to Mr. Arnold Foster. Here is some private correspondence that I have in regard to the same matter, in which a friend of mine writes to me and says:

All the home service papers, the Times, and all the great English papers have loyally supported and advocated the move most warmly. How awful it would be for the Dominion to have the finger of scorn and ridicule pointed at her by the whole Empire, for getting up such a large and very representative petition from all parts of the Dominion for the restoration of the 100th, and then backing out of it, because no city or town in Canada will come forward with a few paltry thousand dollars for the erection of ordinary barracks or providing equivalent housing for the regiment, which is to have its ranks filled with their own flesh and blood. The move for repatriation is known all over the world, and has been spoken about and referred to in all the service journals and papers of the great powers. What a bad effect it would have on our other colonies, who are watching its progress, if it fell through! If Canada backs out of it after all her many professions of loyalty and repeated offers in men to assist, in our various campaigns, how do you suppose people in the old country will think of her? Recollect, also, that if the Dominion backs out of it, her reasons will be given out in the Imperial Senate.

Mind you, the fact that for years past young Canadians have been joining the United States service, does not absolve our Imperial authorities from the blame of not having provided the facilities to enable such men to enlist in the British service. Long-headed people at home have written and pointed this out for a long, long time. As I said before, it is bad for Canada that her rovi g young men should enlist under the Stars and Stripes. Judging by all one reads and hears about service under "Uncle Sam," it cannot be compared with the substantial benefits of the British service. The more one thinks of it, the more scandalous it is to think of the British army literally starving for a sufficient supply of recruits, and yet all this magnificent colonial "bone and muscle" is allowed to go off and enlist under an alien flag! I will not go over the old ground of the daily increasing advantages of the Imperial service, further than to let you know that even privates on the lowest rate of pay now receive from $1.75 a week upwards, to do absolutely what they like with; and, of course, non-commissioned officers, bandsmen, and men with good conduct badges get a great deal more in addition to their clothing and maintenance. And then consider the easy work they have! Will you kindly tell me how much "pocket money" the ordinary farm hand or labourer has wherewith to enjoy himself after paying all his keep and other expenses at the end of each week of hard work? Has he free medical attendance and an up-to-date first-rate hospital to fall back on when ill or injured like the soldier? Has he the comforts of a reading room, gymnasium, and all the adjuncts which go to improve his condition?

There is another letter from the Broad Arrow which I would also like to embody in this correspondence which is flattering to Canada but nevertheless true. The letter reads:

> There is in Canada a deep rooted patriotism of the very highest character. Canadian patriotism is not merely a selfish regard for Canada herself, but the far wider and more noble spirit of true Imperialism. Canada is indeed responsible, more than any portion of Her Majesty's dominions, for the re-awakening of the British nation to a true sense of its interests and its responsibilities. Good men and true have worked individually for this great matter here in Great Britain, but it is in Canada that the revival of Imperial patriotism first bore fruit amongst the people at large. The Canadian Pacific Railway demonstrated in concrete form a dawning genius for better things. That railway was the first stepping stone towards the establishment of organized co-operation for Imperial defence. That which was once looked upon as the idle dreaming of exuberant enthusiasts has taken shape and is plainly visible. Imperial federation, the goal upon which our eyes are fixed, is still distant, but we are daily drawing nearer and nearer to it, and before very long we shall actually reach it. But whenever that great day comes, a day so pregnant with beneficial results not only for the Anglo-Saxon race but for all the world, let us never forget that it was the example of Canada which served to maintain the loyalty of our colonies at a time when imbeciles at home were saying "perish India, perish the colonies."

That is pretty strong writing for one of our Imperial military journals. There is another article in the Ottawa Free Press of two or three days ago to show how the opinion in Canada is shaping itself. The article reads:

> Some discussion arose in the Imperial House of Commons a few days ago concerning the former 100th Royal Canadian Regiment. Mr. Arnold Foster very properly asked why the regiment should not be permitted to resume its own name, thus meeting the publicly expressed wishes of the Canadian people, and give a strong incentive to recruiting in the Dominion. He reasonably contended that to wait before the request was complied with until sufficient recruits were raised in this country would be to put the cart before the horse. It is to be regretted that Ottawa has not exhibited more zeal in the direction of supplying accommodation for the regiment, and obtaining the headquarter establishment as suggessted some time ago in these columns. There has been such a degree of apathy witnessed that it is no wonder if the Imperial authorities interpret it as national indifference and act accordingly.

Those are some public expressions of opinion from amongst numerous ones that have appeared in regard to this question. The British service is one of the most honourable services there is in the world; it has attained a degree of perfection and comfort for the soldiers engaged in it beyond anything that the world has ever known. You have only to look at the results of the British service with the reconquering of the Soudan, with its enormous mileage covered and its inland character, conducted successfully carried to a successful conclusion for an expenditure of one million pounds, I think—I forget whether it is one million or five million pounds, but if my memory serves me one million pounds represents the cost of last years campaign, which resulted in the overthrow of the tyrannical and obstructive rule of the Mahdi in the Upper Nile, compare that with the expenditure of the American army in Cuba, of something like one hundred or one hundred and fifty million dollars. That would show the power of organization and the great prestige that has followed the footsteps of the British army. The British Government have been most kind and generous in the openings they have made for Canadian officers to join the Imperial army, and I have the proud distinction to say, on behalf of the Canadian in Egypt, the success that Captain Girouard, of the Royal Engineers, the son of Judge Girouard of the Supreme Court, has met with in Egypt. He was selected by General Kitchener for the purpose of constructing and taking charge of the railway that was constructed under his direction as part of the military operations of the force. General Kitchener would have no other, and he would allow no other officer to be placed above him. The result has been that he has most successfully carried out the operations that were connected with the railway service in connection with the force, and he has been appointed president of the railway system of Egypt at a salary of 2,000 pounds a year. There is a young Canadian not more than thirty-five or thirty-six years who has earned that honourable, responsible and remunerative position, at the hands of the British Government. I can mention many other instances not quite so prominent as that where Canadian officers have distinguished themselves and been rewarded. They have been lost in the service of Canada because there is nothing to distinguish them here from other officers and unfortunately some of them coming back here to give their services in their own departments as Canadians and as Imperial officers, that their identity is lost even there. What we are seeking for is that the opportunity shall be open to anybody who chooses to enlist in the British service? It is an honourable service and a well paid service and pensions are given for long service, and there is nothing that a man need regret in going and seeing something of the world by a three, five or ten year tour in the British army. I know ten years of my life was spent in it. It gives you travel and opportunities that you cannot attain otherwise on account of the expense attached to it. Several new regiments have been lately raised, and I see it stated that there were three or four regiments still to be raised. I observed also that it was the intention of the Imperial authorities or rather it was suggested that there should be a regiment of Irish guards as well as Scotch guards and the Horse guards and English guards and the Coldstream guards. The headquarters of the 100th regiment as it is constituted to-day are in Ireland and the depot is in Birr, and it is enlisted by men from Ireland. We want the 100th regiment as it exists to-day in the territorial district of Leinster to be recruited in Canada and its place supplied in Leinster by another regiment, or I would make this suggestion to the Imperial authorities that if they are going to raise a regiment of Irish guards that they could transfer the men from the present 100th regiment to that regiment and build up the old 100th with Canadian recruits. I know perfectly well that there will be no difficulty if the effort is only made in a proper way. The position in which it stands in the army list at present is as follows:—

The Prince of Wales Leinster Regiment (Royal Canadians).
Regimental District No. 100, Birr.
The Prince of Wales Plume,
A Maple Leaf.
NIAGARA.
CENTRAL INDIA.
1st Batallion, (100 Foot).
2nd " (109 Foot).
3rd " (King's County Militia).
4th " (Queen's County Militia).
5th " (Royal Mealte).
DEPOT, BIRR, IRELAND.
Uniform, Scarlet.
Facings, Blue.

I should like to see this read:

The Prince of Wales Royal Canadian Regiment. Regimental District, No. (Depot, Canada). Insignia, Niagara belongs to the 100th Colours.
Central India belongs to the 109th.
1st Batallion 100 Foot.
2nd " 100 Foot.

And three batallions of our militia attached from Ontario and Quebec where the 100th regiment was disbanded in 1818, and the present 100th Royal Canadian was raised in 1858.

That policy could be carried out. The Imperial Government as I have said before have shown all the disposition in their power. They have sent the Royal Canadian regiment to be stationed in Halifax some year or two ago to show their disposition in regard to it. I see unfortunately in the newspapers that in the list of exchanges, which they publish in the spring of the year in relation to the moves to take place in the fall of the year, moving from one district to another, that the 100th regiment is to be moved from Halifax. If that regiment is to be moved from Halifax we may give up all hope of instituting a broad policy with regard to our military life which is a policy that is worthy the consideration of our government, and I would respectfully ask you to give your best attention at this moment to the solution of this question. It would appear from the correspondence that I have read that it is partly due to the apathy or policy of the Canadian Government in regard to the matter, but it only just wants the Canadian Government to take the question up in a broad spirit to bring it to a successful conclusion, the supply of barrack accommodation and medical attendance is all that is asked for on the part of Canada. We have heard the criticisms made with regard to our Postmaster General when he said: "We hold a vaster empire than has been." If we do not pay one single solitary penny to the Imperial service and if we do not unite with Great Britain even to have a recruiting ground in Canada or to furnish the accommodation necessary for the quarters of a regiment and its depôt, what right have we to have that motto on our stamp? If there is any one in Canada who should take this white man's burden upon his shoulders of bringing this matter to a successful conclusion it is the Postmaster General in order to make good in part the boast he has put upon his postage stamps that we hold a vaster empire than has been, he should support the Minister of Militia to bring the negotiations to a successful termination. When the doors open allowing commerce free, and from the standpoint of Imperial defence in the interest of the worlds civilization the lines are drawn closer together, and when we have cemented our union, so far as it is our duty to do, the boast may come in its proper place but it will not take place until we have made one step in the direction I have brought to the attention of this honourable House to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was not my intention to address the House on the Speech, or to make any observations on the present occasion, until my hon. friend from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) made certain statements which I thought should not go uncontradicted. I endeavoured at the moment to correct him, but the House evidently thought it was not proper or courteous in the middle of a speech to interject the arguments I wished to use. It, therefore, compels me to make some observations on the Speech. I take first the hon. gentleman's charge against the government of having abandoned the policy they advocated in opposition. It is quite true in 1881, 1882 and 1883, when the National Policy was being commenced, that we found it necessary to criticise very seriously and severely the departure from the lines which had previously prevailed in Canada. We thought it was very unwise. The argument used at that time was that it was being adopted to force the United States into reciprocity—"Reciprocity in trade or reciprocity in tariffs," became the war cry of the Conservative party. We all remember that even Sir John Macdonald announced at the time himself that it was not intended to permanently raise the tariff; it was to be rearranged. We have the celebrated telegram sent to a gentleman in the Maritime Provinces announcing that fact. I will point my hon. friend to a few instances where the present government have reduced the tariff. The farmers of the North-west use agricultural implements largely. They use ploughs, harrows, hoes, reapers, and many other articles of which iron forms the basis. The duty on iron, I stated to my hon. friend in the course of his remarks, was cut at least 50 per cent. He seems to deny that. I have sent for the statute showing what the duty was on iron under the tariff of 1894, and compared it with our tariff. I find scrap iron, &c., was $4 per ton. That was cut to $1 per ton under the tariff of 1897. Iron and steel ingots, blooms, slabs, puddles and so on, was $5 per ton, and that was cut to $2 per ton. Iron in pig was originally $4 per ton, and that was cut to $2.50 per ton. That shows a very substantial decrease in the duties imposed by the tariffs respectively of 1894 and 1897.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And a bonus was placed on it instead.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The farmers and manufacturers have the advantage.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who paid the increase in the bounty?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The bounty was not equivalent to that, nor was the quantity turned out anything like the consumption of iron in Canada. It led to a large importation from the United States, because of recent years the United States is a larger producer of iron than Great Britain. I have called attention to the reduction in duty of certain articles. There are about four hundred items in the tariff, and a very considerable reduction took place in over one hundred of them. Take files, adzes, cleavers, hatchets, saws—they were reduced from 35 per cent to 23 and a fraction—that is, taking in the 25 per cent preferential. Tools, scythes, reaping hooks, edging knives, hoes, pronged forks, snathes, post hole diggers, agricultural tools, not otherwise specified—they were reduced from 25 per cent to 18 and a fraction per cent—that is, taking in the 25 per cent preferential. Binder twine was put on the free list, as was barbed wire.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Still, it is dearer now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, in consequence of a large proportion of the raw material for binder twine coming from the Phillipine Islands. You cannot say that putting an article on the free list makes it dearer.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Make it free to England, and it will get cheaper.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is free to the world. You can buy binder twine in any part of the world, and it comes in free. Surely it is impossible to artificially help it beyond that plane. I will give another illustration to my hon. friend of the reduced taxation.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I suppose my hon. friend saw the dividends that the institution at Stratford paid.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, like all the other manufacturers they sent a deputation here and said we were going to slaughter the industry unless they were protected, and last year they paid 40 or 60 per cent dividends showing at least that they did not require protection. I have mentioned some of the actual reductions in the tariff. I will read now from the last volume of the Trade and Commerce Returns a statement of goods entered for consumption. I will take a year when the duties correspond with those of last year. The duties last year were twenty-two millions odd; in 1888 the duties were twenty-two millions odd. The importation in 1888 were $102,000,000 and in 1898 $130,000,000. The $130,000,000 paid no higher duty than the goods entered for consumption in 1888.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is not that rather ancient history?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It shows that the consumers in Canada saved the duty on $28,000,000. On that amount of importations nothing was paid, because the same duty was paid on $102,000,000 as was paid on $130,000,000. There is a patent fact that no logic can possibly overthrow. There must have been a considerable lowering of duties or an increase in the free list, because the statement of goods entered for consumption embraces both.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Some of that lowering was done by the Conservative government before they went out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. I have referred to 1888 first. I say that under the tariff of 1888 goods to the value of $102,000,000 were imported into Canada on which $22,000,000 were paid as duty; and last year, after the new tariff had been introduced, there was an importation of $138,000,000, on which no more than $22,000,000 duty was paid, showing plainly that the tariff reform was carried out to that extent at all events. Our tariff reform, no doubt, does not come up to the desire of my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The Conservative party deserves some credit for that. The Conservative party made several reductions since 1888, and, therefore, should get credit for a portion of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No doubt they are entitled to credit for a portion of it, but it was not very material. My hon. friend criticises very severely the conduct of the present government in advocating free trade when in opposition. The present government would be derelict of their duty if they refused to recognize the conditions under which they found this country when they took office. Had they introduced free trade there would have been a terrible destruction of capital; industries that had grown up under the law, in which people had invested their money with the idea that there was some degree of permanence in the tariff, would have been ruined. Statesmen must recognize the surroundings. How many times did Sir Robert Peel change his policy? We know in one year he went over from protection to free trade, but he did not introduce free trade as rapidly as my hon. friend desires it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, at once.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it took sixteen years.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The reduction in grain was made in four years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This government have only been in office a little over three years, and they think the reductions that have been made have been as rapid as the circumstances warranted. Had they gone faster they might have done irreparable harm. I do not consider the tariff permanent. If the tariff can be lowered it will be lowered, but it is our duty, and the duty of all statesmen, not to be bound by hard and fast rules. Men in opposition may give utterance to views which, under the responsibility of office, they cannot carry out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then they should not make them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is quite within their province to do so. It is the practice to do so. In a country that is growing and developing as rapidly as Canada is, you cannot lay down a policy that would be prudent four or five years from now, because you would be stultified. You might find the conditions so changed it would be impossible to carry them out. They were visionary at the hour probably and could not be carried out. I think it is clear that this government has gone as fast for free trade as was wise and prudent. No matter what their views were, they would have been guilty of serious dereliction of duty had they proceeded any faster than they have gone, and wrecked many industries that had the sanction of law for many years under various Acts passed, from time to time, and which had to be respected and could not be swept away by the change of government. A good deal of criticism has been passed by some hon. gentlemen on the action of the government of Canada in holding the conference at Washington. I do not think it quite lies in the mouths of my hon. friends to use any undue criticism in that direction. Their attempts at treaty making with the United States have not been attended with marked success. We know that in 1888 the present leader, in the other House, of the Conservative party went to Washington and, as he supposed, was successful in making a treaty. He came back, was duly applauded, and the Parliament of Canada was so satisfied with the result that they placed the treaty on the statute book. Needless to say it was not ratified in the United States

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They succeeded in making a treaty and the President of the United States recommended to Congress the adoption of the treaty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What was the use of that when they would not adopt it?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I say they made a treaty and the President of the United States recommended the conditions of that treaty to Congress for adoption as being fair and equitable to both countries; but the prejudices of the people of the United States, incited by the then opposition in this country of which my hon. friend was one, induced them to reject it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was not a success, at all events.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is true.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In 1891 the Conservative party carried the election by the announcement that they had the power to make a treaty with the United States, and that they merely wanted the people of Canada to give them authority to conclude a treaty. That was announced in a very formal and official way, after which Parliament was dissolved. In the Speech from the Throne delivered in 1891, we have these words:

> My advisers, availing themselves of opportunities which were presented in the closing months of last year, caused the administration of the United States to be reminded of the willingness of the government of Canada to join in making efforts for the extension and development of the trade between the Republic and the Dominion, as well as for the friendly adjustment of those matters of an international character which remain unsettled. I am pleased to say that these representations have resulted in an assurance that, in October next, the government of the United States will be prepared to enter on a conference to consider the best means of arriving at a practical solution of these important questions. The papers relating to this subject will be laid before you. Under the circumstances, and in the hope that the proposed conference may result in arrangements beneficial to both countries, you will be called upon to consider the expediency of extending, for the present season, the principal provisions of the protocol annexed to the Washington Treaty, 1888, known as the modus vivendi.

On the strength of that the government went to the country and captured the vote because it was announced that the United States were quite ready then to enter into a treaty which was to be, no doubt, beneficial to Canada. We know that Mr. Blaine, the Secretary of State, repudiated any idea that they had entertained such a proposition—denied that there was any authority for the announcement that the United States contemplated making a treaty with Canada. It effected its purpose, however, and resulted as we know, in nothing. The present conference had for its source the circumstances which arose when the negotiations were entered into in 1893, under which the regulations of the Behring Sea in regard to seals were to be revised every fifth year. It was believed that, with the experience of five years, new regulations might be adopted with the object of preserving seal life. That was the source and origin of the present conference at Washington. As hon. gentlemen know, in the last two years many other questions have arisen that it was of the utmost importance, in the interests of both countries, should be settled. Owing to the excitement in the Yukon district and Alaska, it became very important that the line of demarcation there between the two countries should be defined. An Alien Labour Law had been adopted in the United States and we had followed suit. The inland fisheries required attention because our lakes were being depleted of fish.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is it true that negotiations are going on in Washington in regard to a modus vivendi in connection with access to the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware. The hon. gentleman knows very well that it was in consequence of a difference between the commissioners of the United States and those of Canada in reference to the importance of having at once the boundary delimited that the conference broke up. That was publicly announced. Our commissioners felt that it was exceedingly important that the line should be defined, and it did not seem probable that six commissioners on one side and six on the other were likely to reach a conclusion, and our desire was to refer it to an independent tribunal that would carry out the views of both parties and fix the line where it ought to be. The hon. gentleman is aware of that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I saw a reference to it in a newspaper.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That would show the absolute necessity that exists for the delimitation of the line; otherwise difficulties will arise. The miners of one country or the other may be encroaching over the line which should form the true boundary.

Some considerable discussion has arisen in reference to the plebiscite, and I desire to make a few observations on that subject and express what I think are the sound principles on which the government ought to act. The crucial point at the present moment appears to be what proportion of votes would have justified the government in adopting legislation in conformity with the desire of the prohibitionists. I have always held the view that a law of that kind could not possibly be enforced unless it had the moral support of a very considerable majority of the whole people of the country. Whatever views or feelings we may entertain on the subject, we must all admit that the great majority of the people do not regard drinking as a crime. A law against drinking is not on a plane with a law against burglary, larceny, or personal rights of individuals. It is what is called a sumptuary law, and one that each individual feels he is amply justified in resisting if it does not meet with his approbation. In a country like Canada, with a frontier, taking the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the frontier of the United States, of 10,000 miles, it would be absolutely impossible to enforce such a law unless you had the great body of the people behind it. Some twenty years ago we had to consider what proportion ought to have the right to enforce prohibition on their neighbours under certain limitations only, because under the Scott Act an individual could buy and bring into the district for his own use any liquor he desired, but they could not have sold within the district or manufactured for sale within the district, and discussions arose in this chamber as to what proportion of the whole community would be fair and reasonable to bring a law of that kind into operation. The hon. senator for Toronto (Mr. Allan), who supported the measure, was strongly of opinion that at least a full majority of the whole vote should be recorded in favour of a law of that kind before it could be adopted; failing that, there should be a majority of two-thirds of the recorded vote; but all were agreed, and the temperance people themselves approved of the principle, that the law should not be initiated unless 25 per cent of the people demanded it. That is, before the petition could be entertained there must be sworn evidence that 25 per cent of the ratepayers and voters had approved of the Act and desired to have the question submitted, so that there was a basis laid down at all events for the initiation of it. It was regarded as so exceptional a law that at least 25 per cent of the voters must have asked to have the law put in force.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Where is that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the Act of 1878. It cannot be brought into operation unless a petition asking for the enforcement of the Act is signed by 25 per cent of the voters, and the signatures must be verified. The mere signing of a paper is not sufficient; every signature must be verified as a bona fide one, and the signature of a person entitled to vote. Now, I say that the temperance people regarded that as a reasonable proposition. There were present deputations of them from various parts of the country, from the time the bill was drafted and when it was before this House in its various stages. It was before the Senate for six weeks. The Senate took a deep interest in it, and every effort was made to have the Act as perfect as possible. Very many hon. gentlemen, some of whom are here to-day, will remember that we were, I think, five or six weeks discussing the measure. We had committee after committee on the subject, and every clause was carefully scanned. There were from one to two hundred of them—but all admitted that a law of that kind should not go into operation unless it had the moral support of a very considerable number of people in any district in which it was to be put in operation. Now, in the plebiscite the other day 56 per cent of the people did not vote at all. Of the vote that was recorded, the vote in favour of prohibitory legislation was not quite 23 per cent. In some districts of Canada the vote was very small, districts where they did not seem to think it was worth while going to the polls, where they did not regard it as a practical issue. Take for instance the province of British Columbia, the vote there was insignificant, a mere fraction of the community. The vote in Prince Edward Island was probably the largest of any vote relatively in any province. They have there the Scott Act in all parts of the province except Charlottetown. In Queens, although they had defeated the Scott Act only very recently, yet they seemed to have abstained from voting on this occasion. The vote was extremely small, and did not seem to indicate that there has been any active sentiment either way. The hon. gentleman himself explained that the liquor people did not think it worth while to oppose it. It has been stated that in the province of Quebec there had been some improper voting. That is not an element that need be considered when the answer of the government is based entirely on the proportion only of those who asked for legislation. But I think there is a great deal of misconception with regard to the voting in Quebec, as I find the percentage of voting is not any larger than the percentage of votes in Ontario In the province of Ontario the vote was carried by about 30,000 odd. When it was submitted before, under the provincial plebiscite, it was carried by 80,000.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And in the Dominion it was only 30,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—A great discrepancy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The reason was that either the views of the people had changed or when this question was submitted to them in earnest they would not support prohibition. It was submitted simply as an abstract question in Ontario before, when this 80,000 majority was recorded. It was simply an abstract proposition. It was carried even in the city of Ottawa. The plebiscite was defeated in the city of Ottawa last September.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Was there not another election going on at the same time?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, a municipal election.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—And that brought the public together.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That probably would be it, but this legislation was asked for by the temperance people.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—No.

The Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend says no, but he does not speak for the whole community. It was announced by Liberal leaders on the platform that they would consent to the introduction of a prohibitory law if the people asked for it, that if the will of the people was so expressed they were prepared to legislate, and that is the pith of the resolution which was adopted at the convention in Ottawa. The important words were that the will of the people should be ascertained. No man will pretend to say that on a question of that kind the will of the majority is shown by only 23 per cent asking for it. It could not be argued with any degree of fairness that it should be granted if only 23 per cent are asking for it, and a law of that sort could not possibly be enforced in a country like Canada under such circumstances. At the present time we have a very large amount of smuggling in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. I daresay my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island will confirm what I say that this country is now, and has been for many years, spending large sums of money in order to catch the smugglers who bring in spirits from St. Pierre, Miquelon and other points. The revenues are seriously affected by the smuggling which goes on and although large sums of money are expended there to put down smuggling, we are unable to check it absolutely. We may minimize it but cannot effectually stop it. There are so many opportunities of bringing liquor into Canada with its exposed border that it is absolutely impossible to prevent it being brought into the country. If that is the case when liquor can be obtained and bought within the limits of Canada in all parts of it freely to-day, how much more would the smuggling be if there was a law against its use in Canada. If there was a law that it could not be manufactured or sold in Canada, why 10,000 men would not be sufficient to keep out the smugglers.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—In fact I have reason to believe that a large number of people in the liquor trade voted for the plebiscite to show that people would then smuggle it extensively.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been found impossible in other countries. Maine has a stringent law that liquors are not allowed to be sold or imported, and yet, as a matter of fact, liquors are bought and obtained all through the districts. The government are powerless. I saw a letter from Governor Brading the other day where he sets out the difficulties of the situation, and he says it is absolutely impossible to keep the liquor out. He says that the judges appointed to try the liquor cases will not condemn. The detectives employed to prosecute the persons who sell the liquor will prosecute for the moment, and then will go to the bar next day and take part themselves in the drinking that is going on.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The trouble arises from the fact that they are bribed.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—And so it has been in the state of Maine during the last fifteen years.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman evidently does not believe in prohibition—thinks it is not practicable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I believe in prohibition.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But you believe it cannot be carried out?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I believe it cannot be carried out unless you have a large proportion of the people behind you. I am a total abstainer. I do not believe that liquor is useful under any circumstances—a great many prohibitionists believe it is good as medicine. In the pledges that are given, and in the words of the vote submitted the other day, it was only to be prohibited as a beverage; it could be used in other ways. It can be used as a doctor prescribes it. I do not think it is useful when prescribed. I think it is poison to the human body. I have always been of that opinion. I know many hon. gentlemen will not agree with me, but that is my view of it, and I would like to live in a country where prohibition could be carried out. It is an ideal country, which I do not think I shall ever see.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You would not emigrate to such a country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; I would not like to leave Canada. Canada has improved. It is the most advanced temperance country in the world. We have gone on as fast, probably, as the most ardent prohibitionist could have hoped for. If you consult the returns of the liquor traffic in Canada, you will find the consumption of liquor has been going down till it is far below the average consumed by any other country in the world. There was a meeting at Berne of advanced prohibitionists of other countries and Canada got the palm for the lowest consumption per head of any country on the face of the globe. That is a most pleasant state of things. But the prohibitionists are not fair when they say the government ought to enforce prohibition. Governments are just what the people make them. Do hon. gentlemen suppose that if the government enacted a prohibitory law on the demand of 23 per cent of the electorate that it would be in existence at the next election? Not at all. It would be swept away. The hon. gentleman from New Brunswick illustrated what I now say. In that province, under Sir Leonard Tilley and other advanced men, prohibition was introduced, and what were the consequences? The demoralization which prevailed was so great that the House had to be dissolved and a new House elected. Forty members out of forty-one who were returned were pledged to repeal the Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose that is the reason why the government do not introduce a prohibitory law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We know we could not enforce it unless the large majority of the people were behind us. Any sensible man would realize that. I give you the case of New Brunswick, where the people clamoured for prohibition and they got it and kept it for two years, and they found the drinking was worse than before. They could not enforce the law, although the public sentiment there was very much stronger in favour of prohibition than the public sentiment of Canada to-day.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—They only kept it nine months.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And forty out of forty-one of the members returned to the House were pledged to repeal the Act. I say the temperance people are inconsistent. They have the opportunity in every province of this country to reduce the drinking opportunities. They can reduce the saloons and reduce the taverns and the shops where liquor is sold, but they will not do it. They support aldermen who vote to keep up the taverns, and yet they denounce the government because they will not pass a prohibition law. The whole matter is in the hands of the people. I have always maintained that the true principle was to remove the opportunities for drink. I found that just according to the number of tavern licenses, and according to the number of saloons on the corners of the streets, just in proportion will the opportunity of drunkenness arise and drunkenness increase. But the temperance people are inconsistent. They go to municipal polls and they have the opportunity, wherever they are in a majority, to elect men who will refuse to give out licenses and yet they will not do it. They will not do it themselves, and why should they ask governments to do it, simply for the purpose of making them commit suicide, for that is what it would be. No government in this country even, though Canada has advanced to the extent that it has, could live if it adopted prohibition, because it is not possible to enforce it with 10,000 miles of frontier. You could not get officials honest enough to carry it out. Take the Scott Act and see how it was abused in many localities. Medical men were permitted to give certificates where they considerd the patients required it. I have brought out in this House evidence in hundreds of cases where medical men had prescribed a gallon of brandy, the patients to take two glasses a day, and where they prescribed two dozen bottles of ale, two tumblers to be taken per day. That was turning the law into a farce, and in a locality where the temperance sentiment was supposed to exist to a great extent. They carried the Act there and the temperance people stood by and they said "it is none of our business to enforce the law; get some one else to enforce it." We had provided machinery in the Scott Act. We provided that the Inland Revenue officer was to be the officer in each district who was to enforce it and to employ persons under it. What was the consequence? When the Act was adopted the Inland Revenue officer did not carry out the law and his chief did not direct him to carry it out, and there was no one behind the law to enforce it. It could not be carried out of its own motion, and it got into disrepute simply because there was not sufficient public sentiment behind it. I say advisedly that there is not sufficiently strong public sentiment in Canada to enforce a prohibition law, and it is perfectly idle to expect the government to attempt to carry into execution a law which the people are not behind. There are portions of Canada where the law can be enforced. I believe Prince Edward Island is sufficiently advanced to adopt a prohibition law. There are other portions of the country, probably New Brunswick, possibly Nova Scotia, but it would be idle to talk of enforcing it in British Columbia where you have not ten per cent in favour of prohibition. It is ridiculous to ask the government to enforce a law where the people do not want it enforced and where they will not sustain the government in the action they take. I simply rose on this occasion to correct the statements of my hon. friend from Shell River, because I thought it was important that they should be explained from my point of view at all events.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY resumed the debate. He said:—It was not my intention to have spoken on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, only for a few remarks which were made by the hon. Secretary of State just before recess. I felt, however, that if I did not make some few remarks in answer to statements made by that hon. gentleman, I would be remiss in my duty as a representative of the people whom I have the honour of representing in the Senate. I may say that I do not desire to speak as a party man, because I think that every hon. senator here should speak as one representing the interests of Canada and not in the interest of any particular party. It has always been my course to speak in the interests of the country and not in the interest of party. It is true I was appointed to the Senate by the Conservative party, but there was no condition when I was appointed that I should support any particular policy, and in all the elections with which I have had anything to do individually throughout my public life, I have only pledged myself to support two policies of the Conservative party—that is, a protective tariff and the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. After that I told the parties who voted for me and whose candidate I was, that I should vote on every measure on its merits, and that I would not be tied to the apron strings of any party. I have voted in the House of Commons and in the Senate as my judgment dictated, on the various questions that have come before me. I have pursued that course in the Senate on all matters from the election of a page to the defeating of measures brought before this House. And I hope to continue in that course all the way through while I have the honour to hold a position in this chamber. Whilst in some respects I differ from the policy of the present government, it is not from a party stand point; I differ from them as I might differ from the directors in a corporation with which I might be connected, not in a spirit of opposition, but because I cannot approve of their policy. I do not desire to say an unkind or ugly word against the government of the day. I speak as one interested in the future of the country and having some stock in it. I look on the government of this country in the same way that I look upon my own private business, when I hire a man there has to be confidence between him and me. I hire him for certain wage and he expects that I shall pay him according to agreement. If I fail to carry out my agreement I forfeit his confidence and lose credit, and when I want to hire another man, I will find difficulty, because I am regarded as not being a man of my word. The same principle applies to the government of a country. The hon. gentleman who moved the Address the other day so very eloquently and ably—and it is a pleasure to know when a new member is appointed that he is able to take an active and creditable part in the proceedings in the House—said that Canada was enjoying a large measure of prosperity in every branch of trade and industry. I thought when the hon. gentleman made that remark that his object was to give the credit for that prosperity to the policy of the present administration. In my opinion the present prosperity of Canada is largely due to the policy of the Conservative party. I do not say that in a spirit of partizanship; I say it as an independent man. At the time the National Policy was adopted, great objection was taken to it, and very justly, because we cannot all expect to be of one opinion. The National Policy, so called, was a new departure. I remember in 1867 the possibility of higher taxation was one very great obstacle in the way of carrying confederation in the province of New Brunswick. My father was a candidate on the confederate side in that campaign, and I took a very active part in the election. One argument with which we were met was that the tariff would be very high, that the provinces of Quebec and Ontario would override us and we would have to pay tribute to them. The maritime provinces were in favour of a low tariff. After a few years depression and hardship came on the people of Canada. The manufacturing industries of the country were subjected to very unfair competition from the United States. To some extent, and in some industries, the same thing is occurring to-day. The Mackensie government favoured a revenue tariff, notwithstanding the hardships to which our people were subjected through Canada being made a slaughter market. The result was that Sir John Macdonald offered then, as a remedy for the evils that existed, that if Mr. Mackenzie would introduce a protective tariff he would support that policy. Mr. Mackenzie was true to his principles and opposed that proposition. Sir John Macdonald was forced to go to the polls with that protective policy and was returned by an overwhelming majority. Then he inaugurated the National Policy. I was a candidate in New Brunswick and no one supported more firmly the policy of straight protection than I did on that occasion. The hon. Secretary of State referred to a letter sent by Sir John Macdonald to Mr. Boyd in which he said that it was only an adjustment of the tariff that was intended. I said I was in favour of a readjustment if it would establish protection and build up our industries and employ the labour of the country, so that they in turn would buy my products as a farmer. What was the result? When that policy was introduced in the House of Commons by Sir John Macdonald, the gentlemen who are now in the government opposed it. I do not find any fault with them for opposing it, if they believed they were right and felt that a protective tariff was not in the interests of the country or would build up the industries of the country. They did not believe that the railway policy would help the country. They abused both policies, not very effectively, but their opposition had this effect they weakened the confidence of the importers and manufacturers to the extent that they looked for a change of tarff. They promised to wipe the protective duties off the statute-book altogether. That discouraged those who desired to go into manufacturing. A man who, under the circumstances, would invest his capital would be unwise, because a change of government might take place, and the adoption of free trade would close up his factory. The importer of goods would have the same feeling in his mind. He would say what is the use of my importing a large quantity of goods when in a short time the tariff may be changed and I will have my shelves filled with goods on which 20 or 30 per cent duty has been paid, when the same class of goods will be brought in free of duty under a free trade government. That was the state of things that continued all those years from 1878 to 1896. The Liberal party preached this doctrine. I do not say they did not believe it but that was the doctrine they preached, and when the hon. gentleman referred to the measure of prosperity this country enjoys, I ask him how was it possible to expect, with one party declaring for and promising free trade, that business would be developed? Now, there is an entirely different state of things. The government came into power pledged to free trade. They found fault with Sir John Thompson for sending commissioners among the people to inquire how the tariff was working, and what improvements could be made for the benefit of the country. The late Sir John Thompson in sending the late Mr. Wood and Mr. Wallace to inquire how the tariff was working pursued a wise and proper policy, because the government were not all business men. They sent these commissioners to inquire of and receive suggestions from those who were engaged in the different industries how the tariff affected them. But what was the result on the other side of the House? They pooh-poohed the idea. They said: "you do not know how you should frame your tariff, and you have to get instructions from the business men of the country;" but the moment the hon. gentlemen get into power they had to adopt the same principles themselves and sent their Minister of Customs and the Finance Minister to get the very information that they said all those years they possessed, and the very information they pooh-poohed the other government for trying to acquire. They have come into power and they are in a different position from the Conservative party. There is no opposition now. The business men of the country have become satisfied—they have it from the lips of the ministers that they endorse the very policy which for years in opposition they had condemned. They have made some slight changes it is true, and I regret to say that wherever they have made those changes they have been a detriment to the country as I will show before I am done. The manufacturer to-day says: "I am satisfied; those men who have been preaching the destruction of the Canadian tariff for the last eighteen years endorse the policy of the Conservative party from beginning to end." The merchant who imports goods says: "I have no further fear, now." For eighteen months prior to the last election, I thought the Conservative party was going to be defeated. Not only were these men preaching against the Conservative trade policy, but there was a religious element in the matter that was sure to defeat them. At least a large portion of the people believed they would be defeated, so the manufacturers and merchants arranged with the other party that they would not destroy their industries. The merchants got rid of their goods, emptied their warehouses and cleared off their shelves, not knowing, but rather expecting, that the policy of the men who were then out, when they came in, would be carried out—that is to say they would frame a tariff on a revenue basis. They also believed the opposition when they said they would not increase the public expenditure if they came into power; but what has been the result? These men emptied their warehouses and prepared for the coming event. In that way the farmers, the consumers, also prepared. They said we will do without these things four or five months longer; we can get them cheaper after the change of government. The importer, the manufacturer, and the consumer prepared for the change The present government came in, but they did not change the policy of their predecessors; they rather confirmed it in the strongest possible manner, and what was the result? Everything boomed at once; there was an empty market to be supplied. The manufacturer went to work with greater energy because the National Policy was not to be disturbed. He knew the policy of the Conservative party would be followed out and he could go on manufacturing. The importer said: "there is no danger now, I can enlarge my business," and, therefore, in that way I say the present prosperity is not due to the policy of the present government, because they have done nothing to change the policy of their predecessors. They have done nothing to improve the condition of things and create the great prosperity that they now seek credit for since they came into power. The hon. minister opposite referred to the binder twine industry. I am a farmer and know something about binder twine. The last year under the Conservative administration I bought all the binder twine I wanted at 6 and 6½c. per lb. This year, before I left home, I asked a dealer in binder twine how much he would charge me this year for it. We have 500 acres of grain, and it takes about 2½ lbs. of twine for an acre with a good crop. The agent asked me the night before I left home 12c. per lb. for binder twine. Under this free trade policy of the present administration the price of that article has doubled. Under the late administration, when these gentlemen who are now the administration, were in opposition, we know what a great hubbub was raised over combines in the country. There is the greatest combine on binder twine to-day that you will find in America on any article. The combine is not confined alone to the United States. This government, as well as the Ontario Government have done wrong in relation to this matter. They manufacture central prison binder twine in Ontario, and penitentiary binder twine in Kingston, and they have sold that binder twine to two men, thus enabling them to go into a combine with the United States manufacturers, and the result is that binder twine in the North-west is 12 cents a pound, whereas under the old tariff it was only 6 or 6½ cents. Under the free trade policy we are at the mercy of the United States and have to pay 12 cents, and it will amount in my case to $50 or $60 of a tax, and a great many farmers pay $100 more than if there had been a fair protection, and legitimate industry had been encouraged throughout Canada, leaving one manufacturer to compete with another. Instead of that, there is a combine by placing the trade in the hands of two individuals who have the opportunity of working with the United States combine, which could not be done if there was 12 per cent duty. In the matter of coal oil, the merchants in the town in which I live club together and buy a carload of oil in barrels. I do not know how many barrels it would be, but they take a carload and they get it at a reduction. When the farmer gets the oil it costs 45 cents per gallon. There is no reduction. It is 25, 30, 35, 40 and so on. I distinctly state to the honourable House that I have not bought a gallon of coal oil that I did not pay 40 cents for, wherefore, when the government made a pretense of taking off a cent in the tax on coal oil, they put it in the hands of a few merchants, and the great body who consume that article pay as much as they ever did.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I only pay 25 cents a gallon.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The hon. gentleman does not get good oil.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The best in the country.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—What did the hon. gentleman pay for it before?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Twenty-nine cents.

Hon. Mr PROWSE—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Beg pardon, yes.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I live 2,000 miles from the hon. gentleman. He gets his coal oil in United States vessels and may get it cheaper, but we have to pay heavy freight.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We pay 50 cents a gallon.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What has that to do with the government?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They do not allow tank cars to come into our country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman supported that provision before the change of government and he is speaking for himself.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I speak for the North-west, and I say that at Qu'Appelle they charge still more. I am not speaking of one particular point, but speaking of the whole western territories, and it is well known that what I am saying is correct in every particular. Immigration is another matter about which I wish to say a few words. The policy of the Reform party in our country was against what they call pauper immigration, and they passed resolutions on the subject. They had hole and corner meetings in the country and were loud in their dnunciation of the government for permitting pauper immigration. There was no pauper immigration into the country until last year, I think. There were men who came into the country with very little means, and I think they would be desirable men to work for the farmers, but the hon. gentlemen opposite claimed that every man who came into the country should have the means to fit himself out to carry on agricultural operations, and not be an expense to the public. The present government have brought in a large number of Doukhobors and Galicians. I think the latter are a very undesirable class. They are very poor people, they are not good servants nor good citizens, and on the whole are very undesirable settlers and a class very much disapproved of by the whole people of the western country. The Doukhobors are different. I went down to Brandon the other day to the immigration sheds and saw a number of them, and I do not hesitate to say that they are a clean, tidy, well-behaved people, as far as I could see them and learn of them, but they are very poor. They are vegetarians. They will be a cheap class of people to keep. The government are feeding them and will, of necessity, be compelled to feed them for eighteen months, because they cannot grow a crop this year. If it is a good thing on the part of the government to bring in a lot of paupers whom they have to house and feed for eighteen months, I think they might have brought them a little later in the season, because they will cost the country a considerable sum of money. I do not think it was a good policy. It would have been better to bring in people of our own nationality, who speak our own language, and a thrifty people who are willing to abide by the law of the land. These men are exiles from their own country, and not desirable citizens, or they would not have been treated as they have been. I hope they will become good citizens. As far as working for the people in the North-west, they will not be good workmen. I would sooner have a Scotchman or an Englishman who would understand what you said to him than these men. It is better to pay good, fair wages and get a good day's work, than to employ a man who is no use at all at half wages, or perhaps, no wages at all.

On the plebiscite question I was sorry to hear the hon. Secretary of State speak in the way he did of the temperance people. He has given them cold comfort. If he had given them last session the same speech that he gave to-day, I think the state of affairs would be very different now, because it would have been a foolish thing for the temperance people to have asked for the plebiscite and vote in favour of prohibition if they had known the sentiments of the hon. gentleman. To-day he has spoken disparagingly of the temperance sentiment and of the temperance people. When I asked him last session what percentage he would require to carry out prohibition he could not give any answer. He and his colleagues are very flush with their answers now. The Hon. Prime Minister say it takes fifty per cent, which is a most unheard of thing. We cannot understand how any people can give a vote of fifty per cent. It is more than they can possibly give, because there would be some sick, some absent and some unable, for other reasons, to go to the polls. If the government had told us this last session, it would have been fair and honourable, but the course they have taken only shows that they were willing to deceive the public. I am sorry to use that word, but that really is the true meaning of their conduct. They really deceived the people. We could not get from them what percentage of electors they would want in order to give us prohibition. When they made prohibition a plank in their platform they ought to have been willing to carry it out. But then it was on the principle that drowning men grasp at straws. They would put anything in their platform to get into power, when they came into power they had to carry out their promise to take a plebiscite vote, it was a promise made to a large portion of men they could not trifle with, the temperance men, but they have trifled with them more than any other class have been trifled with except the people who want free trade.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman talks very much like a party man.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—No, I talk like a man who does not like to be humbugged. I am a temperance man. I am prepared to vote for this government on any measure which I think is right, and I do not care if every other man in the chamber votes against it. I am here to discharge a duty which I feel in my own breast I am discharging honourably and in the interests of the people I represent, and if I talk like a party man, I only speak as I do to my hired man or any one who disobeys my orders. If I tell my man to do anything, and he does not do it properly, he hears from me in the same manner and as strongly as the government hears from me to-day. I say the time has not come in the interests of the country when the bond of union, the bond of confidence, the bond of truth between the government and the country can afford to be broken. The great safeguard which the people have in this country is the confidence which they put in the word and the conduct of our public men. That is the true principle that a country should be governed on. When a class of men preach a doctrine for a great number of years, and when they get into power ignore and falsify every pledge they have made, then they betray the confidence of the great body of honest people who have confided in them. If you have forty men in a company, and they have half a dozen men managing the business, and the directors violate every pledge they made to the stockholders and break every promise, and do business which they said they would not do, and business contrary to their charter, how long would you have them in office? Not long, I tell you. Canada is the freest country in the world, and ——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And has the best government.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—That is based upon the fact that there is confidence between the government and the people. When a man deposits his ballot in the box, he does it because he believes the man he elects will carry out his pledges, and when the party of his choice gets into power and out of the reach of the people, where they cannot get at him for a certain length of time, and ignores all his pledges and treats them with contempt and ridicule—when that state of things exists, it is deplorable and must be lamented by every honest man in the country. I did not rise to make a speech. It was only a moment or two before the House rose for recess that I made up my mind to say a word, I want to correct the hon. gentleman when he says that the reduction on binder twine, coal oil and barbed wire, has redounded to the benefit of the consumers of the North-west. If they had left the duty on I would have got the binder twine cheaper, because the raw material from which binder twine is made in the central prison has been sold to two individuals. They had the raw material there and they could have gone on and manufactured it, but they did not do that. They sold the products to two individuals to foster a combine. There is no telling how much these two gentlemen will add to the election fund on account of the combine. That is the impression of the majority of the people in the country, and I am sorry to say that I think it bears that impression to me. I would like the hon. gentleman to explain to me one thing which I cannot understand that is, the duty on wire. They have left the duty on the raw material; that is the plain smooth strand of wire; and they have made barbed wire free. If they had reversed that arrangement the matter would have been right, and would have shown that they knew what they were doing. You see in Winnipeg and the western prairies we are not as fortunate as you are in eastern Canada in getting fence posts. We get poplar poles and stick them in the ground thirty feet apart, and stretch the wire from one to the other, and consequently the farmers have more or less of this fencing, and when you consider the number of farmers we have there you can imagine what the industry is. The barbed wire is a cheap manufacture. I know one concern in Canada had fifteen or twenty machines. I never saw one of them work but it is a cheap machine; twisting two strands of wire together. But the government took the duty off the manufactured article and left it on the raw material. If they had reversed it they would have reached the same result and benefited the industry in Manitoba. But they have placed us in the position that we have to buy all our barbed wire fram the United States. Another combine in the United States is the iron combine. Our barbed wire is all manufactured in the United States and bought from a large combine. Therefore, on the barbed wire they have made a mistake in reducing the duty, because it has not worked to the advantage of the farmers, and this year we are paying more for our barbed wire than before the duty was taken off. Reference has been made in the Speech to the exodus out of Canada. It is quite well understood how there is no exodus from Canada to-day. The opposition party are not running down the country. We are all good citizens of Canada. Every man has a good word to say for the country. I have no fault to find with the tariff, except so far as it has been changed. The only thing I have to find fault with is that the policy which the hon. gentlemen advocated in opposition was not carried out. It might have been a good policy, and I had made up my mind firmly to support it. I announced that when I came down I would support the new tariff to the very letter, to see how it worked, and if it worked well I would continue to support it. My words are on record in a dozen places in the North-west. I also said that if the tariff did not work well I would oppose it. I say now that so far as they have changed it the tariff is working to the detriment of the people of the country. They are dissatisfied with the government, and the government will find that out when they come to appeal to the North-west at the next election. There was a member with whom I am very well acquainted, who was strongly opposed to the duty on binders. The binder and the seeder and those larger implements are the ones we are interested in. The hon. gentleman spoke about the hammers and axes and things of that kind, but they do not amount to anything. A binder costs $150, and a seeder costs $80, of course we have different kinds of seeders—the disc drill seeder and the shoe seeder and the hoe seeder. They have different prices, from $175 down. These seeders and binders are articles which cost a good deal of money. The government took the duty off the raw material and made the material to the manufacturer cheaper, but the price of the manufactured article is just the same. They charge just as much to-day as they charged three years ago. They charge more for a seeder I think, but they charge just as much, at any rate, for all those articles. Then take the matter of wagons. I paid $77 and some cents for a wagon before I came down here. That is the reason we find fault with the government. They have left the duty on the manufactured article the same, and have taken the duty off the raw material so that the manufacturer can produce the article for less money and have the benefit of the free trade, and we whose business it is to till the soil, those articles being our raw material, our stock in trade that should be made as cheap as possible, find they cost us just as much as before. When I was in the House of Commons, I opposed the government on the question of the thirty-five per cent duty. The duty was thirty-five per cent the first session I was there. I asked to have it twenty-five per cent, and voted against the government because they did not do it. I say that there is no wiser policy that the government could possibly adopt than to reduce the duty on binders, ploughs and wagons and articles such as we use in that country, because we are tilling the soil under adverse circumstances, and we are entitled to every concession they can give us to make us successful, and in proportion as we are successful the whole country will benefit, and if we are successful it would tend to bring in a good class of immigrants instead of paupers, and operations could be carried on in that country at a profit.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I have listened with a great deal of pleasure and attention to the speech of the hon. gentleman from Wolseley. His declaration of independence of party lines as far as this House is concerned, would operate very well, and I think the Conservative party in this House are perfectly free and independent, and have shown themselves so on many occasions. But the question of party lines, although perhaps working well in this House, would not be practicable in the parliamentary form of government. Supposing it to be the case in the House of Commons, you would have a new government coming into power every year and new elections taking place continually, so that adherence to party is an absolute necessity. But in this chamber, where we have not to go to the people and where we do not make or break governments, we are independent. His opinion on the operation of the tariff I believe to be thoroughly accurate, and I am fully in accord with every word he said on the subject.

I beg to offer my tribute of welcome to Their Excellencies on their return to Canada in the exalted and responsible position they now occupy, and may their administration be prosperous and agreeable. I also beg to welcome an old friend, Mr. Kerr, to this House, of which I am sure he will be a useful member.

First, I will deal very briefly with Yukon affairs. It is not my intention to do so in an acrimonious way, knowing, or at least surmizing, that the ministers on the floor of this House were not exercising their full will, but rather giving effect to party and cabinet exigency in their contention last session. On my return to British Columbia last year I did certainly expect that many of those who did not understand the question, who had not seen the Stikine-Teslin Railway contract, to be very indignant and displeased with the action of the Senate on that question; but I did not find the anticipated displeasure. Only one man who had a subcontract from McKenzie & Mann, uttered strong language about the Senate. The more we know of this question the more we are convinced that the Senate was right. At the best season for packing and travel—in that northern country, September and October, the water in the Stikine River was so low as to make navigation dangerous, and in some cases impossible. Even if navigation for six months in the year, the altitude to overcome between Glenora and Teslin would be a serious hindrance to construction and difficult to overcome. Then after all the route would not be an all-Canadian one. With all the information I now have, and with all my desire to have an all-Canadian route by rail into the Yukon, I would not give half a million acres of land in the Yukon, with the power of selection the contractors had, for the proposed narrow gauge road. A company of British capitalists, with commendable enterprise, have built and are building the White Pass Railway from the head of Lynn Canal. It is now in operation over the most difficult part of the route, and will be running to Fort Selkirk this year, a distance of 300 miles from the coast line. The great benefit of this railway to miners, merchants and others going into that country, will be that it gives speedy access to the Atlin gold fields of British Columbia, as well as to the Yukon. Another great benefit of this road is that its managers have relieved the mercantile community of much worry and anxiety by taking charge of goods at Victoria or Vancouver forwarding and bonding them through the fringe of United States territory to the Dominion boundary.

Last session I directed the attention of the government to the wisdom, and absolute necessity of preserving the timber in the vicinity of Dawson for the use of the mining population, but I fear this has not been done; favourites have been given undue advantage, causing much discontent owing to the increase in the price of fuel. The government has gone to great expense in connection with the Yukon, which, with prudence, may be recouped, but which cannot be recouped if the mining industry is crippled. Fuel at reasonable prices is the great and absolute necessity for mining, and for sustaining life, and should be prudently conserved for those purposes. I call the particular attention of the government to the unsanitary condition of Dawson, and the number of people in hospital. Simple municipal law, with moderate rates, should be instituted there at once. I ask the minister not to turn a deaf ear to this suggestion, it is a pressing necessity. I congratulate the government on the intention to get at the bottom of the official scandals in the Yukon administration, but doubt whether the commissioner can conduct the necessary investigations to a satisfactory conclusion. He should be assisted by a prosecutor of legal standing. I am much pleased to see that it is the intention to extend the telegraph system to the Yukon, which will be a great benefit to all. I would suggest that a cable from Skagway to the north end of Vancouver Island would be safer than a land line in a wild unsettled country. I have to congratulate the Postmaster General, and again the government, for the introduction of the two-cent postage rate to Great Britain, and to other parts of the Empire. It is a bold and commendable step, and one of the class of cases where free trade can prevail without fear of outside competition.

The hon. mover of the Address alluded to the prosperous condition of our trade and of our manufacturers. That such is the case is very gratifying, but where would this prosperity have been if the government had kept to its oft-repeated pledges? The government could see the great benefits of the National Policy, and wisely made the choice of adhering to its principles rather than to their own previously expressed opinions.

I consider prohibition the most important subject to which reference is made in the Speech from the Throne—a reference brief, and insignificant considering the far rearching importance of the subject. The first promise for a plebiscite was a great mistake leading to results impossible of fulfilment. The Minister of Justice told us yesterday of the financial difficulties in the way of adopting prohibition. Such difficulties we know and the time to consider them was before the promise was made, and the vote taken, and not afterwards. Now the country stands facing an expensive deception. I listened with much attention to the academical sophistry of the Minister of Justice in his effort to show the difference between a vote taken on a specific subject, and that taken for the election of a member of Parliament. I cannot accept the hon. gentleman's conclusions, but believe the effect of a majority of votes must be the same in both cases, unless specified in the reference to the electorate. There can be no grounds for a difference in the effect and I think it will be difficult to convince the electorate that there is any difference. The Secretary of State freely admits prohibition to be an impossibility, and I fully agree with al! he said on that subject—which shows the unwisdom of making promises.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Would the hon. gentleman approve of a prohibitory law based on the wishes of 23 per cent of the population?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I would not approve of the law in any case. If the whole of Canada favoured it, and I stood alone, I would oppose it. With a frontier of 4,000 miles and some 14,000 miles of sea coast, it would be impossible to carry it out. Even now smuggling is going on constantly; what would it be if we had prohibition? It would be the most demoralizing thing imaginable, it would be a monstrous evil, but that does not justify the promise that was made and the expense incurred in taking a plebiscite for the purpose of deceiving the electors.

With regard to the negotiations at Washington I rejoice, as a British Columbian, that no agreement was come to, or is likely to be come to, for the free admission of farm products, as it would be ruinous to our farmers.

The Alaska boundary is a matter of such importance as to demand a settlement as soon as possible, owing to the importance of the developments in the Yukon and northern British Columbia, and I regret that no agreement has been come to. I freely admit that any one who has read the treaty of 1825 between Russia and Great Britain, and who has studied the coast line, must see that there are difficulties in the way of the parties directly interested coming to a decision satisfactory to both. A disinterested tribunal will have to be called into existence to settle this question. I think the government is fully impressed with the necessity of closing this question, and I trust it will use every effort to arrive at such a consummation.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—After the grand rhetorical convolutions and shoutings that we have listened to for the last forty-eight hours, perhaps I may be permitted to make a few prosy remarks. I am sorry to see that my hon. friend from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) has gone out, because I do not care to speak about a man behind his back; still I cannot allow his statements to go without some reply. I regret very much that that hon. gentleman has not confined himself to subjects about which he knows something. He is a man of good intelligence as a farmer no doubt, a good judge of lands, of hay, cattle, cereals, and I believe roots of various kinds, but when he comes to talk about trade and commerce he is out of his element. As a business man, he certainly stands in a ridiculous position when he comes to talk about the manufacturing and importing interests of this country. Any one knows that the manufacturing interest is hostile to the importing interest. In all cases the importers are opposed to protection; they prefer to import their goods from where they can be bought to the best advantage, and in this way control the merchandise of the country. The hon. gentleman spoke of the importers placing goods on their shelves and said that a suspension of their business was caused through indecision as to the trade policy of the government. He said further that the manufacturer was not ready to go on, and the importer was not ready to import, and the consequence was the shelves of the importers were empty instead of being filled for four or five years. Any one knows that an importer does not import stocks to last four or five years. With the present business arrangements and shipping facilities we import every four months and replenish stock; therefore, there was no necessity for hesitancy on the part of those gentlemen to supply themselves with ordinary goods. But to show you further how little the hon. gentleman knows of what he was talking about, I interrupted him, when I heard him state that he had to pay forty cents a gallon for common burning oil, because I thought he was going too far. I am prepared to say that the best burning oil, White Rose oil, is sold at present by the barrel for 20 cents a gallon, and is even lower wholesale.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where is that?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—In St. John.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We can buy it for that in Belleville, but the hon. gentleman spoke of prices in the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It shows simply this, that these things are controlled by distance. Supposing he lived in some parts of British Columbia, he might have to pay fifty cents a gallon for his burning oil.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—How much did you pay for oil two or three years ago?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I paid 21 cents; it is only 25 cents a gallon now by retail.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is dearer now in Belleville.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The hon. gentleman from Wolseley also spoke of free trade and protection. He belaboured the government because they put certain goods on the free list, and yet he claimed that the protection which exists led to combinations, so hon. gentlemen can see that he is very like a certain class of fly which passes over one's sound parts and lights upon the sores. I cannot sympathize with him when the flies settle on him, because he brought the trouble on himself. He and another gentleman, in front of me, hon. Mr. Macdonald (B.C.), did all they could to block the Yukon Railway Bill in this House, and the consequences of that has been that trouble has arisen in the Yukon country, such trouble that the British Government have had to send out one of their first jurists to help us out of it. If the hon. gentlemen feel as they ought to feel, they would know that they did their very best to bring about the difficulties which led to Lord Herschell being sent here, which brought his death upon him.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Do not charge them with that.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Yes I do, because Lord Herschell was brought to this country to try and undo, as far as possible, what was done through the rejection of that bill. The defeat of that measure enabled strangers to take possession of that country, and now it is difficult to get them to leave. I sympathize with the latter hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald B.C.), in the way he suffers, and I do not wonder that he tries to retrace his steps before the House. He should seek to get back, if possible, without being exactly seen as others see him, but I assure the hon. gentleman it is well understood what has been done against the peace and prosperity of the Dominion, and the people when they get an opportunity will show again that they are displeased with a certain class. The hon. gentleman from Wolseley in the opening part of his speech said that he was not a party man, but he took very good care before he was long speaking to stab and strike under the belt all he could. Men cannot be considered friends who hold out their hands with a smile and at the same time stab when they get an opportunity.

I have been in the neighbourhood of thirty years in this honourable chamber, I am free to state that the speech of the mover of the Address gave me about as much satisfaction as any I have ever heard in this House. He spoke well and logically; he kept his temper, and at the same time made his points in such a manner that he must have brought conviction to this House that he was speaking the truth. The seconder of the motion is a gentleman I have known for a good many years, and he spoke with the grace and dignity peculiar to the French members of the Senate. Whenever they address the House, expressing themselves clearly and forcibly, they avoid giving offence to any one, I cannot help wishing that the mover of the Address had been less emphatic in expressing what he called his Anglo-Saxon feelings. I have never yet met such a hybrid as an Anglo-Saxon, and I hope I shall never see one, because he should be red-haired on one side and flaxen-haired on the other. As I look around me I cannot see any one who answers that description in this House, not even the hon. gentleman himself. On the contrary, I find that he has dark hair and eyes, and from his manly and outspoken address, I would take him to be an Anglo-Celt, or an Anglo-Scot, or an Anglo-Norman as I have the honour to be myself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He is a descendant of the Danes.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Then he ought to have red hair, but his is black. I know in Ireland they are all looked on as red-headed people, and when met, by the peasants, the sign of the cross is put on the forehead, to keep away the evil one. But in speaking of the races that inhabit this Dominion, whilst I am willing to give fullblooded Englismen, such as the leader of the opposition, credit for all they are and all they have done, I have no desire that the Anglo-Saxon shall flippantly and without any consideration for the feelings of other races, claim all the honour, glory and loyalty due to the people of this great country. Canada will be built up of all our races and especially with the assistance of our French Canadians who have shown that they have representatives fit to take the highest positions in the land.

My next remark will apply to our new Governor General. I feel that it is my duty, as far as in me lies, to invite, compliment and welcome that gentleman amongst us. I have not the slightest doubt that the government of Great Britain made the selection of the present Governor General keeping in view the record of his predecessors, and if he should prove equal to them this country will have no reason to complain. If ever people were blessed in that respect, it is the people of Canada, from the days of Lord Dufferin to the present time. I hope that His Excellency will meet with the same success and win the same confidence of the people that his predecessors did; if so he will have no reason to complain of his sojourn in Canada. With reference to Lord Herschell, who lost his life at Washington, I had the honour of sitting near him at an entertainment given in his honour at St. John when he was passing through that city. A dinner was given in his honour, with the mayor of St. John presiding as chairman, and such citizens as felt disposed to be guests. I had the honour of sitting on the left of our Mayor whilst Lord Herschell sat on the right. For two hours I had the satisfactory pleasure of sitting near a gentleman elected by his sovereign as being one of the greatest jurists and diplomats of his day, a man full of knowledge, full of patriotism, coming out to the assistance of our, and his country, to adjust, if possible, the differences that exist between Great Britain and the United States. In listening to that man speaking, and observing him for two hours, I came to the conclusion that he was a man of most astonishing simplicity of character and yet fullness of knowledge. The unassuming character of his intercourse with us was such that it would be hard to forget it afterwards, knowing the sad end he had after six months of worry and care on behalf of his and this country. I feel, hon. gentlemen, that we have lost a friend, and if it were permissable to give expression to my feelings of respect for his manly conduct and patriotism, I would hope that in another world he shall reap a high reward. I shall now make a few remarks with regard to the personnel of the present government. It is my duty to state that I feel we are blessed with a government, from the Premier to the youngest member of the cabinet, that any country might feel proud of. I believe that they are men of honour, men of ability, men of truth and honesty. I believe they are men anxious to promote the best interests of this country, and that the people of Canada feel that they are the right men in the right place. Having these people in power has given confidence to the country, and there will be prosperity under their administration. Complaint has been made that the present ministry have been pursuing the policy of their predecessors. While it is rather flattering, I should think, to those members of the former government who sit in this House and also in the other House, I do not see why they should take umbrage at it. There is one thing, certainly, they are not following them in, and that is in their throat-cutting amongst themselves —in not having amongst them what is called a nest of traitors. We have heard no complaint of treachery; no drumming of drones from the hive, and I, for the life of me, cannot see why a proud Englishman, such as my hon. friend on my right, would allow himself to be bottle holder for such a crowd, who, he knows, looked upon him as being unfit to associate with and unfit to be leader of the government of this country. I am glad to say that this House did not look upon the hon. gentleman in the same light, for they gave him an opportunity of going to the country, and I think declared to him from both sides of this House that if he went to the country we would stand to his back and return him triumphant as Premier of this Dominion if we could.

What I would suggest is that we should have less enmity to each other. What we want is more fair play, more charity, and not so much spite. I know it is very hard for men who have fallen from the high places to forget, but still forgiveness and charity are garments that cover with glory those who suffer. If this feeling were carried out we could legislate, I think, with some credit to ourselves, and there would be no necessity for an agitation to be gotten up to reform the Senate. There is another remark I would like to make, and that is with reference to the winter port of Canada.

No credit is given to a government, who have been largely instrumental and are following up the good work, for making one of our Canadian ports one of the most prominent ports on this continent, a port for the last two seasons that has been issuing from its harbour and wharfs cargoes of food of every description, even the very turkeys for Christmas dinners for the proudest and wealthiest nation in the world. Hon. gentlemen from the west may not see the importance of this, but I assure hon. gentlemen that merchants and people who have the well-being of the whole of this Dominion at heart will have the greatest respect and regard for the men who have given this winter port that attention, and will appreciate the efforts of the government to introduce into the city of Montreal the Intercolonial Railway, because it is known that the Intercolonial cost this Dominion fifty million dollars, and from the time it was built to a very recent date it is well known that it has never given any returns on the vast amount of money invested in its construction. The great cause of this was that while it started from the Atlantic, it terminated somewhere in the woods in the neighbourhood of Quebec. In was met by the Grand Trunk Railway, and the Grand Trunk Railway, protecting itself, naturally, charged for freight delivered to the Intercolonial such a rate that it was impossibe for the Intercolonial Railway to place it at the point of delivery without having to charge more freight on the goods than merchants could afford to pay. In this way the Intercolonial Railway was a non-paying investment, and this government, after some twenty-five years, was the first to make an effort at all events to improve it, and I hope—and I think we all hope—that their effort will be successful. At all events it is an effort, and an effort in the right direction. There is another remark I desire to make, and it is this: Complaint has been made that the business between Great Britain and Canada, notwithstanding the twenty-five per cent preference given to goods of that country, is not as extensive as it should be. This is rather bad, I admit, and unsatisfactory, but in looking into this matter more closely it will be seen that there is a sufficient cause for it, and the cause, in my opinion, is that the exports of Great Britain, if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to look, are not nearly so great for the last two years as they had been. In fact, they are for the first time superseded by the exports of the United States; in other words, goods of the same class in the United States can be got to better advantage, and consequently importers must necessarily import their goods from that country which gives the best value. To show that this is no supposition I would read a small paragraph showing that the exports of Great Britain for 1898 were less than the exports of the United States which is something that hon. gentlemen may not yet have realized. In fact, when I saw the returns I was astonished myself, because I did think that Great Britain was the greatest exporter of merchandise in the world, but I find the last year or two that the United States are exceeding them extensively. The paragraph reads:

March 18th. Ambassador Choate's remark that the United States and the United Kingdom would doubtless continue a friendly rivalry in regard to the world's commerce, is quite justified by the latest figures on the commerce of the two countries, as compared with the treasury bureau. The exports of domestic merchandise from the United States in the eight months ending with February, amount to $829,336,141, and those from the United Kingdom amount to $798,960,427. In the calendar year 1898 the domestic exports from the United States amounted to $1,233,564,828, while those from the United Kingdom amounted to $1,161,944,331.

Showing that there is a cause operating against the preference we give to Great Britain. There is a cause operating against us to keep down the imports of that country in our returns, and therefore it is rather an answer to those gentlemen who complain that the preference has not done any particular good to Great Britain. They will see that it did do good, because if they had not the preference there would be a further reduction according to these returns from Great Britain.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is a very small difference.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is an immense difference when you come to take it as against the returns of a few years ago. It shows that the United States are going up and Great Britain is coming down.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How do you account for that?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is the great prosperity of the United States. They are shipping all over the world, and to-day they are the great competitor of Great Britain.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)--And Germany too.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I was going to say, in answer to the complaint that the present government do not stand well with the United States, that I have no proof of that further than this, that I am not aware that they have been ejected from the United States yet, or that they were brought to account for any information that they had unauthoritatively given during former meetings of some of our delegates in that country. They have been wise enough to hold their tongues, and I believe that if the present government do not succeed in making a treaty with them, that no other government will ever succeed, because in my opinion the present government are looked upon as men of honour, not a tricky lot, telling one story here and another there. They are men who have stated what they want, and the United States representatives know it, and will treat them accordingly. With reference to the temperance question, that is a matter I would rather not touch upon, but really I do think there is a class of men who call themselves temperance men who are not temperance men, who in my opinion are half crazy men who speak for the temperance men because we must all respect temperance men, and people who are reasonable and moral, who want to carry moral reformation, but we are not in favour of anarchists and bomb throwers, or men such as Mr. Bulmer who wrote the letter that has been read by the hon. leader of the opposition. The man quotes the language that has been appropriated from the language of the Jews at the Crucifixion—of whom? At the Crucifixion of Christ, when Pilate was asked to have him executed, he said: "No, I wash my hands clear of this transaction." "Oh," they said "crucify Him and let the sin be upon us and our children." Those are about the words of Bulmer from Victor Hugo, and are these the kind of men that are going to carry temperance in the country. He boasts that he has a thousand churches at his back. I have some knowledge of the religious people of this country, and I do not think any church will give credit to such a man as that. I hope they will not. I hope there is too much feeling of christianity to tolerate firebrands of that kind, men throwing bomb shells and slander broadcast without any foundation for it, because nobody is opposed to him if he goes about the matter properly. All the religious people in Canada think we should be a temperance country, and we are a temperance country.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Better answer the letter in the press.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Would the hon. gentleman like to hear it read?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It was read here the other day.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I am sorry the letter was read, because reading the letter was endorsing it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then the hon. gentleman was endorsing Pilate?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about. He is all adrift on the school question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But my hon. friend is quoting Pilate.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I have detained the House some time in presenting my views to hon. gentlemen, but I did so in all good feeling, because I am most desirous that we should have good feeling in this chamber.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—And if we carry on our debates we should carry them on with a spirit of fair play and each and all of us support those views of politics that we think are best calculated for the largest number of this Dominion. If we do that we will do our duty, and I think we will also give an opportunity to the gentlemen that the people of the country have selected by their votes to carry on the public business and in whom, in my humble opinion, the people have entire confidence.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It is with some diffidence that I arise at this late hour to make a few observations on the question, before us. I thought, on reading the speech of His Excellency, there was so little in it that it required very little discussion, but I have been wrong in that assumption, as I possibly may be in others with respect to the general outline of the matters under the consideration of the present government. The mover of this Address in reply to the Governor General's speech is a man familiar with the political life of this country, and he showed by his course that he was an ardent supporter of the present administration. That is his right. Nobody can find fault with him for that. He has a perfect right to have his own opinion on these matters. But he went a little further. He considered we would justify him in saying that the present government was the best government the country ever had. Well, he may be of that opinion, but I do not believe that that opinion will be generally entertained by the great majority of the people of this country. If the violation of all the pledges that were made by these gentleman for the last eighteen or twenty years, if the introduction of very crude and un considered measures for the consideration of this Parliament and the increasing of the debt of the Dominion entitle them to be considered the best government of this country, then these gentleman are entitled to that distinction. With respect to the speech itself, we are told that the commissioners who attended at Washington have not been able to accomplish anything. This must have been a great disappointment to those gentlemen, because we all know that they have persistently for years and years declared before the House and before the country that the United States people were so enamoured with them that they would consent and agree to any proposition that might be submitted to them for their approval, but they have found by sad experience that our neighbours are not made of that kind of stuff, that they have always looked after their own interests, and it is utterly impossible to conceive anything more foolish than to suppose that they would be actuated by any other course than the course that they would consider beneficial to themselves and their own country. That is perfectly right, and nobody can find fault with it, but the government in power at present, when in opposition, made the charge that the United States were so adverse to the members of the Conservative government and their policy that they would not listen to any recommendations they might make, and therefore, reciprocity or the settlement of any difficulties between the two countries could not be expected until there was a change of government. There has been a change of government, and the hon. gentlemen have been to Washington and have come back and I believe that the United States will never give fair value in return for what we may give them. That is the course they have pursued for a great many years, and they will continue it to the end of the chapter. I believe our commissioners came in contact with these eminent men in the United States and won a certain amount of admiration from those gentlemen, which may be productive of good results in the future. I think that Sir Wilfrid Laurier's words will have the effect of smoothing the way for those gentlemen in the future. But there is an outside pressure bearing on them, and I do not care what these gentlemen in authority do, there is a power behind them controlling them, and it is useless to go to the United States and beg for some concession. I do not think we require it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I think we are better without it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—And if we had gone on in our own way this country would have been as prosperous or even more prosperous than at the present time. It is a consolation to me that the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side admit that this country is prosperous. It has taken the Liberal party twenty-five years to find out that fact. We have been claiming it from year to year. We have been quoting statistics to prove it was correct, but they never would believe it till they assumed the reins of power. I am glad to hear it. We will hear nothing more in the future of blue ruin and men decrying the country. That is a source of satisfaction and consolation to me as a loyal man. These gentlemen went to Washington and were very cautious no doubt. We may benefit by it in the future, but it seems to me most extraordinary that under all the circumstances this conference was not held in this city, the capital of the country. I cannot understand it. I always thought these negotiations, being of a semi-national character, should be conducted at the capital of the country. I am almost beginning to think that we are not the capital of the country. If any great affair takes place it must be removed from Ottawa to some other city. I do not object to Quebec, but upon principle I think all these negotiations should take place at the capital of the country where the discussion is carried on. I had hoped and expected that Sir Wilfrid Laurier would have insisted on this as a principle, because he has shown a great desire in the past to make this city the Washington of the North. I hope the effect of his visit to Washington will open his eyes. He will study the system pursued in Washington, and will yet carry out the promise he made at the time of the election some years ago. We are the capital of the country, and I think we ought to enjoy all the benefit of it. But I am told that the reason he did not ask the commissioners to come to Ottawa was owing to its want of attraction and the want of proper accommodation. I cannot vouch for the truth of that, but it was generally promulgated here, and I believe it gained some currency in the United States newspapers. If that is the case, it is most deplorable that the capital of the Dominion of Canada has not sufficient accommodation to attract the people to the south of us. I do trust the visit to Washington may have a beneficial effect upon the hon. gentlemen who represented us there duringthe last five or six months. They had a very pleasant six months outing, enjoyed themselves in Washington I have no doubt, as princes. It is true an unfortunate circumstance took place in the death of two very prominent men. Lord Herschell is reported to have said that he was there six months, and received nothing but a broken leg. We have not had that misfortune to complain of, because our representatives are back in robust health, and have enjoyed themselves, and all we have to do in the future is to pay the piper, to pay the expenses of these gentlemen and their large retinue and staff of officials, and an army of underlings, I suppose, that were necessary for the purpose of carrying on the negotiations in Washington. It may have one good effect at any rate: it may show the people of this country that whether they are desirous of obtaining some concessions in the right direction from the United States or not, it is impracticable, and they will no longer endeavour to carry out a thing which cannot be accomplished. That is the result of the conference, and I believe the country will rejoice at the ending of the negotiations. Such being the case, the collapse of these negotiations will be a source of benefit to us in the future.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear. I believe that myself.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—There is one important matter which I think might receive some little consideration at the hands of this administration. It is a subject which is now engaging, and has been engaging, the consideration and attention of the people of this country for a great many years: I allude to the Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal. No work was ever devised that will be of such permanent benefit to the general prosperity of the Dominion as that canal. I admit that a great deal has been done by this country in affording necessary means of transportation, but still the facilities are insufficient to meet the great and increasing requirements of the country, and the sooner the government recognize this fact and make some provision for the construction of this canal the better for the country. As hon. gentlemen all know, a committee was appointed last year by this Senate, and their report has been largely circulated throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion, and has had the effect of encouraging to such an extent the promotors of the scheme that they are now in England for the purpose of having it fully carried out. I believe when the names of the eminent men who will take an interest in this project become known, there will be no further loss of time in carrying it to a successful conclusion. I hope and trust that the gentlemen controlling the destinies of this country will show that they are alive, to the importance of this matter, not because it happens to be a local measure, for it has now become a national question, and one that the people of England are taking a great interest in, and one, I think that would do more to benefit the material interests of the country than any work which has been undertaken by this or any other government. I will not even except the Canadian Pacific Railway, because when this canal is constructed, it will be the means of transporting cheaply the heavy articles which are so much required in England. We were told to-day by the hon. gentleman from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) that the demand in England for iron ore was becoming greater every year, and this iron ore cannot be transported except by water at a low freight rate. Railways cannot transport it at a remunerative rate, and therefore it is of the utmost importance that this canal should be undertaken and constructed as soon as possible. We know that there is a company formed in England. We know they have made a certain proposition to this country, and it is only waiting the final decision of this country to say whether the matter will be undertaken within a very limited period of time. I consider it my duty, as one of the representatives of this section of the country, to bring it to the notice of the country at large. I hope and trust that we will continue, as we have always boasted in the past that we have been, to pose as a non-partizan body. We have acted upon that principle for a great many years, and I think with beneficial effect to the country at large. We have not been partizan in any sense of the word. We have endeavoured to discharge our duties. We have looked at every measure irrespective of the source from which it emanated, and given it our best consideration in disposing of it. I hope that may long continue to be the course pursued in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Of course we know politicians are sometimes led away by force of circumstances. That I suppose applies more to the Lower House than to the Senate; but still we can all enjoy our own rights. We can have all the privileges we desire. We can express our views, and still we can maintain that dignity that ought to pertain to a high chamber like the Senate. It is true we are told that some great change is to take place. We do not know exactly what that may be. We hear it heralded forth through the papers of this country. At one time it was said that we were to be hanged, for the purpose of getting rid of us. Another time we are told that some reform is to take place. I do not know whether they consider abolition necessary or not; but there is a scheme on foot to dispose of this chamber, or destroy the influence it has had in the past. In my opinion a check is necessary in our system of government, it has been employed on some occasions and I believe with advantage to the country. I think that is the general opinion of the entire country. Whether I am right or wrong is a matter that is capable of being demonstrated by facts to the whole people of this country, and I believe that you will find in place of 22 or 23 per cent of the people as in the case of the prohibition plebiscite that there would be 75 or 90 per cent in favour of retaining the Senate for the purpose of checking legislation from the Lower Chamber. The more people object the better will be for the Senate. In your private business you must have checks. You need them in legislation as in other matters. If you hold that the Senate is not needed as a check, you might as well say there should be no checks of any kind; dismiss the Auditor General, let the Lower House manage the affairs of the country, just as they desire, without check of any kind. A great deal has been said with reference to the proposed Gerrymander Bill. I do not know whether I am in order in speaking of this matter, because it is not before us, but I have been told on very reliable authority that the introduction of such a measure at this time is illegal. If such is the case, it would be a great misfortune if a bill of this kind were rushed through the House and found to be illegal. Would it not be within the range of parliamentary procedure that this measure should be submitted to the Supreme Court, in order to ascertain their views as to whether this measure could be passed by Parliament at this time. I am not a lawyer, and I cannot tell whether it would be legal or not. I hear such a strong opinion expressed outside, however, that I should like to hear what the opinion of the Supreme Court is. With reference to the plebiscite I have very little to say. I never took any stock in it. I did not think it was a measure that ought to have been submitted. However, the government in their wisdom thought differently. They had a right to do it, and the only advantage we have now is that we have to pay about a quarter of a million dollars for the purpose of gratifying——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—About $181,000.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That is a small difference. Two or three millions make no difference to this government. They were going to reduce the expenditure, but they increased it two millons: but that is nothing. They have large expansive ideas, and they will increase the liabilities of this country to such an extent that they will frighten people away.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend thinks there is no difference between $181,000 and $250,000.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—However, that money is spent and gone. The Secretary of State told us to-day frankly that he did not think it was possible to carry out the measure even if Parliament passed it. Why did he not give us that information before? It seems to me if he entertained those views, then it was his bounden duty to come forward and say "It is useless, because supposing you carry it by 75 per cent of the people of this country it would not be possible to enforce it."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not say that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But your argument led to that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not say any number, but certainly it should not be less than 75 per cent.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—If you had told the people that, would they have gone and risked their money and their reputation if they had known it would require a seventy-five per cent vote in favour of it? Would they have taken that course if they had been told that? I do not belong to either party. I am on the fence.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, Oh!

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I never took any stock in it. I thought the Scott Act was a perfect humbug. The people were humbugged and they got so disgusted with it that they either annihilated it or would not re-enact it. I believe, as this matter is now settled, it rests altogether with the government and their friends to carry out their own views just as they please. As far as the Conservative party are concerned, they have acted an honest, independent part in this whole matter. They have been perfectly free to say from the beginning "It is a matter for yourselves, and it is your own funeral; dispose of it as you think proper." The present government have taken that course and gone to the people and spent their money, and they now return in the same way as they came back from Washington with nothing accomplished, and the only result is the payment of this large sum of money, which must be taken from the pockets of the poor people of this country.

With respect to the postal system, there is a differenee of opinion. There is no doubt that the reduction of postage, so far as domestic letters are concerned, may be right enough, but I doubt the policy of extending it across the ocean. If what the Postmaster General says is correct—if there is sufficient revenue to meet the expenditure, it is right enough, but it will take some time to make up the difference, the reduction is so great. But I suppose the people are always satisfied to have a reduction, no matter how it comes. They will always take a reduction rather than an increase. It is difficult to get an increase when they require additional revenue, and when they have to put up the rate they will find it extremely difficult to persuade the people that they are acting in the public interest. It is a question, therefore, whether it was not in advance of what the people expected of the government. Our postal service has been well managed, and no one found fault with the small exaction of three cents for carrying a letter from one end of Canada to the other. Perhaps in the future, when our resources are larger, some further reduction may take place. However, we will take what we have. The government are entitled to the credit of initating this reform, although I see some papers prefer to give credit to people on the other side of the Atlantic. The Postmaster General is entitled to some consideration for the steps taken, and if it should turn out as he expects it will, there will be no reason to complain; but if it should result in a further deficit in the revenue of the Post Office Department, there will be an outcry against the government for having acted precipitately in this important matter.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—On account of the general desire that exists for closing the debate to-night, I shall not detain the House long; but I ask to be allowed to make a few remarks in connection with the question which has been agitated for some years, which is still unsettled, but which is put in jeopardy by the course taken by the government. I refer to the Manitoba school question. This year as last year, the Speech from the Throne has omitted any reference to this question. I am not surprised at that. I expected the government would take that course; yet it is precisely against that course I enter my protest. There are no rights belonging to any individual or section of the country which are so clear, so well defined, and so indisputable as the rights of the minority in Manitoba, yet these rights have been trampled upon for ten years. These rights have been secured by Imperial promises, by Federal promises, by provincial promises. They have been embodied in the constitution, and they are within the spirit of the principles underlying the whole political fabric of this country; yet these rights have been trampled upon for the last ten years, and I am bound to confess that the chance for the minority to recover their rights is losing ground on account of the course taken by the government. The policy of the government is to do nothing for the relief of the minority. It is to force, as it were, upon the people, the belief that the school question is settled. It is my duty to protest against that course, and if you want to know in what shape the school question is at present, whether it is settled or not, I beg you to hear the latest utterances of Mr. Greenway on the 13th of February last, in which he said:

> There were people who at the present time were making it their business to cast insinuations at the government's attitude on the matter of public schools. These people did not hesitate to say that the government had weakened in the position it had all along adopted, and of these he wished to say that they never made a greater mistake. It was impossible for the government to keep officials watching at the door of every school, but one thing the government would and could do was to see to it that if the regulations governing the management of these schools were violated, the government grant would be withheld. The government stood to-day where it has always stood since the passing of the Public School Act. Its aim was to make the people of this province one in education, and one in helping to develop the country, and it would brook no interference in carrying out its policy along these lines.

This is the way the school question is settled. We are expected to drop our claims and submit quietly to that law which for ten years we have been fighting with all the energy we could. This we cannot be expected to do, and I want to enter, at this stage of the debate, my protest against the government and against their policy. It will be our duty, again and again, until the question is settled, as it ought to be settled, to affirm our rights, to affirm the jurisdiction of this parliament, and to demand that this Parliament exercise their powers by providing a true and constitutional remedy for the grievances of the minority, and a remedy of a permanent character.

The motion was agreed to.

VACATION OF HON. MR. SUTHERLAND'S SEAT.

The SPEAKER read a statement from the Clerk as follows:—

In conformity with the 99th Rule of the Senate, I have the honour to report, for the information of the Senate, that the hon. John Sutherland, member of the Senate, for the province of Manitoba, has failed to give his attendance in the Senate for the last two consecutive sessions of the present Parliament.

Firstly. For and during the second session of the Eighth Parliament, which was opened on the twenty-fifth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, and prorogued on the twenty-ninth day of June of the same year.

Secondly. For and during the third session of the Eight Parliament, which was opened on the third day of February, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, and prorogued on the thirteenth day of June of the same year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Following the practice that was adopted in former cases, as for instance in the case of Hon. Geo. Alexander in May, 1891, I move, seconded by Hon. Mr. Scott, that the report of the Clerk be referred to the committee appointed to consider the Orders and Customs of this House and the Privileges of Parliament, the committee to meet to-morrow, at a quarter to three o'clock, in the Senate Chamber.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee of Selection, presented their first report and moved that it be adopted. He said:—Perhaps it would be more intelligible to the members of this House if I explained the changes on the different committees, and hon. gentlemen will see that there has been as little displacement as possible. The Library Committee remains unchanged with one exception. The Hon. Mr. Miller, as ex-speaker, claims the privilege of being placed on the Library Committee and his name has been substituted for Mr. Wark's. On the Joint Committee on Printing the only change is the substitution of Mr. Cochrane for Mr. Perley, with the approval of the hon. gentleman, if I am correctly advised. They make an exchange which I will explain later on. On the Standing Orders Committee, Mr. Yeo, the new member, takes the place of Mr. Aikins. On the Committee on Banking and Commerce Mr. Perley takes the place of Mr. Cochrane, making the exchange I spoke of. Mr. Paquet takes the place of Mr. De Blois. We thought proper to put him on the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, I will advert later on to a suggestion that the committee desire to make to the House. On the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee, Mr. McSweeney takes the place of Mr. Adams and Mr. Carmichael takes the place of Mr. Macfarlane. On the Internal Economy Committee Mr. Paquet takes Mr. De Blois' place and Mr. Kerr is substituted for Mr. Baird on the Divorce Committee, as Mr. Baird is quite willing to retire. The committee, I may add, have suggested a change in the rule restricting the number on two important committees, Banking and Commerce, and Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours. It was quite impossible to take in the new members without creating considerable friction in the older committees, and it was thought advisable to recommend to the House to allow the Committee on Banking and Commerce to be increased by five members and the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to be increased by an equal number, making the Committee on Banking and Commerce thirty instead of thirty-five, and the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours forty instead of twenty-five. The names proposed to be added to the Banking Committe are the Hon. Messieurs Carmichael, McSweeney, Dandurand, Yeo and Kerr, and on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, Hon. Messieurs, Kerr, Mackeen, Kirchhoffer, Villeneuve and Baird.

The motion was agreed to, and the report was adopted under a suspension of the rules.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE DUTIES IN THE YUKON DISTRICT.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a return showing the amounts of customs and excise duties collected on goods imported into that part of the Dominion known as the Yukon and Klondike country, from the first day of September, 1898, to the first day of March, 1899, specifying the character of the goods so imported, and the countries from whence imported; together with a statement showing the quantity and character, as far as practicable, of Canadian goods sent to the said Yukon district during the same period.

He said :— I have no desire to make any remarks upon this motion further than to express a doubt as to the ability of the department to furnish the latter portion of the information asked for, but I thought that if any system has been adopted by which goods passing in transitu from one province to another, which did not exist while I was at the head of the department, they might be able to give the information. If it is not given I shall not be at all surprised.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to the hon. gentleman that there will probably be considerable delay in obtaining the information which he seeks by this motion. My hon. friend is asking for a return to the 1st day of March, 1899. As communication between the capital and the Yukon country is very slow, I do not think that that information is on hand at the present time down to the period which my hon. friend mentions, and so there may be some delay in getting the information for that period.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should be quite satisfied, as suggested by my hon. friend, if they cannot bring it down to a late period, if they would bring it down to the first of January, or I am quite willing to wait, provided we can get the information asked for before the discussion takes place upon the subject of the Stikine route.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I shall endeavour to see that the information is brought down to the latest period in our possession.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That will do.

POST OFFICE EMPLOYES.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a return showing :—

1. The number of persons in the employment of the Post Office Department on the 30th of June, 1896, and the total amount paid to said employees for the year ending said 30th June, 1896.
2. A similar return giving the same information for the year ending 30th June, 1898.
3. The number of employees in the said service on the 12th day of July, 1896, and on the 16th February, 1899.

The motion was agreed to.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved :

That when the Senate adjourns to-morrow it do stand adjourned until Wednesday the 5th day of April next at 8 o'clock p. m.

Several Hon. MEMBERS—Too short! Too short!

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I quite understand that the leader of the House would not like to take the responsibility of asking for an adjournment to a later date, but I have had a conference with some members of the House who desire to have the adjournment to the 18th April. I do not know if that would meet with the views of the majority of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would that not be too much of a reformation?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I have been asked by several members to suggest a longer adjournment. Would the hon. leader of the House consent to an adjournment to the 12th of April?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A longer adjournment than that proposed in the motion would be exceedingly unwise and undesirable The committees will meet to-morrow and organize, and if we adjourn for such a length of time no possible progress can be made. Those who are applying for bills will be very seriously embarrassed by a longer adjournment, and it would really justify the statement, which has been made outside, that the Senate is not a very important body. We had better adhere to the motion as it stands.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It has been the practice of the Senate to leave the question of the length of the adjournment to be determined by the government, and if the government do not wish to have it extend longer than to the 5th of April, I am disposed to support the government. My own opinion is that our adjournment begins really a week too early.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved that the adjournment be to the 12th of April.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What necessity is there to adjourn at all before next week?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I trust that my hon. friend will not persist in his amendment. The proposition that I have made is the one that I think should be adopted.

The amendment was declared lost, and the motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I think it is not too late to have a vote taken on the amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, it is too late.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHOFFER—I did not hear the amendment put. I move that the vote be taken on the amendment.

THE SPEAKER—Unless notice is given to reconsider the matter, it cannot be done.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I do not think the question is settled. Before the Speaker can decide he must say those who are in favour say Content, those who are opposed Not content. The hon. the Speaker did not put the amendment that way to the House, and I do not think under the circumstances, that because he says it is carried, it precludes the possibility of taking a vote on the question.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I did not know that it was carried.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If the government say that we should meet on the 5th of April, they are responsible for the legislation and we should accept their view.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I move to extend the adjournment, because of my experience of last session. I remember we sat there for some weeks after the adjournment from day to day with little or nothing to do. The leader of the House did not take the responsibility of moving for a longer delay and I thought the amendment would be accepted. I did not know that my amendment had been put and voted upon.

The SPEAKER—I put the amendment regularly and asked is it your pleasure to adopt this motion. There were cries of carried and lost and in my opinion the majority were opposed to the motion and no vote being demanded I declared the amendment lost. I then put the main motion, which seemed to have the support of the majority and declared it carried. Personally I should have preferred to see the amendment carried and I am sorry that those who favour a longer adjournment did not insist on a vote being taken.

ANTI-JAPANESE LEGISLATION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL inquired:

Whether any answer has been given to the protest of the Japanese government against the anti-Japanese legislation by the British Columbia Legislature, during the past year? If so, what is the nature of said answer?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that no answer has yet been given to the Japanese government. We have discussed the question with the British Columbia Government, but have not yet answered the Japanese government on the subject, nor have we taken any final action with respect to the British Columbia legislation.

The Senate adjourned.

THE STOCK DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED, from the Committee on Divorce, presented their second report, recommending that the fees in the case of David Stock be remitted. He said:—I believe that evidence was submitted before the committee showing the very limited circumstances of the petitioner, and such a case was established as to warrant the committee in making a report asking the House to concur in the petition that the fees be remitted.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS moved concurrence in the report of the committee.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS introduced Bill (A) An Act for the relief of David Stock."

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I should like to ask if the concurrence in the report of the committee grants the prayer of the petitioner. If it does I shall oppose it. I think it is opening the door to too many of those cases and it would be well to stop it at the threshhold.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The report recommends that the $200 fee payable to Parliament on the presentation of the bill be remitted to the petitioner. I might, in presenting the report, have stated that the petitioner is a man with seven children working his day's labour in the gas construction works in Toronto. He has a very limited income, probably not exceeding $2 a day. Evidence was brought before the committee establishing conclusively that he was not possessed of property to prosecute his case if called upon to pay the fee. There seemed to be no difference whatever amongst the members of the committee as to the desirability of remitting the fee. The Minister of Justice was present when the matter was discussed, and the committee felt thoroughly warranted in pursuing this course. I might further say that a number of precedents have been established by this House which are of a nature similar to that which we now ask the House to concur in, and therefore the committee felt justified in asking the Senate, in this particular case, owing to the circumstances which have been set forth in the petition, to remit the fee of $200, and allow the petitioner to proceed in forma pauperis.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I have no doubt the statement by the hon. gentleman is quite correct, and I agree with the idea that there might be an invidious distinction between the rich and the poor man; but there is always a danger that you may increase the number of applications to this House for divorce if you allow it to go forth that we are at all times willing to remit the fees to men or women that may petition the House upon the basis on which this petition is founded. The precedents to which my hon. friend has referred have only been in the cases of women, who are not, as a rule, in a position to prosecute. Under such circumstances, I believe the House was compassionate enough to remit the fees and ascertain the facts, but I do not know of an instance where a man who made an application for divorce had the fees remitted.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—We have had no statement of the views of the wife of the petitioner in this case, and I think it would be a mistake to remit the fees.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The evidence before the committee established this fact, and the wife, from whom the divorce is sought, being the mother of seven children, deserted not only her husband but her family, to secure a license for marriage with another person. Both the woman herself and the man whom she married on the second occasion suffered imprisonment for six months by reason of their having committed bigamy. So that, under the circumstances, I think the House cannot be carried away by undue sympathy for the mother who deserted her family. I might say, in answer to the hon. gentleman from Glengarry, that the decision of such a question should not be a matter of false sympathy. It should be based entirely on the facts submitted to the committee. I do not think the committee ought to take into consideration whether it be a man or a woman who makes the application. If the facts warrant the husband making such an application, the House should weigh those facts precisely in the same way as they would in the event of the petitioner being a woman. The question of sex should not determine the course which this house should pursue in the matter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I agree with the observations made by the hon. gentleman from Calgary. I was present in the committee and heard the papers read and the evidence produced, and I think that so long as you permit divorce at all, what is proposed in this case is a proper proceeding. The woman, I think in 1893, deserted her husband, and married another man. Both were prosecuted for bigamy and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. The woman had two children, it is stated, by her second husband. The petitioner has his family of six or seven chidren to provide for. He is working as a day labourer in the employ of the gas company in the city of Toronto, and it was stated had no means beyond what was necessary for the maintenance of his family. It did seem to me a proper thing in this case that he should obtain a divorce, so long as divorce is recognized by law. I am perfectly aware that a large section of our population are opposed, on principle, to divorce from the marriage bond. There is another large section, the Protestant section, who think that for the cause of adultery there ought to be provision made for a dissolution of the marriage bond. In this country no section of the population has ever proposed to carry the principle further than a divorce for adultery, and it is most fortunate for the country that that is so, because I see, while in this country during a period of twenty years 116 divorces have been obtained in this House, that in the United States, during the same period, over 400,000 divorces have been granted. So it is very well, indeed, that the power to obtain a divorce should be confined, if permitted at all, within the very narrow limit to which it is now restricted, and if we do grant divorces—and we are doing it now—it seems to me that the man who applies in this case is entitled to obtain divorce, and if so entitled, looking at his circumstances, we ought not to demand from him the usual fee.

The bill was read the first time on a division.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS moved that the bill be read the second time on the 10th of April next.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—We have heard from the husband ; we have heard nothing from the woman. It is very possible that this man may not have supported this woman, that he may have turned her adrift and may be as guilty as she is. We all know that those whom God has joined together we should not put asunder: we are putting these people asunder and doing it without sufficient evidence.

The motion was agreed to.

THE FENIAN RAID MEDALS.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL gave notice

That he will call the attention of the Government to the following proceedings of a joint meeting of the special committee appointed by the Toronto '66 Veterans' Association and the Red River Expedition Association, 1870, held at Toronto, on the 22nd of March, 1899, for the purpose of considering the best steps to be taken for securing an early issue of the Canada General War Medal. These were present:—

Representing the Toronto '66 Veterans' Association.

Major Dixon, Past President.
Capt. George Musson, Past President.
Lieut. Fahey, Past President.
Alexander Muir, President.
R. C. Marshall, 1st Vice President.
Lieut. Kingsford, 2nd Vice-President.
Capt. Stinson, David Creighton and E. A. Crossman, Members of Executive Committee.
James Constable, Secretary.

Representing the Red River Expedition Association, 1870.

Capt. S. Bruce Harman, President.
Capt. J. J. Bell, Secretary.

Capt. Musson was appointed Chairman of the joint meeting, and Capt. Bell, Secretary.

After discussion, the following resolution was adopted unanimously:—

Moved by Lieut R. E. Kingsford, seconded by Major F. E. Dixon, and carried:

That this meeting deeply regrets the delay which has occurred in the issue of the Canada General Service War Medal, and draws attention to the following facts:—

1. The Memorial from the people of Canada to Her Majesty, praying for the issue of a Canada General Service War Medal, was presented to His Excellency the Governor General in May, 1897. This Memorial was signed by Lieutenant Governors of Provinces, Ministers of the Dominion and of the Provinces, Mayors of Cities and Towns, Wardens of Counties, Boards of Trade and many other representative bodies, and was a truly national representative Memorial.

2. The memorial was forwarded by His Excellency within a very short time after its receipt, and on the 20th October, 1897, a cable message was received to the effect that Her Majesty had been graciously pleased to authorize the issue of a Canada General Service War Medal.

3. In November, 1897, the Imperial War Office requested the Canadian Government to forward a design for the reverse of the medal.

4. In June, 1898, the Militia Department announced that a board of officers had been appointed to consider claims.

5. In November, 1898, one year after the Militia Department had been asked for a design for the medal it was announced that the Ward Department had approved of a design furnished from Canada.

6. It thus appears that a lapse of over a year took place between the announcement that the medal had been granted and the anouncement that the design had been approved of.

7. Application was made to the Minister of Militia in March, 1899, the present month, for information as to when the medals might be expected, and the reply was made that no satisfactory information could be given as to when the medals may be issued.

8. It is now over a year and five months since the first announcement was made that the medals had been granted and so far as the committee can ascertain no definite progress in the actual delivery of the medals appears to have been made.

9. During the interval many of those who were entitled to this medal have died and their comrades have seen, with bitter regret, these old friends depart this life without receiving this honourable distinction which they so fairly earned.

10. The committee would respectfully call the attention of the Minister of Militia and of the Members of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada to this deplorable delay, and request that urgent measures be taken to obtain the issue, or distribution, of the medals on Her Majesty's next birthday, 24th May.

11. The committee feel strongly that this medal having been granted by Her Majesty in Her Majesty's Jubilee Year, it should be presented on Her Majesty's birthday, and that if one anniversary has been unfortunately allowed to pass, no time should be lost in making quite certain that the medals be distributed on the 24th May next.

12. That copies of this resolution be transmitted to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Hon. R. W. Scott, Sir Mackenzie Bowell. the Hon. Minister of Militia, Sir Charles Tupper and the daily press of Toronto and Montreal.

The secretary was requested to take immediate steps to forward copies of above resolution to parties named.

GEORGE MUSSON, Capt.,
Chairman.

J. J. BELL, Capt.,
Secretary

And inquire whether the medals referred to in the above resolutions have been received by the Department of Militia? If so, when will they be ready for distribution? If not, what steps have been taken to secure them, in order that the prayer of the petitioners may be complied with?

He said:—My only reason for placing this on the notice paper is to give the government an opportunity of making a public statement with reference to these medals, as there are a great many who are interested in receiving them, and, as one of the resolutions points out, some of the older men are dropping off and would like to have the medals in their families.

THE ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, may I claim the indulgence of the House to make an observation or two with regard to the question of adjournment, which was discussed yesterday afternoon and settled amid some little confusion. I have been approached by some hon. members of the House who suggest the propriety of this matter again being brought before the House this afternoon, and the attention of the hon. leader of the House directed to the fact that the House of Commons will very soon adjourn for a week. Hence, if the adjournment, which was decided upon yesterday is brought into effect, it will result in our meeting a week from Wednesday next without any practical object. I would, therefore, with all due deference to what was said yesterday by the hon. leader of the House, ask him to reconsider the step which was taken, and, if possible, concede to the members of the House, what a majority of them seemed to be in favour of obtaining if possible, a longer adjournment than that which was agreed upon. It must be manifest to every one that if we meet again on the 5th April, as was yesterday determined, it cannot be with any good result. I do not think the public service will be injuriously affected if we adjourn a week longer than was determined on yesterday.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I stated my views to hon. gentlemen yesterday. I believe, as my hon. friend says, that the House of Commons is not making the progress with the discussion of the Address that was anticipated, and it may be that they can not get through with it before the Easter adjournment. Of course, we are in the hands of the House, but in any event, if the House desires it, we would not like to adjourn longer than Tuesday the 11th at 8 o'clock. If that is the wish of the House I have no objection to make the change.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That being the case, I move that the motion adopted by the Senate yesterday to adjourn from to-day until the fifth of April next be rescinded.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Before voting for that, I should like to know, for my own satisfaction, whether the course now proposed meets with the approval of the hon. gentlemen who represent the government in this House, or whether the public business will be prejudiced by the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think that the public business will be prejudiced by the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I am very sorry that we had not that statement from the leader of the House yesterday. I think that we were entitled to it. I expressed my desire to carry out the views of the government, and if the change that is now proposed had not been favoured by the government I should have opposed it, but the government having declared that the public interests will not suffer by the adjournment, of course I am not disposed to vote against it. At the same time, the Senate has been placed in an anomalous position by this proposal to rescind the action taken yesterday, and to adjourn to a later period. In future, when an adjournment is proposed, more time should be given to enable the Senate to come to a decision. I think it is a mistake to bring on an adjournment this week; it would have been better to sit a week longer and then adjourn. The probability is that when we return and sit here for a few days, with little or nothing to do, there will be a clamour for another adjournment.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The Minister of Justice has further information since yesterday as to the progress of business in the House of Commons and instead of finding fault with the government for granting the request of the House to extend the adjournment a week longer, I think it is a good thing in itself, because when we return we will probably find very little business here to be attended to.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—If the leader of the House says that the business of the country will not be interfered with by the extension of the adjournment, I have no objection to the motion being carried, but if it would delay the business of the House I should certainly oppose it.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that when the House adjourns to-day it stands adjourned until April 11th at 8 p.m.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ALASKAN BOUNDARY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. Secretary of State may remember that in the debate on the Address I asked him if he was informed if any discussion was going on between the Imperial Government and the government of the United States with reference to the modus vivendi in that matter of the Alaskan boundary. I see by a dispatch published in this morning's paper that a question was asked on the subject in the House of Commons yesterday, and that the answer was that proposals for a modus vivendi had been made to the United States Government and that they were now under consideration. It is strange that the government here should not be aware of that, because it is a matter of greater importance in Canada than it is in the mother country. Perhaps the government have heard since then what negotiations are going on. There must be something in it from the information that appears in the newspapers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have had no information beyond what we have seen in the public press. I have no doubt the facts are as stated in the press. The attention of the government of Canada has not been called to the question. It is very well known that the minister, when in Washington, had pressed on his colleagues in the commission the importance of having this question settled and had suggested a tribunal to settle it, but they were unable to convince them that it was necessary to do it. From the published telegram it appears that the matter has been taken up by the Imperial Government in that direction.

WINNIPEG REPRESENTATION IN PARLIAMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY rose to inquire:

Is it the intention of the government to give to the city of Winnipeg representation in the Dominion Parliament during the present session? If so, how soon will the writ for the election be issued; and if no representation, why not?

He said:—It has been a source of great regret to the citizens of Winnipeg that since the last session of parliament they have lost their representative. It is in view of that fact that I now ask the question, notice of which appears on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The matter is in the hands of the Speaker of the House of Commons and the members of the House of Commons. If any hon. member moves that the writ be issued, there is no doubt a writ will be issued. That has not been done, so far as I know. When that is done the government may take action, not before.

ALLEGED CABINET MEETING IN NEW YORK.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired :

If it is true the Dominion Government held an Executive Council meeting in the city of New York, one of the cities of the United States of America; further, if said meeting was held on the Sabbath day; and furthermore, if the minutes of said meeting are entered as official records in the Privy Council?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to the hon. gentleman that it not true that the government held a meeting of the Privy Council in New York, and so there is no record called for.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You only had a talk.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose my hon. friend did not find it is impossible to talk beyond the boundary of his own country.

THE YUKON-TESLIN ROUTE.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all correspondence with, and instructions given to Louis Coste, late engineer in the Public Works Department, with reference to the Yukon-Teslin route, and the navigation of the rivers and lakes connected therewith, and all reports thereon, made by the said Louis Coste.

The motion was agreed to.

INSPECTOR OF MINES IN THE YUKON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer, inquired :

1. Was James D. McGregor appointed Inspector of Mines in the Yukon district? If so, what was the date of his appointment? Is he still employed in that capacity? If not, when was his appointment terminated?

2. What was his salary?

3. Was he allowed his expenses in addition, and if so, what was the amount paid for his expenses while so employed?

4. Did his duties comprise the collection of ten per cent royalty on the output of the mines? If so, what was the amount of royalty collected.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I might say in reply to the hon. gentleman's questions :

1. That James D. McGregor was appointed Inspector of Mines on the 28th of September, 1897.

2. That his salary was $1,500 per annum.

3. That he was allowed his expenses in addition to the salary, and these amounted to $916.50.

4. His duties comprised the collection of 10 per cent royalty on the output of the mines, and to examine the records of the miners in order to see that they have paid the royalty, and if not, to collect it, and to issue the gold commissoner's receipt for the same. The amount of royalty collected up to the 31st of January, 1899, was $396,462.36.

ROLLING STOCK OF THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EXTENSION.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer, moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a statement showing the quantity of rolling stock purchased in connection with the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from Lévis to Montreal; from whom it was purchased, and the price paid therefor; also, the number of passengers and the quantity of freight carried, and the expense of working the said extension since the date when it passed into the hands or control of the government.

The motion was agreed to.

VOTERS' LISTS IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the adjournment of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A motion has been made in the House of the Assembly in Nova Scotia to which I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Justice. I wish to ask him whether the promise of last year in reference to the request that was to be made by the Dominion Government to those provinces in which there was no appeal from the voters' list to the judge, has been carried out. I notice that Mr. Kendall has given notice of a bill to extend the time for the completion of the electoral lists in the county of Cape Breton. Perhaps it is not necessary for me to read the discussion that took place at the time, unless it has escaped the memory of my hon. friend. I called attention, however, to the statement made by the Premier in the other House that representations would be made to different provinces, Manitoba, Nova Scotia and, I think, New Brunswick, of the fact that there was no appeal to the judge by those whose names had been left off the lists. It will also be remembered that the Senate thought it was well that such a provision should be contained in the bill which adopted the franchises of the different provinces; but after consultation certain concessions were made by the House of Commons and also by the Senate. In this case the House of Commons declined to accept that amendment, and the question was put to my hon. friend by myself whether the promise which had been made by the Premier would be acted upon in this case, and if that promise was given it would justify the Senate in not insisting upon their amendment. My hon. friend the Secretary of State also acquiesced in this way:

I suppose (I said), we have the assurance that this will be accepted by the hon. gentleman's colleagues in the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think so.

What I wanted to ask the hon. Minister of Justice is whether any representations have been made, in accordance with this promise, to the different provinces, and, if so, what has been the result? Have they promised to adopt the system which prevails in Ontario, or any other system by which a disfranchised man would be enabled to appeal to the judge in order to secure those rights of franchise to which he is entitled.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot say to my hon. friend what communication has taken place. I shall make inquiries and be able, I hope, to give the hon. gentleman the information which he seeks immediately after we meet again.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

SALE OF KINGSTON PENITENTIARY BINDER TWINE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired:

What quantity of binder twine was manufactured, during the past season, in the Kingston Penitentiary? If it has been sold? And if so, to whom, and at what price per pound?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that I am not able to answer the question to-night. I forgot about it being on the paper, and the inspector, whose business it would have been to have brought this matter before me, is away in the North-west Territories at the present moment. However, I will inquire into the matter and give him the information to-morrow.

ANTI-JAPANESE LEGISLATION BY BRITISH COLUMBIA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL inquired:

If any correspondence has taken place between the Canadian Government and the Japanese authorities since the receipt of the despatch from the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for the Colonies, conveying the protest of the Japanese Government, protesting against the anti-Japanese legislation by the British Columbia legislature? If so, what is the nature of such communicatien, and will it be laid upon the Table of the Senate?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that we have had correspondence, I think about contemporaneous with the letter of the hon. Secretary of State to which my hon. friend refers, but I am not prepared to lay it on the table at the present time, because we have not yet acted on the matter to which the Japanese Government have referred. As soon as action is taken and the matter dealt with, I see no objection to bring the correspondence down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask if the correspondence is still being continued, or whether it has been completed and is awaiting the action of the government?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The correspondence is not being continued in the sense in which my hon. friend uses that expression. It simply is awaiting the action of the government here to see what may be done and I may say to my hon. friend that we communicated the action of the local government, and our report to the Colonial Secretary, for any observations that he may be disposed to make, and to the present time we have had no further communication.

LA BANQUE DU PEUPLE SUSPENSION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a return showing:—

1. A copy of the last government return made by La Banque du Peuple before that bank suspended payment, as well as the name of the bank official and a copy of the declaration made by him.
2. A copy of the different statements of the affairs of said bank submitted by the directors at each of the public meetings of the stock holders and depositors which were held since the date of suspension.
3. A list of the names of the directors of the bank at the date of its suspension, and the number of shares held by each of such directors at that date.
4. A list of sales or transfers, if any, that may have been made of the stock of any one or more of the directors since the date of the suspension, and to whom made.
5. A list of any vacancy or vacancies that may have occurred since the said date and the cause or causes thereof, as well as the names of those who have been appointed to fill any such vacancy.
6. The prices as near as can be ascertained from the quotations of the stock of any sales or transfers that were made within the last month immediately before such suspension, and the prices paid for any such transfer of stock that may have been made since the date of suspension up to 1st April, 1899.
7. A list of the names of the stock holders of the bank on the 1st day of April, 1899, and the number of shares held by each on that date.
8. A statement in detail of the assets and liabilities of the bank, excepting therefrom the liabilities to the depositors and stock holders which may be given in the aggregate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say to my hon. friend that I do not know how far we may be able to give him the information which he seeks; but I shall make inquiry of the Finance department, and as far as that information is in the possession of the government, I see no objection to its being brought down.

The motion was agreed to.

FENIAN RAIDS MEDALS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to:

Call the attention of the government to the following proceedings of a joint meeting of the special committee appointed by the Toronto '66 Veterans' Association and the Red River Expedition Association, 1870, held at Toronto, on the 22nd March, 1899, for the purpose of considering the best steps to be taken for securing an early issue of the Canada General War Medal. These were present:—

Representing the Toronto '66 Veterans' Association.

Major Dixon, past president.
Capt. George Musson, past president.
Lieut. Fahey, past president.
Alexander Muir, president.
R. C. Marshall, 1st vice-president.
Lieut. Kingsford, 2nd vice-president.
Capt. Stinson, David Creighton and E. A. Crossman, members of executive committee.
James Constable, secretary.

Representing the Red River Expedition Association, 1870.

Capt. S. Bruce Harman, president.
Capt. J. J. Bell, secretary.

Capt. Musson was appointed chairman of the joint meeting, and Capt. Bell, secretary.

After discussion, the following resolution was adopted unanimously:—

Moved by Lieut. R. E. Kingsford, seconded by Major F. E. Dixon, and carried:

That this meeting deeply regrets the delay which has occurred in the issue of the Canada General Service War Medal, and draws attention to the following facts:—

1. The memorial from the people of Canada to Her Majesty, praying for the issue of a Canada General Service War Medal, was presented to His Excellency the Governor General in May, 1897. This memorial was signed by Lieutenant Governors of Provinces, Ministers of the Dominion and of the Provinces, Mayors of Cities and Towns, Wardens of Counties, Boards of Trade and many other representative bodies, and was a truly national representative Memorial.
2. The memorial was forwarded by His Excellency within a very short time after its receipt, and on the 20th October, 1897, a cable message was received to the effect that Her Majesty had been graciously pleased to authorize the issue of a Canada General Service War Medal.
3. In November, 1897, the Imperial War Office requested the Canadian Government to forward a design for the reverse of the medal.
4. In June, 1898, the Militia Department announced that a board of officers had been appointed to consider claims.
5. In November, 1898, one year after the Militia Department had been asked for a design for the medal it was announced that the War Department had approved of a design furnished from Canada.
6. It thus appears that a lapse of over a year took place between the announcement that the medal had been granted and the announcement that the design had been approved of.
7. Application was made to the Minister of Militia in March, 1899, the present month, for information as to when the medals might be expected, and the reply was made that no satisfactory information could be given as to when the medals may be issued.

8. It is now over a year and five months since the first announcement was made that the medals had been granted and so far as the committee can ascertain no definite progress in the actual delivery of the medals appears to have been made.

9. During the interval many of those who were entitled to this medal have died and their comrades have seen, with bitter regret, these old friends depart this life without receiving this honourable distinction which they so fairly earned.

10. The committee would respectfully call the attention of the Minister of Militia and of the members of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada to this deplorable delay, and request that urgent measures be taken to obtain the issue, or distribution, of the medals on Her Majesty's next birthday, 24th May.

11. The committee feel strongly that this medal having been granted by Her Majesty in Her Majesty's jubilee year, it should be presented on Her Majesty's birthday, and that if one anniversary has been unfortunately allowed to pass, no time should be lost in making quite certain that the medals be distributed on the 24th May next.

12. That copies of this resolution be transmitted to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, hon. R. W. Scott, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the hon. Minister of Militia, Sir Charles Tupper and the daily press of Toronto and Montreal.

The secretary was requested to take immediate steps o forward copies of above resolution to parties named.

GEORGE MUSSON, Capt.,
Chairman.

J. J. BELL, Capt.,
Secretary.

And inquired whether the medals referred to in the above resolutions have been received by the Department of Militia? If so, when will they be ready for distribution? If not, what steps have been taken to secure them, in order that the prayer of the petitioners may be complied with?

He said:—Might I ask if the hon. minister is prepared with an answer to this question?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No; allow that to stand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have had some correspondence myself on the subject and I find that the delay is due to the officers of the Mint. They have been pressed from time to time to get out the medals, and Lord Strathcona has been appealed to to hasten, if possible, the completion of them. The delay is there, and of course we can do no more than press them, and explain that the delay is very much regretted on this side of the Atlantic.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The answer will be satisfactory to those who complain. I have received some letters lately, stating that some others have departed this life since the notice was given, and I am glad to learn that it is not the fault of the Canadian Government, but rather of the Mint at home that the delay has occurred. I think that the answer will be quite satisfactory to those who are interested.

GOVERNMENT BILLS IN THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the House do now adjourn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understood the hon. Minister of Justice to say that he intended to introduce a number of important bills in this House. Has he any objection to tell us what the character of those bills is, and when they will be submitted to our consideration?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I expect to introduce some of them to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 12th April, 1899.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL read the following notice of motion:—

On Monday, 17th instant, I will move that an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that he will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all correspondence and communications bearing upon the subject of the proposed Pacific cable between Canada and the Australian Colonies, not already laid before Parliament, together with a copy of the agreement entered into between Her Majesty's government and the Eastern Extension Company, bearing date the 28th day of October, 1893, granting to that company exclusive rights to land a cable in Hong Kong; also, the report of the Imperial commission on the subject of the laying of a submarine cable between Canada and Australia.

He said:—My intention was to have given notice of this motion prior to the adjournment, but I neglected it. I see, however, by this morning's paper, that the government have come to a decision as o the course they intend to pursue on this important project. It was a question with me whether, if that report be correct, my motion would be necessary, but, on reflection, I see that no harm can arise from my making the motion and discussing the question. It would be gratifying to many of those who have taken a very deep interest in what I might term a matter of great Imperial importance to know if the reports, which appear in to-day's paper, are correct as to the course the government have determined to take upon this question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I might say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that the subject is under the consideration of the government, I may say under the favourable consideration of the government, but further than that I am unable to express any opinion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Probably the hon. gentleman will be prepared on Monday, when we discuss the motion, to give us some information.

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY BINDER TWINE

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired of the government:

What quantity of binder twine was manufactured, during the past season, in the Kingston Penitentiary. If it has been sold? And if so, to whom, and at what price per pound?

He said:—The hon. Minister of Justice said he would answer this question to-day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—With regard to the quantity of binder twine, I may say the quantity on hand at the end of February was 534,800 lbs. Tenders were called for, and it was sold to the Hobbs Hardware Co. The prices cannot be given until the twine is marketed by the purchasers, because it is contrary to the practice to do so.

CITY AND TOWN POST OFFICES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to inquire:

Whether the Postmaster General has, during the the past year, or any other time, reduced any city post office to that of a town office, as was done on the plea of economy in the case of the city of Belleville? If not, why have not those cities which the public accounts show cost a greater percentage of the revenue collected to perform the duties of said offices, then did that of Belleville reduced?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In reply to the first part of the question, as to whether the Postmaster General has, during the past year or at any other time, reduced any city post office to that of a town office, as was done on the plea of economy in the case of the city of Belleville, the answer is no. With regard to the second part of the question, if the hon. gentleman will name the particular post offices to which he alludes, it will be possible for the Postmaster General to give the information. Then with regard to the further question—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it will be better to wait till the questions are put; or there may be some irregularity in regard to the matter. An irregularity occurred yesterday which prevented the Clerk putting the question which I submitted, with reference to the veterans' medals, upon the journals. It is not a matter of very much consequence I dare say, but the question really was not put, although my hon. friend the Secretary of State answered it and his answer was accepted by myself, but the Clerk informed me that not having the document in his hand, and the question not being put in regular order, it could not be put on record. The course adopted to-day may have the same result. I think I understand the answer given by my hon. friend. He says, in the first place, that no city office has been reduced as was that of Belleville. He also says that, not having given the names of the cities to which I refer in this motion, he is not in a position to answer. I gave all those facts last session and I presumed my hon. friend was in possession of them, or the Postmaster General was in possession of the facts, because I not only gave the names of the cities in the different sections of the Dominion, but I also gave the amount collected and the percentage of the expenditure in collecting it, showing that there were several in a much worse position than Belleville. However, I will accept the suggestion of my hon. friend and put another notice upon the paper. The hon. gentleman has answered my second question first: I have therefore to ask the government:

How many new post offices have been opened since the 12th July, 1896; the names of said post offices; where situated; the names of said postmasters, and the additional number of miles which have to be travelled to serve said offices?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The answer that the Postmaster General has put in my hands is that this queston will have to stand for a few days, as it will take a good deal of the time of the staff to make the necessary extracts to give the hon. gentleman the information which he seeks.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Whenever the hon. gentleman is ready.

The question was allowed to stand.

DISMISSAL OF POST OFFICE MAIL CLERK KETCHESON.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, the complaints and all correspondence relating thereto, which led to the dismissal of Mr. Freeman Ketcheson from the position of post office mail clerk, including the statement or statements of the said Freeman Ketcheson in reply to said complaints.

He said:—I do not know that it is necessary that I should discuss the facts in connection with this dismissal. They were fully considered during the last session of Parliament. What I am desirous of obtaining now, is the complaints which were made against Ketcheson and his reply thereto together with the evidence submitted.

The motion was agreed to.

THE BINDER TWINE QUESTION.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I should like to ask the hon. leader of the government if I correctly understood him to say that the government refused to disclose the prices at which penitentiary twine was selling.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, we have never done so in the department. It would be prejudicial to the parties purchasing.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What about the other parties who are interested?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are a great many competitors on the market.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—It would be interesting to know how the sale was made—whether by competition or by private sale.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—By tender.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.—I think the better way to get that would be to move for the tenders. I suggest that course to my hon. friend, because the position taken by the government is very extraordinary.

SENATOR SUTHERLAND'S SEAT DECLARED VACANT.

REPORT ADOPTED.

The SPEAKER presented the report of the Standing Committee on the Orders and Privileges of the House, recommending that the seat of the Hon. John Sutherland be declared vacant.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the report be adopted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When a member of this House who has been so long associated with it as Mr. Sutherland—I think for upwards of twenty-five years—severs his connection with this body, it is only right and proper that those who knew him should bear testimony to the worth and esteem in which he is held. I have had the pleasure of knowing him for nearly a quarter of a century, and during that time formed a very high opinion of his honour and integrity. He had a kind, gentle disposition, and although he did not take a very active part in debate, when he did so he always spoke with judgment and good sense and commanded the attention of the House. Mr. Sutherland, before entering the Senate of Canada, which he did when Manitoba came into Confederation, held the position of sheriff of Winnipeg. He had before that been associated with other distinguished citizens in advancing that province, having been born in the neighbourhood of Winnipeg before the city was founded. I think his father emigrated there at a very early period, and Mr. Sutherland was born somewhere in the neighbourhood of Fort Garry, before Winnipeg became known to the world. I am quite sure that the resolution which I propose to submit to the House—and which I trust will be communicated to his family—will receive the universal approval of every hon. gentleman present, and I trust it will be seconded by the hon. leader of the opposition. I propose the following resolution :—

Moved by Hon. Mr. Scott, seconded by Sir Mackenzie Bowell, that the members of the Senate beg to convey to their late colleague, the Hon. John Sutherland, the expression of their sincere regret at the severance of the tie which has hitherto connected them, which has been occasioned by his failing health, and beg to assure him that they will cherish pleasant recollections of their association with him for so many years in the Senate of Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I second the motion with pleasure, while regretting very much the causes which have prevented our late colleague from attending the sessions of the Senate for the last few years. It has not been my privilege to know him so intimately as the hon. Secretary of State who has moved this resolution, but my limited acquaintance with him was of a character similar to that which has been expressed by the mover of this resolution. I regret his absence all the more from the fact that he was one of the older members of the Senate and a representative of the Western province to which his father moved in 1815, and in which country, as the hon. Secretary of State has stated, Senator Sutherland was born, within the precincts of the present limits of the city of Winnipeg. He has occupied, as I stated in the Committee, a number of very important positions in his own province. He was at one time a director of a Trust Company, a director of the Commercial bank, and a member of Council of Assiniboia until it was abolished, and also held the high office, to which the hon. Secretary of State has referred, of sheriff of Winnipeg. Everyone who had the privilege of his acquaintance must have formed a high opinion of his character, and we cannot but deeply regret that failing health prevents him from attending to the duties which pertain to a member of the Senate. I do not know that I can say more than to hope that his successor may succeed in securing the good opinion of both political parties as Mr. Sutherland has done. If he does, we certainly shall have no cause to regret his appointment. I still hope that, although in failing health, Mr. Sutherland may be spared to his family for many years to come, and I cordially join with my hon. friend the Secretary of State in the expressions of regret that we are losing such an estimated colleague.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—As has been mentioned by the Secretary of State, Senator Sutherland was one of the oldest members of this body, and as I am fast in the way of receiving that same reputation myself, I think it would not be out of place to add a word to what has been said with respect to the hon. gentleman. As the hon. Secretary of State has mentioned, Mr. Sutherland did not very often take part in the debates of this House, but when he did so, the sound common sense with which he expressed himself always commended what he said. He was always a useful member and a constant attendant of committees on which he was placed, and few members of this House commanded more thoroughly the respect and kindly feeling of this body. In common with all our friends, I am sure, I regret the cause which has led to the necessity of filling his place, and I would add also the expression of my hope that although he may no longer sit with us here, his life may be spared to his family and friends.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Coming from the province of Manitoba, where the hon. Senator Sutherland has resided so long, and of which he was one of the founders, I cannot let the present opportunity pass without adding a few words to what has been said by the hon. Secretary of State and other hon. gentlemen who have expressed themselves on the departure of Senator Sutherland from amongst us. I have had the pleasure of knowing the Hon. Mr. Sutherland ever since the year 1869, when it was still the Selkirk Settlement, before the province came into confederation and before he became a member of this House. I have also had the pleasure of knowing his family, and I might say that a more representative, a more highly respected family, does not exist in Canada than that of Senator Sutherland's. As the previous speakers have already said, it would be difficult to find anyone who will occupy such a warm place in the hearts of the members of this House as Mr. Sutherland has done by his consistent character and impartial conduct while he was a member of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that His Honour the Speaker be requested to communicate a copy of the foregoing resolution to the Hon. John Sutherland.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that an humble address, based on the resolution of this House be presented to His Excellency the Governor General.

The motion was agreed to.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the first reading of Bill (B) "An Act further to amend the Exchequer Court Act." He said :—The first provision of the present bill is for the purpose of facilitating the work of the Exchequer Court in the province of Quebec. Hon. gentlemen know we have one judge of the Exchequer Court, who finds it possible to discharge all the judicial functions of that court, but in the province of Quebec, in some districts, where it is necessary that the court should sit, it is found inconvenient sometimes, in consequence of the fact that the judge of the Exchequer Court is not familiar with the French language ; and therefore I propose to enable the local judge of the Admiralty Court to undertake, when asked to do so in the province of Quebec, the work of the Exchequer Court judge, and the bill also provides that there shall be paid the judge for holding such court in the province of Quebec the usual sum of $100 that is allowed for holding the court. I also propose to provide by this bill some amendment of the law in respect to the assessment of damages for injury to lands affected by public works. The law as it now stands is found unsatisfactory, and the government often has judgment given against it for very much larger sums than it is of opinion the party who is seeking damages from the Crown ought to receive. I therefore propose to amend the law in that regard in this way :

If the injury to any land or property alleged to be injuriously affected by the construction of any public work may be removed wholly or in part by any alteration in or addition to any such public work, or by the construction of any additional work, or by the abandonment of any portion of the land taken from the claimant, or by the grant to him of any land or easement, and if the Crown by its pleadings or on the trial or before judgment undertakes to make such alteration or addition or to construct such work, or to abandon such portion of the land taken, or to grant such lands or easements, the damages shall be assessed in view of such undertaking and the court shall declare that in addition to any damages awarded the claimant is entitled to have such alteration or addition made or such work constructed, or such grant made to him.

The last clause provides that this bill shall apply to pending cases as well as to future claims. No injustice can be done to parties in this regard if the law itself, as proposed, is perfectly just.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the first time.

PRESERVATION OF HEALTH ON PUBLIC WORKS BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr MILLS moved the first reading of bill (C) "An Act for the preservation of health on public works."

He said :—This measure has been suggested by the events, with which hon. gentlemen are familiar, that occurred in the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. There were a number of cases of serious illness, and there did not seem to be the necessary hospital accommodation that ought to have existed for the protection of the health and the preservation of the lives of those who were in the employ of companies. Since last session a very full and careful inquiry has been made of all the events associated with the death of certain parties on that work, and we have endeavoured to avail ourselves of the information contained in the report of the commission with a view to meeting cases of that sort which may arise in the future. Hon. gentlemen will understand that a law of this sort is necessarily tentative. We are travelling over a way which has hitherto been but very imperfectly marked out. It will be necessary to acquire experience in order that our legislation may be efficient and may exactly meet the requirements of the various public works or undertakings in the country. We therefore have not been in a position to make the provisions of our bill in this regard as specific as they otherwise might have been made.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask is that provision to be made applicable to both contractors and builders?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—To both.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Both to be held responsible?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly, all parties, to the extent that may be necessary.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—For instance, the railway companies.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, and a contractor may himself become criminally liable by failing to act in accordance with the provisions of the bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But do I understand the bill makes it a criminal offence?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is rather in the nature of a police offence than a criminal offence for the protection of the health of the parties along the line of the work, or undertaking. Where the hospital accommodation is inadequate, we provide for punishment by imprisonment not to exceed three months, and we provide for forfeitures; that is, where subsidies are granted to a railway, and where the company undertaking the work of construction altogether fail to meet the requirements of the law in this regard. It is necessary to adopt a somewhat stringent measure in order that there may be little temptation to disregard the provisions of the law. I was saying a moment ago, that we have our experience in this regard to acquire, and there is no doubt whatever that it will be important to supersede any regulations that the Governor in Council may make, under the authority of this bill, by legislation as soon as the government, or any one else, is in a position to submit to parliament proposed provisions of the law to supersede ordinances or Orders in Council, and so I say in this 4th clause that the Governor in Council may, until Parliament otherwise provides, do so and so. I have indicated that as soon as the necessary information is had, and Parliament is in a position to legislate fully upon the subject, then the function and power that will be conferred by the Governor in Council by the bill should come to an end. This, I think, is as far as it was possible for us to go under the circumstances, and all our Orders in Council must necessarily be of a tentative character.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Could not that bill deal with the quality of food supplied by contractors to workmen in cases like that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Possibly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am inclined to the opinion, from hearing it read, that the bill is in the right direction. It is impossible for any member of the Senate to commit himself to the details until we have had an opportunity of seeing it, but from what I can understand of it, I think it is not only in the right direction, but is of a practical character, which will meet the approval of the people generally. I might say that the other bill which has been introduced strikes me as being of a somewhat similar character, to meet a difficulty which I know has arisen in the province of Quebec, where it is necessary that the person holding the inquiry should understand the language of the people; and although I know it is not strictly in order, while I am on my feet, I may add that if I understand the bill, it does not give the Governor in Council powers to appoint any new judges, but to relegate the duties of the present judge of the Exchequer Court to a judge of the Admiralty Court in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, we confer that power upon the Exchequer Court judge himself.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the first time.

The Senate adjourned.

EXPROPRIATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS introduced Bill (D) "An Act to amend the Expropriation Act." He said:—This bill is complementary to the bill that I introduced to the House yesterday upon the subject of the Exchequer Court Act. As the bill is short I shall read its provisions. The first clause amends section 8 by adding the following subsection:—

"2." When any land taken is required for a limited time only, or a limited estate or interest therein only is required, the plan and description so deposited may indicate by appropriate words written or printed thereon that an estate for years only or some other limited estate or interest in the land is taken, and, by the deposit in such case, such estate for years or other limited estate or interest shall become and be vested in Her Majesty.

"3." All the provisions of this Act shall, so far as the same are applicable, apply to the acquisition for public works of such estates for years or other limited estates or interests in lands.

Hon. gentlemen will see that the object of that provision is to enable the Crown to take a less estate than the fee in the lands which they may expropriate—take an estate for years, or as a simple easement, as, for instance, a railway being constructed at high level may require to go over one's property which would be an interference with the proprietory interest of the owner, or it might be necessary to tunnel under it. In either case, although his proprietory rights would be interfered with, the easement which the Crown might require to take might not affect the surface at all. Then there are other instances, as in the case of quarries, where the Crown might require the use of property for a period, or it might become manifest, after the property had been for a time in the possession of the Crown, that a less interest, or an interest in a smaller portion, was required than that which was originally taken. Clause 3 provides as follows:—

The fact of such abandonment or revesting shall be taken into account in estimating or assessing the amount to be paid to any person claiming compensation for the lands taken.

It does not take away his right at all to compensation, but it may affect the amount of compensation to which he is entitled.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does that refer to the clause which the hon. gentleman read previously?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. The last clause provides that the provisions of sections 2 and 3 shall apply to lands heretofore taken as well as to lands hereafter taken for public works. It does not, of course, refer to lands that were finally dealt with and disposed of, but such as are under consideration as between the former proprietor and the Crown.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How would that affect the proprietor of an estate from whom land was taken, and subsequently it was ascertained that the Crown did not require the whole of it? If I understand the provisions of that bill it goes on to say that under the hand of a commissioner he may declare that a certain portion of the land is not required and that it then reverts back to the original owner. That property may have been depreciated in value owing to the uses to which the portion retained may have been put. Are there provisions which would affect the damages that the proprietor might claim, or do I understand that the land reverts back to him after having been paid for by the Crown without refunding any portion of the amount paid to him?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The bill contemplates lands which are not dealt with finally. The fact of such abandonment, or re-vesting, shall be taken into account in estimating or assessing the amount to be paid.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is originally taken: I am speaking of lands which are abandoned. Is the Crown to have any of the fund paid for the land, remitted or refunded?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The bill does not contemplate the case of lands finally dealt with. It deals with lands still in controversy between the government and the parties. In many cases it is found that a larger area of property was taken by the Department of Railways and the Department of Public Works than was actually required, and before it is finally dealt with they desire to amend their claim and to take a smaller amount than the one for which the plan was filed. Then they may also require to take a smaller estate—to take an estate for years instead of taking the fee, and the object is to enable the Crown to abandon the larger estate for which it filed the plan in the first instance. My hon. friend will see that when the plan is filed the title passes to the Crown and the party may say it is so vested and decline to receive the lands back. The object is simply to protect, as far as possible, the public interest in dealing with these matters without doing any injustice to the proprietor, and for that reason clause three is put in. That the fact of such abandonment or re-vesting shall be taken into account in estimating or assessing the amount to be paid to any person claiming compensation for land so taken. There are many instances, I dare say my hon. friend remembers some of them, when the Crown has been compelled to pay a very much larger sum than it ought to have paid, simply because it is shown on the original plan.

The bill was read the first time.

THE FRANCHISE ACT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the House do now adjourn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the House adjourns, I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to a question which I put to him on the 24th of March, just before the adjournment, as to whether the promise, which was made during the discussion last session on the Franchise Act, that representation should be made to the different provinces in which no right of appeal to a judge existed, had been carried out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I called his attention to the matter at the time as to whether the promise to adopt the system which prevailed in Ontario, or any other system by which a disfranchised man would be enabled to appeal to the judge in order to secure those rights of franchise to which he is entitled—whether those representations were made.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, representations were made.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that all the information the hon. gentleman has?

COMMERCE AND REVENUE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD rose to :—

Call attention to the increasing commerce and revenue of British Columbia as set forth in the following comparative statement taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns for the year ending 30th June, 1898, and ask if the Government intends making an expenditure this year on necessary public works, commensurate to the needs of the country and to the large revenue produced; and whether it is the intention to give that province such representation in the Government of the Dominien as it is justly entitled to from its geographical position and its expanding commercial importance :—

He said:—The necessity does not arise for the representatives of any other province doing what I am now doing—placing before this House, the government and the country, the position and progress of the province from which I come, for the reason that every other province is represented in the government by cabinet ministers, who, being in the inner circle where the good things are apportioned, look after the interests of their own province.

It is not possible, taking human nature into account, that a province so unrepresented will receive fair and adequate treatment, or its legitimate rights, the rights of a revenue producing province to a fair share of public expenditure. The right of representation in the government of the country is denied to British Columbia because our voting power is not strong enough to insist on our rights; but a just and benign government should not keep a progressive province under a great disadvantage. The three maritime provinces on the Atlantic coast have four ministers in the cabinet, and the volume of commerce and the revenue contributed by those provinces are not larger than that of British Columbia with not even one minister. I believe I am correct in stating that the revenue of British Columbia with a population of 150,000, for the year 1898, is equal to that of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick with a population of about 700,000. I will be told, in this connection, that these provinces import largely duty paid goods from Quebec and Ontario. So does British Columbia; to what extent, I do not know. I have placed a comparative statement on the Order Paper, as being the most accurate way of showing what progress we have made.

The hon. gentlemen who were in this House at the time the province entered the federation, and are still here, will, I am sure, feel gratified at the continuous upward strides we have made. At that time our imports and exports and revenue were insignificant; to-day we stand in the proud position of being third in commercial importance, and as a revenue producing province. The members of the government should feel gratified at this position also and should feel that any encouragement given this province will be repaid ten fold. In asking for public expenditure I may be told we gave $3,000,000 to build the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. That road is partly in the North-west, and as much for the whole Dominion as for British Columbia. The share of British Columbia of the three millions Crow's Nest Railway grant is about $90,000. Estimating our population at 150,000, the annual interest would be $3,150. It is also said and thought by some persons that the cost of building the Canadian Pacific Railway through British Columbia might fairly be charged to that province, but such an idea is entirely falacious. That railway is a national and interprovincial work for the benefit of the whole Dominion. Estimating the cost of this work to be fifty-six millions, the cost per head to the population would be $11.20, and to the 150,000 population of British Columbia the capital would be $1,680,000, and the annual interest would be $58,800. The total amount chargeable to us for these two railways is $61,950 for interest. Hon. gentlemen will see that these amounts, taken together, are small compared with our contributions to the Dominion treasury.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The question that my hon. colleague from British Columbia has brought before the House is one, I think, of considerable importance and one I should not like to let pass without expressing my views upon it. British Columbia is a port of export to the outside world in the same way that Quebec is, or any of our ports are. Now, the province of Manitoba is an inland province and cannot show exports and imports to the same extent, or from the same standpoint. That is a question that is often brought up and has never been fairly discussed. The government do not wish to tackle it, but the evidence of prosperity that the hon. member from British Columbia brought before this House is a matter of very great congratulation indeed. It is a matter of very great congratulation indeed that they have so increased. His complaint that the province of British Columbia has not a representative in the cabinet is, under our system of government, hardly a proper one because I do not see yet how we can alter the system of representation by population. While these revenues have increased in the way shown, the population is only small in proportion to the rest of Canada. Our western population is now, I suppose, taking the North-west Territories, Manitoba and British Columbia, close upon half a million of people, and naturally, as the population increases in those countries, the representation in one form or another must necessarily increase, although I see in the province of British Columbia that a local law has been passed to exclude a certain class of immigration—and it is very questionable whether that action has been a wise one or not or whether such exclusion is constitutional from a national standpoint. So far from desiring to increase their strength by admitting an industrial population, so far as that law is concerned, it is evidence to the contrary. What I wish to observe is that we are not represented fairly in the Trade and Navigation Returns with regard to the exports and imports of Manitoba. I mentioned in a former speech on the Address that our exports, during the year which the Trade and Navigation Returns represent, our exports from Manitoba and the North-west Territories together were $16,000,000. That is based upon an estimate of the amount of grain that we know has gone out of the country, the report of which we have from the inspector at Port Arthur, who inspects the grain, and the inspector at Winnipeg, and the return showing the destination of the grain. We also exported in the neighbourhood of 50,000 head of cattle and a variety of other produce. Very fortunately for us, the price of grain that year was good. So, taking the price of our grain and the quantity of our exports, we had a total of $16,000,000 worth, which went out of the province of Manitoba. It is not reported in the Trade and Navigation Returns as exports from Manitoba, because it finds its way to the exporting ports of Quebec or Ontario or some of the ocean seaports; and it is credited to them rather than Manitoba. The only direct imports shown are those which come from the United States through imports to the city of Winnipeg—imports of agricultural implements, machinery, corn and articles of that kind. These are shown in our Trade and Navigation Returns because they are entered by the Customs-house officers at Emerson, the only inlet into the province from a foreign country, The only other inlet is the Canadian Pacific Railway which comes from Ontario and the other provinces. It is the same with regard to our exports. The returns show that for the year 1896 the total exports of Manitoba were reported at $2,000,000 and the total imports at $2,704,000. The duty collected was $615,218. In 1897 the imports were $2,858,000 and the exports were $1,965,000, the duty collected was $644,000. In 1898, the year for which these Trade and Navigation Returns are given, the total exports were $3,472,000 and the total imports were $4,432,000; duty collected $907,000—a large increase in the duty collected on imports into Manitoba over the two preceding years. Now, if that shows anything for us to draw a lesson from, it is that our imports from the United States are increasing, because, as I said before, the imports are represented as coming in from the United States, and I know myself that the imports from the United States of agricultural machinery and a variety of things of that kind are increasing very much, that notwithstanding the duties which were put upon these articles to keep them out of the country and to protect our own manufacturers, still the imports of agricultural and labour saving machinery of all kinds and a variety of other imports from the United States had been increasing which shows that under our present system at any rate our manufacturers are not keeping pace with the manufacturers south of the boundary. We do not complain of that. People only buy United States manufactures because they think they are more suitable or better. I know that binders made in the United States cost on an average $30 each more than Canadian binders, and I think that there is an arrangement between Canadian manufacturers of agricultural machinery and United States manufacturers, by which the Massey Manufacturing Company, which at one time threatened to build agricultural machine shops in Buffalo to compete with the McCormick Company of Chicage, made terms that occasion, by which United States machines should always charge greater prices than Canadian machines. Whether that was the result of a compromise or not, I cannot say. The hon. gentleman from British Columbia, is advancing an argument why more money should be expended in his province.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman's speech gives a great deal of information, but has it any thing to do with the question raised by the hon. gentleman from Victoria? I think the whole discussion is out of order. When a discussion does take place on a question, I think it should have something to do with the question before the House.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—On the question of order, I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the question is put this way: that the Hon. Mr. Macdonald will call the attention of the government, &c.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—You are doing well; go on.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I think when an hon. member calls attention to any important matter, it enlarges the scope of the debate to an unlimited point. I do not wish to offend the susceptibility of the hon. gentleman or to call attention to the fact——

Hon. Mr. DEVER—You are exporting more solid stuff than the whole of them put together.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I think the question is an important one as bearing exactly on the point that my hon. colleague has brought forward. I was showing that we have exported $16,000,000 worth of produce for the benefit of the country as a whole—that a large portion of these exports go through the ports of Buffalo instead of coming this way. That I do not propose to deal with, but what I do want to deal with is the fact that the exports that we send out to the extent of $16,000,000 are well returned to us in time in the necessaries of life for the carrying on of our operations and the support of our families—that we are not an exporting country having credit of our own. We are a borrowing country. The loan companies operating in Manitoba have $20,000,000 out on loan in the province to-day, and therefore so much has to go out to meet the payment of indebtedness for these loans. I mention that in order to show you that the $16,000,000 must be returned to the country in time and that we do not import any free goods. That is to say, the main portion of the free goods that come into the country are imports of raw material for manufacturing purposes, and we receive no benefit from that whatever—that the great bulk of our imports are of the actual necessaries of life, and that therefore we are contributing to the revenue directly and indirectly to the extent of imports to the value of $16,000,000. I do not think hon. gentlemen will deny for a moment that under our present system our taxation is divided between the manufacturers who manufacture the raw materials and the government who receive a portion of it as revenue. I do not think there is any dispute about that at all, and I am prepared to acknowledge that a large proportion of the imports which come into the province of Manitoba from the east come in as manufactured articles—manufactured in the eastern province, but, nevertheless the province of Manitoba in purchasing the necesseries of life, whether they are manufactured in the country or whether they are imported directly, pay a duty, under the present system, of 28⅜ per cent on all that comes back to them, and to that extent we contribute to the revenue of the country on direct imports. Now, if we contribute on $4,400,000 entered for consumption a revenue of $907,000, I contend that as we are entering for consumption into the province, goods to the extent of $16,000,000——

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Never mind parish politics.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is not parish politics. You are getting the money and we are paying it. It is a very serious question for us, and those who receive the benefit have to show whether it is just or not. The revenue we are contributing from the province of Manitoba is something akin to the revenue that the hon. member for British Columbia has represented as coming from the province of British Columbia, $2,944,000. If my contention is correct, we are contributing a revenue of $2,000,000, so that between the provinces west of the great lakes there is in the neighbourhood of $6,000,000 of the $20,000,000 of revenue collected coming from the western country —a very large proportion indeed if you take the population that supplies it into consideration and in addtition to that there is the manufacturers tax. There have been complaints out west against the present government. There is a small bit of public work that the people of Winnipeg have been asking for, that is, the deepening of the canal at Selkirk Rapids, which would enable steamers to come all the way from Lake Winnipeg to the city of Winnipeg, instead of which Winnipeg is cut off from any trade in lumber and fish in consequence of those rapids. These public works have been before the government for many years. Nothing has been done. The present government have given no pledge or promise, even to that small extent, of carrying on any public work. There is no money expended on public works out there, and if there is reason for complaint from the province of British Columbia as to the amount of public work done there, certainly there is good ground of complaint for the province of Manitoba under the same circumstances. I do not propose, however, to go into any long speech upon the subject I have brought before this House on several occasions. I will bring it forward, whenever an opportunity presents itself in a decent and proper way, in order that I may impress on the people more and more the justice of our claim. The policy of the Conservative party has been to wait upon the British Government to get a preferential tariff from Great Britain and postpone any action in regard to the regulation of our domestic mode of raising a revenue and diverting directly into the treasury the taxes imposed upon the people instead of dividing it up with the manufacturers as is being done to-day. But I think if the hon. gentleman from British Columbia would only support me in the contention I raise and say, remove the tariff altogether from the necessaries of life, he would not have the complaint to make that he is making to-day, that his province is contributing $2,900,000 to the treasury and getting practically nothing back from it except the per capita contributions from the Dominion. If he would adopt that system I think he would find the relief given to the promotion of industries in British Columbia would multiply them many fold. It certainly would be the case in the province of Manitoba. To wait on the British Government to do what they expect is I think, futile. We have seen what Sir Michael Hicks-Beach has said about expenditure in Great Britain, and the mode of raising an increased revenue for the forthcoming year.

The free trade policy of Great Britain has this year maintained its character, and has produced a surplus revenue of $7,500,000. In consequence of increased expenditure for naval affairs it is anticipated that the revenue next year, without new taxation, would not be sufficient. Has the British Government put forth the slightest idea that they propose to tax the food of the people or put any tax on the necessaries of life? No. The adoption of the resolutions of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach in the Imperial Parliament for the raising of fresh revenue for the coming year in view of the continued naval expenditure by an increased duty on wines and an increased tax on foreign and colonial bonds should open the eyes of those who are striving to base the commercial policy of Canada upon the assumption that it would be to the advantage of the British Empire to cause the British Government to tax their import of bread stuffs and provisions for the benefit of the colonies by a discriminatory tariff in their favour. I have long since learned to realize that like Sampson of old when the secret of his great strength was discovered and he was rendered powerless by the cutting off of his hair, so it would be to the British Government should they change their policy to one of protection, and through that policy the secret of their present day financial strength should be discovered, and it is unwise for her family of nations to unwittingly act the part of Delialah in laying a foundation for her commercial prostration. To ask her to discriminate against the world would unite the world against her in commerce and as protection is the parent of war, while free trade is the husband of peace, what proportion is Canada prepared to bear of the war debt that would be created in fighting the united nations of the earth should such a misfortune occur? The day is gone by when war is to be fostered for its own sake. To trade with our best and most profitable customer upon an equal basis strengthens our united trading powers, but to ask the people of Great Britain to weaken their commercial policy for our benefit would prove unprofitable for us in the long run and would show little self-reliance on our part. I am not in sympathy with any effort to cause the British Government to put Canada upon any different footing with the rest of the world in the taxation of joint stock enterprises floated there. I have no sympathy with the Hooleys who make themselves wealthy in in one day by the floating of securities, which as a general rule become wealthy monopolies in the home of their birth or die a speedy and unnatural death, and if the promoters of these enterprises are taxed five shillings in the one hundred pounds on their bonds, stocks and shares, to strengthen the revenues of the mother country very few in Canada will be affected by it, and the fair fame of Canada will not be so much jeopardized by the attempt to impose wild cat schemes upon the British public, which legitimate Canadian enterprises suffer from in credit.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have been unable, although I suppose it is due to my own want of intellectual acuteness, to trace the connection between the speech of the hon. member from Marquette and the inquiry which the hon. gentleman from British Columbia has put to myself and my colleagues. I could not help remembering a funeral sermon that I heard delivered a great many years ago that occupied a good deal more time perhaps than it ought, and an old gentleman, who was intensely interested in the Oregon question at the time pending between the United States and Great Britain, said "we have listened to this gentleman for an hour and a half talking to us most earnestly and he has not said a word about the question in which we are all interested—the Oregon question." Now, my hon. friend has spoken of a subject in which I think we are interested, and which does not happen to be strictly pertinent to the question which the hon. member from British Columbia brought before us for our consideration; but I do not exactly understand the position of the hon. gentleman who is making this inquiry, nor do I strictly see the relevancy of the question and the observations which he has addressed to this House on the present occasion. My hon. friend complains that the British Columbia people are not represented in the present administration. My hon. friend thinks the British Columbia Government is one in which neither the British Columbia people nor any others ought to have any confidence.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I did not say so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Why should he desire that some British Columbia representative in Parliament should have the evil fortune of being a member of this administration? My hon. friend does not wish ill to any one, and yet if he is correct in his view of the administration, he certainly is wishing somebody ill when he desires that a member returned to the House of Commons from British Columbia, or any gentleman who sits in this House on behalf of that province, should become a member of the government. My hon. friend does not repudiate the doctrine that evil communications corrupt good manners. He does not suggest that we should take into the present administration a pure minded man from British Columbia without having himself condemned by him as a member of the administration. I am inclined to think that, notwithstanding his disposition to be always against the present administration, he, nevertheless, has not so great a want of confidence in it as he has from time to time enunciated in this House. My hon. friend has spoken of the remarkable progress that British Columbia has made during the past two years and has referred, not only to the progress of British Columbia, but to the progress of several provinces on the Atlantic coast. The progress as indicated by the imports and exports of these provinces is very considerable. It has been a remarkable progress, such as the country has never exhibited before. That progress has taken place under the administration in which my hon. friend nas no confidence.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I did not say so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What else has my hon. friend always said? Is the hon. gentleman prepared to declare that he has confidence in the present administration?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Yes, when it is right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But the hon. gentleman thinks it never is right. Then there is another thing that I notice about the observations which the hon. gentleman addressed to the House. He says in effect that we are not spending money enough in British Columbia. I do not know how that may be; I thought we were spending pretty generously in every province of the Dominion, but my hon. friend will see that we proposed an expenditure last year in British Columbia which he fiercely fought, and therefore I am not at all sure, if we were to propose an expenditure in that province now, whether there is a single expenditure which we could make that would meet with his approbation.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Did not the hon. minister say last year that that enterprise was not going to cost the country a penny?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose while it would cost the country not a penny in money, the hon. gentleman would not say that the road would be built for nothing. If there was to be no public expenditure upon it, he would not say that the purchase of rails, the work done on the track, the building of embankments, the employment of labour, and the consumption of food and clothing within the province of British Columbia did not mean anything to British Columbia. I need say nothing further on that question. My hon. friend who has interrupted me will understand that an expenditure may be one of vast importance to a country—may be one involving a very large sum of money in outlay, and yet, after all, not cost the public treasury anything. That was the position in which the case to which I refer stood. The hon. gentleman says, Why don't you give representation in the cabinet to British Columbia? I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman's question at this moment. I have no doubt British Columbia will obtain representation, but let me say to the hon. gentleman that I suppose if his wishes were met and a member of the House of Commons was offered a seat in the cabinet, that he would abandon his place for the time being in this House, would go back to British Columbia and, after complaining that British Columbia was not represented, he would do his best to prevent her being represented and defeat any one who might be offered the position. Does my hon. friend say he would not do that? Let me say further, the hon. gentleman has spoken of the very large imports in British Columbia. British Columbia is growing rapidly. British Columbia is a prosperous province, quite as prosperous as any other province in the Dominion. I am sure I rejoice, as I hope every hon. gentleman in this House does, that British Columbia is making rapid progress, that it is growing in wealth and population; but my hon. friend has a curious way of counting what the benefits are that British Columbia has received, and I am perfectly sure that he would find very few in this House, whether from British Columbia or elsewhere; who would agree with the views he has expressed. He has referred to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway as if only a small section of that were in British Columbia, and he undertakes to aportion out the advantages to be derived for all time to come in proportion to the population of the entire Dominion. I do not think my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island would be willing to admit that that road is of the same consequence to Prince Edward Island as it is to British Columbia and that she should pay because she has a larger population perhaps at the moment than British Columbia, a larger sum towards the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. I do not think that is the rule which would be applied to the construction of public works in any part of the Dominion of Canada. I apprehend that the fair way to ascertain on the whole the value which public improvements are to any section of the Dominion is to look and see geographically in what section of the Dominion those improvements are being carried on, and while I hope the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway will be of the greatest value to British Columbia in developing its resources and in securing to it an additional population, I at the same time maintain that it is of far greater consequence to British Columbia than it is to my other portion of the Dominion. Then my hon. friend has referred to the imports as though all the imports landed at Victoria or Vancouver were imports for consumption at home. My hon. friend will not say that the teas imported from China and Japan, which are landed at Vancouver and Victoria to be transhipped eastward are all confined to the province.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—No, they do not count at all in our figures. Those goods go through in bond and are not entered at the customs-house at all and are not taken into account.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The tonnage the hon. gentleman gives is 1,942,672 tons. Surely the goods imported, whether consumed in the province or brought further east, are included in that tonnage.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is simply the tonnge?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. I may make a similar observation with regard to what the hon. gentleman has said with reference to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. While the Canadian Pacific Railway cost a great deal more in the mountainous country than in the prairie section, its estimated value to British Columbia and the North-west Territories and all other portions of the Dominion is, on the whole, fairly determined by the cost of construction of each particular portion. That may not always measure the precise value, but it is the only way you have of estimating with any degree of approximation, and I think the hon. gentleman will see that although at the present moment British Columbia is not represented in the government it has not been neglected on account of that. British Columbia has a number of able and active members supporting the present government, who keep the administration constantly informed of the interests of the province. There has been a continuous effort to keep in touch with the people of British Columbia, and to ascertain as far as possible the wants of that province, and one thing is perfectly certain, that with the present representation from British Columbia supporting the administration, that support would not be long continued if the wishes of the province were disregarded. It is of consequence that the interest of every section of the Dominion should be carefully considered. All that, perhaps, it would be in the public interests to do for the time being cannot be undertaken because our revenues and our resources are limited. Those which are of the greatest consequence, having due regard to all portions of the Dominion, are those which must first be considered, but the progress which the hon. gentleman has given figures to show, has been so great within the past two years, and the progress is so certain that I have no doubt that all the wants of every section of the Dominion will at no distant day be fully considered. We have drawn to British Columbia a very large population by the variety and wealth of her mineral resources. We are having a large population invited to our North-west Territories by its agricultural possibilities. We have a considerable population drawn to the older provinces by the resources in pulpwood and in agriculture, and I have no doubt whatever, with the careful consideration that is given to our immigration requirements, that Canada will during the next 5 years make a progress more rapid than it has hitherto known in its history.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was not my intention to take part in this discussion for many reasons. The same question has often been brought before this House, but the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has attributed motives to the hon. gentleman from Victoria which are not at all justifiable. He insinuated that because the hon. gentleman was not a supporter of the present government, therefore he should not advocate the admission to the cabinet of a representative from British Columbia for fear of the contamination, which he might receive by association with the hon. gentleman who made that speech. If he had any recollection of the past history of the Senate and the action of the hon. gentleman from Victoria upon the question which is now being discussed, he would not have attributed to him such motives. Ever since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, no session was allowed to pass, while I was in the government, without a demand being made by the hon. gentleman who has made this claim for representation of the province in the cabinet of the country; and when a representative of British Columbia was selected to assume a very responsible position in the government and given a portfolio, the opponents of the then government opposed his re-election when he went back to the people of British Columbia for approval. Now the hon. Minister of Justice has attributed the action of his own political friend, and the course which he pursued, to the hon. gentleman who has just delivered his speech and made this motion. I refer now to the gentleman who occupies the important position of Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia. We know with what persistency that gentleman urged upon the late government the same policy that has been urged by my hon. friend. I know also the many times that I had to rise in the seat now occupied by the hon. Minister of Justice to combat the contentions of my hon. friend who sits on my left, so that he is perfectly consistent with what he has done to-day, comparing it with his past record. I am in accord to a very great extent with the closing remarks of my hon. friend as to sectional representation, but unfortunately it has been the practice in the past and I very much fear it will be the practice in the future. I may say that while I was at the head of the Customs Department I was gradually bringing them down to adopting the system of making returns that is pursued by the United States, that is to say, to eliminate as far as possible that sectional character that has characterized not only our politicians, but all of us from each section of the country, and to give the trade and navigation returns of the Dominion as a whole, so as to avoid as much as possible the sectional views which many of us held upon that question; but my hon. friend thought he was making a good hit I suppose on the Yukon question. There is a difference between legitimate and advantageous expenditure of the public funds and the squandering of public funds for a work which would be absolutely useless. I mean, to say further, that if the reports come down for which I have moved, of the engineers who were sent out by this government to explore and investigate that route, it will be shown that the action of the Senate in reference to the Yukon district will be approved by the people now and for all time to come. The very fact that they gave a monopoly for five years to contractors, the fact that those contractors refused to enter into the bargain without that monopoly, is the best possible evidence to the people of this country who have paid any attention to it that they looked upon the road as utterly useless. I am not permitted to give the opinion that those gentlemen expressed to me in conversation, but this I do know, that they would not have accepted that contract even at the enormous price which they were to receive, had they not had that monopoly for that length of time, for the simple reason that they knew the Stikine route to Teslin Lake never can be made to compete with that from Skagway or Dyea or Pyramid Harbour, and so does every one else know who has given the subject the slightest attention, so that my hon. friend was perfectly correct in the position he took that money should be appropriated for the development of the country, and opposing that, which he knew, from his personal knowledge and from the representations which had been made, and even from the reports published by the government—the hon. gentleman's report in 1874, where he pointed out in the map shown in the records that there was only about two feet of water in the Stikine in certain seasons of the year—that that route was useless, and that any money expended on it would be wilfully wasted under the circumstances. My hon. friend is extremely dexterous in changing from one point to another. He pointed out what the effect of the bonding system was. That may be true, but what about the tonnage? What has that to do with the question? We know hundreds of ships come into the provinces in ballast, the tonnage is credited to the port, but that has nothing to do with the imports. The one shows the tonnage of the shipping coming into the port, and the other shows the imports from different parts of the world to the port. There is no relation of the one to the other so far as statistics are concerned. I was glad to hear the admission made by the hon. gentleman in his closing remarks. He said, in reply to the demand made by the senator from Victoria, that at no distant day all sections of the country would receive consideration. That implies, that they have not received that consideration in the past. That is what my hon. friend complains of, that they have not received that consideration in the past either under the old administration or present government, but he has this gratifying reflection, that in future they are going to look after the interests of all. Let us hope, if they continue to occupy the places they now hold, they will look after all the sections of the country and treat them all alike. British Columbia is not on a parallel with the other provinces, but there are reasons for that. The development of her mineral resources, her great wealth, in fisheries and lumber, all tend to the advancement of that country, and it is only another evidence of the wisdom of the late Premier of this country, Sir John Macdonald, in pushing through the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway at almost any price. These developments have resulted, to a very great extent, from the facilities which have been given to get into that country. He says that my hon. friend to my right (Mr. Ferguson) would probably not take the same view as to the proposed railway as my hon. friend to my left. The gentlemen in Prince Edward Island who have an interest in the mines of British Columbia, and more particularly in the Kootenay district—and many of them have invested largely in those mines—take just as much interest in the construction of the road and the benefits to be derived from it as my hon. friend does.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was not my point at all. My hon. friend in speaking estimated how much of the Crow's Nest Road might be fairly charged to British Columbia, and he was estimating on the basis of so much per capita, and I pointed out that that was not a fair way of estimating, because the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island would scarcely agree to assume all that expense in proportion to the population.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The question is how far the people of the Dominion are interested in the construction of that road, and whether the people of Prince Edward Island are prepared to pay their share. A broader view should be taken of all these questions, and that view should be, what is the result that is to follow from the expenditure of money either in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, or a branch line on the Island of Prince Edward, and if it is for the benefit of that particular section, and it is also for the benefit of the whole Dominion, then we should be quite satisfied each and individually to pay our share. That is the position I take in reference to that matter. I do not propose to continue the debate any further, but I repeat that the Minister of Justice was unfair in attributing to the hon. member from Victoria——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentlemen, may shake his head, it does not make any difference; the shake of a wise head will not change the fact—he attributed to the hon. member from Victoria that which he was not justified in attributing to him. My hon. friend from Victoria was perfectly consistent in what he did to-day, as will be seen by looking back at his record in the past; and whether he has confidence in my hon. friend or whether he thinks the hon. gentleman who sits to his left will be contaminated by sitting with him, or not, is of no consequence; but he believes that if the hon. gentleman sitting by his side, or any of the gentlemen who were elected to the other House, were in the cabinet, British Columbia would get more consideration than she does now.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—They would raise the standard of the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have heard of raising standards before, and I have heard of raising standards of purity, but I am not going to be led into a discussion of that subject just now, but if this is a raising of the standard, God help the future.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I just wish to correct one word. My hon. friend from British Columbia, complains there was not anything of an expenditure there, and he claimed that only some $1,900,000 of the Crow's Nest Pass expenditure ought to be considered as pertaining to British Columbia. My hon. friend has evaded that statement. It was that statement I had in my mind which I wish to correct.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He has been complaining of that for years.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Of what?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Of the expenditure.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I was not surprised at the answer given by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. I did not expect any definite answer, but I did expect that a gentleman in his position would not always make a personal attack on myself. But the argument amounts to this, that because I do not support the government of the day I have not a right to stand up and advocate the interests of my own province. On this occasion I did not say one single word against the government, and as I said in reply a few minutes ago, I am perfectly willing on all occasions, when there are measures before the House which are in the interests of the country, to give my support to those measures. I do not care if my own friends were in office to-morrow, I would oppose them if I thought they were wrong and trying to injure the country. The hon. gentleman said that I do not support the government and therefore have no right to claim representation in the cabinet for British Columbia. I do not expect to be called into the cabinet, either by this government or any other government; but there are supporters of the government in Parliament—men capable of taking seats in the cabinet, and I am speaking for them and for the province, and I should be perfectly willing to see any of those gentlemen called into the cabinet. They would be part of the government and would look after the interests of the province. The hon. Minister of Justice accused the hon. gentleman from Shell River of bringing in extraneous matter, yet he follows the same course himself. He brings in the Yukon Railway project, a matter outside of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—How much of the 150 miles was in British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do not know how much of it; the boundary of the province in that direction has yet to be determined. The first part of the route was in United States territory, although it is spoken of as an all-Canadian route by the hon. gentleman and his friends. It is a North-west matter, not a project in the interest of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The road was to extend southward.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Some of us cannot forget being pedagogues and bringing up matters extraneous to this question. While I am here I shall stand up for my province whether I gain anything by it or not. With all the hon. gentleman's anxiety to find fault with me, he had to approve of those figures set forth in my motion. There is evidence of what the province has done, whether it receives justice from the government or not.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—As I understand this question, the hon. minister said he did not think the hon. gentleman for Victoria represented his province.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—That is not what he said at all.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—On the contrary, I claim that the hon. gentleman misrepresents it. He has gone against its true interests. The real representatives of British Columbia, when they speak to the government, will be listened to, but when an hon. gentleman who does not represent British Columbia, but is an enemy of British Columbia, rises to speak for the province, he should not be listened to. The Minister of Justice is perfectly right in not paying the slightest attention to men who act and speak here merely from an opposition standpoint, and who opposed the true interests of British Columbia last year in this House when the Yukon Bill was before us, and when that hon. member went back to his own province, as I am informed he had good reason to regret the course he pursued here. These are the views which make the Minister of Justice assume the position he has taken, and very properly so.

PENITENTIARY BINDER TWINE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY rose to :

Ask the Government, how the price obtained this year for the output of Binder Twine from the Kingston Penitentiary compared with the price obtained for the twine sold from the same factory in 1895 and 1896?

He said : This question was to have been asked the other day but was overlooked. In the meantime, the hon. Minister of Justice has given me the prices that the twine was sold for in other years previous to this year. The price of binder twine this year is what I should like to know. I may say in this connection that I do not think the policy of the government in selling twine this year has been a good policy. I do not say this in the way of opposing the government at all, but in my judgment their policy is a bad one and does not compare favourably with the policy of the late government. The former administration sold the twine, not to one individual but to several individuals. I know it was sold in car load lots, and in that way the twine was not placed in the hands of one concern who could make a monopoly of it. It would be very much better, in my opinion, in the interests of the farmers, who have to buy the twine, and of the country generally, if this twine had been sold in smaller quantities, in car load lots, so that there would be competition. It is not the duty of the government to see that men make money out of the twine. The object of having it manufactured at the penitentiary is to keep down monopoly. The late government sold it at the lowest possible cost with a reasonable profit, and in that way sold it to different men who were competing with each other, and the farmers could get it at a reasonable price, and the merchants were not in a position to make extravagant profits. I am informed that the price of twine this year is double what it was last year, because the twine manufactured at the penitentiary does not come into competition with other makes, and in that way keep down prices. I do not know why the government should sell any article under such conditions that the country should not know the price of it. I do not know why the interest of one individual should be more than the interests of the great mass of the people. When articles are sold at public auction, everybody knows the price and on what terms the twine was sold. I think the system of selling to one individual is detrimental to the best interests of consumers of binder twine in Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We have adopted the system of advertising and accepting tenders for twine as one which, on the whole, was the best in the public interest. The hon. gentleman refers to the practice that prevailed of selling the twine in smaller lots to accommodate those who were in the business. It is just a question whether you deal with the primary dealer or with those parties with whom the primary dealer has transactions. The reason for abandoning the former practice before I came in was, that a good deal of that twine is still unpaid for, and it was easier to sell twine in small lots than it was to collect the money after it was sold. Some portion of that money is still uncollected. It was to profit by the experience in that regard that we adopted the system of advertising for tenders and selling for cash on delivery to the highest bidder. The man who tendered the highest price is the man who got the contract. Sometimes, no doubt, the parties who tender undertake to come to an understanding among themselves, but this year, fortunately, that was not done, and we have sold at a higher price than at a former period, and still not at a price that would be extravagant to those dealing in the article.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—May I ask whether the sum for which the twine was sold has been paid by the contractor or by any retailer?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think it is owing by the party to whom the twine was sold.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would that be Mr. Connor?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think he is one of the parties.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He is not a retailer.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then he is a purchaser I have not seen the figures for a long time. There is a party in the North-west who still owes who bought at an earlier period. There is no reason why we should change the practice that existed at the beginning except to profit by the experience of the former government. Men profit by experience in the sale of this article as they do in the sale of other articles, and we adopt that system which gives us some compensation, and at the same time secures certainty of payment. With regard to the price, I may say to the hon. gentleman it has never been the practice of the department, any more than I suppose it is the practice of the manufacturer outside who sells to a wholesale purchaser, to give the price at which the party has purchased until the article is marketed. That has been the uniform practice of the department, and we have not given the price the same year that the twine has been sold. We always give it the next year, and we think that is fair to the parties engaged in the transaction; but apart from that, there are reasons of public interest, some difference having arisen between the contractors and the government, to make it undesirable to state the price at which we have sold the twine. I might say we have sold it at a good deal better price than it was sold at last year or the year before.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—For cash?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. I may say to my hon. friend that at the present day the raw material is very much higher than it has been since binder twine began to be manufactured. Manilla, I suppose, has been affected by the United States war with Spain. The Sisal is also selling at a higher price, and you cannot purchase the raw material at the price that the manufactured article was sold for a few months ago. I trust my hon. friend will not press this question, because it would be detrimental to the public interest to give the price at the present moment.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Have the government taken any action to enforce the payment for the twine that has not been paid for?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, we have, and we hope, on the most of it to get our pay.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must confess I do not see how the public interest is to be affected by letting the world know how much the government gets for binder twine. Neither can I understand how the fact of the raw material, being dearer to-day than it was three months ago, affects the contract into which the government has entered with the purchaser of binder twine. If the government entered into the contract some time ago with the contractors to purchase the output of the penitentiary, and the raw material has increased since that period, that would affect the government, not the contractor, and hence it would not affect the price at which he would be able to sell it to the consumer. It might be that the sisal, or what has been termed New Zealand hemp, or hemp itself, might be twice the value to-day it was when you entered into the contract, but the contractor is not affected thereby, because he holds the government to the contract, and if he could afford to sell at 8 or 10 cents a pound under the bargain he has made with the government, the fact that the raw material would cost 12 cents to the government in order to enable them to give the twine to the contractor, would not affect the contractor in the least; but it may enable the contractor to combine with other manufacturers in the United States who would come into the country, to raise its price to that which would be put upon the article manufactured in the United States from the raw material which had enhanced in value. Why it would not be in the material interests of the country that the farmer who consumes this article should know what profit the contractor is receiving, I confess I am too dull to comprehend. We know that after the contract was entered into last year by a gentleman in the west, that under the pretext of an increase in the value of raw material, he increased the price to the consumer about 60 per cent.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—That is perfectly right. That is commerce.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It might be for the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Or with any other man in trade.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The excuse given by the contractor at that time was that the raw material had largely increased in value owing to the war between the United States and Spain, which affected those portions of the Spanish possessions where the raw material was produced. But that is not true, because the binder twine that was manufactured for consumption last year was manufactured out of the raw material imported the year before. We all know that the binder twine which is placed in the market to-day is the product of the raw material which was imported last year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, my hon. friend is mistaken.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not mistaken. Every year's supply of binder twine is made before the harvest comes in, and could only be made out of raw material that was imported a year or six months before, consequently the Spanish war had nothing whatever to do with the price of raw material last year. It may affect it this year, I admit, because the probabilities are that the raw material imported from the Phillipine Islands will be increased in price. The object of the late Sir John Thompson, when Minister of Justice, and the object of the late government in utilizing prison labour for the production of binder twine was to benefit the farmers of this country. That was the policy of the late government, and the reason for investing largely in the material out of which the binder twine should be made. If that be the case, why are we so particular as to the profits which may be made by the merchants who purchase it? The policy that should be pursued by the government, carrying out the old policy, should be to place that binder twine in the hands of every farmer in the country, whether it be Ontario or the North-west Territories, at the minimum cost to the government of its production; and the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) could easily be carried out. There is no necessity to lose if you sell by the carload. Every merchant knows, if you sell a carload of goods to collect on delivery, that there is no possibility of its being a loss.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that the late government bargained with the contractor who bought the binder twine that he should sell it to the farmer at a particular price?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not say anything of the kind. That is just what I am complaining of. My argument was that as the policy of the government was to produce an article by prison labour which could be placed in the hands of the farmers at a cheaper rate than if it were manufactured by ordinary labour, where we would have to pay double the wages or three times the wages, that they would be enabled to give it to the consumer at a much lower rate than under other circumstances. That should be the policy.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They sold at the market rate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know they did, but they have not done what you did. The present government so placed it in the hands of one or two people who had a monopoly of it and could take some 60 per cent out of the farmers more than they were entitled to. The Farmer's Sun dealt with this question logically and very convincingly. I do not desire to be understood as making any party point out of this matter I say that the policy of my hon. friend should be one which would give that twine to the people who use it at the lowest possible price. I care not what position you take in the matter, the policy of placing the whole output of the bindery in one hand is not good. The result is you enable the purchasers to enter into a combine with the United States manufacturers to put what price they like on it. The fact that to-day binder twine is on the free list enables the contractors—I think they are the same contractors with the Ontario Government for the Central Prison twine—to enter into a combine with the United States manufacturers to ask what price they like for it, because most of, if not all, the competing manufacturers in the country, owing to the placing of binder twine on the free list, have been shut up; and it places Canada in the same position as if she were a state of the United States, and consequently the manufacturers in the United States and monopolists who have the contracts with both the governments in Canada enter into a combine and charge the farmer what they please. That is the practical result of the system which has been followed. Why should not the world know what Mr. Hobbs paid for this twine? If the hon. gentleman will give any reason why the farmers should not know the profit that is being made, I could understand the argument of my hon. friend. But he says: We have entered into a contract with a gentleman who has to take the whole output of the penitentiary, and we must not let the price be known to the farmers who purchase it, for two reasons: First it may affect the profits of the contractor, and secondly, it may show that having entered into the contract, the government now have to pay a larger price for the raw material: ergo we are losing by it and the contractor is making money by putting what price he thinks he can obtain for it consistent with the price named by the producers in the United States. That is really the position. The sooner my hon. friend considers the question and comes to the conclusion that the policy of the government should not be to make money out of but to utilize the prison labour, the better. We have heard over and over again about the down trodden farmers, and how shockingly they were bled by the late government, but when we introduce a policy to benefit them we find that under the policy of our successors the profit which should go to the farmers is given to a few speculators, and the government refuse to tell us what they sold the twine for, for fear it should hurt Mr. Hobbs the monopolist. It is not a policy which they can justify before the country.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I threw out an interjection while the hon. gentleman was speaking, and I think I was justified in doing so. The hon. gentleman seems to argue that binder twine should be made for the benefit of the farmers of this country. As I understand it, the government were simply merchants in this case, like other merchants. They were producing an article for the purpose of selling it in the country to the farmers at a legitimate price. If they carried out the argument of my hon. friend very fully, I do not see why the government should not do the same thing with flour or any other article of merchandise used in this country. Why should not the government manufacture wheat into flour for the benefit of the labouring classes at very low prices as against other manufacturers? The farmer gets the twine at a fair price, and I do not see why he should think of getting it at a reduced price and compel other citizens of the Dominion to contribute to give it to him at a special price. With reference to the objection that the merchant should not ask the advanced price for it because they had purchased this from the government at a time when the raw material was at a low price, hon. gentlemen know enough about the logic of business to understand that if goods go up in the country after the merchant makes the purchase, he has a right to profit by the advance in price. Why should a man sacrifice his merchandise when he knows that when his goods are sold he has to replenish them at a higher price? Why should he do it to oblige his customers? It would appear, from the argument of the hon. gentleman, that because the government purchased a year ago they were able to sell it to the merchant at a low price. Admit that, I say again, does it follow that they should be compelled to dispose of this merchandise at a reduced price, 30, 40, or 50 per cent lower than it could be sold for at public auction? No hon gentleman can endorse such a proposition as that, or expect any such a concession, I think the argument of the hon. gentleman is simply an argument for protection's sake, to make it appear there was something wrong being done where we cannot see anything out of the way, and nothing against the legitimate system of doing business in this country or any other when merchants know their duty to their customers and the public.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It seems to me the government has entered into the manufacture of binder twine—both the Provincial any Dominion Governments. To what extent they supply the proportion of binder twine to the country I am not prepared to say, but with regard to the western country we have about 2,000,000 acres under cultivation in the North-west and Manitoba and we consume on an average about two pounds of twine to the acre. If the crop is very heavy we will consume more, but that is a fair average. That is 4,000,000 lbs. and at the cost of one cent amounts to $40,000, to western farmers, and every cent that binder twine goes up represents an increase of $40,000, which is added to the tax we have to pay in the carrying on our industry. If the government have raised the price one cent by making a secret sale to the purchaser of their twine, thus enabling him to combine with other manufacturers to raise the price, that is hardly fair in view of 60 per cent last year for the Brantford Company—they are entering into a combine with the manufacturers so as to keep up the contract price.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—And with the contractor too.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, so as to put money in the pockets of the contractor who was buying from the government. That is what we complain of so far as our manufacturing industries are concerned. We are taxed heavily by a monopoly which apparently the government are concerned in by selling the binder twine at a price they refuse to divulge. I see by the returns that we import $57,000 worth from the United States. That is not a very large proportion, however. At 10 cents a pound we would be consuming $400,000 worth and the United States are furnishing $57,000 worth, at 8 cents the cost would be $320,000. but every cent rise, as I said before, is $40,000, The price of binder twine has gone up and it is going to be a costly affair, and two pounds to the acre is a heavy charge. By the action of the government it would seem that the interest of the sellers were uppermost in their minds at the expense of the purchasers.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me to make an observation with a view to correcting a misapprehension. I think my hon. friend will be obliged to revise his figures for he will find there is no such variation in price produced by the variation in the price of the binder twine as he suggests. I desire to say that, as I understand it, the manufacture of binder twine in the penitentiary is undertaken mainly for the purpose of giving employment to the convicts confined there and to enable the government to manage the penitentiary with as little cost as possible to the country. If we were to undertake what the hon. leader of the opposition suggests, and what the remarks of my hon. friend imply, we would be obliged to ask for a larger appropriation for the penitentiaries, for every cent you take off the price of the manufactured article would be so much less to the institution and we would be obliged to vote that much more for its maintenance. That is so clear that every one will understand it. There has never been a contract made by us, nor has there been a contract made by our predecessors in office, with the parties who purchased the binder twine compelling them to sell that twine at a certain figure.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not think anybody finds fault with that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, that is not the question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We publish every year what was paid the year before, and we give the purchaser an opportunity, the same as every wholesale merchat gives the man who deals with him an opportunity, to tender. There is a further reason, as I stated to my hon. friend privately, that there was a controversy between ourselves and the purchaser with regard to the contract between us, and it would not be in the public interest to discuss the price at the present time. I may say to my hon. friend that we accepted the highest tender that came in. We advertised very generally and and we got a fair price—a higher price than we got the previous year. My hon. friend said the work was undertaken for the purpose of furnishing the article to the farmers at a cheap rate.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If you sell the twine to a party who is at liberty to mark it at whatever price the market would enable him to get, then it is perfectly clear, no matter where the twine may be manufactured, whether in the penitentiary or outside of it, he would be able to sell it independently of your control. The control over him is the market value. We have binder twine being manufactured at Cenrral Prison and at Kingston Penitenary and by a company who are in competition with the Central Prison and I do not know how many more. There are those, at all events, who are competing with each other. Then the duty has been removed and the United States twine is coming into the market, and so you have as wide a competition to-day as you could have in binder twine. Under these circumstances, we advertise for tenders and get the best price we can, because if we were to put down the price to one-half of what we were getting, the farmer would not obtain his twine one iota less than the market value of twine. So I can see no object in undertaking to inflict a large loss upon the penitentiary, and a large demand upon the public treasury to make up the deficiency, mearly to enable the party who may enter into the contract with us to get the twine at a lower rate when it would in no way affect the value of the twine to the consumer.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I know the object is to employ the labour in the penitentiary and to keep the prisoners at work, but what I complain of is that you allow the contractor to enter into a combination with foreigners in order to keep up the price. I think that the people of this country should know what arrangement the government makes with the contractors. They have to supply the money to feed the men who are making the twine. The answer the other day was that we were not to know what price the government get for the twine; I say it is in the interests of the people of this country and it is their duty and their right to know, and I am surprised that the Minister of Justice should answer the way he did. He will tell us, he says, a year hence. He will lock the stable after the horse is gone. We have a perfect right to know.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Supposing our terms of contract are far above what the purchaser could sell the twine for in the market. Does my hon. friend think it is right for the public to know that and so affect his credit?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—He must use his brain when he makes a contract with the government, and if he makes a loss he must stand it, and if he makes a profit he should have it. I find no fault with the government for doing what they can to employ the prisoners, and I think it is a wise action on their part, but when the government wants to hide what they are doing from the people of this country and will not let them know till a year after, I think it is not right.

ALLEGED PLEBISCITE FRAUDS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to:

Call the attention of the government to the following telegraphic despatch which was published in the Evening Journal on the 12th of April instant, a newspaper printed in the city of Ottawa, as follows:—

GRAVE CHARGE OF CORRUPTION.

HOW QUEBEC'S BIG VOTE AGAINST PROHIBITION IS SAID TO HAVE BEEN MADE UP—LIBERALS ARE CHARGED WITH FALSIFYING RETURNS.

(Special to the Journal.)

Toronto, April 12.—George M. Webster, vice-president of the Quebec branch of the Dominion Alliance, and a Reformer in politics, has made a statement to a press representative, strongly denouncing the Laurier Government on the question of the plebiscite. Mr. Webster's statement has caused consternation in prohibition circles. Mr. Webster stated that the taking of the vote on the plebiscite in Quebec was attended by the grossest corruption.

"Ever since the plebiscite in Quebec," said Mr. Webster, "strong and persistent rumours have reached the executive of the provincial branch as to the gross amount of fraud which occurred all through the province. This finally became so repeated and seemingly definite that the Quebec branch sent two men to investigate. Each went in lependent of the other, and neither knew that the other was in the field.

"The first, when he came back, reported universal appearances of fraud, but was unable to lay his hand on any concrete cases. The second man was William Henry Parent, of Ottawa, a man whose father was at one time a Liberal member for Rimouski, and who himself had been employed as an election agent and general party representative of the Liberal party for years, being sent into different constituencies to organize for elections, and at other times drawing revenue from the ministers or from the departments. This man reported when he returned that he had visited some thirteen constituencies.

"In every case, without a single exception, fraud was apparent and could be proven. His report showed in detail that say, in the county of Quebec at poll No. 1, parish of Beaupré, such a man was deputy returning officer, that at the day of voting 36 votes were polled and yet the next day the deputy returning officer would add from 50 to 120 votes against prohibition.

"This emissary returned from Quebec and brought a letter purporting to be written by E. Pacaud, editor of Le Soleil, the leading Liberal newspaper in the district, which contains a promise that the department would offer a position under the government to the emissary if he did what was requested of him. He did what was required.

"In the case of Three Rivers a deputy returning officer did the work only on consideration that he was to be made a forest ranger. This position was promised, and he is at the moment in the woods as ranger, drawing pay from the provincial Liberal government.

"In another case the deputy returning officer of one of the polling places, believing that the whole thing looked like a farce, as the officer was not sworn, went up to Quebec to ask for instructions as to what was meant. He there saw some of the chiefs of the Liberal party, whose names were given, and asked them what was required. They laughed and told him that if he did not know enough to know that, he had better resign his position and allow others to be appointed. This hint was enough for the gentleman, and the day after the election he put 75 votes in against prohibition.

"These are only sample cases of what went on all over the province, particularly in the French districts.

"In Quebec and Montreal gangs of men were driven from poll to poll, some voting as often as eight or ten times. The provincial branch, being much more anxious to benefit the temperance cause than to hurt or further any political party, submitted the evidence to a member of the government who was supposed to represent the temperance people. He recognized the seriousness of the allegations, all of which were sworn to before a justice of the peace. As a result, the Alliance was informed that the whole story was a fabrication, that the names of the deputy returning officers were not correct, and that the total number of votes given as being both genuine and those given as fraudulent were wrong. Indeed, the reports seemed to be a tissue of falsehoods.

"Permission to inspect the returns was asked for and refused on the ground that it might not be pleasing to all the members of the government, and so all the executive did get was a list of alleged officials made out by the government employees.

"With a view of verifying matters, an effort was made to bring Parent forward to give evidence, but unfortunately, and here is the 'snap of the whip,' Parent, between the time this information was given to the government with Parent's sworn declaration as to the truth of the information and the time we wanted him to give evidence, had been appointed immigration agent and sent to Wisconsin, though not even then could any one be found who could give his address."

And inquire:

1. Whether William Henry Parent, the person referred to in the said telegraphic despatch has been appointed an immigration agent, or to any other position by the government of Canada, or by the government of any of the provinces in the Dominion.

2. Whether the government intends to appoint a Royal Commission to investigate and report upon the grave charges which have been made of ballot stuffing, and other frauds in connection with the said Plebiscite vote, on the 29th day of September, 1898.

3. That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, all correspondence with the government or any member thereof, relating to the subjects of the introduction of a prohibitory liquor law by the government, together with all affidavits and other documents having relation to the vote cast upon the question of prohibition, on the 29th day of September, 1898, and the alleged frauds in connection therewith.

He said:—With the permission of the House, I had better divide this motion and put the two questions first, and when answered I will move the motion for an address if it be deemed necessary. If the answers are satisfactory it may not be necessary to make the motion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say this is a rather unusual sort of proposal. It is part question and part address.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I admit it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And I think my hon. friend had better conform to the rules of the House and offer these as separate propositions. With regard to the first question that my hon. friend has put to me, I may say that this man is not appointed to the position of immigration agent or any other office in the gift of the Crown in connection with the government of Canada. What has been done in other provinces I cannot say, but I can say this much that he has not at all events been appointed in Quebec. My hon. friend has obtained from the Premier of the province the following answer:—

Wm. Parent has not been appointed immigration agent by our government and holds no position under us.

I do not know that we are called upon to be put on our trial because we are not in a position to answer what has been done by every other government in the Dominion of Canada. We are responsible for what we do ourselves as the government of Canada, and we are in no way responsible for what has been done by a local government. As far as I know, this man has not been appointed by any local government to any office, and I do not think that it is a proper question to put to us because it is a question which, before any answer is given, not merely implies dereliction of duty on our part, but conspiracy between our government and some local government to aid a man because he has committed some fraud in the discharge of a public duty. I think my hon. friend will see that the insinuation is a monstrous one to make against a government without any authority whatever. With regard to the second question, whether the government intends to appoint a commission, I am not aware that a commission is necessary. Here is a false statement that has been given to the public, that represents certain persons as being in the employ of deputy returning officers who were not employed. It represents certain things as happening at particular places which had never happened, and which the government know have never happened, and why should my hon. friend expect a commission to issue to inquire into a matter of that sort. If a man, proved to be a scalawag, represents a body that has an interest in a social or political reform, and if for the purpose of imposing upon people he represents himself as being what he is not, and certain men as being officers who are not officers, and represents a certain state of facts that do not exist, then I do not think the government are called upon to issue a commission to inquire into a matter of that sort. If there are any parties who believe these things who are inclined to think that Quebec above all places under heaven is a corrupt place, why, holding that view, let them make the inquiry. I do not take that view. I think human nature in Quebec is about what it is elsewhere. I say the percentage of votes recorded in the aggregate is about the same in Quebec as in the other portions of the Dominion, and I have no reason to think there were frauds committed in Quebec any more than in any other portion of the Dominion, and so far as inquiry has been made into this matter, there are no indications whatever that there is any foundation for the charges which have been made and it would be giving an importance to the party who made these representations—if he has made them and I suppose that he has—in the public eye which he does not at all deserve. He is not a public officer of the government and he is not a public officer of any other government so far as I know.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Had he not been in the employment of the government formerly?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He may have been. My hon. friend the Secretary of State says he was for a time in the employment of the post office.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was admitted by the Minister of Agriculture that he had been in the employ of the government. My hon. friend exhibited a little feeling—I might say a little passion—in answering the questions I put to him. He ought to remember that when I put the question in the first place, I intimated that I did not expect an answer to that portion of the question relating to appointment by another government, because I anticipated precisely the same reply that he has given. Apart from that view, it is unnecessary to enter into the question of conspiracy between the provincial government and the Dominion government. I think I would be enabled to show that, as far as political matters are concerned, they have been working into the hands of each other, and into the pockets of each other, and that there has been a political conspiracy existing between them for a long time past. However, that is not my present purpose. It may come on at some future time when it will be more pertinent to the question at issue. My question was fair and legitimate. My hon. friend could have contented himself by saying this man was not in the employ of the department. He might have called him a scoundrel, as his colleague did, or a scalawag, or he could have simply said he knew nothing of his being appointed by any other government, but it would have been as well for him to have answered my questions before throwing out the insinuation he did as to what induced me to put this motion on the paper. I may say that I made them on the assertions of a respectable member of his party, a man who occupies the position Vice President of the Dominion Alliance in the province of Quebec. When I heard of Mr. Webster, a respectable citizen of that province, making these charges, I did not know that I was committing a breach of the rules of this House in asking if the statement made by a respectable man in the temperance organization, was true or not, and therefore have no objection to assume all responsibility in connection with it. We are told first that this man is not in the employment of the government, and I am bound to accept that statement. I am also bound to accept the statement of the premier of the province of Quebec. I impugn neither the one nor the other, nor shall I do so till I have good reason to believe that I am correct in regard to this man, whom he calls a scoundrel. Mr. Webster says Parent was in the employ of the government in the past, and the Minister of Agriculture says the same thing, and the Secretary of State admits that he was temporarily in the Post Office Department, in the employ of the government, yet they call him a "scalawag" and a "scoundrel." Mr. Webster states this Parent has been an organizer of the party to which my hon. friend belongs. I was told this man Parent was stumping in the Eastern Townships, organizing the Liberal party down there. I dare say, knowing him they thought him the best kind of man to send to the constituencies to organize them and get them into line, in order that they could give their votes and bring to power those who now occupy the treasury benches. But having acknowledged his character and reputation, and having told the world that he was a scoundrel and a scalawag, I can understand why he was appointed to organize the Liberal party. This is the gentleman whom they have selected to do their honest work in organizing the party that sent them to power. I will now move for the address which appears at the foot of my motion. If these charges which have been made public by the gentleman to whom I have referred, Mr. Webster, vice-president of the Quebec branch of the Dominion Alliance and a Reformer in politics, be not true, then in the interests of good government, and in the interests of those who have been slandered by this man Parent, there should be a thorough investigation made. I cannot understand the line of reasoning and argument advanced in this House and in the lower House, that because they had been accused of committing irregularities in the province of Quebec that therefore, the honesty of the people of Quebec more than of any other section of the country, is inpugned. The same charges have been made against returning officers in the province of Ontario. I never looked upon them as being a charge against the general character of the people of our own province. It is only another evidence of the attempts which have been made constantly to raise a racial and religious war in connection with everything that comes before the country. Read the debates in the other House, and what does it amount to? That because the charge was made that this was done in the province of Quebec and in constituencies that are principally French, you are attacking the French race and their religion. Take the statements of the Minister of Agriculture and you can come to no other conclusion. What do they say when they refer to Mr. Monck who represents Jacques Cartier? They say you should not be permitted to make these statements, and they say it is an insult when he states that frauds have been committed in that constituency, and La Patrie calls down its vengeance because he has the audacity to tell these people that frauds have been committed. That is the way they got into power, and they expect to maintain power that way. If it were not unparliamentary I would say that a more disreputable course could not be pursued in a country such as this, composed of all classes of people. I repeat if Parent is the scoundrel that they represent him to be, and if he has belied these people in the province of Quebec, then it is due to the people of that province—it is due to those men who had the duty of taking these votes, and their character and their reputation, that his statements should not only be refuted but proved to be false. What are his statements? The Dominion Alliance, believing that fraud had been committed in recording the votes, sent this man into the constituencies to learn if possible how the election was conducted. How they got this scoundrel I do not know. The Dominion Alliance is composed of as respectable people as there are in Canada. They would not select such a man knowing his character to be bad. They must have selected him because they supposed he knew how to ferret out whatever misdeeds had been committed. Though it will take some little time, I propose to read some reports which this man has made, and will ask this House whether, in justice to the accused parties, there should not be a thorough investigation. Before doing so, I must give the Minister of Agriculture credit for having stated in the House of Commons, if I may be permitted to refer to what took place there, that he himself, after these charges were made, made an investigation, and he pronounces them all lies, as my hon. friend opposite me has done. He says, in justification of the course that he pursued, that he examined the record in the custody of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, Supposing he did, he may have found that some names which were given were incorrectly given. He may have found that the names which this man gave were not the names of the returning officers and clerks; but it would be impossible for him to tell, by looking at the returns in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, whether the ballot boxes had been stuffed or not. He would have to take the returns as they were given, and by that means he could ascertain the number of votes recorded, or rather which were upon the list; but he could not tell by any means whatever whether they were voters put there bogusly, or whether they were put there properly and regularly. If the hon. gentleman will turn to columns 1491-2-3 of the Commons Hansard, he will find the speech of the Minister of Agriculture in that connection. This is a very interesting statement that is made by this man Parent, and I shall read it in order that the world may know what the man reported to the Dominion Alliance. This document has been in the hands, I am credibly informed, of the Minister of Agriculture, the high priest of prohibition.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Of anti-prohibition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I judge him by his former reputation. He has been the mouth-piece of the prohibitionists. He has had this document in his hands for a long time, so I am informed, and the reference which he incidentally made to it in his speech in the House of Commons justifies the conclusion that it has been in his hands, and that no step has been taken, other than a private examination by the minister himself, so far as we know, to ascertain whether the report is true or not. This man reports—I shall omit that portion which refers to the hon. speaker, because I have some doubts as to its correctness.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If it is incorrect in one point it must be incorrect in all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am speaking now of those with whom I have come in contact, and have a right to speak of. The report is as follows:—

To Major E. L. BOND,
Montreal.

The Counties of Lévis, Beauce, Montmagny and Kamouraska were visited by me during the last ten days, and sufficient evidence has been found to warrant an investigation by the government in that part of the county.

It will be remembered that on the night of the 30th of September last the telegraph reported that the anti-prohibitionists had carried the province of Quebec by about 40,000 majority. A few days after the majority in several ridings began to increase so enormously as to justify the fears that extensive frauds have been committed, and that long after the hour fixed by law, as the closing of votation had passed, some deputy returning officers with others whose names are given below, stuffed the ballot boxes.

In the county of Beauce, for instance, the majority was increased from 1,100 to over 3,300. The vote actually cast did not exceed one-fifth of the whole, being about 1,200. Now it appears that over one-half of the voters on the list have voted.

In St. François there are five polls. In poll No. 2, on the second concession, 37 voters registered at the polling before five o'clock. Edward Castonguy was deputy returning officer at the poll and he was assisted by Fred. St. Aubin and Robert Samours in the work of increasing the vote to 106. There were at the time about ten people at the poll and Castonguy asserted they were authorized by the government of the Dominion to do so.

At St. Frederic, poll No. 1, only 24 people cast their votes, as given out. At five o'clock no interest was taken and the vote was very light. It was a busy day for the farmers. Ninety-one votes were cast on Sunday evening by parties whose names were Louis St. Denis, deputy returning officer, Charles Malncour, hotel-keeper, and William Lavoie.

At poll No. 2, in the same parish, only 11 votes were cast between the hours of votation. Now there are 67. Capt. Alphonse St. Onge came in from Ste. Marie on an order from the government, he asserted, and 30 hours after votation the box was re-opened and 56 votes were cast. The same Capt. St. Onge did the same thing at St. Georges, where 71 votes were added to the 32 in the ballot box. At St. Victor de Tring, at poll No. 1 and No. 3 40 and 55 votes were cast fraudulently. The deputy returning officers in those two last polls were Pierre Guillemette and Adolphe Fontaine, respectively. The latter protested against such practices being done, but Capt. St. Onge promised him a job from the government on the Chaudière River.

At St. Antoine, near Beauce Junction, a strange occurrence took place. It is a small parish having 117 voters on the list. Now it appears that only the deputy returning officer and his two assistants, with the representative of the antis voted, making four ballots cast. When at five o'clock the four amused themselves an hour voting for all those who had kept away from the poll. I heard the affair when at Ste. Marie and at St. Frederic, and I drove over there and I heard the story from the deputy returning officer himself, who had a good laugh over it. He said that the plebiscite was a funny thing anyway. His name was Joseph A. Paquet, and the representative at the poll was Narcisse Gilbert. With this I was through with the Beauce district.

At St. Henri, County of Lévis, a reporter of Le Soleil, Quebec, by the name of L. Dallaire, came up there at the poll at about three o'clock in the afternoon and inquired about the votation being very brisk and active. He was told that few voters had cast their ballots. He remarked that something must be done to save the situation. He was seen in conference with several men and appeared at the poll No. 2 where he persuaded the returning officer, whose name is Jacques Berlinguet, to vote himself though he was not a voter. He claimed also to have been authorized to vote for a certain number of persons he had on a paper and said he had the power to vote for all these. The clerk whose name is Cléophas Bédard, refused to take part in what he called a dirty trick and left the room. Dallaire, the reporter, proceeded to take his place and write out the names and place the ballots into the box. After five o'clock it was found that nearly all the voters in the precinct had cast their ballots, less two, and many people are astonished to this day how this was done.

MONTMAGNY.

The undersigned visited at Cap St. Ignace a large parish. Mr. C. Roy, a lawyer of St. Thomas and who is disgruntled with the government of Ottawa. Mr. Roy is a close personal friend of mine and told me that many hundred votes had been cast fraudulently. The deputy returning officers were acting under orders from the government leaders of the party in the district, namely, E. Martineau, a lawyer, and now M. P. for Montmagny; Mr. Lislois, M.P.P., for the same county. Mr. Roy added that if a right investigation was held startling facts would be discovered. I asked him how it could be done, as those deputy returning officers having already violated their oaths would not hesitate to do so again. He said that is where I was mistaken, those officers had not taken any oath at all, the whole thing being considered as a huge farce and not a regular election, when the penalties of the law are to be feared. When we were talking, deputy returning officer of poll No. 3, Cap St. Ignace, and Roy, questioned Didace Dufour, the said returning officer, if the facts he had revealed to me were true. Dufour grew white and looked askance at me, but Roy exclaimed, Oh, he can't speak. I answered for Parent, he is my fellow student at Laval University and won't say anything. "It is true, said Dufour, we have not been sworn at all, only 21 persons voted at my poll during the day. I had received instructions from Mr. Lislois, M.P.P., to fill the box, that would please the government. I did accordingly. I think it was done everywhere, as Abraham Caron, who was deputy returning officer at poll No. 2, Cap St. Ignace, did the same thing. At poll No. 1, St. François, Urgèle Langlois, deputy returning officer, did the same thing, and so on added Dufour." But I said, if those facts were known what do you think the prohibitionists would do. He said: Oh, I wish they would do everything. Those fellows, meaning Tarte and Pacaud, had not the courage of their convictions.

At Kamouraska, I was not a very long time, only a few hours, but I learned enough to convince you that huge frauds were perpetrated. A very light vote was cast. Paul Dumont and Grégoire Dessaint were deputy returning officers at poll Nos. 1 and 2, respectively. At those two polls about 80 voted. On Sunday, Mr. Carroll the M.P. is alleged to have sent a man by the name of Ouésime Beaupré, from Rivière du Loup in order that more votes should be cast. There was great trouble as Paul Dumont resisted and said he would not re-open the box. Beaupré threatened him with dismissal from his position of Collector of Customs, if he would not obey. Eight or ten persons were present when the fraud was being committed by Beaupré himself. It appears from the facts given to me by Dumont himself as he knows me personally and had no of me, that 70 votes were thus cast in poll No. 1 and 51 in poll No. 2 and the result was immediately sent to Quebec.

I heard from Ed. Dussault, a printer of Quebec, while on the car, that extensive frauds had been committed in the counties of Quebec and Montmorency. As a result of my investigation I would suggest that a commission be sent in all those counties by the Federal Government at your request in order to make a rigid investigation of all those facts I have revealed to you and I propose to help you further on in the work you have undertaken.

Humbly submitted,

(Signed.) W. H. PARENT.

Mr.J. H. CARSON,
Montreal.

DEAR SIR,—I began my investigation re the plebiscite vote in the county of Quebec on Friday the 17th last. I visited the parishes of Beauport, Charlesburgh, Valcartier and St. Ambroise.

At poll No. 1, Beauport, the deputy returning officer was Jules Begin. There was no representative of the Dominion Alliance in Beauport. In Beauport as in every parish of the county the votes have been accustomed to large expenditures of money in election times.

In the plebiscite campaign no effort was made on either side to organize, so the vote was very light. Only a few in the three polls of Beauport availed themselves of the privilege they had to cast a vote on that important issue. At poll No. 1 seven votes were recorded for prohibition and thirty-six against it. The ballot box was re-opened 24 hours after the hour of votation was closed and 60 ballots put into the box. Begin, the deputy returning officer was present and among those present were Honoré Parent and Pierre Vallancour.

At poll No. 3 in the 6th Concession, Ernest Dubé was the deputy returning officer. He was not sworn in and was advised by a Quebec lawyer and politician to do as he pleased with the ballot box. Only 55 registered against prohibition. A few hours after the closing of the votation 40 ballots were thrown in by a party from Quebec, in the house of the deputy returning officer in his presence and with his consent.

At poll No. 2 of the parish of Charlesburgh, Victor Bedard was deputy returning officer. Only 19 registered against prohibition and one for. There was no swearing in of the officers at the poll and the whole affair was treated as a huge farce. On the day after the votation a man named Octave Proulx came from Quebec and said that something must be done to save Laurier from embarrassment from his Ontario friends. Orders had come from headquarters, he said, to increase the majority of the province of Quebec to over 100,000. Bedard wanted the promise of a job from some higher authority at Quebec. Proulx went to Quebec, 9 miles distant, and returned in the afternoon with a written promise from Pacaud. He holds that promise in his hands at the present day but did not get his job and he is very bitter against Pacaud. Over 10 ballots were thrown into the box by Proulx himself who boasted of the exploit before the undersigned.

At Valcartier the interest taken in the plebiscite was very light, so light indeed, that only 6 cast their ballots during the day. The people have been accustomed to be bought like sheep and they are wondering even now why election agents did not come with large rolls of bills to give them a little of their abundance, and as they concluded to keep away from the polls, but it is found that the ballot box was manipulated on account of the 87 ballots found therein by the returning officer of the county. The deputy returning officer was Onesime Lacroix.

At St. Ambroise at poll No. 1 Arthur St. Denis was returning officer and the representative of the liquor interests was Philippe Tremblay, a cousin of a Beauport brewer. He was sent from the latter place to look after his side interests. At the closing of the votation they counted over the ballots and found that 36 had voted. There are over 220 votes in the precinct. They put 120 more in the box.

At poll No. 3 58 were added to the 19 already in the box. J. B St. Pierre was the returning officer there.

It is useless to say that in all the places visited by the undersigned, no traces were found of the officers at the polls or representatives, when there were any, being sworn in. They were assured of impunity from high quarters and positive that the members of the county of Quebec, Hon. Chas. Fitzpatrick took a hand in the proceedings. The people say that word was sent from him that no one would be hurt in case the frauds were to be unearthed and investigated.

Jos. Dussault, printer of the city of Quebec, and a very active politician, told me that the majority in the two counties of Quebec and Montmorency were increased over 1,000 after the day of votation was over, and that the whole thing was done by orders of Fitzpatrick, Pacaud, Langelier, etc., in order to drown the votes of the other provinces.

MONTMORENCY.

I went next to Montmorency and stopped at L'Ange Gardien the first parish after we have crossed the Montmorency Falls. At L'Ange Gardien, there were three polls. At poll No. 1 Dosithée Fournier was deputy returning officer. He told me that there was no use of taking a plebiscite because the people did not know what he meant. They understood vaguely that it meant taxes. They were afraid to vote and it would have taken a pretty shrewd election agent, added Fournier, with a large pocket book to convince them that it would be right for them to vote.

When I was appointed deputy returning officer, continued Fournier, I went to Quebec and saw Pacaud, C. Langelier, and all the fellows. They advised me to treat the matter lightly and that it would not be necessary for me to be sworn in as it was not a regular election, but only a way of ascertaining the expression of the people; but if the people do not vote, what shall I do, said Fournier. But the shrewd politicians only laughed and told him that if he did not know better he ought to resign his place. So Fournier went back home no wiser than before.

The people had said to Fournier they would not vote without money and kept to their word. Only 14 cast their ballots during the day. But thirty hours afterwards a man came from Quebec and said the majority must be increased at all costs; Fournier reopened the box and put 102 ballots in it.

At Chateau, Richer, over 150 ballots were placed into the ballot box. At poll No. 175 were placed by Joseph Dussault the printer from Quebec, and a native of the place, and at poll No. he put another 75 such he told me himself, were his orders. The deputy returning officers on those polls were Eusebe Lafrance and Jacques Dussault respectively. They talked of the matter of as no consequence whatever. It was not a regular election they added and they said no more.

COUNTY OF TEMISCOUATA.

I visited next this large constituency of Temiscouata containing 26 parishes and over 50,000 souls. Below is what happened at some of the polls of the parishes of Isle Verte, St. Arsene, St. Eli, St. Francois, and Trois Pistoles.

At poll No. 1, Isle Verte, Theophile Lesvesque was deputy returning officer. Charles Leduc was the representative of the liquor interests. About 60 votes were cast and registered at that poll which was in the village. After votation was over, Leduc persuaded Levesque to put some 80 ballots in the box, so to have it appear a more respectable vote, according to the expression used by Levesque in speaking of the matter to the undersigned. Chas. A. Gaievreau, the member of the county had been speaking in every parish, talking about the taxation that would follow a prohibition victory. He only succeeded in frightening the people away from the polls, as one word about taxation and taxes is enough to make them believe that the government intends to impose heavy burdens upon them.

I have been through the county and I saw clearly that the whole question was not understood at all by the electors. The voters were more afraid to vote against prohibition than for it. To them as many told me it was like a sword cutting with both edges, so they generally did not care to vote, as it was considered safer to abstain altogether from exercising that privilege.

Many prominent citizens of the , such as N. Riome, of Trois Pistoles, R. Dumais of St. Eloi, Salluste Bertrand of Isle Verte and Nap. Pelletier of St. Arsene did not hesitate to state to me that not more than 500 votes were cast in the county and nevertheless a majority of over 1,500 was found against prohibition and many of these ballots were fraudulently cast long hours after votation was over.

At poll No. 2, Isle Verte, Seraphin Girard was deputy returning officer, Ludger Rioux representative of the liquor interests. Fourteen votes were cast and registered during votation hours.

That day, Wilfrid Dumais, a prominent politician of Cacouna, was driving through the parishes situated near the St. Lawrence River, stopping at all the polls on his way down and persuaded the deputy returning officer of poll No. 2 Isle Verte to cast more ballots into the box.

At first Girard demurred, but was easily persuaded to do as told. Dumais told him that the majority in the province was not enough, that the party was in danger and so on. He insisted particularly on the point that this was not an election, only a joke perpetrated by Laurier upon the prohibitionists. Fifty ballots were put in the box at that moment, Dumais related the fact to me and showed me confidential letters from Gauvreant to Pacaud, urging him to do something in that line. Some 300 votes were added to the total majority in the county through Dumais' intervention. Ludger Rioux, the representative at poll No 2, Isle Verte, told me that he was present when that was done.

At St. Arsène there are two polling subdivisions. At poll No. 1, Nicolas Pelletier was returning officer; the hotelkeeper of the locality, representative. The name of the latter is Constant Dumais. In spite of his efforts the people were too much afraid of the taxes and did not vote. Only 11 were recorded at that poll, nobody was sworn in, as they were told that it was not necessary, and they believe, even now, that it was not. After the votation was over, the deputy returning officer and the hotelkeeper went to the hotel where the box was left for the night. The day after they both concluded that it would be better for them to have a few more ballots put in, so they put n 90, and had a good laugh over it. Dumais arrived n the afternoon and complimented them on their loyalty to the party.

When they were all at the hotel, Jean Pelletier, the deputy returning officer of poll No. 2, came along with his box. How many did vote at your place? Oh, not many, only a baker's dozen. Dumais exhibited a telegram from the Soleil, Quebec, asking for returns. Something must be done, they all said. How many electors in your subdivision, was asked of Pelletier? No, he answered. Well, let us revise your return and place the number of those who cast their ballots at 112. Pelletier consented, and the thing was done, and a telegram sent the Soleil accordingly.

At St. Eloi and St. François, two small parishes back of Trois Pistoles, Nemese Rioux, an influential and wealthy man of Trois Pistoles, took charge of the business, and increased the number of votes from 14 to 50 at St. François, and from 7 to 77 at St. Eloi. The deputy returning officer at St. Eloi was Elphege Gravel, and at St. François, Urbaux Dion; no representative on either side, only Rioux paying a flying visit. In spite of all his influence he could not get the stubborn French Canadian farmers to the polls; they were afraid of taxes.

Next comes the great parish of Trois Pistoles, where, in polls No. 3, 4 and 2, over 200 votes were fraudulently cast into the ballot boxes after votation hours. Gustave D'Amours engineered the job, and it was done on the first of October long after votation hours.

In these three polls, E. Rioux, Gonzaque D'Amours and Phillippe Lacroix were, respectively, deputy returning officers. D'Amours had given them instructions not to give any returns immediately after five o'clock on votation day, as it is the custom, but to wait a day in order to see the results in other counties of the province. They all came to D'Amours' house on October 1st, about four o'clock in the afternoon, and there in the presence of six persons (the three deuty returning officers and D. D'Amours, Emile Pelletier, and Geo. Bellarance) 200 ballots were added and put into the boxes. At No. 2, 21 had voted, 72 were added; at No. 3, 17 had voted, 68 were added; at No. 4, 27 had voted, 70 were added, and returns sent by telegraph to the Soleil, Quebec.

In the county of Rimouski I visited only three parishes, and learned enough to ascertain that there, also, the same practices had been done, though to not so great an extent as elsewhere. I must say that if I could visit the parishes of the county of Matane and the other parishes of Rimouski, I could find many interesting things.

At poll No. 1, St. Simon, next to Trois Pistoles, Fournier was deputy returning officer, with J. B. D'Anyon, as representative of the liquor interests. No oath was taken at the opening of votation. About thirty registered during the day. Fournier told D'Anyon that the vote was too light. They should amuse themselves, so, being alone in the booth, they voted for every member of their family. Both men cast about 15 votes each in that way during the day.

At St. Mathieu there is only one poll, and about 18 registered during the day. Gustave D'Amours, of Trois Pistoles, sent his son, Henri, there and had the number increased to 85. The deputy returning officer there was Eloi Beaubien, and as he saw no harm, he complied with D'Amours' request to increase the majority to 85.

At St. Valerien the same thing was done at the instance of the same Henri D'Amours. From 14 it was increased to 91. The deputy returning officer there was Conrad Rod.

At Bic there was also fraudulent ballots, but I could not ascertain the names of the parties. As my funds were exhausted, I was compelled to return to Montreal.

I am, yours truly,

(Signed) W. H. PARENT.

MONTREAL, 1st March, 1899.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—How could it be known by this man what votes were cast at the different polls ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am reading his report, which will answer that question. He says that he went there for the purpose of making this inquiry, and he says further that he was not known and that he received the information from the parties who committed the frauds ; and that is a good reason why the falsity of the statement, if such it be, should be proved to the world by a commission and not by a private inquiry by one member of the government whose interest is to show that the majority against prohibition in Quebec is as large as it is reported, and would like it to be much larger, so as to justify no action on behalf of prohibition. Either Parent received the information from the deputy returning officer himself, or he was telling a falsehood. If he was telling a falsehood, prove him to be the villain you represent him to be. I have read this report for the information of the House, to show the character of the document which has been placed in the hands of the Dominion Alliance, and by the Alliance I have reason to believe in the hands of the Hon. Mr. Fisher, Minister of Agriculture, hence I ask that an investigation be made into the truth of these allegations, in order that the parties accused, if these parties exist, should have an opportunity of setting themselves right before the country. Then Mr. Parent makes another report to Mr. Carson, another prominent prohibitionist in the province of Quebec, as follows :—

Mr. J. H. CARSON,
Montreal.

DEAR SIR,—I continued my investigation re plebiscite vote in the counties of Arthabaska and Lotbinière. I arrived in the former County on Wednesday morning, and visited the parishes of Arthabaskaville, Stanfold and St. Valère.

At Poll No. 2, Arthabaskaville, Emile Dugas was the Deputy Returning Officer. He was not sworn in, believing even now that it was unnecessary. Ephrem Girard represented the liquor interests. Thirty votes were recorded, out of a total of 157. Subsequently on the day after, Alexandre Côté, brother of C. Côté, of Arthabaskaville, induced the deputy returning officer to cast 55 ballots in the box, making a total of 85 for that poll.

At Poll No. 3, the same Côté, who is a politician of some eminence in the induced Vital Chommared, Deputy Returning Officer at that poll, to increase the majority there from 21 to 50. It is a small poll.

At poll No. 2, Stanfold, very few cared to vote, only 11 registered at the poll during the day. Constand Dubeau, being the deputy returning officer there. There were no representatives on either side, and no swearing in of the officials in charge.

Dubeau received a letter from a prominent politi- of Arthabaskaville that it was a shame for the people of Stanfold to have given so few votes against Prohibition, as the rest of the Townships would give a majority for it there being quite a few English speaking voters in the village and at polling sub-division No. 3, I could not learn the name of the party from Arthabaskaville. Dubeau, Lajoie telling me they were bound secrecy. The result was that sixty ballots were added to the 11 already in the box, making 71 votes for that poll.

At St. Valère, a new parish in the back concession, I could not learn much, as the two parties I wanted to see were away, but I returned to Arthabaskaville. Wilbrod Pacaud, a relative of Ernest Pacaud of the Soleil told me that good work had been done at St. Flavien against prohibition. Mr. Pacaud, who is a young man of no particular eminence in prohibition told me that the majority against prohibition hac been increased by several hundred in the .

At St. Flavien, Regis Dupré, the deputy returning officer did not want at first to do anything that was suggested, but at last on a promise of a bushrangership he consented to re-open the box and put in a large number of ballots. Pacaud could not state the exact number, as Alec. Côté, Xavier Dumont of Arthabaskaville were alone with Dupré when the trick was done. Dupré has got his job and he is now in the woods back of Three Rivers on the St. Maurice River, bushranging for the Quebec Government.

I next visited the county of Lotbinière, where I found the traces of the same master hand which was so active in the whole district of Quebec.

At St. Emilie, there are two polling subdivisions. At poll No. 1 Philippe Lemieux was the deputy returning officer. Very few electors went to the polls as the farmers were busy gathering in their crops. The federal member Dr. Rinfret, had not taken any interest in the contest. The simple minded farmers of that region were asking themselves why it was that an election was going on without any meeting being held, any organization being done, and specially any candidates announcing their intentions at the church doors on Sabbath day. So after talking between themselves about the matter, they thought they would not risk anything by keeping away from the polls.

At poll No. 1, St. Emelie, 16 voted. Philippe Lemieux the deputy returning officer was not sworn in and so all the officers at the poll. There was no representatives on either side.

At poll No. 2, Augustin Carrière was deputy returning officer, There was no swearing in and the vote was very light throughout the day. After polling day over Lemieux and Carrière drove together to St. Croix, the of the county. They both went to the Lotbinière House kept by a man named Edmond Pageau where they passed the night drinking. In the morning they were induced by the hotel keeper to re-open their boxes and stuff them with ballots. one hundred and twenty-five were thrown into the two boxes by the two officials, Pageau helping them in doing the job

At St. Gilles, there is only one poll and J. B. Dumond was the deputy returning officer. The same thing occured as at Ste. Emilie. tweny-two voted there. Dumont was not sworen in and was told by several hotel-keeper of St. Croix, two of them are named F. Corriveau and N. Fournier to treat the whole matter lightly as it was not a regular election. Dumont received also a telegram from a party in Quebec whose name I could not learn to increase his majority at St. Gilles to over 100. Dumont did as he was told.

At St. Agapit, I found evidence that the master hand at Quebec had sent one of his emissaries there and at St. Sylvestre also. These parishes are situated in the back settlement. The people are for the most part simple minded for lack of education. The hotel-keeper of the place, Félix Lagarde, of St. Agapit, was the deputy returning officer. He was not sworn in, and not more than 14 voted during the day.

At St. Sylvestre, there was also only one poll kept by a man named Philéas Dunoc, from St. Croix. The two deputy returning officers drove over to St. Croix, where a journalist from Quebec, named Arcadia Gérard, now working for the Premier of the province met them with instructions from a committee at Quebec and asked them if they helped the party, the party would not forget them. The deputy returning officer consented to increase the anti-prohibition in their parishes by 52 and 67, respectively.

I then went to Quebec, on my way to Montreal, and passed a few hours on Monday of this week trying to confirm my statements in regard to the investigations made in Quebec, Montmorency and Lotbinière counties. I now know enough to clearly prove what I had said, though the leaders took care not to commit themselves, and had the work done by underlings I have mentioned in my reports.

I think a commission would reveal the whole conspiracy, as the men mentioned in my reports would be forced to speak under oath.

(Signed) W. H. PARENT.

I have read this for the purpose of letting the country know what the report of Parent is, and not to have it hidden in some pigeon hole in the Department of the Minister of Agriculture, who has had it in his possession for some time, but has never revealed its contents. He says he did make some investigations, which I have pointed out he could not do properly. It would be impossible for him to ascertain the truth of many statements which have been made in the report, and I repeat what I have already said, that with this in the hands of the government and not in the possession of the country, in justice to the men who are accused of committing these frauds, a thorough investigation should be made. I am informed that the Dominion Alliance has to-day, a solemn affidavit made by this same man Parent as to the truth of the statements he has made. If he is a perjurer, let him be punished as a perjurer ought to be punished. If one-tenth of this report be true, then, those who are guilty of the frauds, should be punished as the law provides. I have given my reasons plainly and distinctly, and I merely repeat that in the interests of good government, in the interests of purity of election —in the interests of the character and reputation of the men who are accused of these frauds, a thorough and searching investigation should be made in order that they may show whether this man perjured himself, when he swore to the truth of these statements.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the debate be adjourned till to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 19th April, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE BELLEVILLE POST OFFICE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to:

Ask the Government, whether the Postmaster General has, during the past year, or at any other time, reduced any city post office to that of a town office, as was done on the plea of economy in the case of the city of Belleville, namely: the cities of Toronto, Hamilton, London, Ottawa, Windsor, Montreal, Quebec, Fredericton, St. John, Halifax, Charlottetown, and Victoria? If not, why have not those cities which the public accounts show, as set forth in a tabular statement to be found on page 211 of the official reports of the Debates of the Senate of the 14th March, 1898, cost a greater percentage of the revenue collected to perform the duties of said offices, than did that of Belleville reduced?

He said:—Hon. gentleman will remember that I changed the question which I asked some little time ago as originally framed, yet did not obtain the answer which I desired. Might I ask the Minister of Justice whether he is ready to answer these questions?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend I am not ready. I have not got the answers. They were promisad to be sent.

The inquiry was allowed to stand.

CAPE TORMENTINE POSTAL CONTRACT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all contracts made by the Post Office Department, since the 1st day of December, 1898, for the carriage of mails between the Intercolonial Railway and Cape Tormentine.

Also, all correspondence between the Post Office Department, or any official thereof, and the Charlottetown Board of Trade, or any person whatsoever relative to the carriage of the mails from the Intercolonial Railway to Cape Tormentine, since the 1st day of December last.

He said:—In making this motion I have only two or three words to say. The hon. gentlemen are aware that during the winter the province of Prince Edward Island is dependent for its mails on communication across the straits at that narrow point between the Island and New Brunswick. A branch railway was built down to Cape Traverse by the government of Canada on the Prince Edward Island side, under the late government, and a branch railway was subsidized between Sackville, N. B., and Cape Tormentine on the other side, and very many valuable improvements were made in the service. For many years before last winter there had been some delay in the mails going to the Island between the Intercolonial Railway and Cape Tormentine. The mails going from Prince Edward Island went without much interruption, but in the other direction there was somewhere near a day's delay at Sackville, owing to the train arrangements of the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway. It appears some party in Charlottetown made complaint about that last fall, and the Post Office Department, instead of trying to remove the difficulty by bringing the service into a better condition, actually ignored the railway on the New Brunswick side altogether, and made a contract to have the mails carried some forty miles by teams, the result being that in very good weather and good roads, the service between the Intercolonial Railway and Cape Tormentine going to Prince Edward Island was to some extent improved; but it brought about, even under the best circumstances, quite as great, or even a greater degree of interruption in the mails going the other way, while in bad weather and bad roads it resulted, as one would naturally expect, in going back to such communication and service as we had in Canada before the construction of railways. I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that it is a matter of very grave complaint that any such retrograde step as that should be taken by the government of Canada, where the mails of an entire province are affected. Nevertheless, I am told that the most reasonable propositions were made to the government, to which no reply was received, to make the service effective between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. No attention whatever was paid to them, and instead of giving the province the reasonable service that it should receive, and the communications the attention they were entitled to, the department actually went back and made contracts with parties to carry these mails for forty miles by means of horse teams. All I can say is that, notwithstanding the fact we have had one of the most favourable winters we ever experienced, there was a great deal of complaint, and a great deal of cause for complaint. The extent of the interruption that was caused by this arrangement was not so much felt in Prince Edward Island, because the delay and more serious interruption was coming this way, and correspondents writing from the province would not be advised as to the cause of delay in transmission of the mails. As I said before, in fine weather the mail communications were not so bad going to Prince Edward Island, but in all weathers they were bad coming this way. I hope the leader of the House will take note of what I am saying. The people of Prince Edward Island feel it almost an insult to their province that with railway communication the mails of the entire province should be carried by teams as though no railway existed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I shall bring to the attention of the Postmaster General the observations which the hon. member has addressed to the House, and also the motion which he now submits. I did not learn from him whether he had himself any communication with the Postmaster General on the subject, or whether any other representative in the House of Commons has communicated with the Postmaster General and called his attention to the matter of which my hon. friend complains. I shall invite the attention of the Postmaster General to the subject. The hon. gentleman's motion will no doubt be adopted by the House, and the information which he seeks will be given. I cannot help thinking that my hon. friend must be labouring under some mistake as to the correspondence, and as to the want of consideration being given to any complaint that has been made.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am under no mistake as to the result anyway.

COLD STORAGE ON STEAMSHIPS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all correspondence, Orders in Council or departmental orders having reference to the establishment of bonded warerooms on the premises of John Gow Scrimgeour, at Cardigan Bridge, in the province of Prince Edward Island.

He said:—I may explain that a considerable amount of feeling exists in the province with regard to the granting of these bonding privileges to this person. I am aware that under ordinary conditions it is customary, in the Department of Customs, to give bonding facilities to any reputable merchant who applies for them, on his providing suitable premises in which to store the goods that are required to be so bonded, and on the customs officer being kept in possession of the key; but I submit that the case to which I am now referring is one that does not come under bonding conditions at all. The person named in this motion has been convicted a great many times of violating the Scott Act. The Canadian Temperance Act is in force in King's County, and supported by public opinion in that county, and this man has deliberately and systematically defied the law, and has been frequently prosecuted and convicted of violations of the Act. It is to enable this man to carry on this violation of the law that the bonding privilege has been given him. I call attention to the circumstances because I am sure that if the hon. minister were made aware of the circumstances and the character of this person—I am not referring to his private character but to his violation of the law of the land—he would not continue to grant bonding privileges under such circumstances.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Can the hon. gentleman tell me how long this man has had those bonding privileges?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Not very long, I think; but I cannot be positive.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understood my hon. friend to say that this man has frequently violated the Act, so I thought he was referring to a series of transactions that had extended over a considerable time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not aware whether he had the bonding privileges from the outset. I know he has had them while violating the law.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LIGHTING OF THE PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWLEL rose to inquire:

1. What was the total average amount paid to the Ottawa Gas Co., per annum, for lighting the various government buildings, during the three years ending 1898?
2. What is the total cost per annum, by the present system of lighting?
3. Were tenders called for lighting the various buildings by either gas or electricity? To what company was the contract for lighting awarded?
4. What is the total number and power of incandescent electric lights now installed in all the public buildings in Ottawa, and cost of installation, including wiring and all other apparatus?
5. What is the number and power of electric lights operated by the government electric light plant, and annual cost of the same during the three years ending 1898?
6. What is the original cost and present value of all government electrical plant and boilers in the public buildings in Ottawa? How many men are employed to operate them?
7. Were tenders called for the wiring of any or all the government buildings in Ottawa and the supply of all electrical appliances necessary for the same? From whom were offers received and what were the respective amounts of such offers?
8. How was the parliamentary appropriation of $75,000 for extending the government lighting plant, and the purchase of certain pumps for fire purposes, expended? What are the items of such expenditure, and to whom paid?

He said:—I would ask my hon. friend whether he is prepared to answer these numerous questions?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The return is being prepared.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The last two years—1897 and 1898—would suit my purpose. It is not a return, but an answer that I want. If the minister prefers that I should move for a return perhaps it would be better. The trouble is, in moving for a return, one seldom gets it. Shall I change it into an address?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think it would be better if the hon. gentleman were to do so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I may say that the Minister of Public Works has been ill for the past week. I went to his house and saw him though he was confined to his bed. I mentioned the fact that this inquiry was on the paper. He said he had given instructions to his officers to prepare the answers, and I have no doubt they are being prepared.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I sent over to the department for the information and the officers said it was in the course of preparation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then I move my notice as an address instead of an inquiry.

The motion was agreed to.

TIDAL CURRENTS SURVEY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE rose to:

Direct the attention of the government to the numerous wrecks which have taken place, during the past year, along our coast, in many cases attributable to the want of knowledge of those in charge of the vessels, of the courses and power of the currents and tides. And will inquire:

1. Whether it is their intention to prosecute without delay the work of the tidal current survey along the coasts of Canada, especially those bordering on the Atlantic Ocean?
2. Whether an amount adequate to the requirements of the thorough and efficient carrying on of this work, so important to Canadian commerce, will be embraced in the Estimates for the current year?
3. What sum was expended for this service during the last financial year?

He said:—It is not my intention to speak at any length on the subject of this motion, inasmuch as last session hon. gentlemen who were present will remember that I spoke at very considerable length in regard to it, urging its importance, and citing in support of my view of the importance of the work, the opinion of corporate bodies and of merchants who have been long engaged in trade, and the opinions of both of these parties carrying great weight as to the absolute necessity of carrying out this work efficiently. As a further evidence of this necessity, I would cite the very large number of wrecks which took place during the past year. I have not the list at hand, but I am perfectly aware that it is very far above the average. I have seen it stated in the press that very many of these wrecks are, in a measure at least, attributable to the want of knowledge of the captains and other parties in charge of these vessels, of the tidal currents, of their courses and their force. I saw a statement made that this was largely the cause of the wreck of that splendid steamship the "Castilian," recently on the coast of Yarmouth, N.S., and that had the captain or those in charge been possessed of adequate information as to the course and the power of the currents around that point, in all human probability the wreck would not have occurred. To prove how important this is becoming and how inadvisable it is to delay any further the carrying on of the work efficiently, I may mention the fact that that great corporation in London, the Insurance of Lloyds, has discriminated against vessels coming into Canadian waters, the losses they sustained last year having been so heavy. They have discriminated to a very large extent, so much so in many cases as to render the prosecution of business in this way unprofitable by reason of the premiums they charge for the extra hazard. I am aware that influence has been brought to bear, and that that corporation has been interviewed by some prominent Canadians to see if they would not rescind their action in this regard, but I am informed that for the current year at any rate, there is no prospect of its being rescinded. In my view, so important is the effective maintenance of this service that I think the government would exercise a wise discretion were they, if such a course should prove necessary, to lessen the appropriations to some other services which dwindle into in significance in comparison with the hedging round about with every possible safeguard the course of vessels approaching our shores freighted with the products of the world, and often times with the much more precious freightage of human life. If this strong necessity exists under present circumstances for the appropriation of a sufficient sum to carry out this efficiently, surely that necessity is greatly enhanced by the prospect of the adoption soon of a fast line of steamers between this country and England.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I spoke to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on the subject and he does not share the opinion of my hon. friend as to the very great importance of the service relating to the tidal currents, believing other improvements of very much greater importance are required to secure the safety of the navigation of the St. Lawrence and the approaches to our Atlantic sea board and he had arranged this year among other things to place a lighthouse at the traverse below Quebec and to take charge of the buoying of the St. Lawrence which before had been done by private contract.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I had intended to speak about that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been complained that the contractor often failed in his duty so the department will take sole charge of it. It is also proposed to erect a fog alarm at Belle Isle station and a fog alarm on the south side of Belle Isle straits. The minister is also in communication with the officers who are now engaged in surveying the coast of the Gulf of St. Lawrence with reference to the tidal currents. He is making further inquiry toas certain if his former judgment on the subject is sound or not. He entirely disagrees with the conclusion that the "Castilian" was lost in any way because of ignorance of the tidal currents or the existence of tidal currents. The hon. gentleman may recollect that in the investigation which was held into the loss of that magnificent steamer it was shown that she was on a trip from Boston to Liverpool and was nearly one hundred miles out of her course. When the lead was thrown, instead of finding one hundred fathoms of water they only found sixty and that should have been a warning to a captain with the experience of the captain of the "Castilian." They went on with their course and the lead showed that the water was getting shallower. They got down to 30 fathoms, to 20 fathoms, and to 17 fathoms, before the course was altered. In the report which I read there was no reference whatever to the accident being due in any degree to tidal currents, but it was attributed to the fact that the vessel was entirely out of her course.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It was not due to tidal currents in that case anyway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not in that particular case. There is no doubt around the Bay of Fundy there are very serious tidal currents, but I understand there are steamers constantly running between Portland and St. John which have necessarily to pass the particular point where the "Castilian" was lost—I think the Gannet Rock. Those steamers pass and re-pass constantly night and day and even in fogs, and they do not lose their reckoning. Unfortunately this steamer was so far out of her course that she struck on a rock, but, from the best information we can gather it was not due to tidal currents. However, the minister is giving the subject further consideration, and if, from the information he receives from sources in which he can place confidence it should be considered necessary to continue the survey, of course he will do so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—While it is true that the vessel left Portland for Liverpool, was she not on her way to Halifax?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, she was not to call there.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I am very glad that this subject has come up and that it has been so well presented to the House by the hon. gentleman from Pictou. I am also pleased that the Secretary of State has pointed out the cause of the loss of so valuable a vessel as the "Castilian" with her valuable cargo—that she was not leaving or approaching any harbour or the coast of Canada. The fact is, she was billed, I understand, first to either Halifax or St. John, but unfortunately she did not call at either port but after taking in cargo at Portland she set out for Liverpool. Instead of following her proper course her captain or her officers by some means got off their course nearly 100 miles, with the result that she was wrecked on the coast of Nova Scotia. I also say that no fault can be found for that wreck with Nova Scotia or its coast—no fault can be found with the approaches to either Halifax or St. John. I know that a great deal of feeling was aroused by enemies of our respective ports and against Canada, in fact, to see if they could not make out that this great ship was lost on the coast of Canada. That was not so at all. In fact she might as well have been lost on the coast of any of the West India Islands so far as the Canadian ports are concerned, she simply went out of her way and, by the finding of the commission appointed to investigate the matter the officers entirely mistook their course and got wrecked. So, hon. gentlemen will see that no fault can be found at all against any portion of the coast of Canada for the wreck of that vessel. At the same time, we should be most happy, in case the government thought fit to erect more lighthouses on the coast, but at present I do not see that there is any claim to ask for more lighthouses on the ground that accidents or misfortunes have happened on the coast of Canada recently.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—The "Castilian" called at Halifax on her way from Liverpool to Portland. She got her cargo at Portland and was not sailing for Halifax.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It was no fault of Halifax or any other Canadian port. She simply went out of her course in proceeding from Portland to Liverpool.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I never heard before that the "Castilian" deviated so far from her course as 100 miles. I have heard various distances mentioned, but none more than 25 miles. The question is, was that deviation, whether great or small, sufficient to bring that vessel within the trend of these currents of which I have spoken on the southern coast of Nova Scotia. I entertain the hope that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries may be induced, when he comes to consider the subject, to change his view with regard to the importance of this work.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I could bring the report from my office, if necessary, to show that there was no fault to be found with our ports.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I know it is slightly irregular to discuss a question after it has been answered by the government, but I trust the House will allow me to say a word or two with reference to this matter. The hon. gentleman from Pictou deserves the thanks of the Senate for bringing this important matter before us. I understood the hon. gentleman, in the course of his remarks, to refer to the proposed increase of insurance rates between Canada and England. As I understand it, the justification for this proposed increase is alleged to be found in the risks connected with the navigation of the St. Lawrence—that is the river and the gulf —and the Straits of Belle Isle.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—And St. John.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not saying anything about St. John; I am speaking of where the dangers are. I understand the government at the present time are using their best efforts to influence the Lloyds' underwriters to modify the views which they at present entertain; and I wish to direct the attention of the government to this fact that whatever justification there may be for increasing the insurance rates between England and ports on the Gulf of St. Lawrence there is no justification whatever for increasing the rates between England and the Atlantic coast of the maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Halifax?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Take Halifax and Boston, if you will, to illustrate. A steamer coming from England to Halifax follows the same course as a steamer going to Boston until within a comparatively short distance of Halifax. There are no dangers on the way into Halifax. She is sailing over the open Atlantic Ocean. If she goes on to Boston, she has to pass the southern coast of Nova Scotia and the entrance to the Bay of Fundy, where certain sources of danger are, and the risks of going to Halifax are much less than those of going to Boston, and there is no justification whatever for the insurance companies charging higher rates to a port like Halifax or any other Atlantic port of Canada than to United States ports which are further off. I trust that the government will take special pains to bring that point to the notice of the underwriters. These underwriters, I regret to say, are not always as well informed as to our geography as they might be, and it will be the duty of the government, perhaps, to give them some lessons in geography.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to know when the government intend to bring down the returns respecting the Yukon district which I asked for on the 23rd of March.

Hon Mr. SCOTT—Up to what date was it asked for? To the end of last year or December?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I forget, but I think it was December.

Hon. Mr SCOTT—I spoke to the deputy on the subject and he told me that the reports from the Yukon came in very slowly, they were always four or five months behind. I told him we were anxious to get that report?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then there was another one in reference to the number of new post offices and the number of miles travelled passed on the same day, and on the 12th April a motion was carried asking for correspondence which I know is not very long, in reference to the dismissal of Fearman Ketcheson, and on the 24th March Mr. Coste's report in reference to the Yukon. I do not suppose that this is a very long document and I see no reason why it should not be laid before Parliament at as early a day as possible. Then, also on the 24th of March a return was asked for in reference to rolling stock and the expenditure incurred in the extension of the Intercolonial Railway. That, I suppose, could be brought down at an early period. My reason for asking for these returns is that the House may be in possession of all the facts connected with these different subjects when the questions come up, should they come up in the future to be dealt with by the Senate. We have sometimes been asked to express opinions and adopt measures without having the facts in connection therewith before us, and I trust we shall not be treated in this matter as we were in some matters which never came down at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As you treated us when we were on the other side.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You should never follow bad examples. The hon. gentleman is an exceedingly apt scholar in following anything done which he thinks is wrong. Let me advise him to follow the example of those who have done right and not justify himself by saying that because one man stole a pig he must steal a ram. That is no justification.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not defending it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to place the House in a position so that if we have to discuss measures we may discuss them intelligently.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend's request is reasonable, and I hope the returns will be brought down, but I think it is travelling on an unbeaten track.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am afraid all your tracks are unbeaten and consequently very rough.

ALLEGED PLEBISCITE FRAUDS.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned Debate on the motion by the Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell, K.C.M.G.:—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, all correspondence with the government or any member thereof, relating to the subject of the introduction of a prohibitary liquor law by the government, together with all affidavids and other documents having relation to the vote cast upon the question of prohibition, on the 29th day of September, 1898, and the alleged frauds in connection therewith.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said:—In rising to make a few comments on the speech delivered by the hon. leader of the opposition yesterday, I cannot but express my surprise, and I may also add my regret, that a gentleman occupying the position he does in this chamber should have allowed himself to be the medium of sending broadcast over this country slanderous charges that he knew had been contradicted in another place. The Minister of Agriculture had absolutely denied the truth of the statements, and yet this report was given to the world for the first time through the speech of the hon. gentleman yesterday. We all know very well that persons read those reports who never see the denial of them. The answer is not as interesting. People in this world are rather fond of slander, and the majority of people, I am sorry to say, read it with a great deal of gratification, and they either decline or do not care about reading the absolute denial of the statement. The hon. gentleman himself quoted the Minister of Agriculture as having risen in his place in the House and assumed the authority for an absolute denial of the statements therein set forth. The paper to which he referred, that report of Parent, had never been presented to the government; it had never left the parties to whom it was made. They had themselves discovered a very few days after the report was made that they had simply been betrayed and deceived by an adventurer who got from them a certain sum of money and sent in a fictitious report, and this fictitious report has now gone abroad over the length of the country, slandering the people of Lower Canada, representing that they are not worthy of the franchise given to them, that the officers who were appointed to discharge the high duties failed in their work, officers who under the law are liable to a very severe penalty, the payment of $1,000 fine and six months imprisonment. That has gone all over this country now. The Alliance declined to give publicity to that document. They declined to allow a copy of it even to be left with the Minister of Agriculture, who took a great deal of interest in that subject. When Mr. Carson, representing the Dominion Alliance, first brought under the notice of the Minister of Agriculture the fact that, in his judgment, and from reports that came to his hands, serious frauds had been committed in the province of Quebec, the minister naturally asked for the names of the persons. It was asserted that members of this government were implicated, that members of Parliament were implicated, that they had been a party to this serious and wholesale fraud. The names were withheld. Finally, when the second and third reports came in, Carson came to Ottawa and saw Mr. Fisher, and Mr. Fisher asked him to show him the report. Mr. Carson declined to part with the report; he did not wish to part with it; he was afraid there was something wrong. However he gave him then and there in Mr. Fisher's own office the names of the deputy returning officers, and other information contained in this report was taken down by the minister's secretary and the clerks were sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to test the correctness of the statements that were made, and it was found that the whole thing was an absolute tissue of falsehood conceived in the brain of the man who probably received a pretty large sum for it, and who handed in this report which has now gone forth to the people of Canada as a statement worthy at least of credence. I have here the advance copy of the report from the Printing Bureau. I had never seen the report, never heard of it even until it was read here yesterday and it certainly astonished and amazed me. The impression was created that a report had been furnished to the government and the government proposed to take some action. Mr. Fisher may have mentioned that there was a report, but I never heard of it and it had not been brought up. It commences by stating that he had visited the counties of Beauce, Montmorency, and Kamouraska. He professes to have done that some time in the month of February.

I began my investigation in the counties of Quebec on Friday, 17th of February last."

That report is dated the 4th or 6th March. In the typewritten copy it is the 6th March. He says: "I began my examination of the plebiscite vote, etc.; I visited the parish of Beaupré" and so on. And then he goes on to describe what he did. Would the hon. gentleman believe that at this time Parent was an employee in the Ottawa Post Office? He was paid $1.25 a day, and his whole duty was cancelling stamps. He was regarded as a man not safe to trust with any other work, and he was there for some time. The very moment this report was sent in he no doubt recognized that his fraud had been discovered and went off to the States somewhere, I suppose. An insinuation was conveyed across the House that he was in the employ of this government or the government of one of the provinces. The question was put on the paper. Well, my hon. friend was able distinctly to deny that statement. I stated that I heard he had been in the post office for a short time doing the work I have just now indicated. He was not employed by the province of Quebec. My hon. friend endeavoured to make it appear that the two governments were acting in collusion, that these gross frauds were being perpetrated with the sanction of the governments at Quebec and Ottawa. I am sorry the hon. gentleman holds either government at that low estimate. I think it is exceedingly unworthy of any hon. gentleman to make a statement of that kind unless there is some foundation for it. I have here the statement prepared at the time Mr. Carson came to Ottawa to test the correctness of the return made. In his report he gives the name of the returning officer. He commences with the electoral district of Quebec, and for poll No. 1, gives the name Béchard at Beaupré. There was no such man as Béchard among the returning officers. The returning officer at that poll was Langevin. At the other poll he gave the name Ernest Dubé, whereas the deputy returning officer was Edward Giroux. At another district he gives the name of Victor Debarr, whereas the name was Honoré Gobeil. At another place he names Onésime Lacroix whereas the deputy returning officer was C. F. Wolfe. At that particular poll my hon. friend took the trouble to read with a great deal of interest the passage in which Parent said that the interest taken in the plebiscite was very light—so light that only five or six voters cast their ballots during the day, that the people have been accustomed to being bought, and they consider, even now, that the election agent should be around with large rolls of money to give them a little of it, and they concluded to keep away. The hon. gentleman in reading that allows it to go forth into the country that that is the condition of this particular place and at other places in Lower Canada, that the people are purchasable. Is that the opinion the hon. gentleman wishes should be formed of that province? It is very much to be regretted that a statement such as that should go abroad on the authority of a man not worthy of credence, a man of the lowest type who obtained money under false pretenses by writing a report of what occurred in the province of Quebec while he was an employee in the Ottawa post office. In February he was only out of the office two days. I sent to the inspector to make inquiries as to the number of days he was absent in February and March until he left. He was absent on February 17th and 18th and he was absent on the 1st, 6th and 7th of March. During all that time he professes to have been travelling through Lower Canada in the various counties enumerated in this report and getting all this information, and there is not a single case in Kamouraska, Rimouski, Temiscouata or any of these counties where he gives the correct name of the returning officer. In all the inquiries which have been made with reference to the deputy returning officers there is not a single returning officer of the name given by Parent.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Does he come near the facts in reference to the polls?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He describes what occurred and speaks of persons as witnesses. There were no persons of that name in the place. He gives polls where no polls existed at all. In the county of Beauce he describes what occurred at the poll at St. Antoine and there was no poll held there; in Arthabaska and Drummondville he describes what occurred at St. Flavien, and there was no poll there. He drew on his imagination for the whole report. He never saw the people he professed to see, and he did not even take the trouble to have the names of the deputy returning officers correct, because in every single case he is wrong, and the names he has given were not deputy returning efficers at all in that division, showing that the man drew on his imagination for the facts. In order to give importance to this man the hon. gentleman said he had been a Liberal organizer in Quebec. I have made inquiries of several of my colleagues. Mr. Fisher ought to know if he was employed in the Eastern Townships, because he was specially referred to as having been the organizer in the Eastern Townships, and Mr. Fisher never saw him there. Another colleague, who has taken an active part in the elections in Quebec, says the only thing he knew of the man was that he came in one day to his office and he ordered him out. He said he had always regarded him as a drunken tramp. That is the man whose report has been over the country defaming the people of Quebec as being guilty of corruption. And we are asked to issue a commission to investigate charges from such a source. I do not think it is necessary for me to make any further comments. Hon. gentlemen can see the papers up stairs. The officer who prepares those papers is an officer of Parliament, Major Chapleau, and a good part of this document is in his own handwriting.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose you will lay that on the table.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know that I should. If the hon. gentleman desires to see it I have no objection. I state the fact that the returning officers named in Parent's report are not deputy returning officers in the division; not only are they not in the particular polls but they are not deputy returning officers in the electoral divisions at all. I do not think it should be necessary to go further than that. The hon. gentleman's statements are not borne out by the facts. The vote in the province of Quebec was not unduly large. It was not as large as the vote in Ontario. I have the exact figures. In many of the polls the vote was exceedingly small. The vote for prohibition in the province of Quebec was only about $\frac{1}{12}$ one-twelfth of the entire vote of the province. In Quebec the proportion of the vote varies just as much as in Ontario. The whole vote was 335,000 and only a small portion of that vote was for prohibition. In some portions of Ontario 50 per cent came to the poll and voted: in other portions the percentage ran down as low as 30. The highest vote in Ontario is 54 per cent and that was in the city of Hamilton. In the province of Quebec the proportion that voted was comparatively small in many places. In Champlain only 36 per cent and in Hochelaga—I think that was one of the constituencies mentioned—the proportion of voters was only 33 per cent. In Gaspé the proportion of those who voted both pro and con was 30 per cent. So all through the list on the general result the proportion of voters in the province of Quebec was less than the proportion of voters in Ontario. So far as ballot stuffing was concerned, I got the memorandum from one or two of the polls mentioned; I think two polls were mentioned in the extract from the Ottawa Journal. In No. 1 poll, Quebec, the number on the list was 177 and the number polled 111, and in 1896 the number of voters on the roll was 167 and the number that voted 138. So that the number of votes polled was less than at the last election. Three Rivers was also named in the report. It was said there had been ballot stuffing there. The whole number on the roll was 4,176 and the number of votes was very small. The number who voted at the last election was double the number who voted on the plebiscite. At the place where they charge ballot stuffing, the proportion of persons who voted was less than the proportion of persons who voted in 1896. The question had no bearing whatever on the policy adopted by the government, whether the vote was larger or smaller as far as the majority was concerned. That was not the guiding influence in the decision the government came to. As hon. gentlemen will remember, from the letter sent by the Premier to Mr. Spence, the president of the Alliance, the Premier put it on the ground that there had been no sufficient demand from the people of Canada for a prohibitory liquor law. It was less than 23 per cent of the whole vote of Canada, irrespective of the majority. The government did not consider that where only 23 per cent of the people of Canada asked for an exceptional law which was going to interfere with the opinions and views of a large majority of the people of the country, that this government, or any other government would be justified in granting prohibition. The result of the figures shows that the temperance feeling had not permeated generally over Canada, but had been more active in some localities than in others. The vote varied largely; in some localities the vote was strongly against prohibition and in others moderately for prohibition, but in no case was there such an overwhelming majority as to justify any action on the part of the government. Certainly with the Province of Quebec vote so largely against it, and with so small a number asking for a prohibitory law, neither this government nor any government would be justified in submitting to Parliament a prohibitory liquor law. I do not propose to go at greater length into this matter. I have shown sufficiently the facts that ought to convince any gentleman that there was no sort of foundation in the statement made in the report yesterday, I have shown that it was an unfair statement to make, reflecting on the sister province of Quebec. It was sprung upon the House and the government. It was a report that had never emanated from the association for which it was prepared, and I doubt very much whether the leaders of that association will be gratified to know the use which has been made of it. It was assumed that the government was in possession of it because they moved for affidavits and statements. Now, no protest or affidavit or statement of any kind had come to the government. It would naturally come to me. I had been the particular official charged with the taking of the plebiscite and I think if the members of the Alliance are consulted they will see that every possible opportunity was given to secure a fair and impartial vote on that subject. Instructions were sent to the returning officers all over the country to say that they must accept the nominees of the Alliance as representing the organization in any particular locality, where the officers of the Alliance had submitted any particular agent, even though they were not belonging to the locality, in order that there should be no possibility of fault being found with the manner in which the vote was taken. It meant paying out a lot of money and in some places they were not able to send out agents, but they had the authority that any-one authorized by the Alliance to occupy the place of agent at the booth should be recognized in order that there should be no imputation that an unfair advantage had been taken of those advocating the prohibitary law. I understand this man left the Ottawa post office on the 11th of March. That would be about the time his last report came in. He was only absent from the office two days in February when he was supposed to be making a tour to Quebec, and was absent on the 17th and 18th, and absent on the 1st and 6th of March. The second report is dated either the 1st or 2nd, and professes to be sent from Montreal. The second letter was on the 6th. I suppose he went to Montreal to draw his money. He left the post office on the 18th of March. I understand that Mr. Carson was anxious to find out his whereabouts in order that some prosecution should take place. I do not know whether he received any money. He did not make that elaborate report as a prohibitionist, because in the letter from the inspector at Ottawa, he says:—"Although he had the appearance of being a hard drinker, he was not, I understand, under the influence of liquor on duty." The post office people will not admit he was under the influence of liquor on duty. They said he could not be trusted with money on any occasion. I understood he took part in the election in the county of Ottawa on the other side. That is the only election I have any knowledge of his taking part in.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not my intention to find fault with the speech the hon. gentleman has made, except as to the attempt to fasten a charge upon me which is not justified, and if it were parliamentary I should use a much stronger word. I know it would be unparliamentary to say the remarks of the hon. gentleman were disingenuous.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No one in this chamber heard that report till the hon. gentleman gave it publicity.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am speaking of the hon. gentleman's speech in which he referred to me and not to the report. If the statements which the hon. gentleman has made is correct, he and the government and the whole country should be thankful that the matter has been brought before this legislative body, in order that the truth may be set forth and all know it. The hon. gentleman premised his remarks by assuming that all my action was based on Parent's report. I had not seen that report when I put that notice upon the paper. I called attention to these frauds because a responsible and respectable gentleman, so far as I know, whose respectability has not been impugned by the hon. gentleman who has spoken or byanybody else. Mr. Webster, the vice-president of the Alliance in the province of Quebec, made the charges and had them published to the world. That was the basis upon which I asked the question and made the motion placed on the paper, and not upon the report to which the hon. gentleman has referred and for which he attempts to hold me responsible, a report made by a man whom he says is a most disreputable character but who was in their employment for a long time. I did not say that he was appointed an immigrant agent by this government. This gentleman, Mr. Webster, states that, and it was commenting on this statement of Webster, that led me to ask the question whether he was really in the employ of the government; and certainly, not knowing the reputation of the man, those people who read the statement might naturally infer that if he had been in the employ of the government it was not unreasonable to suppose that he had been sent out of the country as an emigration agent. I did not say he was appointed an emigrant agent. Mr. Webster said so, and it was on that I based my remark, and not on the statement of this man Parent; but I read Parent's statement and report in order that the people of Canada might know what basis Mr. Webster had for the charges he made. The hon. gentleman has given an explanation which I am bound to accept as correct, and accepting it as correct, it only verifies what I said yesterday, that Parent must be a consummate rascal, and ought to be immediately, if he made affidavit to the truth of what he reported, be ferreted out, no matter where he is, and prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law, and that would be a total acquittal of the people of Quebec in those sections of the province where this man alleges these frauds were committed. One cannot help marvelling at the apparent simplicity of the Secretary of State, when he talks of frauds at elections, in view of what occurred recently in Ontario, and if I refer to that it is not to cast any stigma on the people of Ontario. In the last Ontario election men were appointed scrutineers and returning officers whom nobody knew. Perhaps the courts will find out when the cases come before them. The fact that this statement has been made in the public press, and is now repeated by me, if we were to draw the conclusions the hon. gentleman has drawn from my remarks, would be construed into an attack on the whole people of Ontario. We know the courts have established the fact that frauds have occurred in different parts of the country, and I fancy they will occur in the future. If they have not occurred in the province of Quebec to the extent to which Mr. Webster says they have occurred, based on the report which my hon. friend says he has in his hand, it is no crime on the part of public or private men to bring that under the notice of the legislature in order that the people who have been slandered may be acquitted of the crimes of which they have been accused. That is my position in reference to this matter and I ask the hon. gentleman in future, when he refers to any remarks that I may have made, not to draw inferences from them which the language does not justify, and that he will not impute to me motives which I did not entertain. I never intimated that the government of the province of Quebec had appointed this man—my question was this, was he appointed by you or by any one else? I can readily understand how these matters might be done. I did not mention the province of Quebec, neither did I impute anything to the people of the province of Quebec. Perhaps if I were dealing with them I might entertain the opinion of the hon. gentleman opposite. An experience of thirty or forty years of public life has led me to conclusions as to what the party to which the hon. gentleman belonged would do, and those conclusions are that I should not be astonished at anything they might do to secure an election.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I owe it to the House to give my experience of the man whose name has been brought before the Senate in this discussion. I saw in the Montreal Gazette that the hon. gentleman from Belleville had declared that Parent had been a political organizer in the province of Quebec. I may give my experience of that man Parent. I met him at Ottawa—saw him at the Russell House dogging the steps of members of Parliament during the time the local elections of the province of Quebec were held. Decidedly, he was looking for a position from the Federal Government. His claim was that he was a son of the late local member from Rimouski in the Quebec House. He asked all those whose faces he knew for support in getting a position under the government. When the local elections came on I had the management of the provincial elections in the district of Montreal, and I received letters nearly every day from Parent asking to be employed as an electioneering agent or speaker during that election.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—He was another Pigott.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—He was so persistent that one day, finding that no one wanted to go to the back of Ottawa County from Montreal—no gentlemen caring to leave his office to go on that journey, I wired Parent to come to Montreal. He said he could make a speech. I gave him some money to go to Labelle and speak for the local candidate in the back parts of Ottawa County. Two or three days afterwards I met friends who had gone to speak at St. Agathe—which is a large village in the mountains of Terrebonne County—asking me if I had sent a man named Parent on a certain errand. I said yes, and I expected he would have passed through St. Agathe to go to the mountains, but they reported that he was staying at the hotel at St. Agathe, and was drunk, extremely so. He ran out of money and showed himself again a week or so afterwards at my office in Montreal. I asked him if he had accomplished his errand—if he had gone to Labelle and other places to speak, and he said he had. I told him I knew better—that I knew of his conduct in St. Agathe. He broke down and said really the roads were bad, and not only had he broken down but the cart had broken down and he had remained at St. Agathe. That was my experience of the man who was employed by the Dominion Alliance to further the interests of prohibition in the province of Quebec. I am not surprised that coming back to Ottawa he should have succeeded by laying, siege at the door of every minister, in getting an appointment at a dollar a day for a few months, but I thought I owed it to the province of Quebec to state what I know personally of the man who signed that document. I must add that I saw him again two or three weeks before the vote on the plebiscite. He passed at my office and told me that Major Bond had met him and had made an agreement with him to try to get representatives to the polls. He said he got $200 for that. He smelled of liquor at the time, and I thought he would cut quite a figure as a temperance man in the counties where he was going.

I would crave the indulgence of this chamber while I say a few words concerning the way—the shabby way—in which the province of Quebec has been treated since the 29th of September, on its stand upon that plebiscite. Since it was taken the prohibitionist papers have been proclaiming that Quebec had voted for the grog shop. The most respectable of them all, the Witness, had an article headed with these words: "Quebec Votes for the Rum Shop or the Grog Shop." I took occasion to step into Mr. Dougall's office to tell him that he did not know anything of the province of Quebec if he brought such an accusation against the province in which he lived; that far from patronizing the saloon the province was waging war against it, that there was not one-fourth of the municipalities which granted license; that there were less licenses in Quebec in proportion to the population than in any other province of the Dominion; fewer prisoners in the jails than in any other province in the Dominion; fewer crimes, and that he should know that if a vote was taken in the province of Quebec upon the question of closing the grog shops or keeping them open, there would be a large vote in favour of closing them; but the question submitted went further than the people were ready to go. Before last September the word prohibition had never reached the ears of the French population. The people of the province of Quebec are educated by the press, and by what they read, and there never was any attempt made by the French newspapers to educate the people in favour of prohibition. They wanted to know what was the extent of the prohibition which was to be imposed. If it had been to wipe out the grog shops they would have voted yes, but when they were told that it was to give the government of the day the right to say what was to be drunk in their own homes and at their own tables they said emphatically no: and without years of an educational movement, such as has taken place in the other provinces, in Quebec, if you ask the people if they want prohibition, if you take a plebiscite again, when an election is on, it is not a majority of 95,000 or 96,000 but a majority of 200,000 you will have against it. The French Canadian population has never discussed or heard discussed the question of prohibition. They are satisfied to protect their young men by refusing licenses in the municipalities, and they want to have the right to say what they shall eat and drink in their own homes without interference or control by the federal or local powers.

It is not the only libel which has been directed against the province of Quebec. As soon as the result of the vote was announced the prohibitionist press and the Conservative press throughout the Dominion declared that the Province of Quebec, at the command of the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, was voting against prohibition and had not yet stopped voting. It is strange that such an accusation should have been persisted in, when the press of the Dominion on the 4th October published the result of the voting up to that date as follows—I am giving the majorities in the several provinces:—Quebec, 51,200 against; and for: Ontario, 17,582; Nova Scotia, 17,840; New Brunswick, 13,715; Prince Edward Island, 6,160; Manitoba, 5,099; North-west Territories, 1,992; British Columbia, 538, which showed that on the 4th of October, the majorities in favour of prohibition amounted to 69,926, and against prohibition, in the province of Quebec 51,000. As the returns came in the majorities increased throughout the length and breadth of Canada, but all eyes were turned towards Quebec with great amazement when the majority against prohibition in that province jumped from 51,000 to 94,000, but there was no surprise expressed that the majorities in the other provinces in favour of prohibition should have increased from 62,000 to 112,000. Quebec was the only province that was libelled. The other provinces were regarded as being naturally virtuous, because, as the returns came in, the majorities in favour of prohibition increased. I have given the majorities published on the 4th October from a Toronto telegram published in La Presse. Now, what was the vote in the province of Quebec? If we exclude the English-speaking counties, not two per cent of the electors recorded their votes in favour of prohibition. But it has been said that on the 4th of October the vote was still going on against prohibition. This is tantamount to accusing thousands of citizens who acted as returning-officers of being perjurers. You find, in looking at the details of the plebiscite in the province of Quebec, that the vote recorded was very small in favour of prohibition in every polling division, running from nothing to eight or ten in all but the English communities. We have been told that some partizan opponents of the present government, who take their glass every day of the year, voted for prohibition. That would perhaps represent a portion of the two per cent who voted for prohibition. We have this result that the Province of Quebec—the French Canadian portion of it—voted nearly to a man against prohibition. There are hon. gentlemen here from Quebec who do not belong to my race who can testify to the sobriety of the French Canadians, who know, for instance, what is the experience of the employers of labour on that pont. I have the testimony of many manufacturers in Montreal. Take for instance Alderman Ames, whose father employed hundreds of men in his boot and shoe factory: he told me that the majority of the employes in the factory were French Canadians, who were paid every Saturday night, and they could always be depended upon to turn up, ready for work on Monday morning. As a matter of fact, the Dominion Alliance could find but two volunteers to stump the Province of Quebec in favour of prohibition. One was Dr. Desrosiers, of Montreal, and the other Mr. Augé, a member of parliament from Shefford, both Liberals, showing that their convictions were not affected by any thought that they might help or injure the government. They were the only two men, at all known in the Province of Quebec, who spoke publicly in favour of prohibition.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Who stumped against prohibition?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I do not know that there was any stumping against prohibition. If the electors had taken any interest in the matter the majority against prohibition would not have been 94,000 but over 200,000 in the Province of Quebec. How can there be, under such circumstances, any question as to legislating in favour of prohibition? I say there cannot be any national prohibition with a whole province—an important province like Quebec—wholly against prohibition. It cannot be, because this Chamber would not allow it. When we, French Canadians, entered Confederation we took it for granted that our customs and habits would be respected, that there were certain questions of general importance which would be settled by the majority, but that questions affecting the habits and private lives of the people would not be dealt with by the Federal Parliament. I wonder where restrictions and blue laws would carry us! Hon. gentlemen may say: But what will you do against the majority? The majority has a right to interfere in a certain number of well-defined questions, but I wonder if the majority can interfere in all questions which pertain to social, and more especially domestic life. We have to-day the question of the liquid we drink. If the doctors of this Dominion should unanimously decide that dumplings and cucumbers were detrimental to health, I wonder if the majority in this Dominion could declare that dumplings and cucumbers should no more be eaten by our people.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Why was the plebiscite taken?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.—To ascertain if there was a general sentiment of the people in favour of prohibition throughout the Dominion. It is not a question whether one-half of the community want prohibition; it is to know if ninety or ninety-five per cent of the people are in favour of prohibition, because then I would consider that the small percentage of the voters who would say no, would have to yield to the overwhelming desire of the majority. But when you have half the vote polled and only about one-third of the inscribed vote favouring prohibition, can we reasonably be asked to force the views of a small minority of the people upon the unwilling population of the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec will not tamely submit to such a treatment. If the Commons attempted to coerce our people we would look to this Chamber, which was originally constituted mainly for the protection of minorities, to see that such an obnoxious legislation should not be forced upon us.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.—That will be good for the reform of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.—I will judge of the work of this Chamber by my personal experience as to the way it votes on such vital questions; but I have never said that a second chamber is not a useful institution in Canada. On the contrary, I have had occasion to declare that while I favour an elective Senate—elected to the second degree—I do not approve of the abolition of the Upper House.

I have already mentioned things that might be prohibited on the ground that they are a detriment to the public health. I wonder how the Englishman would like to take his national pudding without rum, and, in case the doctors decided to prohibit the pudding itself, how he would put up with such a restriction upon his domestic habits.

Now, as to the honesty of the vote taken, I will say two or three words, and I shall close: hon. gentlemen who live in rural districts will bear me out when I say that personation, or telegraphing as it is popularly called, is unknown in rural constituencies. In large cities, where the voter does not know his neighbour, it does occur, but in country districts, where there is a polling place for every 200 electors and where every one knows who is entitled to vote, personation is impossible. There has been no personation in the rural constituencies of Quebec, nor can there be any, I should think, in any rural constituency in Canada. If hon. gentlemen will look at the returns they will find that in the plebiscite vote in the province of Quebec there was a normal vote given at each poll—the whole list was not voted—there was a certain percentage only that voted and that percentage was pretty much the same in all the counties, from Soulanges to the Gulf. Before closing I should like to answer the charge which the hon. gentleman from Hastings (Sir M. Bowell) made that federal liberals and local liberals often conspire together. There is a certain amount of hypocrisy in such a charge as though it were a great crime for a liberal in federal politics to help his comrade in arms in local politics. We all know that they are the same officers; that it is the same army, the same people who vote at the polls under the two political flags which cover the electors of the Dominion. I am quite sure that the hon. gentleman from Hastings will poll a good honest conservative vote for the local conservative candidate in his county at the next election, as I shall do myself on the other side in my county, and will go perhaps a few miles for the purpose of doing so. We all know that liberalism is the same everywhere, and conservatism is very likely the same everywhere. There is one exception—it appears that conservatism is not the same in New Brunswick as in the other provinces, because there the party lines are not adhered to as they are elsewhere; but speaking generally, we all know that the Liberal electors who generally poll their vote for Liberal candidates in federal elections, vote also for Liberal candidates in provincial elections, and it is mere hypocricy to say that it should be otherwise. We all know that the leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, Sir Charles Tupper, when the Ontario House opened at its last session, came down to Montreal to ask Mr. Dalby, of the Star, to try and prevent the Constables' Bill from being passed in the local House, and that the Star then attended more closely to Ontario politics than any of the Ontario papers did throughout the session. Mr. Dalby was then qualifying as organizer in chief of the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec. Sir Charles Tupper at the time, passed the word to his followers that in order to again reach power at Ottawa war should first be waged against the Provincial Liberal Government. Well, he is welcome to do it. He is a provincial elector himself in Nova Scotia, but the electors there did not seem to side with him much in the last election. We all know that it is mere hypocricy to say that party lines are not drawn the same way in provincial as they are in federal politics.

Hon. M. PERLEY—The debate has taken a little wider range than I anticipated. I might say, in behalf of the temperance people who employed this gentleman, Parent, to make some inquiries with regard to how the vote was conducted in Quebec, that if they had known as much about the reform party before as they do now they would not have employed him, because he proved himself to be a disreputable character. He was one of the liberal organizers in the last election. I might remind hon. gentlemen opposite that honesty is the best policy, and if they had practised that principle from the start they would not be in the dilemma they are now in all over the country with so many broken promises staring them in the face. When the temperance people waited on the late Sir John Thompson, he gave them a fair and honest opinion. He said he did not think the country was ready for prohibition and he held out no inducement that his government would legislate in that direction. He told the people what they might depend upon—that he would not undertake to pass a prohibitory law. That was an honest, straightforward decision, and the hon. gentlemen opposite would have done well if they had acted upon that same policy and not undertaken to humbug the temperance people as they did. I do not believe in every little fad being taken up by a government with a view to strengthening their support. There are two great parties in the country, divided upon the trade policy, and to bring in these side issues that are not practical, is not conducive to good government. After hearing the remarks made by Sir John Thompson on the subject, of prohibition, the temperance people—respectable people who have the welfare of the people at heart—admitted that he was an honest man who had given them a straightforward answer, and a reply which hon. gentlemen opposite now admit was a reasonable one. But the leaders of the Opposition of that day were determined to get into power at all costs, so they promised the temperance people that a plebiscite would be taken on the question of prohibition, and that if the people decided in favour of it a prohibitory liquor law would be passed. If they had told the temperance people then that they would require 50 per cent of all the votes on the lists to be cast in favour of prohibition, no action would have been taken by the temperance people to obtain votes. If they had said that they were going to use all the influence of the Government against prohibition in the province of Quebec, there would have been further reason for the temperance people declining to spend time or money in trying to carry prohibition. Who would undertake to secure 50 per cent of all the votes in Canada in favour of prohibition with all the influence of the Government thrown against it? The Government have spent two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the people's money in taking a vote on a measure that they knew they never intended should become law. I asked the hon. Secretary of State in this Chamber, when the Plebiscite Bill was before us, what percentage of the vote they would want in order to give us prohibition, and he would not tell me. The same question was asked in the other House and no information was given. They said that the vote was to be taken on the basis of the Dominion election. That was misleading, because in a Dominion election the candidate who receives a majority of the votes cast is declared elected. No candidate is expected to receive a majority of all the votes on the list. The Government are willing to promise now that if the temperance people can get 50 per cent of all the votes on the voters' lists prohibition will be granted. I say that the temperance people will never get it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Because they cannot get 50 per cent?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am glad to hear it.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—With the Government working against prohibition, it was impossible to get a majority in favour of it. Had they been honest and told the people that they could not give prohibition, that would have ended the matter for the time being, and the temperance people would have gone on educating the people. But honourable gentlemen opposite did in that case just as they have done in every other case. They went to the country on three distinct propositions: one was the trade policy—we were to have free trade, as they have it in Great Britain. They humbugged the people on that. Not only have they not given us free trade as they have it in Great Britain, but they have made no perceptible decrease in the tariff. Another proposition was to give the temperance people prohibition, if a majority should be favourable to it. They have not done that, and they do not intend to do it. Then a third proposition was to settle the school question to the satisfaction of the minority in Manitoba. How have they carried out their pledges in that regard? They have not done anything. All their promises have been disregarded, and their policy is to see how they can best justify themselves before the country. They have broken every promise, and I say their course on the prohibition question is an insult to the temperance people of the country. The Government have done them a wrong. If they had been honest and told them what they intended to do, the prohibitionists would not have been put to trouble and expense for nothing. I have as much respect for a Frenchman as for any other citizen of Canada. He is a man who can vote upon his principle as well as any other man. It is an outrage to speak of him as they do. They try to bring up racial and religious cry. I think it is an outrage to appeal to the passions of the people rather than to their sense of justice. I say the Government have done wrong in dallying with the temperance people as they have done. The temperance people are working for the good of the country and should be treated squarely and not put to trouble needlessly by reason of the Government not carrying out their pledges.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would ask the Secretary of State whether the statements in this paper, which he kindly allowed me to look at, has been made up from official sources with regard to the returning officers?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes. It was made up in Mr. Chapleau's department. I sent to have it checked over.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It has been made up from official sources?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think then, that being the case, and my hon. friend having made strong statements about its contradicting this much abused report of Parent's, in all fairness it should be placed on the table of the House. We are furnished here by a minister of the Government, with what purports to be a statement made up from official sources. My hon. hon. friend confirms that view.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I quoted that to show that the names of the deputy returning officers given in this report of Parent's were incorrect. I went no further than that. It was limited to that entirely.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend gives us exact information as to how he got the details. As a member of the government he got them from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I used it only as far as the deputy returning officers were concerned. I did not analyse it further.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But we must go further, because his statement had reference not only to the deputy returning officers, but also to the polls in which they acted. For instance, Mr. Langevin was put down here for No. 4 poll. He meant he was making a statement about the deputy returning officers and for the particular polls for which they acted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said I got the names of the returning officers to which reference was made in that report, and it was sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to check over, and in regard to some of them, I think the county of Beauce and some others, to know whether the names that are given by Parent as deputy returning officers appeared among the deputy returning officers in any part of that electoral district. In regard to Beauce I sent up for information, and I learned that none of the deputy returning officers mentioned by Parent were on the Beauce or Levis lists. There might be a discrepancy as to the particular poll, and so I was anxious to know whether in any part of the electorel district there was such a case.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend admits the point I am anxious to impress on the House. He has made statements from official sources with reference to the returning officers and the polls where they acted. The hon. gentleman having made these statements from official sources, and having used this return in his place, it should be laid on the table.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You can move for any papers you desire on this point.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not the question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will not do any more.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the hon. gentleman must act in accordance with the principles of parliamentary practice, that when a minister quotes from an official document he is bound to lay it on the table. And we shall have to appeal to the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not an official document, it is not signed by anybody and the only point I sought to establish by it, and the point I did establish, was that the deputy returning officers mentioned in the report were not the official returning officers, and that was all. It is not an official document, and I sent it across to the hon. gentleman. I stake my own reputation on the fact that what I said with reference to the returning officers is true. I do not propose to lay it on the table. Any one can look at it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend quoted it and made use of it in this House and having done so I submit, according to parliamentary practice, that the document belongs to the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They were my own notes from which I read. It is not signed and is an unofficial document.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman is very uneasy about it. But I take this ground that no member of the government has a right to use information or any public document that he is not prepared to submit to the House. He was very kind to hand it across to me. I am not sure that I have any right to refer to a line of it. If my hon. friend is right in his contention, it is not open to me to take up that document and compare it with the report.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have given my view, that it is a private memorandum made for myself, and I state that what I gave the House is strictly true and accurate.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman should wait till we charge him with saying what is not true. That is not the point. My hon. friend used a document purporting to come from officials sources. He made an explanation how it was procured. He used it in his place. I have looked at it cursorily and now the question arises, have I any right to refer to it here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You can deny it if you like.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I contend I have a right to discuss this document. The hon. gentleman sent it to me personally, and I should be sorry to have any trouble on that account.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman raise a question of order?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then let us discuss it. I beg to say that there is no ground upon which the hon. gentleman can demand that this paper be put upon the table of the House. My hon. friend makes an extract from a public document for the purpose of being used here, and the hon. gentleman if he chooses may ask that the document from which that is taken may be produced. The hon. gentleman has a right to make a motion for such a document, but he cannot ask that a mere memorandum, made by the hon. Secretary of State for his own purpose, should be laid upon the table as an official document. He cannot press that, because it is not an official document. It is a mere extract which the hon. Secretary of State makes for his own reference. If my hon. friend quotes from an official document and the hon. gentleman asks that the official document be produced, he is entitled to have it produced, but he is not entitled to call for a memorandum which the Secretary of State has made for his own information.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is simply a question as to whether the document from which the hon. gentleman has quoted is an official document. He has told the House that he procured it from an official of Parliament, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, hence it is not a private document. It is an official document, and it is laid down in Bourinot and May that if a minister of the Crown quotes from a document of that kind it must be laid on the table. It was only the day before yesterday that that question came up in the House of Commons when Mr. Fisher was discussing this same question. He was supposed to have quoted from the document from which I read in this House, and he was asked by Mr. Foster to lay it on the table. The Minister of Agriculture denied that he quoted from an official document. He was just referring to that article which appeared in the Journal and which I placed upon the records of this House, and on appeal to the Chair the Speaker decided that whenever an official document was quoted from, it must be laid on the table.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not an official document.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, yes. The hon. gentleman quoted from a document which he himself acknowledged to my hon. friend was an official document procured from an officer of the department, and it is a part of the record of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. If there is anything in that document which the hon. gentleman is afraid to have made public, then I can understand his position, but if it is a correct copy of information obtained from the official records, then it is a public document. Bourinot says:

It has been laid down by the highest authority that when a minister of the Crown quotes from a public document in the House and founds upon it an argument or assertion, that document, if called for ought to be produced.

Then your distinction is, that if you hold a document in your hand and quote from it, it cannot be laid on the table unless a motion for it is made?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What does the hon. gentlemen contend? The hon. Secretary of State has quoted from a document which is official in its character.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I say that is the position we take. The hon. gentleman says no, and says it is not an official document. We contend it is, and the hon. gentlemen having quoted from it, and having acknowledged it was an official document, as such it belongs to the House and not to the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The information which I quoted from was more than my memory could carry. This little memorandum I have in my hand may be called an official document according to the hon. gentleman's argument. I sent my secretary up to the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to ascertain whether, in the county of Beauce or the county of Lévis, the names of the deputy returning officers appearing in Parent's report were the deputy returning officers in any part of the riding. He gives me a memorandum that they are not. The hon. gentleman would contend that that is a public document on the same principle. I could not carry all I desired to convey to the House in my memory and I had a table prepared, and so far as I read I stated that the table was correct, that I had tested it with the returns in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Any hon. gentleman has access to that office, and it is open to any hon. gentleman to get the same information which I got. There is no signature to this document at all. It is a mere memorandum for my own information, and what I said to the House was that the statements, as conveyed to the House, were correct because I had a paper in my hands which had been compared with the official returns in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. I did not examine all the details in connection with the elections in those counties. I satisfied myself that the statements made were wholly imaginary, and having satisfied myself as to that I fairly concluded that this man had never gone near those counties. I did not go any further. It is not an official document any more than this other memo. Will any hon. gentleman say this slip of paper is an official document? Any hon. gentleman can take the trouble that I did. This officer is an officer of Parliament. The papers are in his office. They are not in the custody of the Crown. The Crown has no control over them. When I had the courtesy to send the document over to my hon. friend I did not think he was going to raise any question about it. The clerk has copied out a lot of information which I did not use. I simply asked for the first part of it. I did not know about the rest of the document at all.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—What objection has the hon. gentleman to having that document laid on the table of the House?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know that I have any.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In reference to the point of order that has been discussed I will quote what May says at page 321. I think it is the tenth edition:

A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House unless he is prepared to lay it upon the table. This restraint is similar to that rule of evidence in courts of law which prevents counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence. The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested and when the objection has been made in time it has been general acquiesced in.

I think it was made in time in this case.

It has also been admitted that a document that has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the House if it can be done without injury to the public interests.

No public interest could possibly be prejudiced by laying it on the table.

The same rule, however, cannot be held to apply to private letters or memorandum.

I notice that they are going to take the point that this is a private memorandum.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it is a memorandum.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If that is the view we are to take, we ought to look at the contents of it to settle that point. I take the strongest exception to its being considered, in any sense whatever, a private memorandum. Here is a case which covers the view that my hon. friend appears to take with regard to a certain document:

On the 18th May, 1865, the Attorney General, on being asked by Mr. Ferrand if he would lay upon the table a written statement and a letter to which he had referred on the previous day in answering a question relative to the Leeds Bankruptcy Court, replied that he had made a statement to the House upon his own responsibility, and that the documents he had referred to being private he could not lay them upon the table. Lord R. Cecil contended that the papers having been cited should be produced, but the speaker declared that this rule applied to public documents only.

Nothing could more clearly sustain my view than this does, and if my hon. friend takes the ground that this is a private document which we have before us I will concede the point at once, but I cannot admit anything of the kind. However, I am not disposed, unless the House desires it, to press the point any further. If my hon. friend and his colleagues are disposed to shield themselves from using the document on the ground that it is a private memorandum, I am quite willing to congratulate them on the position they take in the matter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend cannot acquiesce in that way. He has raised the question of order and that must by disposed of.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then we must refer to the Speaker, and the Speaker cannot possibly deal with this matter unless he sees the document.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend cannot take that for granted. I am prepared to listen to him until he has completed his argument.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I take the ground that this document is of a public character and that my hon. friend having quoted from it, having admitted that it was official, obtained from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, the proper custodian of that information, he is bound to present it to the House because it is a public document and cannot be regarded as one of a private charter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say that when my hon. friend beside me undertook to give to the House information in defence of the line of argument which he was taking, that it rested upon public documents, that is on the returns in the hands of an officer of this House, it was open to the hon. gentleman to say you must not refer to that return unless the return itself is produced; but my hon. friend did not raise that question, and I think it is quite as well that he did not, because my hon. colleague made extracts from the document and has made his notes in addition to those extracts and used them in his argument in this House—it is a part of his argument. It is not a public document, but one that he has himself prepared for his own information, and therefore is not of that official character which would entitled any member of the House to demand that it should be laid on the table. I have said that if the hon. gentleman wanted the document to which my hon. colleague referred, he is entitled to get it, and if my hon. friend had a public document in his hand, instead of extracts from it and his own notes upon the extracts—

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No notes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If my hon. colleague had been quoting from a public document, a despatch or any official communication, in the custody of the Crown it would have been the right of the hon. gentleman to ask that that communication be laid on the table of the House, where it would be accessible to everybody. My hon. colleague has quoted from a document not in the custody of the Crown, but of Parliament, and so far as this information was obtained, placed it in the hands of my hon. friend opposite, furnished him every facility which he would have possessed if the document had been laid on the table of the House; but when my hon. friend demands, as a matter of right, that these extracts which my hon. friend has obtained from a document already in the custody of Parliament should be placed on the table of the House as a public document, my hon. colleague rightly objects to that course. What he was willing to concede as a matter of courtesy, and what was a matter of courtesy, he is not compelled to do under the rules of the House.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD(B.C.)—I think the question hinges on the reply of the Secretary of State. He was asked if it was a public document, and he replied that it was.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—He said it was taken from a public document.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, that is correct, taken from a public document, with my own notes upon it. Here are my own notes on it.

The SPEAKER—In my opinion a distinction must be drawn between a public document and an extract from a public document which a member may use in his argument. I do not see any authority which would force a member who declares that the paper from which he quotes contains extracts from a public document that he got for his own use, to lay those extracts before the House. I do not think that the quotation from May, cited by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, applies to this case. If the hon. member had produced a despatch or a document officially signed, he would not be allowed to use it unless he would be prepared to lay it before the House, but in my opinion an extract from a public document is not a paper which he could be compelled to lay before the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friends in the government might have taken a different course in regard to this document, and I am surprised that they have not done so, because my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, made very extended remarks based on this document. On the strength of it he made a general declaration that every single statement contained in Parent's report respecting the deputy returning officers was false.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear, I made that statement and I stand by it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend is very valiant after the Speaker's ruling. I glanced over the document hurriedly, and I say that it does not confirm my hon. friend's statement. There are discrepancies, no doubt, and in some places flat contradictions in the document, but the statement which I saw does not warrant my hon. friend in saying that there is a flat and pointed contradiction to every statement made by Parent. I am not a defender of this man, and have no particular interest in defending him. He was not long ago, a trusted official of the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He was only employ ployed a few weeks in the post office.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says it was only a very short time. I do not care how long the date of contamination existed, but he was in their employ at one time, and they must have trusted him and known something about him or they would not have employed him. Not long before that he had been in the employ of the Liberal party as an organizer. I agree with my hon. friend from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) that the Dominion Alliance have been the victims of misplaced confidence in a great many respects. They evidently believed the promises of hon. gentlemen opposite that they would ascertain the will of the people and abide by it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says no; does he say that the government were not prepared to abide by the will of the people.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, by the will of the people.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The Minister of Agriculture, in a speech at the Ottawa Convention of the Liberal party, in 1893, when he submitted the plebiscite resolution, said that they would ascertain the will of the people and would carry out the expressed will of the people, and my hon. friend need not contradict that state ment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell us what the will of the people is on the subject of prohibition?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend need not attempt to draw a red herring across the trail. The point I am particularly interested in making now is that the Dominion Temperance Alliance have been the victims of misplaced confidence in regard to the plebiscite. They have been still further the victims of misplaced confidence in thinking that an official appointed and employed by this government would be trustworthy in collecting information with regard to the doings of this same government. They evidently thought he was reliable, and in that respect they have again been the victims of misplaced confidence. They thought an organizer of the Liberal party would be reliable——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He is no organizer.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I never saw this man Parent and know nothing about him. I have had no opportunity of reading his report, but I have glanced through the document from which my hon. friend opposite drew his inspiration when he said that every single statement in that report with respect to the deputy returning officers is absolutely untrue, and I say that if it is untrue the hon. gentleman will have to get more information and further evidence than is contained in that document to prove that it is untrue. That is the only point that I wish to make, with regard to this question, and I only add that we all know very well that it is always the nature of crime to conceal itself. A man who commits a fraud will take every means to cover up that fraud. It is no easy task to follow up election frauds in any case, even in a contested election. Any one who has had anything to do with this business knows that it is very hard to get information; you may be sure that gross corruption and frauds have been practised, but those who commit the frauds cover up their tracks and it is hard to get evidence of their guilt. It does not prove that no frauds were committed in connection with the plebiscite in the province of Quebec because this man, who spent only some five or six days in making the inquiry, was not precise in the statements he made. On the contrary, there is pretty strong evidence in the anxiety shown by my hon. friend that this document should not be fully and freely analysed and discussed in this House, that he is not himself very sure that frauds were not committed extensively in the plebiscite election.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, 20th April, 1899.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

COLD STORAGE ON STEAMERS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to:

Ask the government whether the steamers "Lake Winnipeg" and "Gaspesia," which made calls at the port of Charlottetown during the autumn of 1898, were fitted with cold storage facilities? If so, what was the nature of the cold storage provided, when was the said cold storage plant placed on these steamships, and at what cost, if any, to the government of Canada?

What subsidy was paid for each trip of the above-named steamships?

He said:—In connection with this inquiry I wish to state to the House, and to the leader of the House more particularly, that the service of these steamers in calling at the port of Charlottetown last year proved to be of very great benefit to the province, indeed. I wish to make that statement on account of some discussion we had last year in this House with regard to this subject. These steamers made calls at the port of Charlottetown, and it happened in a very good year indeed for the province, because we were not blessed with as good crops in Prince Edward Island last year as Canada had generally. Owing to the attacks of fungus, our grain was very much injured; the wheat crop was only half a crop, and the oat crop was very poor. The services rendered by these steamers was very beneficial, indeed. The only mistake was that the merchants and others of Charlottetown had not sufficient confidence in our own resources to ask for enough space. It happened that the space they asked for in the "Lake Winnipeg" was not sufficient. In the case of the "Gaspesia," she was offered more than she could take on board. I do not find fault with the government for that; it was more the fault of the merchants in not asking for enough space.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The information placed in my hands is as follows:—Mr. Robertson states that on SS. "Lake Winnipeg" cold storage chamber was provided to be cooled by use of ice. Paid half the cost of fitting up insulated cold storage chamber to be cooled by ice for SS. "Lake Winnipeg," $426.22. Paid $500 subsidy for one trip from Charlottetown. The cold storage chamber on the "Gaspesia" was provided by the owners of the steamship. Mr. Parmalee states:—As regards the amount of subsidy paid, there was $2,000 per trip for two trips paid to the "Lake Winnipeg," and $1,000 for one trip to the "Gaspesia."

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am to understand, then, it was ice cold storage that was on these steamers, not mechanical storage?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was ice cold storage that was on the "Winnipeg." That was the statement. And on the other there was insulated cold storage provided for.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Insulated cold storage is, of course, ice cold storage.

THE INSPECTOR OF MINES IN THE YUKON DISTRICT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER rose to:

Ask the government: 1. Is James D. McGregor now employed as Inspector of Mines in the Yukon district? If not, when did his appointment terminate?

2. Is he now employed by the Department of the Interior in any other capacity? If so, what is its nature, what are his duties, and what his remuneration? What was the date of such appointment?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In reply to the first question, McGregor is employed now as Inspector of Mines in the Yukon district. In reply to the second question I would say that having no record of any other employment, we are not aware of his being employed in any other way than as Inspector of Mines.

EMPLOYMENT OF THOMAS D. MACFARLANE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER rose to:

Ask the government: 1. Was Thomas D. Macarlane employed by the Department of the Interior? If so, in what capacity, what were his duties, and what was his remuneration?

2. Is he now in the employ of the government? If not, when and why were his services dispensed with?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In reply to the first part of the inquiry, I would say yes, he was assistant timber agent in the Yukon district to issue permits to cut timber and collect dues, and for this he was paid a salary of $100 per month. In reply to the second question, his services terminated on the 30th of November, 1898, as they were no longer required.

THE PROHIBITION PLEBISCITE.

THE DEBATE CONCLUDED.

The Orders of the Day being read:

Resuming the adjourned Debate on the motion by the Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell, K.C.M.G.:—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, all correspondence with the government or any member thereof, relating to the subject of the introduction of a prohibitory Liquor Law by the government, together with all affidavits and other documents having relation to the vote cast upon the question of prohibition on the 29th day of September, 1898, and the alleged frauds connected therewith.

Hon. Mr. POWER said:—Although I moved the adjournment of the debate on this matter, I do not propose to trouble the House with a speech. I propose just to make a few observations, and the first observation I desire to make is as the wording of the notice given by the hon. leader of the opposition. The address is for "all correspondence with the government, or any member thereof, relating to the subject of the introduction of a prohibitory liquor law by the government." If we take that language in its widest sense, to make the return which is called for by this address would probably take all the clerks in the government employ for the remainder of this session; because ever since confederation there has been more or less correspondence with respect to the introduction of a prohibitory liquor law; and it seems to me that the scope of the resolution should be narrowed. As far as I could gather from the debate which has taken place, the object of the hon. gentleman who has moved the resolution is to get the correspondence which has taken place since the plebiscite. There ought to be some limit, at any rate, to the demand for information. I presume that the hon. leader of the opposition, or some one on his behalf, will amend the motion so that it will cover only the ground which it is intended to cover. Before proceeding to say anything on my own account, I should like to say a few words with respect to the speech made yesterday by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Mr. Perley). That hon. gentleman impresses people who do not know him very well as being a particularly candid and guileless sort of man—the typical farmer, in fact, who talks straight out and says just what is in his mind, and never has anything behind; but I think hon. gentlemen in this House who have had a reasonably long acquaintance with the hon. gentleman have discovered that there is a good deal of the Heathen Chinee about him, and that he is not as guileless and artless as he looks, and as his language would lead one to believe; and I think the little speech he made yesterday illustrates that characteristic, for I think it would be difficult in so short a speech to express more things which were calculated to deceive—which, I believe, was the great characteristic of Ah Sin. The hon. gentleman talked—and in that agreed with the hon, gentleman from Marshfield—about the government simply trying to humbug the temperance people. Now, there is no evidence of that fact. The government made no promises to the temperance men which they did not fulfil. The government promised the temperance men to submit the prohibition question to a plebiscite, and the government did so. The temperance men were at one time afraid that the government would not put the simple question "whether are you in favour of prohibition or not" to each voter, but that they would tack on to this question some other question with respect to the mode in which the revenue which would be lost to the country by the adoption of prohibition was to be made up. The government did not do that. They put the question just in the way in which the temperance men wished it to be put, and the election was a fair and honest election; and this was admitted, some days after the plebiscite took place, by Mr. Spence, secretary of the Dominion Alliance. He gave the government credit for the straightforward and manly way in which they had submitted the question to the people; so I do not see that there was any humbug so far. Then, the government never told the prohibition men that if a bare majority of the actual votes polled on the question were in favour of prohibition they would enact prohibition. That would have been exceedingly unwise and unreasonable, The object of the plebiscite was to ascertain what the sentiment of the people of this country was on the subject of prohibition—whether that sentiment was strong enough to justify the government in introducing a prohibitory law. Now, what was the result of the vote? Altogether, something like 44 per cent of the registered voters of this country voted on the question of prohibition. The average percentage of the registered vote at a Dominion election is 66, so that on the prohibition question there were only two-thirds of the vote which is usually polled at a Dominion election. How were those two-thirds divided? The Minister of Agriculture stated in another place, and his statement was not questioned and cannot be questioned in view of the figures, that about 22½ per cent of the registered voters of this country voted for prohibition, and about 21½ per cent against it. There was one-fourth—speaking broadly—for, one-fourth against, and one-half of the electors did not vote at all. It is safe to say that as a rule the voters who did not go to the poll and vote one way or the other on the subject were not in favour of prohibition. I think there is no question about that. I know that in the city of Halifax that was the case. Those who abstained from voting were, in nearly every instance, opposed to prohibition; and the consequence is that if the government were to act as some extreme prohibitionists wish now, and as some members of the opposition in Parliament seem to wish, and were to introduce a prohibitory measure, they would be undertaking practically to act at the instance of one-fourth of the registered electorate of this country as against the wishes of the remaining portions of the electorate. Now, any hon. gentleman knows that that would be the height of folly, a most indefensible proceeding; and I have no doubt but the great majority of the members of this House would condemn the government in the most unmeasured terms if, after the result of the vote on the 29th of September, they were to introduce a prohibitory measure. The truth is, hon. gentlemen, that the prohibitionists themselves, when the result of the plebiscite became known, did not expect that a prohibitory measure would be introduced. This talk about the government introducing a prohibitory measure is the result of an after thought. It was not expected by any one that the government would, under the circumstances, introduce a prohibitory measure—when I say not by any one, it was expected by very few. So far for the humbug. I fail to see where any charge of that kind has been made good, or where there is room for a charge of that kind. Then the hon. gentleman spoke about cabinet ministers as going about the province of Quebec stumping against prohibition. I do not think that if members of the government had done so they would have done anything wrong. The government did not pretend that all their members were in favour of prohibition. It was not a political question, and each members of the government was free to go on the platform and express his opinion on the subject just as he pleased ; but as a matter of fact the statement made by the hon. gentleman is totally incorrect. The only minister who went on the platform in the province of Quebec and spoke on the subject of prohibition was the Minister of Agriculture, and he spoke in favour of prohibition wherever he addressed an audience. Two other ministers, I believe at meetings—not meetings held for the purpose of discussing the subject of prohibition, but gatherings of a different character, did express themselves, as they had a perfect right to do, as hostile to prohibition. Now, I want to know where the statement of the hon. gentleman from Wolseley is? The hon. gentleman charged the government with spending $250,000 to no purpose. As a matter of fact, I believe that the plebiscite cost no such sum—that it did not cost half of that.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Oh yes, $180,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My impression is it did not cost half of $250,000. I am now told the cost was $182,000, and that is considerably less than $250,000. I would direct the attention of the hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) to the fact that a very important result was obtained by the plebiscite. We have found out where the country stands on the subject of prohibition. A great many enthusiastic prohibitionists were of the opinion, before the voting took place, that a majority, or very nearly a majority, of the voters of this country were in favour of prohibition. That question has been settled ; and I think we may congratulte ourselves that for a little while, at any rate, the subject of prohibition has been taken out of the arena of practical politics.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The hon. gentleman was not upstairs to-day at the committee room.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The government which the hon. gentleman supported did something in the way of spending money in connection with prohibition. They issued a commission, a Royal Commission.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—They spent three hundred thousand dollars.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Four hundred thousand dollars.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They issued a Royal Commission, which sat in various places, and continued to sit for a long time, affording employment at a remunerative rate to a number of deserving followers of the Conservative party. That prohibition commission cost a very large sum of money.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—How much?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not say it cost quite as much as the plebiscite, but it cost a very large sum of money, and accomplished nothing whatever. It was simply a tub thrown to a whale.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—How much did it cost?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You did not read it?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not suppose any one in the country has read that report, with the exception of the proof reader whose duty it was to read it.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Will the hon. gentleman tell us how much it did cost?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not less than $80,000.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman refers to the evidence. I suppose the report itself was not very voluminous.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is just about the gauge of the hon. gentleman's criticism.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is about the size of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What sort of a report could there have been without the evidence?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Recent evidence has justified the report, I think.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not quarrelling with the report which the commission made. The country was just as wise after the report had been printed as it was before. In the present instance we are a good deal wiser than we were before. Just one word with respect to the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson). He agreed with the hon. gentleman from Wolseley, that the Dominion Alliance, representing temperance men, had been deceived by the government; and the hon. gentleman apparently thought that there was perhaps a good deal of truth in the report made by this man Parent because he took a good deal of trouble to show that it was a document which should have been laid on the table, and that the government were withholding information which they owed to the House. Now, the returns of the plebiscite voting are not government documents. They are not under the control, or in the possession of the government. They are documents in the hands of Parliament, of the officers of Parliament, and the hon. gentleman, if he thinks there is anything to be found in these documents to contradict the statements made on this side of the House, can go to the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and consult the documents. I may say that that statement disposes altogether of the claim that the document was one which should have been laid on the table, because the documents which must be laid on the table are documents which are in the possession of the government and which are not accessible to the members of the opposition. What May and Bourinot say does not apply to the documents in question. I may remark that the Conservative party and its leaders have not shown their hand at all in this matter; they have not said what they would do, looking at the result of the plebiscite. The hon. gentleman from Delorimier, who spoke yesterday, called my attention to the fact that there were one or two points which he forgot to mention. Where was the Conservative vote in the province of Quebec? It does not seem to have gone for prohibition, and I do not think the Conservatives are in a position to complain that the vote was so small. There was another circumstance which goes to discredit Mr. Parent, and to lessen the value of anything which has been said with respect to the improper nature of the voting in the province of Quebec, and that is that shortly after the voting took place, detailed statements of the votes in the different electoral districts were published in the newspapers of the province of Quebec, and everybody had a chance to see whether there was anything very wrong about the figures or not, and no one has attempted to show that there was anything very wrong. The principal reason why I have ventured to take up the time of the House is that I wish to express my regret, as a member of the Senate, at the action taken by prominent members of this House in connection with this matter. When the hon. leader of the opposition (whose absence from the House to-day I very much regret) began to speak, I was under the impression that the hon. gentleman had not read the speech made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture in another place, and consequently I was not disposed to find very much fault with the line which the hon. leader of the opposition took in the beginning of his speech; but when I found, as the hon. gentleman went on, that he had read the speech made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, that he had read it carefully and was familiar with all the facts stated in it, then I must say that my feelings for the hon. gentleman were of unmixed condemnation. In the House of Commons, where party spirit is supposed to run rather higher than it does in this House, the matter ended with the speech of the hon. Minister of Agriculture. The hon. Minister of Agriculture is a gentleman of good character and reputation, and one whose veracity is not questioned by any one, and when he made the statement in the House of Commons that on examining the returns in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, he found that not a single name of a person named by Parent as acting as deputy returning officer in the polls to which he had referred was the correct name of the person so acting, and when he pointed out that the figures mentioned by Parent showing the number of ballots cast in the different polling places were in no case the figures shown by the returns from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, members of that House let the matter drop, and no one has raised any question about it since; but here we have the hon. leader of the opposition in the Senate, which is supposed to be a much less partizan body than the other House, deliberately bringing up those charges which he had every reason to believe were unfounded, and asking for a commission to inquire into statements which he has every reason to believe have no foundation whatever in fact, and after a committee had been offered in the House of Commons and not accepted. Then I notice that the hon. leader of the opposition yesterday, having, I think, come to the conclusion that his action of the day before and his whole action in connection with this matter did not reflect much credit upon him, took the ground that he was justified in laying that utterly unreliable statement of Parent's before this House and giving it to the public for the first time, because the persons who were slandered would have an opportunity of knowing what was said about them and would have an opportunity to defend themselves. That was the most extraordinary ground I have ever heard taken. A man utters a vile slander about a number of individuals and slanders a whole province, and the hon. gentleman takes the ground that it is his duty to give these slanders, which otherwise very few people would know anything about, to the public and to future generations, embalmed in the columns of our debates. Supposing, instead of being a public matter as it is, or quasi public matter, the action of those returning officers and the character of the vote in the province of Quebec, are at any rate quasi public matters, supposing it had been a private matter; that the hon. leader of the opposition had heard an atrocious story told about some hon. member of this House, in which he had every reason to believe there was not a word of truth, would he be justified in bringing that statement up and repeating it in this House on the ground that the person who had been slandered would have an opportunity to reply to it? The thing is absurd on the face of it. This Senate is supposed to be, and ought to be, a dignified body, and a body, if not quite non-partizan, at any rate less partizan than the more popular chamber, but I regret to say that as far as my humble judgment goes, the hon. leader of the opposition (and the hon. gentleman who occupies his place for the time being to-day, may be classed with him), apparently does his best to make this body appear to be neither a dignified body nor a non-partizan body. I have observed that the hon. leader of the opposition seems to believe himself under some obligation to go as far as the most extreme partizan in either House will go. Why that should be I do not know. I do not think the hon. leader of the opposition is such a violent partizan as his speeches in this House would make him out to be. Their language is sometimes as extreme and partizan as the substance of the resolutions to which they are addressed. The only conclusion which I have been able to arrive at, and the only explanation I can give of the extreme length to which the hon. leader of the Opposition goes, is that he has an impression that if he is not just as strong and extreme and as violent as any member of the Opposition in the other House, it may be suspected that he is not in entire harmony with the leader of his party. There is a sort of impression, I believe, that for some time at any rate, the relations between the hon. senator and the hon. gentleman who succeeded him as leader of the party were not of the most cordial character, and perhaps the hon. leader of the opposition is afraid that if he were not very extreme and decided, the impression might go abroad that he was not quite true to his party.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think my hon. friend is entirely out of order in imputing motives to the hon. leader of the opposition, more particularly as he is not present. Instead of dealing with the statements and facts given by the hon leader of the opposition, he drifts away and attributes motives to him.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is the hon. gentleman raising a question of order?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I raise the question that the hon. gentleman is altogether wrong in attributing motives to the hon. leader of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have had pretty nearly as much experience as the hon. gentleman and I think I am in order. I simply suggest; I do not say that is the motive, but I think that would be a creditable motive; and I have a right to speculate on the subject, because after all the motives which actuate public men are public property. I do not say that is the motive, but it occurred to me as being a motive which would not be discreditable to the hon. gentleman and a defensible motive.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What are your motives now?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am addressing the members of the Senate as members of the Senate just now. I think we ought to consider what the effect of resolutions of this kind and speeches of the character of those which have been delivered here is going to be upon the esteem in which this House is held by the public. That is the reason I have risen to speak, and it is something which I think we should consider. Can any hon. gentleman in this House imagine Lord Salisbury, or the Earl of Kimberley doing what has been done by the leader of the opposition in connection with a matter of this kind? You cannot imagine such a thing. And still we are supposed to be, in a sense, a copy of the House of Lords, and we are supposed to imitate them in the matter of dignity; and I regret that the gentlemen who lead the majority in this House seem to forget, in my humble judgment, what is due to the dignity of this House and to the esteem in which it is held throughout the country. I had proposed to say a word or two about the attack made by the leader of the opposition on the voters of the province of Quebec, but the hon. gentleman from Delorimier has anticipated anything I had to say in that respect. The people in the province are as honest and sober as those of any other province, and although they do not believe in prohibition, they are as temperate as the people in the other provinces and perhaps rather more so; and I think the history of our election courts shows that fraud and corruption at elections are not greater there than in the other provinces. I notice that both the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. gentleman, from Marshfield laid a good deal of stress on the fact that this man Parent had been formerly an employee of the government. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield went further and said a trusted employee, although why a man whose duty it was to cancel stamps should be necessarily a trusted employee does not appear quite clear. The hon gentleman from Marshfield and every other hon. gentleman in this House knows very well that no government can guarantee the character of all its employees; not only that, but within the experience of the hon. leader of the opposition there are much stronger cases than that of this man Parent. The hon. gentleman was associated in the government for a number of years with several other gentlemen and, after having been associated with them for a long time, he discovered that they were "a nest of traitors." So you see if you cannot guarantee the character of the people with whom you associate at the council board from day to day, how can you certify to the moral character and general good character of a man who is employed in cancelling stamps? I regret very much the course taken by the hon. leader of the opposition and concurred in by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. That course is calculated to play into the hands of the enemies of this House. The enemies of the Senate are fond of representing the majority here as bitterly and blindly partizan; and I think that motions and speeches such as we have had in this matter give a degree of colour to that charge. Just now, when the question of interfering with the rights of this House is before the country, is an unfortunate time to select to make such speeches and to submit such motions. As a matter, of course, when a gentleman comes into this House he does not leave his party feelings behind him. But in my humble judgment those feelings, after he comes into the Senate, should be shown only upon worthy and important occasions, and they should not be bitter and intense.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman from Halifax, after being silent in this House for nearly a year, is heard again. He applies himself to public questions in a very proper way, but there is always a sting in his tale, and at the end of his speech to-day there was a sting. We have had a lecture on the dignity of this House. I would ask the hon. gentleman to turn back to his own speeches in the Senate; has any one been more violent in his speeches or more partizan than the hon. gentleman has been himself? In season and out of season he was on his legs in this House finding fault and raking up everything he could against the late government. That has been the course of the hon. gentleman in the past.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Did the hon. gentleman really mean to ask me a question? Because I can answer that question at once.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman could not content himself with dealing with the questions before the House in a public way; he must resort to personalities, and it is a very common fault with the hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. leader of the opposition is absent to-day, and a charge is made against his motives. He is a strong partizan no doubt, but no stronger than the hon. gentlemen opposite, especially the hon. gentleman from Halifax. With regard to the speech he has made, I am sure he will not himself think that this House or the country or the temperance people are going to accept that speech as a solution of the difficulty, and an excuse for the way the government humbugged them on the plebiscite question. They will hold the government responsible for their conduct in the matter. Before lecturing this House on dignity the hon. gentleman from Halifax should examine his own conduct.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has asked a question. I did undoubtedly, when I was in opposition, criticise the measures of the government, but I did not criticise the personnel of the government to any extent, and I think the hon. gentleman will search in vain through all the speeches I have made here for language as unbecoming a member of this House as the language to which I have adverted.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It is very evident that this temperance question is looked upon by the government as a much more serious question to-day than it was when they made it a plank in their platform. Before I speak on that question, however, I will make a few remarks on the address to which we have listened from the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I cannot congratulate him on the good taste he has displayed in making a violent attack on the hon. leader of the opposition during his absence. Had he been present he is well able to defend himself in the presence of the hon. gentleman or of any other member on the opposite side of the House, and I think it would have been in much better taste had the hon. gentleman from Halifax reserved his remarks until the leader of the opposition was present. However, he is the best judge of the course he should pursue. I am quite willing to admit that the leader of the opposition to some extent is a partizan, and I think very properly so. It is the duty of the opposition in this House and in the other House to criticise the measures, the course and conduct of the Government of the day. I can remember very well when the hon. gentleman from Halifax, as well as the present Secretary of State, were in opposition in this House. They gave a very vigorous opposition to the late government, for which they deserved credit. I think they did their duty manfully and well. Sometimes they seemed to be very unreasonable in their opposition, but they were discharging their duty in criticising the measures of the government to see if there was anything wrong in them. The leader of the opposition, and those who are in sympathy with him to-day, have a perfect right to pursue a similar course without being called to account so sharply by the hon. gentleman from Halifax for so doing. I should like to ask the leader of the government in this House if I understood him to say that the cost of the plebiscite election was only $182,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The returns, as I got them from the Auditor General, a week ago, show that the amount expended was something over $181,000. There were some unsettled items that were under discussion and which had not been paid—accounts from some clerks of the peace and deputies, but one hundred and eighty one or one hundred and eighty two thousand dollars had been paid up to that time.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I hold in my hand the hansard report of the 19th of April, and I find the Prime Minister saying this, "total expenditure to date, 17th April, 1899, $183,684.58. There is yet a few outstanding accounts."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is what I said.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—How much are these outstanding accounts? The figures here are very misleading. They do not give the cost of the plebiscite vote by any means, and we have as much right to imagine that the balance will make up the $250,000 that was voted and expected to be expended, as the hon. gentleman opposite had to say that the expense has been only $182,000. Besides I think the cost of that election was more than $250,000, when you take into consideration the loss of time in discussing the question and carrying on the election. In my opinion it has cost the people of the country far more than $250,000. The question is, were the people led to believe when this plebiscite vote was decided upon by the conference in 1893 that a majority given at the polls when the plebiscite vote was taken would be acted upon by the government. I maintain that the temperance people were given to understand that the majority would rule.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The hon. gentleman may say no, and possibly he may not have thought so himself, because he was in the secrets of the conclave that formed this platform. The circumstances under which that platform was prepared were never divulged to the public. The temperance people of this country were never given to understand that if they had a majority at the polls prohibition would not be introduced. The impression given to the people was that if the majority of the votes recorded were cast for prohibition, the government would give effect to the expressed will of the people. Where is the proof of that? If any other policy had been decided upon by the government, it was their bounden duty to give the country to understand that the result was not to be the same as in every other vote—that the majority was not to rule—that people who never voted at all were to govern the actions of the government in this matter. How is it in this chamber? Does not the majority rule here? The Speaker, in deciding a question, takes it for granted that those who do not vote at all or express their views assent to the motion when put, and if they do not dissent from it then it is understood that those who do not vote are in favour of the measure. I have seen votes taken here when there have not been two yeas in favour of the measure, but the Speaker has decided the motion carried. Who carried it? How many times do we take a division on an adjournment of the House? All who do not oppose the motion are considered in favour of it, and we have as much right to assume that those who did not vote on the plebiscite were as much in favour of prohibition as though they had voted; and, notwithstanding the statement of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, we must reckon them all as not being opposed to prohibition. On the question of the understanding when this matter became a part of the platform of the party in power, I will read to you what the Hon. Mr. Fisher said at that convention. This is from his own speech delivered on that occasion. He said:

> I propose to read the resolution which pledges the Liberal party, if returned, to give the people of Canada an opportunity to express their views on this question, and the government in power must necessarily carry out the express will of the people.

When the plebiscite vote was taken, and a majority of those who gave expression to their views voted in favour of prohibition, it was the "expressed will of the people." Does the hon. gentleman from Halifax, or do the members of the government, maintain that those who "expressed" no opinion are to be regarded as having given "expression" to the will of the people? It was the "expressed will of the people" who voted, not the will of the people who did not "express" any opinion at all that should have been accepted. The Liberal party pledged themselves to give effect to the "expressed will" of the people, and the expressed will of the people was in favour of a prohibitory law. I say when this government refused to introduce such a law they are not fulfilling their pledges to the country on this question. Then, there is another matter which I think requires a little consideration. It has been stated since the vote on the plebiscite was taken that, at the convention of 1893, there was an understanding come to between the members of that convention that unless there was a large preponderating majority in favour of prohibition, the temperance people would abandon the idea of prohibitive legislation altogether; but if there was a large preponderating vote in favour of prohibition, a law would be introduced. If there was any such understanding at that convention, the temperance people, if they were dealt honestly and fairly with, should have been told what that majority would have to be. If it required one-half of the electorate, or two-thirds of the electorate, or three-fourths of the electorate, whatever it was, as honest men dealing with a sincere and honest people, who were anxious to see prohibition carried out in this country, they should have given them to understand what their decision was in the matter. The hon. Premier, in the other House, in his speech this session, said:

> That a resolution was introduced and inserted in the platform, by which the party pledged themselves that if they came into office they would have a plebiscite on the question of prohibition, so as to obtain the honest unbiased opinion of the people on that great question. Let me say this: When we put that plank in our platform, there was an implied agreement between the members of the party who believed in prohibition and those who did not believe in prohibition. The implied agreement on the part of those who did not believe in prohibition was that if the voice of the people spoke unmistakably, if it should be shown that the great majority of the electorate were in favour of prohibition, then those who did not believe in it, would surrender their views to those of their brothers, and would work honestly for the success of that policy. On the other hand there was an engagement on the part of those who believed in prohibition, that if the voice of the people on the subject should not be of sufficient strength to warrant the adoption by the party of the policy of prohibition, they also would square their views to those of their brothers, and we would hear no more of that question in the ranks of the party. That was the policy we adopted, that was the policy we carried out, and what is the result?

Now I do maintain, hon. gentlemen, that if that was—as stated by the Prime Minister, in his place in the House of Commons—the policy of the party in 1893, and it was kept private and secret from the electors until after the vote took place, they deceived the people of this country, because the people had a right to suppose the result of that election would be the same as the result of any other election wherever held. When you put a question to the people the majority always decides the question and if any other policy is adopted, the people themselves who had the votes to give should have been told of it in time. I honestly believe, and I am sorry that I have to make the statement, that this proposition for a plebiscite was simply done to hoodwink and deceive the temperance people, that the hon. gentlemen opposite were never sincere in promising to carry out the policy, but they thought to deceive the temperance people, and secure their votes, and they succeeded in doing so. What a contrast between the course pursued by the present government and their predecessors. The temperance people then were as anxious for prohibition as they are to-day. They asked Sir John Thompson for a prohibitory law. What was his answer? It was honest, manly and straightforward. He said: "I do not think the country is ready for prohibition." The temperance people respected him for his candor, but they said "we have to look to the Liberal party." What did the Liberal party promise? They promised a plebiscite which cost the taxpayers over $250,000. That is what the deception practised upon the temperance people has cost the country. I think the vote polled on the plebiscite was a very fair representation of public opinion, barring the result in Quebec. I must say the vote in Quebec is a mystery to me. I cannot understand it. I believe the people of Quebec are at least as temperate a people as any in Canada, and I think if the question had been fairly put before them, there would have been a majority in favour of prohibition in Quebec as there was in every other province. A good deal has been said about the course pursued by the leader of the opposition in reference to this question, and in reference to Parent's report. Why should we not expect something reasonable to come from that report? Who is this Parent? He was employed by the Temperance Alliance. He ought to be a man of respectibility and reliability, when such a respectable body as the Temperance Alliance would employ him to ascertain if there were frauds committed in the election. They, no doubt, inquired about his past career, and they found what? That he had been in the employ of the government and that he had been employed by the Liberal party as a party organizer.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I think that was admitted in this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It was admitted by the hon. gentleman from Montreal. He told us that he gave him money to organize the party.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And he got drunk.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The hon. gentleman says no. What does he mean when the hon. gentleman from Montreal admits that he gave the man money to organize the Liberal party?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Still the Secretary of State says no. I say yes. It was admitted by other members of the governmen, I think that he was an organizer for them. Occupying such a high position in the ranks of the government and being in the pay of the government of the day, had not the leader of the opposition a right to inquire in reference to the reliability of the statements made by that gentleman and contradicted by the Minister of Agriculture?

I do not know whether the Minister of Agriculture was the only gentleman who took the platform during that agitation in the province of Quebec, but I know that in the newspapers of the day it was reported, and I think was admitted here today by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, that some of the ministers spoke against prohibition at meetings which were held. Still we are told it was only Mr. Fisher who took the platform. I do not understand it; if the other ministers did not take the platform against prohibition, how did they come to speak against it? I am only sorry that this plebiscite has cost the country so much and given so little satisfaction. My own opinion about the passing of a prohibitory measure is —that I think it is fortunate, even for the temperance people of the Dominion of Canada, that this government has not undertaken to carry out a prohibitory measure, because I believe you will never get a prohibitory measure successfully carried out until you have prohibitionists in the government, feeling in their own hearts that it is the right policy to pursue. While we have the present government in power we need not expect them to carry out prohibition to satisfy the temperance people or the people generally throughout the country. My opinion is that if the temperance people have any hope of carrying prohibition, they will have to form a temperance party—will have to withdraw their allegiance from every other party, and make temperance their leading if not the only plank in their platform.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have been listening with interest to the discussion that has taken place, from the speech of the leader of the opposition, who introduced this motion, to the speech which has just been delivered by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island. One hon. gentleman has said, and another has repeated it after him, that it is very wrong to refer to the motives which may actuate men in their public conduct, and in the propositions which they submit to this House for its consideration. I thought that this whole question and the motion itself related to the motives of the administration., I have not heard anything discussed except the motives of the administration, except here and there an incidental observation made in commendation of the leader of the opposition and the very wrong course that had been adopted in saying a word about the motives which induced him to bring this motion forward. Now, look at the questions which are put as a sort of introduction to this motion. They inquire whether a certain party was an employee of this government. What is the object of that inquiry? They inquire whether he is an employee of any other government existing in this country. What is the object of that inquiry? Then it is intimated that he was employed, if employed by some other government,as a reward for services he had done this government, and what were the services for which this reward was to be given? What are the services that were pointed out by the hon. gentleman who made this motion that this man Parent had done for the government of Canada? Why, that he had committed frauds. He had been a party to frauds, and that other parties had been parties to frauds in the province of Quebec, and that he was being rewarded for services of this character which he had performed on behalf of the government to swell the votes in opposition beyond what were actually recorded against prohibition. Now, that is the sort of motive that has been attributed to the administration. And then my hon. friend, who has just taken his seat, has attributed all sorts of improper and dishonest motives to the administration. Has the hon. gentleman one code of morals for the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and another code which he applies to those who oppose the administration? His whole argument implies that. I remember a decision of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States on a constitutional question in which he said the government of the United States was a white man's government, and that the negroes resident in the United States had no rights which were protected under the constitution and which white men were bound to respect. Now, the hon. gentleman seems to think that the members of the administration stand very much in the same position that the negroes in the United States did before the civil war broke out in that country—that we had no feelings, no sense of honour, no regard for truth, which ought in a public discussion to be considered or weighed for one moment when hon. gentlemen on that side of the House chose to attribute any sort of dishonest or unfair motives to us in a public discussion. Now, I deny the statements which the hon. gentleman has made. Further than that, he had given to him by my hon. friend the Secretary of State the expenditure connected with the taking of this plebiscite on the prohibition question, and he was told it was about $182,000, although there were some small accounts yet to come in, and then the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Prowse) read us a statement of the Prime Minister made yesterday, in which he said that amount was $183,000. I suppose there may be a few hundred dollars standing out yet, some one whose account is disputed, some one whose account is still a matter of controversy and cannot be paid until the facts are correctly ascertained; but at most they could amount to but a very small sum, one hundred dollars or two hundred dollars at the outside; and yet upon the mere argument of an unpaid account which may still be in controversy the hon. gentleman declares that he has no doubt whatever that the expense will at least reach $250,000.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I did not say I had no doubt whatever.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say it would be an advantage to my hon. friend, so far as the impression of moderation and fairness which his observations would make, if he did not express his absence of doubt in this matter with so much confidence. Upon what is that statement based? Upon what ground does he say that he has no doubt that the cost will amount to $250,000.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I mentioned in my speech that, reckoning the time fully that was lost to the electors going to the polls added to the cost of the vote, it would amount to that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend may lose valuable time here every day in the subjects that he discusses and the subjects that he does not discuss, those that he considers and those upon which he gives his mind a holiday, and yet he would not think it was quite fair to charge his loss of time in that matter in the public accounts. And yet my hon. friend is speaking of the actual amount of money that is paid out of the public treasury for the purpose of taking a vote. My hon. friend says, "Yes; the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday shows the amount is more than $182,000. I have no doubt it will amount to $250,000," and then, in addition to that, he makes the statement that there is a great deal of valuable time lost. So there is in regard to everything. My hon. friend, when he takes his holidays in the summer, loses a lot of valuable time; perhaps he gets something for it, but the time is not converted into money, neither is the time which the parties have devoted to the discussion of the plebiscite question during the time it was under consideration. Then the hon. gentleman says the government humbugged the people. He is attributing motives again, and motives of not a very high order.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I do not think I used the word humbugged, but that is what I meant.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is not the motives he is dealing with, it is their actions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has undertaken to draw a distinction where there is no distinction. He spoke of humbugging the people of the country in taking the vote and leading them to believe that the government intended to act on a simple majority, if a majority were recorded in favour of it. I say no member of the administration ever led the public to suppose, or ever led the temperance people of this country to suppose, that if the majority of the votes recorded were in favour of prohibition, that prohibition must be brought forward as a government measure, as a matter of course. Why, suppose there had been only 10,000 votes cast altogether, and that 8,000 had been in favour of prohibition, and 2,000 against it, do hon. gentlemen suppose for a moment that the million of votes that were not recorded at all are not to be considered? This is not a question where a legal result depends upon the vote. It is not like the election of a member of the House of Commons where only ten men might vote, and yet those who voted on the side of the majority would succeed in electing their member. There must be a member, and the House of Commons must be constituted, and they make the necessary provision for its constitution; but the object of this vote was not for the purpose of settling the question absolutely by those who voted for it or against it. The object was to ascertain the state of public opinion on this question, and in ascertaining that state of public opinion every man in his senses knows that we must take into consideration those who are indifferent, and those who did not vote at all, as well as those who are acting upon the one side or the other. How does the vote stand? You have 260,000 people odd voting against prohibition and you have 270,000 voting in favour of prohibition, but you have over 600,000 who do not vote at all, and are they to be left out? Are they not to be considered when the government propose to act one way or the other? When the day of election comes these men will vote and they will be ready to say whether the government shall remain in office or whether they shall go out of office, and the fact that they did not vote at all is a significant fact of which any government, in the possession of its senses, must take note as well as it takes note of those who vote. Then the hon. gentleman has said that we were insincere and that we intended to deceive. Those were the words the hon. gentleman used. Intended to deceive whom? What object or purpose would the government have in intending to deceive? The government desired to obtain an expression of public opinion. My hon. friend supported the government who preceded us in appointing a commission, and sending that commission over to the United States to ascertain how prohibition worked under their system and also to ascertain what was the state of public feeling there. That commission made a very voluminous report, embraced in four volums, and if men lived as long as they did in antediluvian times the length of time required to read four volumns of nearly 1,000 pages each might be devoted to the reading of such a report, but, when the days of man are but three score years and ten, it is too much of human life to devote to the investigation of that commission to read four volumes, which would embrace about 4,000 pages and weigh about 25 lbs. avoirdupois. What did the public gain by that? There was a certain amount of information collected, but as to the state of public opinion we were not informed; we could not be informed. I thought myself that the state of public opinion in favour of prohibition was not as strong as many of my friends, who are anxious to see a prohibition measure adopted, thought it was. We have, by the vote that was recorded, an exact expression which shows us that out of nearly 1,000,000 electors at the present time in this country, 270,000 are in favour of prohibition. That is what the result shows, and I think that that result is such as to show, that the government would not be justified in acting upon that vote. There is this to be borne in mind—and the hon. gentleman has not addressed himself to the question—that there are $7,000,000 of revenue or more that would be absolutely wiped out by the adoption of a prohibitory measure. Let me suppose for a moment that the government, instead of asking for a vote on the question, Yes or No, proposed a complete measure, had endeavoured to provide for the loss of revenue that would be sustained and had said to the people of this country: "This is our proposition; we will grant you prohibition, and we ask you to sanction the measure which we propose that will place at the disposal of the government a sufficient amount of revenue to make up the deficiency," does any hon. gentleman suppose we would have got as large a vote in favour of prohibition as we did? If you were to transfer $7,500,000 of taxation from the liquor traffic and the consumption of liquor to a direct tax or a tax on tea or coffee, or any other article of commerce from which the revenue could be raised, does any hon. gentleman suppose that the vote would have been as large as it really was? I do not think so. The temperance people did not think so, because when it was suggested that a perfect measure should be prepared and the vote taken on that measure there was scarcely one among those who favoured prohibition who would sanction such a course being taken. And why not? Because they felt that upon an abstract question a much larger vote would be polled than upon any practical measure for the purpose of giving effect to prohibition that could be devised by the administration. What the hon. gentleman is annoyed at, and why he expresses himself so strongly against the administration, is that he hoped the government would perish in consequence of this proposed prohibitory legislation. The hon. gentleman says that we ought to act upon the simple vote of a majority. Whether the vote was 10 or 10,000, he holds that it is equally binding upont he administration, and the hon. gentleman presses that, not because he is disposed to adopt that view himself, not because he favours that, not because that is so—and he has not said that—

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—You ought to be consistent and obey the mandate of the people.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says we ought to obey the popular mandate. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to obey the popular mandate? Is he prepared to say "If my friends come into power, unless they carry that mandate into effect I will not support them?" That mandate is binding upon those who may succeed us as well as upon us. If it is a popular mandate that we should obey, it is a mandate that our successors should obey as well. Is he prepared to say that? Is he prepared to say: "If my friends come into power to-morrow or next day unless they give effect to that popular mandate I will not give them my support."

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I did not promise it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not a question of promise. If the government are bound to obey a simple majority of those who record their votes, whether that majority be a large or a small percentage of the entire vote of the population of this country, the hon. gentleman and his friends would be as much bound to obey that mandate as any member of the administration.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Not unless they promised to do so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not going to discuss this matter further, I wished to call attention to the motion that has been made, to the questions which accompanied it, to the spirit in which it has been submitted to this House, to the motives which have been attributed to the administration, and to the unreasonable demands which have been made upon us. I say, therefore, that the whole discussion that took place yesterday upon this subject from the other side of the House is entirely beside the question, and it is also beside the question to tell us what Sir John Thompson's opinion was some four or five years ago. We know this, that although Sir John Thompson did say that he was not prepared to legislate, he appointed a commission, put the country to a very large expenditure in the constitution of that commission and in the publication of the report, and the hon. gentleman, so far as I know, has never expressed a word of censure with regard to the action of the government on that occasion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It may be well to inform the House that it would be quite impossible to agree to a proposition such as is contained in this motion because, as explained by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, it is too indefinite. I presume it is in connection with the taking of the plebiscite, although it does not say so, and in regard to the latter part of it there are no affidavits or other documents having relation to the vote cast upon the question of prohibition. This document of Parent's which was read in this House was never presented to the government nor was any other document of a similar character protesting against the alleged frauds or making any reference to them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentlemen cannot bring down what they have not got.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It refers only to the plebiscite?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It may be carried with that understanding.

The motion was agreed to.

THE STOCK DIVORCE BILL.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the adoption of the 3rd report of the standing Committee on Divorce in re Bill (A) "An Act for the relief of David Stock."

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Is that the case in which we have not the report of the evidence?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I do not know whether it is printed or not.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—We had better have the evidence. We have never passed a report before without the evidence.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I have no objections to allowing it to stand till Monday.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—This is very much like the old story of the train that stopped at Chicago and the porter called out to the passengers "Fifteen minutes for refreshments and divorces."

CANADA LIFE ASSURANCE CO.

PETITIONS PRESENTED.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM presented petitions of certain policy-holders in the Canada Life Assurance Company praying for certain amendments to the company's Act of incorporation. He said:—There are 35 petitions, representing policies to the amount of $2,243,000. It is not necessary to read them all. Life is too short. It is a petition of the policy-holders of the Canada Life Assurance Company, praying for the passing of an Act restoring the seventh section of the original Act of the said company, limiting the number of votes to be cast by one shareholder to forty, and also to give to the policy-holders of the company such provisions as may be necessary to protect their interests. The prayers of the petitions are all alike, and there are altogether 386 names.

SPECIAL TRIP OF THE STEAMER "STANLEY."

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to:

Ask the government if it is true that the government steamer "Stanley" made a special trip between Pictou and Georgetown on Sunday, the 16th instant, for the purpose of conveying Mr. Frederick Peters, of Victoria, B.C., to Prince Edward Island? And also, if a special train on the Prince Edward Island Railway, from Georgetown to Charlottetown, was run on the same day and for the same purpose? If so, by whose orders were these special services rendered, and at whose expense?

He said:—I will not make any remarks until I know the nature of the reply, and will simply make the inquiry.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not usual to make the remarks afterwards. However, I will give the answer. The steamer "Stanley" was, by the authority of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, authorized to convey Mr. Peters either on Saturday evening or Sunday, I do not know which, across from Pictou to Prince Edward Island, I suppose it was. Mr. Peters was a member of the legislature. He did not attend at the last session of the legislature, and his seat would have been forfeited had he not been there on Monday. He left Victoria, as I am advised, in time to reach Prince Edward Island before the legislature opened, but his train was delayed, and it therefore was a matter of importance to him that he should be conveyed across in time for the Monday sitting of the House, otherwise he would have lost his seat. There was no authority given for a special train, and Mr. Peters paid his own passage money, whatever it was.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My questions are not all answerd. Mr. Peters may have paid his fare, but I ask, on whose order, and at whose expense, was the special train run?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know that he had a special train at all. I say there was no authority given for a special train. I am so advised by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Was there any authority given for the running of the steamer "Stanley"?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries gave authority to run the steamer across with Mr. Peters.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—At whose exprense were the special trips of this boat and this train made?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The authority was given to run the steamer. I presume Mr. Peters paid his passage money, whatever it was.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—He would not pay the expense of the steamer?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I dare say not.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I should like to make one remark in regard to this extraordinary proceeding of the government with refrence to a private individual. It was well known that Mr. Peters was, in years gone by, the leader of the government in Prince Edward Island. He resigned his position, and went out to British Columbia, and has since been carrying on business there. During all last session he had absented himself from the local House. He did not represent the district for which the people elected him, and the people of that district were unrepresented, so far as he was conserned, during the last session of the local legislature, and I know a great many people were very anxious that Mr. Peters should come and attend to his parliamentary duties as their representative, or give them an opportunity to elect a man to represent them in their local parliament, as they had a right to expect, and which Mr. Peters engaged to do when he was elected by the people. The government of this country went very far out of their way to put their hands into the treasury of the country, and pay the expenses of the steamer "Stanley," to take an individual who had been treating his constituents as Mr. Peters had done, from Pictou to Prince Edward Island, on the Sabbath day, at the expense of the government, and also providing a special train to take him to Charlottetown on Sunday, merely for the sake of retaining his seat in the local parliament. I wish to enter my protest against such such unfair treatment of the public funds of this country.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a letter addressed to the Government through the Prime Minister, by His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface, on the settlement of the school question in the province of Manitoba, said letter being dated about September or October last.

He said:—In moving for these papers I desire to say that I am not doing it in a spirit of partisanship. If I did I am afraid I would rouse the ire of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Power), who is always ready to take exception to any hon. gentleman who asks a question or makes a remark not exactly in accord with the sentiments of himself or the government of which he is a supporter. I may say, however, that I am here to discharge my duty on all public questions, and I intend to do it fearlessly, regardless of any criticism that may come from that hon. gentleman. I must say that I am a bit surprised at the course of the hon. gentleman in criticising the remarks of members who differ from him, because he knows very well that during all the years he was in opposition he never on any occasion voted in favour of the government, and that is so vastly different from the course I have pursued as a member of the Senate that he ought to think twice before he undertakes to read me a lecture on partisanship. I have been known on several occasions to vote against the policy of the Conservative party; but the hon. gentleman has never been known, on any occasion, to vote against the policy of the party that he supports. In that particular I differ from him very much. I might say that this question is not one originating with me. The train passes Wolseley, where I live, at midnight; and on the morning of the 13th of March when I got aboard the train, before going to bed I asked the porter to call me early in the morning, or half an hour before I got to Brandon I had made a previous arrangement with a gentleman in Brandon to meet me at the train. The porter did not call me, because I got up myself before we reached Brandon, and when I got up I found His Grace, the Archbishop of St. Boniface, on the train. He was making his toilet, and we went to the back of the car and sat down and had quite a little time to talk by ourselves. Our conversation was not private or confidential in any sense whatever. In the way of conversation I remarked to His Grace that I had to compliment him on the successful settlement of the school question. I at once saw fire in his eyes. He asked me who said that. I said it was stated by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the House of Commons at different times during the last session of Parliament, and it was also stated by the Secretary of State, in answer to the hon. Mr. Landry in the Senate. Now, I do not wish to say in what language he termed that statement incorrect, but he did so in very strong and emphatic language, which would be unparliamentary if used in this House. I also said to the rev. gentleman that I had not seen that he had taken any particular interest in that matter for the last few months, to which he replied that that was not correct, from the fact that he had addressed a letter to Sir Wilfrid Laurier on this question, and he showed, in order to convince me of the correctness of the statement, a desire that I should call for the production of that letter. I said to him that such a letter would be regarded by the government probably, as a private letter and they would not give it to me. He said that the letter was not private—although addressed to Sir Wilfrid Laurier it was a public letter, and said he "you have my authority to call for that letter, which will show that I am not satisfied with the settlement of the school Question—that it is not settled at all." He further said to me—and here is where the question comes in—that in the city of Winnipeg, in Portage la Prairie and Brandon, the principal towns in Manitoba, that there is no alteration in the Martin School Law—that it was carried out in toto—that there had not been an "i" dotted or a "t" crossed so far as the administration of the law was concerned. But in the rural districts, he said, mentioning some, the law was winked at. There they got those concessions that they wanted by law, and he was entirely dissatisfied with the manner in which they had been treated on this question. I went on to speak to him about the law and he said "in those different places we get by concession that which we claim we have a right to by law." He addded that he did not want it by concession, but by law, and he authorized me to ask for this letter so that I might see that the question was not settled Then I see by a statement made by the hon. Premier of Manitoba that the law has not been changed in the least, and if there was any change made in the law it would have to be by an Act of Parliament. I saw by the statement of the local Premier that in all those schools in the rural districts where the law has been winked at, to use the language of His Grace, and certain concessions have been allowed to the Catholic minority with respect to their schools, that Mr. Greenway, notice having been called to it, sent out an inspector to report, and that inspector having reported that the law had been winked at and concessions made to those people, he has stopped it. Further than that, the hon. Prime Minister of Manitoba says that the law is as it was enacted at the start, and that they would withold the grant from all schools that in any way infringed the law. Therefore there is a discrepancy between the statements made by His Grace the Archbishop and the government of Canada, as far as the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State are concerned, when they say the matter is settled. One or the other party has stated what is incorrect, and the Archbishop is backed up by the statement of the Prime Minister of Manitoba in a speech from the platform, in which he said that the law was as it stood originally. What we ought to know is, who is telling the truth—who is right? Is His Grace the Archbishop right in saying that there has been no change made, and that the law is as it was, or are the hon. gentlemen who administer the affairs of the country right in saying that the matter is settled, and out of the arena of politics. This is a question to which I should like to have an answer. There is another thing I should like to call attention to. During the recent election campaign, in 1896, on some occasions I spoke in favour of the Remedial Bill, as it was called. That Remedial Bill gave the Catholics the right, in some respects, to be protected from paying taxes for the support of public schools, as the law of the country now requires, when they were supporting their own schools, and I contended that that would be right and fair; but I find that the law of Manitoba requires those people to pay taxes to the public schools when they go to their own schools. A portion of the law is as follows: That no Catholic schools can obtain a share of the public money in Manitoba until the teacher makes a declaration, which is an oath to all intents and purposes, that no religious instruction has taken place in that school during the previous six months during which he had taught it. Now, that is a very severe and improper provision in a free country like Canada, requiring a teacher, before the government could give funds in aid of the school, to make a declaration that there has been no religious instruction in the school. I say it is a disgrace to the country, no matter what government passed the Act; and further, that the law was largely passed and carried out for political purposes, and no government is properly administering the affairs of the country which is a party to doing such a thing. I also understand—which, perhaps, to some extent, accounts for His Grace's silence on the school question of late—that the present government, or some of its members, have been sending hush money, as it has been termed in the other House. I do not believe that it is the case. I do not believe that His Grace would be the recipient of hush money as a reward for keeping silent on the question. He may have received a sum of money in support of those separate schools for the purposes of allaying public feeling for a while until after the Manitoba elections, and then, probably, if Mr. Greenway gets into power again, he will wink at the law all over the country, in the cities as well as in the rural districts. It is a disgrace to Canada, or to any part of the Dominion, that there should be a law on the statute-book prohibiting prayers or religious teaching in the public schools. We open both Houses of this Parliament with prayer, and if it were not for the religious prejudices of the people, every school in the land should be opened and closed with prayer. But owing, not only to religious prejudices, but also to political trickery, people sacrifice their convictions for the sake of attaining political power. The question which I should like to have answered by the government is this: Is the school law settled? If it is, bring down the Act and show in what respect it has been amended to settle it, and thus determine who is right—the government here, which says that it has been settled; or His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface, who says it is not settled. I repeat, I ask for that letter on the authority of His Grace, and if it is produced it will show who is right and who is wrong.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has exhibited a laudable curiosity in seeking to ascertain what correspondence, if any, has passed between the Archbishop of St. Boniface and the Prime Minister of Canada. I may say to my hon. friend that there is no letter under the control of His Excellency of the kind which the hon. gentleman has mentioned. There is no letter addressed to the government by the Archbishop of St. Boniface. Any letter which His Grace may have written on the subject of the school question to the Prime Minister, was written to him in his capacity as a friend of the Archbishop, or as the head, it may be, of an administration pursuing a certain policy, but certainly it was a private communication, and not one of a public or official character, which is at all under the control of the administration, and before my hon. friend's curiosity in this matter can be gratified, he must make his application personally to the Prime Minister, and persuade him to place that letter, if there be such a letter, in his hands; but there has been no public letter, no official letter, addressed to the Prime Minister as head of the government by the Archbishop of St. Boniface. What the hon. gentleman says about the school question in connection with this subject may be very interesting to the House, but it is in reference to a question that is not now before the Senate for its consideration. I listened with interest to the declaration of the hon. gentleman in favour of the rights of the minority and that compacts ought to have been observed. I was under the impression, until the hon. gentleman made his speech to the House, that he was of a different way of thinking. I may say to him, however, that upon that question it was in the power of the late government at one time to have disallowed that measure if it was felt to be one that was in violation of a compact, but it was allowed to go into operation.

The motion was allowed to drop.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (B) "An Act further to amend the Exchequer Court Act."

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Before this motion is put, I would like to say that as it seems to me, this bill is one which influences to a certain extent the Expropriation Bill, which is lower down on the order paper, that it is advisable that the Expropriation Bill should be dealt with first and some conclusion arrived at in regard to it before this measure is proceeded with, and I would ask the hon. leader of the government whether it would not be advisable that that course should be pursued. In this bill we have one of the most extraordinary measures ever introduced by any government in the Parliament of Canada. We have an Exchequer Court here especially provided for the trial of claims which private parties have against the government, and we have a judge who is specially directed to try these claims, and yet we have here a bill which is asking—and the effect of which, if passed, will be—that the powers of the judge with regard to some cases shall be absolutely taken away from him, because it directs him, under certain circumstances, as to the verdict he is obliged to give. Clause 3 in this bill is as follows:—

If the injury to any land or property alleged to be injuriously affected by the construction of any public work may be removed wholly or in part by any alteration in or addition to any such public work, or by the construction of any additional work, or by the abandonment of any portion of the lands taken from the claimant, or by the grant to him of any land or easement, and, if the Crown by its pleadings, or on the trial. or before judgment, undertakes to make such alteration or addition or to construct such work, or to abandon such portion of the land taken, or to grant such land or easement, the damages shall be assessed in view of such undertaking, and the court shall declare that, in addition to any damages awarded, the claimant is entitled to have such alteration or addition made or such work constructed, or such grant made to him.

By this clause the judge is given neither option nor latitude. He cannot act according to his interpretation of the law nor take his own view of the evidence which comes before him. If the Crown under certain circumstances, the reason and the method of which is entirely left in their own hands, see fit to make a certain declaration, then the judge is bound to render a verdict in accordance with that. He is not allowed to take his own views of the facts; he is not allowed to give even his own view of the interpretation of the law. All the government have to do is to make a certain declaration, and according to this direction he is bound by that. I think in view of the fact that we have a court specially constituted to try these cases that this is a most extraordinary proceeding to introduce here. Furthermore, the passing of this Act would have the effect of doing away with or taking away the rights of individuals, the rights which these parties individually have against the Crown. Such a measure would be ultra vires of the Federal Government, as taking away rights which are solely and wholly in the control of the provincial government, and the hon. leader would find that not only is the law as proposed here pernicious, as I consider it to be, but he would find it bad after he got through. I would ask the hon. Leader of the House to allow the second reading of this bill to stand until after the other bill is considered.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say to the hon. gentleman I think he entirely misapprehends the scope and intention of the clause to which he refers, and he will find upon examination that it is not ultra vires, and that it is within the expropriating power of the Dominion. The intention of this clause is to give to the Court of Exchequer a larger jurisdiction than it has at the present time. I need not refer to other clauses of this bill preceding it, because the hon. gentleman has not taken exception to them, but this particular clause, which is a substitution for the third section of the statute of 1889, I shall endeavour to explain to the House, and I think the hon. gentleman who has just spoken will see that it is not open to the objection which he has made:

If the injury to any land or property alleged to be injuriously affected by the construction of any public work may be removed wholly or in part by any alteration in or addition to any such public work, or by the construction of any additional work, or by the abandonment of any portion of the lands taken from the claimant, or by the grant to him of any land or easement, and, if the Crown by its pleadings, or on the trial, or before judgment, undertakes to make such alteration or addition or to construct such work, or to abandon such portion of the land taken, or to grant such land or easement, the damages shall be assessed in view of such undertaking.

Now, it takes away no power from the judge, but it puts it in the power of the Crown to make suggestions. If a party says, "My property is injured by a portion of it being taken away," the Crown suggests alterations or changes. It is then open to the judge of the Exchequer Court to take into consideration these proposed changes. He will see whether they meet the objections made, whether the grounds on which damages are sought from the Crown are lessened by the proposed changes or not. All that will be before the judge of the Exchequer Court. The judge will pass upon those suggestions or proposals. It simply is an enabling power—enabling the Crown to propose something by way of mitigation of damages, and it enables the court to pass upon those proposed mitigations, and to say whether they have the effect of lessening the damages which might otherwise be done to the property. In all the proposed changes, no jurisdiction is taken away from the Exchequer Court. On the contrary, the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court is enlarged. The Court of Exchequer will be enabled to say whether the proposed changes, if made, would meet the objections of the party whose property may be wholly or in part taken. It is provided that the government may "abandon any portion of the lands taken from the claimant." For instance, not long since, propery was being expropriated upon which a mill was erected. The mill owner says: "You are taking away by your expropriation the yard where teams which come to my mill turn about, and without backing in they cannot get to the mill as conveniently as before." There was a proposal made to give him other ground equally convenient, or to make certain alterations which would meet his objection. Now, the court is of the opinion that it has no power under the existing law to take into consideration a proposition of that sort, and that it is desirable that it should have. We do not think that it is desirable that a party may force the government to take property which it does not want, because there is a certain portion of the property which it does want. If the present amendment is adopted, you will increase the power of settling—you increase the power of meeting the objections of the party whose property is being expropriated, you have the power of mitigating the damages, but you do not pass upon these—it is the Court of Exchequer before whom the case comes that decides whether what the government may propose will have the effect of lessening the claim for damages or not. It is intended as a measure of perfect fairness between the party who may be the owner of property that is being expropriated, or may have some interest in it, and the Crown. It is to protect the Crown against a man's extravagant charges, but whether they are extravagant or not is for the Exchequer Court to pass upon. The hon. gentleman will see the words are:

> If the Crown by its pleadings, or on the trial, or before judgment, undertakes to make such alteration or addition, or to construct such works, or to abandon such portion of the land taken, or to grant such land or easement, the damages shall be assessed in view of such undertaking, and the court shall declare that, in addition to any damages awarded, the claimant is entitled to have such alteration or addition made or such work constructed, or such grant made to him.

By whom? By the judge "in view of such undertaking."

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Why make it retroactive?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see there is no difference between an expropriation case which may be made to-morrow and an expropriation case which may be made after the bill becomes law. If the principle is good, it is as good in a case that has yet to be dealt with as it is in a case that may arise hereafter. It is not retroactive in the sense in which that word is sometimes used. "To grant such land or easement the damages shall be assessed in view of such undertaking." If such undertaking does not diminish the damage done to the property, then whatever does not diminish the claim against the Crown, if it does in any degree overcome it, that is a mitigating circumstance that will be taken into consideration by the judge, "and the court shall declare," nothing else, "that in addition to any damages awarded, the claimant is entitled to have such alteration or addition made, or such work constructed, or such grant made to him." Now, if there is a proposition to build some work which will have the effect of diminishing the damages and overcoming his objection, and the court takes that into consideration, then the party has a claim for the construction of that work against the Crown. He may insist on the work being done, and the terms upon which the judgment has been given fairly carried out. My hon. friend will see that the measure is a perfectly fair one. It takes away no right. It simply gives to the Crown and to the court and to the party himself, for that matter, a larger latitude in undertaking to come to a settlement, to overcome objections, to mitigate damages which may be done to property which is retained, and so lessens the charges that may otherwise be legitimately made against the Crown. The whole matter is to be left in the hands of the Exchequer Court judge. It enlarges his discretion and enables him to arrive at a just conclusion, where, under existing circumstances, such a conclusion might not be reached.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The hon. leader of the House, in stating that this clause is altogether permissive to the judge, is in error. I think this clause is directory. While the hon. gentleman has made a very plausible explanation, from the government side of the question, and shows how anxious he is to protect the public against rapacious individuals, the rights of individuals should be looked after. If the hon. gentleman wishes to make this really permissive, he will consent to an amendment of this clause, and have the words "shall declare," altered to "may declare," then it would be really permissive so that nobody could cavil at it, and it would be beyond the objection which I made before. In committee will be the proper time to suggest these alterations—that the word "may" should be substituted for "shall," which would meet the objection that I made. There is another question also, the bill should not be retroactive.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think, with the hon. gentleman from Brandon, that the Expropriation Bill ought to be dealt with first, because there are important changes propsed in the Expropriation Act, and part of the clause to which my hon. friend has referred in the bill marked "B" is simply to implement the changes that we are expected to make in the Expropriation Act if the other Bill should pass. Although there can be no objection to go into committee on this bill, if the hon. leader of the House things proper to do so and go down as far as clause 3 in committee and advance the bill that far, I think clause 3 should not be disposed of until we have dealt with the bill to amend the Expropriation Act, because, as I said before, the changes proposed in clause 3 are entirely with a view to implement the very serious and important amendments proposed to be made to the Expropriation Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Do hon. gentlemen think that the abandonment of any portion of a work by the Crown is necessarily an injury? If the Crown finds at the time of the trial that more of the land is taken than is necessary and abandons a portion of it, is that an injury?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Yes, certainly.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We can discuss that when we come to deal with the Expropriation Act Amendment Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—To show how very little change is made in the existing law, I will read the section of the Exchequer Court Act as it stands to-day in the statute-book. It is as follows:—

3. If the injury to any land or property alleged to be injuriously affected by the construction of any public work may be removed wholly or in part by any alteration in or addition to any such public work, or by the construction of any additional work——

You will note that so far there is no change whatever in the existing section; then come the words "or by the abandonment of any portion of the lands taken from the claimant, or by the grant to him of any land or easement." These are the new words, and then the clause goes on using precisely the same language that is already in the Act:

——and, if the Crown by its pleadings, or on the trial or before judgment, undertakes to make such alteration or addition or to construct such work, or to abandon such portion of the land taken, or to grant such land or easement, the damages shall be assessed in view of such undertaking, and the court shall declare that, in addition to any damages awarded, the claimant is entitled to have such alteration or addition made or such work constructed, or such grant made to him.

It will be observed that the changes are limited to just two possible conditions—

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Very important ones, though.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There ought to be no objection to that. If the Crown file a plan proposing to take a certain area, and afterwards it is found on inquiry that all of that area is not needed, and before the damages are assessed, the fact that the Crown only takes a portion of what was originally intended to be taken, the court will take that into consideration. The very changes here are suggested by the court in order that the widest possible powers may be given and justice done to the Crown and to the claimant.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I should like to ask my hon. friend who has charge of the bill whether he is going to accede to my suggestion as to giving priority to the more important bill, which involves the entire principle and which this Bill is merely intended to implement. I did not enter into a discussion of this bill and merely raised that point.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.—It is not of the slightest consequence to me, and I am ready to meet the wishes of the House. We can take the second reading of this bill and then take the second reading of the other, and we can go into committee on the Expropriation Bill. before we take the committee stage of this bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Very well.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

PRESERVATION OF HEALTH ON PUBLIC WORKS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (C) "An Act for the Preservation of Health on Public Works."

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I know the hon. leader of the opposition takes a very lively interest in this measure. He agrees with the principle of it, and I think it might be read a second time, although I would suggest that the committee stage be postponed until the hon. leader of the opposition is here.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I quite concur in that.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

EXPROPRIATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (D) "An Act to amend the Expropriation Act." He said:—I gave a pretty full explanation of this measure and its provisions at the time the bill was brought forward. The object of the bill is to meet certain defects in the Expropriation Act as it now stands. It is to enable the government to take a smaller area and to amend its plan in that regard where the smaller area is found to be adequate before the matter is dealt with, and also to take a smaller estate than what is provided for now under the law as it stands. These questions have been considered by the Exchequer Court, and it is sometimes found that a smaller estate than that which was contemplated in the first instance is not provided for in the Expropriation Act as it now stands, and the object of the measure is to enlarge the discretion of the Department of Public Works or the Department of Railways and Canals, or whatever department of the government may find it necessary to undertake the expropriation of certain property. There is no alteration of the principle; in fact the intention of the proposed amendment is to meet those defects which experience points out exist in the law as it now stands.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think this bill is of so harmless a nature as my hon. friend represents it to be. In fact, it makes the greatest possible changes, in the principle of the Expropriation Act. The first change is that the government may, in expropriating, take a limited interest or for a limited term of years, instead of the absolute expropriation which now exists. This is a new feature in our Expropriation Laws. It provides that the government may come in and take the property for a term of years and return it at the end of that time to the proprietor, damages to be assessed, I do not know exactly how. The government would have rental or damages or both to pay during the time they had possession of the property. Then they can take a limited part of the property or a limited interest in the whole. I presume that is what is meant, but it introduces another principle which is a new one in the expropriation of lands in our Dominion legislation. It provides that the government, after having expropriated the lands in the most formal and conclusive way, at any period before the money is actually paid to the owner of the land, may re-invest a part or the whole of this property in the original owner, and the other bill is to implement this change in the Exchequer proceedings. So that the damages for the partial ownership, or the limited use when the government may have been in possession of this property, shall be passed upon by the court. I think this principle of giving the power to re-invest the property in the owner is a very serious innovation. I know that it was once attempted in the province of Prince Edward Island. I have the local law here before me. In the year 1872, the legislature undertook to re-invest some lands taken for Railway purposes. My hon. friend from Port Hill (Mr. Yeo) was in the legislature at the time and he remembers the controversy which occurred over the re-investing clauses better than I do. But the Prince Edward Island Act provides, although in different phraseology, for effecting the same object as is proposed to be effected by this bill in the laws of Canada. It makes all the necessary provisions by which the Provincial Government would be enabled to re-invest lands in the former owner, that they had formerly and conclusively expropriated and evade the total payment of the assessment of damages. All the damages to be paid would be for the injury done during the period the matter was under discussion. That measure caused a great deal of irritating discussion at the time it was passed, and it was never implemented, notwithstanding it was passed. There is this difference between that statute and the bill which we are asked to pass, that this provision was added to the provincial law :

Provided always, and it is here by declaired, that nothing in this Act contained shall apply to or affect any case of suit or proceeding for compension for lands taken from ready purposes under Act 34 Vict., chap. 4, now pending in any court of law, which said case, suit or proceeding shall have been commenced previous to the 20th June in the year of our Lord 1872.

Notwithstanding the great opposition and the injury which it was felt it would bring upon the proprietors in the province of Prince Edward Island, there was this careful provision attached to it, that it should not be retroactive and should not apply to any case pending at the time of the passing of the bill. But instead of that wholesome provision we have these words in section 4 of this Bill :

The provisions of sections 2 and 3 of this Act shall apply to lands heretofore taken as well as to lands hereafter taken for any public work.

That is a deliberate provision that the operation of the 2nd and 3rd clauses shall be retroactive and shall apply to cases of expropriation heretofore made and cases at the present time before the courts of justice in the country. I am not going to raise very strong objections to giving the government power to reinvest property providing the law at the time of the expropriation is as he proposes now to make it, although I think it is one that calls for very serious consideration.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What about railways?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is a very general question, and I do not see the bearing it has on my argument. Possibly the hon. gentleman may see it, but I do not. It would be very injurious legislation were we to pass these clauses and make them apply to cases where the expropriation has been made. When hon. gentlemen look at this carefully, they will see where the wrong comes in. A man owns a quarry or wharf, or any other property, and the government want some of that property or the whole of it, for a railway or canal or any other public work, and they have, under the Expropriation Act as it now stands on our statute-books, formally expropriated that land by filing a plan signed by the minister or deputy minister, in the public office as required by law, and they make a tender of an amount to the owner of that land. This is a case where the owner has declined to sign a deed, and where an amicable arrangement has not been possible. A tender of an amount is made to that man and the land is expropriated. It ceases to be his in every sense of the word. The only question now pending is to find the real amount of compensation. The government offer a certain amount and the owner thinks it is worth more and takes such proceedings as the law of the country has carefully provided for him and all others, to ascertain what that amount is by a court of competent jurisdiction. After he has taken these steps, the government come in and change the law, and take away that power on his part to get a judicial decision upon the expropriation as the government has made it. Before the government proposed to change the law, other conditions may have intervened and the owner of the land may have made other contracts, knowing this property was lawfully taken from him and vested in Her Majesty, and he invests the money he expects to realize for that property in some other business and he enters into contracts on the strength of this expropriation by the government. After he has done all that, the government pass this little bill which is now before us, and decide that they shall have power to put that land back on his hands. I dare say my hon. friend will tell me that that is a matter that will come up in the assessment of damages. I doubt it. I think it would be what is called consequential damages, and it would be very hard for him, when before the court, to get in evidence the whole matter as to what he had done on the assumption that the government had lawfully and irrevocably taken the land from him.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In that case there would be no controversy between the parties. This only applies where there is a controversy.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I fail to understand the relevance of that observation to the point I am discussing. I dare say there may be opinions entitled to more weight than mine, but my opinion is that it is very doubtful if he could yet consequential damages before the court. The controversy would be entirely narrowed down to this piece of property and to the damages in connection with that property, and although he might be ruined in consequence of other contracts he had entered into on the faith of this expropriation by the government of Canada, he would not be able to get the injury he had sustained, or the consequential damages he had suffered, before any court. At all events I cannot conceive why the Parliament of Canada should do such a thing as is proposed to be done by this bill—why we should make it retroactive under any circumstances. I have received no communication from any party that this bill affects. I am told there is a party whom it affects, and that it is in view of some transaction that is going on that this bill has been introduced. The gentleman referred to may have seen other members. He has not spoken to me. My views upon it are the result of my own reflections I believe this retroactive principle of the bill is an obnoxious one and that this House should not pass it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will the hon. gentleman agree to an amendment not to apply this in any case now pending?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly I would not, because it may be on account of existing evils that it is required. I have heard a case mentioned but I may tell the hon. gentleman that neither the name of the party nor the case was before me, nor considered by me at all, and I have no more information that the government intends to touch the case of the gentleman in controversy than I have of expropriating the property of the hon. gentleman in Vancouver.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Why this clause?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There may be many cases in which it would be very important.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am willing to accept the hon. gentleman's statement but there is no special case in view, but I may tell the hon. gentleman that if this bill were to pass it would simply ruin the property that have been expropriated in the case that has been alluded to. The government has expropriated the land already and they should not go back on that now. It would be a small matter for them, but important for the man whose property is taken.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the remainder of the property would be ruined, and rendered valueless, the court would take that into consideration in assessing the damage.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—No.

Hou. Mr. POWER—At whose suggestion has the measure been introduced?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice if what my hon. friend from Halifax has just said is the case? Suppose, for instance, the government were to expropriate a large piece of land for some purpose, be it what it may, for a railway or anything else, and after a certain length of time they find they do not want all that land, and then, in the language of the bill, they propose to re-vest it in the original owner. It may be quite possible that the part they have taken will render the rest of the property of very little value. It may also happen this way: Supposing the government have held the property for some time; there may be a great change in value; there may be a boom, or there may be the opposite result, and if the property is thrown back on the hands of the owner after some years he may find himself in possession of a piece of land not worth half what it was when the whole property was expropriated. If I understood properly what was said by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, he thinks that in this bill there is power given to the judge to take that matter into consideration, but I do not find any expression here which would lead me to suppose that such is the case.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Undoubtedly, the very object of the bill is to leave to the judge the freedom of deciding in what way the proposed changes may affect the property. Let me suppose, for instance, that the party asked such a sum for the property that, in the opinion of the government, a less area would be required or could be got on with, and the government proposed to reduce the amount, if the acceptance of the smaller area were to affect the value of what remained injuriously to the party who held it, that of course would be taken into consideration by the judge, and the bill was intended to cover that very case. If it does not cover the case, then it can be amended in committee so that it will. My hon. friend will see that unless it did meet a case of that sort the bill would, in some measure, be abortive. I think it will be found on examination that it does. I may say this in regard to pending cases—a case that has been tried will not be interfered with. If a case has been argued and dealt with by the court, there is no intention to interfere with it. That case is res judicata so far as the measure is concerned; but, in a case in controversy, that has not yet come before the court, surely the fact that the government may have expropriated ought to have no more influence in respect to this measure than if it were to be expropriated next year. The question is undealt with—the matter is not adjudicated upon—the matter has not been moved before the court, and the government ought to be as free to refer that case to the court for adjudication as anything that might arise five years hence. There could be in principle no difference, and I think there is no principle better settled in law than this, that any alterations of the law of evidence or procedure shall be applicable to any case not yet dealt with by the courts, as much as any case that may arise after the passage of the law.

Hon. Mr. POWER—From whom does the suggestion for this legislation come?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It came from two or three sources, but I do not know whether I would be altogether at liberty to say. I may say, however, that I received most important suggestions from the Exchequer Court judge himself in reference to these measures.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Does not clause 4 make the bill apply to cases where the lands may have been expropriated half a dozen years ago? Supposing land was expropriated three or four years ago, would this bill affect it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the question has not yet been passed upon—if it is in controversy between the party and the government, it would apply to such a case; but if it is a case that is before the court for decision, of course to such a case it would not apply, because that matter could no longer be said to be in controversy between the party and the government.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I take it that it would apply to where there would be no controversy at all—to where a man had accepted the offer of the government, but the government proposed three or four years afterwards, finding they did not want all the area taken, to apply this principle to that land.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think not. "Whenever from time to time, or at any time before the compensation money has been actually paid" is the expression used. We can put in further words there if they are necessary.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—May I ask the hon. Minister of Justice this. Supposing the the government expropriated more land than they wanted, and after the work has been finished they find they had taken more than they wanted, and they said we will expect you to pay us the increased value. Supposing this land is returned and it is proved to the satisfaction of the judge that it has very much increased in value by the public work, will the man be obliged not only to take his land back again, but to pay the increased value of his land?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not the intention to make the party take back the land and pay for the improved value that it has received in consequence of any public work constructed. My hon. friend will see this only applies to matters in controversy. If a party's land is expropriated and the government agree upon the terms, or if they do not agree, and he has already been paid the value of the land, that is a complete transaction and there is no power to be given, or intended to be given, to the government to re-open a case of that sort, and if any further words than those in the bill are necessary to make that plain, I am prepared to favourably consider them in committee.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The one objectionable feature of the bill, to my mind, is to compel the owner to take the land back. Why not leave the matter an open question and put it up for sale, and let any other person take it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The land belongs to him, and we are applying a principle that we recognize in every railway charter that we give to a private company in this country. If we give a charter to a railway company we authorize them to expropriate land. They expropriate, and the lands become the property of the company. If, for any reason, the railway company fails to construct the road, the land reverts to the original owner. We do not permit the company to put up the land at auction and sell a strip through a man's property. The government adheres to the same principle in this measure.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—It is with some diffidence that I rise to question the accuracy of the hon. gentleman's position. As the opposition seems to come from this side of the House mainly, I rise to deprecate, what is often stated and promulgated in the country, and fostered by the opponents of of this chamber, that there is any organized opposition to government measures in this House because there happens to be a Conservative majority in it. I am sure I voice the sentiment of every Conservative member of this House when I say that nothing could be further from the fact, and that every measure introduced here is intended, so far as Conservative members are concerned, to be dealt with solely on its merits. This bill, according to the explanation given by the hon. gentleman who leads this House, is of the most simple and innocent character, and it is so simple that almost anybody would be lead to look over it and to admit the honesty of the measure; but inasmuch as in the ancient days the Trojans were instructed to look carefully after the Greeks, when they came to them presenting gifts, so I think it is the duty of this House to look carefully into every measure that is introduced here, even though it may be in the very highest way, apparently "a boon and a blessing to men, like Pickwick the Owl and the Waverly pen" as the advertisement says. If under the Expropriation Act, the government expropriates more land than is required, there is no way of returning the unnecessary land to the original owner, or indeed to anybody else, and the government apparently wish to take to themselves the authority of doing so in case such a contingency arises. Now, this measure if passed in its present state, would work as I say, and as many other members of this House recognize, a very gross injustice to individuals, and while the position which the leader of the government in this House occupies, on account of his very high character for honour and probity, and fair judicial mind, would prevent any one insinuating that he would be party to any legislation whereby, even in the public interest, the rights of private individuals could be tampered with, and while it might be urged that the assurance which has been given by that hon. gentleman this afternoon as to what would be done under certain conditions might entitle us to leave the matter trusting him as we do, in his hands, still I must point out that we should look beyond that. Ministers change, or die, or are translated to other departments, and the not impossible condition might arise that even the strongest government itself might change and be superseded by another, and I should like to see this House provide against any possibility of an incoming Tory administration having placed in its hands the power to use such a very severe engine as they would have if this measure were to become law, and which they might use very disastrously against their Liberal opponents. Mention has been made here today of a certain case. The name of the case has not been mentioned, but I see no reason why it should not be. I refer to the case of Mr. Archie Stewart, a well known Ottawa contractor. If the House will bear with me for a moment, nothing will bring to their minds more clearly the operation of this bill, if it becomes law, than a recital of the steps that have been taken with reference to this case of Mr. Stewart. I might say parenthetically that Mr. Stewart is a Tory—not that I wish to suggest for one moment that his political proclivities would have the slightest effect on the treatment that would be meted out to him in case this measure becomes law. Mr. Stewart, being a Tory, had a contract under the late government on the Soulanges Canal. He had done a large amount of work on it, and for his purpose he had acquired a very large plant and implements, all that was necessary to carry on the work on that contract, and his acquirements included a quarry from which the stone intended for the construction of this work was excavated. Now, after the change of administration it became evident to the incoming government that it would be better to complete this section as a government work. Notice was given to Mr. Stewart that his contract was cancelled and at the same time the government proceeded to confiscate, or expropriate, not only the land which they thought they needed, and which belonged to Mr. Stewart, but also all his plant and implements, and the stone which he had excavated in connection with his work. To show you what they did expropriate in this case, I will read some paragraphs from Mr. Stewart's petition of right:

On said last mentioned day Her Majesty, represented by the Hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, took forcible possession of the said works and of all the plant and material belonging to your suppliant which he had then on or about the said work and in or about his quarry aforesaid and elsewhere, and converted the same to Her own use and benefit, and your suppliant was then prevented and has been since and still is prevented from completing the said contract and extra works, and has been deprived of the profits which he would have made if permitted to complete the same amounting to $150,000.

The said plant and material so taken and converted by Her Majesty were of the value of $90,000 and upwards, and consisted of one tug, two scows, two pumps, forty derricks, eight hoists, 100 crowbars and 100 picks, the contents of two blacksmith shops, the contents of two carpenter shops, one steam shovel, 100 excavation cars, a large quantity of bar iron, timber and steel, several barrels of oil, a large quantity of explosives and dynamite, a large quantity of saws and railroad iron and scrapers, one stone crusher, and one sand pump and scow and other plant and material, of which the Department of Railways and Canals have particulars.

Her Majesty also seized stone then the property of Her Majesty but formerly the property of your suppliant and prepared by him for use on the said works, to wit, 9,000 cubic yards of stone at the Rockland quarry, for which Her Majesty paid your suppliant $8 per cubic yard, 3,000 cubic yards of cut stone at the Cascades Point on which Her Majesty paid your suppliant $11 per cubic yard and 24,250 yards of backing at Rockland on which Her Majesty paid your suppliant $2 per cubic yard, whereupon the said stone became the property of Her Majesty.

Your suppliant, by deed dated the 8th day of March, 1894, and registered in the registry office of the county of Carleton on the 19th day of March, 1894, as security for the due fulfilment of said contract, granted to Her Majesty $64\frac{3}{100}$ acres therein described as the easterly part of lot letter "F," in concession "D," Rideau front, of the township of Nepean, in the county of Carleton, which said mortgage was conditioned that Her Majesty would, on due performance of said works, discharge said mortgage and release your suppliant therefrom.

So that this gentleman had all his property expropriated—his quarries, his implements and his plant, and, also, the mortgage which he had placed upon his land as a security for the due performance of that contract which existed then still exists. The government proceeded with their expropriation. They filed a map whereby a certain amount of land was set out as expropriated for their purposes. Mr. Stewart, on investigating this plan, discovered that the expropriation was marked upon it for two years only. His solicitors advised him that such a temporary expropriation was altogether illegal, that the government had no power to expropriate for a limited time, and that he should prevent the government from taking possession of the property. The steps which Mr. Stewart took at that time are set out in an affidavit from which I shall read a few paragraphs to show the position occupied by him and by the government. This is the affidavit of Mr. Stewart on that petition of right:

6. About the 8th of January, 1898, the said Biggar informed me that the said Hon. Minister of Railways and Canals only intended to expropriate the said part of the said quarry lands and said railway for a period of two years and that a plan of the portions expropriated was filed in the said registry office for the county of Russell on the 3rd January, 1898.

7. Immediately afterwards I took the advice of my solicitor about such temporary expropriation, and he informed me that the same was ineffectual and illegal, and I thereupon on or about the 10th day of January, 1898, retook possession of the said lands and the said railway sought to be expropriated and shown on said plan, and I tore up part of the railway to prevent the same being used, and I then and until after my interview with the Deputy Minister of Justice hereinafter referred to did prevent the said the Hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, and his employees and workmen from using said quarry or said railway, and I gave them notice that I would not allow them, or any of them, to use the said quarry lands and railway unless and until a valid expropriation thereof was made, and thereupon the said employees did no more work or interfere with my property until after I had the arrangement with the Deputy Minister of Justice hereinafter referred to.

8. After I retook possession I saw Mr. Schreiber, the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, in his office in Ottawa, about the 11th of January, 1898, and I gave him notice not to meddle again with my quarry property and railway, as the attempted expropriation was illegal, and the said Schreiber then informed me that the Department of Railways and Canals was acting under the advice of the Deputy Minister of Justice and would so continue to act as advised by him and he then left me to go over to see the Deputy Minister of Justice.

9. That afterwards, on the 11th day of January, 1898, I saw Mr. Newcombe, the Deputy Minister of Justice in his office and remonstrated with him about such a temporary expropriation being attempted which I contended was only a trespass and would not entitle me to claim compensation under the statute for the property and railway taken, and he then informed me, and I believe the fact to be, that he was advising and representing the Department of Railways and Canals in and about the expropriation of the portion of my said quarry lands and railway of which a plan was filed as aforesaid, that the temporary expropriation thereof for two years was made in his absence and the same was not, in his opinion, legal and that he had so advised Mr. Schreiber who had just seen him upon the matter.

10. The said Deputy Minister of Justice then also stated that the Minister of Railways and Canals required the portions of the land and railway taken for the purposes of completing the contract work on the Soulanges Canal, and that the same would have to be absolutely expropriated for the use of Her Majesty, and he then promised me that if I permitted the Minister of Railways and Canals and his officers to retake possession of the said quarry land and railway that the same would be at once regularly expropriated absolutely for Her Majesty under the statute in that behalf, and that all proceedings in that behalf would be regularly taken to vest the property in Her Majesty and to give me the right to claim the compensation therefor which he promised would be determined as soon as possible in accordance with the provision of the statute.

11. That on said promise and assurance being made to me by Mr. Newcombe I stated that I would be required to give up possession, and I accordingly, and in pursuance of said agreement, and not otherwise, gave up possession of the said lands and railway to Her Majesty, represented by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals and his engineers and workmen, which I would not have done unless said arrangement was come to, and Her Majesty, represented by the said minister and his workmen and servants, then immediately and in pursuance of the arrangement aforesaid entered and took possession of the said portions of said quarry lands and railway now mentioned in the information herein and they have since remained in the possesson thereof and have used the same by quarrying thereupon and taking therefrom a large amount of stone and conveying same over said railway for the purpose of using same on said contract works on said canal, and they are still using and in the possession of the same for the said purposes.

The result of these proceedings was this: that when the suit went into court, the government, finding that their position was illegal and entirely untenable, were obliged to make an application to the Exchequer Court for permission to discontinue their suit. Permission to do so was granted and they withdrew the suit, paying all costs up to that date. That, you would think, should end it up to a certain point, but they were determined still to have Mr. Stewart's land. With that view they filed another map and plan and proceeded to expropriate the land, legally this time. They went through the proper proceedings to do so and took the land under the Expropriation Act and now own it. Under the Act, which this bill is introduced to amend, they are liable to pay Mr. Stewart for the damage attendant thereupon. This is the position in which the case stands just now. One would have supposed, after all that trouble they got into by their mode of proceeding, that the next step the government would have taken would have been to ascertain, as nearly as possible, what amount of land they actually did need and expropriate that and that only. That they did not do so is evidenced from an affidavit which I have here from Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, filed in this suit, and from which I will read a couple of paragraphs for the information of the House. Mr. Schreiber states:

4. I learned from the facts pleaded by the defendant in his statement of defence and his deposition upon discovery herein, which was taken on 27th day of September, 1898, and upon examination of the said plan and description produced herewith as exhibit "B," having regard to the statements so pleaded and deposed to, that the extent of land shown and set forth by the said exhibit "B," was considerably greater, and that the effect of the taking or expropriation of such lands from the defendant would be considerably more injurious to him than was intended by the minister or by the government of Canada, and that the same were also greater than was necessary or desired for the purposes of the said public work, or for any purpose authorized by the said statute, and it appeared to me, therefore, that an error or mis-statement of description had occurred in the plan or description so filed, as aforesaid, on 13th January, 1898, and I thereupon called the matter to the attention of the Minister of Railway and Canals, who, in order to comply with the said statute and for the purpose of correcting such mis-statement and error, directed an amended plan and description to be deposited, setting forth correctly the lands actually required and actually taken by Her Majesty for the purposes aforesaid, such amended plan and description was therefore prepared immediately and duly signed by the Minister, and the same was duly deposited and filed in the said registry office, and now stands as the plan and description showing the lands of the defendant acquired and taken for the purpose of the said public work, a copy of the same being herewith exhibited and produced as exhibit "A."

5. All stone necessary for the completion of the said contract has now been quarried upon the said lands, and, with the exception of a portion of the same, the said minister of Railways and Canals has no further use for the lands in the said amended plan described and set forth, and is ready and willing that the said defendant should have a full free and uninterrupted use and enjoyment thereof.

In other words, after having forcibly dispossessed this man of his quarry and taken the stone out of it, they are now generously disposed to give him back—what? The hole in the ground. I suppose that they take credit to themselves in their claim that they are doing very well for Mr. Stewart on the "Hole." I remember an old axiom which we learned in Euclid, that the whole is greater than the part. Although the government are only applying in this bill for permission to give back part of the land, they intend to be more generous to Mr. Stewart, and to give him back the Hole. I remember a story of Mark Twain's, one of his earlier works, in which he describes himself as being a member of a shipwrecked crew that was put off so hurriedly from their ship that they did not have enough provisions on board to go around, and they were obliged to eke out their existence by eating their boots, and Mark Twain said: "My boots were a very old pair, full of holes; but I do not know that the holes did not taste as good as the balance of the boot." I do not think Mr. Stewart is going to get very fat, financially or physically, upon the hole the government are prepared to give him in lieu of what they have expropriated from him. Besides this case of Stewart's, I would instance another, that of Chief Justice Armour, where he had land expropriated by the government for work on the Trent River Valley Canal. Justice Armour sued the government and he has a judgment against them for $14,000, I think. The case has been appealed, and now stands before the Supreme Court for judgment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This bill would not apply to that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—We have the statement of the hon. minister that it would not, and I take his word for it that it is his intention that it should not, but he cannot control the government and cannot control the law, and a different interpretation can be put on that law than that which he says should be placed upon it. I give him credit when he says he intends it should be a fair Act, and not apply to these individual cases, but I am pointing out where it does apply to the individuals, and does a wrong to private parties. And, moreover, were it not for the position the hon. gentleman occupies in this House and the assurance he has given us, I would say that the introduction of this Act in the House has a suspicious look, and that perhaps it was thought it might be put through without a great deal of discussion. Last session a bill slid through without discussion and became law, which a great many people regret; and if this bill went to the Lower House the subservient majority there would make it law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What bill does the hon. gentleman refer to?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I will explain to the hon. Secretary of State all about it. I do not care to discuss it here. I merely mention it. We want to guard against such an occurrence now, and in that view, I beg to advise the government that when this bill goes into committee I intend to move an amendment to clause 4; so that it shall read:

> The provisions of sections 2 and 3 of this Act shall apply to lands heretofore taken, as well as to lands hereinafter taken, for any public work, but shall not apply to lands heretofore taken with respect to which any action, suit, or other proceeding is pending at the date of the passing of this Act.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—That is a very simple amendment which will exactly cover what the hon. leader of the House said was his intention, and I cannot see that the hon. gentleman can have any objection to such an amendment as that being passed when the bill is in committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has introduced a large amount of extraneous matter into this discussion which I think is not at all pertinent to the question, and, unknowingly, he has made statements which are wholly at variance with the facts. Mr. Stewart had the contract for sections one and two on the Soulanges Canal. As the hon. gentleman knows, the government announced a year and a half ago that they desired to have the canal finished in the year 1898, and the new contracts were given out with that understanding. The contract existing with Stewart ought to have been completed long before this, and Stewart was urged to push the work on. Advances were made to him on the stone, and on the plant, and in every possible way assistance was given, in order that the work might be completed. It appeared, however, to the department, that it would be impossible to get the work completed in the time; therefore notice was given under the contract that, as the work was not being proceeded with as actively as the interests of the Crown required, in view of the necessity for opening the canal, the contract was, with very great regret, taken out of his hands. The new contractors desired to use the stone out of this quarry, and so it was proposed to the department to expropriate the property. They did not need all that quarry, and they now propose to take only a portion of it. They propose to pay Mr. Stewart for all the stone they took out of the hole that the hon. gentleman so sarcastically alluded to. They do not propose to take anything from him without giving him fair compensation. It would be for the judge of court before whom the inquiry is made to say what damages are fair, and the hon. gentleman's experience will have taught him that in all those cases against the Crown pretty large damages—usually very much larger than the actual damage—are usually recovered. The hon. gentleman has quoted a most important case which is now before the courts, and he has referred to the possibility of this bill affecting that case. I think he is going too far in making a positive statement to that effect. The case has been adjucated upon, and has been before two tribunals, and now before the final one. That case could not be considered under this Act. It is not intended to cover it. If the hon. gentleman has any doubt about it, it will be very easy to correct that when the bill is in committee. It is certainly not intended to refer to any case that has been disposed of by the judge. The case of Stewart, which he has referred to, has not yet been before the judge. If it had been before the judge, I certainly say it should not be considered as being covered by this bill.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—It was before the judge, and at the instance of the government, it was withdrawn, and a new case begun.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then should the Crown be in any different position from private individual? We all know that individuals have the privilege of making amendments or changes, so long as they do not affect the rights of parties, and these amendments should be taken into consideration by the court. I am quite sure that when the bill is in committee, if there is any reasonable proposition, it will be excepted; but certainly not the one of which notice has been given, because it would preclude the possibility of cases now commenced being considered.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—As I understand the question, two cases have already been tried upon the question, and the case now pending is an action for damage for expropriation of a quarry, and I presume the expropriation of the plant.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, not the plant.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—In the previous Act which was passed—the Exchequer Court Act—the hon. leader of the government in this House said the government desired to be able to implement, or to interpose arguments before the court with regard to any case that was still subjudice, and it is just possible that in the case which has been mentioned by the hon. gentleman who is opposing this bill, the claimant wants to claim damages for the loss of his contract, and under the old Act this new case might be in such a position that that would have to be taken into consideration. The government want to limit it simply to the expropropriation of the quarry itself, whereas involved in that question of the quarry is the greater damage of the loss of the contract. It seems to me, taking the two bills together, that that is just about the position in which the government desires to place this case that is now before the court. Whether any further information will be given upon this particular case or not, I certainly think that the claimant should have the benefit of whatever rights he had before this Act came into force; and that those rights should not be taken away from him by any legislation subsequent to the action which is now before the court. For that reason, I think the retroactive legislation, so far as it applies to that case, is injurious.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Shell River is in error in supposing that the damages for the loss of the contract could be affected by this measure. It has nothing to do with that matter. This is simply with reference to the land. I do not rise to continue the discussion, but I wish to direct the attention of the Minister in charge of the bill to the fact that, inasmuch as amendments are likely to be made to the bill in committee, there is an amendment which I think should be made to the second clause of the bill. The second clause reads:

2. Whenever, from time to time, or at any time before the compensation money has been actually paid, any parcel of land taken for a public work, or any portion of any such parcel, is found to be unnecessary for the purposes of such public work, or if it be found that a more limited estate or interest therein only is required, the Minister may by writing under his hand declare that the same is not required and is abandoned by the Crown, or that it is intended to retain only such limited estate or interest as is mentioned in such writing, and upon such writing being registered in the office of the registrar of deeds for the county or registration division in which the land is situated such land declared to be abandoned shall revest in the person from whom the same was taken or in those entitled to claim under him.

It seems to me, hon. gentlemen that that is rather too informal a way in which to transfer the title of land, and that the signature of the minister, or deputy minister, should be authenticated in the same way as the signatures to deeds and other documents which are registered in the registry offices are now authenticated. That seems not an unreasonable thing. A mere bald writing, purporting to be signed by a minister or deputy minister, is not quite as solemn a document as should be required to transfer the title to valuable property.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P. E. I.)—I have listened with some attention to the debate on this bill, and I have not yet heard the objection brought forward which appears to me to be the one that I should urge against the bill myself. It seems to me this bill is taking away from the subject a certain right which he now possesses: that is the right to use his own land and property for his own use and benefit, and it is putting into the hands of the government a power which they do not possess up to the present time. That is, that they may take this man's property and use it for a certain time and after they have paid him for the use of that property, which they may have for days, months, weeks or years, that they may after having kept him for that time out of the money which he should receive for it, convey it back to him and say "we will pay you whatever damage has accrued to your property." I take it that it is absolutely the property of the man to whom it was originally granted, and that if it is required by the government for any purpose whatever, they should pay him the full value of the property awarded him by the court which is established for the purpose of deciding what that value is, and that it is unjust that the original owner of the property should be compelled to take back a portion which the government say they do not require. Entertaining that opinion, until I find that it is an erronous one, I am disposed to oppose the bill in toto.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Perhaps the House will permit me to say a few words in reply to the objections urged against the bill. My hon. friend on the opposite side (Mr. Kirchhoffer) has given us an account of Mr. Stewart's case and of his claim against the Crown, and has read from a petition of right setting out what the claim is. The impression that is made on my hon. friend by so much of the document as he has read is not a strictly accurate impression. Mr. Stewart, as my hon. friend the Secretary of State has informed the House, had a contract for the construction of a section of the Soulanges Canal. That contract he was not able to fulfill. I think the time expired a good while ago, and Mr. Stewart was urged and facilities were furnished him for the purpose of going forward and completing the contract. He did not work upon it for several months before it was taken from him. It is true he was using this quarry in connection with the contract. He purchased it for a very modest consideration. The government had advanced money upon stone that had been quarried and piled upon the property beside the quarry, and Mr. Stewart objected, as I understand it, to taking away stone unless they compensated him for the land upon which the stone had been piled, claiming they were trespassers if they even went on the land to take away the stone for which money had been advanced. An expropriation was made, not of the whole of Mr. Stewart's quarry, but of a small section of it, and even that small section was more than the government required, and one of Mr. Stewart's contentions was, "Your expropriation blocks the way to the remainder of my quarry," a quarry for which, if I remember right, he had paid about two thousand dollars, but for which he is suing the government in damages to the amount of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. So hon. gentlemen will understand what sort of claim is being set up against the administration. One of the difficulties, I understood, in the way of Mr. Stewart's getting on was that the stone in the quarry proved very much inferior to what the contractor thought it was when the purchase was made, and a good deal of the stone was condemned by the engineer, on the ground that it was shaky and unfit for use in building a canal. There is no doubt whatever, from the reports which have been made to us, that there was an immense quantity of waste and there was a good deal of loss in labour and time in undertaking to obtain quarry stone from there. In fact, the only justification, so far as I know, was its convenience. We have been asked why Mr. Stewart was not allowed to go on and complete the work after the time had expired. Well, there were very important legal questions arising in connection with it. It has been held by very high authority in England, decided more than once, that if you permit a party to go on with work after the time has expired within which the work was to be completed, that you cannot hold him to the term of the contract—that he is entitled to payment quantum meruit, because, time being the essence of the contract, and the time having expired, the work which might subsequently be done would no longer be work done under the contract. At the present time, Mr. Stewart has permission to bring suit against the present administration. I have not inquired recently whether this suit has been brought or not, but it was a suit for all claims, not specially for payment for the quarry, and where the Crown might have an opportunity of setting up its claims by way of counter charges against Mr. Stewart. Now, Mr. Stewart's claim may have some merit in it, but whether it has or not it is, at all events, not before the courts at the present time, and I know of no reason myself why, if the rule which has been suggested by the bill be a sound a proper, rule to apply in other cases, it should not apply in this case. My hon. friend has referred to the government filing plans for a less area of land. That is perfectly true, but the whole area is far less than the area which Mr. Stewart claims he is entitled to compensation for. While all those matters can be before the courts, if the government in the expropriation of any portion of the quarry expropriated in such a way as to preclude Mr. Stewart from the use of the balance of the quarry, and he can establish that fact, there is no doubt whatever that the court would take that into consideration, and would give him damages accordingly. But that does not touch the question as to whether Mr. Stewart is entitled to compensation directly for a larger area than the government actually used or required. If, in its use, they damaged the remaining portion of the quarry making it impossible for him to use the balance, and that can be shown, all that will be a matter of damages, and there is nothing in this bill that would take any right from him in that regard. All we do by this bill is to give the Crown a right to take a less area than what was originally contemplated, and that whether it applies to a case where expropriation has now taken place, where the question is one not disposed of between the party and the Crown, or whether it refers to some future case, can make no possible difference. If it would be unjust in an existing case, it would be equally unjust in any case that might arise five years hence. In matters of expropriation, the Crown takes as much land as it deems necessary in the public interest. The Crown in expropriating exercises an inherent prerogative, that of eminent domain, and when my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island spoke about land belonging to parties, I think that he was somewhat confused in his notion as to the ground upon which the Crown makes claim in these cases. The Crown has the right of eminent domain. It expropriates such lands belonging to private parties as it thinks the public interest calls for, and the private party is entitled to compensation for that. The Crown is not more arbitrary in that matter than is a railway corporation to whom you have given power of expropriation. If the Crown has taken more land than it actually requires, or a larger estate than is actually necessary, I know of no reason or ground why it should not be at liberty to lessen the area. It is not like dealing with personal property. It does not transfer the property to some other locality. It is entirely in the nature of things, and what remains after the Crown has taken what is required is exactly in the same position it was before the expropriation took place. My hon. friend opposite referred to derricks and other property that belonged to Mr. Stewart which was taken. All that property was pledged to other parties. The Crown did not acquire that property. Money had been advanced to Mr. Stewart by other parties on that plant and their rights in that regard are paramount. I do not wish to discuss Mr. Stewart's case here. This is not the tribunal before which it will be tried. There is no doubt he will be fairly dealt with by the courts, but to undertake to prejudice the interests of the public by representing the government as having, in some arbitrary way, taken the property of Mr. Stewart is no advantage to Mr. Stewart nor is it in the public interest to do so.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I should like to mention a case concerning the eminent domain showing that the demand of the government is not exhorbitant. It is to be found in all our city and town Corporation Acts. By this law, which is general throughout the country, a city can homologate a plan of streets to be expropriated, hold it for a number of years, and tie it in the hands of the owner of the land for a number of years and, without any compensation to the party who has been even paying taxes upon that land, erase that line from the homologated plan ten or fifteen years after, and leave the party without recourse or compensation. By the present bill we have the same right given to the government to release a piece of property which it may find, at a latter period, it had no need for; but I would think that the party under this present law would be entitled to compensation for whatever loss he incurred while the reconveyed property was in the hands of the government.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—After having listened attentively to the very clear explanation given by the hon. Minister of Justice, I cannot help but think still that this bill, if it should pass, will necessarily work mischief. Take an example; supposing the person has gone before the Exchequer Court and the assessment for damages is made and the case closed. The suit is to all intents and purposes ended. Then the government can come in, according to clause 2, abandon a portion of the property and give it back to the individual. What will the consequence be? The case will have to be re-opened and a new assessment made, and you see in what a position the subject is placed by this bill. I believe that we should not pass the bill as it stands, taking away unnecessarily rights that belong to the subject and giving to any government such powers as can be made use of certainly to the detriment and annoyance of the subject. That instance that I have given, ought, in my humble opinion, to be sufficient to induce the government to change the bill in such a manner as to protect any land owner or any citizen of Canada from being placed in such a position. At all events, if the bill is to have no retroactive effect, as the Hon. Minister of Justice has said, the wording of clause 4 ought to be amended. I cannot vote for this bill as it now stands.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, 25th April, 1899.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (G) "An Act respecting the Imperial Life Assurance Company of Canada."—(Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell).

DISMISSALS FOR PARTISANSHIP.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I beg to give notice:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid on the Table of the Senate, the names of all Commissioners appointed by Order in Council or otherwise since the 9th April, 1897, to inquire into and report upon charges preferred against any employé of the Government, whether permanent or temporary, of offensive partizanship, or of any misconduct whatever.

2. The reports of said Commissioners, or of Commissioners previously appointed, not already brought down, and a statement showing the action taken by the Government thereon.

3. The amounts paid each Commissioner since the 9th April, 1897, in fees, per diem allowance, travelling expenses and incidentals of all kinds.

4. The names, ages, offices and salaries of all employés in the inside or outside service of the Government, whether temporary or permanent, who since the 9th April, 1897, have been removed from office by dismissal, superannuation, or otherwise, whether on a report of a Commission or otherwise, specifying in each case the grounds of dismissal, and the amount of superannuation or gratuity granted, if any; also, the age, office, salary or renumeration of any and every person appointed in the place of, or as a consequence of every such removal.

He said:—This, my hon. friend will see dates from the time the last report was brought down affecting the dismissals for partisanship or for other causes. While on my feet, if it is not out of order to ask the question without giving notice, I would like to inquire whether any of the expenses incurred by those officials who were put upon trial and found not guilty have been repaid or recouped to the persons whose conduct had been investigated? My hon. friend, the Secretary of State, will no doubt remember that I asked the late Minister of Justice, the Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat, whether he did not think it was fair that the parties who had been placed upon trial and who had to employ counsel and send for witnesses, who were acquitted on the report of the commissioners, should not be recouped the expenses to which they were put. I know one or two cases where it bears very hard and is very oppressive on parties who were put to heavy expenses—expenses which exceeded in amount the salaries they had received for the year. It is a matter not only of justice, but equity, that those persons should be recouped.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to answer the hon. gentleman's question at this moment, but I will make inquiry.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then I suppose it will not be necessary to put any notice on the paper.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I think not.

REDUCTION OF CITY POST OFFICES.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

By Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell :—That he will ask the government, whether the Postmaster General has, during the past year, or at any other time, reduced any city post office to that of a town office, as was done on the plea of economy in the case of the city of Belleville, namely : the cities of Toronto, Hamilton, London, Ottawa, Windsor, Montreal, Quebec, Fredericton, St. John, Halifax, Charlottetown, and Victoria? If not, why have not those cities which the public accounts show, as set forth in a tabular statement to be found on page 211 of the official reports of the Debates of the Senate of the 14th March, 1898, cost a greater percentage of the revenue collected to perform the duties of said offices, than did that of Belleville reduced ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can the hon. minister answer this inquiry now ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I can answer the hon. gentleman's second and third questions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Deal with the first. I will put the question and my hon. friend will say if he can answer it or not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot answer it. I have sent to the department for information, but they told me it was in course of preparation.

NEW POST OFFICES SINCE JULY 12TH, 1896.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to :—

Ask the government, how many new post offices have been opened since the 12th July, 1896; the names of said post offices; where situated; the names of said postmasters, and the additional number of miles which have to be travelled to serve said offices ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have in detail the information for which the hon. gentleman asks. SCHOOL LANDS IN MANITOBA.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate :—

1. The number of acres of land set apart for the purpose of education in the province of Manitoba and in the North-west Territories, respectively, under authority of chapter 54, Revised Statutes of Canada, section 23.

2. The number of acres sold in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, the amount received in payment therefor, and the amount now due thereon.

3. The total sum now at the credit of said fund held by the Dominion of Canada, how invested, and the rate of interest paid thereon.

4. The amount advanced out of said principal sum in aid of education in the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories.

5. The sum recouped to the said principal out of the proceeds of the sale of lands set apart for the purpose of education, and the amount now due to said principal sum.

6. And all correspondence relating to any further advance or advances out of said school fund, either to Manitoba or the North-west Council.

He said :—My reason for asking for this information is that the Senate may be in possession of all the facts connected with the administration of the school fund in Manitoba in view of the probability that this House will again be asked this session to deal with that question in the way of advances. Those who have paid any attention to the proceedings of the local legislature of Manitoba will understand precisely what I mean by the remarks I have made. The question there has been discussed, and further demands are to be made on the government of the Dominion in reference to these lands, one of which is the total surrender of all the lands set apart for school purposes to the government of Manitoba, who claim that they can manage the lands much better and more economically in the interest of the school fund than it can be administered by the Dominion Government. There may be some truth in the contention of the Manitoba Government in this respect. There may be other and very serious reasons why the concessions asked for should not be granted. However, that is not a question that I propose to discuss now. My sole object is to have the Senate in full possession of all the facts connected with the administration of the school lands since they were set apart for school purposes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the return being brought down, but I have just been handed a return from the Department of the Interior which I think covers nearly all the ground. It is a supplementary return to an address of the Senate dated 31st March, 1898, for a statement of the quantity of lands allotted in the province of Manitoba, the quantity of land sold and the prices at which sold, the amount received on account, the amount still due to the government, the manner in which this fund is invested and administered, the amount already paid to the province of Manitoba, how much on capital, if any, how much on interest; the amount still at the credit of the province, whether capital or interest; the date of payment in each case, and also papers, &c., relating thereto up to date. It is a very large return. It was moved for by the hon. senator from Manitoba and I think covers all the information asked for. If there is any point that it does not cover, I shall be very glad to see that it is brought down at the earliest possible date.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This does not include anything since the return was moved for last year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, there has been, I think a sale since that time.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, there has been no sale.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will look through the return and see what further information is required.

PROPOSED PACIFIC CABLE BETWEEN CANADA AND AUSTALIA.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all correspondence and communications bearing upon the subject of the proposed Pacific Cable between Canada and the Australian Colonies, not already laid before Parliament, together with a copy of the agreement entered into between Her Majesty's Government and the Eastern Extension Company, bearing date the 28th day of October, 1893, granting to that company exclusive rights to land a cable in Hong Kong; also the reports of the Imperial Commission on the subject of the laying of a submarine cable between Canada and Australia.

He said:—When I placed this motion on the notice paper, the government had not then announced its policy in connection with this great enterprise. They have however done so since it has been on the notice paper, and I have come to the conclusion that it is better not to proceed with the discussion of the question at the present moment. I have no desire whatever to say one word which would interfere with the negotiations, or have a tendency in that direction, for the construction of the cable. I express my very great gratification at the course the government have taken in connection with it, and as the whole subject may be brought under the notice of the Senate, when a discussion will necessarily follow the proposal which has been made by the government, with the consent of the House I would withdraw the motion for the present, leaving the discussion until the Bill is brought before the Senate granting a certain subsidy in order to aid the Australian Colonies and England in the construction of the work. Other facts have transpired since I placed this motion on the notice paper, which will be of interest to Canada as a whole, and with it we can deal more fully when the proper time arrives for the discussion of this question.

The motion was withdrawn.

THE FRANCHISE ACT.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid upon the Table of the Senate, copies of all correspondence between the government of Canada, or any member thereof, and the government of any of the provinces of the Dominion, relative to amendments to the Franchise Act of said province or provinces having for their objects the giving the right of appeal to a judge by any voter for redress whose name may have been omitted from a voters' list, either by accident or design; and for the striking off from the voters' list the name or names of persons improperly placed thereon.

He said:—I put a somewhat similar inquiry some little time ago upon the paper in connection with this subject. The answer I received from the Minister of Justice was that he did not know whether any correspondence had taken place. Secondly, when the question was repeated a few days afterwards his reply was that representations had been made to the provinces. When I asked for further information as to the nature of the replies received, the answer was "You did not ask that question, consequently I am not in a position to answer it." The Senate I think will consider it rather singular—I will not say evasive, because probably that would be considered unparliamentary, that the head of a department, from whom representations of this kind must necessarily be sent, should not be prepared to say, without a formal motion, whether correspondence had taken place and whether answers had been received to such correspondence. I can readily understand that he might say "I am not prepared to lay that correspondence upon the table, be cause the House has not asked for it." Hence my reason for asking whether the correspondence had taken place, what answer had been received, and what is likely to follow. Those of us who were present during the discussion of the Franchise Bill will remember very well the strong position taken by the great majority of this House in favour of an appeal being allowed to the judges, in those provinces where no appeal is allowed under the provincial law, against any fraudulent acts on the part of those who prepared the voters' lists, or who might, through accident and without any design at all, leave names off which should be on, and place names on of persons who should not be on. We know we have this right in Ontario, and we have it in one or two of the other provinces, and it is a right that I think ought to prevail in all the provinces. What I desire to know now, is, what action the government has taken upon this, to my mind, very important question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think that the answer I gave the hon. gentleman the other day is open to the criticism which the hon. gentleman has made. The hon. gentleman put me a question. I told him I would inquire. The hon. gentleman assumes that if there was any communication upon the subject, it must necessarily be a communication to myself as head of the Justice Department. That does not follow at all. It is not necessarily a legal question of a character that ought to originate, or be communicated to a government of one of the provinces by the Minister of Justice. In fact, strictly and constitutionally speaking, the only organ of official communication with the provincial governments is my hon. friend beside me, the Secretary of State. As I understood the hon. gentleman when he put the question, the statement had been made, when the Franchise Act was under discussion in the other House, by the Prime Minister that he would communicate with the governments or with the Prime Ministers of the provinces where a different rule prevailed. I made inquiry of the Prime Minister whether any such communication had taken place, and I mentioned to my hon. friend the answer which I received. When he asked me what reply had been received from the local governments I was not in a position to answer him, because that not having been embraced in his question, I did not ask the Prime Minister whether any answer had been received in reply to any communication which he may have made, nor can I say to the hon. gentleman whether any such answer has been received yet. I may say to the hon. gentleman that, as I understand it at this moment. there are but two provinces to which his criticism would apply: that is the province of Nova Scotia and the province of New Brunswick. In the province of Nova Scotia there is, I believe, an appeal to the sheriff, and in the province of New Brunswick there is no appeal at all. That, my hon. friend says, is not a satisfactory state of things. That may be so, but so far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned, it is a condition that has existed ever since confederation. I will make inquiry, and if there is any correspondence to be brought down I have no doubt it will be submitted. I am not aware of what the nature of the correspondence is, whether there is any official correspondence or whether it was an informal and private correspondence between the Prime Minister and some local authorities in the Atlantic provinces.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not desire to prolong this discussion, but I must protest against even the supposition for a moment that there can be a private correspondence upon a public question of this kind, affecting as it does, the franchise of a whole province. We have had a little too much of that. On one of the most important questions discussed for the last quarter of a century, which has affected and agitated the whole country, we are told that there was no public correspondence, that it was all private. Those who know anything of the constitutional history of our country would fail to find a parallel to the statements made upon questions of this kind. I can understand private communications existing between the government, or any member of it, and a foreign country upon a question as to which it is not in the interest of the country that the fact should be made known; but private correspondence between the Premier, or any member of the Dominion Government, and a provincial government upon a question which has been discussed in Parliament, a question also which the Senate gave way upon, strongly though it felt upon the subject, upon the pledge of the Premier and of the members representing the government in this House that communications should take place with a view to impress upon the minds of these local governments, the propriety and necessity, in order to meet the views of the senators who surrendered—if I may use the expression—their own views upon that question, and that we should be told at this day, that it is likely to be a private correspondence, is someting novel.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no recollection of what occurred in the House of Commons at the time, but I know in this House the hon. gentlemen opposite pressed strongly that some representations should be made to the province of Nova Scotia particularly for an appeal to the judge. While we did not give any undertaking we certainly said we would call their attention to it. I spoke to Mr. Fielding and some other gentlemen from Nova Scotia about it, and their answer was that there had never been any complaint, there had never been any pretence of interference, that the province was satisfied with the decisions made by the sheriff, and that they did not consider there should be any further appeal, as there was no complaint. Nobody said that any voter had been deprived of his rights in consequence of there being no appeal to the judge. The people there should be the best judges of what their rights were and whether they had been at any time disfranchised or deprived of their rights by the action of the sheriff. The appeal is to the sheriff.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We are not discussing that point.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman says we have not taken the measures we ought to have taken in order to force on the province of Nova Scotia a new system of compiling the voters' list.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not take that point. The point is, the hon. gentleman made a promise and I want to know whether he has fulfilled it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We made no promise. We said we would call their attention to it. We have no power over them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Did the hon. gentleman do it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand the answer given by the Minister of Justice was that the Prime Minister had written to somebody in Nova Scotia, but all I can say is that the ministers representing the province said there was no complaint and nobody down there wanted it. Why should you press it if nobody wanted it? They know their business better than we do. We were adopting the provincial franchise and following their lists. If there proved to be any abuse there, we should use our influence, but if they answer and say there is no abuse and no one wants to revise the rolls, my hon. friend does not pretend to say it is our duty to force upon them, by any argument we should use, to change the law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friends did not adopt their franchise, because they made an amendment to to it. And in the next place I was not arguing the propriety or impropriety of it. The Senate took a certain position and the House of Commons asked us to recede from it, and we receded from it on a distinct pledge that the government would call the attention of the Government of the Provinces to the question of giving the right of appeal to a judge. Did they do so and so? Let us have the correspondance and know what the answer is.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Has the hon. gentleman the observations that were made at the time?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I read them here the other day. You will find them in the Debates.

The motion was agreed to.

GROSS RECEIPTS AND WORKING EXPENSES OF THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a return showing the gross receipts and working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway between Montreal and Chaudière, from 1st March, 1898, to 1st March, 1899.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY said:—Owing to the unavoidable absence of the Hon. Mr. Wood, he requested me to make this motion for him to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am advised by Mr. Schreiber, the Deputy Minister of Railways, that the Intercolonial Railway is not worked in sections, but as a whole, and the accounts are not kept in that way, and it is not possible to make a return showing the gross receipts and working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway between Montreal and the Chaudière.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear! bear!

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not kept in sections.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman means to say that they do not do it, not that they have no way of doing it. It is a very convenient answer.

THE SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman press the motion?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It cannot be brought down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman can lay that on the table.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I would be glad to lay that on the table.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It will be rather unusual to press a motion after the House is informed that the government is not in a position to give the information.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Well, that is what I accepted.

FREIGHT FOR EUROPE VIA THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Wood, moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a return showing quantity of freight carried over the Intercolonial Railway from Montreal to Halifax for shipment to Europe, during the winter 1898 and 1899.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the address.

The motion was agreed to.

WORKING EXPENSES OF I.C.R.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Wood, moved

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a return showing the gross receipts and working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway, each month, from 1st July, 1898, to date.

Also, the gross receipts and working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for the same months of the preceding year.

He said:—I might say, although I have no idea with what motive the hon. gentleman placed these motions on the paper here, so far as I am concerned I think it is very proper at the present time that information should be given to the Senate as to the working and management of the Intercolonial Railway, in view of the fact that additions are to be made to that work by the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, and that negotiations are going on with reference to the purchase of the Canada Eastern Railway in New Brunswick. Before any of these bargains or negotiations are concluded, the country should know how the Intercolonial Railway is managed—whether it is a paying concern or not. So far as I am individually concerned, I am opposed to the government undertaking to work railways when they do not pay, and create a deficit in tha public treasury, In the North-west we have to pay for the transportation of our produce to market on a proper financial basis, and if the Intercolonial Railway was worked in the same way the deficit so aften spoken of would not occur. Therefore it is of great importance to have information relative to the working of that road, and the freight charges, I would add, if I were moving on my own account, to see how they compare with the rate on roads over which I have to pay freight, because if the rates are not sufficient to pay the expenses of the transportation of the goods, there is no reason why the government should increase the mileage of that road and increase the expense and the deficits which will accrue to the country by so doing,

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I make no objection to the motion of the hon. gentleman, but when he says that the Intercolonial Railway is to be run exactly as one of the railways in the North-west Territories that are in private hands, he is undertaking to apply to the Intercolonial Railway a rule that has never been applied to it since it was first opened. The hon. gentleman knows that the geographical position of the Intercolonial Railway is peculiar, and no doubt if the parties having charge of the road were to undertake to apply the rule which the hon. gentleman has mentioned they would find themselves very soon without a traffic, and I think they would find the representatives from the Maritime Provinces, both in the House of Commons and this House, in opposition to that view. There is no doubt whatever that the Intercolonial Railway is run on conditions, both as to freight and passengers, that are advantageous to the section of country in which the road lies. The hon. gentleman says that if the road does not pay it is highly improper to undertake to extend it, because we are simply increasing the loss which we sustain. I do not take the hon. gentleman's view. I think that the extension of the Intercolonial Railway westward to Montreal, a great distributing commercial centre, will prove advantageous to the road. The returns which the hon. gentleman has moved for will go to establish that fact, and in my opinion the Intercolonial Railway is to-day in at least as prosperous a condition as it has ever been in at any period in its history. When the returns which the hon. gentleman has moved for are submitted to the House he will see that there is no reason for taking a gloomy view of the situation of the Intercolonial Railway. There has been a new commercial departure in the management of the institution, and the extension of it to Montreal has opened to it a future more prosperous, in my opinion, than any that has hitherto characterized its history.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I would just draw attention to the fact that the train mileage earnings of the Intercolonial Railway are 78 cents, and the train mileage earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway are $1.43. That is to say, the rates that the people in the North-west have to bear to convey their traffic to the seaboard amount to $1.43, the profits on which go to a private company; while the train mileage on the Intercolonial Railway, 78 cents, is regarded by the government as satisfactory, that, being a national road, we are not called upon to run it on the same lines that the people in the other parts of the country have to submit to

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—My hon. friend from the Maritime Provinces says, "hear, hear." I can quite understand the view on which the hon. gentleman says, "Hear, hear," that he wants to get the thing done just as cheaply as possible; at the same time, I do not know that it is an honest policy to place a burden on one portion of the community in order to lighten it for themselves. I do not think that is a basis on which we could agree to manage public affairs or to carry on the legislation of the country. There are two things that operate in train mileage earnings, one is the excellence of the road bed which will enable it to carry large trains and a greater amount of traffic with one train. Then there is another thing, and that is the rates which are charged. I have always heard it claimed for the Intercolonial Railway that it is one of the best built lines on the continent of America. I have heard that statement made and I have always understood that that is a claim that is put forth by the people of Canada on behalf of the Intercolonial Railway. If that is the case, there should be no reduction in the train mileage earnings as compared with other roads in the country in regard to the Intercolonial Railway, and therefore we can only suppose that the reduction in train mileage earnings is, to a large extent, due to the lower freight rates that are charged on that road than are charged on the Canadian Pacific Railway or Grand Trunk Railway. I do not see why one part of the population should be supported at national expense and become a charge on the rest of the community. The hon. leader of the government said, in reply to the mover of the resolution, that it was carried on on the same basis as it had always been—that it was treated as a national road and, being a national road, it was not called on to do more than pay its running expenses. I regret to say it has not even, as a general rule, paid its running expenses. That it is in a little better state now, I believe is the case. It used to be as far behind as six or seven hundred thousand dollars. This year it was behind only $138,000. It was brought up by the Minister of Railways and Canals in the late government to a deficit of only $20,000, but it seems to be going back now. I am not prepared to concide with the hon. leader of the government when he says that it has been customary to consider the Intercolonial Railway as a national road to be supported by the people irrespective of its commercial attributes at all. A new system might fairly be inaugurated on behalf of the whole country in order to make this Intercolonial Railway a better paying institution. So far as it is being brought into the city of Montreal, a great commercial metropolis, I can see no objection so long as the road is run on a commercial basis. If it was projected further, to the city of Ottawa, and this city made the headquarters of the Intercolonial Railway, so much the better, and if in the course of time it could make connections and find its way where competition is necessary in the great North-west, I would have no objection. If you can run the Intercolonial Railway up to the North-west on the same basis that you run the Intercolonial Railway in the east, we will hold up both hands for the extension of the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—It seem extraordinary that when the question was put by the hon. gentleman for Wolseley (Mr. Perley) he was answered by the Secretary of State that it was impossible to separate the receipts and gross expenses of that portion of the road—that it could not be done, and in reply to a subsequent question put by the same hon. gentleman, the hon. leader of this House said : " It will be found on investigation that that portion of the road is a paying portion of the road." Now, how we can get at that decision without an investigation of the receipts and gross earnings of that particular portion of the road, I cannot understand. It seems to me that the two objections cannot co-exist.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think it is so difficult to understand. It may be that the accounts of the Intercolonial Railway are kept in such a way that the expenses and receipts of the section between Montreal and Chaudière cannot be separated from those of the remainder of the road, but at the same time it may be perfectly true that the extension of the road from Chaudière to Montreal is known to have increased the business of the road, as it undoubtedly has. I understood the hon. leader of the House to say that the returns show that since the extension to Montreal the financial results of the working of the road have been more satisfactory than they were before. That seems to be not a very difficult thing to understand. The hon. gentleman from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) referred to the difference between the train mileage of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he does not think the difference might arise because there is a larger traffic over the Canadian Pacific Railway than over the Intercolonial Railway?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That does not make any difference. A train will carry 25 or 30 cars, just in proportion to the amount that is put on that train, and the rates charged for it are the cost of operation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But if the train carries a valuable load, the returns must be greater than if the train carries a comparatively light load. In the past the trains of the Intercolonial Railway have not been as a rule heavily laden, and it must be borne in mind that while the Canadian Pacific Railway, or a portion of it, runs through the western country, a very large portion of it runs through the most thickly peopled portions of the province of Ontario, and it is difficult to make comparisons by simply taking an isolated fact like the train mileage. It is a subject which deserves discussion, and it is possible that later in the session we shall have a discussion which will show the exact facts.

The motion was agreed to.

SANITARY CONDITION OF THE YUKON.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) gave notice that he would, on Friday next ask the government if any steps have been taken to improve the sanitary condition of Dawson City, on the Yukon. He said :—Perhaps the Minister of Justice can answer the question now. There is a great deal of sickness at Dawson City and has been all winter. I trust the government will not allow things to go on as they have been going on recently.

THIRD READING.

Bill (A) "An Act for the relief of David Stock"—(Hon. Mr. Aikins).

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 26th April, 1899.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PRESENTING PETITIONS.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD, from the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills, presented their seventh report, recommending an extension of the time for receiving petitions for private bills and introducing private bills, and moved its adoption.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not oppose the adoption of the report, but I think it should be adopted with the distinct understanding that the time shall not be any further extended. This should be a final extension. We have come to the conclusion, during various sessions, that some rule of the kind should be adopted, and it is really time to adopt it now.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Very important bills might come up later and we could suspend the rules, but that is for the House to adopt afterwards.

The motion was agreed to.

LOTTERIES IN QUEBEC PROVINCE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL gave notice that he would to-morrow:

Inquire, in view of the number of petitions complaining of the evils arising out of the operations of lotteries organized and carried on in the city of Montreal under the plea of having been legally incorporated under section 205 of the Criminal Code, whether it is the intention of the government to introduce measures providing for the suppression of gambling by the means of lottery, and to make any infringement of the law in that particular punishable by fine and imprisonment?

He said:—Can the hon. gentleman answer that question now?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I can answer my hon. friend that we are preparing a measure for that very object at the present time.

REDUCTION OF CITY POST OFFICES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to:

Ask the government, whether the Postmaster General has, during the past year, or at any other time, reduced any city post office to that of a town office, as was done on the plea of economy in the case of the city of Belleville, namely: the cities of Toronto, Hamilton, London, Ottawa, Windsor, Montreal, Quebec, Fredericton, St. John, Halifax, Charlottetown and Victoria? If not, why have not those cities which the public accounts show, as set forth in a tabular statement to be found at page 211 of the official reports of the debates of the Senate of the 14th March, 1898, cost a greater percentage of the revenue collected to perform the duties of said offices, than did that of Belleville reduced?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Postmaster General has placed an answer to the hon. gentleman's question in the following statement:

It does not appear to the Postmaster General that the conditions applicable to the Belleville post office, when placed upon a percentage basis, find a parallel in connection with any other city post office. The cost of the Belleville office appeared excessive, and likely to increase, owing to the provisions of the Civil Service Act, which contemplated increases in salaries; and the staff having been but a comparatively brief period upon the civil service list, the cost to the country of retiring them, and thus effecting considerable economy, was not excessive.

With the exception of Windsor, the other offices on a city basis were either in cities of a very considerable population, or provincial capitals, or otherwise so circumstanced as not to call for similar action. Windsor being a border town, opposite Detroit, has been utilized in connection with the exchange of mails between the United States and Canada, so that the revenue of that office does not fully indicate the work done there. Nevertheless, the Postmaster General did, at that point, reduce the staff by retiring certain of them under the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

There has also been a reduction in the staff at Charlottetown and Fredericton.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The statement which my hon. friend has just read is precisely what I anticipated, but it does not answer the question which I put. It gives reasons why certain offices have not been reduced like another, but the plea upon which the Belleville office was reduced from a city to a town office was that of economy, and it is shown by the tabular statement to which I referred, that all the other offices are in a worse position than that of Belleville. The fact that they are differently situated can make no difference, if the plea of economy is the basis upon which these reductions are to take place. I think if my hon. friend had said that, with one or two exceptions, the constituencies in which these different offices are situated are represented by supporters of the government, and Belleville is represented by an opponent, he would have come nearer the truth than the explanation, or the excuse, which has been given for the course which has been pursued.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think I have given exactly the truth in the statement I have read to the House. My hon. friend and I discussed this question last session. My hon. friend has not asked why certain other offices were not put upon the footing of Belleville. For instance, Brantford was not put on the footing of post offices in the large cities, although Brantford, if I recollect rightly, yields a larger revenue than Belleville. Then there was Stratford. My hon. friend did not put Stratford in the position that he put Belleville. My hon. friend did not put Chatham in the position in which he put Belleville. There are several cities which in population are at least equal to Belleville and in the revenue derived considerably in excess of Belleville, and yet these were not treated by my hon. friend opposite, when he had control of public affairs, in the same way that he treated Belleville. If the objection made by the hon. gentleman had force then, it would have equal force in favour of those other cities which I have mentioned as it has in the case of Belleville. The truth is, as the Postmaster General has pointed out, London, with a population of nearly 40,000 ; Toronto, with a population of over 200,000, and the city of Quebec, with a population of 60,000, do not stand on the same footing as Belleville, but those other cities which I have mentioned do, and if there was anything to be said in favour of putting Belleville upon the footing of the large cities, there was an equally strong argument in favour of doing so in the case of the other minor cities, where an equal revenue was obtained. Now, my hon. friend did not insist on putting them up—he did not put them up when he had the opportunity. The Postmaster General has simply put Belleville in with the class of cities to which Belleville may be fairly said to belong.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is one little misapprehension under which the hon. gentleman labours. All the places mentioned have never been made city post offices. Chatham and the other places to which my hon. friend refers have always been treated as town offices.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend may call them towns, but Chatham is a city, Stratford is a city.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When were they made cities ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They have been cities for some time.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Is Chatham a city ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But never city post offices.

THE MOVEMENT OF POPULATION.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to direct the attention of the government to a paragraph which appears in a newspaper published in one of the Maritime Provinces with respect to the exodus from those provinces to the United States. I was somewhat surprised to observe in the papers from that part of the country lately that large numbers are leaving—in some cases whole families—to make their homes in the United States. In the paper which I have before me lists of names of persons who are leaving the country are given. I am all the more surprised at this when I remember the reference made in the Speech from the Throne to the increase of immigration into Canada under the present government in such marked contrast to the exodus which went on under the recent administration. When I heard that paragraph read by His Excellency I was pleased to know that the exodus had stopped and that our own people were likely to remain in Canada. But for the last six weeks I have seen in almost every issue of the papers from the Maritime Provinces that a large number of people are leaving those provinces to go to the United States. This is a matter of surprise to me, because I did not expect, under the present administration, an exodus could exist. I am aware that under the recent administration there was a considerable exodus, but that could be accounted for by the fact that the hon. gentlemen then in opposition were very different from the hon. gentlemen now in opposition. The hon. gentlemen in opposition now are patriotic. They are not running down the country and saying it is a hard place to live in. They approve of the tariff, but the other gentlemen who preceded them in opposition were always complaining of the tariff and the railway freight rates, and the fact that the country, the North-west Territories particularly, was a barren waste, the home of the wolf and the bear, and that the Canadian Pacific Railway would never pay for the grease required to grease the axles of the trains. Under the present condition of things, I am somewhat surprised to find that an exodus is going on and that the people are not satisfied to live in this country under the administration of the present government. That is to be deplored, because it is a misfortune to see the young men of Canada, who have been brought up in the country and know how to work and make an independent living, leaving the country to become citizens of the neighbouring republic, while we are paying large sums of money to import the paupers of other countries, who cannot possibly make good citizens. Many of them are an undesirable class of people. The Galicians cost the country a considerable sum to get them here and to keep them after they came. They have a very degraded idea of humanity and Christianity. They are a class of people who believe that a man may kill his wife if she does not happen to suit him, and two of these men are now under sentence of death for murder in Manitoba. It is said, from the evidence of those men themselves, that when they went to the place where they committed the murder for a small sum, one man asked who was in the house and where the wife was. The man said his wife was away—that she had left him. He was asked why he did not kill her. The reply was because the law was different in this country—that men could not kill wives in this country, though they could be killed in Galicia. Then they killed the man and five children for $60. That is the class of people we are importing into this country. I saw, also, in a police court report the other day in Winnipeg, where one of this same race had preferred a charge against a neighbour for not delivering up his wife that he had bought a few days before—he wanted either the woman or the money. That is a very undesirable class of people to bring into the North-west, while we are allowing the young men of our own country to go to the United States. I understand that the Doukhobors are not a very desirable class either. I had a conversation, on my way down here, with His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface, and it turned on the subject of immigration. On that subject he said that these were a very undesirable class—people that he did not think it advisable to bring into this country. He had learned from reliable sources that when they went on a place, the first thing they did was to drive away the evil spirits.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—A very desirable thing to do.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—They are very undesirable class of people, in my opinion, to bring into this country. I want to call the attention of the government to this subject. I do not want to make a speech hostile to the government. I know that my hon. friend from Halifax can never stand anything being said against the government but I thought it was my duty to call the attention of the government to the fact that there is a large exodus of the best citizens of our country from the Maritime Provinces. I realize now that the government have changed their policy from what it was when they were in opposition. They are now bringing in immigrants, and we are taxed to pay for bringing them here. We are at the same time paying large numbers of immigration agents to go to the United States and get back the very men that they, no doubt, very largely influenced to leave the country a number of years ago. They are trying to now get them back to settle in Manitoba. It is an unfortunate thing that we have to pay money to get them back to Canada after they leave the country. I have also noticed that there is no change made in the traffic. We find the tariff is the same as it was under the late administration. They have made no change which would render it more easy for people to make a living, and one can hardly understand how it is that they can advise these people to come back, after having told them that the policy which was pursued formerly was one which rendered it hard to make a living. I therefore think, under the circumstances, that the government ought to take steps to divert the exodus from the Maritime Provinces which is now flowing to the United States, to our own North-west which is one of the finest countries for young men, particularly young Canadians, to settle in. We have a German immigration to that country, and the Germans are an industrious and thrifty people. They have to work hard, owing to their poverty, and they get no assistance, whilst others, who have no means at all, who have left their own country, perhaps for the country's good, are brought here and largely supported. The government has to feed them from the time they come until they are able to raise a crop. More than that, this class of people work for very low wages, because they live on very poor food. They are vegetarians, and a great many Canadians who have been accustomed to having a good living on bread, meat, and other foods, cannot obtain work at a price to enable them to live because they have to compete with these men who are vegetarians, living on potatoes and onions. The government should take some steps to advertise the North-west more largely in the Maritime Provinces. I know it is not the policy of the government to encourage people to leave one part of Canada to settle in another, but they would be justified in taking such means as might be necessary to influence young men, by giving them cheaper railroad rates, or even free transportation, or making some advances to them to enable them to go to the North-west Territories instead of United States of America. There they would find millions of acres quite as good as any of the land occupied, because the whole country is a fertile plain. They only require to go to the old settlers who have tested the problem of how to till the soil in the country. These men would have little or no difficulty, with very small capital, in going into that country and making good homes for themselves and they would be a very desirable class of settlers. There is no country that can surpass the North-west for grazing. We are not subject to the droughts and pestilence of many other parts of the world. We have heard of the great loss of cattle in Australian colonies in consequence of drought. In the North-west we may have some little drought once in a while, but it is very slight, and has no perceptible effect on the prosperity of the people. We do not make quite so much as we do when there is no drought. I have never had my cattle give more milk than the year we had no rain. We always have nutritious grass when we have dry weather. In other countries cattle starve by thousands, that never occurs in the North-west. Most years we have a very good crop. So that if the government would take some steps to advertise the North-west and induce the young Canadians who are now going to the United States to go to the North-west they would be doing a good work, and would make more money for the country, apart from keeping a valuable population in our county. I merely call the attention of the government to this matter. I know it is against the policy of the government to urge people to leave one part of the country to go to another part of it, but some arrangement might be made in the way of lower passenger rates and transportation of settlers' effects to induce these people to go there.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman did not read the articles he quoted from.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The article appears in the Gazette of 19th April :

THE EXODUS GROWING.

(Bras d'Or Gazette, April 19.)

Peter Campbell and daughter of Arichat left for Boston recently, where they will reside in future. A great many young people are leaving Inverness for the United States. A number left Brook Village for Boston recently.

John A. McInnis of Claverhouse left last Thursday for Boston, Mass. Too bad to see so many of our young people going away. James F. McDonald of Dunvegan while on his way to Boston, last Tuesday, called on his many friends at Lake Ainslie to bid them adieu. Angus Ferguson, of Frambois, and John A. McLeod and D. K. Morrison, of Lower St. Esprit, left for the Hub last Monday. Alex. Munro, W. A. Boyd and Angus W. McDonald left Salem for Boston on the 14th inst. They will be much missed from the several societies of which they were active members. Mrs. Muray, who left Tuesday morning for Boston, was given a surprise party by the young people of Salem Road on the evening before she left.

(Charlottetown, April 19.)

Misses Florence and Annie McCalder and Master Willie McCalder leave to-day for Montana, where they will in future reside with their uncle, Daniel Buchanan, formerly of Long Creek, Lot 65, P.E.I., Wilbert Dockendorff, South River, who left home about a week ago for Boston, has secured employment.

The latter part is a quotation from the Charlottetown Sun of 18th April.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The other paper is a Bangor paper.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—No.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) has brought a very important subject, for the North-west at any rate, before this House, though in perhaps a somewhat informal way; yet having expressed himself at such length, I must add a few remarks. I know that the hon. gentleman, previous to going to the North-west, lived in the Maritime Provinces. He has pointed out, in a very admirable way, the prospects that there are for any one who comes from the Maritime Provinces for bettering his condition in the North-west. At the same time, when he gives an account of such a large number of people leaving the Maritime Provinces as he has given here to-day, there must be something very wrong with the Maritime Provinces, or the conditions which prevail there under the present government of the country. I see by the paper that the iron mines have failed and stopped work, after being fostered by a protective tariff for the last fourteen years. I see also that the iron works in the town of Yarmouth have failed, and that sixty men, who have been at work there more or less for the past forty-five years, have ceased to enjoy their occupation, and these evidences, of course, reported in the public press account for the exodus. I do not see the government is taking any particular steps to prevent the exodus of our strong healthy Canadian population and replacing them with an inferior class from the interior of Europe, with whom they can have no common sympathy for two or three generations at any rate. So far as the exodus is concerned, what we have seen in the public press is quite sufficient justification for the contradiction he has given to the government for the congratulations which they have put in the Speech from the Throne. I might add also that the hon. gentleman from Halifax, informed me that when he was coming up from Halifax, there were one hundred and twenty people on the same train with him going to the United States also. That was only on one train.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the junior member for Halifax?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I beg the pardon of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, but when the junior member for Halifax tells us that one hundred and twenty were on the train with him when he came up to attend his duties in this Parliament, and that they formed part of the exodus to the United States, I think there is something wrong which requires a remedy. The hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) has not told us what remedy he would apply. From my own standpoint I have a remedy that I think would stop it, but I do not propose to enter into that question at the present moment. I have this to say, however, that I saw in the journals of the lower House a statement that $3,000 had been expended in assisting immigrants to come from Great Britain, and that $23,000 had been expended in getting immigrants from the interior of Europe, from Russia and Galicia and other points. That was last year, next year's accounts will contain much larger expenditures on the same class of emigrants. The immigration agents of the steamship companies are paid at the rate of $5 a head for men who cannot speak English, and only $2 a head for men who can. That is a most extraordinary position for the country to be placed in, that we should be paying such a premium for strangers and foreigners, who have lived under an entirely different form of government to what we have been accustomed live under, an autocratic form of government, men who have no ideas of self government, who do not know what the value of their vote is and who do not know the principles that our Canadian population has been brought up under, and who thoroughly understand, I am thankful to say, the principles of self government in our democratic institutions or limited monarchy under which we live. The sooner that kind of business is stopped the better. We are spending $200,000 for immigration purposes, and this is the result. As many go over the borders to the United States and leave Canada as are coming in under that heavy expenditure. We in the North-west feel it very keenly. We are only a small population at present, and when we see foreigners, Doukhobors coming in at the rate of 10,000 in a job lot, and Gallicians brought in to the extent of eight or ten thousand, settled in a small population such as we are, we can see perfectly plainly that we are going to be swamped. In fact, I have heard it said by some settlers, who have lived there for eight or ten years, who have taken a part in the development of the country as pioneers, that if they are going to be overrun by that class—hundreds passing their door every day and looking for work and moving about—that they will have to pull up stakes and go somewhere else. That is a very deplorable state of affairs. The Doukhobors, I understand, will not intermix with the population. They will not let their young women go out to service; they keep them together, and take them west with them to form one solid community, with their own peculiar ideas and their own methods of conducting themselves. I do not know what agreement was made between the government and the representative of the Doukhobors on the immigrants coming to this country, but I believe he made some terms with the Canadian Government before they came to this country. What those terms are I do not know. Whether it is that they have special privileges which the rest of the population do not enjoy, I am not prepared to say, but if the government has given them special privileges over the rest of the population in the North-west Territories and Manitoba, a very great injustice is being done to the pioneer settlers, who have borne the burden and heat of the day in opening up that country without assistance. The fact that an exodus does exist, the various evidence we have that it does exist, should stimulate the government to take some steps beyond any they have yet taken to change that condition of affairs.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot say that I am surprised at the speeches made by the two hon. gentlemen who represent the North-west Territories, and yet the speeches made by these hon. gentlemen are the last that one would expect from representatives of a country that is but sparsely populated and where it is considered desirable to obtain a very large increase of the population. I think I am within the facts when I say that the speeches made by both hon. gentlemen are wholly unworthy of them. Those speeches are as unpatriotic as it would be possible to address to this assembly. Both hon. gentlemen have done what they could to traduce the character of those who have come from the continent of Europe into that country with a view of becoming settlers, and whose descendants will, in all probability, for centuries to come be worthy citizens of that North-west country. I should like to know what right the hon. gentleman from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) has to make an attack on the Doukhobors and Galicians, or what ground the hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) had for the attack he has addressed to this House——

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The law courts of the country will determine that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says the law courts of the country will determine that. The hon. gentleman has given a description of those people as being barbarians.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—So they are.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Who are they? Poles, the most democratic people in the centre of Europe, a people whose country was overrun and divided by the nations on their borders, a people who have been for a thousand years members of the Roman Catholic Church, and the hon. gentleman rises here and says that those who have been under the instruction of that Church for a thousand years are barbarians—that they are murderers—that they are wholly unfit to become citizens of Canada, or to associate with the native-born population of this country. I say that it is a most outrageous attack. We have built railways in the North-west—have spent hundreds of millions of dollars there, and for what purpose? That that country may remain desolate? That it may remain a great lone land without inhabitants? We have been seeking to secure a population for it, and it is only within the last two years that the efforts of the government in that respect have been successful. Now we have a large population flowing into that country from the continent of Europe, more in one year than you have had in five years before, and these hon. gentlemen do all they can to dissuade the people of Canada from permitting settlers to come into the country. Human nature on the continent of Europe is very much the same as human nature in the United Kingdom, or in the United States, and it requires but a very short time, where you give men an opportunity—give them a fair chance in the race for life—to make a Canadian of a man, whether he be from Belgium, or Germany, or Austria.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Why do you not keep Canadians in the coutry?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman wish to issue an edict and forbid Canadians to go across the border?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Give them $5 a head to go west.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the hon. gentleman's proposition, and when he can get a majority of the people of this country to agree with him in that respect, they will place him at the head of the government and give him an opportunity to carry his scheme of giving $5 a head to the 6,000,000 people of Canada to persuade them to remain in the country. The people who are here are willing to remain unless they can see that they are going to better their condition by going elsewhere. What does the hon. gentleman undertake to show? Why, that there is a very large emigration from Canada at the present time. I tell the hon. gentleman that I do not believe it. I have in my hand an extract from the Mail newspaper, which I shall read to the House, and I think it is of about as much authority as the extract the hon. gentleman has read. It says that "it is satisfactory to point out that Canadians are not now going in any number to the United States but that large numbers of residents of the United States are coming into Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia." The article concludes with the statement that "the exodus is a matter of history." Now, why does the hon. gentleman undertake to show that there is a large exodus from Canada at the present time? Is it because the facts warrant it? Is it because it is going to help the country to make such a statement? The hon. gentleman is anxious to damn the administration. He has a pique against the administration, and if by misrepresenting the condition of things in the country the hon. gentleman can damage the government he will make the effort. Now, what are the facts? There never has been a time in the history of Canada since a railway has been constructed when there has not been a very considerable emigration from this country to the United States. From 1867 down to 1874 there was on an average an emigration of something like 33,000 from Canada into the United States. From 1874 until 1878 there was an average emigration of nearly 22,000, nearly 10,000 less, and yet the hon. gentleman and his friends at that time spoke about the exodus from Canada, although it was nearly 50 per cent less than it had been during the previous seven years. Then there was a change of administration. The exodus was not diminished. It increased. It increased why? Because commercial prosperity revived in the United States two or three years sooner than it did in Canada, and the result was that the exodus from Canada increased from 22,000 and some hundreds in 1878 to 51,000 in 1880. Now we have no such exodus at the present time. The hon. gentleman has referred to a case where, in all probability, the parties may be going to work in the United States mills for three or four months and afterwards return to their own country, as large numbers do in the lower provinces. Supposing that were so—supposing a number of young people in the province of Nova Scotia, especially women who work in factories, find that they can get better wages during the summer season in Lowell or Worcester or in Springfield, then they can in any town or village of their own country, is it extraordinary that they should go there? They have been in the habit of doing so for more than a generation, and in all probability they may continue to do so for a generation to come; but what is the general condition of things in Canada today? Why, that you have five times the addition to the population from abroad each year that you have had at any previous period of the history of this country since confederation. Then why does the hon. gentleman bring this matter up? He has given no notice of it. It is not a question of privilege. He has brought it here, as he brought a similar question yesterday, and told us again of the conversation which he had with Archbishop Langevin in which the latter stated that these people who are going into the North-west, from Galicia, Russia and Poland are a population totally unfit to settle there. I would tell the hon. gentleman in my opinion he must have misunderstood the Archbishop. I can hardly conceive that Archbishop Langevin would make such a declaration with regard to those who are his co-religionists.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I said the Doukhobors. They are not his co-religionists, nor are the Galicians: they belong to the Greek Church.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I do not think any man of character could speak against the Doukhobors.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me say this with regard to the Doukhobors, they are Quakers. They are notably an industrious people in every part of Christendom where they are to be found. They are peaceful. They are usually strictly honest people. They are remarkably industrious people, and yet the hon. gentleman from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) has spoken of them as a job lot, brought by the government into the North-west Territories. That is the way that he expects to aid in bringing immigration to the country! I tell the hon. gentleman, much as I esteem him, highly as I value his industrial efforts in the North-west Territories, much as he may have added to his fortune while there, I am inclined to think that there are many of those people whom he has to-day traduced in this House that ten years hence will exhibit as large a degree of prosperity under the opportunities they have as the hon. gentleman has exhibited in that country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to withdraw the term "job lot" and say "wholesale."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think the hon. gentleman has improved the statement much, and I am inclined to think that the observation of the hon. gentleman will reflect rather upon himself than upon those he has traduced.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—A job lot you get cheap.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are purchasing nobody. So far as the Doukhobors are concerned, they were aided by Count Tolstoi and by others in Russia who sympathized with those people in their resistance to oppression and have assisted them in coming to Canada and forming a colony in the North-west. I remember the time when certain parties in the United States known as "Know Nothings"—a most pertinent name I may say to my hon. friend—who undertook to discourage immigration from abroad, who made attacks upon those coming from the continent of Europe and from the United Kingdom in much the same way as the hon. gentleman has made attacks upon the Doukhobors and upon the Galicians here to-day. There have been added to the population of the United States in a single year 700,000 from the continent of Europe. They were, many of them, very poor people, far poorer than the Galicians or the Doukhobors who have come into our country, and those people have not brought any discredit upon the government of the United States. They have, in remarkably short time, become citizens of that country in feeling, in sympathy and in aspiration, as much so as those whose ancestors had been in the country for half a dozen generations before, and I predict to-day that those who have come to Canada from Galiacia and from the eastern confines of Russia will be found as estimable citizens, as much devoted to the institutions of this country and as much in favour of British connection as many hon. gentlemen who speak very loudly against them and who do everything they possibly can to injure the growth and the prosperity of this country.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Who is doing that? Name them. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice says that the government have purchased nobody. I do not say that they have purchased anybody, but I do claim that when the government pays $5 apiece to bring Russians into this country, and only $2 apiece to introduce British subjects into Canada, they are discriminating against British subjects. When he speaks of the exodus I begin to think of the time when the hon. getlemen were in power once before. The country did not prosper well in those days, but when the late administration came into power and the national policy was introduced, things soon changed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is a delusion.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman may think so: I say it is a fact. I claim that these Russian and Galician immigrants are not as desirable a class of people as immigrants from the British Islands.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Or Canadians brought back.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Yes. I know you cannot lay an embargo on Canadians to prevent them leaving their native country, but I do claim that it is not fair to spend $5 apiece to bring Russians here when we are paying only $2 each to bring in British subjects. Further, I say it should be the policy of the government, as far as possible, to keep Canadians in this country. When the Conservatives were in power, the leaders of the Liberal party went through the country preaching blue ruin. They said that the manufacturers of the country were going to swallow everybody, and Sir Richard Cartwright told us that after swallowing everybody and everything, they would swallow themselves in the end. A curious kind of animal he painted the manufacturers. But a change has taken place. These hon. gentlemen who preached blue ruin when they were in opposition are very indignant when their policy to bring foreigners into this country is criticized. They deny that the Doukhobors are a job lot, forgetting that a job lot implies that they get them cheap. I say they are an undesirable class at any price. One of the conditions on which they come is what? That they will not be called on to defend this country if we should get into trouble. What good are they? They live within themselves. They do not want to associate with Canadians, and they are altogether an undesirable class. The government should offer every encouragement to British subjects to come to Canada, and every inducement to our own people to remain in the country. One good Canadian or native of the British Islands, is worth half a dozen of those foreigners.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—May I ask the hon. leader of the House on what authority he makes the statement that five times as many settlers came into Canada last year as came into the country any previous year in its history?

Hon. Mr. ALMON—May I ask the hon. Minister of Justice if the Count Tolstoi to whom he refers is the author of a number of books which were stopped in the custom-house on account of their immoral tendency? I am inclined to think he is. If he is the author of books which are too vile to be admitted into the country, we may be, perhaps, allowed to criticize the men, women and children that he is sending us. I may be mistaken, but I think I am right.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I rise for the purpose——

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. There is nothing before the House, and there has been nothing for some time. There can be no discussion without a question before the House.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I merely wish to say, in regard to this question of exodus, that notwithstanding the disclaimer which has been made by the hon. leader of the House, I see before me in this chamber today hon. gentlemen who come from a district of the country in which there has been an exodus sufficient in extent to render such an expression as we have in the Speech from the Throne totally inapplicable to the present condition of affairs, that is, that "it is gratifying that there has been an almost total cessation of the exodus."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman answer the question which has been put by my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Ferguson)?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I am not going to answer any question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. senior member for Halifax raised a point of order. That should be decided. If the Speaker decides that we are out of order, I shall take steps to put ourselves in order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My question of order is that there can be no discussion in this House, under the rules of the Senate, unless upon a question moved and seconded. There is no question before the House, consequently the discussion is out of order.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Why did not the hon. gentleman take that point of order earlier?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I took it because I thought the discussion was going too far.

The SPEAKER—There is nothing before the Chair. The Senate has been a good deal governed by usage I know, and such discussions have occurred many a time, but under our ordinary rule, there is nothing before the Chair.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I concur in the decision given by his honour the Speaker, and to put myself in order for a few moments I move seconded by Mr. Ferguson, that the House do adjourn. Before the motion is put I desire to reply to the extraordinary statement of the hon. Minister of Justice in reference to the exodus from the country prior to the advent of his party to power, and the further allegation that during the last year or two the influx of immigrants into the country has been five times greater than it had been in the past. I congratulate my hon. friend from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) on having raised, shall I say the ire of the hon. gentleman opposite. He threw a good deal more spirit and vim into his remarks to-day than he is in the habit of doing. Evidently he felt keenly the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley, but I propose to confine myself to one point in order to show that the hon. gentleman osposite speaks at random very often when he rises to address the House. I shall read the figures contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns, which are the only authentic records we can have on questions of this kind. Before doing so I may be permitted, however, to call attention to the very great difference in the sentiments uttered by the hon. gentleman now and those of a few years ago, when he occupied a seat in the other House. Then the principal theme of the late Finance Minister and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce and the hon. gentlemen by whom they were surrounded was that Canada was going to destruction and that its people were leaving the country. My hon. friend nods. He admits then that was the position they took, and he now, as the hon. Secretary of State did when discussing these questions in the past refers to the evidence of the settlers' effects which were exported, without reference in the list to the imports of goods of a similar character. If you look at the Trade and Navigation Returns for the year 1897—turn to the imports of settlers' effects for the years 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896 and 1897, you will find that in 1893 the settlers' effects imported amounted to $1,702,759. The exports of settlers' effects for the same year were $1,303,379, being less than the amount imported. In the next year 1894 the imports of settlers' effects, were $2,665,893. This is from the United States alone. The exports for that year were only $940,709, as against over two million of imports. In 1895 the imports of settlers' effects from the United States was $2,005,848, and the exports for that year were, $1,222,000 ; and for the last year the imports were $1,803,275, and the exports only $927,888. Those are the last statistics which have been laid before us, and they prove incontestably that the statements made by the hon. Minister of Justice are not borne out by the records or by the facts, but are another evidence of the wild assertions which the hon. gentlemen make very often when referring to statistics and to—I was going to say facts—to questions upon which you can scarcely ever lay your hands on the actual facts. The only thing we have to guide us in this matter is the document which they themselves lay upon the table of the House, and that proves incontestable that the statement made by the Minister of Justice is not a fact which is borne out by the records.

Hon Mr. MILLS—I would say in reply to the observations of the hon. gentleman opposite, that the statistics which he has quoted do not justify his denial of the observations which I addressed to the House a few moments ago. I refer to the census which is the only reliable information in these matters. The hon. gentleman and his friends had a census taken at an intermediate period in the North-west Territories between 1881 and 1891, for the purposes of ascertaining what the population was. We have the statement of the Deputy Minister of Agriculture as to the number of emigrants that have gone into that country, and if I remember rightly there was one hundred and fifty thousand short, shown by the population.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Short where ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Short of the population which the Minister of Agriculture and the report of the Minister of Agriculture showed had gone to the North-west Territories from foreign countries and from other portions of Canada. The hon. gentleman cannot get over that fact. Then let me call his attention to another fact. The evidence which he has read does not show the number of men who cross the border in the North-west Territories. Our statistics are fairly accurate for the older settled portions of the country, but they are not so accurate for the newer portions, and cannot be. When my hon. friend questions my statement as to the immigration, I ask him to look at the province of British Columbia as it is now in population and as it was two or three years ago.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That has nothing to do with it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes it has to do with it, for the far greater proportion of those people are people not from other portions of Canada, but from across the border, from Australia and South Africa and England

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Strengthen your argument by referring to the Klondike.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I am going to refer to the Klondike. And here you have a city that had no existence three years ago, with between twenty and thirty thousand people to-day, and yet there is not ten per cent, or anything like ten per cent, of that population British by birth. They are nearly all foreigners. And so I say I am justified, and I am within the mark, when I contrast the immigration into Canada recently with the immigration which existed at any earlier period within the history of this confederation.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend has made another very unfortunate remark on this subject to-day, coupled with a rather unfortunate one for which he is responsible, in the speech which he put in the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General at the beginning of this session.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A perfectly accurate speech.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Indeed! In the speech it was stated:

> To these evidences may be added another, which is most gratifying, the almost total cessation of the considerable exodus of our population, which at one time was a regrettable feature of our affairs.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would challenge the hon. gentleman to give any evidence to show that there is this cessation of the exodus to which he referred in the Speech from the Throne. We have no evidence whatever of it. On the contrary, we know that there is a movement of population going on at the present time, just as has been going on in other years, notwithstanding that there is a very considerable degree of prosperity in Canada. I am not referring to this for the purpose of magnifying it, nor I am deploring it. I never deplored a movement of the population in the great races to which we belong. I never took that ground, but I do object to fallacious statements being put in the speech with which His Excellency opened the session.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend should have discussed it when the speech was before the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did discuss it then and showed its fallacy, but notwithstanding that, my hon. friend now makes a statement that the influx of people during the last year has been five times greater than in any other year since confederation. I do not wonder that my hon. friend declines to defend that statement, because he came to the conclusion himself that he had drawn a long bow and would sooner let the matter drop.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I gave my reasons.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, and what were the reasons? That the town of Dawson in the Klondike has grown up to twenty or thirty thousand.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And Nelson and Vancouver.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Perhaps the reference to Dawson was drawn from him by the observation made by my hon. friend on my left (Sir Mackenzie Bowell). We know very well that in the early eighties at Winnipeg as large an influx of population occurred as in Dawson, and he forgets when the remarkable growth at a later date Vancouver sprang into a respectable position as a city, and again when it was destroyed by fire, from its ashes grew a city of very great importance in Canada. He forgets about the influx of Icelanders, Mennonites und Crofters who came into the country in quite as large numbers as the Galicians and the Doukhobors are doing now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, no, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Oh, yes. I am prepared to say that the Mennonites emigrated in quite as large numbers as the Doukhobors.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are not as many of them there now altogether.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.—My hon. friend says no, no. Excepting when my hon. friend is hard pressed politically there is no man whose word I would sooner take, but he made an extraordinary statement when he said that about five times as many people came in last year as at any time before. He must excuse me if I am not inclined to accept his view in regard to the other matter wherein he contradicts me. My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, referred to the Trade and Navigation Returns, and I submit, hon. gentlemen, that these returns are very much more entitled to weight in ascertaining what the influx is than my hon. friend's reference to Dawson City or the Galicians or Doukhobors. I sub mit the Trade and Navigation Returns are more reliable guides in this matter than any remarks which my hon. friend makes without data to guide him. We turn to the Trade and Navigation Returns and we find that in 1894 the value of settlers' effects of people coming into Canada in that year, was nearly $400,000 greater than in this last year when he says there were five times as many people came in as in any previous year. I want to impress that upon hon. gentlemen, because it is a flat and emphatic contradiction of the hon. gentleman's statement. In the year 1894 the Trade and Navigation Returns show that from the United States the settlers, effects coming in amounted to $2,665,893, while in 1898 they were only $2,334,457. In 1894, which we all know was a bad year, which my hon. friend classes among the years when only a fifth part of the people came in, we have this extraordinary difference that they brought with them effects in value nearly $400,000 more than were brought by settlers last year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend knows that there is not a single dollar in the Trade and Navigation Returns relating to the Yukon country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who said there was?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not referring to that. We have no figures for 1899 yet. My hon. friend is too soon in talking about 1899.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is too soon in contradicting me.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But my hon. friend was speaking about the last completed year, and I am dealing with the last completed year, and if he is right in his statements that there have been five times as many people came in, they must have been poor in this world's goods at all events, because they brought with them $400,000 less of settlers' effects than were brought in by the alleged small number who came in in 1894. We are compelled to make these references because in the Speech from the Throne a most remarkable statement was put in the mouth of His Excellency. We are living in this country and say we do not decry it and that it is going to ruin, but we are not going to allow the hon. gentlemen on the other side to mislead the public and repeat such statements as are made in the Speech from the Throne and as by my hon. friend in this House.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Without any desire to prolong this discussion, which has been precipitated by my hon. friend from Wolseley (Mr. Perley), I would like to say that in regard to the immigration into the country, as far as the west is concerned, I do not think the hon. Minister of Justice overstated the case. As far as British Columbia is concerned I have not the slightest doubt that the immigration into the province during the last two or three years has been more than five times as great as any time previous to that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We do not dispute that.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—I am speaking for a very important province on the Pacific coast, and without respect at all to Dawson City. The population of British Columbia has doubled within the last eight and ten years and largely that increase has taken place in the last two or three years. You can point to half a dozen towns which have, in half a dozen years, increased wonderfully in population.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Nelson has grown considerably.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Nelson has grown in the last two or three years. I simply wish to corroborate, in so far as British Columbia is concerned, the statement that the increase has been marvelous indeed, that the immigration into that country has been very largely from the United States to the mining districts and largely from England, and to a considerable extent from Eastern Canada. I have only a very slight knowledge of the condition of affairs in the North-west, but as far as my knowledge goes the immigration into the North-west is infinitely greater than it ever was in the history of that country. The hon. gentlemen from the North-west know better than I do. I do not wish to enter into the political discussions, because it appears to me that some hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly my hon. friend from Wolseley, imagine that an election is going to take place next fall, and desire to make political capital.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The hon. gentleman would leave us to believe that the immigration into British Columbia was from foreign countries. Is it not a fact that it is from other portions of Canada?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—A great part of it.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The greater part of it—90 per cent.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I think a good deal of spite and unpleasantness has been expressed on this side of the House in reference to this Canada of ours. I regret this very much, because I think it is a foul bird that fouls its own nest. I know something about the lower provinces, which have been mentioned more especially, just as much as any gentleman in this House. I have come as lately from the lower provinces as any hon. gentleman in this House, and before I left home, and since then, I have heard no expression given that the times were not good.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—The navigation in the Bay of Fundy is so dangerous they are afraid to go away.

Hon. Mr. DEVER.—On the contrary there has been a great deal of prosperity there within the last year or two, so much so that real estate is going up in that portion of the country in which I live. Business is good there—much better than it had been for a long time. With reference to parties going to and from the United States, there is no doubt at all times a great many are going to the cities of the United States and coming from there. We trade a good deal with the United States and they trade with us, and the consequence is that strangers might impute the movement of population to people going away from one country and settling in another. That is not so at all. For the last year or two we have heard of no families of any consequence removing from the province of New Brunswick. With reference to the class of immigration that has been brought out to this country, one gentleman seemed to have expressed himself very unkindly about a certain class I have some knowledge of. The Doukhobors came to our city in large numbers. They were heralded there by people who knew them, and the newspapers took hold of the discussion and a very strong feeling was aroused in their favour, and properly so. The ladies of our city congregated and arranged to give them a kindly reception. They waited on them and made them as happy as possible by giving them little presents and intermingling with them to ascertain what class of people they were. The consequence was they were reported as a very moral people. They are a class of people designated as Quakers, and if I mistake not, those of the Quaker persuasion is generally looked on as a moral class of people. The first act they performed after landing in America was to give praise and thanks to Almighty God for their delivery from the accidents of the sea, and their gratitude in getting to a country in which they felt they would have perfect freedom, both religious and political.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—And sell their wives.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Other nationalities can sell their wives too. I have no knowledge, and I do not think any other man who wishes to speak simply as to the facts knows that the Doukhobors are not a proper class of immigrants to bring to this country. From some remarks made by my hon. friend from Wolseley (Mr. Perley), he seems very anxious to associate himself, as far as I can learn, with a certain divine in Manitoba. I feel disposed to say that I do not think much of that divine if he would allow himself, thoughtlessly or otherwise, to divulge what I might call secrets to a general politician who might promiscuously come in his way, and I have my doubts, notwithstanding the ascertain of the hon. gentleman, that ever that clergyman used such expressions as have been repeated in this House. At all events, if he did I do not think it is to the credit of that hon. gentleman to break confidence and to retail and peddle out what he alleges was a private conversation. If his principal in the matter is no better than his statement about the Doukhobers, in my opinion it is worth very little to this House and to the country, because again I wish to say that the Doukhobors have been pronounced by the people who knew them to have been the best class of immigrants we have had come to our shores for many years. With reference to the general prosperity of the country, our banks will show that we are in a more prosperous state now than we ever were in commercially. Any stranger in the city of Ottawa can see that it has been improving every year for the last two or three years. As for the suburbs of St. John, they are extending, and, as I said, real estate is becoming more valuable every year. In my opinion, and I think in the opinion of a large number of people in the country, the cause of it is that the people feel they have a stable, honest, watchful, vigilant government at the head of affairs and it has given to the people a feeling of stability, so much so that I think there is a permanent prosperity before us what we have not had for years.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am glad I am given an opportunity to say a few words in reply to the leader of the government. I do not think I merited the strong language he used in characterizing my utterances in regard to the immigration that is at the present moment the subject of discussion. I have been ten years in this House, and I do not think any one has heard me say anything derogatory to the character of a private individual or any class of individuals. It is as foreign to my habit and foreign to my feelings as it possibly can be. We have a right to discuss public questions so far as they concern the public weal without having anything attributed to us of a private nature. My reference to the question of the immigration of the Doukhobors being a job lot was, I think, perfectly pertinent—or brought in by wholesale. They were a distinct lot of immigrants; they were being forced out of Russia in consequence of their religious belief, or some other reason. There are 10,000, and there were two ships sent over expressly to bring that 10,000 people to Canada. It is only in that way that I referred to their being a job lot, and I think I was perfectly correct in making that statement. It seems to me that the school question which has been the subject of considerable acrimony for the past six or seven years, has developed a species of effort on the part of the government to keep level, so far as religions are concerned, in that country—if a certain number of Roman Catholics are brought in there as immigrants, they have to be offset by a certain number of Quakers or Spirit Wrestlers as they call themselves I believe. It is unfortunate that that feeling should prevail. That any member of the government should pander to the fanaticism of Sections of the people, or use it for political purposes. It does exist among our own people who desire to see religious tolerance the leading spirit. I have not a single word to say against the Galicians. I have not a word to say against the Doukhobors. We have employed Galicians ourselves since they came to the country and I have nothing to say against them in any shape or form. What the honourable gentleman from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) referred to was what appeared in the public press—the dreadful murder that took place recently out west. It was a perfectly legitimate subject for discussion. It exposed to the public what does pass through the minds of a certain class of immigrants. What I object to, with regard to this wholesale immigration of large numbers of foreigners, is that they are put in possession of the soil—put in possession of 160 acres of land and they will remain in possession of the soil from generation to generation no doubt. Is it desirable that we should pay such a large sum, I think it was $7 a head, per head for men and women and children ?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I thought it was $5.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I think it was $7 a head for the Doukhobors.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—How much does it cost to feed them in this country ? Have we not been feeding them all winter ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Yes, and we will have to feed them all summer too.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON.--They have been supported since they came. They will have to be supported during the summer and will have to be supported for a considerable portion of the winter. I have no doubt, because the climate is of that character that it is very difficult to produce any large quantity of food the first year that they go in there, so that the expense is very great indeed. If they were to offer the same opportunity to our own people, or to people of our own way of thinking, they would have no difficulty in bringing 10 or 20 of 25 thousand there, and it is perfectly legitimate for us to raise our voices in this House and express our desire that that class of people should be settled amongst us instead of a population with whom we cannot assimilate, at any rate in this generation. I have no doubt that what the hon. gentleman says is true, that future generations of these people, the same as those that came to Ontario, will be good Canadian citizens, but that we should go to such an enormous expense to bring foreigners in and place them on the soil, leaving the odd numbereds section of land vacant between them, so that our own people cannot settle in among them or perhaps will not be made comfortable to settle among them, and feed them at the public expense, is a mistake. In Russia there are 104,000,000 people, in Austria something like 40,000,000 and these people write home and bring in their friends gradually until we find that the Great North-west, instead of being filled up by a population homogenous to the rest of the population, will be entirely foreign so far as this country is concerned in their ideas, and will go on developing their own habits and methods. How far that is going to be good for Canada as a whole, I am not prepared to say, but I am distinctly opposed to such a policy, and I think I am speaking the opinion of those who live on the soil in that country when I say, that we hope that wholesale immigration of that kind will not be continued—that while it may confer a certain amount of benefit to the country, as a whole, from a financial standpoint, it would be a great deal better to go slower and have a population that would be homogenous to the country than these foreigners are likely to prove themselves to be.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Did you oppose the Mennonites coming in ?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, I was not there at the time Mr. Hespeler became a guarantee to the government for $120,000 for the re-payment of all expenses connected with the Mennonite immigration. That expenditure has been all repaid to the uttermost farthing. They have been no expense to the population, and it is not a proper comparison.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was a loan after they went there. The passages were paid by the government and the land was given free.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They never paid it back.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Every penny of the $120,000 was paid back.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was the advance. It was not the passage money at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. Minister of Justice to say that the loan made to the Mennonites was not paid ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I did not say so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What was not paid ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The aid given to the passage across the Atlantic was not charged to the Mennonites.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON : I did hear, before I came to Ottawa, that a fund of $20,000 had been raised in Great Britain and the United States and elsewhere for the benefit of the Doukhobors, that this had been paid to the Minister of Interior and that there was some complaining among the Doukhobors that this $20,000 was not paid over to them. How far that is correct I do not know. Whether that $20,000 is to be kept by the government to maintain the people for such a long time I do not know. My honourable friend from British Columbia who cried : hear, hear, when the leader of the Government was addressing the house has spoken of the immigration to that province and the mines that have been developed there. His province has passed a law to exclude Japanese, so far as it can do so. I do not see that it comes very well from him to express approval of the immigration of foreigners to our country when he has passed a law to say the Japanese shall not come to British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—It is quite obvious that British Columbia could not pass such a law.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I say that so far as you have been able to do so, you have passed it. You have passed a law that no Japanese shall be employed on public work, and the Chinese are to pay $500.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—On any public work receiving a subsidy from the government.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Whatever it was, to the extent they were able to legislate, they did pass a law to say that no Japanese should come into the country. If it was constitutional they would go further and prevent Japanese from settling in the province. We are not taking that position at all. We are welcoming anybody who comes of his own free will and accord, and will give him a hearty reception and help him, but when the government bring 10,000 at a time, and isolate them from the rest of the population, we think it is injurious to the future welfare and proper settlement of that country which, if it only had fair-play would attract a class of population more harmonious to the whole.

The motion to adjourn was withdrawn.

PRESERVATION OF HEALTH ON PUBLIC WORKS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on Bill (C) "An Act for the Preservation of Health on Public Works."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose that means all works in connection with the railways, telegraphs, &c., that have been legislated upon by the Parliament of Canada. It would not apply to works that had been authorized by provincial legislatures.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it refers to works in process of construction, undertaken under the authority of the Parliament of Canada.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 3.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—With reference to subsection "c" I do not think the government wish to constitute themselves a body to examine medical men, and I would suggest this change: strike out the words "and qualifications" so as to read "as to the number of medical men to be employed on the works," and I would add that medical men so employed should be graduates and legally qualified to practice in any one of the provinces of this Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think what my hon. friend proposes is what was intended here. As to qualifications, of course we do not wish to authorize any contractor to bring in men who are not qualified under the law here.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—This would do it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We might change it to read as to the number of qualified medical men to be employed on the works.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That would meet my views. You must remember each province has its own medical board and does not recognize the men of other provinces. In the case of a public work in Ontario, will a medical man from the province of Quebec, who may be employed on a public work, as this law contemplates, be permitted to practice in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As it reads there, the party must be qualified by the law of the place where he is employed.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That would mean only medical men in Ontario could be employed on public works in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 4.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think this is giving the governor in council unlimited power, although I do not suppose for a moment any government would exercise it; but it gives the government the power to prescribe the penalty. I do not know that I object to it particularly. I am only calling attention to the fact that it is delegating to the government very extraordinary powers. At the same time, I do not think any government would exercise them prejudicially to the parties.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Could not this power be exercised by some judicial authority? It should not be left in the hands of the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no intention to supersede the courts in the trying of parties. The question is under what law or regulation they shall be tried, and it is only giving the government power to make the regulations.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The courts have to carry them out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Why don't you say that? According to my reading of it the government have the power.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The government is substituted for Parliament on a comparatively unbeaten track. We can only make regulations until Parliament otherwise provides, intending that Parliament shall legislate as soon as the necessary experience has been acquired.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There may be circumstances, such as those which arose in the Crow's Nest Pass, that might require the immediate action of the government, and it would be prejudicial, not only to public health but to the lives of people, if the government had to wait for Parliament to give the power.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I propose, as an additional clause, to provide that any orders in council made under the authority of this act shall be laid on the table of the House within 15 days after the meeting of Parliament, so that Parliament would have supervision over everything that is done under the act.

The clause was amended and adopted.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE, from the Committee reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The Senate adjourned.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER rose to:

Inquire of the government, whether any memorandum, communications or representations have been received within the last twelve months by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, or by any member of the government, from any party or person whatsoever, bearing on school matters in Manitoba or in the North-west Territories?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say in reply to the hon. gentleman that I believe a letter written some time ago by His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface, who also wrote a letter to the Prime Minister stating that he desired that the communication which he had sent should be considered confidential, so that the government have no public letter which they can communicate.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—No memorandum?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No memorandum. I stated to my hon. friend that a letter was received from His Grace, but His Grace also wrote a letter to the Prime Minister stating that he desired that that letter should, for the present at all events, be considered confidential.

PRESERVATION OF HEALTH ON PUBLIC WORKS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the third reading of Bill (C) "An Act for the preservation of health on public works."

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Before the bill is read the third time, I desire to make a suggestion. I find that it does not quite meet the objection I raised yesterday. In fact, I must have misunderstood the Minister of Justice, for I find that it excludes the medical men from other provinces from being allowed to practice where the public works are going on. As these public works are of a federal nature, I think it ought to allow medical men from other provinces to be employed in that capacity. I will give the House an illustration. Take the province of British Columbia; I do not think the province could supply medical men enough to engage on public works there, as happened in connection with the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—We have a surplus of them.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—British Columbia may have a surplus, but the other provinces have surpluses and they contribute as much towards the public works as British Columbia. I thought it would be well to allow medical men from other provinces to be considered as qalified to practice. The provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the provinces by the sea have men who are as well qualified as any in the Dominion of Canada, and probably British Columbia has also; at the same time, I do not think they should be prevented from being employed on public works no matter where that work may be. They have not been hitherto prohibited for I have known medical men from Ontario and Quebec to be engaged on the Canadian Pacific Railway on the north coast of Lake Superior and away west in the other provinces. I would like, therefore, to see this bill amended so as to provide for that, and would suggest the adding of what I mentioned yestereday—"that men so employed shall be equally qualified to practice in any of the provinces of the Dominion."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The objection which occurred to me with regard to my hon. friend's suggestion, is that the qualification of men to practise medicine is within the jurisdiction of the province.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—So it is unfortunately.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And it is for the province to say who may practise medicine within the limits of the province. British Columbia, I believe, has recently provided by its legislation that any one who is qualified to practice medicine in any one of the provinces of Canada and the North-west Territories shall also be at liberty to practise medicine within the province of British Columbia, but I am not aware that any other province has gone that far. I do not care to assume to confer a power upon medical men, or to assume to bestow upon the government power to employ medical men in contravention of the law of the local legislatures. The government may do so. The man who undertakes to practise of course takes a risk, but it is extremely doubtful whether the government of Canada, any more than an individual, could employ a medical man to practise in the province who is not qualified to do so by the law of the province, and it may be that we would be at liberty to employ a man who is not a qualified practitioner at all. That is extremely doubtful, and I do not think that there is likely to be any interference hereafter any more than there has been in the past, and I thought it was not desirable that we should assume a larger jurisdiction than we know we actually possess. If that question is to be raised, I would rather see it raised in some other way than upon what would seem to be, by the government, an encroachment upon local authority.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AND EXPROPRIATION ACT AMENDMENT BILLS.

COMMITTEE STAGE POSTPONED.

The Orders of the Day being called:

Committee of the Whole House on (Bill B) "An Act further to amend the Exchequer Court Act."

Committee of the Whole House on (Bill D) "An Act to amend the Expropriation Act."

Hon. Mr. MILLS said:—I would ask that the order be discharged and put on the order paper for Tuesday next. I have received some communications, and parties have expressed a desire to write me further on the subject, and I wish to give them sufficient time to do so. I would ask that the order in which they stand on the order paper be reversed, so that the wishes of hon. gentlemen with regard to the order in which they should be discussed may be met.

The Orders of the Day were discharged accordingly.

THE SENATE DEBATES.

FIRST REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved the adoption of the first report of the committee. He said:—The report explains itself, but should any hon. gentleman require further information, I am ready to give it. As to the gentleman who is recommended, he has been a translator in the House of Commons for many years, and the committee thought that a sufficient recommendation. However, they deemed it best to try the translator for a year, and give him a smaller salary to begin with than he would have ultimately. I may remark that Mr. Bouchard, who is now a pretty old man, has always been a French journalist, and consequently has had occasion every day to translate public documents, so that he should be a good translator, and that is the reason why the committee thought he was the man for the position.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He is not the gentleman who has been removed from the staff in the other House?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Has not Mr. Desjardins been employed to do this work?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Not during this session, but during previous years. During this session Mr. Bouchard has been going on with the work since the beginning of the session at his own risk, because we had to wait until the Senate should decide the matter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am simply asking for information whether a Mr. Desjardins was not employed in the work of translation, and whether there was any reason for superseding him by the appointment of Mr. Bouchard.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I presume the chairman of the committee answered by saying that this was a move in the direction of economy. Mr. Desjardins has in the past been paid so much per page for the translation for a number of years past, and if a gentleman can be appointed to the staff whose services would be at the disposal of the Senate during the whole year, at four or five hundred dollars less than is now paid for the translation, which is done (as I have already intimated) by the page, it would be an advantage to the Senate to have such a man to utilize his services in the translation of any documents in addition to this work, and at the same time save five or six hundred dollars a year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Mr. Desjardins, I believe, was a very competent translator.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No one has found fault with Mr. Desjardins as a translator.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Is Bouchard to do all the translation, or are others to assist him?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—No. He will be an officer of the Senate, and will do the translating during the session, and during the whole year he will be under the control of the clerk, and will do all the work of translation which the Senate may require.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He will do all the work; there is no staff under him?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—No, he is alone.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (H) "An Act to incorporate the Imperial Loan and Investment Company of Canada (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer.)

Bill (I) "An Act respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company." (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer).

THE GEOLOGICAL MUSEUM AND DOMINION ARCHIVES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER rose to inquire of the government:

If it is their intention to commence this year the erection of new buildings for the Geological Museum?

If space will be reserved in the building for the Dominion Archives, which are now scattered in three or four different places?

He said:—Since this notice was placed on the order paper a declaration has been made in the House of Commons by the hon. Minister of the Interior embodying an answer to the question. I understand that it has been virtually decided by the government to erect a building for the Geological Survey, and that plans are about to be submitted to the government for that purpose. However, the answer of the hon. minister is somewhat indefinite. In fact, there is no mention as to the date when the government propose to commence the building. It is vague. I will therefore be permitted to say a few words on this question, which is of great national importance. My idea is simply to call the attention of the hon. members of the Senate to this important question, so that they may look into it, and if possible strengthen the hands of the government. Anything done by the government for the city of Ottawa is viewed, I am sorry to say, with a certain amount of jealousy by other cities, and therefore an expression of assent from this House would have the effect of encouraging the government in carrying out a policy which I believe would be of great utility. I remember in 1879 or 1880, when it was proposed to enlarge Metcalfe street, opposite the parliament buildings, so as to make a large avenue of 400 or 500 feet, Sir Hector Langevin, if I remember rightly, had that idea in his mind. It was part of the policy of the government. It was then opposed, and to-day we have reason to regret that it was not carried out. An avenue here just in front of the parliament buildings of five or six hundred feet, would be such an enhancement to the beauty and utility of the place that it would have been a good policy to adopt at that time. The expropriation could have been made then for a little over $100,000; now a couple of million dollars would not do it, and very possibly, if ultimately it is done, it will cost very many millions. It is important that in building here in Ottawa for future purposes, great attention should be given to making the structure sufficiently spacious for the requirements of future ages. Our public buildings here are already too small. If the parliament buildings were one story higher it would be a great advantage to us. The library of Parliament here, which is itself a gem, is unsuitable, in this way, that it cannot be enlarged, and that it is already too small. If when building it more attention had been given to the future requirements of the Dominion, we would not be in such a predicament. The library is a beautiful piece of architecture, but it will soon be very nearly useless. The idea in erecting a building for the Geological Museum should be to have one of large proportions. The importance of our mines is very great indeed, and they are constantly assuming greater proportions. Last year, or the year before, the revenue of the mines was inferior to that of fisheries. We see by the last report that a leap has been made, and while the fisheries have increased to twenty-two millions of dollars, the output of the mines has gone to over twenty-eight millions of dollars, and the increase will continue year after year. The mines of the Dominion of Canada are a great source of natural wealth, and will yield a large revenue, and it is very important that the proposed building should be constructed in such a way as to meet future requirements. I have looked into this question very closely. I shall not detain the House very long, because I believe some other gentlemen desire to take part in the discussion, but I shall, as regards the importance of the museum, read an extract from the Royal Society report of 1896—in the summary report of the Geological Survey Department, for 1894, the director writes as follows on the buildings now occupied by the survey:—

I may also again venture to direct your attention to the wholly inadequate accommodations afforded to the museum and offices by the present building on Sussex street. The collections now contained in this building, including the departments of minerology, lithology, palæontology, botany, geology and ethnology, either on exhibition or classified and readily accessible, agregate more than 120,000 specimens. The greater part of the space available is devoted to the illustration of the minerals and general geology of Canada; but it is impossible to display the specimens to advantage or in such a manner as to attract the public notice which they deserve. The position of the building and its construction further render it liable to the constant danger of destruction by fire, and when it is remembered that the collections include the typical specimens which have been described in the publication of the survey since its institution, besides many others of a character which it would now be impossible to duplicate the very serious nature of this risk will be understood. The building also contains much accumulated material in maps, plans, notes and records, together with the entire reserve stock of the printed reports of the survey, and a library comprising a large number of scarce and valuable scientific works.

Hon. gentlemen will understand what an irreparable loss the country would sustain if this building should be destroyed by fire, as it may at any time be. Many years ago I remember there was a very serious fire in the immediate vicinity of the museum, and it was close work for the city fire brigade to save the valuable collections of documents and specimens. We have, I understand, over two thousand typical specimens which are unique and which could not possibly be replaced. There should be constructed a separate building, distant from places where fire could originate, and built in such a way as to render an enlargement of the building possible. There is no doubt that ere many years, it will have to be enlarged again. The suggestion to the government is not to build anything like the library here, but such a building that it could be extended one way or the other. That is very important. In my notice of motion, I also ask if a space could be reserved for the archives. The archives are another valuable collection which should be looked after better than they are now. It is shameful to see that our Canadian archives, which are invaluable, rich, unique many of them, which could not be replaced, are scattered—where? In the public library here, in the Department of Agriculture, in the Privy Council, in the office of the Secretary of State. Some in Montreal have been lost, I am told. They are so scattered that any one looking for historical information has to go from one department to another before he can ascertain where to locate the special documents he is looking after. Moreover, these documents, not being under the control of one man, are liable to be lost, as unfortunately has been the case with a good many of them. We have the military reports, for example, 1785 to 1890, which are unique. Let those be lost or burned, and it would be impossible to replace them. The loss to history would be such that future historians could not write that part of our Canadian history as they would if they were in possession of those documents. There are also private documents of a historical character. In fact, our wealth of archives is very great, and has cost a great deal of money; it has accumulated from about 1872 up to the present time, and there should be a structure, in my opinion, where all those archives could be collected together and securely stored. In the building to be erected for a museum, there should be space for the archives, if not for a permanent location, at least until such time as the increase in the archives will necessitate a separate building. At all events, I should like to see the archives stored in such a way as to be safe from danger of destruction by fire. I might incidentally call the attention of the government to the fact that many of the officials in the geological department are leaving the employ of the government, no doubt to better their positions. I have been pretty well acquainted with the department myself, and I know that we have lost a number of officials whom it will be very difficult to replace. They have left the service to take more remunerative positions, and the list of them that I have here and which I propose to read to the House covers a full page of foolscap paper. I mention this for the purpose of calling the attention of the government to the position of those employees who are now in contact with the outer world—with speculators, with foreign governments and universities—and who are frequently tempted by offers of much higher remuneration than they receive here to leave the service of our government. We should try to keep those men here. They are not like ordinary employees. In most cases, where dismissals have occurred, it has been found very easy to fill vacancies, but those skilled officials, possessed of technical knowledge, are not easily replaced. We cannot blame them when they are offered much larger remuneration than they receive here if they sever their connection with the department. The country suffers by the loss because it is not the first comer, or even the first geologist, who is competent to replace a man who has been in the service for ten, fifteen or twenty years and who is conversant with special localities where he can be of great service to the country. The services of a newly arrived technical officer, equally competent in general geology, would not be in such localities as valuable. The following is a list of employees who have left the Geological Survey to seek for more remunerative positions :

PERMANENTS.

J. B. TYRRELL, left in 1899, whose salary was $1,850. Is now consulting engineer at Dawson, Yukon.

WALTER FERRIER, left in 1898, salary $1,600. Is now manager of a mining company at Rossland, with a salary of about $3,000.

Mr. COLE, 1898, now assistant manager of a mining company at Rossland.

H. P. BRUMELL, 1895, salary $1,262, now manager of a mining company at Buckingham, in the province of Quebec.

Dr. F. D. ADAMS, 1889, salary $1,400. Now professor at McGill University.

Dr. A. C. Lawson, left in 1889 also. Now professor in the California University. Had a salary of $1,200.

A. BOWMAN, 1889. Salary also of $1,200.

M. A. C. COSTE, left in 1888. Had a salary of $1,850. The two latter have started on their own hooks.

TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES.

H. N. RUSSELL, assistant geologist, now manager of a mining company near Denver, Colorado; D. I. V. EATON, now in Kingston; M. FOSTER, now mining expert for Vanderbilt, New York, where he gets $5,000; Mr. A. BOYER, now an engineer in the Public Works Department; Mr. J. A. ROBERT, now in business in Montreal; Mr. KENDRICK, who acted as chemist here and is now professor and analyst in Winnipeg, where he derives a large salary; Prof. SPENCER, who is now in an American university; Dr. B. J. HARRINGTON, now professor at McGill University, where he is well remunerated; Mr. WM. LAWSON, now manager of a mining company.

This shows that we are losing the services of very valuable men, and why? For no other reason than that their services are not adequately remunerated. I make no plea for the employees, but I mention this fact as incidental to the museum, because it is very important that we should retain our technical men and not let them go to other places where, of course, they get larger salaries. They would, on an equal or even smaller salary, remain here, but when the discrepancy is great and the offers made to them are large, of course they leave. For example, I made a comparison of the salaries that officers occupying similar positions in the United States survey get, and I find that they are about twice as large as the remuneration our employees receive here. The work is identical. The requirements of the fisheries are the same and if we wish to retain our best men in the service I again remind the government that they should be well paid. I suppose they are like other employees. Before leaving they apply for an increase of salary, and when the government find that those increases are reasonable, as in many cases they must be, they should be offered inducements to remain. We should, in the matter of mines and in all matters concerning Ottawa, look out for the future of our country. The Premier, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, stated that he would make Ottawa the Washington of the North. It is desirable that Ottawa should be made the Washington of the North or a fine city at all events. It will necessarily be a large city, but for the three years these gentlemen have been in power I have looked in vain for anything like a Washington here. The museum to be erected should be a large building, suitable for the present time and for future generations, because what is being built now should be built in such a way that it would serve the purpose of the country for half a century or a century hence. Remember the policy of the Romans when they built their city. They felt that they were building for all time. Let us build in the same spirit, because our Dominion is making such strides that before long we will find that the city of Ottawa will, by force of things, become in fact a Washington of the North. Already we find that hosts of citizens are coming to us from other countries. We find that the Galician and Doukhobors and Finns, are crowding our hon. friends from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) and Marquette (Mr. Boulton) from the North-west. Every appearance of prosperity is before us. We should, therefore, in constructing permanent buildings in Ottawa look forward to those future requirements.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—This House is under a debt of gratitude to my hon. friend, the member for L'Acadia, for having brought the need of a museum so forcibly before the government. I am more interested, however, in the archives. The archives were kept for a long time in an underground room in the western building. If you wanted to go down to see it you had to pass through a badly lighted entry, full of old packing boxes, and when you got in there you found it was damp, and in the early winter there was a snow bank in front of the windows, which continued until late in the spring. It was unhealthy for the persons who were there, and certainly for the very archives themselves it was a great detriment. It was musty and damp. That was fortunately removed. I take credit to myself for having brought the matter before the House, and I hope the archives will be put in a proper place. My hon. friend informs me they are put in different rooms, and not accessible, as they ought to be, to members. I am certain if they were in a proper place and members of the House knew the value of them, they would visit the place oftener and encourage the persons who have charge of them to take more pride in their work and keep them in better order. The necessity of keeping the archives is illustrated in Nova Scotia. I remember meeting a Mr. Fuller, a book man, coming down the street and he says, "Doctor, do you know what I have in my hand?" I said "No." And he says "I have a letter from Washington to the Governor of Nova Scotia." I said "Where did you get it?" He says "I saw it in the provincial secretary's office, and he told me I might have it." There is another case, the original survey of the Mason and Dixie line, separating the north from the south. The original of that survey was in the museum of the House of Parliament in Nova Scotia. Mr. James, secretary of the House, took it to the exhibition in Philadelphia and sold it for $600. He said it was given to him, but who had a right to give it to him, I do not know. Those are two instances that came to my own notice, and there are, no doubt, a great many others. I do not say that anything of that kind has happened here, because I understand that Mr. Brymner had always taken great care of these things, but, at the same time, he was so wedded to the underground place, that it kept them there. I am glad the matter has been brought before the House. I have no doubt the hon. Minister of Justice will see that these things are taken care of.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The first question put by the hon. member, as to whether it is the intention of the government to commence this year the erection of new buildings for the Geological Museum, I am unable to answer at this moment. The subject is under the direction of the Minister of the Interior, and the hon. gentleman will no doubt be fully informed before the session proceeds much further. He asks also if space will be reserved in the building for the Dominion archives which are now scattered in three or four different places. Of course it is very desirable that some one convenient location where these archives will be protected against the possibility of destruction by fire shall be found. I have myself always felt a great interest in the museum and in the preservation of the archives. I think it was while I was Minister of the Interior, a good many years ago, that the museum was moved from the city of Montreal to Ottawa, because it was a very important branch of the geological department. A building was subsequently acquired for the purpose of a museum which has served the purpose for a great many years, although having been constructed for another and different object. It is not, perhaps, the best building for that purpose. A museum ought to be erected in some place where there is abundance of light and where it is far away from highways, so that the specimens which are collected will not be affected by the dust. Most museums are constructed without any impediment from the top of the building to the basement, and whenever a building comes to be constructed it will require to possess those characteristics. A building is necessary. The present building is not sufficiently strong to make it perfectly secure because the collection of a large number of specimens in a building is a tremendous weight upon it, and it requires to be constructed with special reference to that fact. The hon. gentleman will get the information later, when His Excellency will, if called upon, ask the House for the necessary appropriation. With reference to the preservation of the archives, it is a question which has often been considered whether they ought not to be placed in connection with the library of Parliament. Our library is too small even for the present purposes, and whether there ought to be an attempt made to extend the building or whether it would not, on the whole, be cheaper to erect a large library building on the site where the present library stands, is a matter which Parliament no doubt will at no distant day consider.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That cannot be.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—You do not mean to destroy the present building?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You cannot build another.

THE POST OFFICE AT SOUTH BAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to inquire of the government:

Whether Mr. W. H. McLean, of South Bay, in the county of Prince Edward, Ontario, has been dismissed from the office of postmaster, and if so, the reason for said dismissal, and upon whose suggestion or recommendation such dismissal was made, and who has been appointed to fill the position made vacant by such dismissal?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In reply to the inquiry of my hon. friend, I may say that Mr. W. H. McLean, late postmaster of South Bay, was not dismissed from that office. A re-arrangement of the mail service having been made by which the service of South Bay was increased from semi-weekly to daily, and that of the two offices between South Bay and Point Traverse increased from semi-weekly to tri-weekly, it was found necessary to remove the South Bay post office to a more convenient site. As a result of this change in the location of the office, a change in the postmastership became necessary and a successor to Mr. McLean was appointed. The change in the mail service referred to was recommended by Mr. W. V. Pettet, M.P., and approved by the inspector. Mr. W. H. Whattam is the name of the new postmaster of the office.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not suppose the hon. minister is in a position to say whether, finding it necessary to make the changes referred to, Mr. McLean was offered the position if he would remove to that locality.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to inform the hon. gentleman. I can only give the information which was furnished me.

DISMISSALS FOR PARTISANSHIP.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid on the table of the Senate, the names of all commissioners appointed by Order in Council or otherwise since the 9th April, 1897, to inquire into and report upon charges preferred against any employee of the government, whether permanent or temporary, of offensive partisanship, or of any misconduct whatever.

2. The reports of said commissioners, or of commissioners previously appointed, not already brought down, and a statement showing the action taken by the government thereon.

3. The amounts paid each Commissioner since the 9th April, 1897, in fees, per diem allowance, travelling expenses and incidentals of all kinds.

4. The names, ages, offices and salaries of all employees in the inside or outside service of the government, whether temporary or permanent, who since the 9th April, 1897, have been removed from office by dismissal, superannuation, or otherwise, whether on a report of a commission or otherwise, specifying in each case the grounds of dismissal, and the amount of superannuation or gratuity granted, if any; also, the age, office, salary or remuneration of any and every person appointed in the place of, or as a consequence of every such removal.

He said:—This is dated from the date of the last return which was brought down, and will make the return complete when we have it before us.

Hon Mr. MILLS—There is no objection to the address.

The motion was agreed to.

SANITARY CONDITION OF DAWSON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to inquire:

If any orders have been issued by the government for the improvement of the sanitary condition of Dawson City, in the Yukon district?

He said:—I suppose the members of the government have heard about the prevailing sickness at Dawson City, as well as I and others have heard of it, and I hope something will be done shortly to improve the sanitary condition of that place. All accounts agree as to the sanitary condition of Dawson City. The government are receiving large revenues from the Yukon district, and should do something towards improving the sanitary condition,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The sanitary regulations of Dawson City is under the control of the commissioner and council of the district, who are provided with sufficient funds to carry out such work as may be necessary. No special instructions have been issued because none are required. They fully appreciate the importance of the matter and we have been so advised.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am very glad to hear it.

IMPERIAL LIFE ASSURANCE CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (G) "An Act respecting the Imperial Life Assurance Company of Canada."

He said:—I might explain that the provision in this bill is simply asking for further loaning powers. The loaning powers granted to this life insurance company are much more limited than those of any other company, and considering the difficulty of investing surplus funds which they have in hand at the present time, which difficulties did not exist in years past, it is found necessary in the interests of the company that they should have their powers extended. The matter, I dare say, will be fully discussed before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, when further reasons can be given. I can only add this, that taking the Canadian Life Assurance Company, their powers are almost unlimited. The Sun Life of Montreal is also in the same position. These two companies are the most successful life assurance companies doing business in Canada; and, perhaps I might say, almost on the continent, and while they have these large powers they have been enabled to invest their money in the interest of stockholders as well as of the policyholders. If hon. gentlemen have paid any attention to the powers given to the most successful life companies in England and in Scotland, they will find they have not been restricted in the manner that some of our companies, particularly life companies, are in this respect. I shall not occupy the attention of the House further in giving reasons for asking for these extended powers, they can be more fully discussed before the committee. What the Imperial Life Company ask is that they shall be placed in as favourable a position as are other companies which have been most successful. I may also add this piece of information, although it is not information to those who have paid attention to the monetary institutions of the country, that some of the loan companies which have been most restricted in their operations have been the companies that failed. I do not attribute that so much to the law under which they were carrying on business, as to the dishonesty of those who were conducting them. In all those companies the character of those connected with them will have much more to do with their success in the future than any law under which they may act. The Canada Life is the best possible evidence of that, as is also the Sun Life in Montreal.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice and Secretary of State to a report which has been published in reference to the action which the Imperial Government proposes to take in aid of the construction of a Pacific cable between Canada and Australia,

The report which I hold in my hand, as having been cabled from London, on the 27th inst., says:

London, April 27—The Times announces this morning that the British Government has decided to contribute an annual subsidy to the full amount reported in the report of the Pacific cable committee of 1896, for the construction of a Pacific cable from British Columbia to Australia.

I may add, before reading further, that the committee of 1896, of which I was a member, made no recommendation whatever, as to the manner in which the cable should be constructed; probably the reference is to the committee of 1897. The despatch continues:

After expressing its satisfaction with the government's decision, the Times says: "It is not obvious why the Government have decided to pay a subsidy instead of joining on the same terms as Canada and the colonies. The subsidy method seems to involve foregoing all share in the probable profits, as well as the right of nominating commissioners in case the line pays, and the subsidy should no longer be required. If there be any alarm as to supersession by wireless telegraphy that scare may be dismissed, as the new system does not promise to bridge vast space.

On the 26th, another telegram was sent:

London, April 26.—At the semi-annual meeting of the Eastern Telegraph Company to-day the Marquis of Tweeddale said he believed that by international law the United States government was bound to recognize the company's concessions in the Philippine Islands and to take up the undertakings of Spain in this connection. He added that negotiations on the subject had been opened, and the company expected a reply shortly. Their relations with the United States authorities in the Philippines, he explained, were most satisfactory, and he was glad to say, relative to the various proposed cables connecting the United States with Australia and Canada with Australia, the various governments were still considering the questions, which were expected to be settled within six months.

In addition to this, information has been received that the Eastern Extension Cable Company have called their agent home from Australia to consult upon this very important question. From what has transpired it is quite evident that the Colonial Secretary, The Right Hon. J. Chamberlain is favourable to the all-cable route upon British territory alone. Whether his opinions are to be set aside by the extraordinary influence which we all know the Eastern Extension Cable Company possesses in Europe, remains to be seen. The system which, if this report be true, the Imperial Government desires to adopt, will certainly delay the further consummation of this project for many years to come. Those who have looked into the question cannot but come to the conclusion, that the Eastern Extension Company's various ramifications in Europe, and in England especially, are of such a character that they are dangerous to any enterprise which may be suggested that would interfere with the monopoly they have at present over Pacific cable communication. I have given some attention to this subject, and have been surprised at the apparent apathy—unless there is something behind it—of the Australasian colonies on this question. They are the people who are bled in connection with this monopoly. The charges from Australasia to Europe, and particularly to Canada, to reach which they have to go round three-fourths of the globe, are exorbitant. I know also that the Eastern Extension Company, through the late Sir John Pender, represented to our own government in Canada that they never had received any subsidies to aid them either in the construction or the carrying on of their work. If any hon. gentlemen desire to be better informed on that question I would refer them to the report which was prepared in reply to that statement by the late government on the subject, in which it was shown conclusively that that company have been largely subsidized—that they have spent over five million dollars in the extension of their lines, and that they have to-day a reserve of between five and seven million dollars, extracted from the pockets of those who have had to use their cable. Its importance to Canada is this, that in order to increase our trade with the Austalasian colonies or any of the Pacific Islands, it is absolutely necessary that we should have cable communication. The old adage was that trade followed the flag. That may be true to a certain extent to-day, but you cannot carry on trade in modern times, successfully, unless you have cable communication with the different parts of the world. As an Imperial question, it is of the highest importance that England should be able to communicate with all her colonies without having to send messages through any foreign country or over any foreign cable. The Right Honourable Secretary of State for the Colonies, I think, fully appreciates this fact, and also the war department, over which the ex-Governor General of Canada, Lord Lansdowne, presides. Why this change should take place I cannot understand; but we do know that every step that can possibly be taken by those who are interested in the Eastern Extension Cable Company will be thrown in the way, in order to frustrate any attempt which may be made by Canada, Australia, or even England itself, and the influence of the company is so great that I very much fear that Imperial interests, as well as colonial interests, will be sacrificed in the interest of this great monopoly. Many people say that this is more an Imperial than it is a Canadian question. I differ from those who take that position. To my mind, that which is Imperial is also in the interest of Canada; that which is Canadian should be considered as Imperial; Canada being an integral part of the British Empire. We should act in unison on questions of this kind. I only hope that the government, having taken the steps which it has, in asking Parliament for an appropriation to aid in the construction of this great work, which, I repeat, is of vital interest, particularly to the Pacific province of British Columbia, as well as to this part of the world, will make strong representations to the colonial office and to the Imperial Government as to its necessity, not only from an Imperial standpoint, but from a Canadian standpoint as well, in order that the influence of the monopoly to which I have referred may be counteracted. I have a number of extracts in my desk which I intended to lay before the House, but I do not deem it necessary to occupy the time of the House at the present moment in bringing them forward. There is one point that struck me forcibly in an article in the Bullionist of London, in which the writer argues strongly in favour of the construction and laying of this cable; among other things it points out that the contribution which is being given, or which is promised, by the Canadian Government for the construction of this cable connecting the Pacific colonies with Canada is of infinitely more importance to England and Imperial interests, than the offer which has been made by one of the Australian colonies, to put a man of war, at their own expense, at the disposal of the Imperial Government. It goes on to show that while the expenditure connected with the maintenance of a man of war, no matter of what size or how much it would cost, would not be of so great interest to England in case of trouble with other countries, but that the fact of the war department of England being able to communicate instantaneously with the different parts of the empire, saving as it would largely in the expense of carrying on the operations of any war. That is a point that has not been brought out so strongly before, either by those who have advocated the construction of the cable in Europe or in Canada; but those who will reflect for a moment will see the importance of that statement made by the Bullionist, and we know, further, that the facilities for transporting troops and munitions of war are just as important as having either the fleet or having men belonging to the regular army; and that the facilities which are offered for such a purpose are a very great saving in the carrying on of operations of that kind. There is another singular thing connected with this cable, and it shows that there is an extraordinary influence even in the Colonial Office itself upon this question. When I had the honour of being appointed by the late government to proceed to Australia to discuss trade questions and to consult with the different Australian Governments upon the feasibility of laying the cable, a few days after the colonial office had been informed of the action of the Canadian Government in these particulars, despatches were sent to each of the colonies of Australia, transmitting to them old reports which had been made years and years before, pointing out not only the impracticability of this route but that its enormous cost would be such as to make it almost impossible for governments or individuals to lay the cable on account of the great distances that would have to be stretched between the different land points along the route. When Mr. Fleming and myself went to New South Wales to discuss this question, the first thing we were met with was these despatches. We went to Queensland, we found the Premier and the Postmaster General with these despatches ready to lay before us, and in Victoria precisely the same thing. The question arises how or why should these have been sent under such circumstances? Again, when I moved for papers, a few days ago, it was not known that an agreement had been entered into between the Colonial Office and the Telegraph Extension Company, which was inimical to Canadian interests. What called my attention to it was an article in the Toronto Globe a short time ago, making the statement that such a document was in existence of which we, the outside world, knew nothing. As long ago as 1893, while we were negotiating with the colonies, the Imperial Government had entered into an agreement with the Eastern Extension Company, by which they were to have the sole right of laying a cable extending it from Australia to Hong Kong; and, more than that, Canada is specially excluded from the right of landing upon the shores of Hong Kong, unless done within a certain number of years. After that, if permission is given to Canada to lay a cable between this part of Her Majesty's Dominion and Hong Kong, the Imperial Government, or somebody else, will be bound by that agreement—that is, if the statements as I have pointed them out and as they are indicated in the Globe be correct—will have to pay an enormous sum in order to obtain the right from this company. The present scheme of the Eastern Extension Company is to extend their line from probably Queensland or New Caledonia where they have a line connecting that with Queensland at the present time, to the Philippine Islands, and from that to Hong Kong and via San Francisco to Europe, thereby cutting off Canada altogether; and just so long as they can maintain the monopoly that exists at the present moment, just so long will Canada be deprived of being the centre of the great highways and the benefits which would accrue to this country from such cable communication. Another significant fact, is, if newspaper statements be correct, a late Under Secretary of State for the Colonies is a director of the Eastern Extension Cable Company, also president of the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company. It would be improper to suppose that these facts have had anything to do with what has transpired, but that undue influence has been exercised is beyond a doubt. I have taken the liberty of making this statement with the hope that the government will not be remiss in their duty, at least in calling the attention of the Colonial Secretary to the importance of it not only as an Imperial work but as a colonial work, and to break up, if possible, the monopoly which is enjoyed by the Eastern Extension Company. The more I have studied the matter the more I consider it of importance to this country. Not only should we be connected with the Pacific colonies but we should be connected with all the West India Islands by a cable from Halifax to Jamaica, and with all the islands with which we have any trade. If we expect to build up an export and import trade with these colonies, we should be connected at the earliest possible moment with every part of the empire. It is a matter of great importance that the Imperial Government and the people of England should know that we fully understand the influences that are at work in England used by this company to which I have referred, and that we shall try to break up that monopoly in the interest of the empire as a whole and more particularly in the interest of Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Answering the question which the hon. gentleman has put after reading the extract from the Times, I am in a position to say, and I regret to say, that the main features of it are correct. I am unable at present to give him any further details, but the proposal now made by the Imperial authorities is in the nature of a subsidy and not as co-partner in the original arrangement. That has been proposed for several years and that is the proposal that was accepted. I notice in the report made by the Imperial committee that the original arrangement was based on the assumption that Great Britain and the colonies would be joint owners of this cable. In regard to the ownership, the committee which was composed of the Rt. Hon. Earl of Selburne, who represented Great Britain, who was the chairman, Lord Strathcona and Mr. Jones of Halifax representing Canada and the other gentlemen represting the different colonies, say :

> The committee are of opinion that the cable should be owned and worked by the governments interested. In arriving at this conclusion they would not undervalue the importance of allowing all commercial undertakings to be carried out wherever possible by private enterprise and assisted by government and in the present case there seems to be no probability that private capital will be forthcoming for the purpose of laying a Pacific cable without a larger subsidy than the governments interested in the project would be prepared. If government assistance in some form or other is necessary, the committee think that a scheme under which the cable should be constructed and owned by the governments interested is much to be preferred than a private company working under a government subsidy.

Since the time of that report public opinion has pointed strongly—more particularly in view of those who advocated the ultimate federation of the empire and who look to the unity of the empire—in the direction of a joint Pacific cable. It was considered essential. I regret much that should be departed from. I am unable to give the details at the present moment, as we have not got them in full, but from the advices that we have received, I believe, in its main features, the report in the Times, which the hon. gentleman has read to the House, is correct, and when the hon. gentleman gave notice a few days ago for all the papers connected with the subject, that had passed between the parties interested during the last twelve months, I had them collected with a view of placing them on the table. However, he did not press the motion on that occasion and if he desires now, I shall be very glad to lay them on the table. Among other papers I am able to lay before the House the agreement which was made in October, 1893, to which he has adverted, and which fully bears out all the statements made by the hon. gentleman under which it was quite apparent that the Eastern Extension Company had secured monopoly clauses that were quite at variance with the rights and privileges that the colonies should claim. This company was practically to get a monopoly, and so tightly was that drawn that under article five, which I will read, it is provided that :

> Nothing in this agreement shall affect the right of Her Majesty's Government to grant to the government of the Dominion of Canada, or of any colony in Australia, permission to lay or cause to be laid a submarine telegraph cable connecting Hong Kong with Canada or Australia, provided such connection between Canada and Australia be completed within five years from the date of this agreement.

That is certainly an extraordinary provision to be inserted in the document. It is signed by Lord Ripon. It will be a matter of surprise to the people of Canada to know that Canada has been excluded from the privilege she would have a right to claim. It is a matter of great regret, and there will be, no doubt, in Canada a very emphatic expression of opinion not at all flattering to those who have been promoting the Eastern Extension Company. I fear that all the criticisms the hon. gentleman has expressed on the floor of the House in the main are true. I am not in as good a position to speak as he is, because he has been intimately connected with the enterprise for years and made a voyage to Australia in support of it. He knew the obstacles he had to meet with there and he knows those obstacles have been thrown in the way of the enterprise year by year. They represent financial strength equal to what the hon. gentleman has described, and it will be a matter of very great regret for all time to come—because if it is not done now I do not believe in the future it will be carried out. If it is not accomplished now, it is on the cards that the Eastern Extension Company may form an alliance with the American Company and build a cable from San Francisco, taking in those islands. The American interests centre there; and Canada will be for ever cut out from the interest and share she should possess in this enterprise which will have so much to do with the future development and growth of the British Empire.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am much obliged for the statement the hon. gentleman has made, and I hope he will lay that document on the table.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have the report of the commissioner, which was never produced before. The seal of confidence can now be removed from it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I notice the portion of the report to which my hon. friend referred was dated in 1897. That was the result of the negotiations carried on by Lord Strathcona, high commissioner, and Mr. Jones, of Halifax, assisted by Mr. Fleming, who was there. The extract which I read refers to some report of 1896. That would be the report which was made by Lord Strathcona and myself when we were commissioners in England. That is why I said no report had been made at that time, indicating a basis upon which the work should be constructed. I see now it is only a mistake, probably of the Times, in stating 1896.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The more the document is examined, the more grave it will appear, because I apprehend that for 100 years there has been nothing more seriously done under Imperial authority affecting colonial interests than the attempt to create a monopoly and restrain and cripple the commercial growth of this country. I will not venture to discuss the subject at the present time, but the legislature of Canada and the people of Canada cannot too seriously consider the subject. There are some things that are impossible that this country can afford to have done, and it seems to me that the compact set out in that document comes very close to that border.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think there will be any difference of opinion on that question.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 17th May, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

A CORRECTION.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Before the orders of the day are called, I ask permission to refer to an incident which occurred in the Senate on the 27th April, on a motion which I made asking the House to concur in the first report of the Committee on Debates. The Hon. David Mills is reported to have asked me on that occasion the following question, "He is not a gentleman who has been removed from the staff of the other House?" I am reported to have said "No." This answer of mine was not correct. My excuse is that I did not evidently catch the question of the hon. minister. The House will recollect that, at the very moment when the question was put and I gave the answer, the hon. leader of the opposition Sir Mackenzie Bowell rose in his place and called the attention of the minister to the fact that the minister was speaking in too low a tone of voice, and to speak louder, in order that the House might understand what he said. Add to that hon. gentlemen that the House was at this very moment quite noisy. Under such circumstances, it is not extraordinary that I should misunderstand the question and answer as I did. Had I understood the question, I could not have made such a reply, knowing, as I knew then, and as I have known for some time past, that Mr. Bouchard had been employed in the other House and dismissed. I have been many years in this House and in public life, and have never been accused of saying anything that was not according to the truth. I could not, therefore, let the circumstance pass without putting myself right before the House, and particularly before the Minister of Justice, who is certainly one of the last hon. gentlemen in the House to whom I would give offence by giving them a misleading answer.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I might say, in reply to my hon. friend, and for the information of the House, that as soon as my hon. friend discovered what my question was he came to me and stated that his answer was erroneous. I am perfectly sure that the House will believe the hon. gentleman when he stated that he misapprehended my question, and was led to giving an erroneous answer. I have no doubt whatever about that, and am perfectly sure my hon. friend would not seek to mislead any one in a matter of this kind.

THE LATE SENATOR BOULTON.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Before the orders of the day are called, I beg to refer to an event that is one of melancholy interest to us all. When we adjourned there was with us an hon. gentleman, a member of this House, who is no longer with us. I refer to the late senator from Shell River, who had for several years been a distinguished member of this body, Senator Boulton. That hon. gentleman was for a long period of time engaged in the public service. He entered the service at an early period of his life as an officer in the 100th Regiment. He served Her Majesty with distinction and rose from the rank of ensign to a higher office as an officer of that regiment. Upon retiring from it he went into the North-west Territories and there took an active part in upholding British authority. When the first rebellion occurred there he threw his influence and his abilities on the side of the maintenance of law and order. Subsequently he took an active part in the municipal affairs of that part of Canada. He wrote a very interesting account of the condition of things in that country when he first went there, and of the steps that had been taken to satisfy the people who were disposed to distrust the government of Canada, and to establish quiet amongst the earlier inhabitants of the Red River Valley. Mr. Boulton was honoured by the Crown in being called to this chamber, and hon. gentlemen know that he always took an active interest in the proceedings of the Senate and in the conduct of public affairs. We may not all of us have agreed with the views which he entertained on public questions. He was something of a student, and on many matters of public interest he took perhaps rather the view of a student—an academic view—than that of one engaged in practical politics; but the questions which interested him he studied with care, and as a member of this body, as a member of the committees of this House, he was attentive to his duties, and as active in the discharge of them as perhaps any hon. gentleman who sat in this Senate. When we parted here at an earlier period of this session the hon. gentleman was at that time in excellent health and spirits, and those of us who intended to return here, expected to meet the hon. gentleman in this chamber. Perhaps there was no member of this Senate who had before him a fairer prospect of long life than the late hon. senator from Shell River. We shall meet him here no more. He has been unexpectedly called away. While it was yet day his sun has gone down. The last night—the long night—has settled upon his career, and I would move, hon. gentlemen, that out of respect to his memory this House do now adjourn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I rise for the purpose of seconding the motion which has been made by the hon. Minister of Justice. I do not know that I could add anything to what the hon. minister has already said in reference to the hon. senator whom we shall meet no more. All of us who have had the pleasure and the honour of his acquaintance must have formed a very high estimate of him, not only as a public man, but as a private citizen. The courteous and thorough manner in which he always treated every subject brought before the House, showed that he was in fact not only a student, but that he had imbibed what we would consider somewhat advanced opinions as to what should be the correct policy of any party governing the country. Those who knew him and his family, will deeply regret that the country should have lost so prominent a member of the Senate at so early a period of his life. I do not know that it would be improper at this moment to refer to other members of the Senate who have departed this life since the last session of this Parliament. We have been singularly unfortunate in losing some of the older members of the Senate, as well as some of those who have not been so long members of this body. Since the last sitting of Parliament we have lost, including Senator Boulton, no less than four of our members. First among them was the Hon. Mr. De Blois, a representative of one of the oldest and most respected of the French families in the province of Quebec. He was in every sense of the word a gentleman, in his demeanour and his intercourse with his fellowmen. We also lost a very old and respected member of the Senate in Senator Macfarlane, who was appointed to this chamber soon after confederation. He was an ardent advocate of the union of the different provinces. He lent all the aid he could to bring about confederation, and occupied a very prominent position in his own province, and while his health permitted, took an active and intelligent interest in all affairs of state. We have also lost a young and active member in the person of Senator Adams. He occupied in his own province a prominent position, having been a member of the New Brunswick Government. Those who knew him could not but respect him for the intelligence which he displayed on every subject he attempted to discuss, and on any matter which he thought of interest to his own province and to the country generally. These are losses deeply, from a human standpoint, to be deplored. They only show us how uncertain life is. The hon. Minister of Justice pointed out that when the hon. gentleman from Shell River left us, about three weeks ago, at the adjournment, there was no one amongst the whole of us who to outward appearance would have been accepted as one who was likely to live for many long years. I deeply deplore the loss of the hon. gentleman to this body, as well as the loss of those other members to whom I have referred.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Before the motion is put, I desire to be permitted to add a few words to the expressions of regret which have fallen from the hon. mover and seconder of this resolution with reference to the very unexpected loss which this Senate has sustained in the death of Senator Boulton. I am sure that there is but one feeling of regret in this House at the hon. senator's sudden removal from amongst us, more particularly amongst those of us the older members of the House, who have been associated with Senator Boulton for nearly ten years, since his first admission to the Senate. There are many of us, no doubt, who differed very much from some of the views on public matters which Colonel Boulton advocated, but I do not think there is any member of this House who does not believe that on all occasions he was actuated by a spirit of honest sincerity in the views which he took on public questions, and in the opinion which he advanced in this House with so much ability and so much clearness on very many occasions. Another matter to which I cannot help alluding is the pains which Colonel Boulton took, and which I think may well be imitated by all of us, to inform himself thoroughly on all subjects which he brought before this House. His industry was immense, and he spared no time or trouble to thoroughly get, as he thought, at all the facts connected with the different subjects which came up for discussion in the Senate. Allusion has already been made to Senator Boulton's career as a soldier. As the hon. Minister of Justice has said, he first entered military life an an ensign in the Royal Canadian 100th Regiment, and after serving Her Majesty in different parts of the world, and attaining the rank of major retired from the army and, returning to his native country, subsequently went to Manitoba, where from the first he took an active part in the affairs of that province, and it will be remembered that when the rebellion of 1885 broke out, he organized a corps known as Boulton"s scouts, which did good service during that eventful period. I cannot help recalling an incident connected with Senator Boulton's first appearance in the Senate where he took his seat, in 1890. He was asked by the government of the day to move the address in answer to the speech from the throne. He followed the custom which, as hon. gentlemen well know, is one which is generally followed in the British Parliament, of the mover and seconder of the address appearing either in uniform or court dress. Colonel Boulton appeared here in his uniform in moving the address, and I well recollect what was said by an old and very much respected member of this House, long since dead, Hon. Mr. Haythorne, a member from Prince Edward Island, of how much pleasure it gave him to see the British uniform in this House, and to know that the wearer of that uniform had worthily served Her Majesty in other countries as well as in Canada. We all feel, I am sure, that in the death of Senator Boulton we have lost a man who, in every sense of the word, was a gentleman, who followed out his convictions honestly and conscientiously; and when his opinions might possibly have become more matured as he continued in public life, would have been an increasingly valuable member of the Senate and, I have no doubt a most useful man to the country. I desire to add my own expressions of most sincere regret, both for the loss of the senator himself and for the sorrow and grief which his untimely death has brought on his wife and family and all connected with him.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I wish to express my concurrence in all that has fallen from the hon. senator from Toronto who knew Senator Boulton well for many years. I also had the pleasure of knowing him for a long time, and of knowing, though I did not always concur in his views. Senator Boulton occupied a very unique position in this House. A very ardent and warm Conservative, he yet differed from his party on a most important question, and while very many gentlemen did not concur in the views he expressed, yet it must be conceded that he fortified his arguments always by apt illustrations which his study of the subject of free trade had given him facility to quote at any moment. Senator Boulton came from a very distinguished family in Upper Canada. The Boultons occupied high positions, both on the bench and at the bar, in the legislative halls, and in every way were probably one of the leading families of the old province of Upper Canada. One member of the family was a Chief Justice in the Island of Newfoundland. The late John Boulton, and his namesake, was at one time mayor of Toronto. They filled positions of very great distinction in the gift of the people of Canada. While we here express our great regret at the sudden taking away of Colonel Boulton let us also add a word of sympathy to those who will miss his presence for many long years, the family of which he was the head, the bread winner for the afflicted family that he leaves behind him. They are entitled to our deep sympathy at the present moment. Few members left this House under more painful circumstances than the late Colonel Boulton, leaving us in the full vigour of life less than three weeks ago; to-day he is buried in the church yard near the village where he lived.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It may appear to some hon. gentlemen presumptuous on my part, being one of the most recently appointed to this House to say a word upon this occasion. My apology must be that my acquaintance with the late senator has extended over a period of more than forty years. I have not enjoyed the acquaintance of any other senator during that long period, save and except that of the distinguished leader of the opposition, who has seconded the motion in such tender and pathetic language to-night. Senator Boulton was the son of my nearest neighbour, and during many years I had the pleasure of not only enjoying his acquaintance, but, what I valued more, his warm and continued friendship. During these forty years, although differing from me on public questions in many respects, it has always been, and is to-night, a special gratification to me to know that during that long period, not a cloud ever flitted over our friendship or marred that kindly feeling which we had for each other, and it will not be surprising, and you will indulge me when I say that I feel, in the taking away of Senator Boulton so suddenly and so unexpectedly, depriving us of his presence here and his wise counsel, that it is not only a great loss to this distinguished body but personal loss that I shall no more have a the pleasure of meeting him here and enjoying the benefit of his association and counsel in years to come. I could not hope to add anything to the appropriate, tender and touching observations which have been made by the mover and seconder of the address, and so beautifully endorsed by the two distinguished senators who have added their contributions to what has been said. Senator Boulton was well born and well bred. As the seconder of the motion has said, he bore an honoured name—a historic name. His name, like that of the contemporaries of his father, who is still living, and his mother mourning in Cobourg to-night the loss of a dutiful and loved son, his name, I say, was a household word, like that of the Robinsons, the Cayleys, the Camerons, the Allans, Baldwins, the Blakes, the Gambles and others whom I could mention—names that have been household words in Ontario during my lifetime, and the names of gentlemen who have done so much to build up and establish in this country those institutions which are a reflection and largely a copy of British institutions. Senator Boulton, left college in early life and adopted the profession of arms, rendering valuable services to the empire abroad, and after resigning active work in the army, believing that "peace has her triumphs more glorious than war," he turned his attention to the arts of peace, and I do not think that the north and west had a better friend, one who desired more to promote their welfare and happiness, especially the agriculturalists of the great prairie province of Manitoba, than the late Senator Boulton. He had the welfare of the agriculturalists of his province very much at heart and he never ceased to advocate their claims and their interests. As has been said when the news came to Cobourg in the troublous times in the North-west, the people of Cobourg—the birthplace of the late senator—naturally took a deep pride in his gallant conduct, his noble stand for law and authority. If any thing were wanting to give him a warm place in the affections of the people of Ontario, I think that that gave him a strong claim to their consideration. Senator Boulton not only was loyal to British institutions and connections, but he was loyal to this chamber. I would take the liberty of reading a short passage from a letter which I received from him on the 17th March last, in which he says:

> Although there is a disposition to decry the usefulness and good faith of the Senate from a party standpoint, it is a more useful and a more capable body than is allowed to appear on the surface by the public press. The Senate is a sound constitutional plank in our machinery of government which I regard as an extension of the British constitution in Canada.

These words will be a lasting memorial and do great credit to the good judgment, the appreciation and the clear headedness of Senator Boulton, who so appropriately and so beautifully expressed his opinion of the high position and the important functions this body had to perform in the machinery of the government of this country. Moreover, Senator Boulton had great faith in British connection. I think he was as loyal and patriotic a subject as Her Majesty has in this fair Dominion. It was his day dream to build up a great country on the west side of the Atlantic under the ægis of the British Crown, and every inspiration and every aspiration that he had was in that direction, and although his views upon questions of trade policy may have differed somewhat from the views of hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House, I have thought, perhaps, some hon. gentlemen within the sound of my voice have thought that perhaps these views were not less interesting, not less worthy of consideration, because of the fact that they happened to be the views of neither political party in this chamber. But, as has been said, whether his views on the trade policy were sound or otherwise, there is no doubt in my mind—and I am glad to hear it enunciated by much higher authority than myself, by words much weightier than mine—that whatever his views were upon the trade policy of this country, or upon any other question, he held them sincerely, honestly and conscientiously. Senator Boulton's life is ended; his life work is done. And is that the end of it? I think it is England's great dramatic poet who has said, "The evil that men do lives after them; the good is oft interred with their bones." I believe—and it is my faith and creed, that it is equally true, that the good that men do lives after them. I should feel depressed beyond measure, as I walk the corridors of this Senate Chamber and of the Commons and look upon the portraits of men who have built up the mighty fabric of this Confederation, to think that their life work is ended. I think we may fairly take up the words applied to another, that while his body lies mouldering in the grave, his soul goes marching on. I am sure that the influence of Senator Boulton's useful life will not be lost upon me, and should not be lost upon any one who enjoyed the pleasure of his acquaintance. His was a busy life. For about six weeks I enjoyed the pleasure of his close acquaintance in this House, and I had opportunities to form a judgment as to his industry, and before I heard the sad tidings of his death, I took the liberty of stating, in my own town, to his admirers and some who did not know him so well as I did, that I never met a man of more industry, of more application, of more devotion to duty than the late Senator Boulton. He was a man of varied talent. While he was doing his duty as a public man here he was also writing to periodicals on scientific and other subjects, and, in that way, extending the sphere of his influence in many directions. I trust that the example of Senator Boulton will be an inspiration to all young Canadians, and that they will, like him remember to work while it is day for the night cometh when no man can work. That influence, I believe, will be lasting. It has been said that—

> Were a star quenched on high,
> For ages would its light,
> Still travelling downward from the sky,
> Shine on our mortal sight.
>
> So, when a good man dies,
> For years beyond our ken,
> The light he leaves behind him lies,
> Upon the paths of men.

I believe the light that Senator Boulton shed during his life will lie on the paths of many a young Canadian, and inspire him to imitate his noble, useful and valuable life.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is one thing which, I think, must have struck every hon. gentleman here with respect to the deceased senator from Shell River. He was in this House for ten years, and took a very active part in the business of the Senate. He held very strong views on different subjects. He made a great many speeches, and he was sometimes treated, I regret to say, with not quite as much attention and courtesy as he was entitled to; but, during all those years, no member of the House ever heard the deceased senator utter an ill-tempered or offensive word. I think that his gentleness and amiability were his most striking characteristics, and I have stood up to-night simply for the purpose of emphazising that fact. I think we all felt and appreciated that, and that although he belonged to no party, he was as well liked and is as deeply regretted to-day by members of both parties, as would be the most active man on either side of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

APPOINTMENT OF CAPTAIN H. H. NORWOOD.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE inquired:

1. Whether Captain H. H. Norwood is still in the employment of the Dominion Government in the Yukon district, and if so, in what capacity?
2. If not, was he dismissed, and if dismissed, for what reason was he so dismissed?
3. What is or was his salary as one of the inspectors?
4. Is the government aware that the said Captain Norwood is a citizen of the United States, and strongly in favour of the annexation of Canada to the United States?
5. Does the government know that Captain Norwood, in the course of his experience, never had one hour's work in connection with minerals of any description, and that he is very illiterate?

He said:—Captain H. H. Norwood left Nova Scotia when he was a mere boy and never returned to take up his dwelling there until about three years ago. Strange as it may appear, whilst this man appears to have been the appointee of the Liberal government at headquarters, he is totally discredited by his Liberal friends in the district in which he resides. He has never voted in Canada. He is a United States citizen. He is also a blatant annexationist, and these facts surely should render him thoroughly ineligible for any position under the Canadian Government. Even in the municipal elections held last November he did not vote, but in one ward where he made the fight a personal one, the candidate whom he supported was defeated by a majority of one hundred and forty-six in a total poll of less than 300 votes. He is posted, it is true, in whale blubber and he is an honour graduate in whale oil, having devoted his whole life and energy to that business; but he knows nothing whatever of the production of gold, or of the qualities of gold ore, and under these circumstances the man could not be expected to have these qualifications, but he had that which seems to have implemented all deficiencies, in the shape of what is technically called a "pull" upon one of the ministers, a pull at once so tenacious and so elastic as to affect his conversion from an expert in whale blubber and in whale oil to a full fledged inspector in the Yukon gold districts. His appointment, to my mind, seems to be about as incongruous as setting a rough coarse blacksmith to work upon the delicate mechanism of a high grade watch, or commissioning a pettifogging lawyer of the lowest possible type to proclaim the evangel of good will to men. Neither of the parties occupying either of these positions would prove so thorough and complete a misfit as would a whaling captain in the position of a gold inspector. Unfortunately for them, this is not by any means the only case in which it appears that the present government has shown a disregard, to say the least of it, of the ordinary fitness of things and of the necessity for having something like a proper adaptation on the part of their appointees to the duties which they are expected to discharge. I would ask the hon. minister to answer these questions seriatim as they are placed upon the order paper.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think, after the comments we have heard from the hon. gentleman, that it would not be an unwise proposition if we were to follow the practice of Parliament and restrict comments on questions, particularly those that are of a character assailing gentlemen who are not present, and no notice of the proposed attack having been placed on the record. The hon. gentleman says that the reason for Captian Norwood's appointment is that he had a "pull" on some minister. I think it is a most uncalled for and improper remark to make in putting the question that appears on the paper. The hon. gentleman was not consulted, I suppose, in the selection of Captain Norwood. I do not know who appointed him or on whose recommendation he was appointed.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You had better find out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The question was not asked. I am prepared to answer the questions seriatim as they are placed on the paper, but I do think it is exceedingly improper, in putting these questions, to make an attack on a gentleman who is not here to defend himself, and also a general attack on the policy of the government. He says this government makes appointments that are not to be approved of in any direction, going entirely away from the record that is before us. In answer to the first question Captain Norwood is in the employ of the government as Inspector of Mines; second, he was not dismissed; third, the salary is $125 per month; fourth, my answer is No; fifth, the answer is No. The government is, however, aware that Captain Norwood has proved an exceptionally capable officer and that he is not illiterate.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER inquired:

Whether it is the intention of the government, during the present session of Parliament, to introduce any measure having for its object the increase or readjustment of the salaries of the judges of the Superior or County Court of the Dominion or of any of the provinces thereof?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The subject is under consideration.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (J) "An Act respecting Usury."—(Mr. Dandurand.)

LA BANQUE DU PEUPLE.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to call the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to the fact that, owing to my limited knowledge of French, the papers which were laid on the table here in connection with the Banque du Peuple, are of no use to me. I should like the portion of them given in French to be supplied in English as well.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The institution is a French one, and they make the return in French. I presume it would be the duty of the translator of the House to make the translation. We have no English copy. It would be much better if the translation were made by an officer of the House.

SCHOOL LANDS OF MANITOBA.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like also to call the attention of the minister to the fact that I moved for papers in reference to the school lands of Manitoba. My hon. friend the Secretary of State laid on the table this modest return, not in answer to my motion, but in answer to a motion from the hon. gentleman from Provencher. I must candidly confess I have not read all these papers. I have taken the trouble, however, to so far examine them as to find one document which would comply with a portion of the motion that I made, and if my hon. friend would take that and extend it to the present time, the information will be nearly all that I require. That portion of the return to which I refer is the Manitoba school lands showing the revenue and expenditure from the commencement until the 30th of April, 1893. I suppose it is considered of very great importance, because it is duplicated. I find two copies, one in typewriting and the other in handwriting. It gives very clear information.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It just so happens the hon. gentleman made his motion the day I brought this down. I shall be very glad to have the other information supplied.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It gives a good deal of information. The next is the particulars as to the advances made to the Manitoba schools. The total is also here. It would be a very interesting document if we could have this table to which I am calling the attention of hon. gentlemen, extended. If I could get it, it would answer all the purposes required.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Extended to the present time?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If it is in duplicate, I can take one of the copies and tell the officials of the department to prepare the return. That will be the only document required then, I understand?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes; that is all I require.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY ROLLING STOCK.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A motion was passed on the 24th of March, asking for a return of the rolling stock that had been purchased in connection with the Intercolonial Railway and its extension to Montreal, and also the amount paid for said rolling stock and the expenses of working the extension since the time it came into the hands of the government. It is likely we shall have that question discussed in a very short time in this House, and it is necessary that hon. gentlemen should have full information in relation to the subject. I propose to-morrow, or next day, to ask for some other information, of which, however, I will give notice.

ANTI-JAPANESE LEGISLATION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Minister of Justice will remember that, before the recess, I called his attention to the important question of the British Columbia legislation in reference to Japanese, and, as the time will expire for the disallowance of that legislation, if such be the intention of the government, some time early in June, I should like to ask the government whether they have adopted any policy, or whether they have received any intimation of the wishes and intentions of the Imperial Government on this question, which is supposed to affect Imperial as well as Canadian interests.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that these bills have been considered in my department and we are waiting an answer from the Colonial Office, which we have not yet received. If no answer comes, action of some sort will nevertheless be taken before the year expires.

THE FRANCHISE ACT.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is another question I should like to ask in reference to correspondence for which I moved, between the Dominion Government and the provincial governments, in reference to an appeal in case any one considered himself improperly treated in reference to the Franchise Act. It is somewhat important that we should know exactly what the opinions of the different provinces which are affected thereby, are upon that question. I observe by the newspapers that the province of British Columbia has passed an Act disfranchising certain people who formerly had the franchise and to ask whether the government intend to interfere with that law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—None of the statutes are here yet.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was going to point out that if they do not interfere with that legislation, then British Columbia will occupy a different position in reference to its franchise to that of other provinces in which certain officials of the Dominion Government were disfranchised, and that under the law which was passed by this House, provision was made to allow that class of voters to be placed upon the voters' list. If such a bill as that to which I have called the attention of the minister has been passed by the province of British Columbia, then there will be a certain class of voters in that province who would be deprived of the franchise which this Parliament thought it necessary to provide when they gave power to have them placed on the list, even though it is not in accordance with the provincial franchise.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The Dominion officials were not disfranchised in British Columbia.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who were disfranchised?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The provincial officials.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—The Imperial officers and the provincial officials.

EXPROPRIATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (D) "An Act to amend the Expropriation Act."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Speaker leaves the Chair, I think it better that some discussion should take place on the general principle of the bill, rather than to have that discussion in committee. When the hon. gentleman introduced this bill I expressed, from what little he said, some approval of what I thought was its general principle; but on looking more carefully at its provisions, it seems to me to be a highly improper measure to place upon the statute-book, interfering as it does with the rights of individuals from whom property has been taken. I cannot understand why the government should ask for any greater powers than are given to railway or to other companies that have the power of expropriation. Under this bill a man's property may be taken by some engineer—and we know very well that they are not always very discreet in interfering with the rights of private individuals. The government, if I understand this bill, has the right to seize the property under a plea of expropriation and hold it for any length of time they please, and then finding that they do not require it, give it back, or portions of it, to the owner. It is true provision is made giving power, under another bill, to the Exchequer Court to compensate him for the land which they have taken, and also I think for the damages which the property may have sustained. But is not that going further than any government should ask power to go? You may take a man's property from him and hold it a year, six months, or two years, because there is no limitation to this. The property might be one from which the owner derived a livelihood, and, under the supposition that it was to be retained by the government and a fair compensation paid therefor, he may have made arrangements for some other business, pledging the money which he expects to get for the expropriated property, in this other business, and then he finds that though he has made that bargain and entered into this other arrangement, the government coolly say to him: "We do not want your property, we want only ten or fifty feet or five hundred feet," as the case may be. It seems to me that is taking a power which might be exercised not only tyrannically, but with great injustice to the parties owning the property is wrong. I want to divest myself altogether, in discussing this question, of any individual case that is before the courts now, and, speaking for myself, I should object to making any law of this character retroactive in its effect. You take a man's property. You may destroy his business, and then, after having kept the property for years, you have placed it in court and the suit is proceeding and it may last for years, and in the meantime that man is kept out of his property, and he loses all the benefits that might accrue from his retaining it, and the first thing you know, while all this loss has been sustained by the owner, it is thrown back upon his hands.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He gets damages for that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not present at the debate on this bill at the second reading, but I suppose this may be considered a continuation of the same debate. In the speech made by the hon. Minister of Justice he gave an instance of where a man had given a small amount for a property which they expropriated or intended to expropriate, and now asks an enormous sum for it. Supposing that to be true? A man often buys a property at a low rate and afterwards finds it has a value he never anticipated it had. Is that any reason why he should not ask the reasonable sum for it? You might pay ten thousand dollars for a mining claim, and it might be good for nothing, or it might be worth hundreds of thousands of dollars; but the fact that you gave a few thousand dollars for it would not justify the government in taking it from him at a small advance on that sum, simply because the owner for the time being gave only a small amount for it. But, apart from that, unless the Minister of Justice can give us some better reasons than were disclosed in his speech in defence of the bill, it should not become law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The bill has been read a second time, and I think the motion is now to go into Committee of the Whole House, so that the propositions which the hon. gentleman takes exception to will be better discussed when we come to the clause than on the motion to go into committee to consider it. We are not now undertaking to read the bill a second time. It has been read and I do not understand that the hon. gentleman is going to oppose the principle of the bill, but simply the specific provisions of certain clauses, and that I think can be better done in committee when we are confined in our discussion to the particular provisions to which the hon. gentleman may be disposed to take objection, rather than to go over the whole measure as if we were still engaged in the second reading. I suggest that we had better go into committee.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I think it was understood at the second reading that the principle should be discussed later. This clause is the whole principle of the bill, and before going into committee is a proper time to discuss it. We cannot discuss the principle of the bill in committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not understand that there was any objection taken to the first clause of the bill. It could not be fairly argued that the Crown should not be permitted to take a limited estate so long as notice was given in advance. The Crown ought not to be compelled, surely, to buy the whole property when they required only a part, or the Crown should not be obliged to purchase the property in fee when they only required the user for a year. That provision is set forth in the first clause. I did not understand there was any serious opposition to that. I understood the opposition was to the second clause of the bill, which provided that at any time before the compensation money had been actually paid the Crown could then avail itself of its desire to take a less estate than contemplated in its original notice. I understood the opposition was to that particular clause and not to the first clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I had not the opportunity of being present when this matter was discussed upon the second reading. However, it appears to me that a more important principle, if anything, is involved in the first clause of the bill, which has just been referred to by the hon. Secretary of State, than in the other portion of the bill. So far as I have been able to ascertain—and I have made some little investigation into the English Land Clauses Act. There is no parallel to the principle which it is proposed to introduce into the first clause of the bill now before us. In fact, there is no approach to it in the English Act. The principle of the English Act is entirely antagonistic to the principle which is now being introduced into the Expropriation Act. In fact, so far does the English Act protect the interests of those whose lands are about to be expropriated that the Crown is not permitted to make divisible any part of an estate which is necessary to be used in its entirety by the owner. I would direct the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to section 92 of the Land Clauses Act, which enacts as follows:—

> No party shall at any time be required to sell or convey to the promotors of an undertaking a part only of any house or other building of manufactury, if such party be willing and able to sell and convey the whole thereof.

Not only does the English Act preclude the exercise of any such right as the Crown taking part of an estate, but it in no way countenances, so far as I can ascertain from the limited search I have been able to make since seeing the bill, such proceedings as are provided for in the bill before us. It seems to me that for the Crown to enter upon the estate of any one individual and say "we shall take a limited interest in this estate and we shall tie it up for either a short or a long period of time until we satisfy the demands which we desire to make upon the estate, either in using it in part or in whole, and then to hand it back to the original owner after it has been dismantled, after its value has departed, after the owner perhaps has been prevented from making any disposition which at the time the Crown took it he otherwise would make, is forcing upon the individual a wrong which certainly cannot be compensated as is contemplated by the Exchequer Court Act, dealing with the valuation which should be placed upon the land. Let me instance this case: there is a possibility today of an individual being able to make a very satisfactory disposition of the entire estate which he owns. The land may be in demand. The market may be high and values may be rising, and he can sell the whole of that property at a very great advantage to himself. The Crown steps in and interposes with this right which it is proposed to vest in the Crown under this Act and say to the individual " we shall not permit you to make that disposition which by reason of the rising market you could make of the property in question, but we intend to come upon this property and use it for a term of years, removing stone or timber, as the case may be, and at the end of that time, we shall hand it back to you." In the meantime the man has been deprived of making a disposition of his property, a right which every individual in the state should have. At the end of three years or any particular period, if it so pleases the Crown to hand the property back, there may be a depression in real estate—the owner in the meantime has been prevented from making a sale or using his estate to advantage. Will any hon. gentleman here pretend to say it will be possible for the Court of Exchequer, or any board of arbitrators, to seriously determine the loss which that man has sustained by reason of the opportunities which have gone by during the years which have passed? We very well know that remote damages cannot be considered by the court or by a board of arbitration. It is utterly impossible for a board of arbitrators or the Exchequer Court to take into consideration the possibilities which might attach themselves to that land, or the opportunities which might have presented themselves to the owner, and it seems to me that if there is any element in the state which should not be vested with high and arbitrary power of this nature it is the Crown. The Crown can afford, very much better than any corporation or any individual, to deal justly with that man, and why should those extraordinary powers, notwithstanding the rights which we always accord to the sovereign power of the state, be vested in the Crown by which an individual may be deprived of the exercise of a right which every subject has a right to exercise, namely, selling his property in the best market and at the best price which he can obtain for it. Under these circumstances, we are introducing a principle which has no parallel, so far as I can ascertain, in England, or in the United States, and which is without parallel in the history of any law of eminent domain, so far as the books inform us upon the subject. I therefore think that, as far as the principle of the bill is concerned, it is pernicious and should not be countenanced by this House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The argument of the hon. gentleman from Calgary goes a little too far. If the principle for which he contends were adopted, the Crown would be obliged to take the whole of any property, no matter how extensive. If there were a property 200 acres in extent, and the Crown required to take an acre, then, under the theory laid down by the hon. gentleman, the Crown would be obliged to take the whole 200 acres. If the argument which the hon. gentleman has attempted to base on the English statute were a good one, then that would be the case. Now, what is the effect of the English statute which he has read? The effect is this, that if a portion of a factory, or a dwelling-house, or any other building is to be taken, then, unless under exceptional circumstances, the Crown would be obliged to take the whole building. One can see there is some reason in that law, when you come to deal with a building, but this bill does not apply to buildings at all. What does the Act, as it stands, provide for? It provides for the taking of a portion of the land, and the only question as to this particular clause of the bill, is whether, if the Crown happen to require, in the construction of some public work, some portion of a man's land for a month or six months, they shall be obliged to buy it out in fee simple. There is no reason why the Crown should be obliged to take the property in fee simple any more than the Crown should be obliged to expropriate a whole farm of which they require only a part. We ought to be governed to a certain extent in these cases by practical experience. What has been the experience of this country in the matter of the expropriation of lands? Is it not a fact that the tax payers have been fleeced in nearly every case where private lands have been taken for public works? Between the original line of the Intercolonial Railway at St. Charles Junction and the station at Lévis, this country paid, I think, about $2,000,000 for land damages, where one might have bought out the whole district for less money. This same sort of thing has taken place all over the country. Every one knows that when arbitrators are appointed, their disposition is to deal liberally with the private individual as against the government. We know that land in the estimation of the witnesses who are called, who are generally the neighbours and friends of the man whose land is being taken, assumes a fabulous value.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have you no confidence in the Exchequer Court?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Certainly. The court may feel that the public are being fleeced, but it is obliged on the evidence to award larger sums than should be awarded. Our duty is to see that, if public works have to be constructed in this country, they shall not cost any more than they ought fairly and reasonably to cost. This measure is not in any sense a party measure. The first clause of this bill, I think, makes a very desirable improvement in the Act as it stands. It provides that if the land is required only for a limited time, then the plan and description shall indicate what time it is required for and that the Exchequer Court shall award damages for the mischief actually done the owner. The judge is always fair and reasonable. There has never been a complaint that he was not disposed to give fair play to persons whose land was being taken, and I am rather surprised at the attitude assumed by the hon. gentleman from Calgary.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The hon. gentleman from Halifax, has placed a construction on the argument of the hon. gentleman from Calgary which is entirely distinct and different from what he stated. That hon. gentleman in no part of his argument laid down the contention that the government were obliged to take the whole of a man's land. But there is, by the Expropriation Act, a course laid down for the government. They have, before expropriating land, to file a map showing what land they are to expropriate. That part they should be obliged to take. No one claims that, because they want a part of 200 acres, they shall be obliged to take the whole of it. There is nobody in this House who is not prepared to allow to the government the fullest power they should have with regard to expropriation, but the only point in which they are entitled to get additional power is to take such land as they require, outside of that, I do not see why the government should have larger powers than a railway company or a large corporation. A railway company's powers of expropriation are limited. They can take land because it may be absolutely necessary they should have it for railway purposes, but, after that, they must deal as private individuals. The government should state what land they require, and have power to take it, but to permit them to hand it back after holding it for some years is a power which should not be given them. I have said before, and I say it again, no matter how individual members of the government may wish to act fairly, it gives the power to members of the government to do great injury to individuals, and I think very often pressure is brought to bear upon them to use against individuals, powers which should not be in their hands. I do not think the government wish to be placed in that position. The only reason given why it should not be left in the hands of the Exchequer Court, as given by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, is that the judge must act on the evidence. Certainly the judge must act on the evidence, and it is the duty of the government to bring evidence to the contrary if they wish to get the land for less value than the parties who own the land put upon it. But, as we have seen, the government here have taken a portion of land from an individual. They take it first for a limited period. Then finding that they have done an illegal act, they come before the Exchequer Court and have the action dismissed and pay the costs themselves. Let this be a lesson to the government, that when they go into a thing of this kind they should decide what they require for their purposes for whatever public work is going forward, then file their plan, and let them be obliged to stick to it. That is the correct way to proceed.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I rise, not on a question of order, but to ask a question concerning suggestions made by the Exchequer Court judge to the hon. Minister of Justice. In answer to a question from the hon. gentleman from Halifax, who asked at whose suggestion this legislation was brought in, the hon. Minister of Justice said it came from two or three sources, but that he had received most important suggestions from the Exchequer Court judge himself in reference to these measures. Not so much because it may look, to say the least, uncommon that the judge before whom a case which will be affected by this legislation is to be tried should express an opinion about such legislation, as from motives of curiosity (justifiable, I imagine), I would ask the hon. minister to tell us what those suggestions were and when they were made to him? I have referred to a remark made by the hon. Minister of Justice, reported in the Debates of the 24th of April last, when the question came up. It would be interesting for the House to know what suggestions the Exchequer Court judge made to the hon. minister, when they were made, and what bearing they have on this bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I might say to my hon. friend it is not of the slightest consequence to this House what particular suggestions the judge made. I suppose every Minister of Justice finds that the judges discover, in administering the laws, what they think are defects and suggest certain amendments. I said this measure had been considered and suggestions made in respect to it by the Exchequer Court judge, because these are matters which come under his observation, and, so far as we can, we profit by his experience.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not propose to discuss the matter further than to say to my hon. friend opposite, that the position he takes in reference to discussing the principle of a bill on a motion to go into committee is quite correct, providing always that the principle has been affirmed by those who were here. The object of the parliamentary rule requiring a certain interval of time to elapse between the different stages of a bill is to give every member of the House an opportunity of expressing his opinion and view upon the principle of the measure, and not only upon the principle but the effect which it might have on the community; and it was for that reason that I took advantage of the motion to go into committee, which allows, under our rules, the fullest possible discussion; not only on the principle of the bill but on its details. That was the object of the rule adopted by the British Parliament and by all legislative bodies in order that the representatives of the people might have every opportunity for discussing measures. That is the reason why I took advantage of this opportunity, because by going into Committee of the Whole without stating our objections, we would be admitting the whole principle of the bill, and from what I see of it, I am fully in accord with the sentiments uttered by the hon. gentleman from Calgary, that the principle of the bill is pernicious.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—After the discussion we had on this bill, I was in hopes that the Minister of Justice would see fit to withdraw it altogether. I think every clause of it is oppressive and unjust to citizens. The very clause approved of by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, that the government might take my land for a year or two, and then throw it back on my hands, is iniquitous and unjust and should not pass this House. There is no member of this House who wishes to throw out a government measure at any time. We wish the government to lay before us measures which will be approved of in the public interest, and it is with a great deal of reluctance that I at any time have voted to throw out a government bill. I do hope that the minister will withdraw the bill, because I do not think it should pass this House. The powers asked for are too arbitrary. There is no objection to taking a man's property, but to take if for a time and then throw it back on his hands, is highly improper. I shall never agree to that principle.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This bill has been read the second time. So far, the principle was approved of by the hon. gentlemen who were present. The second clause was taken objection to, and that it was stated, could be considered in committee.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE — I understood and others understood that we allowed the second reading, reserving our objections to the principle.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think my hon. friend accurately remembers the facts. The hon. gentleman for Manitoba took exception to clause 2, and stated what his objections were, and I said that the proper time for discussing the objection to a particular clause of the bill would be in committee, and I asked my hon. friend that notice should be given of the specific amendments which would be required, and he put a notice on the paper. That notice is on the paper now, suggesting the amendments that he desires. All that was done on the assumption that this House was going into committee on the bill. Just consider what the position is at this moment. The bill has been read the second time. No one can dispute that fact. Then there is an order of the House with regard to it. What is that order? That the House shall go into committee on the bill at a certain time. The time has arrived. That is the order of the House, and it would be a novel thing if the House were to say that we shall go into committee on a certain day and we intend to disobey our own order and shall not go into committee.

Hon Mr. McCALLUM—What is the consequence if we do not go into committee?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman contend that it would not be perfectly in order for any member of the Senate to move that we go into committee this day six months? You might just as well say that when you read a bill the first time and give notice that it shall be read a second time to-morrow, that the order of the House having been passed to read it the second time you must read it. In olden times the reading of a bill the second time was always considered an affirmation of the principles contained in the bill. Later, the modern practice in the House of Commons and you will find it laid down distinctly and positively in Hansard by the late Sir John Macdonald—that is, you allow a bill to pass its second reading, reserving the principle so that you may consider it, if you like, in committee, and you can there, when the bill is reported, oppose the principle of the bill. That has been laid down over and over again as a principle of legislation in the House of Commons during the time my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and myself were there, certainly by Sir John Macdonald, and it was accepted by both sides of the House and acted upon hundreds of times.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I say yes. It is a matter of opinion. I venture the assertion that Hansard will sustain exactly what I have said and that the utterances of Sir John Macdonald are precisely in that line—I do not say the exact language that I have indicated to this House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The rule, I take it, is this: every man who votes against a second reading of a bill is assumed to oppose the principle of the measure. Any member may permit the second reading of a bill reserving to himself the right to take exception to the principle of the bill, and every member who votes against the bill, may oppose the principle of it from the beginning to the end right through. There is no doubt any other member may change his mind on the subject. But the hon. gentleman has now referred to a different matter and that is, the House having read this bill the second time and adopted an order that we should go into committee for the consideration of the bill, the House may refuse to do so. I think that the hon. gentleman will find it difficult to turn to the proceedings of the other House and find any such course adopted. I have been in this Parliament for over 30 years. I do not think the hon. gentleman will find during the whole of that period a motion of that sort. If the hon. gentlemen wish to reconsider the principle of the bill, or take exception to the principle of the bill, they may go into committee and hon. gentlemen may move that the committee rise without reporting progress and so kill the bill. That is one mode of proceeding; but the hon. gentleman will not find an instance, in my opinion, of a refusal to conform to the order that has been made to go into committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman lay down the principle that the House has no right to do that? I did not make the assertion that motions had been made to throw out bills in going into committee. What I say is, it is the right of any member of the House to make such a motion, that there is no rule of the House to prevent it, and that the object of every step in the progress of a bill, whether you affirm the principle or not, is to give every member an opportunity to oppose it if he thinks proper to do so. My hon. friend from Calgary was not here when the principle was affirmed, as the hon. gentleman says; neither was I.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman say that his absence from the House at the second reading gives a member the right to go back and take the first reading again?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, but it gives a member the right at any time, when a motion comes before the House, to oppose the bill. It has been read the first and second time, and is now set down to be considered in committee. It is my right to move that the bill be considered in committee this day six months.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—My hon. friend from Manitoba and myself did not approve of the bill, but we allowed it to be read the second time as a matter of courtesy.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—What is before the House. The last I heard was a motion that the Hon. Mr. Vidal take the chair. Since then some hon. members have spoken several times, in my opinion in the most disorderly manner. Will the hon. gentleman tell us what is before the House?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—If, as the hon. leader of the House has stated, there is an order of the House that we now go into committee, why has it been moved that the House go into committee?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The other day, when this matter was before the House, I stated that it was an open question, that the principle was not affirmed. The hon. leader of the House brought in, I believe, two bills. Now he substitutes others. I understood the principle was not affirmed, because, I think the House would never have affirmed a principle which I consider is tyrannical and unjust. I contend that the government has sufficient power at present over the people of this country, and I shall never be a consenting party to the Crown occupying a position superior to that of any private individual. The Crown now compels you to give up property that you may not wish to dispose of. They now ask power, that after keeping for a certain time, and finding no further use for it, to give it back to you. I say that when the Crown wants a piece of property they should, like an individual, make out a plan of what they require and conform to the law as others do. Now they propose that they shall have an advantage over the citizens of this country. The government should not require any such advantage. I believe the people of Canada are prepared to pay a fair and reasonable price for any property needed for the public service, and they should not take an unfair advantage of any citizen. We know from experience that the government have exercised a very arbitrary and improper power in many respects in the past. I know of many cases wherein the government have been very arbitrary. Even after the decision of the Exchequer Court in favour of a plaintiff, the government have taken upon themselves to say whether they should pay the interest accruing upon a judgment that would be collectable against an individual. That is unfair and unjust. In a variety of ways, the government take an unfair advantage of the people of this country. They make a contract with a man; they owe him a large sum of money; the contract expires, and they, not having the money to pay it at the time, say "we will not pay you any interest." Is that fair? I contend that if the people were sufficiently independent, they would not do business with the government without security. I have had an opportunity of judging of those cases. I could mention a few cases which were decided by the Exchequer Court in which the government have acted in an unjust and arbitrary manner. After costly litigation, in which the individual succeeded, the government refused to pay the litigant interest, because there is a clause in the Act which says the Finance Department "may" pay interest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Alter the law.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The law never was that way until the present government came into power.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes, it was.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Oh, no. There have been cases where one party was paid and another was not paid. Mr. Smith was paid and Mr. Jones was not paid. A dozen cases of that kind have happened. I do not desire to give the government further power to oppress people. This is the most tyrannical and oppressive measure ever brought before the Parliament of a free country, in every sense of the word. I would like to move a six months hoist to this bill. I do not think we should place such power in the hands of any government, whether Liberal or Conservative, though I do not believe that a Conservative government would take such a course at all. They would act honestly and fairly in any matter that came before them. I have these cases before me, and the hon. gentlemen know perfectly well that advantage has been taken in these cases by the government, and

I do not want that to be continued. Let the government say what amount of land they require, and let them lay it out and deposit the plans in the proper place, and pay the value honestly and fairly. If they cannot agree with the owner let them leave it to arbitration, but the man should know whether he will be ruined or not. The land may be reduced in value during the time it is held by the government, and the fact that the government held the land for a certain time would put a blot upon it. Fair play should be accorded to every one dealing with the government. My hon. friend the Secretary of State informs us that the law at the present time recognizes the principle contained in this bill. If that is the law it should be changed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The government may say, "we have no money; the appropriation has been expended, and we cannot pay you." Then the party may ask, "will you pay interest?" And they say, "Oh no, that is not our system." But if you happen to owe the government you must pay interest. Let us have this matter decided now. I am willing to move that this bill be read this day six months, to test the opinion of the House, and I think that is the honest way to do it. I am not afraid to call a spade a spade. My hon. friend the Secretary of State may not agree with me. He has had some reason in the past and may have in the future, but I am not afraid to give my candid opinion. I will move the six months' hoist, seconded by the Hon. Mr. McCallum.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I would like to refer to one or two statements which have been made during this discussion. The present government has made no claim whatever for interest.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It is wrong.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I quite agree with my hon. friend that the Crown should be in the same position as an individual. This bill is not an innovation, and I think if we went into committee we could agree upon some phases of it. It has been stated that the Crown should not be permitted to take any property for a given time. If the Crown desires to cross a man's farm and take right of way over any portion of it, it has a right to do it for five years or any other term. Suppose that, in taking the property, the government shall say exactly what they want. If they want a property for three years they shall say so, and that should be specifically set forth at the time the notice is served. The question of incidental damages would come up before the judge, and he would necessarily take cognizance of what the damages would be for the limited period. It is altogether a matter of compensation; there may be language stronger or wider than the House could agree to, but I do not think that should prevent us going into committee.

The SPEAKER—When the order of the day was called, I understand that it was my duty to leave the Chair without any further motion as it was one of the orders of the day.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have moved an amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The hon. gentleman is in order in moving an amendment.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I move the six months' hoist, seconded by Hon. Mr. McCallum.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I hope my hon. friend from Rideau will not press his motion giving the hoist to this bill. So far as I am personally concerned, I should like to hear every possible explanation that can be made by the government in regard to the merits of the bill. If satisfactory explanations can be made, I do not desire to throw anything in the way of the government in carrying out such a measure. I expressed myself as much opposed to the principle introduced into the bill. I am equally emphatic as to its inutility and its impolicy. Yet it seems to me it would not be advisable that a full ventilation of the merits of the bill should not be had. If, after the explanations, the House is not satisfied as to the wisdom of the bill, it is then possible for the House to take such action as they desire.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The bill has been pretty well discussed. The hon. gentleman from Calgary has not heard the discussion, but I think we all understand the measure. The hon. the Secretary of State says there is no change in the law. Then why introduce this bill? It is a very important measure, and I consider the government have power enough to take all the lands they want under the present laws to carry on the legitimate business of the country, and they should not be allowed more privileges than any private corporation in this matter, because there is such a thing as governments oppressing the people at times, and I do not want to give them power to do that. Governments have no soul. I, therefore, have much pleasure in voting for the amendment which has just been moved.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I rather envy my hon. friend from Monk, because he says he thoroughly understands the bill. I confess that the difficulty with me is that I do not thoroughly understand the bill. There are some parts of the bill I do not like at all, but I should be glad to hear further explanations upon it, because, as I read the clauses, I cannot satisfy my own mind that the bill should pass in its present shape. I hope the House will give every opportunity to have a thorough explanation of the bill. It would be a great pity if the hon. gentleman from Rideau should insist on his motion.

The SPEAKER—I understand that the House is not insiting on the amendment and that I should now leave the Chair.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not desire to raise any unnecessary objection, but I am not a lawyer and cannot help it. The motion is made to go into committee. Then a motion is made that the House do not go into committee at present, but that we go into committee this day six months. I should like to have the question settled as to whether that motion is in order.

The SPEAKER—There is no motion to go into committee. It was an order already on the orders of the day. Therefore, no motion would be necessary.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Why was the motion made to-day that the Speaker should leave the Chair and the House go into Committee of the Whole? Certainly there was a motion to that effect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Speaker says that that motion is not necessary.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—And my hon. friend moves the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The practice in the House of Commons and the practice here is to go into committee without making a motion. It is a mere intimation that the party in whose charge the bill is is ready to go into committee on the bill.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I think it is our privilege to move against the bill at any stage whatever. If the hon. gentleman chooses to make a foolish motion he can do so, but to say that you are deprived of the right to make a motion now I think is not correct, because it is clear there must have been a motion made or we could not go into committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I wish to say, with regard to the question of order, that I think the practice in this House and the practice in the House of Commons is somewhat different. The practice in this House is to go into committee on motion. When that motion is put from the Chair it is open to an amendment. It is a rare thing that an amendment should be made to such a motion as the hon. Minister of Justice has made. I do not recollect any amendment to a motion such as this. If I desired to defeat the bill I would take the course advised by the minister and allow the House to go into committee and resort to one of the expedients which are open to any hon. member to get rid of the bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understood that Mr. Speaker had ruled upon the question. I do not understand that a motion is required here any more than in the House of Commons. Practically there is no motion, because this is one of the orders of the day.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—When a bill is put down for a second reading it is just as much an order of the day as this motion to go into committee is an order of the day, and the hon. gentleman is aware that such a motion is liable to amendment, that the bill be not read the second time but that it be read three months, or six months hence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would suggest to the hon. gentleman from Rideau, after the expression of opinion in the House, and considering the facilities which are offered him for defeating the bill if he desires to do so, that he do not press his motion just now, but permit the House to go into committee. There are three or four ways in which he could accomplish his object after we have heard the explanation of the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to undertake to differ from the hon. gentleman from Richmond (Mr. Miller) altogether, but the House will bear in mind that the committee stage is a different thing from a reading of the bill. There are only three stages substantially. Sometimes the committee stage is omitted altogether. For instance in the case of the supply bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is only by courtesy.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And the language which is used by the Speaker when he resolves the House into committee is different. He says "pursuant to the order of the House I now leave the Chair," and that indicates the difference between the two positions. I do not undertake to say that the House has not the right to do as the hon. gentleman from Rideau proposes, but I trust, as a matter of courtesy to the government, and in pursuance of the request of his own friends, that the hon. gentleman will allow the bill to go into committee, where he can make a motion to kill it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—When the Speaker says "pursuant to the order of the day, I now leave the Chair," he refers to the motion which has just been put.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not wish to obstruct, but if I have a certain right I want to know it. I do not desire to be put in a false position, I made the motion in good faith. I feel strongly against this bill and think it should be defeated, but if the government can bring in some other proper bill in relation to this matter, I will support it.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I do not think it is necessary to take up the question of right. I suggest the question of expediency. Is it expedient that we should throw the bill out now, or is it more expedient that we should have a thorough explanation of the bill and an opportunity of knowing exactly what its provisions are?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I shall waive my right to have the amendment put to the House.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The question of expediency is one thing, and right is another. If you put it as a question of expediency, all right, but you must not say I am going to be forced into it.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The hon. gentleman is a Highlander and cannot be forced.

The SPEAKER—I understand the hon. member from Rideau withdraws his motion?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yes.

The motion to go into committee was agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the bill.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the adoption of clause 1. He said:—I will read the law as as it stands now and point out to the committee, what I pointed out on the second reading of the bill, what this clause is intended to accomplish beyond what may be accomplished under the law as it now stands. Seection 8 of the Expropriation of Lands Act of 1889, of which this is an amendment reads:

> Land taken for the use of Her Majesty shall be laid off by metes and bounds; and when no proper deed or conveyance thereof to Her Majesty is made and executed by the person having the power to make such deed or conveyance, or when a person interested in such land is incapable of making such deed or conveyance, or when, for any other reason, the minister deems it advisable so to do, a plan and description of such land signed by the minister, the deputy of the minister or the secretary of the department, or by the superintendent of the public work, or by an engineer of the department, or by a land surveyor duly licensed and sworn in and for the province in which the land is situate, shall be deposited of record in the office of the registrar of deeds for the county or registration division in which the land is situated, and such land, by such deposit, shall thereupon become and remain vested in Her Majesty.

That is the power of expropriation under the statute as it now stands. Now we propose by the provisions of this bill to amend that section by adding the following:—

> 2. When any land taken is required for a limited time only, or a limited estate or interest therein only is required, the plan and description so deposited may indicate by appropriate words written or printed thereon that an estate for years only or some other limited estate or interest in the land is taken, and, by the deposit in such case, such estate for years or other limited estate or interest shall become and be vested in Her Majesty.
> 3. All the provisions of this Act shall, so far as the same are applicable, apply to the acquisition for public works of such estates for years or other limited estates or interests in lands.

That is, instead of taking the fee in the land you take power by this bill to take a less estate than the fee, a leasehold estate, or some other estate less than the interest of the party in the land. Let me take one or two instances by way of illustration. Suppose the government wish to-morrow to build a bridge across the ravine east of this building. It would run over, it might be, the top of some house, the proprietor of which might not be disturbed by what is there done. The government does not want the property in the valley beneath. It does not want the house, it simply wants an easement. We know that under our law a man's title extends down to the centre of the earth in one direction and up to the heavens in another. The power to build an overhead railway, for instance, or an overhead bridge might be a power which the party would refuse to permit you to exercise unless you were disposed to take the entire estate. The experience of the government has been that in many cases it would be convenient to take a less estate than the fee in the land, and it does seem to me that where you grant to the Crown power to take the whole of a man's estate in fee, it certainly is not an arbitrary thing to take a less estate than the fee. Take, for instance, another case. A government acquire a quarry for the purpose of constructing a public work of some sort, but, in order to get to that quarry, they are obliged to use a lane running through a man's property half a mile. Surely it is to the interest of the man, if he is to have reasonable compensation for his land, that the government, instead of taking the fee in that lane or way to the quarry, should be at liberty to take a lesser estate. They may only require the quarry for a specific purpose.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You already have that right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman admit that is a right power to have?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Because it is only temporary. You already have that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman admit that we have the right to acquire that temporary interest?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We are discussing a very much larger right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As I understood the hon. gentleman when he addressed this House an hour ago, he denied that we should have such a right.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend referred to a temporary cause in which the right might be used for the carriage of building material, and gave the House to understand, during the progress of his argument, that it would not be necessary to expropriate the fee simple of that road. I say, under subsection D of section 3 of the Act, you have that right already. The case that you want to provide for in the proposed bill, is an entirely different case from that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has evaded my point. The hon. gentleman argued, without looking at the statute, that that was an arbitrary power which the government ought not to possess, and now he turns round and says that the government do possess that power. That fact is shown by section 5 of the statute as it now stands, that the government have the power to take, in certain cases, a limited estate as well as to take the fee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman argued, you not only ought to take the fee but the whole property, and he read a portion of the English statute to show that we are introducing a principle here that is not recognized in the English law. I say we are not doing that—we are not introducing a principle that is not recognized in our law as it stands. We have the power, under the statute, to take a limited estate, or the power of taking the fee, and under this bill we do not go beyond that.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Will the hon. gentleman let me answer that question. Under this bill do you not take the power to compel a man to take his land back? Is that not the object?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We pay him, and he has the right to go into the court, and if he shows that during the period the land was in our possession he has lost his opportunity of parting with the land, he may ask to have that made a consideration in the assessment of damages.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—And do you consent to give him consequential damages?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly not, unless you specially provide for it. What do we propose to do? The bill provides:

2. When any land taken is required for a limited time only, or a limited estate or interest therein only is required, the plan and description so deposited may indicate by appropriate words written or printed thereon that an estate for years only or some other limited estate or interest in the land is taken, and, by the deposit in such case, such estate for years or other limited estate or interest shall become and be vested in Her Majesty.

The hon. gentleman has argued against that on principle, but I say that on principle that does not differ from the Act as it now stands. It is no extension of the principle involved in the existing law. When this bill was up before the House for a second reading, I do not think there was a single hon. gentleman present in the House at that time who took exception to either subsection 2 or subsection 3 that we proposed to add to section 8 of the law as it now stands. The hon. member from Manitoba did take exception to section 2, and when we come to that I will be prepared to discuss that subject; but I think the hon. gentleman will see that, so far as subsection 2 here is concerned, the one now under consideration, there is no extension of principle other than that, perhaps, involved in taking a less estate, which I think we do now. We certainly take a limited estate for years, and this enables us to take certain specific easements about which there might be doubt at the present time.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Will the hon. gentleman name any civilized country where there is such a law as this?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I take it this country is a civilized country, and I have pointed out to the hon. gentleman that as the law now stands there is not a principle in this subsection now under consideration that is not involved in the statute as we have it already.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Then why this amendment?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because it is required. It is an extension of that principle, but it is the same principle.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—If this exists already in the law, as the hon. gentleman says it does, why introduce this bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because this is to meet a class of cases not provided for in the statute as it exists.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there not this difference; you have the power now I understand—both railway companies and the government—of taking a limited portion of a man's estate if required for public use.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—All you have to do is to survey it, register the plans, and it becomes de facto the property of the government. Is not that the case now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In certain cases.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In all cases. If you require a piece of property through which to run a canal, under the Expropriation Act you can take it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You take the fee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You take the fee of the land required.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This bill goes further than that, as I understand it. You can take the property of individuals and keep it for twelve months or twelve years if you like, and then, if you find you do not want it, you throw it back on the owner's hands. The clause provides "When any land taken is required for a limited time." I can understand the propriety of taking lands for a limited time if you require it for a road, or require to go through a man's land to reach a quarry or a gravel pit. You have that right under the Expropriation Act at the present time; but under this bill you can take a man's property and keep it and use it as long as you please, and then throw it back on his hands. It is true that you make a provision in the Exchequer Court Act to compensate him. Take, for instance, a quarry; you require stone for the construction of a lock on a canal. You take possession of a man's quarry; you keep it twelve months, take out all the stone you require during the twelve months, and then give the quarry back to him. You deprive the owner of the right of selling that stone at a profit to you or to any other party who requires it, and after you have obtained all you require you throw it back on his hands, less the value you have taken out of it. You say he can go into the Exchequer Court and fight for the value of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is what he does now if they cannot agree.

Hon.Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, there is this difference: if you take that property and register your plans, it becomes de facto your property, and you cannot throw it back on the man's hands afterwards, nor can you say to the individual afterwards "we require only an acre, or half an acre of what we have taken from you." There is the great objection. If you require that quarry, or a certain portion of land.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not in this clause. It is in the next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, it is in this also. What I was stating was this: you want a man's quarry; you go and expropriate an acre or five acres of that land, or you require land through which to construct a canal, and you take from the proprietor ten acres. After building your canal, and after he has been out of the ownership of the quarry and also of the ten acres you have taken from him for some time, you find that you do not want all of that land and you say to him "we do not want ten acres; we want only eight," or "we have used your quarry for a certain time; we took an acre from you, but we find that half an acre will supply what we want. You can have it back."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has misconceived the situation. The government decides that it wants five acres of a man's property for five years. They file a plan, and they have a right to do what they like with that property for five years. If it is a quarry, any court would fairly consider that in five years all the stone would be taken from it, and therefore would very properly award to the person whose land they were expropriating the full value of the property.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I can mention a quarry in North Hastings that they are taking stone out of for the Victoria bridge that you could not take all the stone out in twenty years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The question would arise, what quantity could they take out during the time the Crown had it. The plantiff should be entitled to the fullest amount that the Crown could get. The Crown could not, after notifying the party that five acres was required, say we only want two acres. That would be impossible.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, under this bill you could.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, because the award would be made. In the instance the hon. gentleman gave about the canal, the Crown would have to pay for the land at the time, and surely the Crown would not expect the man to take the land back again and recover its value back from him? The Crown must complete the transaction. The Crown is bound by the award of the judge to complete the compensation at the time, and therefore there is no opportunity or facility for the Crown to divest itself of any portion afterward.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. Secretary of State is altogether mistaken as to the wording or intention of this clause. There is no limit of time within which the Crown is obliged to complete its bargain. I asked that question on the first reading. When it was moved by the Minister of Justice, I asked if there was a limit of time within which they could hold the land, and he said no. If you look at the report of the debate you will find the explanation given was that you can hold the land as long as you please, until the money is paid, and it depends upon the government when the money is to be paid.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER — What would you do in a case of this kind: an individual owns a quarry which is expropriated by the government. That individual has other contracts to supply stone from that very quarry. The government take the quarry away from him. How is a court going to assess the damages for which he is liable for non-fulfillment of his contract? The government hold the quarry for two or three years, during which time the owner is absolutely ruined. He is not able to supply the stone under his contract. At the end of that time the government return the quarry. How are they going to assess the damages or award compensation for a case of that kind?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like the Minister of Justice to instance some case, not already provided for in the Act, to which this bill will extend. If the public requirements are of such a nature as to cover such instances as have been suggested, actual instances certainly should be submitted to this House for the purpose of pointing out to members the desirability of passing this particular legislation. The hon. Secretary of State has instanced certain cases in which it is desirable that legislation should be placed upon the statute-book to meet the requirements of the Crown. In the class of cases mentioned by my hon. friend, he will find legislation in section 3 of the Expropriation Act covering the very particular class of cases to which he alluded. The right is given to the Crown to take possession and enter upon any lands deposit and remove stone or other material for the purpose of any public work, &c. That being the case, my hon. friend surely will not contend that the Crown is handicapped or hampered at the present time in the carrying out of its public works.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend instance a case in which it is so handicapped? My hon. friend must draw a distinction between a temporary user of a road, or quarry, or property, such as is set out in section 3 of the Act, and the expropriation for a limited time of a property belonging to an individual, during which time that individual is absolutely deprived of all right of property in his own land or other property. Now, the bill does not even go so far as this to throw upon the government or compel the government to mention the limitation of time which it contemplates using a man's property.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That must be in the notice filed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The bill does not say so. All you have to do is simply to mention that it is for a limited time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It must be limited to a certain time. The time must be named in the notice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend point out in what way the damages could be assessed in a case like that mentioned by the hon. gentleman from Brandon?

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the case put by the hon. gentleman from Brandon; if the government expropriated that quarry absolutely, would not the owner of that quarry be placed in as bad a position as if they took it for a year?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, because he divests himself of all interest in it, and he knows where he stands. Under this bill the sword is hung by a hair over his head for years. He does not know whether that land will depreciate in value in the course of time, so that he could not dispose of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The land is just as likely to go up as down in value.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let me instance a case: An owner of land observing that property in a particular vicinity is not likely to increase in value, but rather depreciate, at once takes steps to dispose of that property. Say, concurrently with that, the government serves him with notice tying up this property for a term of years. At the end of that period the market may become so absolutely depressed as to render his land of no value whatever. In the meantime he is deprived of the power of selling his land. Will my hon. friend say that a court could assess damages equivalent to the loss the owner sustained? I say such damages would not be ascertainable.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The hon. gentleman from Halifax says the land may appreciate in value. No one objects to the government getting the advantage of the increased value when they pay for the land. They can do what they like with it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend from Calgary has referred to the power given in section 3 of the Act as it stands. Any one who will look at the provisions of that Act will find that if the provisions of this bill are all arbitrary, then the provisions of section 3 are still more arbitrary.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Two blacks do not make a white.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman knows this, that the section has been introduced in the public interest; that it has been in the law for several years, and nobody has complained in regard to it. It makes provision that the government may enter on a man's property and deposit there material taken from other places. They may practically destroy the value of the land. On what does the proprietor depend for compensation? If he and the government cannot agree with regard to the value of the property that is damaged or used in this way, he has his redress in the Exchequer Court. Under this bill he has his redress exactly in the same way. As I said before, there is no new principle introduced into this bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But you cannot tie a man up under section 3 of the Act, and that is where the objection to this bill lies.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You do tie the lands up. The present law provides that whenever any gravel, sand, &c., is taken at a distance from a public work, the minister may lay down the necessary sidings, &c., through any land intersecting, and such right "may be acquired for a term of years, or permanently." It may be acquired for a term of years for a certain specific purpose, and the section continues:

> And the powers in this section contained may be used in all respects after the public work is constructed for the purpose of repairing or maintaining the same.

Here is a right that the House will see the government may acquire and maintain in the property during its construction, but it does not end there. The paramount interest of the government enables it to go on land, under the provisions of this statute and exercise the same right of easement as long as that public work exists for the purpose of keeping it in repair, and obtaining material. The powers are confined to the use of the right of way. But we extend it to other purposes equally necessary in the interests of the government for the maintaining of public works that are from time to time required, and they are to do so without being liable to exorbitant charges for damages or compensation from the party. Now, where is the difference between a government taking an easement which may be continued indefinitely and any power provided in this bill? Hon. gentlemen will see that this power of returning a portion of the lands expropriated by the Crown is a power that must be exercised before the question of amount is settled between the government and the party. If the government expropriated lands under the provisions of the law, and the parties cannot agree upon the price, or if the government finds after the expropriation is made that a less area than was first contemplated is required, they may restore a portion of the lands to the party, but all that must be done before a settlement for the property takes place. It must be done while the question is still in dispute between the government and the party to whom the lands belong.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—What is the meaning of the second clause when it says: "Whenever from time to time, or at any time, before compensation is made."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—At any time before compensation is made.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—What about the first words "Whenever from time to time?"

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman will see these words are intended to cover —

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The hon. gentleman said that all this must be done and the award made before an expropriation is made for temporary purposes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would suggest that we might strike out the word "or" when we come to that clause.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—"From time to time" means while the matter is still under consideration and while they are still unsettled as to the amount required to be held by the government. It is before an award is made. If my hon. friend thinks that more definite words are necessary than those employed in that clause for the purpose of guarding the rights or interests of the individual, I am prepared to consider any suggestion that may be made when we come to that section.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could the hon. minister suggest some specific case, which will lay the whole matter before the Senate practically, which necessitates this change in the law? If he can do that we will then be better able to judge. The great objection that is taken to this bill is, as I understand it, the taking a man's property and holding it for a limited time until, as you say, a settlement has taken place, and then if you do not want it, hand it back to him, no matter what the damage may be. Under the present law when a property is expropriated by the Crown there is an end of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not necessarily.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, necessarily. Draw the distinction if you please between the powers given to the government or a railway company now of acquiring an easement of a property in order to reach that which they require to carry on their works and the clause in this bill. That is all the hon. gentleman has been arguing for the last half hour. The government have the right already to take possession of a man's property to reach a gravel pit, and they have power to expropriate the gravel pit, but they have not the power, under the present law, to take the gravel pit and then after a certain time throw it back, or a portion of it, on the owner's hands.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is to be regretted that in dealing with the first clause of the bill hon. members will slip off to the second. The clause before the committee deals simply with the case where land is required for a limited time only, or a limited estate there is required. The plan and description to be deposited will indicate by proper words that a limited estate is required. As it stands now, the Crown can take a man's estate in fee simple in the land, and if the owner of the land and the government cannot agree the damages are settled by the Exchequer Court. It has never been contended that the Exchequer Court is ungenerous or illiberal in dealing with claims for damages. If that can be done, what earthly reason is there why the Crown cannot come in, and if they require a piece of land for some public work for a year or two, file a plan and state that. Why cannot the damages be as easily arrived at as the damages for taking the land altogether?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Will the term for which the estate is required be stated?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The clause says so. It says the plan and description may indicate by proper words the estate or time. Then everybody knows, and the man whose land is being taken for a year or two knows just how long it is to be taken. There is certainly no difference in principle between the two cases, and I cannot see how any difficulty can arise. Let us not mix up this clause with the next one, about which there may be some difficulty.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The case mentioned by the hon. gentleman from Halifax is already provided for by the Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will the hon. gentleman look at the Act?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have looked at the Act, and I do not find it. It covers certain specific things.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Minister of Justice says the present law is harsher than the proposed bill.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—And the greater must include the less.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. gentleman from Halifax kindly point out the extent to which this clause gives power to the government that is not in the Act? You say they are not alike. Then what is the difference?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that we ask for power to take a limited interest, or an interest for a limited period of time, or the fee, in certain lands. You have, under the law now, power to take the fee in lands, or a limited estate for certain purposes, but for certain purposes mentioned. Looking at section 3 of the Act, it will be seen that you make and use all such temporary roads to and from such timber, stones, clay, gravel and so on. The government acquire a quarry. They are obliged to pass through the lands of another party for the purpose. They take a limited estate for a highway. They make certain improvements upon it. They may hold it for a term of years mentioned, or they may abandon it at any time when they cease to use the quarry. Now, every argument which the hon. gentlemen have used against this provision of the bill applies against the provisions of the law as it now stands in respect to highways. The ground upon which we defend such an expropriation by the government is the ground of public necessity. A quarry would be useless to a government if they had no possible way of approaching it and you give them, as a matter of necessity, by the provisions of the Act, the power to take the land for a limited period of years.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under section 5 you have the right to expropriate it for a right of way.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, but not for other purposes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What other purposes do the government want it for?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know what purpose the Department of Public Works might want it for. I gave my hon. friend an instance to-day as it now stands. You could not run across a ravine over a barn or building with a bridge for railway purposes under the provisions of the law as it now stands, because you have not the power of expropriation unless you take the whole fee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The railway company has to expropriate by taking the fee and why should not the government do it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The party might not want to part with it. And the hon. gentleman undertakes to say that the Crown, which is under the control of Parliament, whose encroachment would be constantly watched by the people's representatives in the House of Commons, is not to be entrusted with any larger discretion than you would trust to a private railway corporation. I say that is a monstrous proposition and one that has never been recognized in the legislation of this House. Hon. gentlemen have raised objections to this bill but, if they have any value at all, they would be good against the law as it stands to-day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says no, but I say yes. I say under the law as it now stands you have the power to expropriate.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Amend the law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is what we are trying to do. There are many cases to which it is not applicable, and we ask permission to take a limited estate in the land, or a fee, and when we ask the power to restore a portion of property, we are asking a power that has to be exercised within a limited period of time. Let me ask the hon. gentleman who sits opposite (Mr. Lougheed) how the law of compensation is to be determined with regard to the provisions of this Act in respect to subsection D of section 3? How is the court to determine what the value of the interest the government have taken is?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As provided by section 25.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It can only be determined when the government state the extent of the interest and the period of time for which the interest is to continue, and in that respect it is broader than what we propose here, because it will be necessary here, when you file a plan and set out the interest you propose to take, to state the number of years for which that interest is to continue, and so you have means placed at the disposal of the Exchequer Court to determine the value more precisely than you have in the case of the subsection to which I referred. I am satisfied hon. gentlemen will see that this is a reasonable proposition. It is one which experience has shown to be necessary, one which it is in the public interest to adopt, and which can do no possible injury to any just right or interest which any party may set up under its exercise.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—As I understand, under the clause now under discussion when the government desire to take a limited estate in any property they will have to state the number of years they desire to hold it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. You could only ascertain the value of the interest by the number of years it is to run.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—That they have to state at the time?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. The clause reads:

2. When any land taken is required for a limited time only, or a limited estate or interest therein only is required, the plan and description so deposited may indicate by appropriate words written or printed thereon that an estate for years only or some other limited estate or interest in the land is taken, and, by the deposit in such case, such estate for years or other limited estate or interest shall become and be vested in Her Majesty.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I have been most anxious during the debate to come to a conclusion upon the arguments advanced by the hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Secretary of State. A good deal has been uttered about limited estates and estates for a short time and for a long time, but there is no question about this, that between vendor and vendee the time specified in their agreement is a whole perfect period, although it be only an estate for years. An estate by a lease of lands is an estate for years, but do you mean to say that the lessee can, at any time after that lease is made, go and say to the owner, "I want you to take back all this estate that I do not require?" No, the lease was made for ten years or for fifty years. He takes the whole of that time. It is no part of it he takes. It is no part of that estate that the lessee or vendee takes. Neither is it a part of the estate when the Crown deals with the fee. It is not a part of that estate that is taken. It is not a limited estate for days or months or years. The Crown takes the whole estate and everything that is in that estate, and agrees with the person from whom it is taken to pay him for what is taken, but if he had entered a condition in his deed with the government, "If you like to give me back within a year or within two years, one or two or three acres of this land, we will settle now for the price that I must remit you for the land you take back from me," there would be some sense in it. But take the case of the government having five years ago acquired land for a certain purpose. The agreement for that land was made at that time under the law as it was. He did not make a treaty with the government giving them power to bring in an Act of Parliament whenever they pleased, changing the law, and this law under which the land had been given for public purposes was in existence, and it was not in contemplation of the parties that it should be changed for the benefit of the government. If there is a change in it that change must be at the time of the sale and purchase which comes afterwards, and the price to be refunded by the government is to be considered by both parties before the original deed or contract has been made. The change in the law contemplated here would have this effect—I will not say it was contemplated by the government that it should have the effect—of changing the law as it was when the contract was made. Which of us will have a piece of land purchased on such terms from the government. The government has no right itself to take lands except by the statutory power conferred upon it in the public interest, but this is asking for additional power long after the contract. When the purchaser sold his land he sold the whole of it, as the hon. Minister of Justice has said, from the sun down to the bottom of the earth. He sold all that and there is no use speaking of, or leading to confusion in speaking of limited estates or estates for years, or less than a year, but take the whole thing that was in the contemplation of the parties at the time the sale passed. What passed to the purchaser is his, and what passed to the vendor is his. They have no interest any longer if it was an estate in fee. The vendor ceases to have any interest in the estate that passed, and the purchasers, the government, have nothing to say further in the matter. The property is theirs, and if they want to make any change in it thereafter, it must be the matter of a new bargain, just the same as if neither of the parties had ever had anything to do with one another. It seems to me this is, in effect what is abhorred by the law—a sort of ex post facto legislation. It is bringing in a measure to amend the law as it was when all the transactions up to the present time had been carried out. I have not heard from my hon. friend the Minister of Justice an instance given at all bearing upon such a case as might arise under this change—not one. Although he says the experience of the past would warrant this being done at any stage in the public interest by the government, I deny that, and if it was not deniable, I have no doubt, with the assiduity and keenness of perception of the hon. Minister of Justice, that we would have the cases cited in which such a thing occurred, and until I hear such a citation, I shall not be a party to any ex post facto legislation affecting contracts made in the past. That is my position, and it is not one of opposition because of the source from which the legislation springs, because my feeling is to be with the government whenever I think their legislation is right, and I believe that when their legislation is well considered and right, they will seldom meet with any party opposition in this honourable chamber.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I beg to ask the hon. minister whether under this clause the government can take a less estate than that expropriated two years ago? Supposing the government expropriated five acres a year ago can they now say we will take one acre?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentlemen had better reserve that question till we come to clause 2.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—This clause speaks of taking a limited estate. Has it a retroactive effect?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The question which my hon. friend has just asked has only intensified the question which I asked some time ago, to give us some specific case in which the government has suffered by not having the power which they now ask. I find, looking at this definition of lands in the English law, that they are much more conservative than we are:

> There are no sections in the Land Clauses Act of 1848 which empowers the undertakers to compel any owner of land to create a grant or easement in their favour, although such easement might be sufficient for carrying on the purposes of the undertaking.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the undertaker—not the Crown?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that applies to the expropriation of all lands; and lays down the principle, even supposing it does apply to companies, that you have no right, against the will of the owner, to take possession even of the easement although it may be necessary for carrying on a public work. In our Expropriation Act the power is given to the government to take possession against the will of the people, so that we have gone much further in Canada than in England. It seems to me the whole object of the bill is simply to enable the government to take possession of a man's property and hold it until they have paid the money, and there is no limited period in which they shall pay the money, and then hand it back, or a portion of it. Under the present Act the moment they file the plans of whatever they desire to take of the property it becomes absolutely the property of the Crown, or of the company that has the power to expropriate and has expropriated. What the government wants to do is this: take a lease of the property, whether it be a gravel bed, quarry or other valuable piece of property, and after they have taken possession of it, hold it for a certain time and then say to the owner "we only want half of it." That is really what it is in a nutshell, and there is no use trying to hide it, and if the minister would tell us why they want that power, and the cases that have arisen to justify it, the Senate will be in a better position to judge.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no objection personally to any amendment that would require the Crown to pay in a limited time the award as between debtor and creditor. I do not think the Crown ought to be permitted, after the award has once been made, to hold the money indefinitely in order to ascertain whether they want the whole of the land. I think the award should be final, and if the bill does not so express it, I think the Minister of Justice will be prepared to make it clear. I daresay there are instances where the Crown had not paid up the amount in a reasonable time. If the government are not appealing against the award they should pay.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Why should they not pay interest?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think they ought to pay interest.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Why do they not do so?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is owing to the administration that was in power prior to us, for eighteen years, that they are paying no interest.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend asked me to instance a case. Let me give an instance which I gave him the other day in connection with the construction of a canal, a case where the turning ground connected with the mill was taken for the construction of the canal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What ground?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The ground where the customers of the mill used to turn round. It was necessary for the mill. What the government would desire to do in that case would be to acquire ground elsewhere in immediate contact with the mill and provide a turning ground, instead of being compelled to purchase the mill at a very exorbitant figure. Of course the Crown might be regarded by the proprietors of the mill as an excellent customer, and the owner might think that the money at which the property would be valued would be of more use to him than the retention of the mill, but we have no power, if we construct a canal and use the land close to a mill, to provide that other land shall be given in place of that which we have taken, lands in the immediate rear of the mill furnishing any amount of room, and we leave it to the judge of the Exchecquer Court to say whether the lands given him in exchange are adequate compensation for what has been taken from him.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is the next clause.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am giving it because hon. gentlemen have persisted in discussing the provisions of the whole bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The limited estate clause would not apply to that interest.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, but that is an interest that the Crown cannot at the present time compel the party to take—cannot offer in compensation. The court cannot say that it shall be so taken. They cannot estimate its value. The whole provision of this bill, from beginning to end, is for the purpose of enlarging the power of the court in order that justice may be done both to the Crown and to the party. I am myself wholly unable to see the force of the objection which the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) raised to this provision of the bill, and I think my hon. friend by this time sees that there is not a very great deal of force in the objection. He must see that the clause is a reasonable one and one which should form part of the law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that there is power to take a man's property on one side of the mill and give him property on the other side? That is the instance which he illustrated. The hon. gentleman has argued that if it is necessary to expropriate land which is necessary for the public to get to the mill, you want power to take that land and get an entrance to the mill for the customers by another route. There is no power in this bill to compel a man to take it in exchange.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, there is.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The first clause, after the explanations which have been made, simply means to give the government power to take a lease, in point of fact, for a term of years for a less property, which they consider they may require in the construction of public works; and if it is amended in the direction suggested by the hon. Secretary of State that this word "may" shall be changed into "shall," and they shall make these plans and define the period for which the land is wanted, and pay the compensation within the specified time, then I think it would remove the objection to the clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the difference between "may" and "shall" in an Act of Parliament?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are both alike when applied to the Crown in respect of duties, but not in other cases.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is no analogy between the provision in section 1 of the bill and the illustration or case mentioned by the hon. gentleman from Toronto. So far as the government leasing the land is concerned, I fancy there would be no objection whatever, provided the Crown might lease the land from the owner. A lease always involves an agreement between two parties, but it would be an extraordinary case for a lessee to go to a lessor and say to him, "I insist upon leasing your land for five or ten years whether you want to let me have it or not."

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would it not be just as extraordinary to go to an owner of a lot of land and say "I insist upon taking your land in fee simple whether you wish me to or not."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, that is the right of eminent domain for purposes of public utility to expropriate lands. I will now read from Cripps' Law of Compensation, which is the leading authority on the question of expropriation:

> There are no sections in the Land Clauses Act, 1845, which empower the undertakers to compel an owner of lands to create or grant an easement in their favour although such easement might be sufficient for carrying out the purposes of the undertaking.

Now the hon. gentleman has laid considerable stress on the fact that the Crown should not be asked to purchase a larger estate than necessary for the purposes of the undertaking, and yet under the English law which is the source of our legislation, no such principle has been there recognized or introduced into the Act as to allow the Crown to take arbitrarily a less interest in land than the fee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should suggest to the hon. gentleman that perhaps there was some later authority than the Act of 1845. That is a long time ago.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It was amended in 1860, but the amendment did not affect that clause.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And our law is altogether different from the law we had in 1845. I think the hon. gentleman has done enough in the way of logic or mathematics to know that the whole is greater than the part, and that if you can take the whole of a man's estate, you should be able to take a part of it, and if the law allowed the government to take land in fee simple, it should allow the government to take a lease for the term mentioned. I move that the word "may" in line 9 be stricken out and the word "shall" be substituted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend will not say that the courts will not determine "may" as mandatory. It is interpreted mandatory as often as permissive.

Hon. Mr. POWER—"Shall" is always mandatory.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Here it refers to a duty and is mandatory, but I do not object to the change.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In line 12, after the word "taken," I move that these words be added:

Specifying the amount of such estate or interest.

That will indicate whether it is for a year or two years, or for any other term.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The word "extent" would be better than amount.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Better put the extent of years. It may be an estate for life or an estimate fee simple.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You mention the extent of the estate and I think that is the proper way.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I would like to know when the motion was made to adopt this clause.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I moved the adoption of the first clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not see what effect it would have to mention the extent of the estate. If you file the plan you must state what you are taking.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My object in moving the amendment was to get the clause in the shape in which it should be and then the vote could be taken on the clause as amended.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I could understand the force of the amendment if it limited the period in which it was to be done.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The object is to provide that the government shall state beforehand just what they want, that they must state whether they want it for one or two or three years, and that they must set that out in the plan or description.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I move that the whole clause be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN—The hon. gentleman might let the amendment be made and then let the vote be taken on the clause.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Yes.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I move that the clause be struck out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think that that is an amendment. I think that voting against the passing of the clause is the mode to accomplish what the hon. gentleman wants.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When the adoption of the clause is moved, the hon. gentleman can vote.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—A division can be taken on the motion for the adoption of the clause, and we would get the sense of the committee at once with regard to the whole bill.

The motion being put to the committee for the adoption of the clause 1, it was declared lost on the following division:—

Yeas, 12; Nays, 19.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported that the committee had risen.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 19th May, 1899.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I find, in looking over the list of committees, that by some mistake, although the Striking Committee put the name of the hon. senator from British Columbia (Mr. Templeman) on several of the committees, his name in some way or other has been omitted, and I would move, seconded by Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, that the Hon. Wm. Templeman's name be placed upon the Committees of Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, Debates and Reporting, and Divorce, in place of the late Senator Boulton.

The motion was agreed to.

THE COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS.

QUORUM REDUCED.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I have to ask the House to adopt a resolution which should properly come from the Standing Committee on Standing Orders, but there is no quorum at present. The maritime members have not come forward, and there is a great accumulation of work to be done, and I have to ask the House to pass a motion reducing the quorum to three.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It seems to me to be a very small quorum, and perhaps it is a failure of duty on the part of members that might not happen very often.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It will only be for the remainder of the session, and I think three members of that committee and the chairman will do the work as well as five.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not objecting.

The motion was agreed to.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (B) "An Act further to amend the Exchequer Court Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the adoption of the first clause. He said:—I think perhaps this bill explains itself. The first clause reads:

1. The Local Judge in Admiralty of the Exchequer Court of Canada in and for any Admiralty District in Canada may at the request of the judge of the Exchequer Court hear any cause, matter or proceeding in the said court arising in such Admiralty District, or hold any sitting of the Exchequer Court for the trial of causes in such Admiralty District, and when so acting shall in respect of such cause, matter or proceeding, or the holding of such sitting have and exercise all the jurisdiction, powers and authorities of such court, and of the judge thereof.

There is sometimes a single case to be tried, and a judge in the Admiralty Court, where such a case would arise, say in Vancouver or Victoria or down at Halifax, can undertake the duty at the request of the judge of the Exchequer Court, and at much less cost, and without any inconvenience to the public, and also I think that where the judge may be otherwise occupied, it may be important that the judge in Admiralty should have the power of undertaking the work of the Exchequer Court judge. This has been found by experience to be a power that it would be convenient that the judge of the Exchequer Court should possess.

The clause was adopted.

On the second clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would ask the Minister of Justice whether he has thought of the question of the power of the Senate to appropriate moneys. I am not sure. I know that no independent member of the Commons can introduce any measure affecting the expenditure of money. It must come by message from His Excellency, and the Senate has no power to authorize the expenditure of money, but whether the general terms in which this is worded would obviate that point I am not positive, but I have great doubts upon the point.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not object to the sum of $100 being in brackets, although I am inclined to think that, not being an appropriation, but the assignment of a certain sum of money already voted for a work undertaken, that that perhaps could be done, but I would say that it might be put in with the sum blank, leaving it to be filled in by the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think that would be the safest way.

The clause was adopted.

On the third clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This bill provides for giving power to the Exchequer Court to carry out the provisions of the bill which was rejected by the Senate last night.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If my hon. friend will read the clause, he will see that that is not so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have read the clause. It varies to the extent of giving power to the Exchequer Court to award damages which might have occurred or accrued from the expropriation of property which had been handed back, or the expropriation of property for a certain time, and that bill not having been passed, this clause certainly is not required.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that this clause enlarges the power of the Exchequer Court. If my hon. friend will compare section 3 of the Exchequer Court Act, chapter 38 of the statutes of 1889, he will see that there are certain variations. I will read the section as it stands now, and if my hon. friend will look at the bill, he will see what the variations are:

If the injury to any land or property alleged to be injuriously affected by the construction of any public way may be removed wholly, or in part, by any alteration or in addition to any such public work, or by the construction of any additional work, and the Crown by its pleadings or on the trial, undertakes to make such alteration or addition, or to construct such work, the damages shall, so far as the future is concerned, be assessed in view of such undertakings and the court shall declare that, in addition to any such damages awarded, the claimant is entitled to have such alteration or addition made, or such work constructed.

The variation, my hon. friend will see, is in the words that have been added. The clause reads:

If the injury to any land or property alleged to be injuriously affected by the construction of any public work may be removed, wholly or in part, by any alteration in or addition to any such public work, or by the construction of any such additional work.

That, so far, is exactly the same as the law now stands. Then the bill proceeds:

Or by the abandonment of any portion of the lands of the claimant.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the objectionable part.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is new. "Or by the grant to him of any land or easement." The point is illustrated exactly by the case I mentioned yesterday. In building the Trent Valley Canal, the canal is cut not far from a grist mill. The road runs between the canal and the mill, but the canal has cut off the turning ground at the side, or at the end of the drive. The mill owner says "You have rendered my mill useless to me, I want you to take over the entire property—I want $14,000 for this mill." Now, the mill is as accessible as it was before. The road is not injured, but there is a piece of ground in the rear which it would be possible to acquire for a turning ground, in every way, in the estimation of those who have reported upon it, as suitable for the purpose as that which he before possessed, right beside it. On the opposite side the canal has cut away a portion of the turning ground. Now this provision, if carried, would enable the Exchequer Court, if the government made such a proposition, to say whether that ground was as suitable for the purpose as that which the mill owner possessed before—would it serve the purpose and, if so, to what extent has his property been damaged? If it is not as good in every way as it was before, then the difference will be estimated in damages by the judge of the Exchequer Court. I am just mentioning this one case as an illustration and it is constantly coming up. Let me mention another case. The government have acquired a quarry. They have used a piece of land opposite the quarry, an acre or two acres, for a piling ground upon which to pile the stone and dress it. They have no power to take a limited interest in that property. The party may say "You must acquire the fee." We can acquire a limited interest under the law to the road leading to the property, but we only require the use of that property while we are engaged in some public work. There can be no impropriety—there can be no difference in principle between giving the Crown the power to say that we will take that for one year or two or three years, than giving the Crown the power to take the right of way over the ground on the same point for the same purpose for a limited period. Supposing a man has a farm or a piece of land lying between the public work that is being constructed and the quarry from which the material is being obtained. The law as it is gives power to take the road—not to take the entire fee, but the easement, and to use it so long as it may be required. That is provided in section 5 of the Expropriation Act as it stands. Now, is there any difference in principle or in practice between acquiring an easement or taking a lease for that right of way for two, three or four years, and taking a lease for an acre of ground at the end of it for the purpose of piling up the material you want to draw away on that road? Is not that principle exactly the same, and why should the attempt be made to limit the power of the Crown and compel the Crown to take the fee for a piece of ground it may not require for more than six months? You cannot compel them—you did not compel them when chapter 39 of this statute in 1889 was under discussion—you did not compel the Crown to say that if you want the right of way you must take the fee. You did not say that. Looking over the discussion that took place on this Act, I do not find a single word said on the subject in this House. Now, why should there be difficulties put in the way with regard to acquiring a piling ground, for instance, and acquiring a right of way? In principle they are exactly the same. Now, this clause, as I said when the bill was being read the second time, does not in principle differ from the law as it now stands. You applied it then to the right of way. I propose that in addition to the right of way it may be also applied to a piece of ground that you may require for the purpose of piling the material upon that you use in construction of public building or public work. Let me take another case. We want opportunity of obtaining lands and offering them to the company or to the party, who says we have damaged their property by what we have taken, in mitigation of the damage which may be done. Let me take an instance which I mentioned to my hon. friend, who sits opposite me, yesterday. The government is engaged in the construction of a basin or a dock in the harbour of St. John. In the construction of that they cross a railway running out to the deep water terminus, cutting right across the track. The government would like the power ——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the street railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I am speaking of an ordinary railway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it is at St. John it must be the Intercolonial or the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It must be the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why should the government not have the power of acquiring property alongside of and down the track if they see proper, running further in?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have you not that power now?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You have not the power to expropriate?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We have the power to expropriate, but we have not the power to say: "We give you this in substitution of what we have taken and leave it to the Exchequer Court to say what is the difference in value." Let hon. gentlemen understand this question and see what they are seeking to do. Supposing this railway were to demand $500,000. They say: "You have cut off our connection with the deep water terminus." If we had the power of proposing another tract of land at the end of the basin, we could say, "We have not done so." We have taken away, it is true, a portion of the land which you now hold as a track, but we have substituted other land for it which still gives you your connection with the water terminus which you had before. It may be better. It may not be so good, but that is a question that the Exchequer Court would decide upon evidence if the Crown and the party cannot agree, but it is of consequence—of immense consequence that in such an undertaking the Crown should have the power of proposing something else in place of what they have taken in order that it may not be in the power of the corporation to come before a court and to say "Our connection with our water communication has been destroyed and absolutely taken away." I mention these as illustrations of the importance of the work, and I may say to hon. gentlemen that the gentleman who has given us suggestions upon this subject, based upon a large experience in these matters, is not a political friend or supporter of the administration. If he has still any political sympathy or feeling, it is with hon. gentlemen opposite and not with us, and I am perfectly sure that his recommendations to my department are as honest as they are sincere and are certainly in the public interest. Now, let me read this provision:

If the inquiry to any land or property alleged to be injuriously affected by the construction of any public work may be removed wholly or in part by any alteration in or addition to any such public work, or by the construction of any additional work.

So far that is exactly word for word with the statute as it now is:

Or by the abandonment of any portion of the lands taken from the claimant.

Supposing it could be shown after the land has been expropriated, but before a final settlement has been reached, that by abandonment of a portion, the injury would not be a serious injury, that the only claim the party would have would be for the actual value of the property taken, and that no damage would be done to what he retained, surely the Crown ought to have the power of restoring to the party that which would seriously damage what remains if the Crown cannot do so?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does that bill give power to abandon a part of the land damaged?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—And take a limited interest as well?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The question of limited interest does not come up in this bill. It is the abandonment of "lands or easements." The Crown may give him a right of way where he had no right of way before. If we should remove the mischief which might be done him—it is taking the power to remove the mischief in that way but it does not take it out of the hands of the court—it does not say he shall not have redress. It says the Crown may undertake to remove the injury that may be done by doing that, and the extent to which it does succeed in what it has undertaken will be estimated by the court. It is a matter of litigation. "And, if the Crown by its pleadings, or on the trial, or before judgment," some hon. gentlemen object to these words "or before judgment." I am perfectly willing to make any amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is in the statute now.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, it is not in the statute.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Whether it is or not, I am willing to say this in the bill, that no proposition shall be made without the consent of the other party after the question has been argued. I think, up to the time that the matter comes before the court, the Crown ought to stand in the position of any other party to propose a means of redress if such means can be discovered.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How about cases before the court now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If a case has been argued, then it would not be touched by this bill at all; but, if there has been notice of trial, there is no reason in the world why——

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the crucial point of the whole thing. This bill, of course, would touch a certain case now pending in the courts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is labouring under a delusion. There may be fifty cases where property has been expropriated that have not been up for discussion or decision at all, and that might come under this bill. For instance, supposing my hon. friend had a case in court to-day, and the right of appearing as a witness on the part of either party to a case were taken away, and the law were restored as it was before, no one would think of calling that an ex post facto law—the altering of the law of evidence. Every case that was pending at the time the law of evidence was changed was dealt with and decided under the law of procedure as amended by that amendment to the law of evidence. That took away from the party no right. His right is a right to compensation. We take away from him no right. If his property is damaged, if by any alteration previous to any litigation or controversy on the subject, by any proposition we may make to him, may mitigate the damages, surely that is not taking a right away from him.

If the Crown by its pleadings, or on trial or before judgment, undertakes to make such alteration or addition or to construct such work, or to abandon such portion of the land taken, or to grant such that is to grant land in place of that which is taken and which will remove the damage of which the party complains.

The damages shall be assessed in view of such undertaking. If it does not mitigate the damage in the least, then the assessment of damages would not be affected in the least, but if it does mitigate the damages and reduce the injury to the party, surely that is not a matter of which he can complain—that is not a thing which can be set up as a matter of ex post facto legislation. There is no right which he possesses which is interfered with in that case except it is beneficially interfered with. The government is not going to press a proposition that will aggravate the damages and increase the difficulty, and therefore the party might say: "You injured me largely by what you proposed to do in the first place, but you have further increased the injury by the alterations which you propose to make." If he could make such a plea as that, he might say that you are putting him in a worse condition than before, and if you had expropriated before the Act came about, you ought not to apply the Act to him. But that is not the case at all. The case is that the damages are mitigated—the injury is diminished by the alteration proposed, and if his injury is diminished he has nothing of which to complain. Why if you right the injury which is done and it goes on by any change that the government propose to make until it reaches a vanishing point, his injury has disappeared altogether, and therefore there is no ground of complaint. In this matter, then, there is not any ground of valid objection that can be urged from that point of view.

The court shall declare that, in addition to any damages awarded, the claimant is entitled to have such alteration or addition made or such work constructed, or such grant made to him.

Now, the Crown says to a party, "What you propose to do will be an advantage," and the court says that all that this concluding portion of the clause does is to provide that a proposal which the government has made and with reference to which the damages have been assessed shall be carried out. The government could not undertake to obtain a mitigation of damages in diminution of injury done to a party and after the court had dealt with the question, then turn round and say, "We will not carry out the provisions agreed upon." This clause is intended to meet that, and it provides that in addition to any damages awarded—that is, pecuniary damages—the claimant is entitled to have such an alteration or addition made or such work constructed or such grant made to him. There may be a retaining wall built—there may be a hollow or depression that requires to be filled up, or the ground levelled off. The damages are diminished in consequence of work of that sort being done, and the judge has awarded him diminished damages accordingly, and the clause provides that the government shall carry that provision out—shall do what it promised to do in connection with any work or undertaking. I think hon. gentlemen will see, the more they consider the provision of this bill, the more just and fair they are. No injury is done to the party. A benefit is conferred upon the public. Let me take an instance I have mentioned, of a man who wants to get rid of his mill and who makes the taking of a small corner from his turning ground an excuse for his saying "Parties coming to my mill cannot conveniently turn on these grounds any longer and I want you to take the mill over." We do not want the mill. The mill is no advantage to us. The Crown is not engaged in milling operations. There is plenty of land at the rear of the drive that can be acquired for that purpose, and why should not the Crown have the power to acquire that territory and put the man and his mill in as good a position as they were before? If the Crown cannot, then he is entitled to that extent to damages, and surely the provision is a reasonable one and one that will enable, in many cases, the government to protect the public treasury against unnecessary charges which are made without any serious injury to the parties complaining.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman tell the House on which side of the harbour the improvements are being made in St. John? Is it on the Carleton side or on the eastern side of the harbour?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot tell my hon. friend. I have not looked into the matter. It was mentioned to me by my deputy as an instance in which this power would be important.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If my recollection is right, the improvements are taking place on the east side of the river—that is the St. John portion, and not on the west side, or Carleton, and if that be the case, there are no railways in the city of St. John, not even street railways, that I am aware of, except that which belongs to the government. It is true the Canadian Pacific Railway crosses the river and enters the station, but that does not interfere with the harbour, as every one knows who has been in St. John.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not the slightest consequence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is, because the hon. gentleman said the railway was interfered with.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I gave it as an illustration, and it was given to me as an illustration by my deputy. I take it that he is correct.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It must be somewhere else then.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. Even though there were no such case in existence, it serves for an illustration as well as if it were an actual fact to show how injury could be done and how it could be prevented.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. Minister of Justice seeks to introduce into this bill the principle upon which there was a very strong pronouncement last night and which would be voted down by this House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, my hon. friend will see that it was not voted down. The corresponding provision to this in the bill was not reached. It was a wholly different provision.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then my hon. friend should not proceed with this provision of the bill until the second clause in the Expropriation Bill is passed by the House. My hon. friend must necessarily concede that the clause he has been dealing with is simply the machinery to carry out clause 2 of yesterday's bill. If that clause does not pass, my hon. friend must know very well, particularly as a lawyer, that he simply would be beclouding this bill by tacking on to it machinery for the exercise of power which is not yet vested in the Crown. My hon. friend proceeds to-day with a very strong discussion of the principle of the bill of yesterday, principles which he knows very well this House is adverse to. I regret very much that my hon. friend saw fit to introduce into the matter of the discussion to-day an implication that the House was dealing with this question from a political standpoint, and that the clause was recommended by one of a different political faith from that to which my hon. friend belongs. I, for one, have always opposed, and opposed very strongly, extending the powers of the government to invade those private rights which, under every British system of government, we have considered sacred. It seems to me that the government already have powers that are very much too wide, and the exercise of which very frequently results in very great cases of hardship.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As for instance——

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I can recall cases in which individuals have suffered very great loss and have been put to very great expense by reason of the government invading private rights in expropriating lands and compelling the owners to go into the Exchequer Court to enforce their rights against the Crown.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are more cautious now.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not saying the exercise of expropriation should not be vested in the Crown, but this House should look carefully at giving larger powers to the government than already possessed by them. This clause relates particularly, as I said, to yesterday's bill. I cannot understand why my hon. friend wishes to proceed with it in the absence of our having dealt with that clause, and therefore I would ask him to let this clause stand until the Committee of the Whole House should sit upon the bill which we had before us for our consideration yesterday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is dead.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It can be brought before the House by giving notice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—However, it seems to me my hon. friend should not proceed with this bill in the absence of securing the power which he yesterday asked. Now, dealing with those cases alluded to I would ask my hon. friend to point out a little more clearly where any injustice has arisen to the Crown by reason of the present powers being too limited.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Take the case of the mill and the canal.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Take the case of the mill. I would refer my hon. friend to a case in England in which a very similar question was dealt with by the courts, and in which it was held that the expropriator had no right to exercise such a power as is now being sought by the government, or which the government wish now to possess:

In Marson and the London, Chatham Dover Railway Company it was held that an open piece of land in front of a public house which formed the only means of approach to the front door, and which had been treated as passing with the house by every demise of the public house since 1802, came within the definition of a curtilage, and was part of the public house, as being necessary for its convenient occupation.

And consequently they were called upon to expropriate the whole property.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Do you think that was a proper thing?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have sufficient confidence in the English courts in their adjudication of a principle by which the equilibrium between the Crown and the people in such cases shall be justly maintained.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was not a Crown case.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The same principle applies to the Crown. It comes under the Consolidated Land Clauses Act as well as private corporations. Another place where a man had bought land and put a house on it and inclosed it with an ornamental hedge and formed a back entrance, it was held that the company could not take a portion of the back entrance without taking the whole. If my hon. friend desires any Crown cases in which the Crown was prevented from expropriating land under such circumstances he will find several cases in Crips. Why should that mill owner be compelled to take back from the Crown certain lands which they heretofore had expropriated and which the Crown now chooses to abandon? Has that mill owner rights as well as the Crown? And can the Crown not better afford to be at some expense or to be at some additional trouble or loss than a private individal who may possibly be ruined?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is precisely what we propose. We propose to give him land in lieu of that which we took, which certainly will serve his purpose, and we propose to leave it to the courts to say whether, after that has been done, he has been damaged. If he has, he will be indemnified by the government.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Where are you going to get the land to give to him? Take it from somebody else and give it to him?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, we own it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is quite obvious that if the carrying into effect of such an interchange of rights as that indicated by my hon. friend would prove of advantage to the mill owner he would accept the exchange. It is quite evident that when he refuses to accept this exchange of land there is some wrong about to be done him.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it proves he thinks there is an opportunity of selling his mill to advantage.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then that being the case you have the Exchequer Court which sits impartially upon such a question as that, and the Crown can preserve its rights by reason of the judicial machinery which it possesses.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I pointed out how it could not be done.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is no law by which a railway company or any aggregation of individuals having once taken a piece of land can abandon it afterwards, and say we have made a mistake in taking that land and insist upon your taking it back. It does violence to the fundamental principles of all contract law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not a matter of contract.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Any gentlemen who have given any consideration to this question will know that the law of compensation is based practically upon the law of contract, that there must be an interchange of rights between the parties, and if you expropriate certain lands from the individual you must give to him the value he would obtain for the lands had he put them upon the market for sale. That is the principle of all expropriation, and a principle which should be strictly observed. I should be very sorry to embarrass the government in the passage of such legislation as this, but the cases cited by my hon. friend are cases I confidently state are already provided for in the Act. Take the piling grounds referred to by my hon. friend. It is already provided for in the Expropriation of Lands Act. I would refer my hon. friend to section 3, paragraph B, in which the Crown has the right to enter upon and take possession of any land, streams or water forces, the expropriation of which is necessary for the construction, maintenance and repair of any public work. In reference to the piling ground, I refer to section 3, paragraph D, where it is provided :

> Enter with workmen, carts, carriages and horses upon any land, and deposit thereon soil, earth, gravel, trees, bushes, logs, poles, brushwood or other material found on the land required for the public work, or for the purpose of digging up, quarrying and carrying away earth, stones, gravel or other material, and cutting down and carrying away trees, bushes, logs, poles and brushwood therefrom, for the making, constructing, maintaining or repairing the public work.

How can my hon. friend to-day say that a case of hardship has arisen in which it is necessary for the interposition of legislation by Parliament to meet the case mentioned by him when he states himself that he has not the particulars of the case which he cited as an illustration. My hon. friend cannot say to this House that it is indispensable to have this legislation to meet that particular case, because he himself admits freely that he is not sufficiently familiar with the particulars to inform this House as to wherein this legislation would apply to such a case. Under these circumstances it is simply asking us to do what we have pronounced against yesterday, and which I am satisfied the House is averse to doing.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I felt obliged yesterday to say that the argument of the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed), on the matter before the House went too far, and I think the same remark is applicable to-day. Before proceeding to say anything about the clause which is now before the committee, it would be as well to eliminate an element which I think has played a very considerable part in the discussion of both these bills, and call the attention of the committee to the fact that if clause 4 of this bill is stricken out, then any past transaction will not be affected by it; and it is in the hands of the committee to decide whether or not this bill, if we pass it, shall apply to past transactions. Let us take the clause which is before the House and look at it in a fair and impartial way. As the law stands to-day, in the case of that mill—that was the extreme case—the government, to-day, if it were practicable, might themselves go to work and expend a sum of money and construct an entrance as a public work by which the mill owner might get access to his mill, and if they did that, under the law as it stands to-day, the persons damaged would be obliged to accept that, and the judge would be obliged, in estimating the damages, to deduct the value conferred on the property by the public work which the government had constructed. Hon. gentlemen is it not just the same thing in every way? If the government happen to have a piece of land adjoining that mill which will afford the same access to the mill which the public work would have afforded, or which the existing road has afforded, is it not just the same thing to the mill owner if the government transferred to him a piece of land which gives access to the mill; and is it fair to the public to insist that the country shall pay $14,000, or whatever value the judge may fix for that mill, when they could have escaped the payment of that sum by simply deeding this piece of land to the mill owner. My hon. friend behind me does not seem to accept my view, but it seems to me the case is just as plain as that two and two make four. There is no difference whatever in principle between the government building for that mill owner a way of access to his mill and giving him a piece of land which the government happen to own and which gives him the same access.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why cannot the government sell the land?

Hon. Mr. POWER—What land?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The land they would abandon.

Hon. Mr. POWER—To whom?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—To who ever would buy it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The government happened to build a canal which runs close to that mill, and which, unless something is done, will damage the mill owner very considerably; and if the government are in a position to transfer to the mill owner a piece of land which avoids the damage, why should they not? The law at present allows them to make any addition to the public work and construct any additional work, and this bill before us simply goes on to add to that power which the Crown now has, the power of abandoning any portion of the lands taken from the claimant.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Up to the time of settlement.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes. I am not dealing with that. I am dealing now with the future and not referring to past transactions. The hon. gentleman talks as though the land owner's rights were all taken from him, as though he would have no damages for the harm actually done. What is the real effect of this provision? That when the judge comes to assess the damages done to the land owner, he treats the land which the government have offered to transfer to the land owner as representing its value in cash. Instead of compensating the land owner by giving him $14,000, the judge says, "Here is $8,000 cash, and I value the land which the government proposes to transfer to you at $6,000."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You force upon him land which he does not want.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Why should the government be forced to take land they do not want? Why should the mill owner be obliged to accept a public work which will give him access to his land? The hon. gentleman never opened his lips when that bill, now an Act upon the statute-book, was before the House to condemn the principle, nor did any other gentleman on that side of the House. This bill is simply extending the same principle a little further. It does not extend the principle, but it extends the operation of the principle a little further. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken in saying that this particular clause depends upon the bill which failed to pass yesterday. Not at all. If the hon. gentleman will look at this third clause of the bill, he will see that it is a clause proposed to be substituted for the third section of the Exchequer Court Act. The bill which we discussed yesterday was one which proposed to amend the Expropriation Act, which is a totally different Act; and this clause has no more connection with the clauses of the bill which was before us yesterday than the clause in the Exchequer Court Act, as we have it on the statute-book, with the Act respecting the expropriation of land. This bill would give the Exchequer Court the right in future cases to deal with that matter. If the committee in their wisdom think it would not be well that that power should be extended to past transactions they can strike out the fourth clause of the bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have listened with a good deal of attention to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Justice, and also to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Halifax. It may be from my stupidity, but I was at a loss to know why we had such a long dissertation upon the question involved in the remarks of the Minister of Justice, from the simple fact that he argued upon a point which is not involved in this or the other law. The law, as it stands on the statute-book, as already read by the hon. gentleman from Calgary, gives the minister all the power that he argued for some fifteen or twenty minutes that he was entitled to. There is every power given in the present Expropriation Act for the taking of any lands or easements that are necessary for the carrying on of public works and for the abandonment of the easements, which he has taken, or whatever they may be, after the work is completed. The question involved in this bill is, to my mind, very simple. Take the case of the mill to which my hon. friend has referred, and which the hon. member from Halifax has very learnedly expounded; he asks the question, why should the government be compelled to take land which it does not require any more than the owner of the mill? How did the government become possessed of the land which lies in front of that man's mill and which would interfere with the approach to the mill, should they carry out their present improvements and keep the land? Is it through the stupidity of some engineers who made the survey, that the government, under the survey, expropriated the land which lies at the front of this man's mill, and thus, to his mind, destroyed its value?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That work was undertaken in my hon. friend's time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It matters not when it was done, but how did the government become possessed of this land the expropriation of which the mill owner says is going to destroy the mill property? What if it were done by the engineers of the late government, and I know that engineers often get ministers into trouble by the reckless manner in which they go and take possession of a man's property without regard to the feelings or the interests of the party, knowing the government is at their back, and that the government will have to pay for any mistakes occurring through their recklessness or stupidity. But does it follow that because the government takes possession of land under the law, and it is expropriated by the department under the law, that you should afterwards be in a position to say to the owner of the property: "You must take it back, and I will give you some other property so that you can enter by the back door." That is really the position. You have this land and have had it for some time, you must have had it for years if it was expropriated by the late government. It must have been in the possession of the present government for a number of years, and now, under this bill, the government want to give this man in exchange for the land they have taken, some other land that he does not require, and they claim that it will answer his purpose. The only equitable point in the whole argument is that they say they are prepared to compensate him. We say, you have taken a man's property. If you do not want it, sell it. Whether he is entitled to the full value of the mill or not, I do not know. If he is, that is through the action of the government, and they should suffer by it. The hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Power) argues that this bill is not a corollary of the bill we had before the House yesterday. When the bills were introduced, it was distinctly understood by the members of the Senate that the first bill was to extend the powers of expropriation by the government, and to enable them, after the expropriation had taken place, to give portions of it back, and also, to enable them to expropriate for a limited time and a limited portion of a man's property; and that after they had given it back, if they desired to give it back, the court should decide what compensation should be paid; and this bill followed the other to give the Exchequer Court judge the power to carry out the provision of the first bill, which was defeated last night. If that be not the case, what is the meaning of the language, in the addition, which has been made in this clause? After giving power to deal with the works, as they exist now under the law, these words are added:

> Or by the abandonment of any portion of the lands taken from the claimant, or by the grant to him of any land or easement.

That is a provision to enable the government to abandon a portion of the property which they had expropriated and to exchange one property for another, a power that they had not before. Now, does it give the Exchequer Court judge, without the passage of the bill which was before the Senate yesterday, the power to deal with questions of this kind, or does the giving of the power to the Exchequer Court to deal with questions of abandonment, give the right to the government to abandon lands, which they did not have before.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—He said so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a question which even laymen like myself would differ upon, and I have grave doubts as to what position a judge would take on a question of that kind. Some judges would probably take the view that has been enunciated to-day by the hon. Minister of Justice, other judges would take what to my mind would be a common sense view of it; that is, that while it gives them the power to deal with a question of compensation, they would before doing so, refer to the Expropriation Act and ask themselves the question whether the government have any power, under that Act, to do what they have asked the Exchequer Court judge to do. Then you go on a little further and you say that this can be done on the trial, or before judgment, so that a case may be in court to-day, and may have been there for months, and until that judgment is given, the government have the power, if the hon. minister's interpretation of the clause be correct, to do precisely what the Senate said yesterday should not be done. I do not desire to prolong the discussion further than to say this clause contains the same principle that the Senate rejected last night. The hon. Minister of Justice says that we did not consider it. We rejected it by voting for a motion which absolutely killed the whole bill. The bill was designedly killed, the committee having risen without reporting. It was done designedly—it was not done through any ignorance on the part of the senator who made that motion, or on the part of those who voted for it. They knew when they voted for that motion that it was actually defeating the whole bill; and we have the question revived here to-day in another measure, and if the Senate is consistent in what it did yesterday, it should reject the clause. I move that the clause be stricken out of the bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hon. gentlemen have taken an extraordinary position both in regard to the bill of yesterday and this bill. My hon. friend yesterday, although not opposing the other bill in committee—if I remember correctly, he said he rather agreed with the principle of the bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But took exception to its applying to past transactions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I said that was one of the objections. My hon. friend is confounding what I said. I said, when he introduced the bill, from the slight explanation he gave, I was rather in favour of it, but when I read it, I found I could not support it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What the hon. gentleman supposed was in the bill which induced him to favour it on first impression, it is difficult to say. Yesterday, the bill had been read the second time. It stood for consideration in committee. The House had ordered it to be considered in committee. The House went into committee on the subject, and one hon. gentleman moved the rejection of the second clause of the bill, the clause which enabled the government to acquire a less interest than the fee in land they might require to take temporarily for the public service. That was the clause which was considered and rejected in the bill yesterday. That bill is not now before the House, and it is not necessary to discuss it. In fact, hon. gentlemen know that it is irregular to discuss it on the consideration of this bill. This is a bill to amend the Exchequer Court Act and to enable the Exchequer Court to do justice, and it gives a larger measure of authority than the court now possesses, for the purpose of adjusting any difference that may exist between an individual having a claim against the Crown for lands or property expropriated and the Crown itself. That is what this bill proposes. One hon. gentleman says that railways have not such extensive powers as it is proposed to confer by this bill, and he referred to a decision that has been given in England with respect to the exercise of power by a railway corporation. I do not know what great analogy there is between a railway corporation that is pursuing its course in the interest of a few corporators—in the interest of a very limited number of the community—and a government that is exercising its powers in the interest of the whole community, and in the discharge of those powers is under the supervision of this House and of the House elected by the people. Let me take a case. My hon. friend says, "Why should a mill owner or any other party whose property has been taken in part by the government be compelled to accept some other property?" But why should he not, if it is adjoining his own property? Mr. Jones or Mr. Smith has land and he does not want to part with the land at all. But you expropriate his land, nevertheless, and you undertake to give him money—of which it may be that he has abundance already and does not want to be troubled with the inconvenience of investment—for his lands whether he wants to part with them or not. Well, if you take the whole property and compel him to accept what he does not want in place of the property which he does want, where is the injustice or wrong done in taking a limited interest in the property, or a small interest, and to give him compensation as the law provides under a judge sworn to administer the law fairly. Where is the injustice, I say, in requiring him to accept compensation for that lesser interest? Take the case of the mill owner I have mentioned. Here is a canal running close to a mill, not interfering with its road but interfering with a larger area on which customers may turn about, and he comes to the government and says: My turning ground has been injured; people who come to the mill with a team cannot turn without inconvenience, and I want you to do what? I want you to take the mill, for which the government has no use and to accept that at a high figure, as in all those cases, and if you do not do that, I am ruined. Is he ruined if you give him other land which the court says is of equal value?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—There must be evidence to prove the value of the property.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, but you give him other land which will prevent the damage which would otherwise be sustained.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would the court, in view of the fact of evidence establishing that he could acquire other lands for turning grounds, compel the government to take the mill? I submit not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says he submits not, but the damage has been done and the Crown, in the trial of the case, ought to be in a position to say "Here we tender you this property; and it is for the court to say whether it is sufficient compensation or not." Let me take this case: supposing I go to an insurance company and insure my house, I insure it for a certain sum of money, and it is burned down. You give to the insurance company the liberty to rebuild for me. You do not apply to the company the doctrine which the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) mentioned here awhile ago, when he said it would be a monstrous injustice to compel a man to take property in lieu of that which had been taken from him. You do that in the very fact that you empower the insurance company to rebuild for a man instead of paying him the money.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—But in this case he would not rebuild on the same ground.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not of the slightest consequence. The question is, is the party adequately compensated for the injury that has been done him, and does he require further compensation of which we permit the court to be the judge?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—We have been told that it is irregular to refer to the discussion of a bill, or the bill itself, which was discussed here yesterday. The one is so much the complement of the other that I do not see very well how we can discuss this measure without reference to the proposed amendment to the Expropriation Act. I confess, myself, I saw no objection to the first clause of that bill. It proposed to expropriate a man's property for a certain period, and that being so he knew where he was exactly, and I could not see that there was any injustice likely to be done in that way. The other clause which has been referred to several times, I certainly saw very great objection to, because it appeared to me the effect of it would be simply this: under it you could expropriate a man's land in some public work, retain it for an indefinite time, and then abandon any portion of it upon the plea that it is not required, and the owner is compelled to accept this "reinvestment" as part compensation for the damage he has sustained. It seems to me that, on the face of it, it is a very unjust enactment, because a man's property might be very seriously injured by a temporary occupation of it, and what he might have to take back under changed circumstances might be very much decreased in value. Then again the clause to which I had the strongest objection was making any legislation of this kind apply to cases which are at present before the courts. With respect to the clause in this present bill, I am not perhaps lawyer enough to understand it properly, but I can hardly understand, after what took place yesterday in the loss of the Expropriation Bill, how the Court of Exchequer could act upon this clause which it is proposed to insert as an amendment in the old Act and adjudicate for the giving back to a man a portion of his land after it had been expropriated. Would the court have authority to do this, seeing that the Expropriation Bill, which was intended to give the government that power, was lost? I cannot see how the Exchequer Court could exercise that power. Much of my objection to the bill would be removed if in any case where a man's property was taken for the requirements of the government, instead of their being allowed by the third clause of the Expropriation Act almost any length of time to say whether they require the whole of a man's property or not, the question was settled within a specified limited time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I quite agree to that.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—So that a man could know what he was dealing with and what he had to look forward to. There is where the injustice seems to arise in the wording of the Expropriation Act. The government might leave the question open for years, and in that way work a very great injustice. If parties whose land was being expropriated knew exactly what the government proposed to take, and it was so specified in filing the notice, as in the case provided for by the first section of the Expropriation Act, for a temporary occupation only, one of the great objections to the bill would be removed, and providing, of course, that its application to cases now before the court was also struck out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman from Toronto is no doubt right in saying that the whole subject of expropriation is open for discussion, because, naturally, the important point of this bill is the expropriation and in connection with that I may say, in Canada we have carried the principle of expropriation very much further than it is in England. We have greater necessity for it. Our railways, canals and public works are, of course, far more numerous and extensive than England's, and then the land is held in much higher estimation in England than in Canada. It has cost some railway companies a couple of thousand pounds to get an Act through Parliament, simply because some party whose lands it was to pass through objected to it. It has never been an objection in Canada, a railway coming through a farm or orchard. We have struck that away long ago, because the necessities of the country demanded it, and the principle of expropriation has been carried to a far greater extent in Canada than in England. In my judgment the whole standard in estimating this should be: Did the Crown in the first instance specify what it proposed to do? I do not think, after the Crown has served a notice, that the Crown ought to be permitted before judgment to change its view. That is perfectly clear. The party ought to be fully advised at the very first step. I suggested yesterday that the language should be made specific in filing the notice in the registry office, that the party whose property was to be attached was to know what was to be done, and the judge should be fully possessed of the greatest extent of the injury the Crown could do the property, and no doubt the court will say if that term of three or five years you can deteriorate the value of the property to a certain extent, and the award the man should be liable for would be the full extent to which that property could be injured. There is no doubt it is the introduction of a very novel principle that in taking a man's property you will pay him so much in land and so much in money. It is rather a shock, because it is a new principle. I have never known it to be introduced before.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We do it in Ontario with regard to roads.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but you take the road.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The government may take the best part of a man's land and return the balance.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The taking of a road is not analogous at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I admit that. It is a public road. I take the case now that is being discussed. I do not know the facts at all, and it is therefore only a hypothetical case. Take the mill owner, whose land around the mill has been injured by the construction of the canal. A considerable area may be taken that his customers use for turning their wagons on. The mill and the land are worth $20,000. The Crown owns property adjoining the mill, and makes this offer: We will pay three thousand dollars, and we will give you this piece of land that we estimate at $1,000. If it is adjoining the mill it may be a convenience to the mill. If it is not adjoining it is no use to him, and therefore the judge will not estimate it as worth anything. Under these circumstances, there ought not to be opposition to the clause. It is entirely a question for the judge. The judge may say, "I do not attach any value to that land for the purposes of this man's mill, and therefore it would not amount to anything." It is purely a question of damages that has to be arrived at by the tribunal before which the matter is to be discussed.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) — I think the question of the mill is far fetched. You may take a case more in point in this matter. Supposing I have a public work and have to purchase a piece of land to carry on that work, and the government destroy my interest in that work, and after that they expropriate my land and apply part of my land and material to their own use, after destroying my work, and afterwards they throw back the useless part of the land on my hands. That is where the monstrous part of this bill comes in, and it is a principle that this House will never consent to. If this applied only to cases to come up in the future, it would be a different thing, but ex post facto legislation like this is objectionable. There is in the mind of every hon. gentleman a special case, and if that had not arisen perhaps this bill would not have come into Parliament at all. We cannot divest ourselves of the idea that this bill is intended to cover a special case. The Minister of Justice should withdraw the bill altogether and remodel it if it is to pass this House at all.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It is with a good deal of reluctance that I rise to discuss this question. I have listened with a great deal of interest, as well as attention, to the able arguments that have been addressed to the House during the discussion of this bill, and I have tried to form an opinion as the discussion proceeded. It seems to me unfortunate that this bill, whose object is entirely different, has to be discussed in the shadow of the bill which was practically rejected yesterday. In order to arrive at a proper view of this measure, we should utterly put aside from our minds the law of expropriation. This bill has nothing to do with expropriation. The law on that subject has been on the statute-book for some years, and is well understood, and if this bill passes into law it cannot enlarge or abridge one iota the power that the government now has under the law as it has stood for some time.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What about the payment?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It gives the power to abandon.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I hope the hon. gentleman will hear me and correct me afterwards. This is simply a bill providing for a further amendment to the Exchequer Court Act. The law was amended in 1889, as I understand it, and by that amendment certain rules and orders were enacted for laying down the principles by which the Exchequer Court should be guided in deciding upon cases that came before it under that Act. There are several rules laid down. Hon. gentlemen no doubt are familiar with them, and therefore I shall not detain the committee in discussing them, but this bill which we are discussing to-day is a bill further to amend that Act. And in what respect? Section 3 of that Act is simply a rule for adjudicating upon claims arising upon lands and properties that had been lawfully and properly expropriated. What does rule 3, which it is proposed by this bill to repeal and to substitute another rule for it, say? There is not so much difference in the rule which it is proposed to substitute, except that it enlarges the powers of the judge. It simply enlarges the present power of the judge. I would fail to understand the force of any argument, if I were an Exchequer Court judge, why that power should not be enlarged, if in the opinion of that judge, having heard all the evidence, he thought he ought to exercise it. The passing of the bill before the House will not compel the judge to act upon it if in his sound judgment and discretion he thinks it would be an injustice to do so. It gives him a larger discretion, a larger power, but that larger discretion and larger power will be exercised or not exercised according to the force that the evidence and the arguments addressed upon that evidence make upon his mind. No injustice can possibly arise from the repealing of that rule and substituting a larger rule—a rule that would give the judge more discretion, a larger power, which according to my view as a lawyer every judge ought to have.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Read that rule.

Hon. Mr. KERR—The head note is "a further rule" I mentioned that there were several rules here in the Act of 1889 and this says "further rule." It is rule 3 and it is a section of the Act:

If the injury to any land or property alleged to be injuriously affected by the construction of any public work may be removed wholly or in part by any alteration in or addition to any such public work, or by the construction of any additional work, and the Crown by its pleadings or on the trial undertakes to make such alteration or addition or to construct such work the damages shall, so far as the future is concerned be assessed in view of such undertaking, and the court shall declare that in addition to any damages awarded the claimant is entitled to have such alteration or addition made or such work constructed.

I venture to say that this House would not for a moment hesitate to give that larger power had it not been for the unfortunate circumstance that there was a bill before us further to amend the expropriation law, and this bill is suffering, not for its own sins, but for the alleged sins of the bill that was before us yesterday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KERR—And it ought not to suffer for that reason. Let each one answer for its own sins. If the other bill sinned, why grievously hath it suffered for it. If this bill hath sinned, or proposes to get an opportunity to sin, let it suffer likewise; but, for the life of me—and I say it with all frankness, and I say as one accustomed for a great many years to weigh statutes and consider them, to consider language embodied in statutes—I have no hesitation in saying that this House would be perfectly safe and would not take away nor abridge any man's rights, according to my view, by enlarging that rule and giving the court power to give the subject, the litigant, the suitor, justice. The suitor cannot have his rights taken away, because there is the judge, the man selected for that very purpose, to protect his rights, as well as the rights of the Crown or the rights of the government. The government are simply trustees for the people, and in discussing these measures, I know hon. gentlemen will consider that there are two parties to all these cases. There is the subject or the private party, who is the litigant. We must protect his interest, but we must, at the same time, not forget the public interest, and that is what I think this bill is aiming at, to do no injustice but to give the judge an opportunity to do justice all round. The bill that is proposed is simply to abrogate or to repeal that rule No. 3, and in lieu thereof to substitute this new rule 3 in the Act further to amend the Exchequer Court Act, by enlarging it somewhat. I do not propose to make a long argument on this matter, because, to my mind, it seems absolutely and perfectly clear.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What is the enlargement?

Hon. Mr. KERR—The hon. gentleman has the bill.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I know.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—How about the power to abandon land and throw it back into a person's hands.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I will answer that in this way, that is a matter entirely for the judge, and if I were a judge and saw that the government were proposing to abandon, I would feel it my duty to say, "If that property is taken back it must be taken back at a large reduction in price, and I shall award a sum sufficient to indemnify him against that." Any judge would do that. In other words, this section, according to my view, is simply to enlarge the powers of the judge and to lay down distinctly the rule by which he shall assess the damages.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is to enlarge the powers of the Crown, not the judge, because the owner is bound to accept the abandonment.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I do not see it as he does.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is to say it is not discretionary with the judge to say whether the man shall accept the abandonment. It is obligatory upon him to accept the abandonment.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It is obligatory upon him to accept the abandonment on certain conditions.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If I understand the case, it is precisely what the hon. gentleman says it is—to enlarge the rule or the power to deal with certain questions by the judge. But if the Crown, under the present law, has no power to abandon a part of the land, could they under the law abandon it, so that it would be a legal abandonment, and then go to the court and ask the judge to adjudicate upon that question?

Hon. Mr. KERR—If they have no power now, they will not have any under this bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes; but take a case of this kind, where they abandoned a limited portion of a property, and then went into court and the court said they had no power, would this measure give the court power to adjudicate upon that act of the government?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think the court said that.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I am discussing this matter, and I have no case before my mind.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have given you a case.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I am discussing it as a matter of principle entirely, and I am glad indeed that I do not happen to know of any case it would affect injuriously or otherwise. There is no doubt, the more hon. gentlemen consider it the more they will see that this is simply a rule which has nothing to do with expropriation, and it simply enlarges the power of the judge in assessing damages.

Hon. Mr. MACDONAD (B.C.)—Read lines 31 and 32 of the Act. It gives the government power to enter new pleadings any time before judgment and to abandon.

Hon. Mr. KERR—If the judge thought it ought to be done, I cannot see any reason why the judge should not be at liberty to admit that if the evidence and justice required it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The word "before judgment" are struck out. It is "on or before the trial."

Hon. Mr. KERR—We are practically setting ourselves up as Exchequer Court judges.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Oh, no. All the laws of the country are made by Parliament for the judges.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I understand that. I rise not to enlarge but to try, if I can, to throw the minds of the hon. gentlemen beyond the law of expropriation. This has nothing to do with the law of expropriation, that has been settled for many years. The bill before the House yesterday has nothing at all to do with this bill, and I have no doubt if this bill had been before this House, and that bill which was rejected yesterday had not been brought up, it would not have taken ten minutes to have passed this bill. The trouble is that one has to follow in the shadow and suffer for the supposed shadow.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I asked the minister yesterday if land expropriated some time ago could be abandoned under this bill, and the hon. minister said that the bill gave them power to do that, and that altered the whole case. The former bill did not give the power to abandon, but gave the power to adjust and award damages. But this bill gives power to abandon land expropriated years ago.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I did not understand it that way.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not propose to add very much to what has been said. I say that if the government of this country desire to take people's property in order to use that property for the good of the country, they should pay for it, and pay in cash, and not in barter, by giving land back which people do not want. My hon. friend from Cobourg (Mr. Kerr) is discussing this on principle, he says. We are all discussing it on principle. I do not suppose my hon. friend meant to say that other people were not discussing it on principle. I say the government should pay in cash for the land they require. My hon. friend says there is no connection between the bill rejected yesterday and the bill under consideration. The one was for expropriation and the other for compensation. How can you part the two. They are intimately connected together, because you expropriate people's land under the one bill and this bill defines the powers the judge of the Exchequer Court has in fixing the amount of payment for that property. They are so close together that you cannot sever them, and yet my hon. friend says they have nothing to do with each other. I cannot understand it that way, and I do not see how any body can disconnect them. Of course, the government will say when they take land at a man's front door that they will give him land at his back door. The mill owner who has been referred to, has, at a great deal of trouble, erected his mill to do business, and the government will have to pay the price of the mill. Let them pay him in cash. He cannot make this government pay any more than the value of the property they have taken, and the man should have it. If they do not want the mill they can sell it to somebody else. If they destroy his property they should pay for it, and the government of this country is able to pay for it. It should not be the duty of 5,000,000 people to take one man's property and not pay for it. That is the way I look at the matter. For that reason I will have much pleasure in supporting the motion made by the hon. leader of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I ask my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, to look at the bill and in line 32 of this clause, if I take out the words "before judgment" will it not remove the objection?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I am opposed to the whole principle involved in the bill of empowering the government to take a man's property and to hand it back if they choose. The suggested amendment would not affect it further than enabling you to do precisely what you asked to do, and if the argument of the hon. gentleman from Cobourg (Mr. Kerr) be correct, that would be useless, because the bill gives you no power.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That will depend upon future legislation. I propose to take out the words "before judgment" and to insert in section 4 "Section 3 of this Act shall, in assessing future damages, apply to claims in respect of damage to property heretofore as well as hereafter injuriously affected."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the intention in putting in the words "before judgment?" Whatever you do you must necessarily do before judgment, because the judgment settles it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It indicates you might do it after trial and before judgment.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—If the bill is to be amended it should read "lands to be taken" not "lands taken."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see in principle, as I mentioned before, supposing the lands are taken a month ago, and the question as to the value of those lands or as to the character of the damage done to them has not been dealt with, surely there is no difference in principle, and no reason why they should not come under the provisions of this bill as much as lands taken to-morrow. My hon. friend will see that what he has in his mind has really no applicability to this bill at all. I think that when a case is argued all the propositions up to that time ought to be before the judge, and I do not propose to ask on behalf of the Crown that there should, after the case has been argued, be any further change on the part of the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But you have abandoned in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Then you do not propose that the case shall be adjudicated upon in any specified time?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I am quite ready to consider any proposition. My hon. friend will know that sometimes it is very difficult to fix a specified time within which action shall be taken, because occasionally a matter may be in negotiation for a considerable time. I am quite ready to agree to any proposition that can be reasonably accepted and practically worked out.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I am not prepared, on the spur of the moment, to suggest anything of that kind.

The committee divided on the amendment, which was carried on the following division:

Yeas, 19; nays, 13.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the committee rise.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman move that the committee rise without reporting?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I do.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—All right, then you kill your bill.

The motion was agreed to.

DOWDING DIVORCE BILL.

The Order of the Day being called:

Second reading Bill (E) "An Act for the relief of Annie Inkson Dowding."

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The two divorce bills which are on the paper to-day for second reading cannot be considered until the report of the committee is adopted, and and I suggest that the two reports of the Divorce Committee be considered now, and then I shall be able to go on with the second readings. They have been on the paper a long time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have to be very particular in observing the rules with respect to divorce bills, and I think they will have to follow the regular course.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are the only class of bills we are likely to get through.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—They have been delayed by the adjournment, and I think if we can facilitate them we should do so. It is a great wrong that these bills should be blocked. These people have come here and paid their money. I move that these bills be placed at the end of the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I would like to know what is the objection raised against them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The report has not been adopted.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—They stand upon the Order Paper for adoption to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They cannot be taken out of their order.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Let the reports be adopted and then take the second readings.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman can ask the consent of the House to refer back the two bills after the reports are adopted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They will stand for the present.

The two orders of the day were allowed to stand.

NAVIGABLE WATERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (19) "An Act to amend the Act respecting certain works constructed in or over navigable waters." He said:—The hon. gentleman from British Columbia moved the second reading of this bill to push it along, but had not charge of the bill. It is simply amending section 6 of the Act, and reads as follows:—

6. The Governor in Council may approve of any work constructed prior to the first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine, and of the site and plans of such work, and any local authority, company or person may proceed in such manner as the Minister of Public Works directs to obtain such approval.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Is there a necessity for the bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If an application is made to the Minister of Public Works, how can any legal question arise?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It affects works which have been built in a harbour. The application had been made, and this simply provides for a case in Kingston. It was introduced in the Commons by Mr. Britton.

The motion was agreed to, and the bil was read the second time.

EDMONTON AND SLAVE LAKE RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (35) "An Act to incorporate the Edmonton and Slave Lake Railway Co."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman, if he expects the Senate to read this bill a second time, should give the House some reason why a road in such a region should be constructed. Slave Lake is out of the reach of ordinary traffic, and we had a great deal of difficulty, as hon. gentlemen will remember, with former bills which went beyond the Arctic Circle. The hon. gentleman should give us some reason to suppose that the people who are taking hold of this undertaking possess means and are prepared to put it through, and that the passing of the bill will be of some advantage to this country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And to those who live in that section of the country.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I merely took charge of the bill for somebody else and know very little about it, but the bill is a simple one and I find in the first clause the names of the following gentlemen :

The Honourable John Costigan, John W. McRea, E. C. Whitney, W. J. Poupore, George Goodwin, Michael P. Davis, W. C. Edwards and F. X. St. Jacques, of the city of Ottawa, in the province of Ontario; Frederick H. Hale, of Woodstock, and James Robinson of Newcastle, both in the province of New Brunswick; and H. J. Beemer, of the city of Quebec.

As far as that is concerned, it is a pretty strong party of gentlemen, and they will be able to construct the road. I presume they will give the necessary information before the Railway Committee, and I have no further statement to make on the measure. I simply took charge of the bill. No one was responsible for it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is Mr. Blair's name not among the directors?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—No, his name is not here.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

BRITISH COLUMBIA SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (28) An Act respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Co."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman who has charge of the bill is not doing his duty when he does not explain it. My impression is that this company has been absorbed by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is at the instance of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that this bill has been introduced. It asks for time for the completion of certain branches that have already been authorized to be constructed, and, when constructed, will be part of their system.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THOMAS ROBERTSON RELIEF BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL, in the absence of the Hon. Mr. Cox, moved the second reading of the Bill (11) "An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of Thomas Robertson." He said :—It is a bill to enable Mr. Robertson to pay the necessary fee for the extension of his patent. It appears from the preamble that Mr. Robertson employed a lawyer to attend to the business. He died without paying the fee, and, consequently, when he asked to have the patent extended, it was refused by the department under the law. Hence the petition asked that he be permitted to pay the fee and have the patent extended.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

NIAGARA-WELLAND POWER COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM moved the second reading of Bill (67) "An Act respecting the Welland Power and Supply Canal Company (Limited), and to change its name to the Niagara-Welland Power Company (Limited)."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that the hon. gentleman from Monck should tell us a little more about his bill. This Welland Power and Supply Canal Company, if I remember rightly, was, when it first came here to apply for a charter opposed by the hon. gentleman from Monck.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman is mistaken altogether.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am sorry that I should have made a mistake in this instance. I know I have heard the hon. gentleman oppose very vigorously proposals to interfere with the Welland Canal. This bill proposes to give the company an extension of time, and I think the hon. gentleman should explain why they have not proceeded promptly.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—This bill was before the House on another occasion, and when the hon. gentleman said I abused it he is mistaken. I abused another bill very similar to this one. It was tapping the Welland Canal in the wrong place, which had a tendency to destroy the canal. That is what my hon. friend refers to. It is not necessary to explain the details of this bill. We can do that before the Railway Committee. I can say this, however, if they can succeed in their undertaking, and I believe they will, a great benefit will be conferred on the manufacturing industries of this country. The object is to get a water power from Lake Erie. They take Lake Erie as a mill pond, and if they can tunnel through the mountains so as to get down to Lake Ontario, it will be a great advantage to Canada. They have the surveys made. They are curtailed in their power to issue bonds. They can only issue bonds to 75 per cent of the subscribed stock. If I abused the bill before, one reason was I thought they were taking too much power. I said then I thought it was a scheme to rob the public, to "spoil the Egyptian." That is what perhaps my hon. friend refers to. I do not think this is a scheme of that kind. I can say to my hon. friend if he is not satisfied with this explanation I can give him more in the committee or on the third reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, 22nd May, 1899.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that when this House adjourns it do stand adjourned till Thursday next, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

GOLD INSPECTOR IN YUKON DISTRICT.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—In view of the answers which were given on Wednesday last by the hon. Secretary of State to the questions which I asked in reference to the appointment of H. H. Norwood to the position of Gold Inspector in the Yukon country, and as those answers are in direct opposition to information in my possession, and under the impression that it may perhaps be possible that the hon. Secretary of State may have been misinformed in the matter, I desire to give notice that on Thursday next I will move that an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that he will cause to be laid upon the table of the Senate the originals of all letters or other documents written to the minister or any official connected with the Department of the Interior, or to any member of the government, by H. H. Norwood the person appointed by the government to the position of Gold Inspector of the Yukon district.

BUSINESS OF PARLIAMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. WARK inquired of the Government:

If they have decided on any means by which the business of Parliament can be more equally divided between the two Houses; and if so, what changes in the present procedure have they decided on?

He said:—I propose calling your attention to a subject which was under the consideration of the Senate during the first session of the first Parliament of the Dominion. The subject was how the legislation might be most equally divided between the two Houses. A committee was appointed to consider the matter. Its report on the journals of 1868, page 260, states that a few years before a committee of the House of Lords had reported on the same subject without any result. The Senate committee suggested that as the legislation would be chiefly on government business, the government might divide it between the two Houses, but they did not foresee that while there were then five members of the government in the Senate who might have taken a large share of the business, the number would soon be reduced to two, and that it would be necessary to have the heads of the spending departments in the House of Commons; nor did they foresee that much business that ought to go to the local legislatures would find its way into this Parliament. Over thirty years have since passed and if the state of things then did not seem so urgent as to require immediate action, the state of things now calls loudly for a change, if such a change would do no more than to shorten the sessions.

For many years after confederation the sessions were quite short. When complaints began to be made that they were getting too long Sir John Macdonald said he always expected that the work of parliament would require sessions of ninety days. The following figures will show how far they have exceeded his expectations: The first parliament of five sessions, the sessions averaged 80 days. The third parliament of five sessions, the sessions averaged 72 days. The fourth parliament of four sessions, the sessions averaged 95 days. The fifth parliament of four sessions, the sessions averaged 118 days. The sixth parliament of four sessions, the sessions averaged 94 days, and the seventh parliament of six sessions, the sessions averaged 117 days. The Senate is composed of men well qualified and able and willing to discharge its duties as one of the branches of the legislature. Yet we cannot but regret that it is less popular than we could desire, and may not this be largely due to the way in which, from necessity, we are forced to spend, or I might rather say, to waste our time? I could not illustrate this better than by referring to last session. Parliament met on 3rd February. The Senate adjourned until the 7th, and spent from that till the 13th over the address. On the 16th and 17th committees were appointed and on the 18th, for want of anything to do, we adjourned again till the 8th March. This was the thirty-fourth day of the session and what valuable work had we to show for it? Up to this thirty-fourth day fifty-seven bills had been introduced into the House of Commons, a considerable number of which were private bills, which might have been first introduced and considered in the Senate and rendered an adjournment unnecessary, which might have served materially to shorten the session.

The present session is no improvement on the last. The debate on the address in answer to His Excellency's Speech was shorter: we have had two long adjournments and when we met at the end of the last we had reached the 63rd day of the session. Over two months had thus passed and with the exception of some attention given to three short government bills, it might be said that our work in legislation had scarcely begun, while over 100 bills had been introduced in the House of Commons. Now, it cannot be denied that this is a state of things calling loudly for a remedy. I do not suppose the government would care to provide a remedy and then assume the responsibility of carrying it out. If not, I would suggest that the work might be very satisfactorily done by a joint committee composed of a few members from each House to be clothed with the necessary authority to apply the remedy. Your honours will see that the existing state of things has arisen from leaving the promoters of private bills to select the Houses into which they wish their bills to be first introduced. Let this no longer be left optional with them. Let a rule be made that every bill must, in the first place, be laid before the joint committee which will require to keep well informed as to what House has most work before it and will send the promoter with his bill to the other House. He will then have to apply to a member of that House to bring in his bill. It ought to make no difference to him : he must appear before the committee of each House to explain his bill and furnish any information required, and it can matter little before which he attends first. Under this arrangement the Senate, having more leisure to devote to the work, would no doubt send the bills to the other House in so perfect a state that they would not find it necessary to spend much time over them and would have more to devote to other business. The government, if they have not already agreed on a better scheme, might undertake to bring about this arrangement between the two Houses, or the Senate might send a message to the other House and ask for a conference by which an arrangement might be made to mend the case and lead to a much needed improvement on our present system. I leave the matter in the hands of the Senate, or the government, to take whatever course may be thought best, unless there is some insuperable objection which I have not seen.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In congratulating my hon. friend, at his great age, on being able to present so clear and succinct a statement to the House, I am sure I express congratulations that are shared in by every hon. gentleman who is now present. (Applause.) I may say to my hon. friend that this subject is one to which I gave some consideration, along with my colleagues, last year and again this year; but my hon. friend knows that since last session several members of the government were away a great portion of the year as members of an important commission, that they returned, not long before Parliament was convened last March, and that one of the consequences of this was there was not a little of the minor business of Parliament on behalf of the government to put into shape after the session began. Under these circumstances, of course it was not possible to carry out the view of presenting a very considerable number of measures in this House, and some of the measures presented, the more important measures presented this session, necessarily were connected with the constitution of the House of Commons and could not be introduced in the Senate. The same may be said of the legislation of last session. We had before Parliament last session two or three very important government measures which affected the constitution of the House of Commons, or related to public expenditures, both of which were matters which properly pertained to the other chamber. Under these circumstances, it was not possible to bring much government business into the Senate. This session I have so far submitted to the consideration of the Senate bills which, although not voluminous or complicated, were measures of very considerable importance, connected as they would be with the administration of government. The one measure related to the preservation of public health and the protection of the health and lives of employees on public works, or on works in which the public were interested. That measure has received the sanction of the Senate, and has gone to the other House for its consideration. Two other measures, relating to the enlargement of the powers of the Exchequer Court and the powers of expropriation, have been before the Senate, and have not, as my hon. friend knows, been favourably considered, and the fate of those measures has not been such as to, perhaps, give the government a very great deal of encouragement to introduce measures into the Senate. However, I may say to my hon. friends that I am not wholly discouraged by the course they have taken. I trust that before the session is over they will see more clearly the public necessity for such legislation, and that they may have the opportunity of expressing their opinions again. It is not easy to say to the public, who are doing business with the two Houses, "You must introduce your measure into the Senate in the first instance." The members of the House of Commons are more closely in touch with the public than members of this House are, and the result of that is most people who are introducing measures calling for a decision go to those who represent them, and so, as a matter of course, the private legislation is introduced into the House of Commons in the first instance. It is perfectly true that, by the alteration of our rules, these measures could be submitted to some officer of Parliament who might say to which House the measure in the first instance should go, but after all there may be doubt as to the propriety of a course of that sort. Let me mention this: there are many measures that are brought before this House that have been considered with care by this House, and the committees of this House do very little more than consider the phraseology of those measures. There are no great and general principles involved that call for serious discussion or a great deal of consideration. At all events, no one in the Senate takes a very deep interest in them. No member's fate is in any way associated with the proposed measures. It may be that a considerable section of the community are interested in them—deeply interested—and so the representative of that community has a special interest in giving to the measures the most careful consideration, and so discusses them fully in the House of Commons and invites full discussion. I may say that it is well known to hon. gentlemen that the great mass of bills that come before this House referring to private legislation and the promotion of private interests, are scarcely discussed here at all. They will come to the House without much discussion, and it would not be to the advantage of this chamber that they should be fully and exhaustively discussed in the House of Commons and radical defects discovered in them after they had received our approbation. That being so, there is a great deal to be said in favour of the view that the Senate chamber, in respect to legislation, ought, in the main, to be considered a court of review, not to settle the principles of private measures so much as to consider whether the objects which the persons wish to attain are likely to be carried out as the bills now stand. Therefore, they are in most cases considered from that standpoint. That being so, it is to the advantage of this House and, I think, also to the advantage of Parliament, that the measures should receive very full consideration in the House of Commons before they are brought here for discussion. As long as this is done, we are acting upon a theory that this chamber is a chamber of review, and we undertake to discharge our duties specially from that standpoint. There is this also to be considered, that we cannot be expected, unless we are going to turn the Senate into a debating society, to occupy as much time in the consideration of public questions in the Senate chamber as is given to them by the people's representatives in the other chamber. A large portion of the time of the House of Commons is taken up with the discussion of taxation, with settling the ways and means by which the government of the country for the twelve months is to be carried on. These duties we have not to discuss at all, and so I do not think that the country expects us to give as much time to the discussion of the business that comes before us as is given in the House of Commons. If we did, we would require to give a great deal more time to the discussion of public measures than is given in the House of Commons, for more than half the time of that House is taken up with the discussion of the estimates and of the ways and means. That being so, it is not necessary that we should constantly find fault with ourselves because holidays are more frequent with us than they are in the other chamber. I am quite ready to give all the attention that is necessary to the consideration of public questions. There is a great deal to be said in favour of the views expressed by the hon. mover of this motion, and as the Senate discusses these questions from the standpoint of the public, as we are brought more directly in touch with the public, we will perhaps be disposed to take a more active interest in the discussion of private measures. As it is, although those measures are seldom discussed on the floor of the Senate, I think that they receive, on the whole, as careful consideration in the committees of the Senate as they do in the House of Commons, but, as I said before, they receive that attention and consideration from a somewhat different standpoint.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I would like to answer one observation which fell from the Minister of Justice, if I understood him correctly, and that was that in the Senate and in the committees of the Senate, they addressed themselves more to the correcting of phraseology and mere matters of form in the private bills. My experience has been entirely different. I have been a member of the Private Bills Committee and for many years chairman of the Banking Committee, and my experience is that the private bills which come before the committees of this Senate are not merely looked over to see whether the phraseology is correct, but the whole tenor of each bill is considered and discussed often at considerable length in committees. I have had the testimony of members of the House of Commons present at some of the meetings of our committees, that matters coming before them were much more thoroughly and carefully discussed than in many committees in the House of Commons. As far as my experience goes the Senate has discharged a very important and necessary duty.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think so.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Not merely in correcting the phraseology and wording of a bill, but in thoroughly examining its effects and the principle or the interests which may be concerned, Then, again, I do not think that we are all so very far removed and out of touch with those different constituencies, or districts, or whatever you choose to call them, which are supposed to be represented in this Senate. As far as the city of Toronto is concerned, and my own division, I am just as much in touch with the people there as one of the members for Toronto. I deny that we are standing aloof from our friends and have no interests or sympathies of that kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend's political life does not depend upon them.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I would like to add that I know that in very many instances private bills have been introduced in the House of Commons for the first time, by those who introduced them, under the delusion that they must necessarily go there before they come to this House. I have had that question asked me over and over again. I see no reason why a very large portion of the private bills legislation should not be brought into this House in the first instance. It would enable this Senate to do good work while they are still waiting for public measures from the House of Commons, and I do not see why that should not be done in the same way as in the Imperial Parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Has my hon. friend ever found, in his experience, that the Senate had not ample time to get through with the business coming up from the House of Commons?

Hon Mr. ALLAN—What I am more especially alluding to is the fact that over and over again we are kept here without any work before us, which is constantly turned to our disadvantage by the general public who think in that way we are of no use, when the fault does not really rest with us, but with the distribution of the work of the session.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That must always happen sometime or other during the session, for half the time of the House of Commons is taken up with the discussion of questions with which we have nothing to do.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—This question is certainly very interesting, but there are very few members to-day in this House, and, besides that fact, many of us on this side of the House could not hear the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Fredericton (Mr. Wark). I therefore move the adjournment of the debate in order that we may have an opportunity to read the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and perhaps others may also wish to take part in the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILROAD.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That in order to arrive at an intelligent opinion of the benefits likely to be derived by the country from the purchase, by the Dominion Government, of the Drummond County Railway, it is essential before effect be given to such purchase that the following information on the subject be laid on the Table of the Senate:—

1. The original contract entered into between the government and the proprietors of the Drummond County Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

2. The present contract or agreement entered into between the same persons or companies.

3. A statement of all moneys paid to the proprietors of said railways from the date of the non-ratification of the first contract to the 31st March, 1899.

4. An account of the earnings and working expenses of the Drummond County Railway from the time of its being first worked in connection with the International Railway to the 31st March, 1899.

5. And also, an account of the total amount of money paid the Grand Trunk Railway Company for station accommodation, running powers over its line, for bridge extension, or for any purpose whatever in connection with the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to Montreal.

And that an order do issue requesting the government to lay such information on the Table of the Senate.

He said:—I have moved this resolution for the purpose of placing the Senate in possession of such information as can be obtained before discussing the question of the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, and the lease which has been entered into between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It is not my purpose to discuss either of these branches of the subject just now, but in view of the action taken by the Senate upon this question previously, I think every member of the House desires that all the information possible, should be laid before us, in order that we would be enabled to deal with and more intelligently consider the question when it comes before this House again. It will be observed that I ask for the originals of the contracts and agreements entered into between the government and the two companies, and also for the present contracts or agreements, if there be any new ones, into which they have entered. My reasons for that are, to ascertain what concessions have been made by either of these companies to the government since the non-ratification of the agreement last session. I read with much interest, and with a great deal of care, the four-hour speech delivered by the Minister of Railways in the other House, and I must confess that I failed to find any information whatever in reference to these two questions, affecting as they do the finances of this country, which would lead me to the conclusion that no new arrangement had been made. In fact, I find but two references in the whole four hours speech to the question of the Drummond County Railway, one that it had been of great advantage to the trade of the country, financially, and the other that in securing that road they had done a great benefit to the country. Beyond that information I think there is scarcely anything in the whole speech other than a laudation of the manner in which the Minister of Railways has conducted the affairs of his department during the time he has held office. Immediately after reading it, I had every reason to suppose, considering the majority they had in the other House, that the agreement would be ratified in the House of Commons, as it was last year, and considering the action of this body upon that important question, I thought it was only reasonable for us to ask, particularly as we will be expected not to repeat what we did at the last session of Parliament, to have such information as would justify the Senate in ratifying the agreement which had been made. These are my sole reasons for placing this motion on the notice paper. I know it is said, as it has been said in another place, that the railway accounts are not kept in such a way as to enable the government to give a certain portion of the desired information. All I have to say on that point is this, if the accounts have not been kept in such a way as to enable the government to know whether the extension of the railway from the city of Quebec to Montreal is a paying concern and of such benefit to the country as we are led to suppose it has been and will be in the future, they should have been so kept. It is nonsense to tell ordinary business men that accounts cannot be kept in such a way as to give the information we require. We know there is scarcely any railway company—certainly no great corporation in the whole Dominion but has some leased lines on which it pays 40, sometimes 60 per cent of the gross earnings, usually 40 per cent, to the proprietors of the road. They must have a system by which they can ascertain exactly the amount that is earned by that railway, and if they have that, surely the Department of Railways and Canals can so keep their accounts as to give the same information to the public. I know from information that I have obtained that these facts can be given if those who are connected with the railway are set to work to prepare a statement of the information required.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no objection to the motion, although I do not think that the information asked for in the fourth paragraph can be given. Perhaps an estimate can be furnished, but my hon. friend will see, notwithstanding what he has said, that through traffic over this road, extending over a portion of the Intercolonial Railway, could not very well be divided into two parts, and the Drummond County Railway charged with one part and the other portion of the road charged with the other. The probability is that an approximate estimate might be made, but it would be a subject of very great inconvenience, I am informed, in book-keeping, and would entail a very great deal of trouble and expense, to undertake to make the business of the Drummond County Railway, which is now an essential part of the main line, and over which the through traffic necessarily passes each way, a matter of separate accounts. In fact, it would double the cost of book-keeping over the road without being, perhaps, in every instance, accurate, but all the information which can be furnished to my hon. friend will be given.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must accept what I can get, but I must dissent from the proposition laid down by the hon. gentleman. If it costs $10 for a passenger to go from Montreal to Halifax, that can be divided by mileage. If 100 tons of freight passing from Montreal to Halifax or to any station below Quebec, the same could be done; or if to Quebec itself, it could all be credited to that portion of the road. If it went 20 miles below Quebec it would be in proportion to the mileage. There can be no difficulty in getting the information if the government desires to furnish it.

WORKS OVER NAVIGABLE WATERS BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (19) "An Act to amend the Act respecting certain works constructed in or over navigable waters."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I took charge of this bill, as no one appeared to be responsible for it here. I think it is a matter which should be in charge of the government, in order to bring it properly before the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The bill is unobjectionable.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the introduction of bills of this kind there should be some explanation given to the House at the second reading, more particularly as the Minister of Justice has laid down the principle that in accepting the second reading of a bill we affirm the principle. Now, there is a principle involved in this little bill, although the only word that is added to the statute as it stands upon the statute-book is "heretofore." It affects navigable waters and as the hon. Minister of Justice has just said, it is an unobjectionable bill. It happens that I had a conversation with the hon. mover of the bill and agree with him on that point, but if it is understood that in consenting to the second reading we are affecting the principle of every bill introduced in the Senate, whether it be a bill originating here or in the House of Commons, then the member having charge of it should, at the first reading, explain what the intention and objects of the bill are; then we would have time to consider it between the time of its introduction and its going before a committee, so as to decide what course we should pursue. I throw out that suggestion, and I think I have done so a number of times before. When I occupied the position which my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Mills) now occupies, I laid down that proposition and I think it would be well to follow it now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition are a reflection on myself to some extent. In the absence of the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Mr. Macdonald) I took the liberty of moving the second reading of the bill, and at the time I called attention to the fact that the effect of the bill was to remove a doubt as to the meaning of the Act, that the object of this bill was to make it clear that this section applied to the construction of any work constructed prior to the 1st of March, 1899. If this bill did not become law, it might be contended that the powers given in this section would only apply to work constructed prior to a certain date.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I was not present at the second reading.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Are there any cases necessitating the passage of this legislation? I notice that it is more far-reaching than indicated by my hon. friend from Hastings (Sir Mackenzie Bowell). It proposes vesting a new power in the Governor in Council. Heretofore, to exercise that power it was necessary that some local authority, persons or corporations, should set in motion the Governor in Council. It now vests in the Governor in Council power to take certain steps.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, the only change is the word "heretofore."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) that there is a case. The case that gives rise to this bill is in the harbour of Kingston. A work has been constructed there. That work does not vest in the party and would not, without this provision, and very serious injustice would be done, and this legislation is intended to meet that case and any other case of like character.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

THE GOLD INSPECTOR OF YUKON DISTRICT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, the originals of all letters or other documents written to the minister or any official connected with the Department of the Interior, or to any member of the government, by H. H. Norwood, the person appointed by the government to the position of gold inspector in the Yukon district.

He said:—I make this motion under the explanations which I gave when I gave the notice. Since coming into the chamber, I have been informed by the hon. Minister of Justice that it is not customary or usual to produce the originals of such documents or letters, but certified copies. In that case, I wish these copies to be certified verbatim copies both of the diction and of the spelling of the letters and documents referred to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—All the copies that are brought down must be accurate or they are not copies, and I do not think that it is necessary to state that they are certified verbatim copies. No such motion has ever been made in this House before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But to accomplish the object which my hon. friend has in view, they must be verbatim copies, and if they are not he will not be enabled to establish the charge he has made.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If they are not verbatim they are not copies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the copying of the letters may be placed in the hands of clerks, and they may never consider the necessity of giving the exact diction or the exact spelling of the words. I think the hon. gentleman had better insist upon the motion as he has amended it.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I thought I had done so. That is what I intended, and the only thing that will satisfy the requisition of this motion. Otherwise my object fails altogether.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a suggestion that the department, or the minister who has the letters in charge, unless specially instructed, will act dishonestly. If the House chooses to make that declaration I cannot help it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No such suggestion or insinuation has been made.

The motion was agreed to as amended.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (L) "An Act respecting the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada."—(Mr. Ogilvie).

COBOURG, NORTHUMBERLAND AND PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (98) "An Act respecting the Cobourg, Northumberland and Pacific Railway Company." He said:—The hon. gentleman from Cobourg (Mr. Kerr) asked me to take charge of this bill in his absence. This railway company was incorporated in 1889, and the Act was amended in succeeding years, the last amendment being made in 1894. That charter has been allowed to lapse. This bill proposes to revive the charter of the company. The committee to whom it will be referred will see if it is such an organization as deserves to be revived.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

LA COMPAGNIE DU CHEMIN DE FER DE COLONISATION DU NORD BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER, in the absence of Mr. Landry, moved the second reading of Bill (29) "An Act to incorporate La Compagnie du Chemin du Fer de Colonisation du Nord.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentlemen will see that this bill relates to a railway which is wholly within the limits of the province of Quebec, and there is no declaration that it is for the general advantage of Canada. The bill had better stand.

The order was allowed to stand.

ARTHABASKA RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.), in the absence of Mr. Drummond, moved the second reading of Bill (46) "An Act to incorporate the Arthabaska Railway Company." He said:—This bill is to incorporate a company to build a branch from the Quebec Central Railway to the Intercolonial.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is not a revival?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—This is a new charter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is open to the same objection as the previous bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is a declaration in this bill that the work is for the general advantage of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I see there is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has been the practice to consider such objections in the Railway Committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not consider the declaration that the work is for the general advantage of Canada is a sufficient reason.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I presume, although a railway may be in a province entirely, it may be for the benefit of the whole country as well. Though it may be local in some ways, any such local work carried on in any part of the Dominion is for the benefit of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The principle laid down by the Railway Committee is that when an apparently local undertaking connects with a through railway, it is a sufficient justification for declaring it a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We might, on the same theory, obtain jurisdiction to incorporate a street railway running from some point to a railway station.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is municipal, more or less.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I never considered that that was a proper interpretation of the Act, but we have acted upon it for some years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has been the practice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the practice is well founded, then by the simple declaration that a work is for the general advantage of Canada, we can obtain jurisdiction over all local works, which I do not think was the intention of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—This branch railway is to connect the Quebec Central with the Intercolonial Railway.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Order of the Day being called:

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said:—I understand that we are to have before us a bill relating to the criminal law; and it will be more convenient if this matter is allowed to be discussed at the same time as the other bill. DRUMMOND COUNTY AND GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY CONTRACTS.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Might I suggest to my hon. friend the Secretary of State, that the papers submitted in connection with the Drummond County Railway should be all printed. There are only parts of them printed. Some of them are in writing and some typewritten. I think, as these papers are very important, that they all should be printed and distributed, so that the members could have an opportunity of consulting them. I refer to those papers which have been brought down with regard to the contracts with the Grand Trunk Railway and the Drummond County Railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If there are any members of the Printing Committee present they could call the attention of the committee to the matter and have the documents printed. That is the proper course.

USURY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill (J) "An Act respecting Usury." He said:—In the session of 1897 a bill was introduced by the then leader of this House, Sir Oliver Mowat, fixing a maximum rate of interest. Some agitation had taken place in the country, more especially in the province of Quebec, in consequence of the exposure of an exceptional case of usury. The case which had prompted the hon. Minister of Justice to propose this bill was one where a lender had loaned two hundred and fifty dollars to a party at five per cent per day. He sued for a sum amounting to thousands of dollars. In fact, the action had been taken for five thousand and some odd hundreds of dollars, though originally the amount owed was two hundred and fifty dollars. The bill asked this Parliament to fix a rate of interest upon all contracts, not to exceed eight per cent. It was quite radical and far reaching, in fact it aimed at restoring the old usury laws which had been wiped off our statutes in 1853. Apparently public opinion was not ripe for such a move. This chamber, at all events, was not, and the then Minister of Justice dropped nearly all the important clauses of his bill and in order to prevent the ignorant and inexperienced from being imposed upon, simply asked this Parliament to declare that all notes and negotiable instruments should bear on their face the annual rate of interest, so that people who borrowed would know what they were to pay twelve months after signing the document. The hope was then expressed that the measure would be sufficient to protect a certain class of borrowers. I am obliged to declare that, from my own experience of what prevails in Montreal, although that law may have to a certain extent protected some ignorant and inexperienced borrowers, it has not stopped in any degree the usurious transactions which daily come to light. I am speaking from what I have seen with my own eyes, and I tell this House that usurers in Montreal ply their trade at the very door of our court-house. They lend clerks, students and young men who are starting in the liberal professions. They do not stop at the door of our court-house. They enter it daily to obtain summonses in the name of Her Majesty the Queen in order to collect not only the principal but the interest which never runs under 60 per cent per year, and is generally 10 per cent per month, or 120 per cent per year; and when they obtain their judgment they again resort to law to press those people for payment and succeed in either getting it or forcing them out of employment, and eventually out of this country. We have in our province, the seizure in the hands of a third party, the saisie-arrêt after judgment, by which employers are obliged to go to the court-house and declare whether they owe anything to their employees; and though they may declare to-day that they owe nothing, if the usurer wants to harass his debtor he can seize the following week, and every week, until the employer, tired and harassed to a degree of exasperation, gets rid of his employee. If those usurers were content with waiting for business to come to them they would be still very obnoxious and their trade would not be any less objectionable, but they do not stop at that. They send out circulars to young men inviting them to come in and get money from them, that they will ask very few questions, will not go to their employer, or to their parents, and that they will lend a young man money on his own signature. On the 21st March last, the Daily Witness of Montreal, published the following:—

> Montreal is full of spider webs spun to trap the unwary. Among them is the short-loan agency, an institution whose bait too often proves a curse instead of a blessing. Neatly worded advertisements and circular letters invite those whom careless profligacy or cruel fate has made penniless to step in and help themselves to money. They get the money, but it is upon such terms as keeps them in the power of the money-lender until the very life-blood is sucked out of them. The araneida mercifully kills his victims outright; his human namesake holds him in the bondage of financial slavery. Once entangled in the meshes of the loan agent's web, escape is almost impossible. Flutter and struggle as they may, the victims are drawn tighter into the clutches of the voracious agents, to be released only when sapped of financial life and subsistance.
> There seems to be no adequate way of reaching the offenders by legal prosecution.

Our Montreal usurers generally ask for two signatures. With two signatures, a maker and an endorser, they generally feel that they will get back their money. If one sinks the other will float. They generally examine these chances, weigh the prospects of those young men, and when they lend their money feel quite sure that they will have a return of five or six hundred per cent on the amount advanced. As I have stated, it is our young men, in the full vigour of life, who are enticed into those offices. They are not men generally who are in very great distress and in need of money to tide over temporary difficulties. They are usually young men who are all the time in a stringent financial condition and who would do without the amount, as they are forced to before and after they make the loan, but who are enticed into borrowing money when they see that they can get it so easily, not knowing how hard it will be for them subsequently to get out of the hands of those unconscionable money lenders. Usurers declare that one of the reasons why they charge a high rate of interest is that they must make up for the losses which they meet when they encounter rogues. I do not doubt but that there are people who will get the better of the money lenders, but I may state that I know young men who were honest when they entered the offices of those money lenders, and who, when they left or stopped approaching them, had been made criminals through usury. I know of four young men—two of them notaries—who, within the last few years, having gone into the hands of these shavers, embezzled money to extricate themselves, and are to-day in the United States. A fifth one was not long ago sentenced to the penitentiary. They are weighted down by these unconscionable bargains that they have made, by those extortionate rates, and when an innocent party goes into their office to ask them if they could not place some money for them at five or six per cent, the temptation is too great, and they try to borrow the money to get out of the clutches of the people who have charged them 120 per cent per year. The result is that the young men suddenly leave for the States, or if the police officer can lay his hands upon them, he takes them to the penitentiary, as happened not a month ago in the city of Montreal. Young men who start in life with salaries of $25 or $30 per month, or others who enter liberal professions with no resources but a light heart and hopeful future, must feel discouraged when having borrowed $50 or $75, which probably they did not absolutely need, which perhaps, they could have dispensed with, they find themselves in a short time owing a few hundred dollars. I will just cite two cases which are at present on record in Montreal. First, the case of Demers vs. Voyer et al; the endorser gave his signature to the defendant upon two notes, one of $100 and another one of $80. When he was brought face to face with the seizure of his salary, he had to pay within eight months of the date he signed those two notes, the sum of $430. I have still a worse case to submit. There is a young man in the press gallery of the House of Commons to-day, who originally borrowed from the same man Demers, of Montreal, $75. That was five or six years ago. Judgment was taken against him. Interest and costs were piled on him. He was a young beginner at the time. He decided to renew his indebtedness to obtain delay, and signed a note for $300, and he finds to-day, that unless he strikes a bonanza, he is hopelessly insolvent. For a borrowed sum of $75 he now owes $1,896.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Was he a journalist?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—He was an advocate and is now a journalist. He found when he undertook to conduct a case that his costs were seized in advance. These are typical cases which come to our knowledge every week through our law courts in the city of Montreal and throughout the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It is pretty hard to protect such men.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The public press of Montreal have agitated for some remedial legislation. The Chamber of Commerce of Montreal, presided over by a former member of this House, Hon. Mr. Desjardins, passed a resolution on the 12th of April last asking, in view of the social plague of usury which appears openly at the surface, in Montreal, that a law against usurers should be passed, and the demand was made upon myself to introduce such legislation into this chamber. This plague is not simply one which prevails within our borders. In Great Britain the disease is more widespread. Wealth flowing abundantly from one generation to the other, the usurer is on the alert to divert a share towards himself. A gentleman named Thos. Garrow within a few years has demonstrated that it is time some restrictive legislation should be passed. Mr. Garrow went fully into the means employed by those people to gather in victims and grind them to death, and after exposing them thoroughly in the press, and even founding banking institutions to come to the rescue of people needing money but who could not go to the regularly constituted banks, got the House of Commons to appoint a committee to inquire into the system of usury prevailing in Great Britain. I have before me the report of that commission, which covers many hundred pages, the result of its sittings during the sessions of 1897 and 1898. They reported in favour of a bill which, I understand, has passed its third reading in the House of Lords and is now before the House of Commons. They have heard witnesses, including judges, solicitors, barristers, usurers and their victims, and all agree, with the exception naturally of the usurers, as to the great necessity for some legislation to check the practices which were exposed before this commission. The witnesses who had experience of usury in England were most pronounced upon the fact that usury was not only a danger, but that money lending at high rates had not, to their knowledge, helped any one citizen. It had not come within their knowledge that a party applying to these money lenders for help had been benefited, and they all concluded in favour of wiping out this system of money lending. Sir George Lewis had no hesitation in saying that they are a vermin of the worst kind which should be exterminated, and he adds:

> The effect of this money lending by all these people in London, is that young men are encouraged to bet, because they know they can go to the money lender next morning and probably raise the money. The money lender will give them money, not that he thinks the debtor can pay, but because his father can pay, or his relations can pay; and most of the money is squeezed out of the relations in that way.
>
> I entirely deny that the community or society requires the existence of these money lenders; they have all amassed and do amass considerable fortunes out of the public. I have never seen one instance in forty-two years' practice where a borrower has obtained any advantage by borrowing money.

Mr. Justice Owen makes a similar statement:

> You would wish to render such loans impossible? Certainly, a man had better get money elsewhere than do that. It is only staving off the evil day and bringing trouble upon himself. In the case of a man wanting to get clothes to get a situation or something like that? If the man is a decent man there is always somebody who will do that for him. If he is a man who wants to go into domestic service there is always somebody who will make some advance to him, I think, and the worst thing a man of that class can do is to get into the hands of a money lender. My experience is that when he once gets into them he never gets out of them again.

I could give the opinion of Sir James Mathew and Sir Henry Hawkins, who say that in order to check money lending they would throw every legitimate impediment in the way. I stated that one of the usurers who was examined by the commission, declared that they had to deal with a great number of rogues, who used all means possible to get money from them, and it was one of the reasons why they had to charge high rates of interest to recoup themselves, so that from the opinion of one of the money lenders we have this fact: there are two classes of men who approach them—rogues and others. The others are the victims. The first are not at all interesting, but I think we should come to the rescue of the second class. I shall not dilate longer upon the immorality of usury. I suppose we are all of one mind on that point. The question is how to suppress it. Two systems have been advanced and discussed at considerable length by the commission which sat on the other side of the Atlantic. One is for Parliament to give discretion to tribunals to re-open transactions which come before them, and weigh the risk incurred in the loaning of money and the circumstances, and fix the rate of interest themselves. Or to examine what legitimate trade and financial transactions require, and in order that there should be no impediment thrown in their way—in order to give elasticity to commerce in general—fix such a maximum limit as will suppress usury and prevent the usurer from plying his trade. The report made by the commission I have spoken of says among other things:

> The loans are usually advanced on the security of promissory notes, given by the borrower either with or without sureties, or bills of sale, and the minimum rate of interest is generally 60 per cent, while some money lenders charge a uniform rate of interest, others charge as much as they can get, and, one lender admitted that his rate had sometimes been as high as 3,000 per cent.

Under the heading of remedies, they say:

> The two fundamental proposals which have been made to your committee for remedying the evils are:—
> I. That Parliament should enact that any interest above a certain rate on loans advanced by professional money lenders should be irrecoverable at law, or > II. That the courts should have power to go behind any contract with a money lender, to inquire into all the circumstances of the original loan and of the subsequent transactions, and to make such order as may be considered reasonable.
> As regards the first suggestion your committee consider that a high rate of interest is not in itself incompatible with fair dealing, and that no limit of interest can be prescribed which would be adopted to the widely different conditions under which these loans are contracted, and further, that if a maximum rate were fixed by statute, the interest would tend in all cases to rise to that maximum.

I may say at this stage that I have adopted a maximum rate of interest, for reasons which I will give, while the report made by this committee, and the bill which is now before the House of Commons favour a measure of discretion to be given to the courts. The English bill contains this clause which is the essence of the very bill itself. Clause 2 is as follows:—

> Where proceedings are taken in any court for the recovery of money lent by a money lender, and the court has reason to believe that the interest charged in respect of the loan exceeds the rate of ten per cent per annum, or that the amounts charged for expenses, inquiries, fines, bonds, renewals, or any other charges are excessive, the court may re-open the transaction, and take an account between the money lender and the person sued, and may, notwithstanding any statement or settlement of account, or any contract purporting to close previous dealings and create a new obligation, re-open any account already taken between them, and relieve the person sued from payment of any sum in excess of the sum adjudged by the court to be fairly due in respect of principal and interest and of such charges as aforesaid as the court, having regard to the risk and all the circumstances may adjudge to be reasonable; and if any such excess has been paid, or allowed in account, by the debtor, may order the creditor to repay it; and may set aside, either wholly or in part, or revise, or alter any security given in respect of money lent by the money lender.

The two reasons which the report gives for adopting this system instead of a maximum limit, are those which I have mentioned—first that a high rate of interest is not in itself incompatible with fair dealing. To this I answer that if we were to try to go back to the old usury law that was abolished in 1853 in England and which fixed 5 per cent per annum, undoubtedly I would admit that the reasons which prompted the legislators to wipe out that law still prevail; but I wonder if we cannot fix such a rate of interest as will allow all legitimate transactions to be carried on between citizens and yet protect our people, our young men more especially, against the trade of usury. The second reason which is given is that if a maximum rate were fixed by statute the interest would tend in all cases to rise to that maximum. I beg to dissent from that opinion, because we have a case in point in our own statutes. Our Banking Act allows 7 per cent to the bankers. Has it had the effect of raising the general rate of interest up to 7 per cent? We all know that money to-day can be borrowed on loans of $5,000 and over at 5 per cent and less, so that the rate within which the banks can operate, has not had the effect of raising the general rate of interest, and it seems to me that if we say that beyond a certain rate of interest on short term loans,—for in reality we are only aiming at destroying usury on short loans—the lender will not recover, we effectively check the evil. The rate of interest is regulated by the value of money throughout the world rather than by any maximum rate that we could fix. We all know that the rate of money in Canada, at all events, is influenced to a considerable extent, if not wholly, by the reduction in the rate of interest that gradually takes place in Great Britain, so that nothing will be changed in our habits. We will still borrow upon security from loan institutions below six per cent, and we will still be able to borrow from the bank, when we have a certain degree of credit, at or below 7 per cent. The reasons which have actuated me in adopting a maximum limit instead of giving sole discretion to the judge are those which are mentioned by Sir James Mathew in his testimony. Sir James Mathew, as everybody knows, is one of the County Court Judges of England. He says :

I should limit that to ten per cent, or whatever figure in the judgment of Parliament might be allowed. I think it is a matter of great importance that the law should be fixed and that people should know where they are. Somebody has said that it does not so much matter what the law is, so long as people know what the law is, and it is very important that the money lenders who enter into these transactions should know what they must look forward to if they make these exactions.

And he adds :

One judge will consider 20 per cent fair ; another judge will consider the ordinary rate the proper amount. You would have a great variety of opinion. It would be far better to settle the thing once for all.

This is one of the reasons given : the variety of opinions in the judgments which we would get from different judges. Unsettled legislation is one of his motives for preferring a fixed rate of interest. His second reason is that it would create a tendency to litigation. People would try to have their contracts revised. They would think that if they had agreed to pay 15 or 20 per cent they might get their rate of interest lowered. The tendency to litigation would bring the further objection that costs would be piled up I do not know exactly the conditions that prevail in other provinces, but I know that, in my province, a party sued for a loan of $100 or $200, who would ask for a readjustment of the rate of interest, would be mulcted in as large a sum of costs as the principal claimed from him. So that even if he obtained a reduction in the interest he would very likely, in nearly every case, have to pay double the amount of the capital which he borrowed. These are the very reasons which Sir James Mathew gives. There is a fourth one which struck me and which I submit to your consideration. It seems to me that, giving complete discretion to the judge to fix the rate of interest will conduce to immorality, for young men who would bind themselves to pay an extortionate rate of interest would very often enter into those contracts with a corrupt mind, knowing that they can repudiate their obligation if they applied to the court to obtain a reduction in the rate of interest. Would not this legislation smack of repudiation ? While if we fix a maximum rate of interest within which money lenders can lend money, we are sure that the parties will know exactly how they are, and if one of them commits an illegality he will not be surprised if the other takes advantage of it. Some may object that, fixing a special rate of interest is simply going back to the old system that prevailed before 22 Victoria, chap. 25 was passed, repealing the law against usury, which had been enacted by 17 George third, chap. 3. If the conditions which prevailed when those laws were repealed now happened to be changed it is no reason why this same law should not be re-enacted ; but it is not the same law that I submit. What were the reasons which were given for the repeal of the laws against usury ? The first one was that business transactions were hindered and that commerce could not develop under normal conditions. In England the sum allowed was 5 per cent. In Canada it was 6 per cent. At a time when money was worth 8 and 9 per cent, the legislators pretended that contracts should not be entered into which carried more than 5 or 6 per cent. It was an impediment to trade, and I am not surprised that these laws were repealed. The other reason why usury laws were repealed, was that they were inefficient. They were ineffective, because they were absurd on their face, inasmuch as they pretended to regulate the value of money, to fix the real value of money, when in the markets of the world money was worth far more, and they were ineffective because no legal enactment allowed the tribunals to reopen contracts in order to find out what sum had really been advanced by the money lender. The rates allowed by the laws of our country and Great Britain were below the real value of money, and people were borrowing the best they could, illegally, at a high rate. The fixing of the value of money—for it was practically that—was simply a vestige of the old feudal laws by which the monarch established the rate of all other products. I do not pretend that I am really offering to this Parliament a law which would have been called, in the past, a usury law. As I have just stated, the old usury law interfered with business. I try to keep clear of such a danger. I want business to go unfettered. I give the commercial and financial transactions a clear and wide field. My sole aim is to prevent unconscionable bargains. I am after the modern Shylock, who, claiming more than the classical pound of flesh, wants body and soul. If some hon. gentlemen fear for legitimate business, and if the margin I mention is not sufficient, I am ready to go further. As to the efficiency of the law which I will read, I think that it is, as far as I have been able to find ways of preventing any evasion of it, as complete as possible, but if there were any other mode which seemed to hon. gentlemen more adaptable to our condition I will readily invite suggestions. Now, what margin should be given? What maximum rate of interest should be fixed? I have the opinion of Mr. Garrow, who has founded these agricultural banks in England, that 25 per cent is not too high for short loans. Judge Owen says:

> Of course the main question is the question of the rate of interest, and it seems to me there are only two courses to take; one is, to fix it by statute, re-enacting for these cases the usury laws; the other to give a court of law power to reduce the rate of interest when satisfied that it is exorbitant and oppressive, to what is a fair rate of interest * * * * and if you recollect the Pawnbrokers' Act, which only extend to £10, fixes the rate of interest, and therefore there is a precedent for doing that, and it seems to me it would be a good thing in the case of these small loans, to fix the limit, beyond which it should not be allowed.

Judge Lumley Smith says:

> What interest is mostly charged by loan offices that come to your court? A.—I think they profess to charge about 13 or 14 per cent. Q.—Per annum? A.—Yes. I think 13 or 14 per cent per annum. It is not very extravagant; it is the systematic renewals which make it so much higher.

In fixing the rate of interest it seems to me we need not think very much of the usurer. Let it be 12, 15 or 20 per cent, the usurer must go. He will not lend even at 25 per cent. Twenty-five per cent per year on a loan of $50 for a month would mean a sum of $1.04, which he would be entitled to, and all those who were examined before that commission in England declare that they would simply go out of business if a rate of 25 per cent were fixed. So that whatever rate of interest is allowed by law, I am satisfied that the evil which I complain of would disappear. I am quite sure the usurer, or the shaver as we call him, would be bound to disappear. The only question to be considered is the margin needed by trade and commerce. I have mentioned in the bill now before us the rate of 20 per cent. It may appear large, but I arrived at that figure when I found that in our own statute-books, in the revised statutes, chapter 128, we allow the pawnbroker 214 per cent per year. We allow him 214 per cent upon loans perfectly secured, for, the pawnbroker generally advances but one-fourth of the value of the goods pledged. Our chapter 128 enacts as follows:—

> Every pawnbroker may take the following rates above the principal sum advanced, before he is obliged to re-deliver the goods pawned, that is to say, for every pledge upon which there has been lent not exceeding 50 cents, the sum of one cent for any time not exceeding one month, and the same for every month afterwards, including the current month in which the pledge is redeemed, although such month has not expired; and so on progressively and in the same proportion for every sum of 50 cents up to $20.

So that up to $20 the rate is 24 per cent in our own law. That is the rate given to a man who has a perfect guarantee. The statute reads:

> When the sum lent exceeds twenty dollars, the pawnbroker may take upon all beyond that amount after the rate of five cent for every four dollars by the month, and so on in proportion for any fractional sum.

So that the man who wishes to borrow $50, and who offers a perfectly sound security, will pay an annual rate of interest of eighteen and one-third per cent per year. It struck me that when we had this very principle embodied in our laws, we could give twenty per cent to a money lender who accepts in return and, as a sole guarantee, the signature of one or two persons of doubtful credit. I have said twenty per cent. It is for the hon. gentlemen to say if it is too large. If fifteen per cent will give financial transactions sufficient elasticity, let it be fifteen per cent. If we feel that we are encroaching to any degree upon the legitimate development of commerce by saying fifteen per cent, by all means let us allow twenty per cent. As to the conditions which prevail in other countries, I may state that Germany, at one time repealed its laws against usury, but eleven years ago felt under the obligation of re-enacting them. Austria has not repealed its usury laws. France has laws against usury. Five per cent is the maximum rate of interest in civil contracts, and six per cent in commercial contracts. In the United States the rate differs according to the state. I have here a list covering the forty-nine states and territories of our neighbours, and apart from ten territories and states which are without any maximum limit, all have a legal rate of interest, and, besides, a rate allowed for contracts. The legal rate runs from six to ten per cent, and the rate allowed by contract from six to twelve. The list is as follows:—

I may explain some of the provisions of the bill now before you.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of chapter 127 of the Revised Statutes, no person shall stipulate for, allow or exact on any negotiable instrument, contract or agreement whatsoever a rate of interest or discount greater than twenty per cent per annum, and the said rate of interest shall be reduced to the rate of ten per cent per annum from the date of issue of process in any suit, action or other proceeding for the recovery of the amount due.

I have the opinion of judges who ask that judgments should not bear more than six per cent per annum. Judge Gill says:

Legislation should have been enacted long ago, judgments should not carry more than 6 or 7 per cent interest. I prefer a fixed rate to discretion being given us. I have once been obliged to give judgment for 12 per cent, per day. This scandal should stop.

Judge Taschereau, in an interview, favoured any legislation which would tend to minimize the disastrous effects of usury. Judge Pagnuello says that a law against usury is absolutely necessary.

Last week all the papers published a judgment rendered by Judge Charland who said among other things—re Tapley et al vs. Dufort:

The plaintiffs sued to recover $270.75 being $150 for a note for that amount signed by the female defendant with the authorization of her husband dated August 31st, 1897, and payable at four months with interest at the rate of 130 per cent per annum being $120.75 as interest at the rate aforesaid on $150 from the 11th of March, 1898.

His Honour took advantage of the occasion to denounce usury in the most unmeasured terms. Said His Honour:

"Usury has free sway and the harm it does is incalculable. It is to be hoped that the bill which has been introduced in Parliament will bring a remedy to the situation. The motives for this bill are numerous, but it is better to leave this to the legislators. I may be allowed to say, however, that I approve of a law destined to kill this sad trade which is disgraceful for those who engage in it, and which only creates miseries.

"I believe that it is extremely to be regretted that the state of affairs often revealed by the judges of this court should be allowed to exist as it does. Usury has a free sway, and the harm is incalculable.

"Usurers are gloved thieves, who circulate in society clothed with the misery which they throw on all sides."

In fact, for a number of years the judges have denounced usury from the bench on every occasion. So I propose to fix the rate of interest at 10 per cent from the date of the issuing of a writ for the recovery of the amount loaned. If this chamber thinks ten per cent is too high a rate, I have no prejudice or feeling in the matter. If this rate is adopted, the man who bargains to pay fifteen or twenty per cent, will still be relieved to a certain extent when his interest is reduced to ten per cent. Clause 3 reads as follows:—

3. In any suit, action or other proceeding respecting a loan of money wherein it is made to appear to the court that the amount of interest sought to be recovered exceeds the rate of twenty per cent per annum, the court may re-open the whole transaction, up to the original contract, if there have been renewals, and may determine the rate of interest paid or claimed, by taking an account between the parties and by computing in the legal interest all sums paid or claimed as and for commission, fines, bonus and other such outlays; and the lender who is found to have received more than twenty per cent interest shall be condemned to repay such excess, and such judgment may be executed even by coercive imprisonment.

I have mentioned imprisonment because it strikes me that the lender may put in the body of the note the name of an insolvent to whose order the note would be made, thus preventing the recovery of any excess paid. The next clause simply repeats the existing law:

4. The bona fide holder, before maturity, of a negotiable instrument discounted by a preceding holder at a rate of interest exceeding that authorized by this Act, may nevertheless recover the amount thereof, but the party discharging such instrument may reclaim from the usurer any amount paid thereon for interest or discount in excess of the amount allowed by this Act.

I give right of action in favour of the aggrieved party to recover from the usurer wherever his name may be on the note the amount paid in excess of the legal rate. The present Act is made to apply to contracts to mature in the future only. As I have already stated, there are a number of judgments against young men who are weighted down with judgments bearing one hundred and twenty and a still higher rate of interest, and it seems to me that we should relieve them for the future in order to help them to a certain extent. This law will also apply to negotiable instruments which have not matured, but from the date of maturity and for the future only. As there are Acts which prevent corporations from charging more than seven per cent interest, I have in the seventh clause of this bill provided that nothing herein shall operate to increase the rate where it is fixed by law. This is the bill which I submit to the judgment of this House. I draw your attention to a plague which exists. I try to cure it by wiping out the Shylocks. My desire is that we should keep clear of the objections that were raised against the usury laws. It seems to me we can reach the usurer, without encroaching on the commerce and business of the country, by fixing a maximum rate of interest which will give plenty of scope to legitimate enterprise.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is a very important subject. It is one that has received the attention of leading men in the mother country. It has there been a subject of very careful inquiry by a committee, and the measure founded upon the report of that committee was introduced into Parliament during the present session by a member of the administration. That measure shows the importance which is attached to legislation upon this subject in the United Kingdom. The hon. senator from Kennebec (Mr. Drummond) informed me, at an early stage of the session, that this evil had grown to considerable dimensions in many of our cities, and he was perfectly cognizant of the extent to which it prevailed in the city of Montreal. So that the subject is not one on which we are legislating with a view to ideal perfectibility, but for the purpose of meeting a practical evil which affects a considerable number of members of that community. The measure is in no sense an attempt to restore the old usury law, nor is it founded upon the principles upon which those laws were, for a long period of time, up held. The theory upon which the ordinary usury law is based was, I think, effectively exploded by Jeremy Bentham at the close of the last century. His views have been adopted in the United Kingdom and given practical effect to by legislative bodies in all the dependencies of the British Empire. The ground upon which those obscure institutions which exist some of our cities, and the evils associated in with them which my hon. friend has undertaken to meet by his bill, was defended on the theory that money lending at more than the ordinary normal rate of interest was justifiable on account of the risks that are incurred by the money lender—that the money lender must insure himself against loss, and so the desperate character of the risk which he takes in the loans which he makes must determine the rate of interest which he will charge in order to protect himself against loss. I notice in the report to which my hon. friend has referred, a portion of which he has read, that one money lender who appeared before that committee maintained that the rate of interest which he was able to secure by lending money at these exorbitant rates, taking into consideration the losses which he had sustained, yielded him, in fact, but five per cent of interest, so that those that paid the enormously high rate of interest were, in fact, paying him for the losses which he had sustained in lending to others who were unable to meet their obligations. Legislation of this kind is legislation to meet an evil which exists in the community and can only be justified, it seems to me, as an interference with the ordinary adoption of contracts, assuming that every man is able to contract for himself, on the ground that certain members of the community have reached a financial condition which, in no small degree, deprives them of the liberty of contract. It was upon this ground that Mr. Gladstone defended his legislation by which he interferred between the landlord and the tenant in Ireland. The tenant was in such circumstances that he was not a free man, and was not in a position to enter into a contract with his landlord upon terms that were reasonable to him, and therefore it was necessary that the law should intervene, and that a reasonable arrangement should be made on his behalf. My hon. friend, in discussing the subject, has pointed out by practical illustration the evils which exist, and which have come under his own notice, by which he justifies, I think fairly so, the proposed measure. The plan of the measure which my hon. friend has submitted to us differs to some extent from that measure which was submitted to the House of Commons by Lord James. In that measure Lord James provides that where the rate of interest exceeds 10 per cent the whole question may be opened before a judge, who may inquire into all the circumstances, take into consideration the risk which the party incurred who loaned the money, and decide what is a reasonable rate of interest. My hon. friend by this bill adopts a different course. Instead of leaving it to the discretion of the judge, he fixes a maximum rate in this case which shall not be exceeded. Now, that maximum rate seems to the casual reader a high rate, and yet we find, when we examine it, that it is not quite so high a rate as the law already fixes in the case of pawnbrokers. If the party is greatly in need of a loan—if he is threatened with a suit, if he finds that he will be able in the course of a few days or weeks to meet his obligations, but is unable to meet his obligations at the moment, and can obtain money even at 20 per cent, it may be much more advantageous to him to pay that rate of interest and pay off his obligation and avoid the cost of a suit. I say he may do this with advantage pecuniarily to himself, and so where loans are effected for a short time, it may be that my hon. friend does not err on the side of extravagance in fixing the rate of interest at 20 per cent. This view, it seems to me, is a subject which may very well be thrashed out in committee. I have no doubt that the members of the committee to whom the bill may be referred will have an opportunity of carefully considering the plan suggested by my hon. friend in this bill, and by the bill which Lord James of Hereford has suggested in England. There may be reasons why the discretion which you give to the judge in the United Kingdom might not, with the same advantage, be given to a judge in one of the provinces or territories of this country, but that matter may be fairly considered by the committee. I think I may congratulate my hon. friend on the very full and clear statement which he has made, and when the bill is read the second time it may very well go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why not to a Committee of the Whole House?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—He may make a special reference if he likes, but it will naturally go to a Committee of the Whole House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Very well, if that is thought best. I would suppose where special inquiry was necessary and investigation needed, it might be better to go to that committee than to be discussed by the whole House.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Would it not be better, before referring it to a Committee of the Whole, to send it to a special committee to get information which we do not now possess?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I believe it cannot be successfully denied that a law of this kind is a necessity. It has been well known for years past that great abuses exist in every part of Canada in the practice of usury, so that I cannot myself say that I am opposed to the project under discussion. Indeed accepting the principle without binding myself to the details, I am ready to give my vote for any project which may better our position. But while admitting the state of things to be so, I cannot say that I approve of the change which is proposed to be made to our present law. I find that the remedy proposed to this House against usury, especially outside of a great city like Montreal, is worse than the evil. It may be that such a law is required in Montreal, and might do much good in the present state of affairs; but, as far as the country parts are concerned, it would be quite wrong to change the present system as proposed. It is often said that money is an ordinary subject of commerce. Even if it be so, there is a limit outside of which it is usury of the worst character if you exact too much. When a man takes 120 per cent for a loan of money to a young man as mentioned by the hon. mover of this project, the lender is not better than a thief I should think. Anybody can see that if a man, is in such a position that he has to pay 120 per cent for a loan, he had better be ruined at once. No doubt there are men who, being a ruin, will try to escape and will borrow money at any rate of interest if they can find it. If they can not get it at 5 per cent they will get it at 10 per cent, or higher, hoping for better times; but it is our duty, as legislators, to protect the public at large, and make such laws as will protect society. Such laws cannot be made for large centres only, such as Montreal. They have to be made to protect the public at large, of which large cities forms only a small part, and those laws should be made effective by punishing the offender by imprisonment.

Again I do not see that this project of a new law improves in any way the position we now hold under the present law, indeed it seems to me that the project of the hon. senator makes things worse.

Under the present law the amount of interest is six per cent. Should the project become law there would be no legal interest except that interest stipulated in the agreement and which may be so high as 20 per cent, an interest which I am bound to say is enormous in ordinary circumstances.

In the present state of things though the law enacts what will be the amount of interest, to be paid if none has been mentioned in the contract, yet it opens the door to the vilest acts of usury, when it enacts that any amount may be recoverable for interest provided the amount is mentioned in the contract. I should think that the present law ought be amended in such a way as to protect the public from those abuses which the hon. the mover of the project has given this House a detail of.

Here I find that if the 20 per cent mentioned in the project would be applied to our present law, by a proviso, enacting that the interest mentioned in the contract will never exceed 20 per cent, that it would make things a great deal better.

Believing as I do that even 20 per cent is too high a rate except in most extraordinary cases, I would add the remedy suggested by the project, that of giving to the borrower at a rate of over 6 per cent, the power to go before the courts who would adjudge upon the question of the amount of the interest mentioned in the contract, taking into consideration the circumstances of the case.

The usurer does not want to be known as a man who will rob his neighbour. He does not like to put an extortionate rate on the face of a note, and consequently he would rather have a law like this which would at all events give him the right to charge 20 per cent and still enable him to pose as a very honest and charitable Christian.

Knowing pretty well what money is worth in country parts, I say when an ordinary citizen of the country, a farmer or mechanic, or any man of moderate means, has to pay more than five or six per cent on money he cannot expect to be saved by paying such a high rate of interest on a short loan. S› that the usurer, in being allowed to take the amount he choses, would be in a position to ruin a borrower, and I think Parliament ought not to sanction anything of the kind. As long as you make laws which permit a harsh man to oppress his neighbour, you will have usury. The man who takes 120 per cent interest from another ought to be in prison, for certainly he has committed a theft. That man cannot be said to have loaned money—he has robbed the borrower under cover of the law, and we legislators will incur a grave responsibility if we give such men an opportunity to oppress their fellow citizens. Other arguments have been advanced by the hon. gentleman which, at the time, I was ready to answer, but as the bill is to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and there will probably be a discussion of it, I think it better to leave what I have to say until then; but I wish to protest against such laws as we have been making from time to time without any good effect at all, for the very good reason that we have not sufficiently provided for the punishment of offenders. In my opinion the only remedy against such abuses as those mentioned by the hon. mover of this bill, would be imprisonment. Let our present law stand on our statute-book with some amendments, as I have already said, and let us try to amend it from time to time until we have done something which may be considered in the public interest. My intention is to vote for the second reading of this bill, under the reserve I made a moment ago.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It seems to me the object which the hon. gentleman has in view is a very good one, and the promoter of the bill should be congratulated, not only on the step he has taken, but on the remarks with which he has supplemented his motion. He has spoken about the evil as it occurs in Montreal, but the evil which he desires to cure by this bill is not confined to Montreal. I see by some newspaper from Ontario that there also it flourishes, and I know that in Manitoba it has also many victims. Having said so, and intending to vote for the second reading of the bill I beg to make a few remarks. It seems to me that the rate of interest, 20 per cent, is too large. In fact, the bill itself seems to suggest a reduction; inasmuch as it provides for 10 per cent after judgment. If 10 per cent is enough after judgment I do not see why it should not be enough before judgment. The law applicable to pawnbrokers has been cited as an argument to justify 25 per cent. It is no argument, to my mind, at all, because that law in reference to pawnbrokers is bad in itself. I think the hon. gentleman is quite right in giving no discretion to the judges. A maximum of interest should be fixed, but to my mind 8 per cent would be quite enough. Of course there should be an exception made for chartered institutions, loan companies and gentlemen engaged in legitimate business. It seems to me that if the bill is referred to a special committee, it would be possible to frame a clause in such a way that those doing legitimate business should be exempt from the operation of the law. In the third clause I see that the court is allowed to reopen the whole transaction. The clause should go a little further. It is not very clear from this whether the court could go into any transaction. I think the court should be allowed to go not only into the transactions immediately connected with the loan, but also into any side transaction which might be gone into, so as to cover the whole thing. As to the latter part of that clause, it seems to me that a fine should be imposed. The clause reads:

> And the lender who is found to have received more than 20 per cent interest shall be condemned to pay such excess.

Well, that is not enough. It seems to me that he should lose his money and be imprisoned in any case. If you have a law you must make it stringent enough to eradicate all desire to be a Shylock, as the hon. gentleman has termed it. The 4th clause, it seems to me, is not complete. Of course, we may conceive such cases where the bona fide holder should be protected, but I am sure that in most cases many would pretend to be bona fide holders who were not such, and this clause will rather help to defeat the object of the bill if it remains as it is. As to the remedy provided in the latter part of the clause, which is that the person may recover from the usurer any amount paid thereon for interest or discount in excess of the amount allowed by this Act, that is not a sufficient remedy. It will lead to endless litigation and difficulties of every kind, and in most cases will result in losses to the victims for whose relief this bill is designed. Then, again, the bill is not made retroactive. I quite understand the motive which has prompted the hon. gentleman to frame the bill in this way, but it seems to me that this is a case where the law should be retroactive, because the transaction is from the first vitiated. A man who charges 100 per cent or 50 per cent is, to my mind, committing an immoral act, and if he has committed an immoral act, I do not see why we should not at once go after him, and whether the note has matured before the law comes into force or not should not make any difference. This is a plain case where it should be made retroactive. I think also that this bill should be referred to a special committee. Of course the Committee on Banking and Commerce could take it up, but the Committee on Banking and Commerce have other work to do, and a special committee should be appointed to consider the bill and to make a study of it, so that it may be made as complete as possible. I am entirely in favour of the bill and shall vote for it.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I think I express the general sentiments of all the members of this chamber who have had the pleasure of listening to the remarks of the introducer of this measure, when I say that the comments which were made by the Minister of Justice were richly deserved by the hon. gentleman who introduced the bill. It must have necessitated a great deal of effort and painstaking industry to collate the information he has given us. I do not intend to occupy time further than to state that it is my personal opinion that the bill would receive more mature and deliberate consideration in the Committee on Banking and Commerce than in a Committee of the Whole House. On that point there is a little diversity of opinion, and it can be better threshed out in the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I do not know that there is any necessity for a bill of this kind in the province from which I come. I have never heard of such extraordinary charges there for money as have been mentioned, but from the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Montreal (Mr. Dandurand), it is very evident that there should be some remedy provided to prevent the occurrence of such very immoral charges being made for the use of money. His argument was strong enough, I think, to show that the rate fixed by the bill should be very much less than 20 per cent. No reasonable man could advocate a charge of 20 per cent, and a man who would extort 20 per cent must be deficient morally. He states that these extortionate charges for money have been the means of driving a great many young men from this country to the United States. If the young men of this country are such idiots as to pay 120 per cent for the use of money, we are much better clear of them, and the United States is welcome to them if they cannot make an honest living in this country. One part of the bill would have a good effect; that is the provision allowing the judges to reduce the excessive rates charged by these usurers down to reasonable figures. It is very improper that the law should be such that a man, by taking an action, could recover the amount of $1,896 for the use of $75, as has been stated by the hon. gentleman. That seems altogether absurd. The judge certainly should have the discretion of cutting it down to a reasonable amount, and, so far as this bill allows the judge to take cognizance of a case of that kind, and to allow 10 per cent or a reasonable rate of interest, it will have my support. I would not advocate the maximum rate of 20 per cent, which is proposed in this bill. It is altogether unreasonable. No legitimate business could be carried on by any person paying 20 per cent for the use of money. People are lending money in every province of this Dominion, investing it at 4 per cent, 6 per cent is usual and 7 per cent is considered a high rate, and I think the rate suggested by the hon. gentleman from Manitoba would be much fairer than the amount mentioned.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW.—This is a very large question, and I think it is one that should engage the attention of the government of this country. The matter referred to by the hon. member from Montreal, surely shows a state of things existing in that part of the country generally that requires some remedy at our hands. You may call it by whatever name you like, usury or anything else, but you may depend upon it that there will be means resorted to by which any law can be evaded, and therefore it requires very great consideration to frame a bill to have the desired effect. The men who lend money at these high rates of interest should be treated as men undeserving of any honourable feeling that pertains to the community generally. I would be in favour of saying that the men who follow that business should be designated as usurers and follow their occupation the same as pawnbrokers, putting up a sign to show people who are dealing with them that they are treating with a class of men who have no conscience, who are charging all they can. With proper restrictions and proper legislation, I believe that these men would be brought to a point where they would not exceed the bounds of decency in the matter of money lending. For instance, a man can buy a note at any price he chooses to bid for it. I suppose the bill would not apply to that. A man can go into the stock exchange and perhaps reap a large amount of profit. Of course, on the other hand he may fail and not be fortunate. Money has a great influence on the community generally. Sometimes a man in straitened circumstances may require a thousand dollars for a short time for which he can pay a pretty large amount in the shape of commission, or something else, but he could not continue to pay that for any length of time without becoming bankrupt. You have to make provision for all these contingencies. It is a difficult question to deal with, and the more you study it the more difficult you will find it is to obtain a proper remedy. Some persons say ten per cent is enough I dare say honest men would be satisfied with less, but there are some men who require larger interest for the little money they have to invest. You must act fairly for all classes of the community. They may take the risk, of course, but too large a rate of interest for a risk is not a sound policy to legalize. I do not look upon a risk as satisfactory, because the rate of interest is high. I know people who will lend money if the rate of interest is sufficiently large. That kind of security is not one which a business man should encourage. I admit that a remedy is required. There is no doubt about that. The evidence produced by the hon. member from Montreal (Mr. Dandurand) must convince every hon. gentlemen that some remedy is required, but at the same time you must provide a remedy which will not debar the honest man from getting assistance when he needs it. You must overcome that difficulty. You must have the matter well considered by prudent men, who will come to a decision which will benefit the whole country. I am not in favour of a usurer, I think he is a man despised and hated by all the community, but we know such men exist, if not in one quarter, then in another. You have to try and prevent usury occurring in the future. It would be wise and judicious to have a small committee appointed to consider the bill in all its bearings, and then they can submit a well considered measure for the consideration of the Senate. I do not believe there are any hon. gentlemen who do not think we should have some remedy. The sooner it is provided, the better for the community. It has been a vexed question for years. We have tried from time to time to cope with usury, and have been unable to do so. We want an enactment by which these men will be prevented from committing what must prove injurious to the borrowers and the country at large. If we find a means to attain this object we will do good to every man in the country, and I think the usurer, if he is not an extortionate man, will feel that he will be able to carry on a respectable business and succeed. We have to take all the circumstances into consideration in order to come to a conclusion which will be fairly satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The thanks of the House are due to the hon. gentleman, from De Lorimier (Mr. Dandurand), for the care he has taken in this matter. I presume the bill may go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, or to a special committee. I have grave doubts as to whether we will be able to improve much on its construction. This bill is almost identical with the bill introduced in the Imperial Parliament during the present session, and that bill was the result of the long continued labours of a commission which inquired into the whole subject and reported on the matter, submitting the evidence which had been taken at great length in connection with the investigation. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dandurand) has a personal interest in the question; he has seen the iniquities perpetrated under the present law in the city where he lives, and I have grave doubts whether any committee will improve on the measure he has submitted to the House. It seems to me that every hon. gentleman who has spoken has endorsed the principle of this bill, which is that there should be some limitation to the power given by the existing law in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec to exact any rate of interest, no matter how excessive, from a borrower who happens to be in straitened circumstances. The hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière, it seems to me, misapprehended the existing condition of things. Turning to the chapter of the Revised Statutes on interest I find that the law in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec is embodied practically in two sections. The first is:

> Except as otherwise provided by this or any other Act of the Parliament of Canada any person may stipulate, allow or exact, on any contract or agreement whatsoever, any rate of interest or discount which is agreed upon between the parties.

So that there is no limitation in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Nor in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; the clauses concerning them in chapter 127 were repealed by the law of 1890, chapter 127. Sir John Abbott's measure was intended simply to strike out one section of the statute concerning Quebec and Ontario, but when the bill reached the other House some member moved that the clauses concerning New Brunswick and Nova Scotia should be eliminated from the statute. It was adjourned, and Sir John Thompson at last consented to that. I may say that I found, in going from one statute to another, that there was no need of eliminating the clause concerning New Brunswick, inasmuch as a special statute passed in 1875 had already done so. It had been by error replaced in the Revised Statutes, and by a law passed in 1890 the clauses concerning New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have been wiped out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the public in Nova Scotia are aware of the facts, and I have not heard of any instances there where more than 7 per cent has been exacted on loans on real estate and 10 per cent on personal loans. We had that law in operation for a considerable time and no inconvenience was experienced from the existence of the limitation. However, the exact rate which is to be allowed is a mere matter of detail which can be settled in committee. Every hon. gentleman seems to recognize that there has been a great abuse and that it is the duty of Parliament to correct the abuse. That is the principle of the bill. The details of the measure, as to what rate of interest should be allowed, and as to what action should be taken as to suits, &c., are all matters of detail which do not properly come before us now.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Justice when I may expect to have the return for which I moved somewhat early in the session relative to the carrying of the winter mails between Sackville and Cape Tormentine.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That will be in the Post Office Department, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will bring the matter under the attention of the Postmaster General.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, 30th May, 1899.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

COMPANIES' ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS introduced Bill (N) "An Act to amend the Companies' Act."

He said:—This is a very short measure. It is to make changes in the Companies' Act of Canada similar to the changes that have been made in the Companies' Act in the province of Ontario. That is to give to every company incorporated under chapter 119 of the Revised Statutes of Canada power to issue preferential stock, and to give to the holders of that preferential stock representation upon the board of that company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are there any other provisions in the bill for the organization of companies, or is it simply for the purpose which the hon. gentleman has stated?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is simply an amendment to the statute. I purpose introducing a bill to-morrow similar to the one I introduced last year, but this bill is simply for the purpose of making a single amendment to the Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps it may be premature, but might I ask my hon. friend if the bill he intends to introduce to-morrow is of the same character, or has he amended it from last year?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have made certain amendments. I have had some correspondence with attorneys general of the provinces, and I have made certain amendments, but practically it will be the same as the bill of last year.

The bill was read a first time.

EXCHEQUER COURT CLAIMS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that he may be pleased to lay before the House a statement showing:—

1. Names and residences of all parties filing claims against the Crown in the Exchequer Court, from July, 1893, to May, 1899.
2. Dates of filing and nature of claim and amounts claimed.
3. Dates of hearing each case.
4. Dates when judgment was recorded, and amounts allowed; amount of costs awarded.
5. Dates when award and amount was paid.
6. A statement showing appeals to Supreme or other courts, from decision of Exchequer Court.
7. Names and residences of parties, with dates of claims so appealed, with amounts, originally claimed.
8. Result of appeals and amounts allowed in cases appealed.
9. Amount of costs allowed in appeal cases.
10. When such amounts so recovered in appeal were paid, and amounts thereof.

He said:—This motion is sufficiently explicit in itself and requires very little explanation at my hands. I think it would be a source of satisfaction to the country to know the amount of work done by the Exchequer Court, and to ascertain if the court has met the expectations which we had at its initiation. I am induced to do this in consequence of the Expropriation Bill which was introduced the other day, when we had not sufficient information to know whether in every case the courts were justified in doing as they have done in many cases referred to. Therefore, under all the circumstances, the country would be satisfied to find from this report, when it is made, whether I am correct or whether the machinery in the hands of the government at the present time is sufficient to meet all the requirements.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to say a few words upon this motion, and to give my reasons why I think the information which has been asked for by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa should be furnished.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would like very much to hear them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Since the action taken by the Senate upon the Expropriation Bill introduced by the hon. Minister of Justice, I have been furnished with information which, I think, fully justifies the action of the Senate, particularly in the two cases to which the hon. Minister of Justice referred as justification of the course which he proposed to take, in asking for powers to expropriate land and return portions of it again to the original owner, and also to enable the government to purchase other property and give it to the party from whom they expropriated the land, in lieu of said land expropriated. I have before me details of two cases which have been brought under my notice since that time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is the hon. gentleman going to discuss the merits of that bill?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I am going to give reasons why I think this information should be furnished to the House. I trust I know enough of the rules of the House not to discuss the merits of a bill which has been rejected by the Senate, and which perhaps we may be asked to consider again, but as the hon. senator from Rideau (Mr. Clemow) has put a notice upon the paper and made a motion asking for information, I am going to give the Senate some information which may be considered premature; but which, I have no doubt, when the return comes down, will be verified, taking it for granted that the information which has been given to me is correct. I intend to refer to cases given me to illustrate the desire of the government to have further power. I shall refer to Judge Armour's case first, and then to the case to which the hon. gentleman specially called the attention of the Senate—that is the Hall case—where a mill property was to a certain extent destroyed by expropriation by the government. I find that under the present law the government took possession of lands belonging to Chief Justice Armour, for the Trent Valley Canal, without giving notice to the judge, and without making him any offer of remuneration for the property. After possession had been taken the judge waited for three or four months expecting to hear from the government upon the subject, but as nothing was done, he instructed his solicitor to prepare a petition asking for a fiat, which for some unexplained reason was refused. Why it was refused I have no information, but, looking at the English authorities and the practice in England upon questions of this kind, it is clear that unless there are grave reasons why a fiat should not be granted it is never refused.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It goes as a matter of course.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. However, in cases where the Crown considers that there is no claim whatever, then the Crown would be justified in refusing to grant the fiat. But in this case there certainly was no pretence of that character. Whether it was the present Minister of Justice who refused the fiat, I am not prepared to say, but whether it was the present Minister of Justice or the late Minister of Justice, or the Minister of Justice prior to his immediate predecessor, it does not affect the facts nor does it affect the case in the least. The case was then taken into court, after the government had been in possession for a long time. Afterwards information was filed to ascertain the amount of compensation to be paid, if any. But after compensation had been fixed through the courts, I am informed that there is no mode whatever by which the government can be compelled to pay the amount, and my informant says "This form of taking a man's property without letting him know it, and then letting him whistle for his pay is too Turkish for this country." That is the opinion of the gentleman who gives me the information, and will be echoed by all who regard men's property as sacred. Another singular act in connection with this matter is the fact that the judge applied to the Minister of Railways and Canals for a copy of the agreement which had been entered into between the government and the party owning the land adjacent to that which was owned by the judge, and this was refused by the Minister of Justice, though the document had been laid on the table of the House of Commons. It thus compelled the judge to issue a subpœna to the Minister of Railways and Canals to appear before the court with that document, which he considered to be necessary in this case. The Minister of Railways not only refused to give a copy of the agreement or the agreement itself, but disobeyed the order of the summons; and, as the gentleman himself says, while he did that, he neglected to return back to him the twelve dollars and fifty cents which he had sent to him for conduct money. That, I dare say, was an oversight. Looking at that case, we may well ask ourselves whether power should be placed in the hands of the government to expropriate other people's property, in the manner sought by the bill, which the Senate rejected. I think the case of Mr. Hall is a much stronger one. I shall take the liberty of reading the statement which I hold in my hand, which is much clearer and more concise than I can possibly put it:

The government expropriated for the Trent Canal a large part of the mill property of Jno. Hall of Lakefield, taking from him land on which he had a valuable mill power—cutting him off from his dam—coming to within one foot of his mill building on the north and cutting in on his roadway so that a team coming to his mill door had to drive into a wedge one foot wide at corner of building. The teams would therefore have to back out. They took away his driving shed and all stables, and now to reach his new stable he has to travel $\frac{1}{16}$ of a mile around by a bridge, or $\frac{1}{8}$ of a mile, there and back. The valuators allowed for the buildings, $925; for the land and house, $1,650, and for damages, $600. The mill is worth $25,000. His yard has been blocked; his windows nailed up to prevent breaking by the blasting; a canal within 25 feet of his door; an embankment 17 feet high between his mill and the road so that now he can only get on his land over land bought by the Crown to make a roadway, and they offer for damages the magnificent sum of $600! Of course it was refused. The Crown brought in suit but found that in their tender they had omitted the sum of $925 for buildings, and finding they were wrong, instead of amending the tender they abandoned the action, and then introduced the expropriation amendment bill to enable them to offer a privilege of passing the mill door and to turn around a team on the land they expropriated, and to further offer some of the land they could do without at point where it was of little value or use to the mill owner. The case was dismissed with costs to Hall, and the costs taxed down to the fixed tariff. Costs between attorney and client were refused; costs of a trip to Ottawa to see the minister at his suggestion was also refused. Hall, for three years, has suffered every inconvenience, put to double the costs, and must now entreat the government to bring on a new suit.

Every effort to get to trial in the old suit was balked by motions and enlargements, and finally the suit dropped in order that this new method of striking below the belt might be accomplished by an Act of Parliament. 'Tis true there was no suit pending, but they entered a discontinuance in bad faith to enable them to say the bill would not affect a pending suit.

Now, this is the case as given by the owner of the property; and I hesitate not to say, if this statement be correct, and I have every reason to believe it is from the source from which it comes, that it is a case in which the Crown should take the whole property, and fully sustains the position taken by my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed), when he cited certain cases in England affecting property in this way. Here is a man owning property. The government, in the interest of the country, takes his land and builds a canal within twenty feet of his mill, cuts off intercourse with his mill except by teams backing out, and then the government coolly ask him to take property a sixteenth of a mile away from his mill, and to reach which he has to cross the canal or river. I have read these cases for the simple purpose of justifying the Senate in refusing to give the government further power.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman may well say hear, hear. The Senate is justified in rejecting a bill which places it in the power of the government to take the property of individuals without proper remuneration. I did hear that one gentleman said, after that vote was given, that it was a flagrant act of partisanship. I had not the facts of these two cases at the time, or I would have given them to the House, but there is this much about it, that both of these gentlemen belong to the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the action taken by the Senate could not have been based upon a desire to obtain advantages for people belonging to their own party. The principle in these matters should be to maintain inviolate the right of property of the individual. I apologize to the Senate for having taken even this much time to lay these cases before them. I am inclined to think, if all the papers are brought down in compliance with the motion made, that these facts will be fully sustained.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has made a speech that has no relevancy to the motion of the hon. gentleman behind me. The hon. gentleman has discussed measures which were before the House a week ago, which he had an opportunity of discussing at the time, and is entirely out of order on the present occasion. I do not know that I could find better evidence of the fact that the hon. gentleman was not satisfied with the course which he took himself than the fact that he undertakes to justify it in this highly irregular manner. The hon. gentleman has referred to a case of expropriation which I think took place under his own administration, or under the administration of which he was a member, with regard to property held by Chief Justice Armour. That case had, I think, been submitted to the court before the present administration came in—at all events, it was before I became Minister of Justice. The action of the Minister of Railways, to which the hon. gentleman refers, was the action of the Minister of Railways who was his own colleague and associate, so far as I know. In the case of Chief Justice Armour, the hon. gentleman says that a fiat was refused him. My impression is that a fiat was withheld, not because there was any indisposition to prevent the case going before the Exchequer Court, but because there was a more convenient way of proceeding. That convenient way was adopted, and the case was taken before the court upon that mode of procedure and argued, and judgment was given. If I remember correctly, the judgment for a small portion of the farm —I do not know whether it was twenty or twenty-five acres which was taken —was for fourteen thousand dollars, a sum which hon. gentlemen who concur in the views expressed by the hon. leader of the opposition may consider was not an inadequate allowance for that many acres of farm land. The Minister of Railways, I believe, thought that the judgment was far too large a sum—whether he was right in that view or not it is not necessary for me to discuss—and he instructed the Department of Justice to appeal the case to the Supreme Court. It has been argued, and is standing there for judgment, and has no relevancy to the measures that were before the House, nor was there any intention or expectation to interfere with that judgment, whatever it might be, by the Supreme Court by either measure that was recently before this House. Then the hon. gentleman said that a sum of money was sent with the subpœna for the attendance of the Minister of Railways on the court, and that although the minister refused to attend he forgot to send back the money. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman means that as a reflection on the minister or not. I suppose he does or he would not have mentioned it here.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I said I supposed it was forgotten.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Why did the hon. gentleman mention it at all? I do not see that it has any particular relevancy to the case. I suppose some official of the department appeared on behalf of the minister, and produced any papers that might be required on the trial.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is the ordinary way.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And I suppose he received the compensation. That is the ordinary way of proceeding, as the hon. gentleman knows right well, for he has been a long time a minister of the Crown. The hon. gentleman referred to another case, which also occurred under the administration of which he was a member, and which still remains undisposed of—that is the Hall case. He says that Hall was badly treated. If Hall was badly treated, he was badly treated before the present administration came into office. If he is badly treated it is because the present administration took the view that the hon. gentleman's colleagues took. Supposing the mill was irreparably damaged, the advantage of that restoration, the value as the hon. gentleman states, that irreparable damage would appear before the Exchequer Court. The judge of Exchequer may be trusted to form a fair and just judgment with regard to the character of the damage done, and if irreparable damage was done to the property, Hall would be compensated, adequately compensated, by the court, unless the hon. gentleman says that the judge who was appointed to the bench when he himself was in office is a man not to be trusted with the discharge of his judicial functions. I do not concur in that view. I think he may be fairly trusted, and that if there is any injury done, either to Hall or to any other party, and if the government proposes to compensate Hall—if they propose to restore now a part of the property which was taken from him, which he believes to be necessary to the proper enjoyment of the property which he retained, —the advantage of that restoration and the value of the restoration and deterioration of the property with that restoration made, would be a fair subject to be decided by the judge of the Exchequer Court. There can be no doubt with regard to that. But I am not further going to follow the example of the hon. gentleman in engaging in an irregular discussion. We shall have an opportunity of discussing these cases fully, and there will be no room for doubt in the mind of any one who will seriously consider the subject that the government have asked for nothing that was not in the public interest, or unjust to any property holder, any portion of whose property has been taken. I am quite willing that the hon. gentleman who has made this motion shall get the return, and that it shall be adopted by the House, and as soon as it is possible for the Exchequer Court to give the information which he has sought it will be placed at the disposal of the House, and if it has any value in enabling hon. gentlemen to come to a conclusion, and it can be brought down in time, I am perfectly willing and anxious that hon. gentlemen shall have the advantage of that additional information and light, if additional light and information be pertinent to the subject of those measures which the hon. gentleman had opposed, and as to which he now, in this irregular way, undertakes to satisfy his conscience and justify his action.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I rise to express my approbation of the motion which the hon. gentleman from Rideau (Mr. Clemow) has brought forward, and I do so because I think the returns, when they are brought down, will show that in every case where the government have taken land the owners have been paid the full value, and often three or four times the value. I could mention cases in Halifax where that was done.

When that appears, it will explain the reason why I voted with the hon. leader of the government on that question, because I feel certain where the government took away any land and refused to pay the sum demanded if the owner went to the Exchequer Court he would get more than justice. I was perfectly justified, I think, in my action. I have no leader in this House. I am a Conservative and could not be anything else if I tried, but I am not going to try. I think we ought as much as possible to set our politics aside. It is contrary to my duty as a senator to follow a leader. The very fact of the expropriation of land sounds an unjust thing. We read in the Bible that Ahab expropriated Naboth's vineyard. There was no Exchequer Court then to settle the matter so they cut off Ahab's head, but we cannot do that now. I think the Exchequer Court will give justice and more than justice to the party. There were some reflections made on my politics. My politics are my own, and I intend to follow them, and it will take a great deal of bulldozing to prevent me from doing so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I had not intended to make any observations on this motion, but after the remarks of the Minister of Justice and the junior member from Halifax, I feel bound, as one who voted against the two bills in question, to resent the imputation cast upon members who took the same view as I did, namely, that any reflection was cast upon the Exchequer Court by our action. The contrary was the case. I do submit in all seriousness, that the proposal made by the government to amend the Exchequer Court Act was a want of confidence in the Exchequer Court. Additional machinery was sought in order to accomplish a purpose which they found could not be accomplished in the Exchequer Court. The expressions of opinion which were given in this chamber upon the discussion of the two measures which were before us, were of such a character as, I am sure, would convince both sides of the House that every confidence was felt in the Exchequer Court by those of us who opposed the bills. We felt that the machinery on the statute-book, with the assistance of the Exchequer Court, is fully adequate to meet the public requirements, and every exigency which could occur. We did ask the hon. Minister of Justice to submit to us, who felt bound to oppose the bill, any cases in which a hardship had occurred or in which it was found that the machinery at present on the statute-book was inadequate to meet the requirements of the case, but so far as I could ascertain, certainly no case was submitted to this House in which it was found or in which we were in any way satisfied that the provisions upon the statute-book at the present time were not sufficiently adequate to carry out all the requirements of justice. I might say to the Minister of Justice that not only is there a desire but there is an anxiety on the part of those who have opposed the bill to meet any view which the government may have in carrying out or carrying into effect the best method of meeting the public service in this particular respect. If my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, will submit to this House or will submit to a special committee of this House such cases as will, to the satisfaction of members of that committee, or of the House, convince them that the present Act is not sufficient for the purpose of seeing justice done between the subject and the Crown, I feel satisfied that this House will be only too glad to support such a measure as will be a remedy to any defect which at present exists. But at the present time no such evidence has been submitted to this House. I furthermore say to the hon. Minister of Justice that if there comes to my knowledge any such case in which it is shown that the Crown is prejudiced and that the subject is benefited at the expense and to the disadvantage of the Crown, when equitable principles would be violated, when fair play between the subject and the Crown would be violated, I for one, shall support any such measure as the government may bring down here to carry into effect that which may be right between the subject and the Crown, but at the present time I have been convinced, from what observation I have been enabled to make, that the machinery on the statute-book, is fully up to the public requirement.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The evidence which the Minister of Justice would have to submit to convince the hon. gentleman from Calgary of the necessity for a change in the law would have to be of a very peculiar kind. The attitude of the hon. gentleman—and I say it without meaning to offend at all—and some hon. gentlemen who agree with them, is that of the Scotchman who said he was open to conviction, but would like to see the man who would convince him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You should not judge others by yourself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am open to conviction and not hard to convince if there is any good reason given. But the hon. gentleman from Calgary rather surprised me when he said that he and his friends were only dying to put more power into the hands of the Exchequer Court judge and to give that judge a chance of discharging his duty in a satisfactory way. This measure was introduced partly at the suggestion of the judge of the Exchequer Court, and the substantial effect of the two measures which this House rejected was to increase the discretion of the Exchequer Court judge and give him a freer hand. The hon. gentleman and his friends dissembled their love for the Exchequer Court judge by kicking this bill out.

The motion was agreed to.

INTEREST ON CONTRACTORS' CLAIMS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that his Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, a statement giving in detail the several amounts paid or allowed for interest, from 1st July, 1893, to 1st May, 1899, to contractors and others having claims against the government or any of its departments, and showing whether such claims were decided by litigation, arbitration or otherwise; the name of the person or persons to whom each such payment or allowance of interest was made, and the amount of each of their claims, and also the period covered by each such payment or allowance of interest; and also a statement showing cases where interest has been refused to be paid and the reasons for such refusal and non-payment.

He said:—I think this motion is sufficiently explicit to obtain a reply from the government to show why interest has not been paid on certain claims. I have before me several cases in which interest has been refused. I want to know why, if interest has been paid to one man, it should not be paid to another. I hold that every man should be placed on the same footing, and that if interest is allowed to one it should be allowed to others. It is an extraordinary thing to me that after judgment is recorded in the Exchequer Court it does not bear interest as in other courts. When this return comes down, it will show that discrimination has been made in the payment of interest on claims.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will give one illustration to enable the minister in all probability to reply, if he does reply, or give his reasons for not paying interest, when the next question is put. I take the liberty, under this motion for an address, so as to avoid the practice which we have followed in the past of discussing questions upon a mere inquiry. I will give the Minister of Justice a case which I think is one of very great hardship. I am not aware that the hon. gentleman is at all responsible, but it is a case of this kind: $190 was allowed for a small piece of a village lot, taken for the Trent Canal. The government took possession three years ago, but did not pay for the land until the other day, but they refused to pay interest to the owner, who was a minor and who gave the deed as quickly as he became of age. The delay in getting the deed did not hurt the government, as they got possession of the land and had it in their possession for three years. The infant is a poor boy, and the guardian supposed the money was drawing interest as if in court. But, no; and the excuse is that the government was not responsible for the delay.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What locality was that?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Trent Valley Canal in or near Peterborough.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What name?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not give the name. It says:

The other day the government paid $190 for a small piece of village lot, &c.

I take it for granted it must have been a suburb of Peterborough, or Lakefield, which is a village, or perhaps is one of the smaller villages or settlements between Lakefield and Peterborough. The excuse I think the House will see is not a good one. The government had been in possession of the land for three years. The granting of a deed was delayed on account of the owner being a minor, and the guardian, supposing the money was drawing interest from the government as if the case had been in court, never applied for it. When the deed was given, upon the minor becoming of age, the government refused to pay interest, on the ground that it was not their fault they had not received the deed before. That is a case of hardship which I bring under the notice of the minister, which should be met by the payment of the interest under the circumstances, and I think my hon. friend will agree with me when I say so. I take this opportunity of resenting the insinuation, by implication, that anything I said, either now or upon a former occasion, had the slightest reference to the integrity or honour of the Exchequer Court judge, a gentleman in whom I have just as much confidence as either of the gentlemen who sit opposite me, particularly the Minister of Justice. The grounds I took were what I believed to be in the interest of the owners of property in this country. I do not know what the junior member from Halifax (Mr. Almon) meant when he referred to his partyism and said he would not be bulldozed. I did not know that any one had spoken to him on that subject. If any persons attempted to interfere with him in the exercise of his right to vote as his conscience dictates, they did a wrong. A man sitting in this House, or any other deliberative body, should act in accordance with what his conscience dictates is right, and no one has a right to chastise or bulldoze him, or find fault with him for doing it. You may argue with him, but it is a matter for himself to decide how he should vote. I regret very much if any one should do that, and I quite applaud and share the view he takes in regard to following any leader. Every member sitting in this House is as independent of his colleague as his colleague is of him, and it does not follow that because a particular member happens to be in the position, or is designated leader of the opposition or leader of the House, that those who support the government or those who support the opposition, as a rule, should follow them in everything if they do not think they are right. I take it for granted that the Minister of Justice does what he thinks is right, and I am sure that he who is termed the leader of the opposition pursues the same course. Our minds do not run in the same direction, and if the hon. junior member from Halifax (Mr. Almon) does not agree with me, that is his business and not mine. They have just as good a right to their opinion as I have to mine, and to exercise it as freely without being called to account for it by any one.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend who has made this motion, that I cannot state how far the information for which he seeks can be had. I daresay by an examination of the judgments that have been given in the Exchequer Court, and by an examination of the awards given by the arbitrators, that this information can be collected. I must say that I do not exactly see of what great practical utility it will be to my hon. friend after it is obtained, if it can be obtained. The question of interest is a question that is regulated by law. There are certain cases in which the court may award interest against the Crown. There are very many cases where this cannot be done. There may be cases where the Crown is under no obligation to pay interest, and where, nevertheless, there may be a hardship in withholding it, and where it may be the duty of the Minister of the Crown to see that interest should be paid as a matter of grace; but all these are legal considerations upon which the hon. gentleman's solicitor could, perhaps, give him more information than it would be possible for him to obtain from an examination of the judgments or of the awards. Where the Crown has a contract, it may be under obligation to pay interest. Where the Crown is wrongfully in possession of money for which some other party may be liable, it may be under obligation to pay interest where it assumes to stand in the place of the officer against whom, otherwise, judgment might be had. In a vast majority of cases where money has come into the hands of the Crown, the Crown, under the Imperial statute, does not pay interest. In some cases in Ontario I think our statute goes further than the Imperial statute, and in the province of Quebec I am inclined to think that it perhaps goes further in respect to the obligation of the Crown to pay interest, than even our law does in Ontario. That is a matter for legal advice, and while I am not at all objecting to the information being given, so far as it can be had, which the hon. gentleman seeks, I do not think it will be of the service to him that he now supposes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I suggest that it would be in the public interest, and the present government as a Liberal government might give evidence of their liberalism by providing that the Crown should be liable for interest? It is a well known fact that the Crown is not liable for interest. That is a general principle of law. Yet, it seems to me the government should be liable. Parliament has enacted very elaborate legislation in regard to individuals being liable for interest to their fellow-individuals in matters of contract and otherwise. Now, why should the government, when, by a verdict of the court, they are declared to be in the wrong, not be subject to a similar liability for interest as an individual? It is really difficult to account for the reason thereof. A case came under my observation in which, in 1883, a sum in the vicinity of twenty thousand dollars was paid for some timber limits. The Crown continued in possession of that fund and had all the advantages of the money in their possession since that time. The late government determined to repay the fund, and put it in the estimates at the instance of the Department of Justice, but without interest. They had had the use of th at money for years. I cite that to illustrate the hardship that is done to individuals by reason of very large amounts oftentimes being in the possession of the Crown without yielding anything, the Crown at the same time having all the advantages that an individual would enjoy by reason of having the use of the money. If it is fair as between individuals that interest should be paid, it seems to me strange that the Crown, in similar cases, should not be liable for interest to individuals.

The motion was agreed to.

INTEREST ON PAST DUE CLAIMS OWING BY THE CROWN.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW rose to inquire:

Is it the policy of the government to refuse payment of interest on past due claims owing by the Crown, when unable, from want of appropriation or other causes, to discharge such indebtedness when the same became actually due and payable for services rendered or material supplied for or on behalf of the Crown?

He said:—This is a case of extraordinary hardship to parties having claims against the government. They entered into a contract to supply material and perform work, expecting when their contract was completed that the money would be paid, but instead of that, they have often been told that from want of appropriation, or come other cause, the government could not pay them, and in consequence they had to make other arrangements, often at great disadvantage. I cannot understand why the government should take advantage of this kind against ordinary creditors. Surely they should be responsible for interest on debts after they become due. I cannot understand by what course of reasoning the government refuse to pay interest to their creditors. They take very good care to have security from parties dealing with them. They get certified cheques from parties tendering for contracts. Such being the case, they inflict serious injury on individuals when they defer payment of amounts for which the Crown is liable. Hon. gentlemen may say it is a small matter. It may be small for some parties, but it may be considerable to others. A man may be in straitened circumstances. He may be requiring this money to discharge his liabilities. Creditors will not be satisfied with being told that they cannot be paid, and private debtors must provide for the payment of their debts, and for interest on the money. I do hope that the government will take steps to prevent this injustice in the future. If appropriations are properly prepared I do not see why such cases of hardship should occur. It is competent for the officials to make provision for the service for the year, and if this is done there should be no such refusals to pay interest. The public should have the utmost confidence in the government. The government should be above any suspicion. The contractor should be free to say "we have undertaken the contract, our time for payment is a certain date and at that date we will get our money." They can then make arrangements with their creditors to pay them punctually. As it is now, when the time for payment comes they cannot get their money. The government should make some arrangement by which such difficulties cannot occur in the future. There should be some way of getting over it—by issuing the Governor General's warrant or providing a sum for contingencies. Everybody should know that when he is dealing with the government he is dealing with a government which will meet its obligations promptly when they become due. People say to me it is of no consequence if you have to wait three or four months for your money, but it may be a serious matter to a man to wait so long. I want to avoid anything of the kind in the future. The policy of the government should be to meet their engagements when they become due.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I must give my hon. the same answer that I did when his other question was up, that there are certain matters of indebtedness on the part of the Crown where interest is payable under the law. There are others in which it is not, and there are cases where the moral claim of the party is such that the government may make payment as a matter of grace, with the sanction of Parliament. I am not aware of any case where the parties have failed to obtain payment because the government were unable to pay. There may be cases where judgment has been had and there was no appropriation out of which to pay it, where the matter was not foreseen, and where the parties were obliged to wait until the appropriation was voted by Parliament. If there be such, they are very rare, and certainly not more frequent now than they have been every since this union was established. With regard to the payment of interest by the Crown, whether there should be an amendment of the law or not, I will say to my hon. friend that I have been giving some consideration to that subject, and as I have not yet discussed the matter with my colleagues, I am not in a position to express an opinion.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I merely mention these cases to the Minister of Justice I ask him now, if he makes a contract with a party to deliver a certain amount of goods, payable at a certain time, would not the government be in the same position as an individual? I think he would say that a government ought to be in a position to meet that indebtedness when it becomes due, and if they cannot do that, the least they can do is to make reasonable compensation in the way of interest. That is a reasonable proposition on the face of it, particularly when the government are so determined to have securities from parties undertaking contracts before they will let a contract.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is no worse now than it has ever been.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not say that it is, but if it is wrong it should be remedied. I am speaking as a business man, and I claim that the credit of this country should be above all suspicion. Such changes should be made in the law as would insure this.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (70) "An Act respecting the Bronsons and Weston Lumber Company, and to change its name to the Bronson Company."—(Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (12) "An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of George L. Williams."—(Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (11) "An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of Thomas Robertson."—(Mr. Clemow in the absence of Mr. Cox.)

LA BANQUE DU PEUPLE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. FORGET moved the second reading of Bill (6) "An Act respecting the Banque du Peuple." He said:—I understand some hon. gentlemen are opposed to the bill, but I think after the House has learned how this bank stands, their opposition will not be so active. The bill is to legalize a resolution passed on the twenty-fifth of January last by the shareholders and depositors. In 1897 Parliament had granted the directors two years to liquidate the assets of the bank. These two years expired on the first of May last. In 1895, when the bank suspended, a committee, composed of two gentlemen appointed by the depositors and one by the stockholders, were jointly appointed to help the directors to liquidate the bank. In 1895, when the bank suspended payment, the assets were $9,533,537.25. When these gentlemen made their report three months after, on October 7th, 1895, the assets were reduced to $6,597,348.31; but in the meantime they had paid a dividend in 1895 of 25 per cent to the depositors. Three months after again they made another report, on the 31st of December, 1895, showing another reduction of the assets. The assets were then $5,313,294. Two months after that again, on the 25th of February, they presented another report in which the total assets were $5,125,827.55. After this they declared a dividend of twenty-five per cent, making a total dividend of fifty per cent. One year after that, on the 27th of February, 1897, the assets had shrunk to $3,543,093.94. Eight months after, on the 1st of November, 1897, the assets were down to $3,146,819.04, and in that year the directors gave their personal security for $195,000 to the depositors. At a meeting of the 25th of January, 1899, the assets were shown to have been reduced to $521,320.94, to meet liabilities of $1,457,256.50 equal to 16⅕ per cent on the total amount due to the depositors. At that time they had paid already fifty-five per cent to the depositors. The guarantee of $195,000 represents six per cent of the total liabilities. The bank has a special charter. The directors are responsible for all the debts of the bank. They are not under the Banking Act as the other banks are that is, the directors are not responsible more than any other stockholders.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are the directors responsible to the shareholders as well?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—No, they are not. The shareholders are special partners. They have no double liability. They lose what they put in and no more. The directors are responsible only to the depositors. Stockholders in other banks are all joint partners, but with a double liability attached to their holdings. That is the difference between the Banking Act and that special charter.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—But the directors of the People's Bank are responsible?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—They are personally responsible for all liabilities to depositors.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are the shareholders responsible to the depositors to the extent of the amount of stock they hold in the bank?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—No. The stockholders have no responsibility at all in the bank. The only responsibility they have is to lose their money if the bank is not prosperous.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They have no claim on the directors. I have been informed by shareholders that they have entered action against the directors for the amount of the stock that they hold. What I ask is: are the directors responsible to the shareholders for the stock they hold?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I do not believe they are responsible, but I am not in a position to answer, that being a legal question. This bill relieves them of their civil responsibilities. If they have done anything criminal, if they have made false statements to the government or to their stockholders, they are still responsible. If I correctly read the papers, the Minister of Justice said this bill does not interfere with any recourse the stockholders may have against the directors criminally. The assets left in the bank on the 25th of January, 1889, were $521,320.94, to meet $1,457,256.50, equal to 16⅕ per cent of the total amount due the depositors. The guarantee of the directors represents 6 per cent, but to release that $521,320.94 an extension of at least two years is required. If you force a liquidation to-day I do not believe you could realize more than 50 per cent of that amount, because it is well understood the debtors of that bank have not had money to pay their indebtedness to other banks. If a man could not pay his note in four years, I would not give much for that note. I want to show to the House that the longer the bank lasts the poorer the assets will become. The directors say this: We will pay you 20 per cent more on $1,400,000, and we will take all the assets, and give us a full discharge. They have already paid 5 per cent, and will pay 15 per cent more on condition that they get this bill through Parliament and have a full discharge. They have already paid 5 per cent on condition that the stockholders and creditors get this bill through Parliament.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the directors are responsible to the depositors, why should they ask for a conveyance of the assets to them and release all their liabilities?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I understand it was offered by the depositors themselves. It would take two years more to collect them. We have not the power to do it, and we must go to the court and get one or two or three liquidators, and there will be lawsuits right and left, and at the end of two years we will not have anything.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Where do the shareholders come in?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—They will come in after the depositors get 100 cents on the dollar.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They ask to hand the assets over to the directors.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Yes, because they are going to pay for them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That 45 per cent is on the amount now due and not on the total amount.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Yes, it will realize 75 per cent and a fraction for the whole thing. The depositors will loose 25 per cent. For the directors to take over the assets, will necessitate an outlay from them of $275,000, and with all the risk of realizing, as I said before, on that half a million of assets for four years.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—A moment ago the hon. gentleman stated positively that the directors were not responsible to the shareholders. If they are not responsible to the shareholders, then why ask this Parliament to legislate their freedom from liability to the shareholders? You want a bill to let the shareholders say that they are free from action. Not only that, but to say that any actions and judgments now pending will have to be abolished. But if there is no claim by the shareholders against the directors, you do not require any legislation to put it right. The hon. gentleman also stated that at a meeting of the depositors and shareholders such and such resolutions were passed. I say that at that meeting that he calls a meeting of shareholders and depositors, the shareholders were not invited to be present.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The only information I have in the matter consists of the figures and papers given to me, and it is mentioned here as a meeting of depositors and shareholders.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—The shareholders were not asked to be there at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Depositors and creditors.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The House must remember that this is not an ordinary charter. Under its provisions the directors are the sole administration of the bank, and neither the shareholders nor the depositors have anything to do with it, and the former are not responsible further than the amount they have subscribed. That is their shares for which they payed $100 each share, but the directors are responsible not only for their shares but for the whole of the assets of the bank.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I know that.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—If the hon. gentleman knows all, why does he interrupt me? The directors are responsible, and in the present case they have given a certain amount of money, I believe it is $200,000.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—$195,000.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—But now they ask to be relieved, and the creditors and the depositors, having met, accept that compromise; but the shareholders as well as the depositors have a right not only to force these men to give up all their estate, but also to put them in prison if it can be shown that they have been in the wrong altogether.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I may tell the House that the directors are not responsible to the stockholders, for this reason: they were never elected by the stockholders. The first directors were named by Parliament. That is years ago, when they got their charter. Men were named as directors and since then they either died, or retired for one reason or another and the directors elected others to fill the vacancies. So that the stockholders have nothing to do with the elections of the directors. They never were elected by them. They had no right to vote. The directors were the proprietors of the bank and the stockholders were special partners. But the directors were responsible to the creditors, and to-day we are dealing with the creditors, and the creditors would rather take so much money than run the risk of getting nothing, and they were unanimous on that point. If the depositors were paid 100 cents on the dollar, then the stockholders would come in and take the balance. My hon. friend said a minute ago that the shareholders were never called to that meeting. I am handed a note here which says that the notices in the papers called both stockholders and shareholders.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The shareholders are called every year.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Will the hon. gentleman kindly read that notice?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I have not the notice here. I am handed a paper saying that such notices were given.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Look at the bill where it says that at a meeting of the creditors of the said bank held on the 25th January certain things were enacted; that meeting, apparently without the shareholders being represented, passed a resolution that the acceptance of this amount should release the directors from the claims of the shareholders, creditors and others.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—My hon. friend may be right, but I ask him to wait until the bill is in committee, where we can hear both parties and have a full discussion.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (C.B.)—Are there any law cases pending?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I am told they are all settled but one.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman one question on a point which has not been made clear to the House. What proportion of the liabilities has been paid off? When the Act of 1897 was passed, 50 per cent of the liabilities had been paid off. That is two years ago, and I should like to know what percentage has been paid off since.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—In 1895, 25 per cent was paid. In 1897 the assets were becoming very hard to collect; they were beginning to get shaky, and they paid 5 per cent in 1898, and paid 5 per cent on the 1st of May last.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—How much has been paid to the present time?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Sixty per cent, and they propose to pay 15 per cent after this bill is passed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They are going to pay 45 per cent?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—No.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The fact of the matter is, if sifted to the bottom, that this is what may be called a whitewashing bill. I made an application to the House early in the session for a return that would give us light upon very many questions with which this House ought to be cognizant, and which every senator in the House ought to have, in order to give an intelligent vote upon the bill now before it. I did get a return on the 17th May, but it was partly in French, and, unfortunately, there are a great many like myself in this House who do not understand French and who cannot make use of the return sufficiently to enable us to understand the question properly. I did not get that return in English yet, and my intention was, when my hon friend rose to move the second reading of the bill, to oppose it until I get it, and I can tell the hon. gentleman now, that if it is read the second time to-day I will endeavour, as far as I can, not to let it go before the committee until we get the return in English, so that hon. gentlemen may understand what they are voting upon. What is the history of this bank in which, unfortunately, I was a stockholder? I became a stockholder for the reason that I supposed the directors of it were responsible to the last dollar that they were worth to all the creditors and shareholders in connection with that bank.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Not to the stockholders.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Yes, to the stockholders.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—No.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—No.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I am telling what I understood and what many more than me understood, and what unfortunately too many widows and orphans in this country understood. They made a selection of this bank for two reasons; firstly, because it was supposed to be one of the sound financial institutions of the country, and, secondly, because the double liability did not attach to this bank whilst the directors were supposed to be responsible to the shareholders as well as all other creditors that might have anything to do with the bank. The history of the bank is this. It had a capital which was fully paid up of $1,200,000, and at the annual meeting in March, 1893, over 50 per cent was shown to be on hand as a "rest." In the returns from time to time, of the bank for years back, that institution was looked upon as one of the safest, what is called a gilt edged institution. And why? From the returns that these gentlemen were making of the affairs of the bank, it was never supposed to be in the unfortunate condition in which it stood till of a sudden, some time in June, 1895, a few months after the annual meeting referred to, the bank suspended payment. A meeting of the creditors and stockholders was called which I attended. The affairs of the bank, according to representations then made, were of such a character that it was supposed it would resume business in a short time, that it was a mere temporary suspension, and that the whole thing was on such a sound footing financially that they could resume business in a short while. From time to time meetings were called, but the shareholders got so careless about them that they ceased attending. Finally the directors made an application to Parliament in 1897, to relieve them from paying the amount due to the depositors for two years. The time was up on the first of May. They told us, as hon. gentlemen will remember, before the committee, that there would be no difficulty whatever in realizing from the assets of the bank a sufficient amount to pay the depositors, and that there would be something left. What are the facts? They come before us to-day, after the two years are up, having only paid 10 per cent of the 50 per cent remaining, and ask to be relieved from all responsibility by paying 45 per cent, which means that the depositors will get in all 75 per cent.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—No, 75 and a fraction.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Yes, 75 of the whole amount. But as against that they ask Parliament to hand over to them the assets of the bank and all the property that the bank possesses. If they are telling us the truth now, they were lying before. I cannot call it by any other name. They were telling us what was really false when it was stated the assets of the bank were sufficient two years ago to pay the 50 per cent. I tell the hon. gentleman that two years ago the statement that was made in the committee room was that they had sufficient assets to pay 50 per cent, and that if the Parliament of Canada would give them time, the 50 per cent would be paid to the depositors and something left.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The report to-day showing that they have half a million of assets is not made by the bank. It is made by the depositors and directors combined. The interest of the depositors is to get all they can out of it. The report is not made by the directors solely: it is made by both combined.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—An hon. friend beside me asks what about the shareholders? I can tell him. There is a schedule attached to the bill which states that so and so moved that a special Act be secured for the purpose of relieving these men on the payment of 45 per cent. Who does that? A gentleman owning seven shares at $50 a share. He represents the whole institution. Every shareholder in the bank is to be cut out by one man who, at the meeting of depositors, owns seven shares.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Will you name him?

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Arthur Boyer.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—He was not representing the stockholders: he was representing the depositors. The only representative of the shareholders was Mr. John Crawford.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—He is the only shareholder we have any evidence of who was present. I am not in possession, as I said before, of the statements from which I could give detailed information of the affairs of this bank from time to time, and consequently cannot touch upon it now. I look upon this as a most iniquitous bill. It is a bill of spoliation. It is taking possession of people's property in a high handed manner. I cannot see it in any other light. The hon. gentleman knows that these men, the directors of that bank, immediately before its suspension, must have known the state of affairs, or if they did not know the state of affairs, then they were not worthy of the position they held in trust for the benefit of widows and orphans and others who were shareholders in that bank. This House will not shield these directors, nor will it give them the privilege to-day of stepping out and relieving themselves of the responsibility which they willingly undertook, and in which, from time to time, they kept themselves, and for which they were well paid. I want to know what the last clause of this bill means:

The rights of the shareholders, creditors and depositors of the bank shall be suspended.

Why are the shareholders mentioned there at all if these directors are not responsible to the shareholders? The hon. gentleman's friends must have had a new light on this question since it came before Parliament. They must have discovered they were not responsible to the shareholders, although evidently at the time that they were concocting the bringing of this bill before Parliament they thought they were, either one thing or the other. I do not wish to take advantage of my hon. friend or I would move the six months' hoist at this moment. I want to give these men time to present the facts upon which they are asking this legislation before the committee, and I am sure that the committee will deal justly with them. I do not believe the shareholders will ever get a cent out of it. We are not looking forward to it in that way at all. I am interested in behalf of the unfortunate shareholders on principle. They were misled; they did not understand the situation, and I think it is the duty of the Senate of Canada to put its foot down on any such legislation. Moreover, I want to say this, that in the House of Commons committee I heard this question asked, "that it was the duty of those who were opposing the bill to show to the committee that the affairs of the bank would not be as well off by allowing this bill" as it would be by having the bank go into liquidation. I do not think it is the duty of those who are opposed to the bill to show that. The promoters of the bill assume the affirmative, and it is for them to show that the course they are taking is better for the creditors, and I will give this warning, that before it goes to that committee they had better be in a position to show that if they want to get this bill through. We do not want to take them unawares; we want to give them every facility for showing the grounds upon which they are prosecuting this case, and they will meet fair play and justice, but I can say this, that if they do not show by clear figures and evidence that they are entitled to this legislation they will find the Senate of Canada is not going to come to their relief.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I am very happy to find the House in earnest and endeavouring to ascertain everything concerning this institution, and to do things properly. It is the right way, and I think when the Senate passes legislation without thorough investigation, it is wrong. Fourteen years ago, when the charter of that bank had expired, I rose in my place here to oppose the continuation of the charter. And why? I said then because the bank was already a ruined bank, and it had been ruined all through its existence. I remember when the bank was in the worst position imaginable. When the charter was asked for, the bank had lowered itself to such an extent that it was obliged to ask that its capital be reduced by 75 per cent. It had to come back to 25 per cent. That ought to have been enough to show the House that the charter was wrong. When the charter expired I said: "Why not change it and give it a charter like other institutions which were so prosperous under their charters?" But no. Hon. gentlemen, there was too much lobbying and too much talking to members before the bill was considered. I was spoken to myself, but I knew I was in the right. I have no interest in this matter myself. At the time I am speaking of my poor wife had a few thousand dollars in it, so I gave a little more attention to the matter; but she died, and I have no interest whatever in the bank now, but my wife's family loses a great deal by that institution. Therefore, I was a little interested in that. Though I had that interest, I was anxious to do my public duty. In the year 1897 I called the attention of the House to the bad position of the bank, and asked: "How can the House grant a charter when it is proved that the bank is now reduced to a capital of 25 per cent?" However, we must take things as they are to-day, and for my own part I do not agree with the hon. member from Glengarry. I believe the best thing that can be done for the parties interested at the present moment is to accept the arrangement proposed in this bill, and why? Because all those widows and orphans whose money has been deposited there will receive as much as they can ever get of it. If the present situation is allowed to go on, the capital will be reduced, and the widows and orphans will lose so much more. As for the shareholders, they have lost every cent of their money? They have no expectation that they will ever recover it. There is no expectation that the depositors will receive the full amount of their claim, so I see no good to be accomplished by prolonging the matter. On the con trary, I believe it is in the interest of those who have suffered to deal with this question now. We should deal with it in a humane manner, since Parliament had not the courage to act in time and make things right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Quite enough discussion has taken place now on the affairs of this bank to put the Banking Committee on their guard and to ensure that the measure will be considered fully there, and I do not really see what object can be gained by any further consideration of the details of the management of the bank on the floor of the House. I just wish to call the attention of the committee to the language used in one or two clauses of the bill. The last clause is a very sweeping one indeed, and I think ought to be considered with great care. It provides :

This Act shall apply to suits pending and judgments rendered.

That is unusual. Then the third clause, to which the hon. gentleman from Glengarry (Mr. McMillan) has referred, undertakes to deal with the rights of the shareholders. Now, the shareholders were not invited to this meeting which took place. It was a meeting of creditors and depositors, and it does not seem to me to be altogether the correct thing that, as a result of that meeting, the rights of the shareholders should be dealt with just as though they had been present. I do not suppose their rights amount to much, since their stock is good for nothing. Then at the close of the clause, it says that the directors, on whom the whole responsibility rests at present, shall be finally freed and discharged from every claim or action which the shareholders, depositors and other creditors of the bank might have against them.

There could not be a more complete and sweeping liberation of the directors from all the responsibility which the law has placed upon them. I have no doubt the committee will deal with the matter fully and thoroughly. Probably the hon. gentleman from DeLanaudiere (Mr. Bellerose) is right in what he said.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would make a suggestion. From what has fallen from the hon. gentleman from Glengarry, as to his determination to oppose any action on the part of the Banking Committee until the information on the table is translated into English, it might be well to instruct the Clerk to have the translators translate it in time to have it printed, and laid before the committee. That would facilitate the matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When the return was laid on the table, the hon. gentleman from Glengarry called attention to the fact that part of it was in French. I then said if any member of the Printing Committee was present, it would be well to have the return translated and printed in English. I presumed that that would be done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it is necessary to make a motion I shall do so.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Why did not the hon. gentleman from Glengarry see the Clerk and have it done?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I had a conversation with the Clerk of the House, but he did not feel that it was a duty that he was called on to perform.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I shall move that the Clerk be authorized to have the document translated into English and printed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Only the other day we appointed an additional translator, and I do not see the necessity of going outside for another to do the work.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I am not here representing the directors of the bank, as has been suggested. I am here representing the depositors and the creditors, who brought this bill before the House. I do not want to excuse the directors if they are at fault. However, that will be threshed out in committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As the hon. gentleman says he represents the depositors, I should like to know what proportion of them consent to this bill.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I understood that they were unanimous at the meeting which took place on the twenty-fifth of January last.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—The hon. gentleman says he represents only the depositors; then his bill should only affect the interests of the depositors; but the bill deals with the shareholders as well. That is what I object to.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I said I had nothing to do with the directors.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—There were no shareholders at that meeting, and this bill not only wipes out the possibilities of action, but wipes out actions already entered, and judgments even.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Might I ask the hon. gentleman in charge of this bill what proportion of the dividend already paid to the depositors was realized from the assets of the bank, and what proportion did they pay out of their own resources? Have they already paid any moneys from their own private resources?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—No. they have not paid anything from the guarantee of $195,000, that is held in trust. They have guaranteed that personally, but nothing has been paid out of it yet. It has been given as a guarantee to the creditors to make up any deficiency after the assets are all realized upon.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What creditors are there outside of the depositors and stockholders?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I do not know of any.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The resolution passed at the meeting of creditors is in the schedude of the bill, and reads this way:

> It is hereby resolved to grant to the directors of said bank a full and complete discharge of their liabilities towards the bank and themselves on payment of said sum of 45 cents in the dollar as above stated, on the balance yet due, and to transfer to said directors all the assets of said bank of whatever nature they may be, in order to afford them the means of paying said amount.

Therefore, if what remains from the wreck of the bank is sufficient to pay this forty-five cents, the directors will escape without contributing one cent.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The guarantee is six one-hundredths on the total liabilities, and they are going to pay fifteen per cent—they are going to pay $275,000.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does not this bill relieve them from all further liabilities?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—After paying 15 per cent. I am not able to give the hon. gentleman all the information required. All information will be furnished in the committee.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Will the hon. gentleman give us a statement showing in detail, as near as possible, how they disposed of the assets of the bank and what percentage of that was paid to the depositors?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I think my hon. friend will get all that information from the directors and representatives of the depositors themselves.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—And what salaries they paid themselves?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—You will get all that in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned.

LOAN COMPANIES BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS introduced Bill (P) "An Act respecting Loan Companies."

He said:—This measure is much the same as the bill introduced by me here last session, and which was approved of by the Senate. In order to give certain parties who desired further time to consider the bill an opportunity of giving it that consideration which they desired, the measure was allowed to stand over until this session. There were many suggestions made by loan companies, and by others, that I have had an opportunity of considering since last session. There have also been objections made by some of the provincial governments, on the ground that they thought we were encroaching on their jurisdiction in thus incorporating loan companies. I have considered these representations and have made some modification of the bill in consequence of those representations. In my opinion there can be no doubt that the incorporation of loan companies legitimately comes under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. Loan companies are closely allied to banking institutions on the one side, and to trade and commerce on the other. The incorporation of companies with the view of lending money or investing capital in various enterprises, and taking security, is as much a matter of trade and commerce as the sale of ordinary merchandise. It is true that when a company lending money undertakes to take security upon lands, the local legislature may exercise jurisdiction in respect to such securities, and to state how far the lands may be held by foreign corporations if any such are seeking to do business in Canada, but a loan company incorporated by the Parliament of Canada can scarcely be considered such an institution. The object of the bill is, in the first place, to enable corporations to be called into existence by letters patent, with the franchises and the power which ordinarily pertain to loan companies, and so we provide by the bill that the Governor in Council may, in respect to certain matters, make regulations as to the terms and conditions upon which letters patent may be issued. We also set out in the bill the minimum number of persons required to make application, and the names to be given in order that such applications may be entertained. In the bill we also provide for the union in the letters patent of two or more companies having similar objects, and stating the conditions upon which letters patent may issue where this object is the main design of the parties in obtaining the letters patent. We also set out the manner of constituting a provisional board, and the conditions under which their functions as a provisional board come to an end. We also impose restrictions on the company; before it receives a certificate from the Minister of Finance and the Receiver General undertaking to transact business, we require that a certain amount of capital shall be subscribed, and a certain portion paid in before such certificate can be issued. We also provide in the bill that after the incorporation has taken place, two or more loan companies that come under the provisions of the bill may become amalgamated, and let the new organization take over the assets and the liabilities of the old corporation. We also provide in what manner the company may invest money, giving in this respect large powers, but we do not authorize them to invest in undertakings or enterprises that ought to have their organization outside of the Dominion or outside of any of the provinces. We impose, with regard to corporations within the Dominion, this restriction, that no loan companies incorporated under this Act can invest or lend money upon the security of stock of any other loan company. That restriction we think is necessary, because there is sometimes a temptation arising, it may be from personal conflict or from rivalry in institutions engaging in the loaning of money, to embarrass each other by undertaking to acquire, by investment in stocks, an undue influence over each other. And so we think that the advantages to be derived from this restriction, to those who are investing money in those enterprises, more than compensates, on the whole, for any mischief that may arise from closing this source of investment. We provide in the bill for the issue of debenture stock, and we also provide that where such stock is issued it shall be treated as ordinary debentures that are issued by the company. It shall be a liability upon the company, and when the manner of investment is considered and the amount of money which they may receive in proportion to the paid up capital which they have, that there shall be a limitation in that regard upon the amount so received by the company, and that the debenture stock that is issued shall be considered a part of the ordinary liability in that regard. We also provide for an increase or decrease of the capital, stating in what way the company may decrease its capital stock and under what circumstances an increase may take place. These are the general provisions of the bill. Those provisions cover the ordinary ground that is covered by the charter of a loan company, and I think if the bill becomes law it will be less necessary to apply for individual Acts of incorporation to the legislature than has been the practice heretofore; that letters patent may be obtained, that the organization may be called into existence and that the security had will be quite as great as it would be if each individual company were to come here on every occasion for a charter or an Act of incorporation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask the hon. gentleman whether the bill he proposes to place upon the statute-book will apply to companies now in existence, or only to those that are going to be organized and established under the proposed law?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It will apply to companies organized and established under the law that I propose, and also to any existing companies which choose to come under its provisions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—To what extent will it interfere with any of the powers that loan companies now have under their special charters, or under letters patent which they may have obtained, and is there any provision also for the permission of loan companies to take deposits and, if so, if the security to the depositors will take priority to the other indebtedness which the company may incur? My hon. friend is aware that many loan companies take deposits. Of course they loan that money, but, I desire to know whether, in case of failure, or the company becoming insolvent, the depositors have a prior right to be paid over other creditors.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The law as I propose it does not touch the question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I drew from my hon. friend's remarks that he has considered that point referring to the union of companies, which would do away with the necessity of going to Parliament in case they thought proper to unite. I understood it was one of the contentions of the provinces that that was a power which was not vested in the Dominion Parliament. I suppose my hon. friend has considered that point well.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I have no doubt that the bill, as presented, is within our jurisdiction.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE, 1892, AMENDMENT BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Second reading (Bill 2) an Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, so as to make more effectual provision for the punishment of seduction and abduction.—(Hon. Mr. Vidal.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS said:—I expected to have brought down a bill amending the criminal law. It is in the printer's hands and I hope I will be able to present it to the House to-morrow. This provision forms a clause in the bill, except with regard to the age of consent, and that may be considered by my hon. friend when the bill comes up. He proposes that the age of 18 be substituted for 16, and if that were adopted it would require some other changes with regard to the subject of abduction. The same principle would apply in the one case as in the other. The bill would raise the age of consent in seduction from 16 to 18. Then we would require to raise it in abduction from 16 to 18, because of the want of maturity of judgment on the part of the girl to protect herself. I would ask my hon. friend not to press this bill, but to consider it in connection with the other bill when it comes up to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It was at the request of my hon. friend that I postponed the second reading until to-day, in order that the other bill might be produced. Of course the promise now given of its speedy introduction should satisfy me. While I have very little personal interest in the matter, still I do not wish to allow it to be interfered with. If the principle is admitted in the larger bill to be introduced, then this, of course, would be of no particular value. However, I think it is wise and proper that I should accept the suggestion which the hon. gentleman has made, because it is a reasonable one. I therefore move that the order of the day be discharged and placed on the order paper for Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTHERN COMMERCIAL TELEGRAPH COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved the second reading of Bill (M) "An Act respecting the Northern Commercial Telegraph Company, Limited." He said:—This is a short bill amending the charter given by Parliament last year to the Northern Commercial Telegraph Company. It provides that the directors of the company need not be persons resident in Canada. They are all British subjects. Then the company takes power to extend its telegraph lines up in the Yukon and British Columbia, and takes power also to increase its stock to £300,000 sterling.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to ask the hon. leader of the House for the return regarding the carrying of the mail from Sackville, N.B., to Cape Tormentine.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that I have not received it yet, but I will drop a note again to my colleague.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When may we expect it? It was moved for a long time ago.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is asking a question that I am not able to answer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It would not be difficult for the hon. minister to find out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will make a memorandum of it. When was the return moved for?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In the early part of the session.

CANADA LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the second reading of Bill (62) "An Act respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company."

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is this the bill for and against which so many petitions have been presented.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think some explanation should be given.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The bill is on the hon. gentleman's desk and explains itself.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—We should have an explanation; the bill has not been distributed yet.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

TRADE MARK AND DESIGN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (41) "An Act in further amendment of the Trade Mark and Design Act." He said:—This is a bill asked for by certain labour men, who are most anxious, as the bill was defeated in the Senate last year, to be heard before any vote of this House disposing of the matter is taken. It seemed to me that the most convenient way would be to allow the bill to be read the second time, without committing anybody to the principle of the bill, and to give the representatives of this body an opportunity of being heard before the committee to which the bill would be referred.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is a public bill and would go to a Committee of the Whole House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In this event I would ask that the order of the day be discharged, and that the bill be put down for second reading on Tuesday next, so as to give the parties an opportunity of being heard.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does my hon. friend propose to have the representatives of the Trades Unions heard before the bar of the House? That is what his motion would imply. If not, by whom would these representatives be heard, and where?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They could be heard at the bar of the House, but that is not desirable; or the bill could be referred to a special committee and they could be heard before that committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must confess I had overlooked the bill and its provisions altogether. Is it the same bill that was introduced last year and rejected by the Senate, or are there changes in it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are some changes in it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has been passed by the lower House, and I see it is introduced by Mr. Sproule. Does the government assume the responsibility of the bill in this House?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I am simply acting as a private member of this House, because there was no one here in charge of the bill. I did not want the bill to be disposed of without due consideration. Of course, I supported the principle of the bill last year, and take the same view still, but the majority of the House entertained a different view and, therefore, I thought, as these people desired to be heard before this House before the bill was finally disposed of, that if the second reading was taken and the bill referred to a committee, the parties could be notified and they would have an opportunity of stating their views to that committee.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Why should it not go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That would be a very satisfactory committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, it could be heard before that committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suggest that it be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (124) "An Act to amend the Inland Revenue Act."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the bill be read the second time on Monday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would it not be well to explain the purport of that measure, as it is an important one?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a short bill, and I shall be glad to read it. I have not considered it myself, and I do not think I could enlighten the House very much upon it. It is simply amending the Inland Revenue Act in some particulars, substituting the word "two" for "one" in one particular paragraph. I do not know what that alteration refers to, and I am quite unable to explain it. I will give the House a clear explanation of it on the second reading, and I hope the House will accept it.

The motion was agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS introduced Bill (Q) "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the bill be read the second time on Friday next. He said:—This bill is somewhat long. I need not undertake to give an explanation of it. It will be in galley form and will be printed for distribution, and upon the second reading I shall be prepared to explain its provisions. In fact, there are very few general principles involved in the bill. It is necessarily a bill of detail, amending the existing law, and nearly everything connected with it can be better discussed in committee than at any other stage.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (108) "An Act respecting the Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Pontiac, and to change its name to the Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Pembroke."—(Mr. Clemow.)

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (N) "An Act to amend the Companies Act." He said:—I have no further explanations to give than those I gave on the first reading of the bill. There is one principle involved in the bill. It makes provision for the issue of preference stock, and gives to the holders of that stock special representation upon the board. I think that it has generally met with the approval of companies, and that the principle will commend itself to the consideration of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will my hon. friend inform the Senate if any special case has arisen which calls for this amendment to the Act? Let me also ask my hon. friend whether, in using the expression "Revised Statutes," he means the Consolidated Statutes of 1886?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When we reach another bill I will call his attention to the fact that where his expression "Revised Statutes" is used in examining the statutes I could not find the Acts to which they refer, but I found them afterwards in the statutes of 1891 and 1892. However, that does not apply now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is only one principle introduced in it. Those who had to do with the working out of the Companies Act have found a considerable amount of inconvenience has arisen where companies want to create a limited amount of preference stock. We know Acts of Parliament passed under which preference stock can be issued, and in England, under the Companies Act, they do issue preference stock. This bill provides that the people interested may, if they so desire, at a meeting at which all are unanimous, either by being personally present and voting for it, or by proxy, create preference stock; or three-fourths in value of the shareholders may at any time create a preference stock, but in that case they must get the consent of the Governor General in Council to the issue of the preference stock. It is found very often that persons enter into a company developing some enterprise or other, and they exhaust perhaps $50,000 and find they want more stock, and they have faith enough in it to offer to let others come in and give them certain advantages and it is found to facilitate business to a very marked degree. It saves the necessity of coming to Parliament to obtain that power. There can be no hesitation in giving the right to the persons who are directly interested, the shareholders. where they must all agree before preference stock can be issued; and where less than all are desirous of issuing preference stock, then it requires three-fourths, and in that case the consent of the Governor in Council must be obtained before it can be done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not see any objections to the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

OTTAWA ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (18) "An Act respecting the Ottawa Electric Railway Company." He said:—This bill is to empower the company to extend its line from Hintonburg, or some point on its present line in Nepean, in the county of Carleton, to some point near Bell's Corners. There is no objection to that clause. The other is to remove the disability now existing as to running cars on Sunday. As hon. gentlemen are aware, a plebiscite was taken in Ottawa on the Sunday car question, resulting in a majority in favour of Sunday cars. The company desire this legislation in order that they may comply with the wishes of the people. I believe it is the feeling in the city that the cars should be allowed to run on Sunday, and the railway company are willing to comply with the wishes of the people, but before it can be done, this bill must be passed.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Second reading (Bill 2) "An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, so as to make more effectual provision for the punishment of Seduction and Abduction."—(Mr. Vidal.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS said:—I would ask my hon. friend to let this order of the day stand till a week from to-day, as the other bill of which I have charge is not yet printed.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I feel the importance of the request made, on account of the bill, which makes considerable change in the criminal law, being almost ready for distribution, and in my judgment it would be a very convenient way of dealing with the bill of which I have charge if I could persuade either the Minister of Justice or the House to accept the amendment when in committee, making the one change in the bill. Still, as I desire to preserve the right and power of going on with the bill in case of anything occurring not exactly as I would like in committee, I move that the bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time on Wednesday, 14th June. That will give the House an opportunity of considering the other measure before this bill is taken up.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the House adjourns, I wish to call the attention of the members of the government once more to the delay in bringing down returns that have been asked for. I find that the return asked for last session has not been brought down, and that another return, which I have repeatedly called attention to, is not forthcoming.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would ask my hon. friend to mention the particular returns.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Send over a memo. of them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There are three returns now overdue. One of them is for information relative to the opening of a bonded warehouse in King's County, P.E.I., in the premises of John G. Scrimigeour. I asked for it a month or two ago, and it has not yet been brought down. Another refers to the Cape Tormentine mails. My hon. friend, I am sure, has not forgotten this return to which I have called attention two or three times since I thought it should have been here. The other motion was for a return showing what money had been expended on straightening a curve in the Prince Edward Island Railway near North Wiltshire, and other information relative to straightening curves on the Prince Edward Island Railway. These three returns are now long overdue, and I hope the hon. minister will be kind enough to see that they are brought down at an early date.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the return I asked for at the opening of the session, three months ago—correspondence relative to the dismissal of Mr. Ketcheson, a mail clerk in the county of Hastings—the affidavits in the case. I also moved for a return for further information in reference to dismissals, royal commissions, &c. That was also moved for at a very early period of the session, being a continuation of the information contained in a document laid before the House last session. Perhaps we will get them at the opening of next session.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It will be meritorious.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It will be a very meritorious act, I admit, on the part of the present government, because they seldom bring down returns in less than six, eight or twelve months.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are some four years standing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The old story, following a bad example.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have endeavoured to get information from the different departments. I expected the return to which the hon. gentleman referred, relating to the mail service, to-day, but have not received it.

IMPERIAL LOAN AND INVESTMENT COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (H) "An Act incorporating the Imperial Loan and Investment Company of Canada." with amendments. He said:—The first amendment is simply giving the company power to lend money on leasehold as well as on freehold property. The next amendment is to insert "provided also the company shall not invest or lend money on the security of the stock of any other loan company." Then the next amendment is in clause 20 which reads "the new company may have an agency or agencies in any city or cities in England, Scotland or Ireland, and any by-law passed for such purpose," &c. After the word "purpose" the committee have added "establishing such agency." That is simply to make the matter clearer. Then it prescribes what the vote shall be—"the shareholders present or represented by proxy." The committee have amended that clause by adding "and holding not less than two-thirds of the issued capital stock of the company represented at such meeting." The last amendment is merely a verbal one.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved concurrence in the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to ask the minister when the correspondence and other documents for which I moved on the 18th May last will be laid on the table.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What was the subject?

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Re Capt. Norwood.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The department was duly notified, but I will make further inquiry.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (K) "An Act for the relief of Isaac Stephen J. Gerow Van Wart."—(Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (10) "An Act respecting the Nisbet Acadamy of Prince Albert."—(Mr. Lougheed.)

THE COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (N) "An Act to amend the Companies Act."

(In the Committee.)

On the third clause.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I think it would be utterly impossible to comply with the first part of that clause. It is an impossibility to get every stockholder in the company to be present to ratify any arrangement or any by-law. Some live at a distance and it would be impossible to trace them, and others might be unwilling or unable to attend; therefore, it would be an utter impossibility to get the total number of shareholders to assent to any proposition of this bill. I have had some personal knowledge of how such legislation would work. I was connected with a company some years ago that had a similar provision, and it served admirably in settling the affairs of the company. We find when companies act under that clause, and it is necessary to raise money, some shareholders expect the majority to do the business for them while they reap the benefit. This measure is in the right direction, and I leave it to the Minister of Justice to consider whether a majority of 75 per cent should not be sufficient. I understand the subject, and think it very desirable that this change should be made. Another change might be necessary; if it should occur that the parties agreeing to this preference stock should at any time consider it necessary to be reinstated in their original position, some provision should be made in the bill to enable them to be so reinstated without having to apply to Parliament for legislation. I offer the suggestion to the Minister of Justice. If the hon. gentleman will look at the legislation of 1867, 1868 and 1871, he will find the provisions to which I refer and which served such a useful purpose in the case of the company to which I refer.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that the sanction of all the shareholders is not absolutely necessary. It may be sanctioned by the unanimous vote of all the shareholders present, or by the unanimous affirmation of the parties who are shareholders, in writing.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—You can easily see that a very few members might be present, and have power to bind the great majority. It would be better to require the approval of a majority of three-fourths of the shareholders.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The bill has been very carefully considered by a large number of the companies, and they entirely approve of this provision, and as it has been approved by those who have had large practical experience, I do not apprehend there is any difficulty with regard to the matter. The provisio is intended to be an additional security that if three-fourths of those present, or three-fourths of the shareholders by written consent have approved of the measure, then it shall receive the sanction of the Governor in Council. If the vote of the meeting be not unanimous, or the approval is not unanimous but represents the views of three-fourths of the shareholders, the matter may be referred to the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—If there should be only twenty shareholders present at a meeting called, and they should be unanimous, they could carry this clause. Is it not usual to provide that there must be either a certain number of shareholders, or shareholders holding a certain amount of stock, present?

Hon. McMILLAN—This provides for three-fourths in value of the shareholders of the company. It does not matter how many are present so long as three-fourths in value of the shareholders are represented in the meeting.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As the hon. gentleman from York says, there may be only twenty shareholders out of three hundred present, and their unanimous consent would carry. The word "unanimous" is something unusual in bills of this kind. In the issuing of preferential stock of railway and other companies, it is usual to have two-thirds or three-fourths of the shareholders present, or representing two-thirds or three-fourths of the stock, or a majority of the stock, I know that is the usual practice.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—At that first meeting, supposing there were two or three dissentients?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—One would be enough.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It would not be unanimous, and their action would be inoperative.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then it could be referred to the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It would be better to make the first meeting sufficient to carry it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—One advantage has been suggested to me: if the shareholders present are unanimous, then it avoids the necessity, if I understand the bill, of their going to the Secretary of State. If they are not unanimous, but secure the assent of three-fourths in value of the shareholders, then they can go to the Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend refer to three-fourths in value of the shareholders present at the meeting?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, three-fourths in value of the shareholders of the company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With all due deference to the opinion expressed by the Minister of Justice, I think the language of this clause is susceptable to the contention that in the event of there not being a unanimous sanction by the vote of the shareholders to the proposed issuance of preference stock, then growing out of that meeting, three-fourths in value of the shareholders may sanction this particular act, subject. of course, to the approval of the Governor in Council. It seems to me to proceed from the one action—if the shareholders do not unanimously agree, then three-fourths of the shareholders may do something else.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend cannot put that construction on the clause, because there is another mode of proceeding.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It makes provision for the calling of the general meeting, then, growing out of that meeting, in the event of the shareholders not being unanimous, I submit it may be argued that the three-fourths in value of the same shareholders may, under this bill, proceed to do something. There should be some machinery introduced into the bill by which shareholders should receive special notice of the meeting being called for this purpose. I understand from this clause that the meeting is to be duly called to consider this particular matter, but it seems to me there should be some provision or some particular mode of giving notice to the shareholders, so that due publicity should be given.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that the clause is not open to the objection which he makes. In the first place, no such by-law shall have any force or effect whatever until after it has been unanimously sanctioned by a vote of the shareholders present in person, or by proxy, at a general meeting of the company, duly called for considering the same. That is one mode of proceeding; it must be duly called for the purpose. Every shareholder is notified as to the object of the meeting, and knows how much he is interested in it, to what extent he can entrust the settlement of the affair to his colleagues, and if he has any special interest, or any feeling that it is necessary to be present in order that he may guard his own interest, he no doubt will be present, and if such a meeting, duly called for such purpose, unanimously decide upon the question, then their decision is binding upon the company. This, my hon. friend will observe, is a simple amendment to an existing law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Oh, I have no objection to the principle of the bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then the second proceeding is that they may unanimously sanction in writing the proposed change. The shareholders of the company may do so. Unless they all do so, then the proceeding in that way is not binding, provided, however, that if the by-law be sanctioned, whether at a general meeting or in this other mode of proceeding by writing, by three-fourths in value of the shareholders of the company, the company may, through the Secretary of State, petition the Governor General for an order approving of the said by-law. Now, the three-fourths means three-fourths of the shareholders of the company and not three-fourths of the shareholders present at the meeting; not three-fourths of the shareholders who may sign the writing, but three-fourths of the shareholders, those who hold shares in the company, and if they do so, then they may petition the Governor General through the Secretary of State, and it will be then for the Governor in Council to decide whether they will give effect to the wishes so expressed or not.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Am I not right in coming to the conclusion that, according to the first paragraph, if a meeting is duly called to consider this matter, it may be a company with two, or three, or four, or five hundred shares, and 25 or 30 shareholders may attend, and they are all unanimous, according to the wording of this clause, that would suffice to carry the vote, but surely that is a very unusual thing to give the power to so small a proportion of the shareholders to legislate for the rest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The notice calling this meeting must be in conformity with the statutes. That notice must convey to the shareholders the object of the meeting; the notice of the time and place for holding the general meeting shall be given at least 21 days previously thereto in some newspaper published in the place where the head office, or chief place of business of the company, is situated, and if there is no such newspaper, then in the place nearest thereto where the newspaper is published. That is clause 33 of the Companies Act of which this is an amendment. This clause only applies to the Companies Act.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—That is very proper, but at the same time it makes no provision for any proportion, either in numbers or the amount of stock, to carry very important changes in the company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Section 33 only provides a method for calling a meeting of the shareholders.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is a general meeting and has to be called in conformity with that notice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—"In the absence of other provisions in that behalf." Therefore, I say that in the event of a by-law being passed dispensing with all these safeguards which are so necessary for the calling of a meeting of shareholders, section 33 would not be in operation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—How would they pass the by-laws?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It might be in the interest of those in control of the company to pass a by-law dispensing with many methods which we assume to be necessary for the calling of a meeting, and only provide for a post card being sent or something of that kind.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No by-law can contradict the statute.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It reads: "In the absence of other provisions in that behalf." They say that in such event such and such steps shall be taken for the calling of a meeting.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Certain companies, in their Acts of incorporation, define how meetings shall be called. Does this contravene that?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Supposing that we dispense with many of the formalities which we consider to be a safeguard for the calling of meetings, and the shareholders provide very meagre methods of calling that meeting, then that very meagre system would supercede the provisions of section 33 of the Company's Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We should define what shall be meant by "duly called." Duly called in this case would cover every company having an incorporation and the means provided for calling the meeting. If there are no provisions in the special Act, then clause 33 of chapter 119 would prevail; but as the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) has suggested, they might have passed a by-law. They have power to pass by-laws, declaring that it shall be simply by advertising in the newspapers. Now, for the changing of the whole value of the property in a company of this kind,—that is the value of the shares—there should be a notice given to every shareholder, or provision made for notifying, of what is intended to be done, and that cannot be done by ordinary newspaper notices, because there are hundreds of shareholders of companies in this country, in England, Ireland and Scotland. In such cases where would you advertise? An advertisement in this country never would reach them. You might provide for it in the way I suggest, that provision should be made for sending a circular to each of the shareholders, stating the object of the meeting, being for the reduction of the stock or the issue of preferential stock as the case may be.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That condition is in force in several companies. They must send a notice, registered in the post office, to every stockholder in the company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But that would not meet the case of companies where there is no such provision.

Hon. Mr. COX—The issue of preference stock is a serious matter, and I think there should be some provision to imperatively require the consent of at least three-fourths of the ordinary shareholders. It is possible for a meeting to be regularly called and an insufficient number to attend that meeting. That number might be unanimous, and as I read in this, the preference stock might be issued without any opposition on the part of those present at the meeting, but there might be a very small minority of the entire shareholders present. I think it should imperatively require the sanction of at least three-fourths of the holders of any stock. And if they did not attend the meeting they should be summoned again and their consent obtained in some way. They should be either present in person or by proxy.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think hon. gentlemen are proceeding upon the assumption that those who are managing the affairs of the company, who call the meeting for the purpose of transacting this business on behalf of the company, have a disposition to ruin the prospects of the company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That might possibly be. Take the Farmers' Loan Company. There is an illustration of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think the whole theory upon which loan companies and other companies are organized is for the purpose of promoting the interest of those who are shareholders. If the amendment is made, I suppose in that first section, as a matter of abundant caution, it would answer the purpose. "No such by-law shall have any force or effect whatever until after it has been unanimously sanctioned by a vote of the shareholders present, in person or by proxy, at a general meeting duly called for considering the same." We might add "representing a majority."

Hon. Mr. COX—Representing a three-fourths majority.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is a very large majority.

Hon. Mr. COX—Not too large to issue preference stock. It is no hardship to require that at least three-fourths shall be present in person or by proxy.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Two-thirds is enough.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You already admit the principle in the other section, and not only that but you have added on to that that the consent of the Governor in Council, through the Secretary of State, must be obtained.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Now you require that three-fourths of the shareholders must be present at the meeting, either in person or by proxy and that they must be unanimous.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh no, you strike out the word unanimous.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If you require that three-fourths shall be present at the meeting, and that they shall be unanimous, you are asking too much. The usual clause inserted in private bills for railway companies is that important changes of that kind shall be made at a regularly called meeting of the company where two-thirds in value of the shareholders are present, either in person or by proxy; and then you might say that three-fourths of those might agree. But to say that you shall have three-fourths of the members of the company at a meeting called for this purpose, to which possibly no member of the company has any objection, is going too far. Why should you put them to the trouble of attending?

Hon. Mr. COX—I do not think it would be difficult or unreasonable to get three-fourths of the shareholders of any company to consent to the issuance of preference stock, and in the absence of that it ought not to be done.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But that is not what is required. The second requirement is that if the shareholders at the meeting are not unanimous, then three-fourths of them must ask in writing for the change.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend does not observe that the intended security of the shareholder is the earlier part of the section. It nevertheless affords really less security than the latter part of the section, because a small portion of the shareholders may be present, and may unanimously consent to the issuance of preference stock.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me, as a matter of convenience, the better way would be to provide that a certain kind of notice shall be given which the directors by by-law cannot alter, and that if the shareholders have satisfactory notice they should be taken as having given their assent.

Hon. Mr. COX—But it is so easy to call a meeting of shareholders, and from various reasons they do not attend. Take a company with a capitalization of $1,000,000 of common stock. I do not think it would be right for the shareholders of that company to issue preference stock if more than $250,000 of capital were opposed to it. It would not be hard, by communication, to get the opinion of at least $750,000 out of $1,000,000, and they should have the sanction of at least that amount before proceeding to issue preference stock. I do not think that would be any hardship. The bill intends to make that provision, but the first part of the clause renders it possible for the shareholders to the extent of say three hundred thousand dollars of the shares to be present and agree to issue preference stock, while the holders of seven hundred thousand dollars may not have an opportunity of expressing an opinion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that, as I have consented to amend the section, it requires the unanimous vote of those present, and requires two-thirds of the stock to be represented. I think that is going a very long way, and that may represent, and in all probability would represent, far more than three-fourths of the stock. The meeting must be regularly called, the vote must be unanimous and it must represent two-thirds of the stock.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—If two-thirds are represented, that would be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. COX—I would like to see it made compulsory, that by some means they should communicate with the shareholders and get their consent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see the meeting must be duly called. Every man has the keeping of his own interest in his own hands, and if there is a single stockholder present, under that clause as it is amended, opposed to the action of the meeting, although there should be a two-thirds vote, it would not carry. The vote must be unanimous, and that, I should think, would be a greater security than simply to say three-fourths.

The clause was amended, and agreed to as amended.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct the attention of the minister again to the clause which the hon. gentleman from Rideau Division has referred to, and ask my hon. friend whether he does not think it would be wise to provide some machinery by which this preference stock could, under certain conditions, revert to the condition of common stock. I do not know whether it would be practicable to make such provision, but it might be a very great convenience.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—In the case of companies to which I have referred, they were compelled to apply to Parliament to restore the preference stock to the position of common stock. It necessitated an Act of Parliament, which was passed in 1871. Could not machinery be provided in this bill to obviate the necessity of applying to Parliament?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That must have been a very rare occasion, preference shareholders applying to have their shares reduced to the level of common stock.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The preference stockholders may get all the dividends, and the holders of common stock may arrange with them to have all the stock placed on the same footing. That occurred in the case that I have referred to, and the company applied to Parliament for legislation.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—You buy them out?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yes, you make terms with them.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (124) "An Act to amend the Inland Revenue Act." He said :—This bill is a very short one, and like many bills that come from the department is rather enigmatical, I confess, but the practice seems to have prevailed for several years to send bills from the department when they require amendments to the statutes which have been passed from year to year. The first clause amends a cause of the Inland Revenue Act by altering the word "one" to "two." On inquiry I find that this refers to chemical stills—stills used for chemical purposes. At present the law permits chemical stills to be made up to the capacity of one hundred gallons. It is found necessary, now that the manufacturers have a larger trade than they contemplated, to make stills, in many cases for export, of larger capacity, and this bill provides that under an application to the Governor in Council the still can be made to the capacity of two hundred gallons instead of one hundred gallons. The next clause refers to the portion of grain or malt required to make up a gallon of proof spirit. The duty on spirit is charged on the grain used in its production, at the rate of one gallon for every $20\frac{4}{10}$ pounds. It appears that in some distilleries malt is used instead of grain, and in that case, upon the malt used in its production, one gallon of proof spirit for every 24 pounds. These words have been added. The third clause is not a very important one. As the hon. gentleman knows tobacco packages which are for sale in the shops are put up in various size,—one-fifth,—one-sixth, one-seventh, half a pound, and so on, and they are sold in accordence with that. This proposes simply to allow one-third of a pound to be put up. I do not know how that proportion was omitted in former legislation, because they had one-eighth, one-sixth, one-fifth, and so on. This simply adds one-third to the proportions in which tobacco may be put up in those small packages, and the stamp of the department attached.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Is it advisable to proceed with this bill before we know whether the decision on the plebiscite is to be carried out ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has this one-third package been suggested from the fact that the manufacturers of tobacco had to reduce the size of the package which they sold for the certain amount of money after the increased duty was placed upon tobacco ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have been told by those who use tobacco that when they went to buy the usual package the price was raised five cents, and the explanation was that the government had increased the duty upon tobacco, and therefore it was necessary to increase the price of that particular sized package. Then they manufactured a smaller package, which they sold at the former price, so that the purchaser really, while paying the extra duty, was not aware that he was getting a smaller quantity of tobacco. It must have been suggested to the department, that in order to meet that case, and to leave the consumers of tobacco under the impression that they are getting the same quantity as they did formerly for the same money, that they make up a one-third package instead of a larger one. Whether that is the reason or not, I cannot say, but I can find no other reason why this change should be made, because there are nearly all sizes of tobacco packages except the one-third, and if the manufacturers can succeed in humbugging consumers of tobacco with the idea that they are getting the same quantity for the same amount of money as they did formerly, they will have succeeded at least in preventing the cry which was raised against the government for increasing the duty on tobacco. I compliment the government on the dexterous manner in which they are accomplishing that object.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman thinks the consumers of tobacco are so green as to accept a package of one-third of a pound for half a pound, he has more faith in their gullibility than the government has.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I think there is a good deal in what the leader of the opposition says about the extraordinary size of tobacco packages. There are sixteen ounces to the pound, and a purchaser never asks for one-third of a pound of any commodity, but for so many ounces. Why should not the government adopt the same system in dealing with tobacco. Who ever heard of a law establishing five and a third ounces as a package ? It is done evidently for the purpose of deceiving the people.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to read paragraph b of the Act of 1898 which is being amended. The hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour will see that he is all wrong. This is the paragraph which is to be amended :

All fine cut chewing tobacco, and all other kinds of tobacco not otherwise provided for in packages containing one-twentieth, one-sixteenth, one-fifteenth, one-fourteenth, one-thirteenth, one-twelfth, one-eleventh, one-tenth, one-ninth, one-eighth, one-seventh, one-sixth, one-fifth, one-fourth, or one-half of one pound, or one pound——.

One-third has been omitted in the list, and the object of the amendment is to insert one-third with the other fractions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Certainly, and the people are not as gullible as the hon. gentleman thinks they are. But a consumer of tobacco knows what he has to pay for one-half pound of tobacco. Instead of getting half a pound he is getting one-third, and this bill is to meet that case.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not approve of the tax on tobacco, but I do object to the criticism.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

WINDING UP ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the second reading of bill (O) "An Act further to amend the Winding Up Act."

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think there is a bill before the House of Commons, with the same object in view, introduced by Mr. Fortin, of Quebec, and it might be well not to press this bill until the other bill comes before us, and the two might be combined.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—For the information of the House, I may state that this bill was introduced by Mr. Osler, a member of the other House, and some other gentlemen who are interested in the winding up of the Farmers' Loan Company. It appears they have some three-quarters of a million of money on hand, and yet they are unable to distribute it, and they express themselves as extremely anxious to get the bill through as quickly as possible. Whether my hon. friend would wish it to stand when it might be the cause of considerable delay, or whether he wishes it to stand in order to see the other bill, I do not know. Will the hon. minister not allow this to go to the committee?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The bill has been read the second time, and I would not ask for any unnecessary delay, but I thought it might be advantageous that, instead of having two bills on the statute-book in the same session amending the same Act, it might be advantageous to combine the two.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—But if it is referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce it might be allowed to stand there?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, that is what I meant.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons introducing Bill (127) "An Act to amend the Bank Act."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of the bill for Tuesday next. He said:—The bill is a very brief one. There is but one object aimed at, and that is to provide that a bank may issue notes for circulation abroad, and that these notes may be of the denomination of one pound. My hon. friend knows that under section 51 of the Bank Act, as it now stands, a bank can only issue bank notes as low as $5 in value. This is something less, but it gives the bank no additional power in respect to the amount of its circulation. It stands precisely as it is in the Bank Act, and the circulation of these notes elsewhere would diminish to that extent the power of the bank to issue notes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It's principle, as I understand it, is to meet the case where Canadian banks have agencies in the West Indies and other portions of the British Empire.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, in other possessions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (32) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the sale of Railway Passenger Tickets."—(Mr. McMillan.)

Bill (68) "An Act respecting the London Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Canada." (Mr. McMillan.)

Bill (100) "An Act respecting the Guarantee and Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank, and to change its name to the Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank."—(Mr. Power.)

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (124) "An Act to amend the Inland Revenue Act."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As I explained yesterday, the purpose of substituting two for one is to authorize the chemical stills to be made of a size double what they are now. In some large concerns they find the 100-gallon stills altogether too small for their operations, and they have asked permission to use a still of 200 gallons.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Do I understand this to be the bill the government was expected to pass after the plebiscite was taken?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; it has no connection with the plebiscite.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It appears to give the distillers a better opportunity of enlarging their stills and supplying the demand for liquor.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 2.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The second paragraph refers to the making of spirit in some distilleries where malt is used. This is another anti-temperance clause. The clause is changed in order to define the duty on spirit made from malt. The first section of part A has not been changed, but the following has been added to it:

Or in the distillery where malt only is used, upon the malt used at the rate of one gallon of proof spirit for every twenty-four pounds.

It appears you can make more whisky out of the malt than you can out of the grain.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 3.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The third paragraph allows tobacco to be put up in a package of one-third of a pound. I do not know how the one-third of a pound happened to be dropped out when they were authorizing one-sixth, one-seventh, one-eighth, and so on. They seemed to drop out one-fourth, one-half and one-third.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I explained that yesterday.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Possibly the hon. gentleman's explanation may be correct. It is for the purpose of enabling the government to put the stamp on. They put it on according to the quantity.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I regret that the government, when they found it necessary to make an amendment to the bill, did not amend it in the way required, that is, to reduce it to the proportion of a pound, as the table shows by the ounces, one, two, three, four, and so on. Then the vendor and purchaser would know exactly what business they were doing and what they were getting for their money. But when you talk of a third of a pound and a fifth of a pound of any commodity, it is evidently done to deceive the buyer, because everybody understands there is sixteen ounces to the pound.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are not responsible for the divisions. Those proportions have been in operation for many years. We are amending the Revised Statutes. There are all the proportions named which were spoken of yesterday.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I take it the government are entirely and directly responsible for this bill as it is now. They admit there is a fault in the statute and they are not correcting it. They must take the responsibility of the whole measure, because, it must be assumed, that they are amending it in all the particulars that require amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is a free country, and if the people want to buy tobacco by the third or the fourth of a pound, they can do so. All the department requires is that they shall put a stamp on it. The proportions were defined many years ago, and the one-third happened to be dropped out. I do not know what reason there was for it.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The arguments of the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island are very logical. The law should be changed so as to designate the quantity by the ounces, and have the package stamped as such.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—There can be no doubt that were it sold by the ounce, it would be much better understood by the trade.

The clause was adopted.

Hon Mr. SNOWBALL, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

PETROLEUM AND NAPHTHA INSPECTION ACT.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (131) "An Act respecting the inspection of Petroleum and Naphtha." He said:—I am glad to see that the department has departed from the practice pursued in some of the other bills, and in making the charges in the Act relating to the inspection of petroleum, have re-enacted the old law, and therefore the charges will be much more easily understood and will probably be better explained when the House is in committee, as I can point out the old clauses and the new clauses. I may say, the object of making any changes is due to the proposal to cheapen coal oil. It is very well known that coal oil could only be brought into Canada in tank vessels and in tank cars at particular points, which are limited, and that the inspection of the oil took place only when the oil was removed to smaller vessels, a barrel or a case, or whatever it may be, and there was the inspection fee charged on that. It is now proposed that the oil shall be inspected and tested while it is in bulk in a larger vessel, either in the tank car or the tank on board the ship, and that coal oil may therefore be introduced in tank wagons or in any other vessel that the parties choose. Coal oil, in the North-west more particularly, has been found very expensive and this will allow parties to come in with tank wagons and have the oil analysed and examined in the wagons, and they will then be authorized to sell it from the original vessel. One of the other important points is that provision is made that it shall only be put up in a vessel painted red and branded as naphtha, and that no other oils of any kind shall be put in barrels painted red, reserving that colour exclusively for naphtha. Those are the principal changes in the bill. The inspection fee on inspecting the oil in the smaller vessels is abolished.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

ADULTERATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (123) "An Act further to amend the Adulteration Act." He said:—The object of this perhaps is not quite as clear as is usual in the case of departmental changes in the law. The object is simply to limit the pharmacopœia in which the druggists prescribe, when it is put up by the chemists, with the label marks, it refers only to the British pharmacopœia. As the law now stands, the United States pharmacopœia is equally recognized, but as I am advised at present, in our universities the United States pharmacopœia is not recognized, and the students are not taught from it. The United States pharmacopœia is therefore placed in the category of other foreign pharmacopœias, and where the article is compounded of drugs that are known only in the United States or other pharmacopœia, the particular pharmacopœia must be indicated on the label. That is the whole object of the bill.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do not rise to oppose the bill, because I think it is in the right direction, but I do not understand it as the hon. minister explains. It really refers to every drug—every drug must come up to the standard which is represented in the pharmacopœia of Great Britain and the pharmacopœia of the United States and the pharmacopœia of France.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. If there is no pharmacopœia named, it is assumed to be the British pharmacopœia. If it is not British, it must be stated on the label whether it is the United States, the French, or the pharmacopœia of any other country.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—And it must come up to the standard.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes; it is simply putting the United States pharmacopœia on the same level as the French.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

TELEGRAPH LINE TO YUKON DISTRICT.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I beg to give notice that on Tuesday next I will inquire if the government intends to proceed this year with the construction of a telegraph line from some point in British Columbia to the Yukon district. With the permission of the House I would like to explain the meaning of this inquiry which I propose to make. It will be within the knowledge of the House that two bills were passed last year incorporating telegraph companies to extend lines of telegraph wire from British Columbia to the Yukon district, and these companies now are very apprehensive that their schemes will fall to the ground, as they hear that the government intends having a line of its own, and they would like to have some definite information as to whether the government intends to proceed with its line or not. Two of these companies have spent a good deal of money, and materials are on the way from England to British Columbia to construct one of these lines, and they find it would be perfectly impossible for them to compete with the government in a telegraph system. That is the meaning of my inquiry, and I explain it now so that I shall be able to get a more definite reply from the minister.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Early last year, fully a year ago, it was felt that one of the most important——

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do not expect an answer now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I can give the answer now as well as at any other time. It was felt very important that a telegraph line should be constructed leading to Dawson. The hon. gentleman knows that at that time we were from three to five months without answers to communications. Orders in Council were passed here, and we did not hear of them for six months afterwards, and in the mean time the department were held responsible for what were held to be errors or mistakes. Therefore, it was decided at once to construct a line. The Minister of Public Works entered into correspondence with certain parties, a syndicate who professed their ability to go on and build at once. The whole of last summer was lost in consequence of promises made to Mr. Tarte which he thought he could have relied upon. Of course we were granting charters last year. But Parliament gave no exclusive privileges. We know the freedom with which charters are granted by Parliament, and there were no assurances given to any parties that they would have exclusive privileges. When in the early part of the present year it became manifest that no action was being taken, it was decided by the government that we should take up the project ourselves and go on with the least possible delay, and so the Minister of Public Works was authorized to enter into negotiations for the purchase of wire and other materials necessary, and in furtherance of that authority given him, Mr. Tarte, as probably hon. gentlemen know from the reports in the public press, sent parties out to British Columbia and on to the Yukon, and already the line is in operation from Skagway, utilizing, of course, the railway line up to a certain point, but from the limit of the railway telegraph line to a point on Lake Bennett, and they are constructing it just as rapidly as the line can be constructed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—May I ask if there was an appropriation voted for that purpose in anticipation?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think there was an appropriation last year. That is my impression of it.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not remember it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The intention is to build the line from Ashcroft to Cariboo and up to the Yukon?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What was felt was that immediate action was necessary and, of course, the shortest way to get connection for the present year would be from some point at the height of land up above the Lynn Inlet along the line of traffic to Dawson, and later on it is to be hoped that the line will be continued on down to a connection with the telegraph system in British Columbia, which would follow then the line that was contemplated fifteen or twenty years ago. As hon. gentleman probably know, a portion of that line is still in existence north from Ashcroft, I think for about 250 miles to a point in British Columbia, and a trail was made at one time for the continuation of that line. It will be remembered that before the Atlantic cable was laid it was proposed to carry a line across by Behring Straits and we had actually commenced the construction of a line up in that direction. It was abandoned afterwards when the Atlantic cable was laid, but no doubt in the near future the line will be extended from the neighbourhood of Lake Bennett, or whatever point may be necessary to carry it down and connect it with the telegraph system.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved:

That when the Senate adjourns on Friday the ninth instant, it stand adjourned until Tuesday the thirteenth instant, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

He said:—When I gave this notice I did not propose to take the management of the business out of the hands of the government, but simply gave notice as a matter of convenience.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—For whom—for the government, or the House?

Hon. Mr. POWER—For the House. I have not the slightest interest in the matter, but when one looks at the order paper he will see that there is practically nothing to be done on Monday.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There are fourteen orders to-day, though.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As hon. gentlemen know, a number of gentlemen who live in the neighbourhood of Ottawa are anxious that the adjournment should extend a little further than it does as a rule, and I think that the public business will not suffer if we agree to meet on Tuesday at 3 o'clock, instead of on Monday at 3 o'clock, and these hon. gentlemen will have an opportunity to attend to their private affairs. I have made the hour 3 instead of 8, because there are some elderly gentlemen in the Senate who do not care to come out in the evenings, and because the experience of a great many years shows that, as a rule, very little business is done at the evening meeting.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As a general rule I think the question regarding the adjournment of this House should emanate from the government, and although my hon. friend the senior member from Halifax (Mr. Power) is no greater transgressor in that respect than others of us, because there has been a practice of private members giving notice and making motions for adjournments in this House, but I think the responsibility devolves on the government, and it is from the government only that such motions should emanate. For my part, I think at this particular moment that we have our hands full of work, and there is no indication, looking at the notice paper, that Monday will not be a day of work, because some of the notices on the paper to-day may be allowed to stand over and the indications are that Monday will be like every day of this week and I hope every day for weeks to come. While I have no desire to oppose this motion, I wish to point out that the matter should be left in the hands of the government—not only a short adjournment of this kind, but all adjournments.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not agree with the view expressed by my hon. friend opposite. After a certain custom has grown up, and a certain practice has been continued for upwards of thirty years without ever being called in question, for the hon. gentleman to rise and say that the government should take control of the House and decide whether it ought to sit on Monday or not is asking us to adopt a rule which has not prevailed heretofore. The House is the judge of its own convenience. The House knows precisely what amount of business is before it, and if they think that without any detriment to the public business they can get through with the motions on the order paper by meeting on Tuesday instead of Monday, I shall not object. It makes no difference to me. The members of the administration are here continuously. I cannot be away, whether the House sits or not, but if the House chooses to adjourn over Monday I shall not make any objection whatever. There are a few important government bills on the paper and there will be more, but my hon. friend has suggested that the government ought to decide whether we should sit on Monday or not. I do not see that. When I was spoken to yesterday about an adjournment for a week, I objected because there is upon the paper a very considerable amount of business. There are a good many important bills—bills in which the government are interested. I suppose we can get through with them in the remaining four days of the week, therefore if it is to the convenience of any considerable number of members that we should adjourn until Tuesday at 3 o'clock, instead of Monday at 3 o'clock, I am ready to acquiesce, because I do not wish to inconvenience any of the members unless it is to the positive advantage to the government in the discharge of public duty. In my opinion, we could get through at the rate of speed at which we have moved, for we have moved rapidly, although we are the senior House in Parliament. We have got through without a great deal of conflict of opinion, and I judge from what we have already done that we will be able to get through with the business before us, and what is likely to come before us, during the coming week. If important measures are not sent up from the House of Commons we will then consider what it may be necessary to do. I am entirely in the hands of the House in this matter. If it is the general feeling of the Senate to meet on Monday at 3 o'clock, I am quite ready to acquiesce in that view, and if the desire is to adjourn until Tuesday at 3 o'clock, I make no objections, for the reason that I do not know that the business before us would suffer from a delay of twenty-four hours.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In addition to the general ground that I mentioned I may explain that early this session the press supporting my hon. friend the leader of the House, made some statements with regard to the Senate to the effect that the Senate in the future would not be allowed to take long adjournments as in the past years, but under the leadership of my hon. friend the House was to be kept hard at work.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The Minister of Justice is non-committal in this matter. He says it is for the House to decide, and he is leader of the House, and must take the responsibility whether he wants to assume it or not. We will know if we push to a division on this question whether he is in favour of an adjournment or not. I do not know what interest the senior member for Halifax has in moving this motion. There must be some action among members that I do not know anything about. I cannot go home myself, like a good many others, when there is an adjournment of only two or three days. I hold the Minister of Justice responsible, and when he tries to throw the responsibility on the House and says it is for the House to decide, as though he had no responsibility, the country will not sustain him in that. I for one will move that when the House adjourns on Friday next it stand adjourned for a week.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Then take the responsibility of going ahead on Monday. I am perfectly willing, but if the hon. gentleman will not take the responsibility of adjourning for one day he must take responsibility of saying that he will not consent to an adjournment for a week. I am perfectly prepared to follow the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is a joke.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I will follow the hon. gentleman as long as he is right, but I will follow no man when I consider he is wrong. I will follow the hon. gentleman when he takes the responsibility of moving the adjournment himself, but when by slight of hand he undertakes to do it through a supporter I will not follow him.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I am glad we have the admission from the hon. gentleman from Monck (Mr. McCallum) that he is ready to back the government every time they move something concerning an adjournment.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The government have the confidence of the hon. gentleman on the question of adjournment; that is a beginning. I do not think we need be so timid about what the public press thinks of our adjournments. We all know that in the other House there was a discussion on the Address which lasted a month, and, here, we passed the Address in twenty-four hours. Are we to remain here for a month just to please some journalists marking time and doing nothing, simply because the discussion in the House of Commons is extended for a month? They have had to discuss the budget in the other House, and they may be two weeks discussing it. We have no such discussion here. Are we to remain here two weeks marking time because it pleases the hon. gentlemen in the Commons to spend that time discussing the budget? We pass, en bloc, the last day of the session, the items that it takes them several weeks to discuss. Are we to remain here for weeks while they are discussing those items? They will have discussions on the Redistribution Bill and on the proposed reformation of the Senate lasting possibly five or six weeks. Are we to mark time here just to please public opinion, or sit in the gallaries of the Commons listening to the same arguments for weeks—arguments which will be rehashed from day to day just because the Commoners have to speak to their electors? In this chamber we think it is beneath our dignity to repeat an argument that falls from the lips of our neighbour, and we pass on as soon as we have formed a judgment upon any question submitted to us. So that in a four months' session every one who attends closely to public questions knows that a body of business men, like the Senate of Canada, can dispose of the work in one month. Why should we remain here two or three months just because the House of Commons is in session? We do not speak against time in this House. We do not speak for the simple pleasure of distributing our speeches to the electors, and it is the experience of hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in this House that within a month the senators can cope with the work which is brought before them. So it will be easily seen that the hon. Minister of Justice is not responsible for the adjournments. It is useless to ask the Minister of Justice to extend our work over four months; and keep us sitting ten or fifteen minutes every day, as we have been doing every day for the last few weeks. We can sit for hours at a time if needs be, and, if we are threatened with a long session running up to the month of August, we can disperse for two or three weeks and do our work in the remainder of the time.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I do not think the Minister of Justice has done himself justice, nor do I think that we have quite done justice to him. Of course, I conceive that in the case of a motion like that which my hon. friend from Halifax has made, to adjourn till Tuesday instead of Monday, the hon. leader of the House would leave it to the decision of the Senate without interfering in any way, but wherever an adjournment for any length of time has been moved for, then the House has always appealed to the government to so decide, as they are best acquainted with public business, as to whether it would be to the prejudice of public business or not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said that.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I think we have always followed the government on such occasions, but in this case it is a very small matter whether we adjourn to Monday or Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I had a notice of adjournment once this session, but before giving it I took the precaution to ask the Minister of Justice if he had any objection, and he said he had none. The senior member for Halifax ought to feel proud that this quiet little motion of his has raised such a row; certainly there was no occasion for it. I agree, however, with the hon. gentleman from Halifax that we might as well adjourn to Tuesday, so far as our order paper is concerned, if we do not discuss adjournment all day. There is no doubt if we meet on Wednesday at three, instead of Tuesday, the work would be done before Friday. We have been sitting ten or twenty minutes per day all week, and have done our work. The hon. senior member for Halifax was right, and I am sorry to say—and I have to say it—that I think my own friend—the hon. gentleman from Monck—was altogether unjustified when he said the Minister of Justice should take the responsibility of these adjournments into his hands. The hon. gentleman from Monck knows as well as I do, for he has been in this House a very long time, that the motion has been made on this occasion in the way we have been doing it for years, and no other leader of the House has ever acted differently. The hon. Minister of Justice is acting wisely, and is perfectly right in leaving the matter in the hands of the House. I quite agree with him, and I am glad to be able to agree with him for once. If I were to move an amendment—which I will not do—I would move to make the adjournment to Wednesday instead of Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As the adjournment is only for a day, we had better not lose a day discussing it.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—This is rather an important question, and I do not think it is lost time altogether if we discuss it a little more fully. It appears to me there is a disposition on the part of some hon. gentlemen in this House to make some innovations in the procedure in regard to adjourning, and I am afraid this motion to-day will be taken as a precedent for the future, and the probability is that Mondays may escape altogether from being utilized as business days in the Senate. I certainly object to that. I would not object particularly to Monday next, were it not establishing a precedent which I think is detrimental to the interests of the country, and to our record as well. When we have our business all done and nothing special coming before us, we would be perfectly justified in doing in the future as we have been doing in the past, taking two or three weeks adjournment, and then almost every member of the Senate could take advantage of it and go home for a few days. But when we adjourn for one day only, it is giving some members an advantage which is denied to others. My hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Dandurand) waxes eloquent on the question of adjournment I think it is the most eloquent speech I have ever heard him make. He says there are several subjects we have no interest in discussing, such as the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the budget and other matters, but we have just as much right as the members of the House of Commons to discuss and criticize all these questions from beginning to end. There is one question on which a two or three hours discussion would be very interesting to the Senate, and that is the hon. gentleman's own position. He says he is not talking to his constituents, that he is not responsible to the electors of this country for the speeches he makes here, and that there is no necessity to make long speeches for his constituents. I tell him his constituents are the government of the day. They are the gentlemen who placed him here, and he has made a very good speech—several very good speeches—especially for his constituents. We know that the hon. gentleman came here because of good services he has rendered his party. He tells us he has been an organizer of the Liberal party for a good many years past, and he has told us in this House how he managed, I suppose, to sweep the whole province of Quebec in support of the present government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—He is going to reorganize the Senate now.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Then we have heard of that man Parent, who was sent into the back settlements to do some very special work for the party, by the hon. gentleman, and the record that man holds before this House and the country does not speak well for him. Instead of spending the money entrusted to him, according to instructions, he spent it in liquor and got drunk. And who recommended Parent to the Temperance Alliance in the province of Quebec? There are a good many interesting questions which might come up on this occasion and on other occasions, and I do not think it would be wise for us to have too many adjournments for fear there will not be time to ventilate some of these questions.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (76) "An Act respecting the Dominion of Canada Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company."—(Mr. Power, in the absence of Mr. Allan.)

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (H) "An Act incorporating the Imperial Loan and Investment Company of Canada.—(Mr. Kirchhoffer.)

Bill (M) "An Act respecting the Northern Commercial Telegraph Company, Limited."—(Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

Bill (46) "An Act to incorporate the Arthabaska Railway Company."—(Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

Bill (I) "An Act respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company."—(Mr. Kirchhoffer.)

CANADIAN POWER COMPANY OF NIAGARA FALLS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the second reading of:

(Bill 77) "An Act respecting the Canadian Power Company, and to change its name to the Ontario Power Company of Niagara Falls."

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Another innovation which is creeping into the Senate is the fact of gentlemen who have charge of bills moving the second reading without giving any explanation of their nature. I have always understood that on the second reading of a bill the members in charge of it is obliged to give some information to the House of its nature and object. As we are not very heavily worked at present, according to statements made to-day, I think it would be well to adhere to our rule. We are not all members of standing committees and it is very desirable that we should get information about these measures.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The preamble of the bill which practically explains its object is as follows:—

Whereas the Canadian Power Company, has, by its petition, prayed that it be enacted as hereinafter set forth, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, declares and enacts as follows:—

Hon. Mr. McKAY—The hon. gentleman is reading his speech.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I am giving an explanation in the very best way it can be given. By the time I have read the bill through, the House will understand every one of its details. (Cries of "dispense.") Do let me go on and explain it! (Cries of "dispense.") Since the hon. gentlemen insist on dispensing with the explanation, I shall have to acquiesce.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (120) "An Act to incorporate the Rutland and Noyan Railway Company."—(Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (103) "An Act to incorporate the Klondike Mines Railway Company."—(Mr Kirchhoffer.)

Bill (61) "An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company."—(Mr. Lougheed.)

ADULTERATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on Bill (123) "An Act further to amend the Adulteration Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As the law now stands the pharmacopœia of the United States is a recognized authority, and it has been found by a leading medical gentleman that very serious mistakes sometimes arise, because under the present law druggists are not obliged to mark the words "United States Pharmacopœia" on the label, and there is a very wide difference in many elements between British and United States drugs and consequently very serious results might follow the omission of these words from the labels.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—As to the strength of the drug?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. We propose to adopt the British pharmacopœia, and if the elements are from any other pharmacopœia, French, German or United States, the name of the particular pharmacopœia must be on the label so that the chemists, in putting up prescriptions, may know how the drugs are compounded.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Under the law as it stands at present, is it obligatory on any vender of a drug to have the name of the pharmacopœia on the label?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Only the word "foreign." But as there is a difference between the British and United States pharmacopœia you can see that serious errors may arise when no distinction is made. If a druggist now mixes up a drug without any statement on the label it is taken to be British, otherwise it must be stated.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is intended that whatever pharmacopœia is used it shall be up to the standard of that authority.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As the law now stands, the British and United States drugs are not defined. A drug may be compounded under the United States pharmacopœia and the druggist is not obliged to give that information. A medical man may give a prescription founded on the British pharmacopœia, and it may be compounded on the United States basis. Under the law as it stands at present, the druggists may compound it from the United States pharmacopœia without at the same time defining on the label that it is the United States pharmacopœia.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I still fail to understand whether it is necessary, under the law, that a particular authority should be stated on the label or upon the parcel, whether, British, United States or what. I do not understand that it is obligatory to have any authority, either British, United States, French or any other kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is if it should be French, German, or any other pharmacopœia except British or United States. The United States is now on the same plane as the British, and therefore, the chemist is not obliged to mention whether it is British or United States, and he may compound his drugs under either pharmacopœia, whereas the medical man, in writing his prescription, may have intended it to be filled on the British pharmacopœia, and so confusion arises. Under the provisions of this bill, if it is made up at all and there is no reference to any pharmacopœia, then the legal assumption is that it is prepared under the British pharmacopœia. If it is prepared under the United States pharmacopœia, then the United States pharmacopœia must be cited on the label. If made under the French pharmacopœia, that fact must be stated.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not understand these amendments in the way my hon. friend explains them. They only require that the drug shall be up to the standard that is claimed for it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not a question of standard at all. There are various pharmacopœias in use, and there are two that are permitted to be used without designating them, the British and United States pharmacopœias. The intention is to leave only the British in that position. If there is no pharmacopœia mentioned on the prescription, then it is assumed that it is British, and the reason for requiring the United States pharmacopœia to be named, if the prescription is under the United States pharmacopœia, is because it is different from the British.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend, as I understand, is explaining what is in the original Act and not in these amendments.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is exactly what is in these amendments. Where a prescription is prepared under the United States pharmacopœia, that fact is to be stated on the prescription.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At present it need not be.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not understand the amendment as my hon. friend does. All that this provides is that if the drug differs from the standard it is adulterated.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Read lines 17 and 18.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I may tell the hon. gentleman that the authors of materia medica in the United States give the description of the medicine, and the standard and strength of the medicine in accordance with the pharmacopœia of that country, and the authors of materia medica in England will have them likewise of the same strength that that pharmacopœia mentions.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—It seems we are legislating to continue a custom that already exists, and has existed in this country for a great number of years. When a medical man in this Dominion writes a prescription, he means it to be prepared according to the requirements of the British pharmacopœia. The authorities in Great Britain are attempting to have a uniform pharmacopœia for Great Britain and all her colonies, and Canada is taking a very active part in that direction. This bill is merely legislating to continue a custom which has been in existence for a long time. I repeat: when a medical practitioner in Canada writes a prescription he means that the British pharmacopœia, and no other, shall be followed and while there may be no harm in saying it, there certainly is no necessity for so stating it, and it will be found a practice that medical practitioners will refuse to append to each article named in a prescription that it should be according to the British pharmacopœia. That goes without saying, and our medical men will not write what to them appears unnecessary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At present the druggist is not obliged to mention the pharmacopœia on the label. I understand that the circumstances which led to the introduction of the bill is that a leading medical man, who is a member of the other House, wrote a prescription under the British pharmacopœia and the druggist in Halifax made it up under the United States pharmacopœia, and it was a grave mistake.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Paragraph I of the first clause says:

(i.) If, when sold or offered or exposed for sale under or by a name recognized in the edition of 1898 of the British pharmacopœia, it differed from the standard of strength, quality or purity laid down therein.

That appears to assume that the edition of 1898 is the standard to be hereafter used in dealing with British prescriptions.

The next provision provides as follows:—

(ii.) If when sold or offered or exposed for sale under or by a name recognized in any foreign pharmacopœia, such as Le Codex Medicamentarius in France or the pharmacopœia of the United States, and having the name of such pharmacopœia, plainly labelled, upon the article, it differs from the standard of strength, quality or purity laid down therein.

The committee will observe that this paragraph does not indicate that that name shall be labelled on the article, and I think that this is the point to which the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) directed his question. It seems to me if the hon. the Secretary of State is correct in his statement of the intention of the bill, then this paragraph should be amended so as to provide that the name of the pharmacopœia shall be plainly labelled. It is not indicated, either in this bill, or in the chapter of the Revised Statutes, or in the Act of 1890, that the name of the foreign pharmacopœia shall be labelled on the bottle or package, and it ought to be.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like the hon. gentleman to point out where it is. It only says "if it is plainly labelled," and the drug is not up to standard, the drug is adulterated. It does not say that it shall be plainly labelled on the bottle.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—I think we are creating a difficulty by introducing anything of that kind. We are in this position: a doctor in writing a prescription writes it with the knowledge that it will be according to the British pharmacopœia and the druggist makes it up in accordance with that recognized authority. If a foreign doctor, United States, French, German or other, writes a prescription and wishes it to be according to his own pharmacopœia, he must so state it in his prescription and the druggist will execute it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The only change made by the bill is dropping the words "United States" out of the Act.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman from Halifax quite understands the point I made, and that is that the bill should provide that the particular pharmacopœia shall be named.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So it does.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It only says if a particular authority is named the drug must be put to that standard, but it does not provide that any authority shall be named. It may not refer to any standard. The adulteration comes in if it is not up to the claim that is made for it. The point is whether we should not require that drugs when sold shall have on the label the name of the authority of the drug they are selling.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Read subsection 2 and you will see that that point is covered. That provides that if you use any other than the British pharmacopœia you must state it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The clause does not appear to bear any such meaning.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I presume that if the article is not plainly labelled, under paragraph 2, as being United States or French, it would come under paragraph 3, and be sold under a name not recognized. I submit, as this is a very important matter as to which a small mistake might be of considerable consequence, and it would be well, before the bill is read the third time, that the medical gentlemen in the House should examine it carefully to see that there is no error. The Secretary of State smiles, but it would not be the first time that a mistake would be discovered in a bill submitted to this House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You get the key of the bill by looking at subsection I. Under that clause a drug would be deemed adulterated if, when sold or offered or exposed for sale under or by a name recognized in the edition of 1898, of the British pharmacopœia "it differs from the standard or strength, quality or purity laid down therein." Now, if it does that, it is within the class of adulterated articles.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is exactly word for word, the law as it now is, leaving out the words "United States."

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It is the manufacturer who is required to have the goods manufactured up to that standard.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The second clause provides:

(ii.) If, when sold or offered or exposed for sale under or by a name recognized in any foreign pharmacopœia, such as Le Codex Medicamentarius in France or the pharmacopœia of the United States, and having the name of such pharmacopœia plainly labelled, upon the article, it differs from the standard of strength, quality or purity laid down therein.

Now, although the name is plainly labelled on the article, if it differs from the standard of strength, then it should be deemed adulterated. That is clear enough. Then the third clause provides:

(iii) If, when sold, or offered or exposed for sale, under or by a name which is not recognized in any pharmacopœia, but which is found in some generally recognized standard work on materia medica or chemistry, it differs from the standard of strength, quality or purity laid down therein.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do not know but that there is something in what the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Power) says after all. It appears to me that the third subsection is unnecessary, because if you have these drugs up to the standard of the pharmacopœias mentioned, that is the British pharmacopœia or the pharmacopœia of the United States or the French pharmacopœia, that is quite sufficient. Why do you go beyond that and give the privilege to have the drugs come up to the standard mentioned in these books? I think that is going too far. If you use the term the materia medica of any country, you should say the authorized materia medica of that country.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON — Before the House adjourns, I wish to call the attention of the members of the government and the House to what perhaps is almost a question of privilege. It is with regard to the mails for the members of this House. The mails coming from the east that arrive from Montreal at eight or nine o'clock in the morning of each day are not delivered here until about four or five in the afternoon of the same day. Occasionally a letter or paper seems to escape the delay in Montreal and get through, but as hon. members know, the bulk of our correspondence and papers do not reach here until about four or five o'clock in the evening, though they arrive in Montreal early in the morning by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am informed, on what I think is very good authority, that by some blunder these mails go to the General Post Office in Montreal, in place of being handed over from one train to another and being carried direct here, they go to the General Post Office at Montreal, and are again made up and sent here in the afternoon. I do not know whether it is the case with regard to the mails for the House of Commons, or whether it is only the Senate mail, but I am now relating our experience during this session with regard to the mails from the east for hon. members of this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Do the mails always come by the short line of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think they do. I am told they come by the short line and that most of them are held over in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They should be distributed on the mail train.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is what should be done.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON — Perhaps my hon. friend will inquire of the Postmaster General and let me know the cause.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If they come by the Intercolonial Railway, they could not reach here till the afternoon, but the mails from Prince Edward Island do not all come by the Intercolonial Railway because we occasionally get a paper or letter about half past twelve or one o'clock. A paper dated yesterday morning arriving here is delivered in the Senate post office at one o'clock, but the bulk of our mail does not reach us until about this time, or even later each day. I have no doubt if it is brought to the attention of the department it will be remedied.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not like to find fault all the time, but I have not had the return for which I moved at the beginning of the session. I first asked if there had been any correspondence between the government and the different provinces in which the right of appeal to the judge against the voters' list, had taken place. I was informed by the Minister of Justice that he was not aware at that time whether there was any correspondence. I pointed out that the reasons why I had asked the question, was because in Nova Scotia a change had taken place and that amendments had been made to the Franchise Act. Afterwards I received an answer, when the question was put again, that letters had been written to the different governments; but then, when I put another question, as to the answers which had been obtained, I was informed by the Minister of Justice that that was not a portion of the question which I had previously asked and consequently had not ascertained that fact. Since that time the British Columbia Government, while in session made a change, and I believe the Manitoba Government has also done the same thing. If I am to believe one-tenth part of what we read in the newspapers, as to the manipulations of the voters' lists in the province of Manitoba, it is high time that there should be an appeal to the judge, in order to set right the iniquities which the journals say are being constantly perpetrated in connection with the preparing of the voters' lists. Following that up, in order to try and obtain this information, which ought to be obtained, I think, in two or three letters, I then put a notice upon the paper asking for copies of the letters which had been sent to the different governments, and also the replies which had been received, in order that the House and the country might be put in possession of what had been done by the government in carrying out the pledges which they made to this House, and to the House of Commons when the question of adopting the local franchises was accepted by both Houses. I am anxious to know—and I think it is in the interest of the country that we should know—whether proper representations have been made to these governments, and whether these governments have acquiesced in the requests, which I take it for granted were made, that provision should be made for these appeals, and if they have declined to do it, we should know that fact. It might guide us in the future in considering many bills coming before this House. I hope the hon. Minister of Justice will not think I am too persistent in this matter, but I felt a great interest in that question of adopting the local franchises at the time it passed this House, having a firm conviction that the Parliament of Canada should control its own franchise; but, as I stated then, as that was one of the planks of the Liberal platform when they went to the people, and the people had elected them, I did not deem it advisable, even individually, nor would I recommend to the Senate, that they should act in direct opposition to what was supposed to be the express will of the people. I should like to have this information, and the country would like to know what has been done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will make inquiry for the information which the hon. gentleman seeks. My hon. friend spoke, as if by way of censure, of my answer to him before, when I told him that I had not inquired, nor did I know, whether the local governments had responded to the question. I answered him precisely in accordance with the facts. Now, I may say to him that what I assumed he was specially anxious to know was whether any communication had taken place or not, and I ascertained that fact and informed him accordingly. My hon. friend says the manipulations that have taken place, as he understands, in the legislature of Manitoba with the voters' lists there makes it highly important——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No; I did not say in the legislature. I said in the preparation of the voters' lists under the present law, which prevents an appeal.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is mistaken when he says it prevents an appeal. The Manitoba Act is exactly like that of the Dominion, which my hon. friend made. Under the Manitoba Act an appeal may be taken to the county judge, or the revising barrister appointed for the purpose.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no revising barrister now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes; under the Manitoba Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. gentleman is in error.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am inclined to think my hon. friend will find the facts as I have stated them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Not a revising barrister.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My recollection is that the Manitoba Act is exactly the same as the Dominion Act as framed by the government of which my hon. friend was a member. But that is a matter of no consequence. We will ascertain what the facts are.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not what I complain of so much. If there has been any communication, it should be in the possession of some of the heads of the departments. If there has been an answer, they ought to have it, and they cannot possibly require three, or four, or five, or six months to ascertain the simple fact. If the correspondence exists, we should have it, and if it does not exist, let the Minister of Justice say so and there is an end of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will ascertain.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman promised that two months ago.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Perhaps I did. I gave my hon. friend the information for which he specifically asked.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the hon. leader of the House is not altogether right when he says that a revising barrister is provided for under the laws of Manitoba in a similar way to the provision in the Dominion law. But he is at least partially right in saying that some provision is made, because I have noticed lately in the Winnipeg papers that our old friend, Judge Prendergast, has been appointed by the provincial government to some duty in connection with the making up of the lists in the city of Winnipeg at the present time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is for this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I had occasion to look into the law of Manitoba, and following that law, assuming that the revision of the list would not take place in Manitoba early enough, we had taken proceedings to have the list revised, and a revision was made in Winnipeg under the authority of the Manitoba Act. I know under the authority of that Act there was a limited time, I think it was one month, and then the list had to be advertised and hung up for a month, and at the end of that month the judge took it up, and Judge Prendergast was appointed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—By whom?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—By this government, but following the Manitoba Act. It was all done under the Manitoba Act. And then we found, after the revising barrister had entered upon his duties, and while the judge was considering the list, that the government of Manitoba ordered a general revision, and so we then cancelled our order. That is the fact. Therefore, there seems to be an appeal there to the judge.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, no, that does not follow. By what authority does the Dominion Government appoint Judge Prendergast? Is it under the Act which adopted the franchise of the province?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have a good illustration of the results which follow the adoption of the local franchise. Winnipeg has been kept out of its representation in the House of Commons ever since the unfortunate death of the late member, Mr. Jameson. The list was not in such a state as to go on with the election. That is three or four months ago. The Manitoba Government took no action, nor did it provide for the revision of the list under their law, and the Dominion Government then had to assume the responsibility of appointing a judge in order to get a voters' list upon which they could hold an election for a member of the Dominion House. The result has been, as my hon. friend the Secretary of State has said, that they had to hang up the voters' lists for a month, and the other result is that Winnipeg has been unrepresented during all this time, and is likely to be during the present Parliament. However, that is apart altogether from the question I put to the hon. gentleman, nor is it an answer to the motion which I make asking for the return. I repeat that a return, which must of necessity consist of only three or four letters, might have been laid before the House a long time ago, and I should not like to say that my hon. friend has designedly delayed it, because it would be very improper to say that, and people who do not know the responsibilities which rest upon my hon. friend's shoulders and the possibility that he may have, or no doubt has forgotten it, will attribute other motives to his failure to furnish this information. I do not think he can blame them if they do

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has made a statement with regard to the Manitoba case, which he says has nothing particularly to do with the question which he has put. I quite admit it, but I did not introduce the election of Manitoba in the discussion. I told my hon. friend that the Manitoba Act provided for a revision by the judge or the revising officer. The appointment to which he refers, in Manitoba, of a judge to make a revision out of the ordinary time, was an appointment under the provision of an Act to which my hon. friend and this House gave assent last year. It was under the authority of that Act that that was done. The reference to the people of Manitoba being unrepresented is one which the hon. gentleman ought to have been more careful in making, because if the election had taken place under the old statute, to which he was a party, it would have been a voters' list of which more than 50 per cent of those on the list would no longer be qualified, and at least 50 per cent of those under the one law or the other, who ought to have been upon the list and ought to have had an opportunity of voting, could not vote at all. It is better that there should be a little delay and the election be made by those who are entitled to make a return of the members to this Parliament than that the election should be held and a member returned by men, a large number of whom, though on the list, are no longer residents of the place and ought not to be entitled to vote.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend, while admitting that the city of Winnipeg has remained unrepresented as a consequence of the Act of last year, pleads that if that Act had not been passed and the old Act remained in force, the same result would have practically followed, or that the member would have been elected on the old list when only about 50 per cent of the electorate would have been entitled to vote. My hon. friend is entirely wrong in that statement because if my hon friend had legislated in the right direction last year in this Parliament, he would have provided for revision of the electoral franchise of 1885, and that revision would have been completed before the meeting of this Parliament, and the member could have been in his place, if not at the very opening days of this session, at all events very early during this session, and the city of Winnipeg would have been represented.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have just made inquiry from a member of the Commons who represents Manitoba, as to the law regulating the voters' list in that country. The hon. Secretary of State is partially right. He says there is an appeal to a barrister or a judge, but he is the appointee of the government itself, to whom the appeal is made. It is not as it existed under the old Franchise Act of the Dominion, an independent tribunal to which an appeal can be made. That is all the difference.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend took the power of appointing a revising officer. It is not confined to a judge.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is quite true. No revising barrister was appointed under the old law—or very few, if any, were appointed—where there was a judge or junior judge. In either case the judge and the junior judge were appointed as the revising officers, and it was only in counties like my own, where there were three divisions that an exception was made, and in that case the junior judge was appointed as the revising officer for two. I do not desire to argue that principle just now, but what I object to is placing the revision of the list or making the appeal to a person who is a creature of a government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I desire to call the attention of the hon. gentlemen present to the fact that the members of the Banking Committee desire to hold a meeting and cannot meet while the House is sitting.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is not a usual thing for the House to adjourn for a committee. Committees sometimes adjourn when the House meets. The time for the committee was half past four, and as that time has passed they cannot meet now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—There are certain gentlemen who wish to address the committee and get away.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—While we are on the matter of delayed returns, may I again ask when I may expect these returns that I have been pleading for so long across the floor of this House. I want that return as to the mail between Cape Tormentine and Sackville very particularly, and I was promised it to-morrow, and to-morrow and to-morrow, but that to-morrow does not appear to come. Can my hon. friend tell me when that to-morrow will arrive.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot tell my hon. friend; I am not a prophet.

DOMINION OF CANADA GUARANTEE AND ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the adjournment of the House I ask leave, on behalf of the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Allan) who is not present, to move that the bill, which came from the House of Commons, intituled: "An Act respecting the Dominion of Canada Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company," be placed on the orders of the day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is one of the most irregular proceedings which could be taken. With a motion before the House for adjournment, my hon. friend, who is a great stickler for the rules of this House, makes a motion which is totally irrelevant and out of order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I accept the situation.

The Senate adjourned.

BEDLINGTON AND NELSON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. MILLER in the absence of Mr. Baker from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (107) "An Act respecting the Bedlington and Nelson Railway Company" with an amendment. He said:—I may state with regard to this amendment that the bill is really intended to make a Dominion Act of an Act of the legislature of British Columbia and the first clause is a declaratory clause to that effect. The amendment is to add to the schedule after the words 1897, the words set forth in the schedule to this Act, which means that the British Columbia Act should be added as a schedule to the Act of this Parliament which is done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This amendment incorporates one of the British Columbia Acts and as there is serious objection to some of their Acts I would ask that the consideration of the amendments be postponed.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The amendment was put in by the law clerk, because it was necessary to be done in order to carry out the amendment passed by the committee. The amendment of the committee was that the British Columbia Act should be added as a schedule to the bill before the committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Is it not rather an extraordinary proceeding? Some legislation may have taken place since on that very Act in British Columbia, so that it is rather misleading. It is a novelty in our legislation certainly. Many of the Acts of British Columbia contain clauses disqualifying the Chinese from being employed in the construction or operation of the company, and there are other objectionable clauses in their legislation. I think it is rather a serious innovation that we should adopt their legislation here and confirm it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The amendment does not confirm the British Columbia statute. The British Columbia statute is recited in the bill as it came before the committee, and all the ratification which the British Columbia measure gets was in the bill as it came to the committee. All the committee did was to say that this British Columbia Act, which is referred to in the bill, should be added to the bill as a schedule, so that any one reading this Canadian Act would know just what it meant. It does not confirm it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I invariably defer to the action of any committee of which I may be a minority member, in regard to any amendment which they may choose to make to the bill, but in this particular case I thought it wise on my part at any rate to object to the proposal which was made by my hon. friend the senior member from Halifax (Mr. Power) in adding to this bill as a schedule of the British Columbia legislation passed on behalf of this company. It certainly, to say the least of it, is an anomoly that there should be embodied in our statute-book a copy of provincial legislation regarding any company, and more particularly when that legislation is not embodied or contained in one Act but in series of Acts, and not only in a series of Acts regarding that particular company, but in the general Railway Act of the province. My hon. friend from Halifax, with very commendable anxiety or zeal to place the public in a position by which they might have full information regarding this company, suggested that one particular Act—the Act of 1897, I believe it is—should be embodied in this particular bill, overlooking the fact that such action would be entirely misleading and illusory, inasmuch as that Act has been amended by a series of Acts, and, as I understand, there has been incorporated into it the general Railway Act of British Columbia. Consequently, one who is a stranger to those facts, perusing this particular bill which we have under consideration, and looking at the schedule and finding thereto annexed a copy of a British Columbia Act, would very naturally assume that it was a complete statement of the whole legislation upon that particular subject, whereas we find, as I have said before, a series of Acts respecting it. I am in favour of embracing in the schedule any agreements to which the public might not have access, and concerning which research could not be had except through private quarters, to any bill which might come up for our consideration, but where an Act of Parliament is embodied in the provincial statutes, and where those statutes can be seen in any legal library to which one may have access, it seems to me an entirely unnecessary step and a very bad precedent to establish, and one which will be extremely misleading, owing to the public believing that the whole legislation is embraced in the schedule, whereas it is only a part of it. I, therefore, with very great hesitation, and with all deference to the committee's report, submit that it is a very dangerous precedent to establish and one which should not be adopted by this House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Rideau (Mr. Clemow) has given notice that these amendments will be taken into consideration on Wednesday, and I take it that is the proper time to discuss it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think that I can give reasons which will justify the course taken. I am fully in accord with the sentiments of the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Scott) on that question, and when it is elaborated, I think the House will agree with me.

THE WINDING UP ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE.

The order of the day being called "third reading of Bill (O) "An Act further to amend the Winding Up Act."

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said:—Before the third reading of the bill, I should like to say that I have received representations, as chairman of the Banking Committee, from several parties to the effect that there are suits now pending before the courts in Ontario which would be affected by some provisions of this bill, and they desire to have an opportunity of being heard before the bill passed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have received similar letters in connection with the provisions of this bill, and in conversation with Mr. Kirchhoffer, before he left for the west, I intimated to him that I thought the better way would be to refer it back for consideration to the committee where the parties interested on both sides can be heard. I, therefore, move that the bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee on Banking and Commerce for further consideration.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think that is a very proper motion, under the circumstances. It is only right that parties complaining that their interests are likely to be affected seriously by the bill, should have an opportunity of being heard before the committee before the bill is submitted to the House for the third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (124) "An Act to amend the Inland Revenue Act."—(Mr. Scott.)

ADULTERATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill (123) "An Act further to amend the Adulteration Act." He said:—After the criticisms of several members of the House yesterday, I submitted this bill to the gentlemen in the Inland Revenue Department who are particularly familiar with the subject, and who drafted the bill, and they seemed to be perfectly satisfied with subsection 2 of section F, which was so commented on yesterday. Several hon. gentlemen thought some improvement might be made in this subsection. The officers of the department expressed themselves perfectly satisfied with that clause, and think it could not be changed with advantage. I had, myself, drafted another clause, perhaps more in harmony with the spirit of yesterday in the debate, but that has not been approved of. The suggestions for the change in this bill, I may say, have been made by Dr. Roddick of Montreal, and were forced on the attention of the department by him owing to circumstances that had really arisen and which might have been attended with very serious consequences, and which would still be open to serious consequences if a change of this kind were not made in the law. Under these circumstances, I move the third reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (Q) "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892." He said:—I need not enter into a discussion of the provisions of this bill. It contains a number of distinct amendments that have no relation to each other, but are amendments to the Criminal Code that have been suggested by different officers acting under the Crown. They have reported their views from time to time to the department, pointing out what ambiguity they think ought to be corrected and what changes ought to be made, in order to carry out the original intention and purpose of the Act. These changes relate to various matters, and can all be better discussed when the House goes into committee on the bill than they can upon the second reading. I may say that if our Criminal Code errs at all, it is perhaps in going further than many think necessary in undertaking to bring various human actions within the purview of what is known as crime. It may be in some instances that offences are temporary in their character, and rather fall within the class of police offences and could be better regulated under the powers of police than powers conferred for dealing with crime. I think it is important that in legislating upon the subject of crime we should take care to distinguish between those classes of actions that may result simply in riot or disorder, and which can be regulated under the police powers of the provincial governments, from those which are permanent offences against the well-being of society. For these reasons there are some things that have been proposed from time to time to Parliament to be made crimes that we have not thought it in the public interest to deal with as such under the provisions of this bill. Take, for instance, the proposals to embrace a certain class of photographs that may be exhibited for hire in halls, mostly representing pugilistic contests. I thought it well not to undertake to deal with them. If they are offences at all, they may be regarded as police offences rather than crimes, and can be dealt with as such by those having jurisdiction over that subject. The same may be said with regard to race courses. It does seem to me that it would be a most illogical position to say that you will permit racing as an innocent recreation, or whatever you may choose to call it, for ten or fifteen or twenty days of the year, but that if one runs a horse race on a race course on the 21st day it shall be a crime. That is a mistaken view altogether of the use which ought to be made of prohibitory legislation constituting crime. If there is gambling or riotous conduct or disorder, or actions which tend to the demoralization of society in the continuance of racing on a race course, the proper way to deal with it is by requiring a license for the establishment of such a course, and to provide for the regulations of its use and the determination of the number of days in the year when such license shall be enforced. It becomes a police regulation, as much so as the licensing of a hotel, or of any other institution in the country which may require regulation in that way. For these reasons, I have undertaken to confine the legislation within those limits that have been long recognized as criminal offences.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I desire to give notice that I shall move to amend the clause of this bill which raises the age of consent to eighteen. I shall move that eighteen be striken out and forty-five years substituted. If I had my own way I would fix no age at all, and would allow "every herring to hang by its ain head," because it is clear to me that it is not so much the age of the female as the way she has been brought up that will be her protection. If a girl has been allowed to stroll about the streets in the evenings, or to go to public houses and buy spirituous liquors for her parents and hear ribald conversation, I think she is more likely to be corrupt at five or six years of age than a girl properly brought up would be at eighteen. A girl who is properly brought up is kept in the house in the evenings and not allowed to associate with improper persons; she is prevented from reading immoral books, and especially is not allowed to read such filthy bills as some which have been brought before this House. The hon. Secretary of State will remember a bill which came to us the provisions of which were of so disgusting a nature that he moved that the report of the discussion upon it be stricken out of our record. I do not want such a bill to be on the statute-book, so that fifty or sixty years hence people will take it as an indication of of the state of morals in this country at the present age. I say wait until crimes are committed before laws are passed against them, I have read in some classical work an account of where a Scythian was asked by an Athenian legislator what punishment they had for patricide in his country. He replied none, we have no such crime. I say we should not legislate to prevent crimes until they arise. The way a female is brought up, and not her age, should be her best protection. I may quote from a noted poet, whom my hon. friend from Monck highly esteems—Robert Burns, in the Jolly Beggars—where a young woman says, "I once was a maid; but I dinna mind when." If my hon. friend from Brandon were here, I would ask him if that is not a literal translation of what Petronius Arbiter, who flourished 1900 years ago, the friend of Nero, put in the mouth of a female in his classical work. In the last 1900 years there have been so many females who did not know when they were maidens, that age should not be made a protection against the wiles of man. Why do I name 45 as the limit? When a woman is over 30, it is difficult to ascertain her age. It is marked in the family Bible, but that is a portion of the Bible she never refers to. It is as hard to find out her age as it is to ascertain the age of a horse, when the mark in his teeth has worn out. At 45, the female is in the state that Moses mentions Sarah was when the angel told Abraham that she should have a son, and she treatd it with ridicule. A young female knows the evil that may happen to her if she sins; she knows that she may become pregnant, and that the offspring would be a bastard, and would be branded as such. He may succeed in life, acquire wealth and distinction, but still would be branded with the name of bastard. William the Conqueror, the greatest monarch, perhaps, that has ever sat on the British throne, who, from his small duchy in France, landed an army in England, conquered at Hastings the army of Harold, who had just returned from the north of England, where he had defeated the Danes, and who brought England under subjection and gave it Norman laws and Norman civilization, and whose Doom's-day book is still quoted as a mark of his legislation, was, nevertheless, spoken of in the annals of the day as William the Bastard, and his mother as the miller's daughter. I will defer anything more I have to say on the subject till the bill goes to committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will say to my hon. friend that the provisions of this bill are for the protection of youth and not second childhood.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—That is the fault of the member for Norfolk in bringing in a bill without consulting the Minister of Justice. My remarks are entirely confined to the bill which he sent down.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

GUARANTEE AND PENSION FUND SOCIETY OF DOMINION BANK BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (100) "An Act respecting the Guarantee and Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank, and to change its name to the Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank." He said:—It appears that at the present time this fund is used for two purposes, namely, as a pension fund and also as a guarantee fund, out of which sums payable by the employees to the bank shall be taken, and the object of this bill is to limit the fund to the purposes of a pension fund alone, and allow the individual employees of the bank to make separate arrangements with the bank as to the guarantee; and as a consequence of that the name of the Guarantee and Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank is dropped, and the name of the fund in future is to be the Pension Fund of the Dominion Bank.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

ERIE AND HURON AND LAKE ERIE AND DETROIT RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY'S AMALGAMATION BILL.

THIRD READING.

The order of the day being called:

Consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to (Bill 60) "An Act to authorize the amalgamation of the Erie and Huron Railway Company and the Lake Erie and Detroit River Railway Company."—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain.)

Hon. Mr. POWER said:—The hon. gentleman from Windsor was obliged to leave Ottawa on important private business, and he desired me to move concurrence in the amendments to this bill for him. If hon. gentlemen will turn to page 318 of the Senate minutes they will find the amendments a little below the middle of the page. It will be remembered that the hon. gentleman from Windsor allowed the consideration of these amendments to stand over because there were two blanks left in the first amendment. The amendment reads:

The name of the company constituted by the amalgamation of the said two companies shall be the Lake Erie and Detroit River Railway Company. The capital stock of such company shall be dollars, divided into shares of dollars each.

On looking into the charters of the two companies I find that the shares of both companies are $100 each; so that the second blank will be filled in with a hundred. The capital stock of one of the companies is $1,000,000. The other company was originally incorporated by the legislature of Ontario with a capital of only $150,000, but with power to increase that capital from time to time; and the gentleman who appeared as counsel on behalf of promotors of the bill said that they wished to have the capital of the new company the sum of the capital stocks of the two companies. Therefore I move that in the first amendment the word "dollars" be stricken out, and the words "the sum of the capital stocks of the two companies" inserted; and that in the second blank "one hundred" be inserted.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the amendments as amended be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the third reading of the bill as amended.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned.

INSPECTOR OF MINES IN YUKON DISTRICT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE inquired of the government:

1. What is the date of H. H. Norwood's appointment to the position of Inspector of Mines in the Yukon Territory?
2. The total amount paid him from date of his appointment to the 1st May, 1899?
3. Total amount allowed or paid him for travelling expenses?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In reply to the inquiries by the hon. gentleman I beg to say that Mr. H. H. Norwood was appointed on the 21st August, 1897. The total amount paid him was $3,476, of which $1,575 is for salary and $1,901.50 allowed him for travelling and living expenses in connection with his duties. The third question as to the total amount allowed or paid him for travelling expenses, is answered by the reply to question No. 2.

PAYMENTS TO GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired of

The leader of the Senate to furnish details of the following items, contained in a return submitted to this House on the 26th of May last, of amounts paid the Grand Trunk Railway Company by the government of Canada:—

Proportion of operating joint sections....	$43,991 71
Proportion of cost of ties	186 57
Proportion of cost of Nunn's signal.....	5 99
Difference in value of rails renewed on joint section	2,176 28
Allowance for proportion of general office expenses, rent, fuel, light, stationery, &c	1,000 00
Proportion of cost of renewals of bridges on joint section.....	2,281 50

The statement of details to show on what basis the proportion was in each case ascertained.

He said:—I may explain that I have asked these questions because an item given earlier than this in the list submitted in the return stated that the Intercolonial Railway had paid one-half of the salary of the car inspector at St. Hyacinthe, and my object was to find whether all these proportions were on the same basis of the government paying one-half.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that this return is in course of preparation in the Department of Railways and Canals, and I have not yet received it. I think they are awaiting some information from the Grand Trunk Railway Company before the return is completed. I expected to have received it to-day. As soon as it is received I will bring it down as promised.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then the inquiry should stand.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, it will stand.

The inquiry was allowed to stand.

THE COMPANIES' ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the third reading of Bill (N) "An Act to amend the Companies' Act."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before this bill is finally disposed of, I desire to mention to the Minister of Justice that considerable attention has been paid to this measure, since publicity has been given to it, in circles that would most naturally be interested in its passage, and I have myself had communications from three different parties relative to its merits, and pointing out that it did not go as far as such a bill might safely go. With a view to giving my hon. friend the suggestions which have been made to me by certain professional men in Toronto, I would ask that he allow the third reading to stand, and possibly he might see the propriety of enlarging the scope of the bill so as to meet the suggestions to which I refer. I would, for instance, mention this class of cases: It has been suggested that there is no logical reason why this bill should not be applied to companies incorporated under special Acts, so that they could issue preference shares in the same manner as companies incorporated under the Companies' Act. I understand that under the Ontario Act, of which this bill I understand is practically a copy, it is possible for companies incorporated under special Acts to exercise the provisions practically of this measure—that is to say, that the preference shares provisions under the Companies' Act in Ontario are not limited or restricted to companies incorporated under the Companies' Act. Another point to which my attention has been directed is that the language of the bill is somewhat vague, and is giving considerable trouble in Ontario—that is, whether preference shares have a preference only in the case of dividends, or whether the preference applies in winding up. The language of the Ontario bill is precisely the same as in this bill, and that language has resulted in complications and doubt in Ontario. I am told that the Attorney General of Ontario is in considerable doubt as to its application by reason of those words. If that be the case, there is no reason why this House should not profit by the experience gained in the working of the Ontario Act. I have no interest in the matter beyond directing the attention of the Minister of Justice to the suggestions which have been made, and to say that it would be well to allow the bill to stand.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The suggestions which the hon. gentleman mentioned, and others, have been brought under my notice. Some of the suggestions made I have discussed with the Finance Department, and we came to the conclusion that the provisions of the bill are all we ought to undertake to deal with in the present session. I may point out to my hon. friend that the object of another bill that we have before Parliament is to enable all loan companies to avail themselves of the opportunity of coming under its provisions, and those companies to which my hon. friend refers, that have special charters, if they choose to come under the provisions of the general Act of incorporation can avail themselves of the provisions of this bill. It is not, I think, in the public interest—it ought not to be a part of the policy of this Parliament—to encourage them to continue under existing charters. If they choose to remain distinct companies relying upon the provisions of their charters of incorporation, and not on the general Act, if they require a provision of this sort they will say so, and will come to Parliament for that purpose. It would be rather illogical to extend the provisions of this bill to them, when this is a part of the general scheme of incorporation, and at the same time to allow them to retain their isolated position under a separate and distinct charter. That is one reason, and I think an important one, why we should not undertake to embrace these companies. Then, with regard to what my hon. friend says in respect to the preference stock, whether it is a preference in the case of winding up as well as a preference in the case of dividends, is worthy of consideration, and if there was any doubt in the matter that ought to be removed. I do not think that any one ever contemplated doing more than giving preference as to dividends, because my hon. friend will see that the bill provides that this special stock may afterwards become general stock under the provisions of the bill. I shall let the bill stand, as my hon. friend suggests, and will be prepared to consider that one point with regard to the preference stock. I move that the order of the day be discharged, and that the third reading of the bill be fixed for Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

OTTAWA ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

The order of the day being called :

Third reading of Bill (18) "An Act respecting the Ottawa Electric Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW said :—Parties interested in the construction of this road are very anxious to have the time limited for the completion of the road, and the promoters have very generously acceded to the request. I, therefore, move that the bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by striking out the word "three" in the second line of clause 2, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "two."

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—The time given to begin the work is how long?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Eighteen months within which to begin the work, and three years to complete. The company wish to reduce the time to two years.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—That will give them only six months to complete the extension.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It is their own request.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was then read the third time and passed, as amended.

Bill (92) "An Act respecting the Saskatchewan Railway and Mining Company."—(Mr. Lougheed.)

Bill (76) "An Act respecting the Dominion of Canada Guarantee and Accident Company."—(Mr. Macdonald, B.C., in the absence of Mr. Allan.)

RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved the second reading of Bill (32) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the sale of Railway Passenger Tickets." He said :—This is a bill to amend the Railway Passenger Tickets Act, section 110, by adding after the word "railways" the words "steamboats or ferry companies." It is done at the request of a ferry company running boats from Windsor to Detroit, and persons other than the agents appointed by this company are taking advantage of some irregularities in the matter of selling tickets, and defrauding the company out of some money. This bill merely authorizes the company to appoint their own agents to sell tickets, and provides that no person else shall have the privilege.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the measure, but I wish to direct the attention of the hon. gentleman of Glengarry to the fact that the bill does not cover the whole ground. It will be necessary, it seems to me, to have this first clause amended by the committee. In the chapter of the Revised Statutes at the end of the first section, there is a reference to railway companies employing such agents. The hon. gentleman will require to insert the words "steamboat or ferry" after the word "railway." The bill does not provide for that. It only provides for the insertion of the words in section 7.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I think it should be amended as the hon. gentleman suggests.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

LONDON MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved the second reading of Bill (68) "An Act respecting the London Mutual Fire Insurance Co." He said:—This is a bill of the London Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Canada to obtain the privilege of issuing stock by by-law of the board of directors. I do not know much about the bill. I simply took it up because it was not fathered by anybody here. I suppose the whole matter can be properly explained in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (91) "An Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners." He said:—This is a bill of considerable length, as it is a consolidation of the provisions of many statutes passed since the beginning of this century, relating to Trinity House of Quebec and Trinity House of Montreal and the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec. There have been, in all, up to the present time, 99 statutes relating to this subject, and there is an attempt made in the bill, which I submit for the consideration of the House, to consolidate the provisions of these Acts that are still in operation, and to make clear the functions and duties of the harbour commissioners of the city of Quebec. The bill is one of details rather than general principles. Many hon. gentlemen will remember how the harbour commission of the city of Quebec is at present established. There is no change in the organization, but there is an attempt made in the bill—and I think successfully made—to consolidate the provisions of all these various statutes, which will be a matter of convenience, both to the public who are interested in the port of the city of Quebec, and to the harbour commissioners who have its management and care in their hands.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if there is any new matter in the bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a consolidation of the law as it is. There is nothing new except the phraseology, which in some cases is necessarily new, on account of the number of statutes relating to the subject.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

JAMES BAY RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (73) "An Act respecting the James Bay Railway Company," without amendment.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved that the bill be read the third time to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before this bill is read the third time, I would like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman in charge of it to the fact that another bill relating to the James Bay Railway Company has gone through the Senate this session. It is not usual to have two measures dealing with the affairs of the same company in the same session.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—This bill relates to another company.

The motion was agreed to.

PETROLEUM INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (131) "An Act respecting the inspection of Petroleum and Naphtha."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I explained on the second reading that the object of this bill was to consolidate the laws relating to the inspection of petroleum, at the same time making changes which I pointed out with a view of reducing the cost of petroleum in this country. The principal change is in regard to the inspection. At the present time, as the hon. gentlemen know oil may be inspected in tanks, or in the refinery, and when it goes from the refinery as inspected by the officer of the Excise Department, it can be subdivided and distributed over the country. Of course, the penalties have been increased considerably in consequence of the greater opportunity of not having the oil up to the standard, but as a close watch is kept on the oil coming into the country, and it is also inspected before it leaves the refinery, it was thought there would not be any real danger in that direction. Probably the more satisfactory way would be for me to explain the clauses as we go on and point out to the hon. gentlemen any that are new. Subsection b of the interpretation clause, contains a provision which is consequent upon the change in the proposal to allow the oil to be inspected at the refinery. All refineries are brought directly under the control of the Department of Inland Revenue, and they must take out a license. It is simply to bring them directly under the control of the officers of the Inland Revenue Department.

The clause was adopted.

On clauses 3, 4 and 5.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said :—The object of the license is to bring the refiners under the control of the Inland Revenue officers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Are they obliged to take out a license now?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

The clauses were adopted.

On clause 7.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Subsection 2 of this clause is new. Naphtha, being considered the most dangerous element of oil, by the statute all packages of naphtha must be painted red, and that colour is reserved exclusively for naphtha.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 8.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a change in this clause. The flash test has been reduced from 270 to 260 degrees. The department have given way to those who use it, for the reason that they think a better light can be obtained, and the test is sufficient. That relates to oil used on railway carriages. Ordinary oil for domestic purposes is only subject to a flash test at 85. It was formerly 95 In 1893 it was reduced to 90, and in 1894 to the present standard, 85 degrees. That is ordinary oil, but the oil to which I have alluded is subject to a test of 260 degrees.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do these tests correspond with the tests of United States oils?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Some United States oils are subjected to higher and some to lower tests. The flash test in England is very much lower than ours. It is down among the seventies.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This clause will apply to all oils, United States as well as Canadian.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. No oil will now be permitted to be used which does not stand the test provided.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain why these different tests are provided for. I understand the 85 degrees test is for ordinary or domestic use?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And what is meant by oil for outside service?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know. I presume it is not allowed to be used in a building. I presume it is for lighting vessels or headlights of locomotives. That has been the law for a number of years. That Act was passed in 44 Victoria.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 9.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Clause 9 is an important one. It is proposed to amend the Act because it has been found that in Petrolia, in the county of Lambton, the farmers use this naphtha for stoves. They have stoves specially constructed for it, and consider them quite as safe as gas stoves. They have 500 stoves in Petrolia using this naphtha in the farming community in violation of the law. It is a stove of peculiar construction and no accidents have followed its use, and the people are familiar with the danger. It is proposed to strike out in subsection b the words "In buildings not inhabited as residences for family purposes" and to add "and in stoves constructed in such a manner as to consume only the gas produced from the naphtha."

Hon. Mr. POWER—By that amendment the use of naphtha for mechanical or chemical purposes is allowed without any limitation. It seems to me that it would be better to put the exception after this clause, because you remove all restriction from its use for mechanical and chemical purposes by striking out those words.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Of course that is so. They have always had that privilege. There is no change in that respect. It can be used for mechanical and chemical purposes, and it can be used in stoves constructed in such a manner as to use only the gas produced from the naphtha.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not pretend to understand the technical parts of the bill, but it would seem that the same care has not been taken in subsection b as has been taken in subsection a, which requires that naphtha shall only be used in underground tanks outside the buildings. In this clause according to the amendment we are now making, it would appear that it can be used in buildings, and there is nothing to prevent it being used within a building which may be inhabited, and the precaution in the law as it stands, about its not being used in inhabited houses, is taken away.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You will notice in subsection 2 that it is allowed to be used for lighting purposes only, and the vapour is introduced through pipes into the house. In the proposed amendment it can be used in stoves constructed for that purpose where they burn only the gas. They have done it in Petrolia for a long time, and it was used by so many that it was idle to attempt to crush it out, and so far no accident accurred.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—It is the intention that naphtha may be used in inhabited buildings.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. They use it in the States, and we often hear of explosions. I should not care to use it in my buildings.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Is it not used here?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In the bill as it was originally drafted, the intention was to prevent its use in inhabited buildings, and the amendment goes on to permit of its use in stoves where the vapour can be used. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman has excellent authority behind his amendment, but that is what it means.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. It was represented by people in the Petrolia district that they had been in the habit of using it in stoves specially constructed for that purpose. It is not likely to spread out of that district, and as there are at least five hundred farmers using naphtha in that way, it was thought better to legalize it, so long as it was used in a stove constructed in that district for the purpose, rather than to attempt to prosecute them all for burning naphtha in stoves.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will there be any provision for inspection?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. Wherever naphtha is used, the officers of the department are authorized to make an inspection, but they will not take any responsibility for these stoves.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think, as this amendment reads, it goes much further than hon. gentlemen suppose. It reads "for use for mechanical or chemical purposes, and in stoves constructed in such a way as to consume only the gas from the naphtha." That gives unrestricted permission to use it for mechanical or chemical purposes, without any restriction.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The word "and" would make it read as two distinct provisions, first the permission to use it for mechanical and chemical purposes, and then the permission to use it in stoves where the vapour only is consumed.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I think we should leave it as it is there. It is a good provision as it stands. There should be another section, numbered c, specially providing for stoves.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I think it would be better. When the department make the changes themselves, one hesitates about making any alterations. But I can quite see that the clause is open to the objection urged against it. I think that we had better leave clause b as it is, and make the provisions in regard to stoves an independent clause. I will draft an amendment later on.

The subsection was allowed to stand.

On subsection 2.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is proposed to make some slight changes in this clause. It appears they put up oil in drums, barrels or smaller packages, and it reads "such drums, barrels and smaller packages must be painted red, with the word 'Naphtha' in some other colour legibly branded or marked thereon."

The subsection as amended was adopted.

On clause 11.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is the same, except that the marking has been dropped. It will be observed now that petroleum and naphtha are not marked in the smaller vessels. A person having a tank brought in by car, or by vessel, can have it inspected in bulk, and then he distributes it in bulk in whatever vessel he pleases. No doubt a good deal of oil would come into the country in what is called tank wagons, particularly in the North-west, where there has been a complaint that oil is very expensive. In some parts of the North-west I have been told that oil has been sold as high as 50 cents a gallon. It is believed that it will be brought into the country in tank wagons and distributed in that way.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 15.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This clause is the same, except heretofore they were obliged to have marks on the vessel. The branding was always an item of charge. One reason why petroleum has been so dear in the past is that when brought in in bulk and put into smaller vessels it had to be inspected and each barrel branded.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This reference to the price of petroleum recalls to my mind something I saw in the papers a day or two ago. It will be remembered that, before the opening of the session, it was found that, owing, apparently, to some understanding which had been arrived at between the Standard Oil Company and the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway Companies, higher rates were charged upon imported petroleum than upon petroleum refined in Canada, and in that way the price of the article was kept up, notwithstanding the regulation with respect to tank cars. Then the government had some correspondence with the railway companies, and it was understood, some time before the beginning of the session, that the railway companies had undertaken to desist from the discrimination which they had made. I have seen it alleged in the last few days that, notwithstanding this undertaking, they still discriminate. Perhaps the hon. minister knows whether that is the fact or not. If it is the fact, I think the attention of the government should be directed to it. It is a very important matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I only got it from the press and from a dealer in Montreal who wrote me unofficially on the subject. I think I referred it to the Department of Railways and Canals. I answered his letter in that direction, that the Department of Railways had the matter under consideration.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 22.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This clause imposes a penalty on any person having uninspected coal oil in his possessien. I presume you do not intend to have the inspection made while in the hands of the middleman?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It may be inspected at any time, if the officer has any reason for suspecting that the oil is not up to the standard.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—An innocent holder may have such oil in his possession and this would leave him liable to a penalty of a considerable amount. I can very well understand the propriety of making him liable if he is wilfully in possession.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The penalty should be levelled at the refiner or manufacturer.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You will find that provided for in the next clause. The policy is that oil coming into Canada shall be inspected at the border. It is only allowed to come in at certain ports, where ample provision is made for inspection. The refiner must take out a license, and there will be an officer from time to time at each refinery, just as at a distillery, and it will be his duty to see that all oil is inspected. The belief is that very little oil will be in circulation that is below the standard. It is necessary to give most ample powers to the inspector, even if the oil is found in the hands of an innocent party. Of course, he would not be subject to punishment if he could show he was not aware that the oil was not inspected.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—But the clause leaves the innocent holder liable to a heavy penalty.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why not say wilfully. In the hands of a small storekeeper, it could not then subject him to a penalty if he does not wilfully keep such oil.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I can understand why the law should be stricter now than in the past. In the past, every package had to be inspected separately and marked as inspected. Under the new regulations the oil comes into the country in tank cars and tank ships, and the opportunities for defrauding the revenue will be much greater than under the existing law. I can understand that it is necessary there should be a pretty severe penalty for smuggling oil. That is about what it is. My own belief is that, though the general effect may be good, in certain places, like the Eastern Townships and some other portions of the province of Quebec, where the border of the United States is only an imaginary line, a good deal of petroleum will continue to come in without inspection.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I dare say the origin of this provision of the law as proposed to be made is just what my hon. friend from Halifax has suggested. Of course, the oil brought into the country in a legitimate way is inspected at the border, or inspected at the refinery if produced in Canada, and it would require no second inspection for that reason. The test is determined at the time, but if oil that was below that test should be found in the possession of any dealer, it would be an evidence, to some extent at all events, that the oil had been improperly imported. That would be one of the indications that it had been oil improperly imported into the country, and had been put on the market without inspection.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The statute should apply to one engaged in the sale, but it appears to me that this clause says distinctly that if a man is found—any private individual—with a certain quantity of this oil in his possession, who has had no opportunity of testing it, he is made liable to this heavy punishment.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—These clauses require a good deal of consideration. I find that this clause imposes a penalty of $100 for the first offence, and $500 for the second offence against any person who may be found having uninspected oil in his possession for sale, and the next section imposes just the same penalty on a refiner who may have allowed to go, or sent out from his factory, uninspected oil. Clause 24 meets the case of a man to whom the Minister of Justice refers—of a person offering oil for sale which falls below the test. I think with my hon. friend from Halifax, that the necessity for this extreme provision without, as my hon. friend from Calgary says, the word wilfully to modify it does not exist so much now as it did formerly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island misapprehends my point. My point was that it is more necessary to have a high fine now, because there are greater difficulties in identifying the oil. Once the oil is taken out of the tank car or tank ship, there is no means of identifying it by the package in which it is, as there is under the existing law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps it would be as well to allow that clause to stand and let us think it over. No man is ever likely to be fined who comes by the possession of such oil innocently.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—How will the clause meet a case of this kind: in our part of the country we import oil from the United States in vessels, and it is landed three or four places before it reaches its destination. Then there is the difficulty of getting it inspected where it is landed. It may be in a man's possession for a week or more before being inspected.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It must be inspected at the port of entry. The ports at which petroleum is allowed to be imported are limited—ports where there is an officer to inspect. Once it passes that inspection, it is safe, so that the case which my hon. friend puts could not arise.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I have known a case of oil being imported from Boston in a small vessel. It was put off the vessel into a scow, carried by scow to the railway station, and by rail to its destination, and it could not be inspected until it reached its destination.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Under the law, as I understand it, the oil can only be imported at the port where it is specifically allowed to come in, and must be inspected there.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Is there a change in the law?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it must be inspected where it first comes into the country. It cannot go beyond that.

On clause 35.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This clause is new. The Acts mentioned in this clause are consolidated in this bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why does it not come into force like any other bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know. They may require to give it some other consideration, or it may be only fair to the public. The refiners have not taken out any license yet, and it may be necessary that they should be notified. The department do not want to take any hasty steps. It may take some little time to get down to work.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Would it be to the interest of the refiners to flood the country with oil before the Act comes into force?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, on the contrary, I think not. The refiner certainly is not interested in having each barrel inspected. He does not get any benefit. The Crown loses from forty to fifty thousand dollars a year. It is practically giving up that much revenue, because the smaller packages are no longer inspected, and the fees due the department are diminished in that proportion.

The clause was adopted.

On the schedule.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a change in the schedule, in the fifth line from the end of it. It appears in the amendment that took place in the Act in 1894, when the flash test was reduced from 90 to 85. The mode of testing ought to have been changed. In doing the testing the temperature is applied at a lower degree than the standard, and it is brought up gradually The oil now must stand a flash test of 85. Therefore, in testing at 85, they would apply the heat at 80, and bring it up to 85. We desire to substitute 80 for 90.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Referring to the statement of the minister in explaining one of the clauses of this bill that the smaller packages shall not be inspected. I think that is a dangerous provision. We make it an offence for a man to sell oil not up to the standard. How is he going to know that the oil is not up to the standard if it is not inspected?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before it leaves the refinery it must be inspected. There are heavy penalties if it is allowed to go out of the refinery without being inspected. If it comes in from a foreign country it must be inspected at the port of entry. No oil comes in which is not inspected.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—But the smaller packages are not inspected.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. If a man imports a tank car, or imports a vessel with a tank compartment in it, he buys the oil in bulk; it is coming in from the United States, and an officer inspects it at the port, and the purchaser can place it in whatever vessels he pleases.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I quite understand that, but there is oil imported from the United States in square cans in a wooden frame.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They would have to be inspected. If a man imports oil in smaller vessels he can do so.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Those packages must be inspected?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—How would it be where persons have already placed an order for five or ten thousand barrels of oil and that oil has been purchased and landed before the bill goes into operation?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If they imported it in a larger vessel the cost of inspection would be so much less. If they bring it in in a barrel they must have each barrel inspected. It is a mere question of cost on inspection.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E I.)—But the oil may be landed and stored before the bill becomes law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then they would have to pay for the inspection in the barrels. It may be some considerable time before the law goes into effect. We desire to give parties ample notice.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Does not this test reduce the quality of the oil to a quality inferior to the present standard?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, the schedule contains the instructions to the officer who examines the oil and he applies the test to it, so that oil that will explode at a less temperature than 85° would be condemned, and in testing it they commence at 80° and go up.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I)—But the present test is ninety degrees.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No ; it is 85. It was originally 95, and in 1893 it was reduced to 90, and in 1894 was reduced to 85, and we are not making any change.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the bill, and asked leave to sit again.

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (90) "An Act respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company." He said :—This is a road which has recently been purchased by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and which, for a number of years, has been involved in serious litigation. There is now an opportunity, amounting to a certainty, of the road being built, and this bill provides for a short extension of time for the completion of the road, and provides that $20,000 shall be spent within the coming year. I understand it has received, to a very large extent, the support of the members from Manitoba and the North-west.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

ONTARIO AND RAINY RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (121) "An Act respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company." He said :—The object of this bill is to empower the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company to acquire, by purchase or otherwise, the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western Railway, a small road which is now being worked in conjunction with the first named line. They have not the corporate power to purchase this road, and they desire to purchase it.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS introduced Bill (R) "An Act further to amend the Penitentiary

Act." He said :—The object of the bill is, where a portion of a province is more convenient to a penitentiary in another province than it is to the provincial penitentiary, to give the government power to attach that portion of the penitentiary district to the most convenient penitentiary. It also provides that the Governor in Council may fix the sums annually paid to the warden and other officers of the penitentiary. At present these amounts have been fixed by law. The last statute, I believe, fixes the salaries in some instances below what they were formerly, and in some instances a grave injustice is done to officers in this way. I ask for power to regulate the salaries of the penitentiary officers. Then I also ask by the bill, with regard to persons who have been promoted from one office to another, and while the office to which they are promoted is an office for which compensation is provided under the Civil Service Act, that certain sums shall be paid to them upon their retirement from office. As the law now stands, where a person is promoted from the office to which a gratuity is attached to an office to which a retiring allowance is granted under the Civil Service Act, he would only be entitled to the latter, although he might have served a very short time in the office of higher grade. I propose to take power in this bill that, where an officer has been a long time in the service holding an office to which a gratuity is attached, upon his retirement he shall not be deprived of that gratuity in consequence of his having been promoted to another office where the compensation is on a different basis. In the latter case, his compensation would be measured by the time he served in the higher office, which might do him a great injustice and might give him much less than he would have received had he been retired before he was promoted. I also propose to provide in the bill for the removal of insane convicts, persons who were insane at the time of their conviction. We have in the penitentiaries several cases where persons had been confined in a lunatic asylum, where they were discharged from the lunatic asylum perhaps under the conviction that they were so far improved that they would be better in the care of their friends. They commit some offence, or they plead guilty, perhaps, upon the advice of relatives and friends, and are sent to the penitentiary, no inquiry having been made at the time, because there was no trial and no evidence taken, perhaps, beyond their own confession of guilt, to establish their mental condition, and to show that they were incapable of committing the offence for which they stand convicted. I propose to take the power—and we have found it necessary in several cases—where it becomes manifest that the person who has pleaded guilty and who was convicted and sent to the penitentiary was insane at the time, that notice shall be served upon the Attorney General and that he shall be handed into the charge of the civil authorities to be taken care of in the lunatic asylum, instead of continuing a charge upon the Dominion as at present. It is right and proper enough that the Dominion should be responsible for those persons who become insane after conviction, but it is scarcely proper that a person who, if the evidence had been taken and all the facts disclosed upon the trial, could not have been convicted because of want of responsibility, should, when that fact becomes manifest, continue to be in the custody of the Dominion authorities. These are the provisions of the bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would like to ask the hon. minister whether the power which he proposes to take to raise salaries can be done at any period? Does he propose to pay them before having first asked for an appropriation in the estimates?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—At the present moment the salaries of the officers to whom he has referred are regulated by the department, but Parliament is asked, before they can be paid, to vote the sum, and approve of the increases of salary which the officers are to receive. The proposition, if I understand him correctly, is to concentrate the power within the minister himself to declare what the salary of any of these wardens in the penitentiaries shall be, without the intervention of Parliament. It is true, when the estimates comes down, the Senate can reject the whole of the estimates. The Commons could reject an item, but the Senate could not. For my part, I cannot see what necessity there is for taking that power so long as power is vested in Parliament to approve or disapprove of the increase of any salary which the minister of the department to which the officer belongs, thinks he is entitled. Then, if I understand the other point, it is a direct infringement of the provisions of the Civil Service Act. At present, an officer may have been serving in the position of a first-class clerk, from which he is receiving $1,800 a year. He may be promoted, a year before his retirement to the position of a chief clerk, which would give him $2,400 per annum.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am only dealing with the officers of the penitentiary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not the officers in the civil service?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Well, are they not under the Civil Service Act? Some of them are, and consequently they would be affected by the statement which I am making. If there are those officers in the penitentiary who are not governed by the provisions of the Civil Service Act, then my hon. friend's bill would apply, so far as the retiring allowance or the gratuity was concerned.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend can see that those provisions are made similar to the Civil Service Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It struck me from the hon. gentleman's statement that an officer who had been promoted from a position with a salary of $1,800 to one of $2,400 a year, and was retired one year after his promotion, would then receive his retiring allowance not upon the average of the three years salary prior to his retirement, but upon the salary he was receiving at the time of his retirement. Does this bill give the power to the minister to say that he shall be retired on the 70 per cent, or whatever it may be, of the full salary he has been receiving for only one year, instead of the proportion of three years' salary? That is the other point which struck me.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think I had better let a portion of the hon. gentleman's inquiry stand till the bill is printed and before us. I will say, generally, for the information of my hon. friend and hon. gentlemen, that the gratuities of the staff in the penitentiaries are regulated by the Penitentiary Act. There are certain officers that are entitled to a retiring superannuation similar to those under the Civil Service Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They are under the Civil Service Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, so far as they are concerned—the warden and the deputy warden. So far as the inferior officers are concerned, they do not come under the provisions of the Act. They are paid a gratuity depending on the number of years they have been in the service—a lump sum. Supposing I take one of these officers who has been a cooper, and who is promoted to the position of deputy warden, and he holds that office for a few years: he would get the allowance made at the present time, as the law now stands, in respect to superannuation.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not unless he had been under the Civil Service Act for ten years.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Still, the sum to which he would be entitled in that case might be altogether less than the sum to which he would be entitled under the gratuity. Therefore, it is only fair in this case that the gratuity which he earned should stand, in addition to what he would be entitled to under the other law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In addition to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In addition to it. There is no discretion in the matter. I have taken no discretionary power, but my attention has been called to the fact that in some cases the parties would receive a less retiring allowance than if they had accepted the gratuity and gone out some years before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We will discuss it in committee.

The bill was read the first time.

BEDLINGTON AND NELSON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to Bill (107) "An Act respecting the Bedlington and Nelson Railway Company." He said:—These amendments were considered in the Railway Committee at their last meeting, and received the sanction of the majority of the committee on that occasion. When it was before this House at the second reading some parties objected to the introduction of the Act passed in British Columbia respecting this road. I approved of it, because I considered it necessary for the information of people who might have anything to do with this company; they would have the whole facts before them instead of having to refer to the statutes of British Columbia. That was one reason why, as an unprofessional man, I thought it desirable that all the information should be before the public by having the local legislation enacted in this bill. I did not think there would be any opposition. It is for the House to say whether they approve of the amendments or not.

The amendments were concurred in.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the third reading of the bill, as amended.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I should like the hon. gentleman to explain the effect of the incorporation of a provincial statute, as a schedule, into an Act of the Parliament of Canada—whether it is merely printed for the sake of information, which would be one thing, or whether it is incorporated into the statute in such a way as to make it part of our law. It is a matter entitled to very grave attention, and if my hon. friend does not object I should like to have the third reading stand.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The question asked by the hon. minister is a perfectly reasonable and natural one, and I may state, for the information of the hon. minister and of the House, that the amendment does not in any sense re enact or validate the British Columbia Act. If hon. gentlemen will just look at the preamble of the bill they will see that. The preamble says:

> Whereas the Bedlington and Nelson Railway Company has, by its petition, represented that it was incorporated by chapter 47 of the statutes of the province of British Columbia of 1897, and that it was thereby authorized to build a railway as therein mentioned.

Now, the amendment is to insert after "chapter 47" the words "as set forth in the schedule to this Act." You will see there is no validating at all; it is simply giving the British Columbia Act for the information of persons who may have occasion to use this bill when it becomes law. I do not know that it is necessary to add anything to what has been said by the hon. gentleman from Rideau Division. He gave the substantial, business-like reasons which induced the majority of the committee to make this amendment. It was stated by some hon. gentlemen that the law could be found in the British Columbia statutes, but the average layman has not the British Columbia statutes at hand, neither has the average lawyer. If this bill had referred to an Act of the Parliament of Canada, it might be said that the law was readily accessible to any one inquiring into this enactment, but the statutes of British Columbia are not to be found in the libraries even of all legal gentlemen. In fact, I believe there are some law libraries in which you will not find the statutes of British Columbia; and, as a matter of practical convenience, there is no doubt it is a great deal better to have that British Columbia statute set out in the schedule. When any one who may have occasion to do business with this railway company picks up this bill which we are now passing, he finds that the first section of the Act says:

> In this Act the expression "the company" means the body corporate and politic heretofore created by the Act mentioned in the preamble under the name of the Bedlington and Nelson Railway Company, and the works which the company by its said Act of incorporation is empowered to undertake and operate, are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

Now, the reader is completely in the dark: he does not know what the works are. He does not know anything about this company, except that it was incorporated by an Act of the British Columbia legislature passed in 1897. On the other hand, if he has this schedule he can find in the Act all the information that he would require. The first section of the British Columbia Act gives the names of the corporators and the name of the company. The second section gives the capital stock. Then there are the usual provisions with respect to the first meeting, and shares, and so on, and that the company shall have certain powers with respect to telegraph and telephone lines, docks and wharfs, in addition to the powers conferred by the British Columbia Railway Act. The 10th section gives the qualifications of directors. The 15th authorizes the company to issue bonds for any sum not exceeding $30,000 per mile of their railway. The 18th section describes the undertaking of the company. The time in which the road is to be constructed is mentioned. There is provision made for a deposit with the provincial government of British Columbia. The hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) took objection to the addition of this schedule on the ground that it did not give the whole of the British Columbia legislation; but any person who reads the British Columbia Act, as given in the schedule, will see the references to the British Columbia Act. They are merely of a general character. They are provisions that are not calculated to create any difficulty or doubt whatever. The only objection which any one can see to the addition of this schedule to the bill is the fact that it slightly increases the bulk of our volume of statutes, but I do not think that is a sufficiently strong objection to counterbalance the many advantages it affords to persons who have to use this statute.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I take a very strong objection to the addition of this schedule to the bill. Hitherto, for a long term of years during the course of legislation, we have referred to provincial Acts of various kinds, and never, until this instance, has it been found necessary to introduce a provincial Act into the Dominion statutes, and I do not see that there is any special occasion for its being done now. There have been Acts referring more particularly to provincial legislation—in fact, confirming their provisions, a much more important matter than the one before us, and surely every argument brought forward in support of this amendment would have greater force were we confirming another statute. Yet, no one has ever asked for such a thing. Is not the British Columbia statute as reliable and accessible as any Dominion statute? It is a recorded volume of Acts. This is a very different thing from a mere schedule of an agreement, which would necessarily be part of the bill; but in this case there is no necessity for departing from the rule which we have hitherto followed, and if it is done now every bill of the kind coming before this Parliament will contain such a schedule. If you adopt it as a principle, it will eventually make the Dominion statutes a very cumbersome book to put in every provincial Act required to give information. Any one having business with this railway must necessarily acquaint himself with the provisions of the provincial Act. Moreover, have we any assurance that what we are here asked to put in this bill is the Act as it stands in the British Columia statutes? It may have been amended.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am told that it has been amended.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—We had no proof whatever adduced to us in committee that there has not been a change made in the bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am told it has been amended several times.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, I am informed, several times.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—That is an additional reason why we should not put into the bill a copy of an Act which has been altered and amended, and which is not the same to-day as it was when it was passed. I do not think that the argument which has been adduced here to induce us to depart from a well established rule, which had worked satisfactorily hitherto, has any weight on this occasion. I do not think there is any necessity for it. This does not confirm it at all, but merely refers to it as existing. It will be a very awkward addition to the bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I took very strong ground in committee against such a radical departure from our regular procedure. I have a distinct recollection of this House having, on various occasions, passed legislation confirmatory of provincial Acts, and yet we never thought for a moment of attaching that provincial legislation to the bill with which we were dealing. The reasons urged by the hon. gentleman from Halifax are the very best reasons, in my judgment, why the course suggested should not be adopted. My hon. friend suggests that, for the purpose of giving information to those whom the Act may concern, it is desirable that a provincial Act, the Act of 1897, as it appears on the statute-book, should be attached to this bill. My hon. friend in the next breath went on to state that that particular Act did not embrace the whole of the legislation concerning this particular company—that it referred to other Acts.

Hon. Mr. POWER—One other Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That it referred to the General Railway Act of British Columbia, and the solicitor who is promoting the bill before the Railway Committee stated distinctly, on that occasion, that a series of amendments had been made to this particular Act. My hon. friend shakes his head, but certainly that statement was made in my hearing. I am not prepared to say whether it is an accurate statement or not, but the committee was told that several amendments had been made to that Act. If that be the case, is it not misleading to refer the public to a particular Act of the provincial legislature attached to this bill, inferentially saying that it contains the whole legislation, and then upon examination we find that it contains only a part of the legislation—only a small part?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If you do not insert this as a schedule, then you have it referred to in the preamble, and one would naturally go to the Act referred to in the preamble, and no other.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then the public are placed upon inquiry. They are driven to the British Columbia statutes, as they should be, for the purpose of ascertaining what legislation has been passed upon the subject. They learn from the Act that the General Railway Act of British Columbia has been incorporated into the charter. and will learn what other amendments have been made to the Act. Hon. gentlemen should keep this in view, that we have not taken the entire legislation concerning this company out of the hands of the local legislature. This bill does not expressly change the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature over this company, and they possibly may have power from time to time to legislate with regard to same.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It simply declares that. It does not confirm or terminate the provincial legislation. It may be a debatable question as to whether the provincial legislature of British Columbia will continue to exercise jurisdiction over this company, but I submit, under the form of bill now before us, the local legislature is not expressly prevented from legislating. I am not urging any captious opposition to this bill; I simply protest against the introduction of a precedent which, I am satisfied, in the future will prove troublesome and cumbersome in reference not only to information to the public, but the preparation of our statute-book. It is a precedent which should not be followed, and one which we have avoided establishing in the past.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The arguments of the hon. gentleman from Sarnia and the hon. gentleman from Calgary, give the very best possible reason why we should not deal with questions of this kind at all, unless the full facts are before us. If the company organized for the building of this railway desire to come under the provisions of the constitutional Act which places such matters under Dominion control, then they should come forward with a new bill altogether embodying all the powers and privileges they require. We are told that in confirming this British Columbia Act we are also confirming the legislation which places it under the provisions of the Railway Act of British Columbia. If it is to be, as it is declared here to be, a work for the general advantage of Canada, it should come under and be governed by the consolidated Railway Act of Canada, and not by a British Columbia Act. I do not understand my hon. friend's argument when he says that, by the passage of this bill, we do not take its operation from the power and control of the British Columbia Government. It seems to me, if I understand it correctly, that the very moment we gave it a Dominion charter, and bring it under the power of the Dominion, and declared it to be a work for the advantage of Canada, then it becomes de facto a Dominion Act and not a provincial Act.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the intention of the bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad to hear that. My hon. friend confirms that view of it by stating that that was the intention of the Act, and the intention of the promoters of the Act. If that were not the case there would be no use coming here. The hon. gentleman for Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) and the hon. gentleman for Sarnia (Mr. Vidal) object to our attaching to this bill provincial legislation which we are virtually confirming and approving by this measure.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We are no confirming any bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What I object to in this character of legislation is that the Senate should be asked to confirm and approve local legislation, and declare a railway to be for the advantage of Canada of which we know nothing whatever. All we were asked to do was to declare that this Act was in the interest of and for the benefit of Canada. My hon. friend says there was a number of amendments to this Act. I daresay my hon. friend is right. I do not remember hearing that statement made in the committee. If there were a number of amendments to this Act, then the preamble is misleading, because it should have stated that it was incorporated by the Act of British Columbia of 1897, and the amendments thereto, so that the Senate would know what they were dealing with. We were asked to declare this Act of British Columbia to be in the interest of the country, thereby making it a Dominion Act without knowing anything about what the Act contained. That is the reason I think why the committee took the ground they did, and the sooner the Parliament of Canada lay down a principle of not enacting legislation of this kind, the sooner it will be in the interest of those who have to deal with corporations of this kind. I remember distinctly a case in the House of Commons when we were asked to give the same powers to a mining company that they had and exercise under a law, I think, of the state of Ohio. My hon. friend may remember that case in connection with the iron mines in North Hastings. The committee never moved a single step until they had that Act before them, and knew exactly its provisions, and knew precisely what they were doing. That is all the committee asked to do in this case—simply that they should know whether they were justified in declaring this Act in the interest of Canada after having ascertained its exact provisions, and that is all the Senate is asked to do to-day. I am very strongly of the opinion that legislation of this kind, asking us to declare provincial Acts, of which we know nothing at all, to be in the interest of Canada, should not be passed. We should know the facts before we take any step in the matter. I do not think it is any argument to say that we have been pursuing a similar course in the past, and therefore, that it must be right, as if we were never to improve. If we find that is a vicious principle, let us reform it at once, and not go on in the old rut. Whenever I see that it is an advantage to the country, I have no objection, speaking personally, to the confirmation of that which I believe to be right, and that is why I ask that the provincial bill should be attached.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will the hon. gentleman from Rideau (Mr. Clemow) withdraw his motion for third reading and fix it for some other day, so that this amendment might be discussed more fully? The motion is to read the bill now. Will the hon. gentleman withdraw that motion and put it down for some other day?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have no objection, if the House desires it, but I think we might dispose of it now.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do not think so. The amendment is carried and it requires a motion for reconsideration.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Then I will move that the third reading be fixed for Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Committee of the Whole House on Bill (Q) "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I ask to have this bill placed on the orders for Tuesday next.

I had two or three deputations waiting on me, yesterday, and I have received several communications, since the bill has been printed, from prosecuting attorneys in various parts of the Dominion, making suggestions, and before we go into committee on the bill I should like to consider some of the provisions. Therefore, I move that the order of the day be discharged and placed on the orders for Tuesday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In looking over this bill I notice that it is almost a reproduction of the bill introduced by the late Minister of Justice, Sir Oliver Mowat, a large portion of which the Senate at that time rejected. I see very few changes in it, except in one or two instances, and they seem to be in the wrong direction.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If my hon. friend had the bill before him, he would see that there are a great many changes, and that what the Senate rejected is not before us now. I took that bill as my guide, and there have been further suggestions, some by the trial judges and some by prosecuting attorneys.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the direction of those provisions which were rejected?

The motion was agreed to.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (127) "An Act to amend the Bank Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand the banks petitioned for this bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

PETROLEUM INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole on consideration of Bill (131) "An Act respecting the Inspection of Petroleum and Naphtha."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 9.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When the committee was considering this clause, it was suggested that the portions of the subsection marked b which was struck out be restored. I now propose restoring this clause as it appears in the printed bill. Then I propose submitting an independent section to be called subsection c, which will read :

For use in stoves constructed in such a manner as to consume only the gas produce from naphtha.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 22.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This clause was allowed to stand over. Hon. gentlemen will see that this provision applies only to oil which has been smuggled in, and therefore we must have a pretty high penalty. If it once goes to the consumer there is no possible chance of it being seized, or the consumer being prosecuted for the penalty. I find that the clause was first introduced in 1881, not, of course, attaching a penalty of so much a car, but it was limited at that time—all the packages at that time had to be marked. The penalty was forty dollars for every package, no matter what size.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—That related only to persons who kept it for sale.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. The next change was in 1893, the words "or has in his possession" were introduced. All the amendments were in the direction of preventing the article going into consumption, unless it had been inspected and the package was marked, so I do not think there is any really substantial ground for alarm in making the penalty so high, because I do not think in any case, where a man is an innocent purchaser, he would be prosecuted, but where the article is smuggled in I think there should be a high penalty.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I appreciate the force of what the minister says, but the words are "any man having in his possession"—how can an innocent man, by any possibility know whether the naphtha or petroleum he purchases has been inspected? I can understand how it could have been known under the old system, where every package was inspected, but under this bill I do not see how a person could know whether the oil was inspected or not. It would be a greater hardship for a man who bought a barrel of oil, who could not be at the tank to see whether it was properly inspected or not, to be held liable if he has uninspected oil in his possession. It is perfectly right that the refiners, and all those who deal in oil, should be obliged to see that the oil is inspected before being offered for sale, but in the case of an innocent party who might have a barrel of uninspected oil in his possession, it would not be right to render him liable to such a penalty.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Clause 23 of the bill refers to refining, and clause 22 to importing. I think the phraseology of clause 22 should be made to apply to the importer as clause 23 does to the refiner. As it is now, an ordinary dealer, who bought from an importer in good faith and is found with uninspected oil in his possession would be liable to this heavy fine. The phraseology of clause 22 should be similar to that of clause 23, which says "every refiner who removes or allows to be removed." If it were applied directly to the importer, it would be all right, but it goes further and includes any one who may honestly and in good faith have bought oil which was uninspected.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would not cover the case at all. It only applies to smuggled oil. Responsible dealers will not deal in smuggled oil. It is only directed against the smuggling which is going on along the St. Lawrence now. Any one buying from a regular dealer would know that the oil had been properly inspected.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If my hon. friend from Rideau had been dealin with the Customs and Inland Revenue, he would see that his argument does not apply. The legitimate dealer always takes care that the oil is inspected before being put on the market. This clause is to prevent people from having oil in their possession which has been smuggled into the country and sold by them clandestinely, because no importer will openly sell oil that he has smuggled. He will cover it up and sell it to different parties in the country. I think that it is the only way in which you can reach that class of smuggling—that is, if you find oil which will not stand the test in the possession of a party you have a right to assume that it has not been inspected, and the question then arises, where did he get it? Did he smuggle it himself, or did he purchase it from some shopkeeper who has a secret cellar in which he keeps the smuggled oil? In that way they will be able to trace the source from which that oil came. If they found the uninspected oil in his possession in that way, he would be subject, no doubt, to the full penalty. The person who is innocently, as it is termed, in possession of it, would be let off with a smaller fine, because the man on the frontier who conceals the oil knows very well, when purchasing it, the source from which it came. I congratulate the government on the position which they are taking. I remember very well the vial wrath that used to be poured forth on my unfortunate head, and on that of the Minister of Inland Revenue, for endeavouring to place on the statute-book what seem to be arbitrary, and which would be under any other circumstances, arbitrary clauses, which are, to a certain extent, contrary to the general principles of laws which govern the community. There are provisions in the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts which we would never allow to exist in any other measure placed on the statute-book, but experience has taught those who have had anything to do with it that it is the only possible means of reaching the offender. For my own part, I fully approve of this clause, and I do so from the long experience I have had dealing with just such cases, and a knowledge of the difficulties which have always presented themselves to the officials who are exercising the power and performing the duty of carrying out the law. That is really the object of this measure, and while it seems arbitrary, and is arbitrary, it is the only means by which you can reach the smuggler on our extensive frontier.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not understand this to be a customs law for the prevention of smuggling. It is an Act providing for the inspection of petroleum, and I presume that without this provision at all there is ample provision made in the customs laws to prevent smuggling.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no provision at all against smuggling oil except this.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend must be wrong. There is a duty on oil, and he does not ask me to believe that, without the passage of this bill, we are unable to collect the duty and prevent smuggling? I have no doubt whatever in my mind that we already have provisions against smuggling.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The customs officers are not supposed to know anything about the oil. They do not inspect oil. That is done by experts.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is inspection. We are dealing with inspection. I cannot see that this clause would be at all necessary, as I believe that in the customs laws we already have ample protection against smuggling. I still think that this provision should be modified, so that it should not bear severely upon the honest dealer who had bought from an importer. If it was aimed at importers, it would be all right, but you go beyond importers, and if you find this oil in the possession of dealers or consumers you impose this heavy penalty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Any oil that has come into the country in tank cars could not possibly go into consumption without the officials knowing it. It is inspected at the border.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is possible that uninspected oil may get into the hands of an honest dealer, and he would suffer. I have no objection to making such oil liable to forfeiture, but to render a man liable to such a heavy fine I do not think is right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The leader of the opposition has given the strongest reasons why this bill should pass. There was one point made by the hon. gentleman from Rideau Division (Mr. Clemow) which ought to be noticed. The hon. gentleman said that, under the existing law, this oil comes in in barrels and casks, each of which is marked; but the hon. gentleman must remember that, under the law of 1893, oil came in in large casks, and was sold out by dealers in quantities of 5, 10 and 20 gallons out of those casks; and if a cask had been smuggled, the person who bought from the smuggler was just in the same position as he would be under this clause. The words here have just the same effect as they have in the Act of 1893. The hon. leader of the opposition put it very well when he said that in the customs and excise laws it is impossible, unfortunately, to have Acts which are altogether consistent with natural justice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This clause specially deals with smuggled goods. It provides that:

> Every person who keeps or offers for sale or has in his possession in Canada any imported petroleum or naphtha which has not been inspected and entered for consumption through one of the ports or places duly authorized by the Governor in Council, is guilty of an offence against this Act, and for a first offence shall incur a penalty of one hundred dollars, and for each subsequent offence a penalty of five hundred dollars.

That oil being found in the possession of parties they become liable, so it does not apply to anything except that which has been brought into the country, and never entered for customs, and it deals exclusively with the smuggling which goes on upon our frontier.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—How does the innocent man know that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No dealer would buy smuggled oil.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, lots of dealers will buy smuggled oil. They will run the risk, and sell it secretly, and if they buy and sell in that way they ought to be punished.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—But if they buy without knowing it?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They must know it, because the inspector's certificate would not be with it. If you were a dealer on the frontier, buying a lot of oil, you would take precious good care to know whether the oil had been inspected or you would not touch it. An unprincipled dealer might get it at a much lower rate than the duty paid on oil, and could double or treble his profits on it.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The minister admitted the possibility of an innocent party having possession of such oil being fined, but said that the party would be let off with a light fine. This clause does not provide for a fine of anything less than $100. It is a very right amount for checking the evil that is being dealt with. My view is this, that in this House particularly, our business is to see that the law is so framed that no injustice can be done. Nothing has been said that would convince me that an innocent purchase of contraband oil is protected by the provisions of this bill. He may have bought it in good faith, and yet he is subject to a penalty of $100.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman will see that the party himself can prevent that from occurring. If he buys from a stranger he of course would make inquiry, and one of the ways he would ascertain whether he took any risks or not would be to apply the flash test himself. If he found it an inferior quality of oil he certainly would have reason to believe it was smuggled oil, because it never could have passed the inspection. That would be one way in which an innocent man could protect himself against the possibility of being punished.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is just as much reason to go farther in clause 23 and make the refiner liable, as in the case of the importer of oil. All the difficulty would be got over in this case if "wilfully" were inserted. This clause does not aim alone at the importer, but at the person to whom the importer may sell. Even in second or third hands a man might get into trouble over it. The insertion of the word "wilfully" would prevent innocent persons, who had perhaps exercised reasonable precautions before purchasing, from being fined.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think any one can point out a case where a consumer came honestly into possession of an ordinary quantity of oil used in a house was prosecuted. The object of the officer would be to find out from whom he got it, not to follow the innocent consumer. The smuggler is not an importer. He cannot be reached in any way.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—If I buy a barrel of oil from a man and he gives me uninspected oil, the fact of having that barrel in my possession renders me liable to the penalty provided for in clause 22. I cannot go and inspect that oil, and yet I am liable if I have it in my possession.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You can give the name of the party from whom you bought it.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yes, but I cannot prove it. I purchased what I believed to be inspected oil, but the dealer deceived me and I am liable to the penalty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is putting a case that has never arisen.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It may arise.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I do not think it. The oil is only allowed to come in at certain ports. It is there inspected, and that is the only oil that goes into consumption. We know there are places where people smuggle oil. It is the duty of the officers to protect the revenue, and they are obliged to have stringent laws.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If it is necessary to have this provision in section 22 as against the imported article, it would be equally necessary to have a similar stringent provision against uninspected oil refined in this country. There is no such restriction. Why not? If it is necessary in the case of imported oil, it is equally necessary in the case of oil refined in Canada. The man to whom the refiner sells the oil is not obliged to show whether it has been inspected or not and could not be put to trouble at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Read clause 24.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The whole trouble could be obviated by inserting in clause 22 the words wilfully or knowingly, and I will move that the word "knowingly" be inserted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then it would entail the necessity of the officer proving that the person knew it. You could not get a conviction in every hundred cases.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Clause 24 covers the defects which the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) finds in clause 23. That deals with the case of the domestic oil. With respect to clause 22, to insert the word "knowingly" where the hon. gentleman proposes to insert it would lead to great difficulty and confusion. I have some doubt as to the propriety of this House undertaking to amend a bill with respect to revenue, but if the 22nd clause were to be amended at all, it should be after the word "or."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that is put in, it will render the whole clause nugatory. It will not be worth enacting it at all. I speak now from very long experience in dealing with questions of this kind. You must have such legislation or you will never stop smuggling.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

LOAN COMPANIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (P) "An Act respecting Loan Companies." He said:—This bill is one of great practical importance, and it has been introduced, after very careful consideration, to meet the wishes of many loan companies, who desire this legislation for the purpose of facilitating their business, and to clothe them with some franchises which they do not now possess, and to place them in a more satisfactory position. There has been, so far as I know, no condemnatory criticism upon the bill itself. There are no clauses that have been pointed out as very objectionable, but in a vague way attacks have been made upon me, by one or two newspapers, charging me with having, by the measure, abandoned the constitutional views which I have hitherto held, and of making war upon provincial authority. I am not conscious that I entertain to-day less liberal views, with regard to the constitutional rights of the provinces, than those which I have always entertained, and to which I have, from time to time, given expression. But let me say there is nothing in this measure which, in any way, encroaches upon provincial authority, and if any one holds otherwise, I shall be pleased if he will point out the sections which he thinks ultra vires of the authority of this Parliament. We have undertaken by this bill to provide for incorporation by letters patent. Once the principles of the law have been settled by a general measure, there can be no object in requiring Parliament to bestow, in each particular case, by its own direct act, those franchises which experience shows may be safely trusted to companies of this kind, and which when once settled by Parliament may be as well bestowed by letters patent under parliamentary authority as in any other way.

It would seem that some parties are under the impression that because this bill deals with companies which are in the habit of loaning money on the security of real estate, it is an invasion of property and civil rights, and so encroaches upon local jurisdiction. Let me say that the loaning of money is not local or provincial in its character; and, although such loans may be made upon the security of land which must be situated somewhere, the contracts with regard to such loans are contracts relating to mercantile transactions which may be extended to any part of the Dominion, and the capacity to enter into them for the whole Dominion can be conferred by the Parliament of Canada alone. I know very well that where loans of money are advanced to individuals, and a mortgage upon land taken as a security, the impression readily arises that because the estate in lands, and the laws regulating their transfer, are under provincial jurisdiction, this subject must be in its nature provincial. But this is not so. An opinion of this sort arises from the confusion of things that are essentially different. In the Princess of Reuss vs. Boss, decided by the House of Lords in 1871, it was held that though the scene of a company's operations was to be abroad there was no objection to its being constituted in England under the Companies Act. It is perfectly true, that though the Dominion Parliament may incorporate companies of this kind, with a capacity to enter into contracts in any part of the Dominion, the power so conferred must be exercised in each province subject to provincial authorities. In this respect, a corporation does not differ from a natural person, and, like a natural person, where it requires the aid of provincial authority for the maintenance or enforcement of its rights, it must depend upon that authority for such enforcement.

I have been referred to several cases, as though this bill were in some way an invasion of the legal doctrines laid down in these cases, which it certainly is not. Among them is the case of the Citizens' Insurance Company vs. Parsons, where the Privy Council decided that though the Dominion Parliament could incorporate an insurance company with the capacity to enter into a contract in any province, the capacity as bestowed could be exercised only subject to the law of the province. This, I think, is a very clear legal proposition, but it is in no way contravened by anything which this bill contains. The Privy Council did not say the Dominion had not the power to incorporate the Citizens' Insurance Company because it was obliged to exercise those powers, subject to the law of the province. It merely pointed out that in the enforcement of its rights it must conform to the law, and that law, in some instances, was the law of the province. This is equally true of every natural person, as it is true of every corporation. Now, to say that a Dominion corporation must exercise its authority subject to the law of the province is indeed a very different thing from saying that it ought to have derived all its franchises from the province, and not from the Dominion. The Privy Council did not say the Citizens' Insurance Company was ultra vires. Their Lordships held the contrary. The intention of every Act of incorporation is to create an artificial person with some of the attributes which pertain to a natural person. It may well be, that in the exercise of the franchise which the Dominion bestows upon an artificial person, created under its legislative authority, it may bestow upon it no more than the capacity, in certain matters, to acquire rights which a provincial legislature alone can bestow; but this does not show that the Dominion Act of incorporation is ultra vires, or that the provincial authority has been invaded in calling such corporation into existence. It might as well be argued that because the civil rights of a natural person are derived from the laws of a province, he ought not to possess any rights beyond those which a province can bestow.

The kind of argument which has been employed to uphold the exclusive authority of the province is one which would deny all authority to the Parliament of Canada in relation to matters which concern individuals or mercantile corporations. Some civil rights, when we use those words in their widest sense, fall within Dominion jurisdiction—such as the right to issue bills of exchange and promissory notes, to engage in mercantile transactions abroad, to pursue the business of banking, and to exercise any of those powers which are not expressly assigned, in the enumerated classes mentioned, to the province. It is true, the lending of money to a particular individual may be, standing alone, local and provincial, but the general business of lending of money is not local or provincial. It is a business that may be extended over the entire Dominion, and when an artificial person is created for the purpose, desiring to carry on its business over the entire Dominion as a matter of right, it is absurd to contend that it should be incorporated only for a province, so that the business that it may undertake to do everywhere else will rest upon comity and not upon legal right. The British North America Act provides for the incorporation of companies with provincial objects, but a company that desires to lend money in any part of the Dominion, on the security of real estate, is not a company with a provincial object. Its objects and purposes are Dominion; and it would be preposterous to argue, because the security which it takes is under local control, that its character is to be determined by that security, and not by its primary aims. A loan company is called into existence, not to speculate in real estate, but to lend money, and as an incident of the loan, to take a pledge of real estate as a security for the loan, and so the nature of the corporation is determined by the capacity which it possesses, bestowed for the purpose of carrying on its operations. Now, a loan company being called into existence to lend money to those who are willing to pay it back, with interest, in any part of the Dominion, is undoubtedly a Dominion enterprise, entitled to Dominion recognition, which is not in the least changed in character by the acceptance of a pledge of real estate as a security for the advances which it may make. A private individual residing in one province may lend his money in every other province, and when he seeks to enforce the contract he invokes the local law to aid him in the enforcement of his rights. An artificial person, created by the Dominion, does precisely the same thing, and to the extent which it invokes the machinery of the provincial law it must conform to it. If it takes real estate as its security, its mortgage must conform to the local law. The sale under it, or the foreclosure, must conform to the same law. The fact that it has a Dominion incorporation does not relieve it from this obligation, but it would be absurd to argue that because it comes within the purview of local authority, and must conform to it, therefore, all its rights and franchises must be of local origin.

These policies of insurance, it is said, are mere contracts of indemnity against loss by fire, and like any other contract between persons are governed by the local or provincial laws. Certainly, they are governed by local laws in so far as the local law is applicable to them; but an insurance company has for its primary object the making of gain out of a certain amount of capital of which it is possessed and for which it is seeking a profitable investment. To get this investment it enters into a certain class of contracts. It undertakes to indemnify the other party against loss by fire for a specified amount. The fact that it has to enforce its contract under the provisions of some local law, and in a provincial court, does not establish as a legal proposition that the provincial legislature is the proper body for the incorporation of the company which desires to carry on these operations. Wherever a person habitually does and contracts to do a thing capable of producing profits, and for the purpose of producing profits, he carries on a trade or business. Erickson vs. Last, 8 Q. B. D. (C. A.) 418. If the Fire Insurance Company undertakes to carry on operations over the whole British Empire, it may seek an Imperial charter. If it desires to carry on its operations over the entire Dominion, it will certainly prefer a Dominion to a provincial charter. In the one case there is no limitation on local authority, because the Imperial Parliament has granted an Act of incorporation, nor is the Act in the other case ultra vires, because the company chooses to invest its money by contracting to take certain risks on property which is held under the authority of a provincial law. All that the province can ask is that the corporators shall not be given a privilege for the exercise of a power which falls within local jurisdiction in a way that that local jurisdiction does not authorize.

There seems to be a good deal of confusion of thought upon this subject. I have already mentioned that in the Citizens' Insurance Company vs. Parsons, while the Judicial Committee held that the exercise of the corporate powers of the company was subject to the laws of the province, it did not hold that the incorporation of the company was ultra vires. These and a number of other decisions clearly point out where the line should be drawn which separates Dominion legislative authority from that legislative authority which is vested in the province. The Judicial Committee say, in the case of the Citizens' Insurance Company vs. Parsons:

> Suppose the Dominion Parliament were to incorporate a company with power, among other things, to purchase and hold land throughout Canada in mortmain, it could scarcely be contended if such a company were to carry on business in a province where a law against holding land in mortmain prevails (each province having exclusive legislative power over property and civil rights in the province), that it could hold land in that province in contravention of the provinicial legislation; and, if a company were incorporated for the sole purpose of purchasing and holding land in the Dominion, it might happen that it could do no business in part of it, by reason of all the provinces having passed mortmain acts, though the corporation would still exist and preserve its statute as a corporate body.

Now, this paragraph draws very clearly a distinction between the creation of the corporation and the powers and franchises with which it seeks to be clothed. The British North America Act, section 11, provides that the legislature of a province may exclusively make laws for the incorporation of companies with provincial objects. If the object of the company is broader than this —if its operations are to be carried on throughout the Dominion—if it wishes to have, as of right, the power to exercise its franchises in every province of the Dominion—its objects are not provincial, and it must look elsewhere than to the legislature of a province for its incorporation. I would be sorry to encourage the incorporation of a company, simply to avoid local jurisdiction, by undertaking to enlarge the field of its operations by seeking Dominion incorporation. But a loan company that is honestly desirous of carrying on its business in more than one province is surely not a provincial institution. There is no one province to which its functions are confined. It is equally desirous of carrying on its banking business—for it is a species of banking institution—in the one province no less than in the other. No province can claim to be the habitat of such an institution, and so it is not an institution with provincial objects and aims. Its primary business is not the acquisition of real estate. Its primary business is the lending of money for gain. It seeks to diminish the risk of losing its principal to the lowest point. Its ability to lend money, at a moderate rate of interest, depends largely upon the diminution of the risk it takes of losing the principal. And so, in order to loan that money with the least risk of losing it, it obtains from the owner a mortgage upon real estate as security. The moment the money is paid, the mortgage is discharged. The form of the mortgage must be such as the local law requires. The property can only be sold by respecting local jurisdiction, and the foreclosure, if made, must also conform to the same laws. Local authority is upheld, local authority is respected; but if the government or legislature of any province says to the capitalist who is in this way seeking to employ his money that "you have no right to seek incorporation anywhere than from us," they are putting forward an untenable constitutional doctrine. They have no right to force a capitalist to come to any one province for a charter. They have no right to compel him to do business on sufferance in every other part of the Dominion. They have no right to say to him that "if you wish to acquire a right to loan money in every province of the Dominion, you must obtain an Act of incorporation from each," which would not make one corporation, but seven corporations. This is one of the inconveniences that was intended to be met by the bestowal upon the Federal Government of the power to incorporate.

Let me refer to another case which makes still more plain the unquestionable right of this Parliament to create corporations of this kind. In the case of the Colonial Building and Investment Association vs. the Attorney General of Quebec, the question was raised as to whether that institution was not really a Quebec institution. It had undertaken to erect buildings with a view to their sale, and to making a profit upon them. It had not carried on business anywhere beyond the province of Quebec. To that province it confined its operations. But did their Lordships say that the Act calling into existence this institution was ultra vires, because it had done no business outside of the province of Quebec? On the contrary, they say that "What the Act of incorporation has done is to create a legal and artificial person, with capacity to carry on certain kinds of business, which are defined, within a defined area, namely, throughout the Dominion. Among other things, it has given to the association power to deal in land and buildings, but the capacity so given only enables it to acquire and hold land in any province consistently with the laws of the province relating to the acquisition and tenure of land. If the company can so acquire and hold it, the Act of incorporation gives it capacity to do so."

It is true that a provincial company may do business in another province than that in which it is incorporated, but it does so as a foreign company. Everywhere, except in the province in which it is incorporated, it stands upon the footing of a foreign corporation, and most companies, in so far as they can, prefer that their franchises should exist not as a matter of forebearance, but as of right everywhere in the country in which they intend to carry on their operations. There are two classes of Dominion incorporations, which stand upon a somewhat different footing in their relation to local authorities, but they are each equally valid as Dominion corporations. The British North America Act provides that the province shall have exclusive jurisdiction in reference to certain matters which are enumerated. It also provides that the Dominion shall have jurisdiction over certain other matters, which are also enumerated. But with respect to Dominion matters, it is declared that notwithstanding anything in this Act—that is, notwithstanding the exclusive powers given to the provinces—that the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the class of subjects next hereinafter enumerated. Now, the Privy Council, in reading these two sections of the British North America Act together, have declared that exclusive powers bestowed upon the provinces shall not restrain the Dominion Parliament in legislating in respect to the enumerated powers of the Dominion under section 91. And so it is held in Tennant vs. Union Bank of Canada that the provisions of the Mercantile Amendment Act of Ontario, which regulate the granting of warehouse receipts, were subordinate to the provisions of the Dominion Banking Act, which deals with the same subject, and which confers upon a bank privileges as a lender which the provincial law does not recognize. The doctrine, as stated by the Judicial Committee, is this :

> The question turns upon the construction of two clauses in the British North America Act, 1867. Section 91 gives the Parliament of Canada power to make laws in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by the Act exclusively assigned to the legislatures of the provinces, and also exclusive authority in relation to certain enumerated subjects, the fifteenth of which is "Banking, Incorporation of Banks, and the Issue of Paper Money." Section 92 assigns to each provincial legislature the exclusive right to make laws in relation to the classes of subjects therein enumerated; and the thirteenth of the enumerated classes is "Property and Civil Rights in the Provinces."
> Statutory regulations with respect to the form and legal effect, in Ontario, of warehouse receipts and other negotiable documents, which pass the property of goods without delivery, unquestionably relate to property and civil rights in that province; and the objection taken by the appellant to the provisions of the Bank Act would be unanswerable if it could be shown that, by the Act of 1867, the Parliament of Canada is absolutely debarred from trenching to any extent upon matters assigned to the provincial legislature by section 92. But section 91 expressly declares that, "notwithstanding anything in this Act," the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada shall extend to all matters coming within the enumerated classes; which plainly indicates that the legislation of that Parliament, so long as it strictly relates to these matters, is to be of paramount authority. To refuse effect to the declaration would render nugatory some of the legislative powers specially assigned to the Canadian Parliament.

So that, in every case of Dominion legislation which comes within the enumerated powers of the Dominion, it is in the power of Parliament to extend its legislation so far as may be necessary to make that legislation effective. It may overlap and encroach upon the enumerated powers of a province, but when it does so it is paramount, and the authority of the province, for the time being, is in abeyance, if the statutes cannot stand together. This is made clear in several decisions. In the case of the Attorney General of Ontario vs. the Attorney General of the Dominion, in respect to an Act of the legislature of Ontario, relating to assignments and preferences by insolvent persons, which provided for assignments purely voluntary, it was enacted in section 9 as follows :—

> An assignment for the general benefit of creditors under this Act shall take precedence of all judgments, and of all executions not completely executed by payment subject to the lien, if any, of an execution creditor for his costs, where there is but one execution in the sheriff's hands, or to the lien, if any, of the creditor for his costs who has the first execution in the sheriff's hands.

Now, this legislation was attacked on the ground that the Act was an Insolvent Act, and that the Dominion could legislate alone upon the subject of insolvency. But their Lordships did not regard it as necessarily such, for this Act dealt with assignments purely voluntary. They say :

> They would observe that a system of bankruptcy legislation may frequently require various ancillary provisions for the purpose of preventing the scheme of the Act from being defeated. It may be necessary for this purpose to deal with the effects of executions and other matters which would otherwise be within the legislative competence of the provincial legislature. Their Lordships do not doubt that it would be open to the Dominion Parliament to deal with such matters as part of a bankruptcy law, and the provincial legislature would doubtless be then precluded from interfering with this legislation, inasmuch as such interference would affect a bankruptcy law of the Dominion Parliament.

Another decision in which the same principle is laid down is that given in the case of the Attorney General of Ontario vs. the Attorney General of the Dominion on the subject of Liquor Prohibition. Their Lordships, in referring to section 18 of the Ontario Act in question, which provides for local prohibition, say that the general authority given to the Canadian Parliament by the introductory enactments of section 91 is to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters that come within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the province. * * There may therefore be matters not included in the enumeration upon which the Canadian Parliament has power to legislate, because they concern the peace, order and good government of the Dominion. But to these matters which are specified among the enumerated subjects of legislation, the exception from section 92, which is enacted by the concluding words of section 91, have no application; and, in legislating with regard to such matters, the Dominion Parliament has no authority to encroach upon any class of subjects which is exclusively assigned by section 92. These enactments appear to their Lordships to enact that the exercise of legislative power by the Parliament of Canada in regard to all matters not enumerated in section 91 ought to be confined to such matters as are unquestionably of Canadian interest and importance, and ought not to trench upon provincial legislation with respect to any of the class of subjects enumerated in section 92. To attach any other construction to the general power in supplement of its enumerated powers, as conferred upon the Parliament of Canada by section 91, would, in their Lordships opinion, not only be contrary to the intendment of the Act, but would practically destroy the autonomy of the province. If it were once conceded that the Parliament of Canada had authority to make laws applicable to the whole Dominion in relation to matters which in their province are substantially of local and private interest, upon the assumption that these matters also concern the peace, order and good government of the Dominion, there is hardly a subject in section 92 upon which it might not legislate to the exclusion of the provincial legislatures, and so their Lordships held that a province had the power to pass, within its limits, a liquor prohibition Act.

Now, it is interesting to observe the distinction which these judgments of the Privy Council draw between those matters which are within the jurisdiction of Canada, under these general introductory words, and those matters which are under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada in respect to the enumerated provisions of section 91. The Parliament of Canada, in the exercise of its authority under the enumerated provisions, can do so to the full extent of the authority so given, and without reference, for the most part, to the provisions of section 92. They may overlap provincial authority. They may seemingly encroach upon it, by legislating in respect to matters, which, from another point of view, might fall under section 92; but when the Parliament of Canada undertakes to legislate under the introductory provisions of section 91, under the general power to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada, it has no authority whatever to encroach upon the exclusive powers vested in the provincial legislatures. And so, taking cognizance of the extent of our authority, and our power, seemingly, to encroach upon any of the provisions of section 92, we must consider whether we are exercising the authority bestowed upon us by the introductory portion of section 91, or a power bestowed upon us by its enumerated provisions. Loan companies are, to a limited extent, banking institutions. In so far as the power to receive moneys on deposit, and to deal with them for the purpose of profits, they are banking institutions. It is impossible to point out, under the exclusive powers bestowed upon the provinces, any power whatever to authorize any company to receive money on deposit, and to deal with it in the way that this is usually done. I felt it necessary to go thus fully into the constitutional right of the Parliament to legislate in respect to the incorporation of loan companies on account of the untenable and unsupported contention put forward on behalf of the exclusive authority of the provinces, and on account of the unfair attacks that have been made upon myself in reference to the question. There can be no room for doubt of our right to legislate as I propose by this bill on the part of any one who has taken the trouble to understand the law upon the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the constitutional point to which my hon. friend has so learnedly and succinctly referred. I must say that I would rather compliment him on what I conceive to be a reformation, if I may so term it, in the opinions which he formerly held, but which he now repudiates. I told him personally, in conversation, not long ago, that my fears when he accepted the office of Minister of Justice were, that he was so much of a states rights man, that he might be inclined to lean against the Dominion authority in any legislation which might be brought before us. However, that is a mere matter of opinion, and I am very glad that my hon. friend has taken the view of this question that he has expressed, though I know he is combated, and very strongly combated, by the Attorney General of the province of Ontario. What I rose particularly for, was to call attention to clause 23 of the bill—probably the hon. gentleman's attention has been already called to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a very stringent provision which will affect some companies which may desire hereafter to come within the provisions of this law—that is, companies which have never dealt in any other security than real estate. Such companies cannot, by any possibility, come within the provisions of this measure, if I read it correctly, so long as the 23rd clause remains as it is. It reads as follows :—

23. So long as a company which is subject to the provisions of this Act is indebted for money received upon deposit, its total assets over and above the value of its real estate and its mortgages or hypothecs upon freehold or leasehold estate or other immovables shall be equal to at least fifty per cent of its indebtedness in respect of such money.

Now, if a company (I know one such company in one of the smaller towns of Ontario) has a deposit account of between three and four hundred thousand dollars, it has no security and deals in no securities other than real estate, under this provision if that company desires to come within the operation of this Act it cannot do so until it obtains what are termed movable, other than freehold security. If I understand it correctly, it places the company in precisely the same position that it does the merchant or individual who speculates in stocks, who goes to the bank and acquires an advance at a small rate of interest on what they term "call loans." That is, he deposits his securities which are saleable at any time in the market, and by that means obtains a loan at a much less rate than if he borrowed it under the ordinary endorsing process. The hon. Minister of Justice, I am sure, will understand what I mean when I point out the effect which I think this clause has that many companies that are constituted as I have mentioned, having no other securities than freehold, cannot come within the operation of this law. In other words, if they have $400,000 of deposits, the security which a depositor has in that case is the mortgages which the company has upon freehold or leasehold; the company would be obliged, under this law, to have at least $200,000 of a kind of security upon which they could realize at any moment in case of a run or a call by the depositors. I might mention one little company with which I am acquainted. In order to protect the depositors they have a special arrangement with the bank with which they do business that in case of an extraordinary demand by the depositors be made, they will advance, to a certain extent, in order to enable them to pay the depositors when they may require their money. They give the personal security of the directors and also collateral security on the mortgages that they hold.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The banks cannot take mortgages.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, but that is collateral security to the personal security. The bank will take a mortgage as a collateral security to the personal security which has been given by the directors. If they think the directors have not sufficient personal means within themselves, they will take precious good care not to advance the money. That is the means taken by some companies to protect the depositors in order that there may be no run upon the company or loss to the depositors.

Hon Mr. MILLS—I have had two or three letters on the subject.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (93) "An Act to incorporate the Edmonton and Saskatchewan Railway Company."—(Mr. Lougheed.)

The Senate adjourned.

SALE OF RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (32) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the sale of Railway Passenger Tickets," with amendments.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved concurrence in the amendments.

Hon. Mr. AIKENS—I think it would be well to have the amendments explained.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The amendments are simply to make the meaning clearer so that it can be understood. It is simply carrying out the intention of the bill. In line 7 the words "steamboat or ferry," were added after the word "railways," to make it correspond with the amendment in line 1, section 1. Then in line 9 of section 2 words were added in order to explain the object of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

A PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION REJECTED.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that when the House adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until Tuesday the 20th instant at three o'clock in the afternoon. He said:—I do not think it is necessary to make any observations on this motion.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think it is very necessary.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Senate adjourned over last Monday, and the public business did not suffer in the slightest degree. I think we shall be able to say the same of the present occasion. I notice that there is not a single order on the paper for Monday.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—The hon. gentleman took good care that there should be none.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And if we came here on Monday we should have nothing to do. I may say that a number of hon. gentlemen who live a little further away than Montreal are very anxious that eight o'clock in the evening should be substituted for three o'clock in the afternoon; and if that change meets the approval of the House, I shall make the motion that when this House adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until Tuesday the 20th instant at eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We had, as the hon. gentleman has just remarked, this same question before us a week ago to-day, and the observations and opinions which I expressed then I wish to reiterate now with others and, I think, strong reasons why this motion should not be carried on the present occasion. I notice that the gentlemen who have been conducting the business with regard to bills and making them orders of the day have been preparing for this motion by leaving Monday unoccupied, by making the orders stand for Tuesday and Wednesday and other days next week. I think I am right in inferring that it was for the purpose of presenting a good argument why this House should adjourn that we had no orders set down for Monday. Unless the hon. gentleman who leads this House takes the responsibility of this adjournment and informs us that it is desirable, in the interest of public business, his own convenience as well as every other consideration, that we should adjourn, then we should not agree to this motion. While it is quite true, owing to the forethought of some hon. gentlemen, that we have no orders of the day for Monday next, it is equally true that this House has at this moment a very large amount of important public business before it. I wish to direct attention to the state of public business in the Banking and Commerce Committee in order that the House may see that this adjournment would really retard the work of the session. I notice that there are four measures now before that committee of a controvertible character that have been postponed from former meetings; deputations have been here with regard to some of them, and probably these deputations will come back. Two of them, I think, are set down for Tuesday next and the others for the following Thursday. There are other measures before that committee that have not yet received consideration, and there is at least one bill on the orders of the day that will be sent to that committee to-day. If we do not meet until Tuesday, there cannot be a meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committee on Tuesday morning. The consequence will be that the measures which should receive consideration then will be deferred until Thursday, for which day there is ample work without the deferring of these bills. Some of the measures that are in this position before the Banking and Commerce Committee are measures that have originated in this House. After being considered in that committee, possibly even if we had a meeting on Tuesday we might not be able to arrive at a final conclusion on them upon that day, and they might be held over to Thursday, and possibly later, and these bills will have to receive consideration in this House afterwards, and they will be delayed probably a couple of weeks before being sent to the other House. One of these is a very important measure in the hands of the hon. gentleman from Montreal (Mr. Dandurand) regarding usury, and there is another bill of considerable importance in the same position. In view of the state of public business, we should pause before we consent to this adjournment, or before we commit ourselves to what is practically making Monday a day on which this House shall not sit. That is the direction in which we are drifting. If we are to have these motions, it is better that we should have the rule changed at once and not meet on Monday at all. When this question was up before I remarked—and I am still of that opinion—that notwithstanding that it has been a practice in this House for private members to make these motions, they really should come from the gentlemen who are responsible for conducting the business of the House. They should emanate from the leader of the House. I think I am right when I say that this is the sixth occasion during this session that we have had motions of this kind submitted to the House, and I think it would be very much better if the leader of the House would take the responsibility. If he has had communications from members, and if he comes to the conclusion that the public business would be promoted or if he puts it on another ground, which I am sure would have weight with every hon. gentleman in this House, that the nature of important public business in his hands, or even his own convenience required it, (knowing as we well know that his hands are very full just at this moment) if the leader of the House initiates a proposition of this kind, I for one—and I am sure every hon. gentleman in this House—will yield to his view and consent to an adjournment of this kind, or any other reasonable proposition of the same nature; but it is time that these constantly recurring motions for an adjournment, coming from private members, and discussions of this kind forced upon the House in this way should cease. The very character of the discussions and the newspaper notices and references to the discussions are not calculated to do this House good in the eyes of the country, and I am quite sure that hon. gentlemen who make these motions have no desire to lessen the importance or lower the character of the House in the estimation of the country. I am quite confident that the constantly recurring motions of this kind, with reports in the newspapers of the discussions on them, are not calculated to strengthen this House in the estimation of the country, particularly at a time like this, when there is ample public business before us and when it is, in the opinion of everybody, highly desirable that every thing should be done to bring the session to an early conclusion. It is three months to-day since Parliament met, and I may say almost for the first time during the session the Senate is full of work. In view of all these facts, I think we should not have this motion for adjournment unless it is supported and fortified by a desire expressed by the hon. leader of the House.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think it very unfortunate that this motion is made at the present time. A bill was introduced yesterday, which is of very great importance, and we should have time to make up our minds as to what course we should pursue with respect to it.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It is in the memory of every one here that I gave notice of a motion which I proposed to move on Monday. There seems to have been some cooking of the order paper, so that no notice will be on for Monday. Some one has taken improper liberties with it, as it has been fixed on the orders for Tuesday. I object to any official of this Senate dictating on what day

I shall take up the notice. Some person has taken a liberty with my notice of motion in putting it down for Tuesday. I should like to know who has authority to do that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think members of this House cannot complain of any want of holidays and adjournments. We have had plenty this session, and I am very much surprised at the hon. gentleman from Halifax bringing up this motion again. A few days ago he gave us a lecture on the dignity of the Senate. These adjournments have reduced the proceedings of this House to a perfect farce. This thing ought to be stopped. There is always work for us to do if we choose to take it up.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I suppose my hon. friend thinks it is more dignified to have the House sit for fifteen minutes and then adjourn.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do. We come here to attend to the business of the country, and there is nearly always something for us to do. There are times in the early part of the session when there is no work before the Senate, and it is understood that we adjourn then until work comes before us, but these frequent adjournments reduce the thing to a farce, and I do not see how an hon. gentleman can have the face to bring forward a motion of this kind week after week. Who is to benefit by the adjournment?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It will enable the hon. gentleman to study up the Drummond County Railway Bill.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—This motion has certainly produced one result that I never knew of in this House before. It has brought out extraordinary speeches from hon. gentlemen who are ordinarily sane and sensible. One says we are making a farce of this by discussing a proposal to adjourn. If we did not discuss it there would not be any farce in the matter. If we come down to the honest fact, it rather annoys some of our friends to see that some of us can get home for a day or two while they cannot because they live too far away from the capital. If the hon. leader of the House states that the business of the country will not suffer by adjourning for a day now, there can be no reason to urge against it. He is the best authority? He will not allow the business of Parliament to suffer, and, as the hon. gentleman from Halifax said just now, to meet for fifteen minutes and then adjourn would not in any way facilitate the public business. I think we are just as far forward now with the business of the session as if we had been sitting last Monday; and this day week we will be just as far forward if we adjourn from to-day until Tuesday next. So far as the dignity of the House is concerned, if there was not so much talk about it amongst ourselves it would not be challenged.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I should like to say a word about the business before the Banking Committee. If the House adjourns until Tuesday evening it is not very likely we shall have very many members present in the morning, and undoubtedly there is something of importance to be considered that day. I am afraid the result would be that we would get behind in our business.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I wish to protest against these frequent adjournments. If the government want this adjournment for their own convenience, I have no objection, but if it is for the convenience of private members, I am opposed to it. We who live a distance from the seat of government would like to have an adjournment that would be of benefit to us all. We have had four adjournments already this session, one in March and April, lasting for eighteen days, another in May for nineteen days. When the adjournment for the month of May was up, members living in far away provinces wanted the adjournment until after the Queen's birthday, and astonishing to say, the members who get adjournments for their own personal convenience on Fridays and Mondays, were opposed to an adjournment for twenty-four days instead of seventeen. If we are to have adjournments at all, we ought to have them to suit all the members of this House. Those of us who wish to go to Cape Breton, Prince Edward Island or Manitoba, should have the adjournments to suit them as well as to suit members coming from Montreal or Toronto.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As one of the members living at a distance from the capital, my views entirely coincide with those so aptly expressed by my hon. friend from Cape Breton. But dealing with this particular adjournment, I must confess that, in view of the present state of the order paper, I can see no impropriety in supporting the motion which has been introduced by the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The amended one?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, I understand the leader of the House will be absent on Monday. If we meet on Monday, nothing will be done. If there is anything particularly aggravating, it is to have to meet here and at once adjourn after our devotions are over. If we meet on Tuesday at three o'clock in the afternoon, the purpose mentioned by my hon. friend from Toronto will scarcely be effected—the meeting of the Banking Committee. It is quite evident that members living in Montreal and Toronto would scarcely be here until the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Then we had better not adjourn at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the House intends to adjourn, I think it should adjourn until Tuesday evening.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am rather surprised at my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Ferguson), he having been for some time a member of the government, assuming that the business of the House is absolutely under the control of the ministers who are in a minority in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Not on adjournments.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He says that I am responsible for the conduct of the public business here, although the hon. gentleman from time to time stands up and says he does not agree with me, and is prepared to vote my propositions down. I understand the practice has always been that the government is in the hands of the House in respect to adjournments, except when the proposed adjournment is going to materially interfere with the public business. I stated, when this question came up once before, that an adjournment for a single day I thought would not interfere with the public business as then proposed, but that a longer adjournment would, and that I was opposed to a longer adjournment on that occasion. I state the same thing to-day. I do not think that an adjournment over Monday is going to lengthen this session for one hour. I looked at the order paper to-day and noticed a number of measures for the consideration of Parliament, the most important of which is still before the House, and, so far as I can understand, there is none of them a subject of controversy. There is not likely, therefore, to be any long discussion upon them, and that being the case, no great amount of time will be required for their necessary consideration. That being so, and there being nothing on the order paper for Monday——

Hon. Mr. McKAY—You took good care there would not be.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Did the hon. gentleman enter into a conspiracy that there should be none? Did any hon. gentleman in the House conspire that there should be nothing on the order paper for Monday? Is this House composed of conspirators to interfere with public business? That is the position the hon. gentleman takes. As a matter of fact, I suppose every hon. gentleman who has proposed measures for the consideration of the House has consulted his own convenience as to time. I have done so, and I suppose every hon. gentleman in the House has done so. I did not suggest that there should be an adjournment to-morrow. My hon. friend in making that motion did not consult me in regard to the matter. It is not a matter of the slightest consequence to me whether the House adjourns over Monday or not, but, as a minister of the Crown in this House, it is my duty, so far as I can, to treat the members of this House with courtesy. If any hon. gentleman desires an adjournment over Monday, and it is not going to interfere with the public business, as I believe it will not interfere with the public business, then certainly it would be a mere matter of cantankerousness on my part to object to such an adjournment. I should prefer to meet on Tuesday at three o'clock. I understand that some hon. gentlemen who are pretty constant in their attendance prefer that we should meet at eight o'clock in the evening. I am prepared to accept that motion in deference to their convenience and wishes. I do not think it is inconsistent with my duty, as a minister, to do so. We can accept the motion and still keep pace with the other chamber, and if we do so we sufficiently discharge our public duty. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the small amount of business that has been before the House. We have gone through a considerable amount of business. Perhaps there has never been a session in which there was so little business of a controversial character before the Senate, and consequently there has not been much discussion. Some five weeks were consumed in the other House in discussion on the Address in answer to the speech from the throne. I think it was a misfortune, but it was not our fault, and this House does not control the House of Commons. They have the control of their own convenience. They pursued that course which they thought best in the interest of the public, or the party, as the case may be. I do not think we are likely to have a further adjournment after this, if this House desires this adjournment, because there are important measures before the other House, and I cannot predict when they will come before us. They may be the subject of very considerable discussion, and I cannot even venture upon a prediction as to the probabilities. Looking at the business before the House, if we meet on Tuesday we shall, by Friday, make excellent progress with that business, and therefore when my hon. friend made this motion I did not object; but I do not subscribe to the absurd constitutional doctrine—absurd in my opinion,—which the hon. gentleman opposite has set up, that the ministers shall decide whether hon. members shall sneeze or not. Every member is at liberty to make such proposals as he pleases, and if the government find his proposition is not going to interfere with the public business, I do not think they are called upon to interfere with it. The government is in the hands of the House. That has been the rule always and I am not disposed to make any attempt to alter the rule.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I wish to call attention more particularly to the complaint made by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Mr. Perley), that is, the tampering with a motion put in the hands of the clerk.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know anything about that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not accuse the hon. gentleman of knowing anything about it, but if the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley be correct, and we have no doubt it is, then somebody has been tampering with a motion which he placed on the paper, and that is a matter which should be closely scrutinized. His honour the speaker should call the attention of the clerk to the complaint which has been made, and it should be thoroughly investigated. It is intolerable to suppose for a moment that an hon. gentleman should give notice for a motion for a certain day, and then have it changed and altered to meet the opinion, or whim, or desire of anybody, whether it be an official or a senator. I desire to call special attention to that, because if it is tolerated in one case it can be repeated hereafter. I sincerely hope that those who are in authority will make an inquiry as to who it was made the change and why it was made, and if it were not done with the consent of the mover himself, the party should be punished. If a wrong of that kind has been committed, it should not only be investigated, but the party who did it should receive the just condemnation of the House. The hon. Minister of Justice is not strictly correct in stating what the practice has been in the past. When I had the honour of leading the House, when adjournments took place, the motions generally emanated from myself, after consultation with members of this House. I am sure that many hon. gentlemen will remember that when adjournments were proposed by independent members of this House they received my strongest opposition on a number of occasions.

Hon. Mr. POWER—On the ground that the public business would suffer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When the public business did not demand continued sittings of the House, then I took the opinion of the members and acted in accordance with the general opinion. If I thought it would interfere at all with the business, I took strong grounds against adjournments giving my reasons for it. When I assented, I nearly always assumed the responsibility of making the motion myself. I am glad to observe that the hon. gentleman is willing to abide by the decision of the majority of the House. He is as docile as any one could wish. When he said he was willing to acquiesce in any motion that might be made, it was a matter of convenience to himself or the government. The hon. gentleman says that we are not always so ready to acquiesce in what he may propose. I quite agree with him, but if he is always right we will back him to the full extent of the majority of the House. We must not be expected always to acquiesce in what he proposes, when we think and believe it is not correct. I am sure he would not ask us to do that. The hon. gentleman says also that we have been kept here on account of the protracted debates in the lower House. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact: he himself has submitted a number of very important measures for the consideration of the Senate, but they have only been introduced within the last two or three weeks and consequently those questions which are controversial, and which will require some little time and probably a good deal of time to discuss here, are questions which, if he had been prepared to introduce them at an earlier period, would have occupied our time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They belonged to the other House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am speaking of measures that the hon. gentleman has introduced himself. I do not hold him responsible for not getting the Drummond County Bill or the Grand Trunk Railway scheme here until the other day.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As a member of the government the hon. gentleman is responsible.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are not responsible for the delay caused by the opposition in the other House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is not responsible for not receiving the bills which come from the other House, not on account of the opposition, but on account of the culpable refusal of his colleagues to furnish the House of Commons with information which was absolutely necessary to enable them to come to a correct conclusion as to the measures they produced. That is the reason why the delay has taken place, and not, as the hon. gentleman would insinuate, the obstruction of the opposition. If we had had the measures initiated here, the Companies' Act, the Criminal Code Amendment Bill, and other measures, a month ago, they could have all been disposed of by this time. The result of this mode of conducting business is that within the last week or ten days of the session we will have work enough thrown upon our shoulders, that, if given proper consideration, would take us two or three weeks to attend to it. That is what I complain of, and I do not think the hon. gentleman is justified in the statement that he made in reference to the position taken by my hon. friend in regard to this adjournment. For myself, it is a matter of very little consequence, as it is to him, whether the adjournment takes place until Monday or Tuesday, and if there has been a conspiracy, which the hon. gentleman intimated, there must have been——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I did not intimate that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman said that if the statements were correct——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That there was a conspiracy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, the hon. gentleman mentioned conspiracy. If the hon. gentleman's statement is correct that his motion, and other motions, had been changed from the date that they desired to consider them to another date, then there was a conspiracy, and he did virtually imply that there was a conspiracy in this House. I do not believe for a moment that any member of the House made that change in the motion referred to by the senator for Wolseley.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLE—Some hon. gentlemen have claimed that this adjournment and the former adjournments emanated from the government. Hon. gentlemen are mistaken in one thing, and that is, the mover of the adjournment at present is the power behind the throne.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to say with respect to the notice given by the hon. gentleman for Wolseley, that I knew nothing whatever about his motion, and did not know that any change had been made until I heard the hon. gentleman speak to-day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That I verily believe.

The House divided on the motion, which was rejected on the following division:—

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (3) "An Act respecting the Canada Accident Insurance Company."—(Mr. Allan.)

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Before the orders of the day are called, I desire to say that the attention of Mr. Young was called to the matter of which I had given notice, and he explained to me that it was entirely a mistake of his.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY MAINTENANCE AND EXPENSES.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to call the attention of the hon. leader of the House to the fact that the information I asked for with regard to the proportion paid by the Intercolonial Railway to the Grand Trunk Railway for maintenance with regard to the extension into Montreal, and as submitted to the House the other day, that the proportion is not given with reference to the largest and most important item in that list. I refer to the item of $43,791.71, and I wanted the proportion of operating joint sections. I asked distinctly, in my inquiry, that the basis on which this proportion was ascertained should be given. In all the other small and comparatively unimportant items the percentage is given, but with regard to this, the most important of all of them, the one in fact which I was most anxious to get, the proportion is not given. My hon. friend will see at once that my object in moving in the matter has been altogether frustrated by the failure on the part of the government to give the information sought for.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says it has not been given. I am not sure that it is not given, but I will speak to the Minister of Railways on the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I might call the attention of the hon. minister to the fact that the motion I made with reference to this subject is in the same position. The information has not yet been brought down. It is very limited. The same complaint the hon. gentleman is making would apply to the motion which I made, and which I pointed out at the time I thought was absolutely necessary to be in possession of the House when we considered the questions affected by them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What was the date?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It appears on the notice paper of the 22nd May, page 232.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What part is omitted?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The information asked for by paragraphs four and five is not brought down.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Four particularly.

PACIFIC CABLE AND ALASKA BOUNDARY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would like to call the attention of the leader of the House to the cablegrams which I have seen in the newspapers in reference to the Pacific Cable and the Alaska Boundary question. It has been stated in the newspaper that the Colonial Secretary, of the home government, had intimated their desire that there should be another meeting of commissioners representing the colonies to further consider the question of what should be done relative to the construction of the Pacific Cable. What I should like to ask is, if the hon. ministers are in a position to give the information as to whether that statement is correct and whether the government intend to re-appoint commissioners to consult with the Imperial authorities and also with those who may be sent from other colonies. And, further, whether there is any truth in the statement which has been made that a modus vivendi had been agreed upon between the Imperial Government and the United States in reference to the Alaska Boundary until after the commission shall re-assemble and consider the question in Quebec in August next. These are two very important questions, and I am sure the people of the Dominion would like to know if those statements are correct, and if they are not correct, we would like to be informed what progress has been made in these matters.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say, with regard to the Pacific Cable, that I think the Colonial Secretary has invited a conference with the representatives of the different colonies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In England?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In England. With regard to a conventional boundary at the point where difficulty is likely to arise, I think a conventional boundary to serve a temporary purpose has been agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask for how long a period has this agreement for a conventional boundary been made?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not in a position to say.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it is for an indefinite period, there is no telling when the settlement may be arrived at. If it is until the commissioners re-assemble in Quebec then one may expect an early settlement of the question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to answer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can you tell me whether the government has decided to appoint commissioners in accordance with the request of the Colonial Secretary to consider the cable question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The matter is being considered by the Canadian Commissioner in England, Lord Strathcona.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS' BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (1) "An Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 3.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct the attention of the minister to the wording of a portion of clause three. The clause reads:

> The said repeal shall not in any way affect the corporate existence of the corporation of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, which together with all such persons as hereafter become members thereof—

Those words "together with all such persons as hereafter become members thereof" I think should not be there, because we do nct know who are the members thereof, and people who afterwards become members are not now members. It is a corporation, and that statement gives it a continued existence. I think those words should be struck out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose the words have been suggested by the nature and title of the bill "The Quebec Harbour Commissioners" if the title was "The Quebec Harbour Commission" these words might not be necessary at all.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This is a bill which hon. members like myself must take entirely on trust. I assure the hon. minister that I do not feel at all able to scrutinize it closely. It purports to be a consolidation, strictly, of existing statutes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—And I suppose my hon. friend the leader of the House, is satisfied that it is such and nothing more.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am satisfied that it is a consolidation. There may be, and there are, verbal changes, but the character of the organization is not changed. The bill is intended to give effect to the law as it now stands, and it is scattered through a large number of statutes. It has been carefully considered by the Solicitor General. It has been, in a large measure, made to confirm to the consolidation which took place a few years ago with respect to the Montreal Harbour Commissioners. The bill has been carefully considered by the law clerk of this House as well, so my hon. friend is perfectly safe in taking the bill as a consolidation of the law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose we may take it for granted that the verbal changes have not altered the intention of the law as it stood. A verbal change might make a material difference.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There might be a difference in the area embraced by the harbour owing to the growth of the city.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could the hon. gentleman tell us how far up the St. Lawrence this area extends? It is important in the carrying out of the Customs Act to know the limits of the harbour.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a clearer definition than is given in the existing section.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 11.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This clause is pretty sweeping in its disqualification. It is a question in my mind whether this is not broad enough to enable a majority of the corporation, by a proposal to purchase for corporation purposes, to disqualify a party. In the House of Commons we do not disqualify in that way, but the party who has any interest in the question under consideration is debarred from having any vote or voice in the matter. However, I thought, as it seems to have been the law before, that I would not interfere with it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it be an error at all, does not the hon. gentleman think it is an error in the right direction, in view of past experience?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The word "proposes" is an objectionable word.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is a good deal in what the hon. gentleman for Halifax says. This disqualifies a man who owns property which the commission proposes to purchase or acquire. Will the mere proposal to acquire disqualify him, or would the disqualification be only after the purchase was made?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It would be too late then. It is necessary, where there is an intention to acquire, if you are to affect a seat at all, that you should affect it before the negotiations are carried on. I think it is better to let it stand as it is.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 35.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This corporation is supposed to borrow money and pay interest. As far as my opinion goes, practically the people of Canada have to pay for all the property which is acquired and to pay the interest on the money that is borrowed, and it strikes me that there should be some check upon this power of expropriating land and borrowing money given in these clauses 33 to 38. There does not appear to be any limitation whatever.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There never was; there is no change in that regard.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a limitation in this. It is the first time there has been.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is power to use a sum which was placed at their disposal, and which has not yet been exhausted.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

WINDING UP ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (31) "An Act to amend the Winding Up Act." He said:—This is a bill introduced in the Commons by the member from Laval, who also introduced an insolvency bill. It is a very simple one. This bill gives the court power at any time, when found advisable, to appoint one or more inspectors to assist and advise the liquidator in the liquidation of the company, and it provides that the court may determine the remuneration.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understand it has been the practice for a long time in Quebec for the court to appoint inspectors. There was some doubt as to whether the court had such power, and one of the objects of the bill was to remove that doubt. Another object, in the case of large estates, is to make provision that the estate is not dissipated before it is finally dealt with.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

PORTAGE DU FORT AND BRISTOL BRANCH RAILWAY COMPANY.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (42) "An Act respecting the Portage du Fort and Bristol Branch Railway Company." He said:—This company propose building a railway from Portage du Fort to the city of Hull, if necessary, to connect with other lines, and to increase the capital.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the hon. gentleman from Rideau Division has taken the House into his confidence quite as fully as he might. It may be perfectly true that when no railway has been built and no money has been spent in constructing a railway, there is no serious objection to granting an unlimited number of charters over the same ground. But the case is different when, as in this instance, other railways have actually been built, and when it is proposed to grant a charter to a certain number of gentlemen for the purpose of competing with railways which are already in existence. I understand that one of the effects of the granting of this charter may be to very seriously interfere with the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company. That company own a railway which covers very nearly the same ground which is proposed to be covered by this railway. The Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company had an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway, under which they operated the section of the Canadian Pacific Railway between Aylmer and Hull. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company transferred their line to the Hull Electric Company, and, as I understand, the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company are now constructing a road from Aylmer to Hull to take the place of the road which was transferred by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to the Hull Electric Company; and the object of this legislation is to enable another company to come in and practically parallel the line of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company through its entire length. I understand that the business of that section of the country is not large enough to afford profitable work for two companies, and I trust that when this bill goes before the Railway Committee the hon. gentleman will be in a position to show that it is a perfectly fair and reasonable bill and, if it is not, that the committee will report accordingly.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The hon. gentleman has stated the case exactly as it is, and I will move to refer it to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours. I hardly think it is fair to parallel an existing railway, but it will be inquired into by the committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have looked at the map and looked at the proposed line, and it seems to me that it would be in the last degree unfair to the road that is now being constructed to grant another charter over almost the same ground. There may be room for a small branch to the existing road extending in the direction of Portage du Fort, but to construct a road extending into Hull on another charter would be in the last degree unfair to those who have already invested their capital in an enterprise that has approached completion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask the hon. gentleman who has charge of the bill whether it is in the same condition in which it was when originally introduced in the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it is not a parallel road to the extent that it was intended to be. I understand this is a bill for a railway to make connection with the road which is now in existence at a place called Quyon, and not at Shawville as was originally intended.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That is the whole point.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it is not so bad as when originally introduced.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, but it is bad enough.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, 19th June, 1899.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS WITHOUT PUBLIC COMPETITION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid on the Table of the Senate a full and complete return of all contracts entered into by the present government, by private contract, and without public competition by tender or otherwise, since 1896, specifying minutely the goods purchased, the prices paid, and from whom purchased. Also, for a detailed statement of all contracts given for work, the character of the work, with the price paid and to whom paid.

He said :—I might say, in connection with this motion, that whilst I was in the Northwest a few weeks ago I met several persons and in talking with them about the affairs of Parliament and how business was progressing, several of them—and amongst them boasted Reformers—asked me if the reports that the government was in the habit of letting contracts to their friends without complying with the law was correct. I said that I could not give any positive information on the subject. I said that such a statement was published in the newspapers of the country. We saw the charge made almost every day that certain parties were receiving contracts without public tender, and that the prices were exorbitant, but I was not prepared to say what the facts were. I said that they had the same opportunity of getting the information in the newspapers and reading the reports of discussions in the House of Commons as I had. One gentleman said to me that it was a preposterous state of things that the government should do this, that it was not the policy of these men when in opposition. I said, no, it was not their policy in opposition, but these gentlemen in opposition and these gentlemen in power were different individuals altogether. I said, "if you desire, I will put a notice on the paper and call for the returns and we will ascertain officially whether it is so or not." What I have to say is that if this story is not true, and if the government do comply with the law and the regulations in giving contracts to persons who tender at the lowest prices, then there will be no difficulty in bringing down the return to-morrow, because there will be virtually nothing to bring down. But if, on the other hand, they are in the habit of giving contracts at exorbitant prices, in cases beyond enumeration almost, then it will take perhaps till the next day or the day after. I hope that in course of time this motion will be answered, and for the credit of the government, that the report which has been spread broadcast through the country that they have had no regard for the law in the past, is not true.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend should have some mercy on the government. If that return is to be brought down in full it will exceed in volume the Auditor General's Report, from what I hear about the number of private contracts let by the government in my own province. They undertook to straighten a curve on a railway and shortened the road one-fifth of a mile, and introduced another curve almost as bad as the one they straightened, and they spent $28,000 in doing this.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—My hon. friend forgets that the mills of the gods grind slowly when he expects these returns down to-morrow or next day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to giving the fullest information to the public on the subject proposed in the address that the hon. gentleman has moved. I am quite sure he spoke very frankly and candidly when he said he hoped, for the honour and credit of the government, that the terrible report he found circulated in the North-west was not true. I presume this government, at certain times and occasions, has been obliged to give out work without tender, but in very rare cases, and I think in very many rarer cases than has been the practice with past governments. I would ask him to amend the motion by having the date run back to 1891, so that we shall be able to form a proper contrast of what has been done in that way by the two governments. The hon. gentleman will quite understand that the latter part of his motion will involve an immense amount of labour. The first part calls for a return of contracts entered into by private contract and without public competition. That could be readily furnished. He also calls for a detailed statement of all contracts, &c. Those details may occupy some considerable time, as the hon. gentleman knows, because they will have to be furnished by all the departments of the government, and I do not know that that could be promised to him at a very early period, but I presume the hon. gentleman has no objection to the return being amended so as to date from 1891.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—If it does not involve too much labour I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman objects to a return of contracts made anterior to 1896? Am I to so understand it?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—No, I shall move for that after this return is brought down.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Of course, I have no control over the acts of the hon. gentleman or the members of the House, but the course that I have suggested has been the usual one when motions of this kind have been made, by way of forming a contrast—for instance there are contracts issued by the Post Office Department which have, from time immemorial, been issued without tender. If my memory serves me, there is a limited amount, under the Post Office Act, within which the Postmaster General exercises discretion. I am not prepared at the moment to say what that is, but the hon. gentleman, if he wishes to be fair, would allow the motion to be amended in the direction that I have indicated.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I would not then get the information at all this session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I doubt whether the hon. gentleman will get any of the latter part of it at all this session, because it involves a great deal of labour.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I think the hon. Secretary of State is unreasonable. The information is in the hands of the government, and if they wish to bring it down they can do so without the consent of the hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Mr. Perley) or any other gentleman of this House. We are told that it will take a great deal of time and labour to make up the return called for; certainly, if you go back to 1891 it will involve a great deal more labour. I take it this government has been placed in power to carry out its promises, not to follow in the footsteps of the former government. The country decided against the former government and turned them out of power and placed these gentlemen in their position to do better than their predecessors. Supposing the late government did do wrong, that is no justification for the present government doing wrong. No comparison that might be made would justify wrong-doing on their part. A plain statement is asked for in accordance with the promises made by this government prior to the last election. They condemned the late government, and the country believed them and put them in power. Now, we want to know if these gentlemen are following in the footsteps of their predecessors, or are they carrying out the promises they made when in opposition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no doubt the remark made by the hon. Secretary of State with reference to postal contracts is quite correct, and it would only swell the return needlessly to include all the contracts which were legally renewed under that law. The law provides that any contract may be made by the Postmaster General for carrying the mails, &c., providing it does not exceed a certain amount. The hon. gentleman from Wolseley, as I understand him, does not ask for information in reference to the giving out of contracts which the law specifically gives the power to the Postmaster General to enter into. What he requires is the contracts which have been entered into for supplies and other matters, which should have been given out by contract under the law. That I take to be the object of the hon. gentleman's motion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Take, for instance, the building last year of a fence round this park. The law provides that if the work exceeds a certain amount, then tenders must be asked for. In order to evade the provisions of that law, the Minister of Public Works asked for a sum just under the amount which, had he named it, would have obliged him to call for tenders, but it was subsequently ascertained, when the debate proceeded, that instead of the work costing under $5,000, it was to cost about $14,000, and the object in placing the smaller sum in the estimates was to enable him to give the work to just such persons as he thought proper, and then next year come down for a similar amount and so on until the whole work was completed. There can be no question about that, and any one who turns to the debate of last year will ascertain that this is the fact. This is the kind of contract to which my hon. friend refers. He refers to contracts in which certain merchants have furnished the government with from $20,000 to $30,000 of supplies for the Yukon district and for the mounted police; and there is no evidence that there was any tender for these supplies. There must have been some reason why these favourites were selected. If my hon. friend desires to ask for contracts from 1891 to the present time, I, as a member of the former government for part of the time, would have no objection to it On the contrary, I would perfer to have the comparison made, and I venture the assertion that he will find that no such flagrant transactions occurred during the period to which he referred, while I was a member of the government. After that I do not pretend to speak, but the Auditor General's Report would tell the tale as to whether the system which is practiced now, was practiced in the years from 1891 to 1896. I have never been able to find any such item, nor has the vigilant opposition of that time, who never allowed an opportunity to expose the peccadilloes of the late government to escape their attention. The suggestion made by the hon. Secretary of State, I have no doubt will be acted upon by the hon. member from Wolseley, just as soon as he can get the information he now desires, and which his constituency evidently would like to have also, in order that comparisons may be made and the country may know how the government dispenses the public patronage.

The motion was agreed to.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY RETURNS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to direct the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to the information I asked for in reference to the income and expenditure of that portion of the Drummond County road which has been under lease. If my hon. friend will look at page 808 of the Senate Debates of 1897 he will find that when I asked the then Minister of Justice for certain information with reference to the earnings of the Drummond County Railway, the hon. Sir Oliver Mowat said in reply "I believe the object is this" that is the object I had in view in asking the question, "that the hon. members having doubt, or more than doubt, whether the business to be done would warrant the expenditure," that is, the expenditure in the purchase of the road, "it was felt desirable that there should be an opportunity to us all to know, by actual experiment how that would be. Then, also, there would be an opportunity of considering whether there could be any modification made in the details,"—that is, the details of the bargain into which the government had entered with the Drummond County Railway people, "such as would make the permanent agreement more satisfactory and suitable to the members who are now opposed to it. The matter will probably be brought up in the House of Commons to-day, and a more full statement of the object of introducing it will be there given." Then he adds, "I did not expect the question would be put to me, consequently I was not in a position to give the answer." Now, we are to be called upon in a day or two to consider this very question on which the late Minister of Justice saw the propriety, when he made those remarks, of having a full statement of the earnings, perhaps I had better say a full statement of the results arising from the purchase of that road and coming to the city of Montreal. I am sure the hon. Secretary of State will see, also, that it is very important that we should know—having rejected that agreement upon a previous occasion—whether the results of their securing entrance into Montreal for the Intercolonial Railway via the Grand Trunk from St. Rosalie, and the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, have warranted the expenditure. If we are, to use a familiar expression, to go it blind, we will not get the information, but if the government desire to have the agreement ratified, I should suppose that they would readily give all the information possible. In the same debate, on page 812, the Minister of Justice made this statement:

> The item is merely suggestive—that is, the item in the lease. In order to afford an opportunity of making an important experiment in this matter, the government, believing that the profits will be so large as to satisfy this House that the bargain is a very good one, while at present the majority of this House do not take that view of the matter.

If that language means anything, it means that the bargain having been rejected by the Senate, they were desirous, having leased the line, to ascertain whether it would pay, and whether it was advisable to continue that lease or to purchase the road. The presumption is that the earnings are such as to justify the government in making the purchase; and, if so, I hope that before the second reading is moved, or we are asked to approve of it, that information will be given to us.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Senate is entitled to all the information that is available in the possession of the government. I think my hon. friend brought up this question some weeks ago, and, if my recollection serves me, the answer was that the Railway Department did not keep any separate account of the Drummond County Railway, and therefore it was quite impossible to give any estimate of what the earnings of that road were; that the larger portion, of course, was through traffic. I do not know what the local traffic is. Of course, it was never considered in this arrangement. The object in coming to the city of Montreal was to secure a larger amount of traffic over the whole line—not over the section between Lévis and the Grand Trunk Railway. Everybody recognizes that, and the Railway Department gave an answer some time ago, if my recollection is correct, that they were unable to credit the Drummond County Railway with items that specially ought to be credited to that line. I will, however, send a communication to the Railway Department asking them to give us that information. All the information they have available should be laid before the House, and will be laid before the House. There may be some that we cannot succeed in obtaining. If the accounts have always been kept in the way indicated, it may be impossible, but whatever information is available will be brought down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think it impossible. It may not have been done, I really admit, and that may place the Minister of Railways and Canals in a position to say "I have not got it and cannot give it to you," but if the promises made by the then Minister of Justice meant anything at all, they meant that they intended to keep an account to ascertain whether the experiment would justify the purchase of the road or the continuance of the lease. If they have not been kept, the government have been derelict in their duty. If they have kept these accounts and refuse to give them to the public, then the object must be to deceive them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The remarks of the Minister of Justice apply to the whole line. He was not speaking of that particular section of it. He assumed that the acquisition of that line would lead to a large traffic over the whole road.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken, because my question was in reference to this portion of the road entirely, and not to the whole, and his answer was that it was necessary to lease the road in order that they might experiment to ascertain whether they should purchase it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But it was in regard to the trade from Montreal certainly. There is no use in criticising mere language. We are all capable of drawing the inferences from the language used by Sir Oliver Mowat. Everybody can do that. Sir Oliver Mowat had in his mind the increase in traffic over the whole line by the acquisition of this branch. Unless you acquired that branch you could not get that traffic from Montreal.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have a further statement made by Sir Oliver Mowat on the 28th June, page 969 of the Debates. After quoting a speech made by the hon. Mr. Blair in another place, he goes on to say:

> Representing the government here, I endorse that statement. I should like to say further, although it is only repeating in substance what I have said a few days ago, with regard to the $157,500 asked for the rental of the two pieces of road belonging respectively to the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Drummond County Railway Company, that this amount is only wanted for a tentative purpose, to ascertain by experiment the effect of nine months operating the road as part of the Intercolonial Railway and with a view to be in a situation to consider more satisfactorily a permanent connection with Montreal by some means, whether those spoken of heretofore or some others.

I have not the report here but I have seen it before, that the railway authorities, Mr. Schreiber or Mr. Pottinger, one or the other, explained before the Drummond County Railway Committee last year that it would be quite possible to give the information separately as to the earning and working expenses of the Drummond County branch.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—May I ask the hon. Secretary of State when I may expect a return that I have been praying for very long with regard to carrying the mails from Sackville to Cape Tormentine?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think that is the only return moved for by the hon. gentleman which is missing. I will make further inquiry with regard to it.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Before the House adjourns, I wish to say that a few days ago I had occasion to make some remarks on a question of adjournment. After I had resumed my seat, I was called out of the chamber, and returned while the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour (Mr. Prowse) was on his feet, speaking in answer to the remarks I delivered. I am quite ready to take any kind of chaffing, provided it is done in good humour, and I am not sure that it was not in that spirit that the remarks of the hon. gentleman were delivered. But I have seen them in print. I returned to the Senate just as he was closing, and I observed that the hon. gentleman thought that we should not adjourn so often, as we had important questions to discuss. He spoke of my having retained the services of a man named Parent during provincial elections in Quebec. I then looked up the remarks I had made in a previous debate to see if they were so obscure, or of such a character as to leave me open to a charge, such as the one made by the hon. gentleman. I had then occasion to answer a statement made by a man by the name of Parent, that he had been employed as an organizer by the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, and the hon. gentleman from Belleville read a statement from that individual to that effect. On that occasion I rose to say that I knew that that was not the case; that I had once, at the urgent demand of said Parent, sent him to address one or two meetings in the county of Labelle, but that instead of reaching his destination he had stopped on the way, and had shown himself not to be trust worthy. My hon. friend spoke of some queer or special work for which I would have sent that man in the back counties. I meant to make it very clear that I had sent that individual to make one or two speeches and that he had not delivered them, that that was the extent of the work he had done, and that it would not constitute him an organizer of the Liberal party in Quebec. As it is not four o'clock, if the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour (Mr. Prowse) has anything specially to discuss or ventilate concerning my own standing in this House, or my conduct previous to my entering this House, I am ready to answer him. I do not want any misunderstanding as to what I did say, or as to how I have acted in my public career. My hon. friend spoke of my boasting of having carried elections before entering this House. I do not remember ever having made such a boast. I know I passed through 17 elections helping friends before I could boast of having been under the flag of victory. I went into politics in 1878. My hon. friends know that the Liberal party did not, for a number of years, see victory perched upon their flag. Therefore, it would have been quite unbecoming to speak of my prowess in political elections.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I hope the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat does not suppose that I intended any personal reflections upon his honour or character in any way. But as the hon. gentleman took a prominent part in advocating the adjournment, and was very anxious for it, I thought I would give what I considered sufficient reasons why we should not adjourn the House over Monday, and I instanced some matters that might be very interesting for debate. I hope the hon. gentleman is not so thin skinned as to take offence at any allusions I have made to his public career. In a semi-official document I find the hon. gentleman described as the political organizer for the last four general elections himself, not Parent at all, and he volunteered the statement in this House that he employed this man Parent and gave him money to advance the interests of his political party. I do not condemn that course, which the hon. gentleman thinks honourable and creditable, or to his boasting of it in this House. He has a perfect right to do so. He may have his ideas of what is proper and right to do in this regard, and so may I. We may differ in our opinions in reference to this matter, but we have it on his own statement that he gave this man Parent money to go into some back settlement and work for the Liberal party, and it now appears that he was only to make speeches. There is not a great deal of difference between organizing a party and going into a campaign to make political speeches for a party. He appears to have been the deputy of the hon. gentleman opposite. The hon. gentleman was the chief organizer himself, and it is recorded in the semi-official document to which I have referred, but he employed other men to do work in the outlying districts, and this man Parent was employed by him to do such work. The hon. gentleman did not tell us how many more he employed during all those elections in which he took part. It appears that Parent is the only man who failed to do the work he was authorized and instructed to do. It would be a very interesting piece of information for us to know what all the rest of them did, and, as I said on a former occasion, perhaps it was owing to the successful efforts of the hon. gentleman that Quebec to-day is very largely supporting the government. The hon. gentleman has got his reward by being placed in the Senate by the present government. I do not object to that. I might go further and refer to another matter, to a newspaper correspondence, where the hon. gentleman has made a declaration that he thinks the constitution of this body was a great mistake from the very beginning, and that he would be decidedly in favour of a very great reform of the Senate. He has not exactly told us in what way he would reform us, but perhaps he will do so before the close of the session. I have no doubt he has been introduced into the Senate for that very purpose, like some other gentlemen, to reform the Senate. Perhaps he may effect his purpose, as the late Minister of Justice did. He came here to reform us, and instead of condemning the Senate gave us high praise and was awarded by being made Lieutenant Governor of the province of Ontario. I should not be surprised if my hon. friend—and I am sure he would grace the position very well indeed—should yet receive the same reward in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Hon. gentlemen (cries of order, order.)

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—My hon. friend has been allowed to speak once on the motion.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—This discussion is all out of order.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I want to to say a few words in reply to the speech of the hon. gentlemen? I want to know if, on a motion to adjourn, I cannot speak a second time if I please.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—No, only once.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If I am in order, I should like very much to occupy a few minutes to call the attention of the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Power) to some remarks he made about myself relating to the Minister of Agriculture and the plebiscite vote. I think I can show from documentary evidence that I have in my possession that I was right and he was wrong. I will take the opportunity to do so when I am sure that I am in order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. leader of the opposition would be quite in order to make any statement now he pleases, because there is a motion to adjourn before the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman expressed very great surprise that I should have made remarks throwing doubt upon statements made by a minister of the Crown, the hon. Minister of Agriculture. The statement made by him was that he had examined the returns of the vote of the plebiscite, and that all the statements which had been made by the man Parent were untrue. If the hon. gentlemen will refer to the debate they will find that I said that it was impossible for the Minister of Agriculture to make so positive a statement by merely looking at the return; that it might be possible that this man had made improper statements in reference to the returning officer, but that he could not know unless he had examined the returns from every poll, that there was no truth in the statement made by Parent that some of the ballot boxes had been stuffed; or, in other words, that more votes had been cast than were on the rolls. That is the point on which I questioned the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture and for which my hon. friend took me to task, expressing his great surprise that I was so much a partisan that I could not take the word of a minister of the Crown. Since that time these returns have been examined, and I will give the hon gentleman some ten or twelve instances where the vote cast was, to say the least of it, suspicious, and ask him frankly whether it is possible to have such a result from any election.

14 polling subdivisions—
Total on rolls	1,357
Total votes	1,330
All voted except	27

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Does the hon. gentleman say that these are the polls that the man Parent pretended to have reported upon?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not arguing that point at all. I am justifying the statement I made here, that it was impossible for any one to take up that return and declare that all that was said by Parent was wrong, unless he had examined the returns from the polls, and one statement made by Parent was that more electors cast their votes, or apparently cast their votes than had gone to the poll. That is my point. I am not justifying Mr. Parent or any one else.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would the hon. gentleman tell me what authority he has for those figures?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I told the hon. gentleman they are from the report which has been laid on the table of the House giving the result of the voting upon the plebiscite, and I also informed the hon. gentleman that I am giving the pages where he can find them. In the fourteen polling subdivisions which I have mentioned, the total votes on the rolls were 1,357; the total votes cast were 1,330, so that in all these fourteen polling subdivisions the total vote was polled less twenty-seven. I give that as evidence to justify the statement I made, that it was impossible for any man to declare that no stuffing of the ballot boxes had taken place, unless he had personally examined all the returns as has been done in this case, by showing the number on the list and the number polled. I have no desire to cast any reflection on the hon. Minister of Agriculture further than to point out that in making the broad declaration that everything said by this man Parent, even to the stuffing of the ballot boxes, was false, and that he was a skalawag and a scoundrel. He may be that for all I know. I give the facts, which can be verified by the return. If any further evidence were required to prove that the ballot boxes were stuffed, that is quite sufficient in itself.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Can the hon. gentleman tell us whether he has gone through the returns from other provinces and found a similar state of things.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Has the hon. gentleman contented himself with looking through the returns of the province of Quebec?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not prepared to say that the frauds were not committed in other provinces, but we were dealing with Parent's report. At the time the statement was made with reference to Quebec, and not to other provinces; consequently I did not go beyond that, but I venture the assertion that you will find the same frauds in the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—In favour of prohibition?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know.

An hon. GENTLEMAN—No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That negative answer needs to be verified.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no objection to the hon. gentleman verifying his statement. I was not dealing with that question. All I intended doing was to verify the statement that I made on the occasion I now refer to. I have not examined the whole of the returns, I have not time to do so, but there were frauds committed I have not the slightest doubt.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I should like to make one statement in reply to the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour (Mr. Prowse) who wonders if, as political organizer, I made many payments of such sums as the one made to Parent. I may state that I never have been a political organizer, as is understood in other provinces. When election time comes in the province of Quebec, on both sides committees are formed to help the candidates during the election, and I have taken part with others, in organizing elections. As to what I may have done in elections, I may state that never was I called as a witness in contested elections to give an account of what moneys passed through my hands. If I had been, I would have been ready, as I am to-day, to give full satisfaction.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to have the statement as to how the hon. gentleman spent the money.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I may state that it has been my contention for the last 20 years, and my experience, that for every dollar spent by the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, from five to ten dollars have been spent by the Conservative party. That I know to be the fact.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Where is the proof?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—In that inquiry which was made by three gentlemen where it appeared that over $25,000 were spent by Sir Adolphe Caron.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or the $100,000 spent by Mercier.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—The hon. gentleman was not very scrupulous as to the character of men he employed in the elections.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I was mistaken in one instance.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The speech which the hon. leader of the opposition refers to was made on the 20th of April. It happened, unfortunately, the hon. gentleman was not present, and I naturally expected that if he was under the impression that I said anything that was not justified by the fact, he would have referred to it almost immediately after his return to the Senate. Of course, after the lapse of a few months the matter is not fresh in my mind. Referring to the Senate Debates, I find at page 169 the language which I used, and which, with the permission of the House, I will quote :

The hon. Minister of Agriculture is a gentleman of good character and reputation, and one whose veracity is not questioned by any one, and when he made the statement in the House of Commons that on examining the returns in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery he found that not a single name of a person named by Parent as acting as deputy returning officer in the polls to which he had referred was the correct name of the person so acting, and when he pointed out that the figures mentioned by Parent showing the number of ballots cast in the different polling places were in no case the figures shown by the returns from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, members of that House let the matter drop, and no one has raised any question about it since.

My statement is perfectly justified by the fact and is correct in every respect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is all right as far as that goes, but the hon. gentleman has not read what he stated with reference to myself, and that is the only part to which I called attention.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What I stated about the hon. gentleman is this :

But here we have the hon. leader of the opposition in the Senate, which is supposed to be a much less partisan body than the other House, deliberately bringing up those charges which he had every reason to believe were unfounded, and asking for a commission to inquire into statements which he has every reason to believe have no foundation whatever in fact and after a committee had been offered in the House of Commons and not accepted.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—As the hon. gentleman who has addressed the House on more than one occasion on this question gave us some explanation in reference to his position as an organizer, I may just read from MacGurn's Parliamentary Guide what that document says in reference to the hon. gentleman. I take it that if it is not written by himself, but he must have approved of it, and, perhaps, read the proof and corrected it. He is there announced as the chief Liberal organizer in the district of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is an honourable position.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Yes ; but he used the money entrusted to him to employ this drunken rascal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I found that out afterwards.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—That was not the first time that Parent was drunk. He was just the man for the work he was employed to do. The chief organizer of the party understood his man well. He was the only man employed that did not turn out just as he was expected to turn out. It would be interesting to get a statement of the number of persons employed who carried out their duties as expected. In reference to this man Parent, it often struck me how he came to be appointed as the agent for the Temperance Alliance to find out the corruption that was practiced in the province Quebec. I think if I had been secretary of the Temperance Alliance and been in sympathy with the present government, I would have first ascertained who was the chief organizer of the party in the province of Quebec. I would have been told that it was the hon. senator (Mr. Dandurand) and I would have applied to the hon. gentleman himself to give me the name of some competent person to send through the province of Quebec to ascertain if anything wrong was going on there, and I do not know any one, in the interest of his party, that could have been selected to accomplish the purpose better than Parent. I do not say it was done that way but certainly some one put his finger in the eye of the secretary of the Temperance Alliance in getting this man appointed—a man given to drinking to excess—extremely so, as the hon. gentleman said in his former speech.

CANADIAN INLAND TRANSPORTATION COMPANIES BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.*

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (51) "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Inland Transportation Company" with an amendment. He said :—This amendment is simply striking out the clause on page 3, line

17, because it refers to a bill now before the House of Commons not yet passed, and it was thought proper to strike out that clause.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN, moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The order of the day being called:

Third reading, Bill (N) "An Act to amend the Companies Act."

Hon. Mr. MILLS said:—The third reading of this bill was postponed at the instance of the hon. gentleman from Calgary. Instead of moving the third reading at the present time, I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of moving certain amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I propose the following amendment to clause 1 in the 9th line: strike out the word "otherwise," and insert "in any other respect," then the bill will read "such preference or priority as respects dividends and in any other respect over ordinary stock as declared by the by-laws." I think that will meet the objection and make it perfectly clear that the by-law must set out the particular respects in which preference is intended to be given.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I presume my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, concludes that those words will be sufficiently wide to permit of the preference being a preference upon the capital, in the event of a winding up, as well as a preference upon dividends.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, if it is so declared by by-law.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 4.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would suggest, in clause 4, line 33, that the word "otherwise" should be struck out and the words "in any other respect declared by the by-law as authorized by section 1 of this Act," be inserted.

The clause as amended was adopted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has my hon. friend taken into consideration the propriety of extending the provisions of this bill to companies that may have special charters? There has been an expression of opinion from certain quarters that companies not incorporated under the Companies Act should be permitted to take advantage of those provisions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is another bill before the House providing for the incorporation of existing companies coming under the provisions of this Act, and if they did, the provisions of this Act might be extended to them, but I would not like, without any notice having been given, to extend the provisions of this Act to companies that might now desire it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would be entirely optional. What I had in view was this, that companies now having special charters, desiring to avail themselves of those provisions might, upon the passage of a by-law such as is provided for in section 1, issue preference stock, and as a safeguard to prevent companies of that character exercising those particular provisions it might be done under the assent of the Governor in Council. However, I simply make the suggestion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would not like to touch companies incorporated under special charters, without giving the matter more consideration.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But your bill would only have reference to loan companies.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, only the loan companies.

Hon. Mr. McKAY, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

Bill (90) "An Act respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company."—(Mr. Lougheed.)

Bill (32) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the sale of Railway Passenger Tickets."—(Mr. McMillan.)

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS BILL.

THIRD READING.

The order of the day being called:

Third reading Bill (91) An Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, as amended.

Hon. Mr. MILLS said:—I would ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole again to consider an amendment that was omitted from the bill when it was before the House the other day. It was in my hands but I overlooked it. The amendment has been suggested by the Solicitor General.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the bill.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The amendment which I propose is a third subsection to clause 19. The general powers and duties of the corporation with respect to pilotage are contained in that Act and the amendments thereto. I propose as a third subsection to add as follows:—

All things heretofore done by the corporation of pilots for and below the harbour of Quebec, and by the directors of the said corporation, with reference to the distribution of the funds of the said corporation between the members thereof, and the payment out of said funds of sums of money to pilots who act as captains, is hereby declared to be good and valid for all purposes.

It is a validation of the proceedings of the pilotage authorities.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is there any conflict?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not aware of it. There is none reported to me, but it is for the purpose of removing any doubt with regard to the proceedings of the pilotage board. There may have been some irregularity when it passed. I do not know of it, but there was no intentional irregularity, and this is to put beyond controversy the proceedings that have been had in past years.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct attention of the Minister of Justice to the wording of the second subsection:

2. Under the Pilotage Act, chapter 80 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, the corporation is the pilotage authority of the pilotage district of Quebec. The general powers and duties of the corporation with respect to pilotage are contained in that Act and the amendments thereto.

The latter part of that subsection is not an enactment at all.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know it is not.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the latter part of the clause ought to be stricken out, because it is simply a recital of information.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are several provisions in the Act that are not enacting clauses, but are really recitals. If my hon. friend will look at clause 18, it is open to exactly the same objection, but I suppose that in the consolidation of the Acts—I believe there are ninety-nine statutes embraced in this bill—the existing provisions of them were to remain in force. Although this is, perhaps, not a skilful form of amending, nevertheless, looking at the great variety of sources from which the law is drawn, it will not be without use for those who wish to look further into past legislation on the subject. The hon. gentleman will see that the previous section is exactly the same form. There is very little that is enacting in it; there is a good deal of recital, and as the bill passed through the House of Commons in this form, I did not think it was advisable to disturb it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am simply calling attention to it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (C.B.), from the committee, reported the bill with an amendment, which was concurred in.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

HUDSON BAY AND NORTH-WEST RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Cox, moved:

Second reading of Bill (110) "An Act respecting the Hudson's Bay and Yukon Railways and Navigation Company, and to change its name to the Hudson's Bay and North-west Railways Company."

He said:—This bill is a bill to authorize the Hudson's Bay and Yukon Railway Navigation Company to change its name. It also authorizes the company to maintain telegraphs and telephone lines, and as the company is to operate between Hudson's Bay and Great Slave Lake and other places in that region, it is not likely that it will interfere with the rights of any existing telegraph company.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (115) "An Act to incorporate the Sudbury and Wahnapitæ Railway Company."—(Mr. Casgrain.)

CANADA PERMANENT AND WESTERN CANADA MORTGAGE COMPANY INCORPORATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved the second reading of Bill (75) "An Act to incorporate the Canada Permanent and Western Canada Mortgage Company. He said:—This is a bill from the House of Commons to incorporate certain persons named in the first clause of the bill. There are the Canada Permanent and Western Canada Mortgage corporation. The capital stock of the company is $20,000,000, 2,000,000 shares at $10 each. The head office is to be in Toronto, and the bill gives power to the company to purchase the entire assets and to acquire the whole, or any part, of the assets and good will of the Canada Permanent Loan and Savings Company and the Western Canada and Freehold Loan and Savings Company and the London Investment Company, Ltd., or any companies carrying on such business as the company is carrying on. I propose to refer the bill to the Committee on Banking and Commerce and simply move the second reading now.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I would like to know whether this is a new company, or whether it is only proposed to amalgamate other companies which have been in existence some time?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It is to amalgamate the companies whose names I have read.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It is an amalgamation company?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I think the amalgamation of these companies is not going to be for the advantage of this country. We are getting too much in the way of these large concerns that will monopolize the business of the country. Hitherto it has been the idea that the more companies were incorporated, the better it would be for the public in the way of reducing the rate at which money could be obtained. But now it appears these companies are going to form a huge monopoly to make business more paying than it has been in the past. I question very much the policy of establishing these large monopolies for the purpose of conducting business. I think it would be far better if the policy in the past had not been continued to the extent that it was. I do not think we would have had the same number of companies in existence that we have to-day. We are getting into the same condition as exists on the United States side. They do everything there by amalgamation and huge monopolies, and we find powerful trusts, like the oil trust or other great trusts, which I believe ultimately will be anything but an advantage to the country at large. This bill requires a great deal of consideration at the hands of the committee when it comes before them. I am not going to oppose it now, but I object to the principle. As far as I am concerned, I shall be prepared to offer opposition to this bill if it is carried by the Banking Committee, because I believe it would be injurious to the best interests of this country. I merely mention these matters now so that hon. gentlemen will know my opinion with respect to organizing these large associations for the purpose of carrying on business which might better be carried on as it has been in the past.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I do not think the hon. gentleman's fears will be realized. However, he will have every opportunity of stating his views before the committee, and I think we will convince him that instead of not being for the benefit of the country, that this bill will strengthen the companies from a financial point of view and will be in no way injurious to the public.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not object to that. It is generally supposed that we affirm the principle of the bill when we give it a second reading. I do not affirm the principle of this bill. I think it objectionable in every way. We will have an opportunity of explaining our views more fully in committee, and I think I shall be able to show that it is not of advantage to incorporate these mammoth establishments. I have objected to giving incorporation to these limited companies, and the argument was that the public would obtain a lower rate of interest. That seems to be all changed, and now they are trying to merge all these companies into one huge monopoly for the purpose of controlling the business and making it more remunerative than it has been in the past.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—And giving big salaries to a few.

Hon Mr. CLEMOW—I suppose so.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (Q) "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892."

(In the Committee.)

On section 3.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is not this provision 166*a* rather stringent? It says, "Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, by failing to perform any legal duty, permits a person in his lawful custody on a criminal charge to escape therefrom." He may not know what is his legal duty. Supposing one man sees another man, who is guilty of an indictable offence, running away and has it in his power to stop him and does not do so, would he come under this clause?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You could put in the word wilfully.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He might not do it wilfully, but carelessly, and yet he would come under the provisions of this section.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If he did it wilfully he would do it knowingly. He might do it carelessly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Take the case of a jailor who allows a man who is awaiting his trial for murder to escape through his carelessness: he should be punished. I think it is a very desirable clause, because these escapes are of frequent occurrence. I know that in the province to which I belong those escapes happen not infrequently, and I think it is desirable to hold up before those officers some penalty which will induce them to be particular in the discharge of their duty.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We want to impress them with a high sense of duty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is quite right when he applies it to an official, whose duty it is, not only to protect, but to secure the criminal and not allow him to escape. But does this clause not go further? It applies to every one.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But the custody must be lawful.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps it is all right, but I think it is pretty stringent.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 180.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think there was some discussion over that word "scurrilous" when a similar clause was before this House in 1897. I doubt the wisdom of adding this word "scurrilous" because scurrility is not immorality. I do not think it is a criminal thing. It may be vulgar and objectionable, but it is not criminal, and I doubt the wisdom of trying to make it a crime to publish in a newspaper an article that may be scurrilous in its character. If a person feels himself aggrieved by such an article, very much aggrieved, he can bring an action for libel.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And plead that it is true, if it is true.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think we should add this word, because, in the first place, it is not germane to the rest of the enactment. The clause which we have just passed deals altogether with immoral publications, and clause 180 does the same, as it stands now. I do not think it is desirable to bring scurrility, which is a different thing, into this clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is it not covered also by section 205 of the Criminal Code? It would enable a party against whom it is directed to take action for libel. The difficulty would be in the interpretation of the word "scurrilous." One man might call an article scurrilous, and another might not. He might say that it is true, and only portrays a man's character. I think the term is open to a good deal of misconception, and I agree with the hon. gentleman from Halifax that the bill would be just as well without it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My impression is that scurrilous writing is not a thing that is desired.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I agree with the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In the Post Office Act the word is used, and when the language was transferred to the criminal law, this word was dropped out. Language cannot be scurrilous without being offensive and insolent. We do not permit in either House the use of scurrilous language, and it is a recognized rule, that that which might lead to a breach of the peace is not language lawful in itself, and the use of scurrilous language certainly would point in that direction. You may call a person very bad names without violating the law, if you do not use this word, and I do not know that there is any mistake in restraining a party from the use of violent and abusive language—telling a man through a newspaper, for instance, that he is an idiot.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It might be in the public interest.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think it would be in the public interest. It could not be in the interests of the community that a person should be so written of.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—This House has been described in the Globe as a set of tottering old idiots.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And a member of the Lower House has been called a slanderous liar. Is that scurrilous?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I should say it was, and it would be scurrilous to say that the members of this House looked like women, but their beards forbid, to use the words of Macbeth. I do not know that we promote the public well-being, and our legislation points in that direction, by simply allowing persons to use scurrilous language without any restraint and without any control by law. I am not wedded to the section, and if the House is of a different opinion, I am not going to complain, but I think there is more to be gained than lost by including it in the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If it is intended for the protection of this House we had better let it go.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does it apply to cartoons?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know that they are to be regarded in that light.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In some of the United States, I think in California, they have made it a penal crime to publish a caricature. You are not going as far as that I hope?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 181.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think the Minister of Justice should be consulted before any alteration of the criminal law is made. If I moved the amendment of which I gave notice I would be following in the footsteps of a gentleman in the other House who introduced a bill on this subject, and I do not desire to do that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The only change is the omission of the words "of previously chaste character." I think the protection should be absolute. Between 14 and 16 I do not think there is such a maturity of mind and judgment that a girl ought to depend wholly on herself for the protection of her virtue. The protection ought to be absolute, and the intention of this bill is to give her such protection by leaving out the words "of a previously chaste character." It has been suggested to me by my hon. friend for Sarnia that the English law is somewhat different from ours. Hon. gentlemen will see that the words are "who seduces," &c., &c. The words of the English statute are "criminally knows." This matter was very fully discussed by parties who called on Sir Oliver Mowat, who preceded me in office, and he preferred retaining the words we have now, because they had been for a considerable time used in our statute, and because also, if a girl has become notoriously immoral, although under the age of 16, it is doubtful whether that ought not to be pleaded in the defence of persons who had illicit intercourse with her, and so the words "seduces and has illicit intercourse" are retained, which implies that she was overcome or persuaded to have intercourse, and not that she was herself a party seeking intercourse. Most of the sections are drawn with the word "or," the disjunctive conjunction, instead of the copulative conjunction, and it might be that the words of the English statute would be more satisfactory than those employed; it is for the House to say whether that is so or not. As these words were already in the statute, I did not think it was desirable to change them without the approval of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The meaning of the change in this clause, if I understand it, is this: the clause which you are asking us to enact now is as it stands on the statute-book less the word "of previously chaste character."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The intention of the hon. member for Sarnia, I understood, was to move that the age of consent be raised to 18?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I am waiting the opportunity to do so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In other words, to adopt the Charlton Bill that was passed by the lower House and make it part of the Criminal Code, while the Minister of Justice merely proposes to leave out the words "of previously chaste character." It seems to me you are opening the door to a great deal of abuse that may arise. How would it be in the case of a girl, such as has been instanced by the Minister of Justice himself, one of notoriously bad character? The crime would be just as bad, under this bill if I understand it, to have any illicit intercourse with such a girl even if she were not virtuous, and it seems to me it is exceedingly dangerous legislation to leave out those words.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We passed that before in 1897.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We passed it in 1897 with the words "of previously chaste character."

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hon. gentlemen will see that there is a good deal of force in the view of leaving out those words. You are bound to consider what the effect of the law, as it will stand without them, is. I do not think, where persons are notoriously dissolute, that we ought to furnish facilities for seducing them between the ages of 14 and 16.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That would not be seduction.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is a want of maturity of judgment which it seems to me ought, in a large measure, to deprive them of the power of consenting. What we have to consider largely is when that period of life arises when a girl ceases to be a child and possesses such maturity of judgment that she ought to be held in a large measure to be relying upon herself. In the section as it stands there are two things necessary in order to constitute the crime of seduction and illicit intercourse. A man who seduces or persuades a girl, is not persuading one who is notoriously an immoral character. That might, to some extent, although not to the same extent, be employed in extenuation of the offence, or justification of the act, as the words "previously chaste character." They are not so strong. I am inclined to think myself that perhaps they might be left out altogether, but certainly the word "seduce" is a word strong enough to give all the protection that a man ought to expect the law to extend to him in the case of his having improper relations with a girl under 16 years of age.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I move to amend the clause by striking out "16" and substituting "18." A great deal of the argument which has been adduced by the hon. minister on the point he has been discussing applies with even greater force to the amendment which I propose. I do not offer this amendment from any particular acquaintance with the law or with the practice which is here legislated against. I appear rather as the advocate of a very large number of those members of our community who are best acquainted with this subject, the Women's Christian Temperance Union and several other organizations similar in their character and object. They have petitioned largely for a change of the statute to raise the age of consent from 16 to 18. That has been the principal argument which has been adduced and had great weight in the other House. There the matter was very fully discussed. Strong objections were taken to the proposed change, but after a full discussion the vote of that House was satisfactory to me, because there the amendment was carried by a very considerable majority of over two to one—a very decisive expression of opinion in that House. I see that it was not considered a party question, because by analyzing the vote, I find that both parties were divided on the subject. I was pleased to see in connection with that vote, that the Premier himself and two of his colleagues supported my view, and are there recorded as voting for this amendment which I now propose. I feel very much to-day the want of the support which I expected to have in this House from my hon. friend who usually sits by me, Judge Gowan, who after 40 years experience as one of our most prominent judges, said that he would very gladly support my motion. He was formerly opposed to the change, but experience had taught him that it was a very desirable one, and he was to have supported me as seconder of this motion had he been present to-day. I attach more value to his views than to those of any one else, because his long experience really gives him a means of forming a judgment that none of us possess, he has had so much to do in adjudicating against offences of this nature. I do not think it is necessary to enter into any argument, because the amendment is a simple one, and it is merely a question whether it should be accepted or not. I do not propose, therefore, to go into any detailed statements by which time would be consumed but simply move that 18 be substituted for 16 in the 181st clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I must confess to a very emphatic feeling of opposition to any amendment of the criminal law where there is not satisfactory evidence before us that, in the interest of the public, such amendments are necessary. The tendency of the present day runs too far in the direction of amending the law from year to year at the instance of various philanthrophic organizations which meet, and without any practical knowledge of the subject with which they undertake to deal, pass a series of resolutions, attacking the morals of the community and suggesting to Parliament radical legislation for the reformation of the public generally. I undertake to say that those amendments are largely proposed at the instance of organizations simply through capriciousness—simply through a sense of busying themselves in respect of public matters regarding which they know very little. I have been engaged for some years in the active practice of law, and I must confess I have never yet seen any abuse of the law as it at present stands upon the statute-book in this regard. I took occasion to ask the Minister of Justice a few days ago if any of such cases had come under his observation, since he has filled his present position, and he could not give me any information of any such cases or abuses. It seems to me, and I say it with a degree of confidence, that if there had been any cases of this nature, such publicity and notoriety would have been given to them as to have directed the attention of the press and of the public to there being necessity for this legislation, but the evidence before us is quite the contrary, and establishes that the law goes sufficiently far to protect young girls. I would have fancied that my hon. friend from Sarnia (Mr. Vidal), who has moved this amendment, and who I know has the good of the public always at heart, would have advanced cases, if he had been in a position to do so, which would warrant us in making the proposed departure. The law as it at present stands, protects girls of previously chaste character up to the age of sixteen. What is now proposed to be done under the bill—I do not refer to the amendment of the hon. member from Sarnia—is to raise the age of consent from fourteen to sixteen. My hon. friend seeks to remove much of the objection by saying that the punishment which we are about to attach to a violation of the law will be only imprisonment for two years. You might as well send a man to penitentiary for five years, almost, as for two years. It is no very great comfort to the man who may find himself convicted on a charge of violating the provisions of this clause, that the punishment for the offence is limited to two years, yet that is what we propose to do. Now we propose to raise the age of consent from fourteen to sixteen.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am now dealing with the bill. The hon. gentleman will not confuse the bill as it is introduced, which is a radical departure from the law as it at present stands, with the amendment of my hon. friend from Sarnia, which proposes to raise it still higher.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The age of consent now is sixteen, and has been for some years. There has been no change.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The law, as it at present stands, makes it an indictable offence for a man to have connection with a girl of or above the age of 14 and under the age of 16, of previously chaste character. That is the law at present, and my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, proposes to strike out the words "of previously chaste character," which would have the effect of raising the age of consent from 14 to 16. It therefore is immaterial whether the girl of 16 is notoriously unchaste or not. No matter how immoral she may be, any one having immoral connection with her becomes subject to the penalty attached to the bill now before us, namely, two years' imprisonment. Hon. gentlemen will take into consideration that a very large proportion of marriages that take place, particularly in the province of Quebec, and sometimes in the other provinces, are those of girls under the age of 16, and when you take into consideration the number of girls that are upon the street, under that age, of immoral character and the number of women in brothels under that age, and attach a penalty of two years in the penitentiary to any man having illicit connection with such persons, you will readily understand the jeopardy in which the community is to be placed, so far as its liberty is concerned. You will readily appreciate the open door for blackmail——

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes; by that class of people with regard to whom the accused man may not at all be guilty, but simply a scapegoat for the sins of other men who may not be good in a court of law for damages, if damages are claimed against them, and who may not be able to satisfy the demands which may be made upon them by way of blackmail on account of the alleged offence. Now, it seems to me—and I say it advisedly—that if there is anything which would place a premium upon blackmail, it is to pass this legislation. But when you come to increase it, in effect, from 16 to 18, then you go immediately into the adult world of females, and you create an offence which I am bound to say, in this country, would have startling results in the way of forced marriages or blackmail. Unless the hon. gentleman places before this House statistics, of which he should be the custodian from the position he occupies, that the Code, as it at present stands upon the statute-book, is not sufficient protection for the morals of the community, then I think we should permit the law to stand as it is. We should in no wise amend it until it is shown to us conclusively, by figures and by facts, that it is not sufficient to protect that class of people.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—While I cannot go so far as to support the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Sarnia to extend the age of consent to eighteen years, I am strongly in favour of the amendment as proposed in the bill before the committee, and I think the object of our legislation should be to protect childhood and up to sixteen. I have no doubt whatever that we would be doing right to make this an indictable offence. I think the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) is drawing too strong a case altogether, because the offence must be seduction. There must be an act of seduction, and the cases that he refers to would not be seduction at all, and would not come under the operation of this bill. I think we should give absolute protection up to 16 years, but I would not agree to extend it to 18 years. There is a great deal in the view that, by inserting these words "of previously chaste character," you throw out an inducement to immoral men, who may have seduced girls of this kind to trump up charges against their character, and probably those who would be bad enough to have illicit connection with children, would also be quite bad enough to trump up charges of previous immorality against them to get out of the clutches of the law. I will support the bill as it stands, but I could not extend the age of consent to 18 years.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I suggest that we dispose of the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Sarnia before we go further.

The question of concurrence being put, the amendment was declared lost.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the clause before the House, I think it must be borne in mind that this House, in 1897, after very serious and prolonged discussion, decided to pass this enactment in the shape in which it is. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson). The policy of the law is to protect a girl of immature years, until she is old enough to take care of herself. We have protected a girl up to fourteen, under severe penalties, and the present law protects, to a certain extent, a girl between fourteen and sixteen. Practically, the enactment as it stands now puts upon the girl the onus of showing that she was of previously chaste character, and I think that that is a highly objectionable requirement. It seems to me that in these cases we cannot go very far astray—at least we cannot go too far astray—we are not doing anything extreme—if we follow the example of the mother country. This subject has been dealt with there, and every hon. gentleman knows that they are not disposed to go to extremes in the matter of rendering men liable, or treating them as criminals for offences of this kind. The English enactment is as follows:—

> Any person who unlawfully and carnally knows, or attempts to have unlawful or carnal knowledge of any girl, being of or above the age of thirteen, and under the age of sixteen years, &c.

It seems to me that this is the law we should have here.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What is the punishment?

Hon. Mr. POWER—He is liable, at the discretion of the court, to two years with or without hard labour. What we ought to do is to take the English enactment and protect children when they are too young to protect themselves. This requirement, that she shall be of previously chaste character, really removes the greater part of the protection from the girl. Supposing a child has, at some previous time, been led astray, that should be no defence to the man who later on, perhaps, when she is trying to get back to virtue and may perhaps for six months or a year have been conducting herself properly, seduces her. It should be no defence to that man that, at some previous time, this child, perhaps before she was fourteen years of age, had been led astray, and I think we had better adopt the English Act here. The language of this bill, and the language of the bill which passed this House before, is objectionable in this respect, that it practically, as the Minister of Justice intimated—although it does not expressly say so—requires that the girl should have been of previously chaste character. It practically requires that, because it provides that the man must seduce the girl to incur the penalty. Of course, if a girl had been previously seduced, it cannot be that this man has seduced her. Can you seduce a girl over and over again? I think that this section goes too far, and I move that section 181 be striken out and the following substituted:—

> Unlawfully and carnally knows, or attempts to have unlawful and carnal knowledge of any girl, being of or above the age of 14 and under the age of 16.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Supposing she was a prostitute, would you protect her?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That amendment is more strict than the bill now before us.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes. I adopt the English law. I think it is a safe thing to go by.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I sent this bill to a lawyer who has had a great deal of experience, and he has placed this memo. on it:

> If you had seen, as I have more than once, the wives of respectable successful farmers suffer over charges of this kind which ultimately proved to be utterly unfounded, you would understand why I advocate protection for both sides.

He has had a great deal of experience, and I find that when this question was discussed before, I quoted from an opinion which I received from a judge of the land to this effect:

> A girl of 16 ought to know enough to take care of herself.

I do not exactly agree in the first sentence, but I agree in the next:

> There is too much opportunity given to abandoned women to levy blackmail. Women of unchaste character will generally swear to anything. Such is my experience.

That is the opinion of a judge of the country, which I quoted at the time the former bill was before us—a judge who had a great deal of experience—and I find that it is fully concurred in by the memo. from the gentleman in Belleville who has had vast experience in criminal charges. What I fear most is the character of women alluded to by that judge, who care very little for an oath, and if there is an opportunity of fastening the crime upon the head of a respectable family, or in some cases, a young man in better circumstances than the one who actually committed the crime, they swear the illicit intercourse or the seduction upon him, and we should be very careful how far we place it in the power of women of that character to levy blackmail. We know from experience of cases that have come before the courts—and I have no doubt in the practice and reading of law the Minister of Justice has had cases under his observation—where attempts have been made to fasten that class of crime upon a man and thereby ruin the peace of his family.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The amendment of my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Power), to introduce the precise words of the English statute instead of the words that are here, goes very much further than this. It makes the offence as absolute in the case of girls between 14 and 16, as it is in the case of girls under 14 years. The only difference is in the degree of punishment attached to the Act. The section, as it stands, does not go so far because the offence is, to some extent, conditioned upon the conduct of the girl. You require seduction and illicit intercourse, both—"seduces and has illicit intercourse."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There could be no seduction without illicit intercourse.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Where there is seduction there is persuasion, and where a woman is not of previously chaste character and willingly consents to the act, there cannot be seduction, although there might be illicit intercourse. But there is a difference between the offence, as it is constituted under the section as it stands, and under the section as it will stand if the English law is substituted for the proposed amendment. I do not object to the English law; and I would say, with regard to the amendment which my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Vidal) proposed, that I do not object to fixing the age at 18, but I would not put in the same class the offence of seducing girls between 14 and 16 and that of seducing girls between 16 and 18. I think there is a greater chance of maturity of judgment in the latter case. Minds, perhaps, mature sooner here than in England.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And that is a fact that cannot be wholly lost sight of in legislating upon the subject of crime. I, of course, only wish to submit for the consideration of the House that which it is necessary to put upon the statute-book, and which meets with the support of general public opinion. Since this bill has been printed a deputation from Montreal has waited upon me, and I have had communications from other portions of the Dominion in which it is said that there are, in many of our large cities, persons who make it a habitual practice to undertake to seduce girls between 14 and 18 years of age. They wish to avoid the chances of serious disease, and therefore they seek to mislead those who were innocent before they came in contact with them. If that be so, of course it is a very serious offence, and especially serious in the case of girls who know little or nothing about the world, and who are exposed to the arts of designing men——

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—And women.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And women.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I think there are women, I have been told so at least, who make a practice of getting young girls into improper houses. This crime is not met by this bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is another clause further on dealing with that, and it is worthy, I think, of the serious attention of the committee, while this subject is under consideration, if it is disposed to adopt the English law instead of this section, making the offence absolute instead of the conditional offence, whether the House might not advantageously provide also in this section a less degree of punishment for the offence against girls between 16 and 18 years of age. At 18 they might very well rely on themselves, but I think we might go that far; we might provide that every one is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable, say, to one year's imprisonment, who seduces and has illicit connection with any girl of or above the age of 16 and under the age of 18, of a previously chaste character.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Introducing the English statute, as to the offence between 14 and 16.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What becomes of those under 14?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are absolutely protected. I would substitute the English section that my hon. friend has proposed for the protection of girls between 14 and 16, and as to those between 16 and 18 I would say:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who seduces and has illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character of or above the age of 16 and under the age of 18 years.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Then the previously chaste character only has reference to those between 16 and 18?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—All we desire to do is to pass such legislation as will protect this class of children. Has there come under my hon. friend's observation any abuse of the law as it at present stands? If there is no abuse of the present law, surely we should not amend it. The law is designed to protect a tender class of the community, and surely if there are no abuses in that direction we should not go further.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have had no statistics upon the subject, but I have had deputations wait upon me who occupied my attention for about three hours in detailing cases.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Were they women?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, they were my hon. friend's own sex.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The criminal statistics of the Dominion are so prepared as to indicate the convictions for all classes of offence. There are two classes of offence, namely the class of offence against girls under 14, and against those between 14 and 16. If the criminal statistics do not indicate that there has been any violation or any abuse of public morals, why should we invade that protection which at the present time is afforded the public against blackmail?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The parties to whom I have spoken contend that the amendment which was made some years ago, by which that provisional protection was given up to 16, has been so beneficial that it has very greatly reduced the cases and we hear nothing about them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then why do you wish to amend it?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Because they say between 16 and 18 there are many cases that you hear nothing about, because the law does not recognize the offence after the age of 16, as a crime, and it is because of that we seek to extend the protection two years. I agree with what the minister says about the diminution of the penalty.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The matter before the committee now is this amendment to section 181. If the committee should adopt that amendment we could consider the further amendment proposed by the hon. Minister of Justice. I do not think that any one will accuse me of being very much affected by mawkish sentiment, but I do feel that children, up to the age of 16 at any rate, ought to be protected. After all, what is a girl 15 years of age? The idea of people talking about a young man being led from the path of virtue by a girl of 15, is, in 19 cases out of 20, absurd. What we want to do is to try and protect girls while they are unable to protect themselves. Some hon. gentleman made reference to young prostitutes. What we want to do is to prevent children from becoming prostitutes, and if it is made clear to a man who has any disposition to seduce a child that he will be very severely punished if he does seduce her you take the very best means of preventing the making of young prostitutes; and I cannot understand why we should here object to go as far as they have gone in England. There is no mawkish sentiment about English law. It has not been dictated by female organizations or by a desire to get votes. English legislators go on sound common sense and reason and they go no further than the case requires, and I really cannot see any objection whatever to our adopting here the English law and giving absolute protection to a child up to the age of 16. I think the idea of her consenting up to that age is not to be entertained. After that age it is different.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How does the proposed amendment affect a girl under 14?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is provided for in another part of the Code. Both of these might be merged in section 191.

Hon. Mr. POWER—One thing at a time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You propose to amend this section by striking out what is in it.

The committee divided on the amendment proposed by Hon. Mr. Power, which was carried on the following vote:

Contents 15; non-contents 12.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved, as subsection b:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who seduces and has illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character above the age of 16 years and under the age of 18.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That goes farther than the Charlton Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; not exactly.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hon. gentlemen will see that it is not the Charlton Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Is not one year a little too much punishment?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The judge can give one day if he chooses.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The objection that I have already expressed to the clause as it was originally proposed remains as strong as ever with the amendment. It is wrong to give this encouragement to men of loose character, who may seduce girls, to trump up charges against their previous character. A man who has committed such an offence, would not hesitate to assail the character of the girl he has ruined. I think it would be more protection to girls of 16 to 18 to leave the law as it stands. If you extend the age of consent to 18 and bring in this provision, I do not think you are doing them any very great service.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In my judgment you are passing most vicious legislation. You threaten the liberty of young men, against whom action designed to levy blackmail or a forced marriage may be brought by designing girls with whom they never had anything immoral to do. Now it is a well known fact that where girls of comparatively mature age, such as between 16 and 18, are seduced, it is utterly impossible to prove that they were of previously chaste character. You will have to consider this, that where you put a girl of that age into the witness box she will invariably swear to her chastity. I have scarcely ever seen an immoral woman put into a witness box who would not swear to her chastity. The men who are guilty of such conduct are generally irresponsible people, and a designing girl will swear her seduction upon somebody who will make a desirable match for her. Cases of that kind are constantly arising, in which a boy may be entirely innocent with regard to seducing a girl, but will make an excellent match, and the woman will swear her seduction on the boy or let him go to the penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not a penitentiary offence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What chance is there for a boy who has been a year in the penitentiary?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The judge may order only one day's imprisonment. One year is the limit.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I shall vote for the amendment, but I call the attention of the minister to this point, if after the seduction the man consents to marry the young girl, would the young man be sent to jail in that case?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is a defence, under the law as it stands.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—In my experience, the man is always the aggressor, and for that reason I think that the woman ought to be protected, but, while I admit that, I think the clause is a little strong. I certainly would not support it unless you add the words "of previously chaste character."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Those words are now in.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—When a girl comes to eighteen, she is a woman, and I venture to say that of the marriages that are taking place to-day in Canada, there are more perhaps at the age of eighteen and under than at the age of twenty-five. It is making the law a little too strong to go up to the marriagable age, and though the period is but short between sixteen and seventeen, I would rather say seventeen. I would rather protect them to the marriagable age and not go all the way to eighteen. That is a little too high.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In the case of the young woman it admits of charges being trumped up against her chastity, and there is temptation in the way of her seducer, to get himself out of a scrape in that way, while in the case of a young woman it throws the temptation in the opposite direction.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—But it acts as a deterrent after all. She will not be as likely to bring an action against a young man if she has to bring proof against a charge of previously unchaste character.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only protection a man has is the suggestion made by the hon. Minister of Justice. It is between 16 and 18 that seductions, as a rule, take place, and this would make it punishable though not to such an extent as the seduction of a girl under 16. I think it is a good amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In the case mentioned by my hon. friend opposite (Mr. De Boucherville) if the parties marry that is the end of the prosecution. In the case of persons between the ages of 16 and 18, the punishment is not confinement in the penitentiary, for no one is sent to the penitentiary for a less period than two years. While the judge cannot exceed one year, he can make the punishment for a shorter term. Representations made to me on the subject, point out that it is desirable there should be legislation of this sort. It acts as a deterrent.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—This law has been in force five or six years, and I do not know of any convictions under it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You cannot have a conviction under a provision that is not law. This is the first time this proposition has received any assent. I think it is a wise provision. It would be most undesirable to go to the extent of making it a penitentiary offence, because the effect in the United States—it is so represented to me by one of the ablest and most experienced judges of the supreme court of the United States—of making seduction a penitentiary offence and giving a party choice between marrying and being prosecuted, is that a marriage generally follows a threatened prosecution, and then the first aim of the party is, if he be a person of good social standing, to secure a dissolution of the marriage bonds. The effect of that has been to make provisions by law for divorce which have no existence in this country. I should be very sorry to see any provision in our penal law the effect of which would be to lead to forcible marriages, to be followed by an extension of the law relating to divorce. The statement made a few years ago by Chief Justice Campbell, of the State of Michigan, was that this had led to a greater number of divorce cases and a greater number of relaxations of the laws on the subject of marriage and divorce than all other causes put together. I should be very sorry to propose any penal legislation which would lead in that direction, and so I propose that the punishment shall be imprisonment for a period not exceeding a year.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I wish to point out the absence of human calculation when we compare human nature with what my hon. friend has said in the remarks just made. He says that by raising the age of consent to eighteen and attaching to it a small sentence—a year's imprisonment—it will operate as a deterrent and yet relieve the seducer from very serious consequences. Does any hon. gentleman believe for a moment that a man, about to commit such an offence stops to consider whether the punishment is one year or two years or five years? Does my hon. friend think any seducer reasons the matter out in that way? Decidedly not, and that is why I say that legislation of this kind is a curse. It does not protect the class of people you seek to protect. It simply affords machinery for blackmailing those who are innocent of the crime. You propose to raise the age of consent to eighteen. That is what it amounts to and you qualify it in this way; the female from sixteen must be of previously chaste character. As I said before, the onus would fall upon the accused to prove that the female was not. How is he going to prove that she is of unchaste character? If she is put in the witness box, the experience of all lawyers is that a woman will invariably swear to her chastity no matter how immoral she may be, and it seems to me you surround a woman of eighteen, having a knowledge of the world, being as designing as any man in his twenties or thirties, with a protection of such a character that it will be impossible for a man to maintain his liberty in court as against a designing female. The other amendment was certainly vicious, but this one is surprisingly so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend asks whether any man stops to consider, when he is on the verge of committing the act. I suppose not, but he stops before he reaches that point.

The committee divided on the amendment, which was adopted on the following division:

Contents, 18; non-contents, 12.

On clause 183, which is as follows:—

183. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment—

(a.) Who, being a guardian, seduces or has illicit connection with his ward; or—

(b.) Who seduces or has illicit connection with any woman or girl of previously chaste character and under the age of twenty-one years who is in his employment in a factory, mill, workshop, [shop or store, or as a domestic servant,] or who, being in a common employment with him in such factory, mill, workshop, [shop or store, or as a domestic servant,] is, in respect of her employment or work in such factory, mill, workshop, [shop or store, or as a domestic servant,] under or in any way subject to his control or direction, [or receives her wages or salary directly or indirectly from him.]

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said: The second subsection is objectionable. I see no reason why an employee in a shop or store should not be protected as well as others, but it is a different matter with domestic servants, and I move that the words "domestic servants" be struck out.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I have seen in a newspaper published in the United States that a Sunday school teacher has been seduced by a Sunday school superintendent. Since we are including so many classes of females, we might as well extend the protection of the law to Sunday school teachers. A superintendent of a Sunday school has great influence over a teacher.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause was considered at great length in 1897. The committee of that day thought that a proprietor of a shop or store would be rendered very liable to blackmail if a girl in his employ was allowed to come under the Act—that, practically, she was in very nearly the same position as a domestic servant, and I do not see why we should not leave the law in this particular as it now stands.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think shop or store should be included. There are many such establishments where a score or more of girls are employed, but I quite admit that a domestic servant stands in a different position, and I did not intend that a domestic servant should be included in the bill.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Should you not include the typewriter too?

The clause was amended by striking out the words "or as a domestic servant."

Hon. Mr. POWER—In a shop or store there may be only one or two girls employed, and I do not see why a domestic servant should be in a different position from a girl in a store.

The subsection as amended was adopted.

On section 186*a*.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How are you going to punish a society for seduction.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You cannot punish the society, but you can punish the officers of it. The case intended to be met in this: here is a society that has certain persons acting as its officers. Such a society, or person, so acting, is to be treated as a guardian, and therefore all the penalties that the law attaches to a guardian for a violation towards a child of the duties of guardianship in respect to the provisions of this law would apply to that society.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—A society is only a legal fiction, and you cannot reach a fiction or an impersonal entity.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We want to reach the person who represents that society, and we want to impress upon them, by virtue of the powers that are conferred upon the societies, the fact of guardianship.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Would it apply to every member of the society?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It would apply to any member of the society who would become an instrument in the ruin of the child. I quite admit the difficulty, and I propose to allow this clause and the one following it to stand for further consideration.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That was in the bill of 1897 and was passed by this House. I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that there is no reason at all, why the society should not be liable under the provisions of clause 186.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 186*b*.

[186*b*. In order to prove the age of a girl or child for the purposes of sections 183, 186, 210, 282, 283 and 284, the following shall be sufficient prima facie evidence:—

(a.) Any entry or record by an incorporated society or its officers having had the control or care of the girl at or about the time of the girl being brought to Canada, if such entry or record has been made before the alleged offence was committed.

(b.) In the absence of other evidence, or by way of corroboration of other evidence, the judge or jury before whom an indictment for the offence is tried, or the justice before whom a preliminary inquiry thereinto is held, may infer the age from the appearance of the girl.]

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I think, before attempting to prove a charge of that kind, they should first ascertain for a certainty the age of the child.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You cannot do so in the case of a child coming from England.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It may be difficult 'out the punishment is very severe, and before punishing a young man you should be in a position to prove the age of a girl to a certainty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think subsection b should be struck out.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I saw a young lady to-day only 14 years of age who looked like one of 18, and I saw one who did not look more than 16 who was 22. You leave too much to the discretion of the judge.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I discussed this matter a good deal with the officers of the department, and I had some doubt with regard to subsection b, but I will let the whole section stand for further consideration.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think subsection a is objectionable.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see the entry must have been made before any offence was committed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—More care should be taken to prove the age in this case than in a civil case. In a case where the accused is on his trial and may be sent to the penitentiary for many years, surely you should require as strong evidence as in a civil case. I would point out the infirmity of this particular case is this, you leave it in the hands of men—those who act as guardians, who receive a small salary per month to act as secretary for some of those philanthropic societies. They are instructed that they must give the girl the benefit of any doubt that may arise as to her age, and knowing the law which protects those children, it would be the most natural thing in the world to put the ages of those children lower than they would be justified in doing. We know the philanthropic bodies would say to those so-called guardians, "You must give the child the benefit of any doubt as to her age." Under the present law of evidence, no such evidence in a civil or criminal case would be admissible.

The clause was allowed to stand.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the bill and asked leave to sit again.

CANADA ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved the second reading of Bill (F) "An Act respecting the Canada Accident Insurance Company." He said:—This is a bill from the House of Commons and a very short one. The principal enactment seems to be a clause striking out a provision for two vice-presidents, and providing only for one; to make Montreal headquarters of the company instead of Toronto, and to give them power to insure employers against claims for damages by workmen and employees.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a second time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (64) "An Act respecting the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlebois Railway Company, and to change its name to the Quebec Railway Light and Power Company."—(Mr. Bolduc.)

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 21st June, 1899.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

EXPERIMENTS IN FRUIT CULTURE IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid on the Table of the Senate, copies of all correspondence between the Department of Agriculture, the Prince Edward Island Fruit Growers' Association and the Provincial Premier, Hon. Mr. Farquharson, with reference to experiments in fruit culture now being carried on in Prince Edward Island; said correspondence to include all instructions to Mr. Kinsman with reference to the nature of the work to be undertaken and the selection of orchards for the purpose of carrying on said experiments.

The motion was agreed to.

SAWDUST IN THE OTTAWA RIVER.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman for Rideau Division, the hon. minister of sawdust, if he has seen the Ottawa River lately. I never saw it covered with sawdust as it is now. The sawdust extends right up to the mouth of the canal. It is a disgrace and should be stopped. I hope the hon. gentleman, who has taken a lively interest in this matter hitherto, will not let it drop now.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not see what I can do. The Act is passed and has become law, and it must be the duty of some one to enforce it. I have done my duty in the matter. I have brought up the question frequently for the last nine or ten years and succeeded in getting the law enacted, and I call upon the government to enforce it. I presume it is their duty. I do not know that anybody else can interfere with it. They are responsible for the good government of the country, and they certainly should take some means to stop this nuisance. I am glad the hon. gentleman from British Columbia has brought the matter before the Senate. I thought from day to day that some measure would be taken by the government to prevent the continuance of this horrible nuisance. I believe it is as bad as it ever was. Some remedy should be applied immediately. I do not desire to be a public informer, and do not ask any one else to place himself in that position, but some one should be responsible for this continued violation of an Act of Parliament.

BEDLINGTON AND NELSON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the third reading of Bill (107) "An Act respecting the Bedlington and Nelson Railway Company," as amended. He said:—The third reading of this bill was postponed on account of an Act of Parliament passed in British Columbia being attached to it. I have ascertained that this is the only Act in the statute-book of British Columbia which applies to this railway. Therefore, there can be no objection on that score. I received a note from Mr. Foster, who introduced the bill in the other House, approving of the provision incorporated in this Act in the bill as it has been passed. He said:

It has been brought to my notice that Senator Power had included in the bill granting the charter to the Bedlington and Nelson Railway Company a Dominion charter. I see no objection to this being done. I think it would very often be an improvement, as settling clearly in one document the powers held by the company. Especially is it so in this case, as this company is only applying for a charter because, the stocks being held in England, the stockholders have more confidence in a Dominion charter than a provincial charter.

Under these circumstances I do not think it objectionable. It will be of easy access to any one who wishes to consult it, and I think it is very desirable that it should be so. I know the other day I desired to find one of the old laws of the province of Canada of 1855-56, and I had the greatest trouble to obtain a copy of the statutes of that year. I sent to the Printing Bureau and they did not have it there. If that is the case with the laws of the old province of Canada, how much more would it be so in dealing with the Acts of a remote province like British Columbia, where the statutes are not distributed as freely as in Ontario. I cannot see what objection there can be to allowing this bill to pass as proposed by the Railway Committee the other day. I have no interest in the matter. I cannot see, for the life of me, what injury it does. On the contrary I think it will be a benefit to all men unacquainted with the law. If they want to refer to this bill they can readily ascertain the facts. I do not see why an objection should be raised because it is an innovation. I hope all our innovations will be in the same direction.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman from Rideau Division is not to blame in the matter, if blame is attachable to anybody. When the bill was up for second reading, an hon. gentleman expressed a doubt as to the wisdom of cumbering our statutes by introducing provincial Acts. I have no strong feeling myself either way, but I had given notice of a motion that the bill be referred back to committee. If the House wishes to keep the provincial statute in the bill they can do so. I now move :

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the House for the reconsideration of the amendment by the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to the said bill, and concurred in by this House on the 15th June.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not object to the bill that is being considered, but it was distinctly understood, when we adjourned last night, that the first order of the day was to be the continuation of the consideration of the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend stated that, but I did not state it, nor did I assent to that proposition, because my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Scott) and I were discussing that matter, and we thought we would decide after we came. I have a good many suggestions in my hand here, but have not been able to go over them all, and I would like to do so before going into committee on the Criminal Code again. We have a number of bills that we may bring up. My hon. friend (Mr. Scott) proposes to go on with the Drummond County Railway Bill, if there is no objection, and after that I thought I would take up the Loan Company's Bill, which I thought was one that the House would be prepared to consider.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I certainly did make the suggestion last night to take up the Criminal Code Amendment Bill to-day as the first order, and I understood, from the nod of the hon. gentleman's head, that he approved of that suggestion. I may have been in error. I was under the impression that a formal motion was made that the Criminal Code Bill was to be the first order of the day, hence I decidedly object to going on with the Drummond County Railway Bill to-day. I am not in a position to deal with the question, being satisfied that we were going on with the Criminal Code this afternoon. Such a misunderstanding can easily arise from the loose manner in which we are drifting in the conduct of our business. If we were to put our motions in writing so that the Speaker would know exactly what we intend, the clerk would be in a position to make the record so that it would be intelligible to us, and we would not get into such difficulties. I regret that I misunderstood the hon. gentleman, but, for the reasons I have given, I am not in a position to proceed with the discussion of the Drummond County Railway Bill to-day. I know the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Power), in conversation with me not an hour ago, was under the same impression, because he came to my room and called my attention to the order of the day, and I said that is clearly an error. Probably the clerk did not hear it.

The amendment was declared lost.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (68) "An Act respecting the London Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Canada." —(Mr. Allan.)

Bill (51) "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Inland Transportation Compny." —(Mr. Casgrain.)

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called :—

Second reading Bill (2) "An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, so as to make more effectual provision for the punishment of seduction and abduction."

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said :—Although I am in a measure satisfied with the progress which has been made in the direction which I have been advocating, I feel that it is my duty to keep the bill alive and wait and see whether the action we took yesterday meets full conformation in the passage of the bill. I therefore move that the order of the day be discharged and that the bill be placed on the orders for the second reading on Wednesday, the 28th instant.

The motion was agreed to, and the order was discharged.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called :—

Second reading Bill (133) "An Act to authorize the acquisition by the Dominion of the Drummond County Railway."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said :—I would ask the Minister of Justice what he proposes to do with this bill under the circumstances? I might point out, also, there is other information which should be laid before the Senate before we proceed with this measure, more particularly the information which I ask for in the motion of which I have given notice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That relates to the next bill does it not?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It may relate to the next bill, but in discussing this question I think the Minister will readily admit that we cannot very well deal with the one without at the same time discussing the two, and in the discussion before the Senate upon this question, the one being a corollary of the other, it would follow, as a matter of course, in discussing the acquisition of the Drummond County Railway you have to discuss the agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, because the House, I take it for granted, would not confirm one proposition and reject the other; so that I think hon. gentlemen will see at once that we cannot very well deal with this one question alone. Therefore, I ask the hon. minister to delay the measure for two or three days until he ascertains if we can get this information.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What information?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The information called for by the motion of which I have given notice to-day, all supplemental arrangements between the Railway Department and the Grand Trunk Railway Company regulating traffic. I understand there have been supplemental arrangements. If so the House should be in possession of the details. The agreement itself declares that the traffic arrangements have been entered into, and they will be confirmed by the adoption of the bill by the House. In the first place, we do not know what they are. We presume they are the ordinary arrangements. If it be true that other arrangements have been entered into, since the first traffic arrangement, we should be in possession of them, because they may affect materially our action in this House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman is entitled to every information that can be given on the subject by the Railway Department. Of course, I cannot say what further information there may be, in addition to what has been brought down, but I shall make immediate inquiry, and all the information which the House or any member of the House requires should be before us. In that event I suppose my hon. colleague will not proceed with the bill until the information is brought down.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend will also remember that I called his attention to the insufficiency of the answer to an inquiry of mine, and he promised me that he would look into that and the information would be supplied.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I spoke to the Minister of Railways with regard to what my hon. friend said, and I think his answer was that the $43,000 was all paid by the government—that the various items there given were sums which the government had paid, and that the whole sum was something over $400,000, of which $43,000 was the government portion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My complaint was that it did not set forth what percentage of the whole this represented. I want to find out how that is ascertained.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If I give the hon. gentleman the whole sum, the percentage will be obvious, not the percentage in detail, but the percentage collectively of the amount already submitted to the hon. gentleman. There was $43,000, if I remember rightly, and the details show for what purposes that was given. I do not know whether my hon. friend wants a corresponding detail showing the use made by the company of their portion or not, but I would say to my hon. friend that I understand from the Minister of Railways that that $43,000 was the government portion of something over $400,000 of the total cost.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What I want to know is what is the proportion, on what percentage? If it is $43,000 out of $400,000 odd, it would be somewhere about 10 per cent. That is what I want.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no desire to press the bill on unless the hon. gentlemen are prepared to take it up, and I am prepared to consult the convenience of the House as to when they would be ready to consider the subject. I should like to ask the hon. leader of the opposition whether he has examined the schedule of the Grand Trunk bill. It probably gives the information that he wants.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have read it very carefully. The provision in the bill reads as follows:—

> In consideration of the rents and covenants herein reserved and contained, Her Majesty represented by the General Traffic Manager of the Intercolonial Railway of the one part and the company by its General Traffic Manager of the other part, have entered into a mutual traffic arrangement in writing of even date herewith, which traffic arrangement is hereby declared, covenanted and agreed to be and form a part of and be supplemental to this contract, and shall be read herewith and shall be binding upon all parties hereto during the continuance of this leasing contract, except so far as the same may be altered with the mutual consent of Her Majesty and the company. When and if the tariff arrangement shall be so altered from time to time such amended supplemental contract shall be substituted for the supplemental traffic contract of this date.

What I want to know is, has any supplemental arrangement or contract been entered into at the date, or since the date, of this agreement? This agreement binds us to a contract of even date with this contract, and if that is not too long, we ought to have it. But what I have moved for is, any supplemental arrangements which have been made. There may not have been any made, and if that is the case, all the minister would have to do would be to say that there is none. Again, in this agreement, it declares that we are affirming a map showing the route and its entrance into Montreal, and it purports to be marked in red. There is nothing of that kind attached to this schedule.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would just add to what my hon. friend has said that this contract refers to a supplemental contract of even date with the main contract. We have not got that. I have never seen it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Nor I either.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is very important that we should have it, as well as any supplemental ones, which have been made since.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suppose any information they have in the Railway Department can be got in twenty-four hours. They must have copies of any agreements they have made. Perhaps we could proceed with the bill on Friday or Monday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Monday would give plenty of time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then I move that the order of the day be discharged, and placed on the orders of the day for Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

LOAN COMPANIES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (P) "An Act respecting Loan Companies."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 9.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Does this section mean that the name of the company may be altered without the request of the party?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Very often names are asked for which are similar to names given to other corporations, and the Governor in Council has power to change the name at any time.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 14.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Does not the amount of deposit depend on the total capital they intend to employ? This section seems to imply that whatever the capital might be they would have to subscribe $100,000.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. It is not considered that a loan company would be safe to undertake business with a smaller paid-up capital.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Supposing the capital is $20,000,000, would $100,000 be considered sufficient for them to subscribe?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It may be provided for somewhere else, I do not know.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What do the government intend doing with the $50,000? Do they intend keeping it on deposit, the same as in the case of insurance companies?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do the government intend allowing interest to the company or do they intend to repay it, or what disposition is to be made of it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Companies Act would apply to these companies, and a loan company would be subject to the general provisions of the Companies Act, and they should not commence business unless they had 50 per cent of the capital stock subscribed and 10 per cent paid up, and that 10 per cent must be $50,000, under this provision.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But you require to deposit this with the Minister of Finance and the Receiver General.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the rule with all companies. All companies obtaining charters from the Dominion must make their deposit with the Receiver General.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This seems to be a substantive provision and contemplates no repayment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, yes. A company incorporated under this Act also comes under chapter 118, in so far as the terms of that Act are applicable.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That particular clause to which the hon. Secretary of State refers relates to the disposition which shall be made of the $50,000. Then if you pass a substantive clause providing for the payment to the Receiver General, without making any provision for its repayment, it seems to me it must remain there.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We passed a bill last year providing that it should remain with the Receiver General until the company was organized, and then it goes back to the company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But is there such a provision in this Act?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is law already. My hon. friend will see it is not necessary to re-enact what is already provided for.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If you pass a substantive clause and say positively that a certain thing shall be done, without in any way making reference to some general Act, then it seems to me it must be treated as a substantive provision, and in no way contingent upon the operation of some other Act, or, in other words, it is repugnant to the terms of the general Act, because it expressly provides that a specific sum shall be paid in to the credit of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General of Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should suggest that even though, on careful consideration, a lawyer might come to the conclusion which the minister mentioned, in order to prevent any doubt some words might be inserted that this $50,000 is to be paid in for the purposes mentioned in section so and so of the Companies Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is a matter that the lawyers will have to discuss. But the second clause provides that the Companies Act shall apply when not inconsistent with this Act. Then this Act provides that you must have $100,000 subscribed and $50,000 paid to the Receiver General. That is a positive declaration. Would that be inconsistent with the provision of the Consolidated Companies Act, that after you have deposited this money they shall pay it back after the organization?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me the keen appreciation always shown by the Auditor General in reference to the payment out of any money which may be put to the credit of the government would assert itself very strongly on this occasion, and a company coming under this Act would find great difficulty in inducing the powers that be to part with that $50,000. In fact, it might be very well urged that it was intended that that deposit might remain with the government in the case of insurance and other companies. I see now that it is explained in clause 17, but it just bears out my contention that such a provision should be inserted in the bill.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 20.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I propose an amendment to clause 20 so as to bring it in line with other Acts. I propose to strike out the proviso and to add:

Provided that any company may take personal security as collateral for any advance made or to be made or debt due such company.

That power is given other companies. We have it provided in all companies recently incorporated that the company shall not invest or lend money on the stocks of any other companies. Experience has shown that companies have sometimes purchased the stock of other companies with the view of embarrassing them, and as they might seriously affect the value of the stock and interests of depositors and others besides the shareholders of the company, we thought it safer, not to tempt loan companies in this way by giving power to invest in the stocks of other companies. We give them power to take collateral security of that kind.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Have they not that power now?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, at least there is some doubt about it. There was a decision on the point some years ago, in the case of Lewis and the Canada Permanent.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does the minister propose to strike out the present clause?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do you propose to in any way place a limitation upon the amount of collateral security which they shall take, or in what way are you able to satisfy yourself that the companies are really not effecting the loan upon the personal security, that is, the collateral security? It seems to me the company desirous of loaning money upon personal security, and knowing that they have the power to take collateral security, might take a very inferior class of realty for the purpose of obtaining the collateral security. That is, the collateral security might be the paramount security that they had in view at the time of negotiating the transaction. It seems to me there should be some limitation in that direction.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That power has already been given to companies, and you are obliged to leave that question to the judgment of the directors and those managing the company. They are the parties who have the greatest possible interest in doing business safely, and I do not very well see how you could undertake to restrict them. If they take altogether inadequate security, it might be regarded as a fraudulent proceeding.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not objecting to the principle of it, but it is equivalent to giving companies power to loan on personal security. The collateral security may be very much more valuable than the realty. However, the policy may not be an objectionable one.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman will see that it was done last year in the bill which was carried through this House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the provision is a good one. I was under the impression before that they had the power to take collateral.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It simply removes the doubt.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know one small company in which I have a little interest that constantly takes collaterals, but it is not done in the way the hon. gentleman from Calgary says. It is when a man defaults in the payment of interest, then we ask him to give us collateral security for the payment of that interest. I am very glad the amendment is being made.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It has been done in the past by some companies, but I think it is very desirable to remove the doubt. It is not at all likely that the personal security will become the principal security for the loan.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We carried through a bill, after a good deal of consideration, last year in which we expressly settled this question on the lines that I propose to embrace in this bill. I would ask the committee to let the clause stand for the present.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 21.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has not the suggestion been made by a loan company to the hon. gentleman that one company should not invest in the stock of another company? It might lead to a wealthy corporation ruining a weaker company.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Nearly all the companies are asking for this power, but I discussed the matter with the Deputy Minister of Finance, and Mr. Fitzgerald, who may be regarded as a specialist in this matter, and we came to the conclusion that the provision was a very wise one. In the bill to incorporate the Canada Permanent Loan and Mortgage Corporation there is the same proviso, that the company shall not invest in or lend money on the security of stocks of any other loan company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the law now.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The law does not go so far now as clause 20 goes. Under the existing law a company could loan on the stock of another company, but could not purchase.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Does not clause 21 confer too large powers on a company? Supposing the whole capital stock of the company is paid up, say $100,000, they may borrow $400,000 on that. Have the public sufficient security for the money the company may borrow? I cannot see that they would have sufficient security. Shareholders and banks are liable generally to double the amount which they have paid in. Under this clause it appears to me this corporation has the right to borrow up to four times the amount of its capital stock.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They borrow, of course, on securities. There would be the $400,000 securities, and this $100,000 paid-up stock would be a sum in addition to that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The security to the bondholders who had loaned their money would be the fact that that money had been loaned upon mortgaged property, and that the mortgage security would be the security to the parties who loaned the money. That is the only security they would have. If you go into the money market to-day, your stock may be but $100,000, you may however, have $400,000 in mortgage securities. The $400,000 would be composed of the amount of paid-up stock, the deposits paid in the company, and the reserve you might have, and the parties loaning the money would take good care to ascertain what security they had before purchasing the debentures.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I propose to offer an amendment to provide that under certain circumstances a company may pass a by-law authorizing the directors of the company to extend the business of the company beyond the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—This is giving companies the same power that insurance companies have taken during the last two years of doing business outside of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Wherein does my hon. friend consider it a wise policy to permit Canadian companies to do business in a foreign country where it is utterly impossible for the machinery of our Act to exercise any inspection of the business of the company? For instance, under the machinery of this bill you have the power to inspect the securities of the company at any time, but if that company is doing a foreign business, how do you expect to exercise any jurisdiction or control, or satisfy yourself that the business is of a safe character?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There has been a plethora of money in Canada during the last two years, and they seek investments outside. The banks and insurance companies do business outside of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am referring to the general policy of the government in permitting financial corporations of this country to do business in foreign countries. It seems to me it is of a very speculative character.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Our banks have been doing it for the last quarter of a century.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend knows that, as far as banks are concerned, we have just carried a bill authorizing them to do business outside of Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In British colonies. That is a different thing.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If you trust the loan companies in the management of their affairs, it is a question whether you cannot safely trust them to do business abroad. I assume that the stockholders of the company will exercise careful supervision over their own officers, and see that no by-law is passed permitting such business to be done abroad, if they disapprove of it. But if it is felt undesirable, looking at the condition of these companies, and the difficulty they sometimes find in making investments in this country, to give them this power I shall not press it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me the very fact of giving the power to divert money which presumably should be invested in Canadian channels into a foreign country, is going to create the evil of money being scarce and high within the Dominion of Canada. The object, of course, is to get cheap money, but if you are going to permit companies to conduct operations in a foreign country for the sake of getting very high interest, you place a premium, so to speak, upon a speculative class of business, which will certainly cause a stringency in the home market for that same money which it was intended should be invested in Canadian channels.

Hon Mr. POWER—As the Minister of Justice does not feel strongly on this clause perhaps he will allow it to stand?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I confess I do not quite like the provisions of this clause, more upon the ground that it is more difficult for a company to manage safely investments outside of the Dominion than investments within our own territory. I would not say very much against it, because I believe the Minister of Justice has conferred with a number of gentlemen who are thoroughly acquainted with this business, and are best qualified to say what is best. If companies are allowed by this clause to do this, I doubt if they will invest so largely abroad as to raise the rate of interest in Canada.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—The trouble that the hon. gentleman for Calgary was speaking of, that it would be impossible to inspect the companies or their business if they were allowed to invest in foreign countries, does present itself. Insurance companies and the insurance department find no trouble of that kind. They inspect our offices just the same, and we are investing in foreign countries all the time and doing business everywhere. If you restrict the loan companies you will restrict the insurance companies, and if you restrict our insurance companies too much you simply do the Canadian companies an injury and help the foreign companies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And you make higher premiums in Canada.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Exactly, because these companies have the opportunity of doing business against us here, and in many cases we can do business against them satisfactorily and successfully abroad. I know that one company with which I am connected has been doing a satisfactory business abroad, fighting such companies as the New York Life, and the Mutual Life, two of the greatest companies in the world, I believe. I do not think there is any more trouble to be anticipated with loan companies than there is with insurance companies, and before you place restrictions on these investments you should carefully consider the effect of it. I know it looks as if a company had no right to invest in foreign countries, because it tends to make money scarce at home, but money goes back and forth like any other commodity, and in the course of time the money that is invested abroad comes back again into the country. From an experience of long standing, I do not approve of placing such restrictions on business between two countries so closely allied.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I notice that in some of the provincial Acts of incorporation, they have conferred upon loan companies the right to invest money abroad. Of course that is all we can do. We can clothe a loan company with the capacity to do so, and once we create an artificial person and clothe him with the capacity to do business abroad, he has a legal right to do so, so far as the country of his origin is concerned.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only danger would be in the action of an unscrupulous lot of directors who could give them power to loan in compliance with the laws of a foreign jurisdiction. That would mean, I suppose, that if the law in the state of New York allowed loan companies to invest their money in securities that we would not accept in this country, they would have the power to do so, but that would have to be left to the discretion of the directors. I am informed that it is only legalizing what really has been done by many companies in Canada already.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Most of the large insurance companies, now, and for some time past, have been carrying on a large business in the United States. They are obliged by the laws of the United States to make deposits there, and having made those deposits they are allowed to do business. In the present state of the money market it would be almost impossible for them to put their money out if they did not have such power.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That provision with respect to foreign business is in compliance with the international law that a company can only do business abroad by courtesy and not by right, and so whatever restrictions the foreign country may think fit to impose, the corporation must conform to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not oppose the clause. I threw out the suggestion more to have a discussion on it.

The clause was allowed to stand.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I wish to go back to section 20, and propose as section 20*b*, the following amendment :—

A company may lend upon its own capital to an amount not exceeding in the aggregate of all such loans 10 per cent of the company's paid up permanent stock, but no such loan shall exceed 80 per cent of the market price then actually offered for the stock, and no loan company whatever shall, after the passing of this Act, except as in this section provided, make any loan or advance upon the security of any permanent share or shares of permanent stock of the company whatever with or without collateral security; provided, however, that any such loan company may pass a by-law prohibiting absolutely the loaning to shareholders upon the security of their stock, or subject to the limitations contained in this subsection, a by-law limiting the aggregate amount which may be loaned on such stock, and it shall not be lawful for any company to repeal either of such by-laws until the liabilities of the company are discharged.

That is taken from an existing law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—One of the loan companies has that already.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. It was included in a bill of last year.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 22.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The statement was made to me by several managers that in times of stringency they found it easier to dispose of mortgages on real estate than to dispose of what are called liquid securities—that more than 20 per cent would be embarrassing to a company in Toronto and Montreal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Some companies deal only in real estate, and not liquid securities.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They cannot get them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In order to avail themselves of the provisions of this law, the smaller companies would have to invest at least 20 per cent in these liquid securities?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I have been requested to call the attention of the company to what has been considered the objectionable character of this clause, but it has been very largely relieved of its objectionable character by the modification which is now proposed, reducing the amount from 50 to 20. It is thought by some companies that it should be reduced to 15, but I suppose 20 is considered a fair compromise. Therefore, I suppose it is not unreasonable that it should be left at 20.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would you regard collateral securities as liquid securities within the meaning of the Act?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose that would depend a good deal on their character.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They are taken as collateral to real estate security.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That would be personal security.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think collateral personal security, the class of security covered by section 23, would not be available for the purpose of meeting those deposits in case a difficulty were to arise or a demand made by the depositors. I think you should go further and exclude any collateral security of a personal nature taken as collateral to the real estate security, because the borrower is entitled to a discharge of the mortgage the moment it is paid off, and consequently the company cannot count on those securities as permanent securities.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not strike me that the law would cover that in any way. It seems to me the provisions of this clause is to compel companies to hold 20 per cent of a class of securities which they can dispose of at any time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And convert into money.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing they hold 20 per cent of Bank of Commerce, or Bank of Montreal stock, that is a stock that you could convert into money at once; or suppose you held any other stock, it would be termed a liquid security, because it is of a character that could be put upon the market and sold. Would that be considered a liquid security?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It might or might not be. Supposing a collateral security were bank stock; if a man could deposit bank stock as a security it ought to count.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It could not, for this reason; I might be owing the company $100. I might give them $100 of stock in security which would be called liquid security if you like, but the companies would have no right to dispose of that stock until the time had expired in which I had agreed to pay that debt.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so, and it could not count until the debt was overdue.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It certainly should not, but under clause 23 I think it would. A borrower may borrow $20,000 upon real estate and may put in bank stock to the extent of $20,000 as collateral, and yet you have that bank stock over and above your real estate security or hypothec, or other immovables. I think you should add to this clause such language as would exclude in that 20 per cent, collateral security of a personal nature. You have to admit that that security would not be available to realize the 20 per cent upon.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Nor do I think it would be the total assets of the company. Supposing the company took $10,000 worth of collateral and the debt was $5,000 they could not claim to own the $10,000.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You count the real estate securities among your assets.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, and so would the $5,000 indebtedness be an asset, but the amount beyond the $5,000 in your possession would not be an asset. You have an interest in that, and you are entitled to hold it for that security, but you have no proprietory interest until the debt is overdue.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But some companies, who may not be in a sufficiently strong financial condition to hold what are known as liquid securities to meet that twenty per cent liability, may say, "We have in our bank liquid bank stocks and other securities. True, they are only collateral, but will bring us within the meaning of the clause."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We might pass the clause as it is, but it will not prevent its reconsideration.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes; that will do. I simply ask the Minister of Justice to consider it. It is susceptible of that construction.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It certainly requires consideration.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If you loaned a man $5,000 and took security on his real estate, and asked him security to the extent of $10,000, and he says, "Very well, I will give you $10,000 in Bank of Montreal stock," that would be a collateral security for the fulfilment of the contract, but would not be available until default in the payment of the $5,000. How then could it be a liquid asset?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think it could.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 29.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A clause has been suggested to me in place of the one I have in the bill, and it is perhaps more concise. This is the clause which has been suggested to me by a gentleman in Toronto in place of number 29 in the bill:

The company may have agencies in any places in Great Britain or elsewhere for the registration and transfer of debentures or other stock and for the prosecution of any other business of the company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that a substitute for the whole clause.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. This suggestion of the change in the section has grown out of the proposed changes to permit the companies to do business abroad. If you do not permit them to do business abroad, the clause is better as it is. Therefore, I think I will let that section stand until I decide whether we will adopt this provision or not. If we adopt this provision with regard to loans and the transaction of business abroad, then the proposed clause would be better than the clause in the bill. If we do not confer that power, it is better as it is in the bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me you should put some limitation on the class of business so as to prevent the transaction of business being transferred from the head office to the agencies.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think it is intended to give the company another central office.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 30.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is a very broad clause, freeing them from all trusts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think that is proper. I think that is a rule recognized in equity.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It frees them from all responsibility. I think it is going very far. Who suggested the clause?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—All the loan companies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The directors of the Farmers' Loan Company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You might add a clause saying that the company would not be free to disobey any order of the court.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think not. They would not accept any trust at all if they are to be responsible for the trustee who has invested the money in this way. He is the the party responsible to the cestui que trust, and not the company, and so the company has nothing to do with the matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Supposing the cestui que trust notified the company that they had lost confidence in the trustee, and gave them notice to withdraw the trust, under that clause the cestui que trust might loose his money.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 31.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there any provision now to compel 90 per cent of the capital to be paid up before you could order the issue of additional stock?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The intention is not to give them the power to issue further stock until they have disposed of what they have.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What reason is there, why, if a company exists and has $100,000 of stock subscribed and, we will say $50,000 of that is paid up, the stockholder is liable, in case of a suit, for the balance of the stock—what reason is there for declaring that another $100,000 should not be issued and sold with the understanding that 50 per cent of it should be paid? I know the Manitoba Loan Company issued its stock, but never would permit any of its stockholders to pay over 25 per cent of the amount of stock held in the company. After they had been in business four or five or six years they increased their capital stock and allotted it to the stockholders at a certain premium. Some did not desire to take it, and it was put on the general market, although there was only 25 per cent required to be paid. They could not do that under this law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, and I do not think it is desirable.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What reason is there for it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is this reason, that they have power to issue a certain amount of stock and to make a certain amount of capital available, and until they do issue that amount of stock and until they do make that amount of capital available, there can be no valid reason for a further issue. The issue would be a speculative issue, and this proposal is not a proposal to come to Parliament on every occasion that they desire to call into existence a company, but it is a provision to clothe the Governor General in Council with certain powers and to set out in the statute itself, as much as possible, all the franchises which every company is to possess. So that it is set out here that the directors, at any time after 90 per cent of the capital stock of the company has been subscribed, but not sooner, may by by-law provide for an increase of the capital stock of the company. Now, unless you provide some restriction or other, a company might issue ten millions of stock; they might issue an indefinite amount. You place some limitation upon them, and at the same time you give them power to increase the stock under certain conditions, and that condition is that they shall utilize the power, both as to the payment of stock and as to the issue of stock, that they already possess.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At present the whole amount of the capital stock must be subscribed before any increase can take place:

> The directors at any time may, after the whole of the capital stock of the company has been taken and 50 per cent paid thereon, make a by-law, &c.

Applying this to loan companies, the provision is more stringent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It may be the fault of my want of comprehension, but I do not understand at all the reason of the hon. Minister of Justice. I know that when companies go into the English market to borrow, one of the first things that the lender will look at is the amount due upon the stock subscribed; and if there is 50 per cent of the stock subscribed unpaid, they consider the 50 per cent unpaid as an additional security to that which they receive from the company. They might take a security upon the mortgages which the company held, and then they reason that if the mortgages will not realize the amount of the debentures which they have purchased, then they resort to the personal liability of each stockholder to the amount of the stock unpaid, and that is one of the principal securities which the lender has. If they consider a company safer, or rather the money they loan safer, when it is loaned to a company that has but 50 per cent paid, why this clause would be a deterrent in the case of borrowing, because they would say, "there is only 10 per cent of personal liability on the part of the stockholders." The moment you have fully paid up your stock you are no longer responsible for debts of the company, unless you have done what they did in the Farmers' Loan Company—that which is unlawful. I do not particularly object to it, however.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—None of the loan companies have taken exception to it, and some thirty odd companies have approved of it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think it is an excellent provision myself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to see what the exact meaning of this clause is. It reads:

> The directors, at any time after 90 per cent of the capital stock has been subscribed and 90 per cent thereof paid in, &c.

What does "thereof" apply to? Does it apply to the whole or to the 90 per cent? Suppose the stock is $100,000. They would have to subscribe $90,000 of the stock and pay up $81,000. Is that the contention?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would it not be wiser, in order to remove any doubt, to say 90 per cent of the stock paid in, because "thereof" may be construed to mean 90 per cent of the capital stock.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think "thereof" cannot refer to any but the one thing, 90 per cent of the stock subscribed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Reading it over, I cannot satisfy myself as to which of the two sums is applied, and other people may be in the same position. What is the objection to saying "such subscribed stock"?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think the phrase is more concise as it is.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the bill and asked leave to sit again.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (R) "An Act further to amend the Penitentiary Act." He said:—I stated on the introduction of this bill the changes and amendments that were intended to be made by it to the Penitentiary Act. In the first place, there was power to alter the penitentiary districts so as to permit the sending of convicts to a penitentiary that might be nearer to them than the penitentiary in the province to which, under the law as it now stands, they would be obliged to be committed. I also provide in this bill for an amendment as to the salaries of the officers by Governor in Council by clause 2. Then, by clause 3 it is proposed that any convict sentenced to the penitentiary shall be deemed to be in the custody of the warden of the penitentiary immediately upon such sentence, and the sheriff, or other officer in whose custody he then is, shall, upon receiving a receipt therefor, deliver up the said convict together with a copy of the sentence taken from the minutes of the court and certified by a judge, &c. At present these convicts in the North-west are confined in the jails at Prince Albert and Regina, and this bill takes power to commit them to the penitentiary. There is power given in clause 4 to the warden or deputy warden. The deputy shall, ex officio, have the power and authority of a justice of the peace, and every keeper and guard of the penitentiary shall have the authority of a constable. That provision is, I think, desirable. Then section 62 of the Act is hereby repealed altogether. Section 69 is almost the same as section 62. They are duplications. One provides for a penalty of $40, and the other for a penalty of $100, and one or the other should disappear from the Act, as they both undertake to deal in a large measure with this same subject. One or the other is unnecessary, and we thought on the whole it was better that section 62 should disappear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the higher penalty.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, the lower penalty. Then it deals with the transfer of officers from one penitentiary to another. Section 7, as explained the other day, provides for the removal of insane persons from the penitentiary. Sometimes men are confined for a considerable period in the lunatic asylum, and they are discharged. They commit some offence against the law and advised to plead guilty, and do plead guilty. If their case was contested, the evidence would disclose the fact that they are insane and not responsible for what they have done, but it is not brought out. They are sent to the penitentiary and they are no sooner there than it becomes obvious to the officers of the penitentiary that they are insane. We take power to discharge those persons and to notify the Attorney General of the province within which such insane convict was convicted by warrant under his hand, and direct the removal of such insane convict from the penitentiary to the jail or other place of confinement from which such insane convict came to the penitentiary, and such warrant shall be sufficient authority to the warden or other officer of the penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Do you propose to send the unfortunate man back to the jail?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We will send him back to where the local authorities can assume the responsibility of dealing with him. We do not wish that, in any province, the insane shall be unloaded, so to speak, and made a charge upon the Dominion. There are proper institutions in every province where such persons can be cared for, and it is much better they should be under provincial control, and in institutions created specially for the purpose of taking care of them, than that they should be sent to the penitentiary and brought in contact with the most lawless and unscrupulous class of the population.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Why not transfer them to those local institutions at once?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We have not the power. We cannot, by any measure we pass here, say to the local legislature, or local lunatic asylum, that they must take charge of this particular party. All we can do is to put him back from where he was taken and placed in our custody, and allow them to do as they please with him.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It is rather cruel to send him back to the jail.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Better than to let him go at large.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Oh, certainly, but they may be a long time in jail, because very often the asylums are not prepared to take them, for the want of room, and particularly with applicants ot that description it would be difficult to attend to them, and under some circumstances they will have to remain in jail for a long time. I have known of lunatics being in our jail for four or five months.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I dare say that may be so, and all that is necessary is that the local authorities should make further provision than what they have at the present time, but certainly we cannot be expected to take charge of lunatics, and if a man is a lunatic at the time he has committed an offence, clearly he was not guilty within the meaning of the law, although his liability to commit the offence was not disclosed at the time he was put upon his trial. Clause 8, I also explained when the bill was before the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I notice that by clause 2 you repeal section 6 of chapter 42 of the Statutes of 1895. That simply means the repeal of the section which regulates the salaries of the different officials in the penitentiary, running from the warden down to the teamster, and giving the power to the Governor in Council to fix all these salaries irrespective of Parliament altogether. The law, as it stands upon the statute-book now, declares what the salary of wardens shall be, and also the salaries of officers in the different departments. You repeal that and leave the question exclusively with the Governor in Council. It seems to me the tendency of our legislation just now—and more particularly by the present government—is to concentrate all the power within themselves, particularly that which affects patronage. This is a matter, however, which we can discuss more freely when we are in Committee of the Whole. At the same time, it is a question for the Senate to consider, and a question for Parliament to consider, whether they should divest themselves of the power which they now have under the statute, and place it all in the hands of the government. I shall not detain the Senate just now, but I shall call attention to clause No. 8, which deals with the retirement of officers. It provides for paying a gratuity to an officer who is entitled to a gratuity before he has become a member of the civil service. If he becomes a member of the civil service, then the minister is enabled under this law to pay him the gratuity to which he would be entitled, and also the amount which he would be entitled to receive under the Superannuation Act. That is open to considerable abuse, as I will point out to my hon. friend. A man might be entitled to a gratuity, and he might be promoted and serve in the position to which he is promoted for a sufficient length of time to enable him to retire under a superannuation. This gives the power to the government, or the minister, to place him on the superannuation list, and give him the sum to which he would be entitled under that law. It also gives him the power, if I understand it, of granting to that officer a gratuity in addition to the superannuation. That might lead to abuse. A man might be entitled to $2,000 gratuity. He might have a salary of $3,000, as the case might be. He might be a deputy head at $3,200, and if he served ten years in that position, he would then be entitled to twenty per cent of his salary as a retiring allowance during his life, in addition to the gratuity. I do not say that the minister would give it, but, as I understand the clause, it would give him the power to do it. However, we can discuss it more fully in committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see if it only applies to penitentiary officers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That makes no difference. It applies to a penitentiary official who is entitled to a gratuity, and who is promoted to another office. That places him under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, and what I have stated is correct.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not understand that my hon. friend, in introducing this bill, has given any reason for the very sweeping change in the second clause of it to which my hon. friend has just referred, with regard to the power being vested in the government of the day to fix the salaries of officials. I find, by referring to the Act of 1895, which this bill proposes to amend in this respect, that it includes a very long list of important officers where the salaries range at present from $500 to $2,000, including wardens, accountants, surgeons, chaplains, school-masters, hospital overseer, store-keeper, matron, assistant matron, engineer and machinist, fireman, messengers. Then another list of officers under the head of police, police wardens, chief keepers, keepers, guards, temporary police and chief in the industrial department, the chief trade instructor and teamster, all this class of officers in all the penitentiaries.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was an innovation at the time that the Act was adopted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I desire to hear some explanation, because, however, it came to be so, all this has been settled by statute. It is proposed now to take all the fixing of the salaries of all these officials out of the Act and give the power simply to the Governor General in Council to make the change.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Where it formerly had been and where the hon. gentleman will see it is paid out of the penitentiary appropriation. That has always been the practice, and is the practice still. But the limitation fixed by that statute has been found extremely inconvenient, and in some cases extremely embarrassing. If the hon. gentleman will compare the salary mentioned in the bill with the salary paid before, he will find very many of them are much less. Take chaplains' salaries, they are all below what they were before, and all below what is paid in the United States or in England. I had a deputation from Montreal and elsewhere with regard to that class of officers. Then, with regard to many of the others, we have been unable to keep some of our officers at Kingston, because they said they were unable to pay their household expenses upon the salaries allowed them. Some of them have resigned in consequence, and we must be in a position to employ competent men in an institution where there is great danger to life and very great danger of disorder. If my hon. friend will look at the report I brought down to-day, he will see that the expenses of the penitentiaries are a great deal more than $100,000 less than they were four or five years ago, and as we propose to pay these expenses out of the appropriation made, I do not think that it is an unreasonable discretion, because that discretion is always subject to review by Parliament, and whatever is done may be asked for by Parliament and subject to its scrutiny. Some men are worth more than others, and so it is very important that we should have a freer hand than we have at the present time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a good argument to justify the change in the law. Let Parliament know what you are going to do before you do it yourself, but it is understood that this matter will be thoroughly discussed in committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And that we do not affirm the principle of the bill in adopting the second reading.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not of that clause.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

CONTRACTS FOR SUPPLIES FOR GOVERNMENT FORCES IN YUKON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired of

The government if they have recently let any contracts for beef or other supplies for the government forces in the Yukon district? If not, are they now negotiating for such supplies? And if so, are they advertising for public tenders for the same?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am advised by the department that no contracts have recently been let for beef. Tenders were invited in February last for groceries and other provisions. Contracts were awarded upon receipt of the tenders, viz., in April, and the supplies are now on route to the Yukon. The matter of the beef supply is under the consideration of the department.

LA BANQUE DU PEUPLE BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved:

That it be an instruction to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, to which has been referred Bill No. 6, intituled: "An Act respecting La Banque du Peuple," that the said committee, before presenting any report upon said bill, shall require the directors of said bank to furnish for the information of the committee:—

1. A full and clear statement in detail, verified by statutory declaration, accounting for the shrinkage in the assets of the said bank in the period from 1st March, 1895, to the date of the suspension of payment by the bank. And likewise a similar statement, verified by statutory declaration, accounting for the shrinkage in the assets from the date of suspension to the 1st June, 1899.

2. A full and clear statement in detail of the liabilities of the bank as they stood on 1st June last, 1899, made by two disinterested and competent valuators to be appointed by said committee.

3. A statutory declaration by two disinterested and competent valuators to be appointed by the said committee, of the present value of the assets of the bank undisposed of.

He said:—I may say, as hon. gentlemen are aware, that this bill is before the Committee on Banking and Commerce. We heard parties for and against this bill, and deferred consideration of it until a future date. For the information of the committee, I wish to get what I am asking for here, in order that they may be able to come to a proper decision with regard to this bill. As hon. gentlemen are aware, the object of it is to relieve the directors of this bank, by giving them the assets of the bank on their paying in a certain amount, and under taking to pay off the liabilities. What the present assets of the bank are, and what the present liabilities are, we are not in a position to judge, for we have only the statement of these gentlemen, and they are very much interested, from the fact that they are responsible to the creditors of that bank. I think it is in the interests of the public, in the interest of Canada and in the interest of every one—and there are a number of hon. gentlemen in this House who are connected with banks and are interested in the banking institutions of Canada—that nothing improper should be covered over by such legislation as is before us in connection with this bank. It is in the interest of the country that no relief should be given to men who did not discharge the trusts that were given to them. This bank is in a peculiar position. The parties connected with the bank have had no means to reach the directors. They had not the power to bring the directors from year to year to task with regard to the affairs of the bank, and therefore, all these things were kept secret and were beyond the knowledge of parties interested. At the annual meeting, about three months before the suspension of payment by this bank, they issued to the shareholders a report which I will read and which, on the face of it, will satisfy hon. gentlemen that there must be something radically wrong, something beyond the natural amount of stealing—if I may use the expression—that there must have been embezzlement connected with the bank of which the people are not aware. On the first day of March, 1895, the directors issued the following statement to the shareholders. I shall read it, because I want to have it on record:

The directors beg to submit to the shareholders the statement of the affairs of this bank for the year ending, 28th February, 1895.

The net profits of the year after providing for all bad and doubtful debts and deducting cost of management, amount to $114,280.18.

Out of this sum we have paid dividends at the rate of seven per cent per annum amounting to $84,000, and placed to the credit of profit and loss $30,280.18.

The business of the bank, both at the head office and branches, is steadily progressing and the number of current accounts annually increasing.

We find that the convenience afforded to the public by the local branches is appreciated and form a valuable aid in the maintenance of the bank's relations with clients, in the outlying parts of the city.

It is the desire of the directors to employ the bank's resources as fully as possible in the locality whence they are derived, so as to assist in every legitimate way the commercial and agricultural interests of the country.

All our agencies have been thoroughly inspected during the year, and we notice a large increase in the volume of transactions; they are working very satisfactory.

We are happy to bear sincere testimony to the industry and attention displayed by the officers of the general staff and branches, in the conduct of the affairs of this institution, and fully appreciate their efforts in assisting your board to promote the best interests of the bank.

The whole respectfully submitted.

J. GRENIER,
President.

MONTREAL, 1st March, 1895.

In the first or second week of the month of July following, this bank suspended payment—about three and a half months after issuing that statement which showed large earnings for that year. It had a paid-up capital of $1,200,000, a reserve fund of $600,000—50 per cent of the capital—and a profit and loss account of $42,876 beyond those dividends that were paid that year. From the statement which I have read this was one of the best banks, perhaps, in Canada, and from the fact that it was a bank in which the shareholders were not responsible on the double liability clause in the Banking Act, it was sought as a place to invest money safely, particularly by trustees of funds belonging to widows, orphans and such parties. They were all misled by this statement issued by the directors. What are the facts? To-day they come to us and say we can only pay 45 cents on the balance of the 50 cents unpaid to the depositors, but we will undertake to do so upon the condition that we receive the assets of the bank and make up the 45 per cent and pay the balance out of our own pocket. The bill says:

> And whereas the said directors have offered to pay forty-five cents on the dollar upon the balance due at the time of said offer; and whereas it is represented that the said offer is in excess of what could be realized by a liquidation of the assets of the said bank, including therein the securities given by certain of the directors; and whereas, after considering the offer of the said directors.

It was decided that they should apply to Parliament to relieve the directors of their responsibility. Now they come before us and say, And whereas the said directors have offered in consideration of paying off the depositors, &c., only the 45 cents, they want to be relieved with the understanding that they will get the assets. It is only reasonable, just and fair that this House should direct the committee to ascertain what these liabilities and assets are before reporting on this bill. It has been always a principle in this House, as far as such legislation is concerned, that a party coming to seek relief ought to come with clean hands, or to be in a position to show that his record is of such a character as to entitle him to the relief he seeks. In the case before us there is certainly a cloud hanging over the statements furnished by these gentlemen to the House and to the country, sufficient to make one suspicious and to make the country suspicious that things are not all right. I think, in justice to all parties concerned, the directors ought to furnish such a satisfactory statement of the affairs of the bank to the House as would relieve them of the suspicion that there was anything wrong. I could, of course, go into figures to show to hon. gentlemen how suspicious they look —how bad the statement looks, but I will await the receipt of those details from a satisfactory source, and will then take occasion to comment upon them. In the meantime, I want to state this publicly so that it will be known; I have taken occasion to consult a good authority upon the question which came up before the committee. It is generally supposed that the directors are not at all now, through lapse of time, responsible to the shareholders. I have obtained a very good opinion on the subject, and it is to the effect that they are not relieved of their responsibility if they ever were responsible to the shareholders. Of course, they are responsible to the shareholders for any balance that may be in their hands after the depositors are paid that is clear enough, or for anything they have done in the way of misappropriating the funds of the bank; but the position I take is this, that the fact of giving an extension to the directors two years ago to pay the depositors does not count in the time since the bank's suspension, but only to the first of May last, and if the shareholders ever had any claim against the directors it is just as good now as it was a few weeks after the suspension of the bank. I am of the opinion, from the situation of the affair at present, that the shareholders will never get anything; but this law—it does not matter whether they get anything or not—seeks to deprive them of any chance and excludes them from participating in any advantage that the laws of the country may give them with respect to this bill. For these reasons I ask that this House direct the committee to obtain the evidence which is certainly necessary before the committee can come to a proper conclusion with regard to the affairs of this bank.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is a reasonable request, so far as the information sought is concerned. I do not know whether there are any parties interested in the bill here to-day, and they might, perhaps if they were present, give some explanation. I do not know whether the hon. senator who has been promoting the bill might be able to point out some objection to the resolution. It is not an unreasonable proposition if there is adequate time. Whether it might have the effect of throwing the measure over for the session or not, I cannot say. The chairman of the committee might be better able to say. There was a good deal of information given in the committee, and it might be that if they require all that is asked for in this motion, the measure could not be put through this session.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It is impossible for me to say what the effect of that resolution might be. The fullest opportunity was given to those who were opposed to the bill and those who were in favour of it at the meetings of the committee, and the matter had been postponed in order to meet the convenience of gentlemen who were interested in the bill from day to day, and it still stands in the way. The feeling of the committee, at the last adjournment, was very strong indeed that they at least required an independent valuation of the assets which the bank was supposed to have, and other information which was not before them at that time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And that information I think the parties promised to produce.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Yes; there was a sort of half promise, but nothing more.

The motion was agreed to.

TRAFFIC ARRANGEMENTS WITH THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid on the Table of the Senate, any and all supplemental agreements and traffic arrangements entered into between the Railway Department of Canada and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, in connection with the contract entered into between the aforesaid parties for the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to the city of Montreal.

The motion was agreed to.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to call attention to a little matter. It is not very important, but being an old newspaper man I am not inclined to find fault with what a newspaper says of me. I find no fault in this case. It is simply the fault of the reporter. The Globe of yesterday says:

Sir Mackenzie Bowell said that the Globe had denounced a member of the Senate as an unmitigated liar.

In the Globe editorial it also says:

Sir Mackenzie Bowell said the Globe described a member of the Senate as an unmitigated liar. If this statement was ever made by the Globe it must have been a long time ago and the provocation must have been very great.

And then it claims the statute of limitation, if it ever made such a statement. I desire to say that I did not utter that expression. The expression I used was that the Globe had denounced a member of the Commons as an unmitigated liar; and I find on looking at the official records by our own reporters that they have reported the exact words I used.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—If I may trespass on the time of the House I should like to give an explanation with reference to the same article, in which it is stated that I said that the Toronto Globe spoke of the Senate as a body of idiots. To the best of my recollection—and I confirmed it by referring to the reporter's notes—what I said was that we had been described in the Globe as a body of old idiots! The fact of the matter is, that at one time the Globe was in the habit of inserting in its columns almost every week, extracts not very complimentary to the Senate from various local newspapers in the province, and this not very flattering description of members of this body was one of these. I perhaps ought to have been careful to have said that it was not a Globe editorial. But the House will remember, the discussion was really scarcely serious at the time. We were half in joke, trying to find a definition for the word "scurrilous" which was in the minister's amendment to the Criminal Code, and that perhaps must be my apology for not being more exact in my language. I did not charge the Globe with having so spoken of us themselves, but they certainly republished articles in which we were so described.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I had reference to an editorial.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask when I may expect that return I called for two or three months ago in reference to the correspondence between the local governments and this government in reference to the question of the passage of a law permitting an elector who has been omitted from the voter's list to be placed thereon, and visa versa. I may say I am a little more anxious on account of the statements which I have seen in the western papers as to what is going on at the present in Manitoba, in reference to what is familiarly termed stuffing of the voter's list, by adding some of the Galicians who have lately come to this country, and the statement is made publicly in the press giving five or six different divisions in the one constituency in which people have been placed upon the list, without giving their names, who have no right there, and it appears that they complain that they have no right of appeal. I do not desire to occupy the time of the House, but I might also state that I have an extract from the Winnipeg Free Press, which every one knows has always been a supporter of the Liberal party, in which it complains very bitterly of the conduct of the officials in connection with the preparation of these lists. I may say, however, that the extract was prior to the assumption to the editorialship of the gentleman who now controls it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to the hon. gentleman that perhaps I am at fault in not calling to the attention of my colleagues the statement made by hon. friend a short time ago on this subject. I shall endeavour not to forget it again, and to bring it under the attention of my colleagues, so that whatever correspondence there is may be in the hon gentleman's hands. With regard to Manitoba, I have only to remind my hon. friend that there is a provision for an appeal to the county judge there, and that the rule to which he refers is therefore not a rule which would be specially applicable in the case of Manitoba.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will take this opportunity to bring under the notice of the Senate what the law is at a future time, but I would like to remind my hon. friend that he has made this same speech five or six times.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We will say four times.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman promised the House to bring this under the notice of his colleagues three or four times. I do not know when he proposes to do it. If he would permit me to suggest, he should take a note, and if he could not do that, he should tie a little string around his finger, as I used to do when I was a boy.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I never had any necessity for a string.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am very much inclined to think that it would be an absolute necessity to put a string on every finger, if I am to judge by the results of this motion. I do not desire to discuss this question at any length, but it does seem to me that it must strike hon. gentlemen present as a most extraordinary thing that it should require three or four months to bring down three or four letters. There could not be more than three or four certainly—a simple letter to each of the provincial premiers, recommending them to do what the government promised they would do, and here we are at the end of three months, and the hon. Minister of Justice tells us he will bring the matter to the attention of his colleagues. I will have to submit to that, because I cannot get any more. He will not be annoyed, I am sure, if I jog his memory in reference to this matter.

THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EXTENSION TO MONTREAL.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask, also, when we are to have the return to which I called my hon. friend's attention the other day. The hon. gentleman on my right (Mr. Ferguson) intimated to the House that all the information for which we asked had been laid before us, except that called for by the fourth paragraph of the motion I made on the 22nd of May. The hon. gentleman took a note of it before. The information wanted is:

The amount of the earnings and working expenses of the Drummond County Railway from the time of its being first worked in connection with the Intercolonial Railway to the 31st of March, 1899.

I know that the statement was made by the hon. gentleman that that information could not be given.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the promises which were made at that time. If he will turn to page 808 of the official reports of this House for 1897, he will find Sir Oliver Mowat used this language——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I read the reports over after the hon. gentleman gave me the page. I read over what Sir Oliver Mowat said.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What has the hon. gentleman to say about it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Sir Oliver Mowat assumed that they could make up a statement of that kind, and on inquiry from Messrs. Pottinger and Schreiber they said it was absolutely impossible, that they could not do it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The bill will not pass till it is brought down.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The accounts were as they had been in years past. No changes were made.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—No Drummond County till that comes down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the evidence which was given by the Deputy Minister of Railways, Mr. Schreiber, before the committee of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I read that to-day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will read it to the hon. gentleman again, I am afraid it has had very little effect upon him. I want also to lay before the House the telegrams which were sent by Mr. Pottinger. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has read them also.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Mr. Haggart, when the investigation into the affairs of the Drummond County Railway was proceeding asked if the statement which the deputy minister had made before the committee was a statement of the amount of traffic on the Drummond County Railway from the 1st to the 31st March, 1898, both inclusive. Then he gives the exhibit as follows:—

The through freight	$18,867 39
Local freight	11,963 36
Through passengers	7,371 83
Local passengers	6,513 46
Making a total of	$44,716 04

Then the question was put to him: "You have not got the working expenses?" And he says: "No, I have not." He is asked: "How do you apportion the amount of the Drummond County Railway through rates?" And he says: "That is determined on the mileage basis, I think." He is asked: "The same as for passengers?" And he answers: "It must be so; that is the only way to do it." What we understand by the mileage basis is this: If an arrangement be made between two railway companies for the carrying of frieght from one point of the country to another, say from Chicago to Halifax, a shorter line, assuming the Drummond County Railway is a separate line, being so much shorter in proportion to that portion of the railway between Chicago and Montreal, and Quebec and Montreal, they are allowed an additional mileage, and the arrangement is to pay upon what is termed construction mileage. So that if the short road over which the traffic has to pass is only 100 miles, while the other is 1,000, the shorter line may be allowed in the division of the profits 125 or 150 miles, I do not know the proportion, but I know that is the basis on which it is done. That is what Mr. Schreiber, I have no doubt, meant, when he spoke of a mileage proportion. If you turn to page 154 you will find that Mr. Pottinger telegraphed to Mr. Schreiber on the 13th of May, in reply to an inquiry made by the department. He says:

C. SCHREIBER, Esq.,
Ottawa.

No freight charge for material for Drummond County Railway construction or equipment entered into the earnings of Montreal extension for March as per statement sent you. It covered earnings from freight for the public only.

That was to show exactly what the railway earned without including freight which it carried over it for the construction of its own road. Then, on the same day, he telegraphed to Mr. Schrieber again as follows:—

Information respecting April traffic (I call special attention to this), over Montreal extension cannot be given until the 2nd or 3rd June, after the April accounts have been made up. Material carried for the railway does not enter into earnings.

Now, there is a positive and distinct admission by Mr. Pottinger to the deputy head of the department that that information can be furnished, only it will take some time to prepare it. The officials of the Railway Department, when the government were asking Parliament to pass the bill authorizing the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, and the entrance into a lease with the Grand Trunk Railway from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, laid a statement before the House giving an estimate made by the officials of the department of the number of passengers and the freight that they expected would be carried over that road. If they could make an approximate estimate prior to obtaining possession of the railway, surely they ought to be able to tell the House and country what the actual freight and passenger traffic was. The statement laid before the House, as stated by my hon. friend to my right:

When the matter came before the House, my hon. friend, the leader of the House (that is Sir O. Mowat) "submitted a statement signed by both Mr. Schreiber and Mr. Pottinger which differed materially from that"—(that is from the statement which had been made by my hon. friend opposite.) It differed in the matter of carrying passengers, and very much in the freight. In the one the alleged increase in the passengers to be carried was 630,000, while in the other it was 230,000.

Hon. Mr. Scott corrected him by saying 228,000. Here is a statement laid before the House of the approximate business that could be done on the road, and if they could do that before they got control of the line, it is a marvel to me that they could not do it after they got control of it. Then I find that Sir Oliver Mowat, in reference to this very question, in the discussion on the 28th of June, spoke as follows:—

The Minister of Railways yesterday made a statement about another matter as to which this House has taken considerable interest. I daresay hon. gentlemen have seen it, but I read it now for the purpose of endorsing it as government leader of the Senate.

Then I asked him if it was the statement that I had seen in the Citizen. He replied:

The statement has reference to the vote for $100,000 for purchasing rolling stock for the Intercolonial Railway.

Then he quotes what Mr. Blair said, as follows:—

Since the item passed the committee he had gone over the matter again, and as the original programme for a 99 years lease had fallen through, and the estimate of $100,000 was leased on that proposal, according to the estimate furnished him by his officers, he had concluded to reduce the vote for additional rolling stock by $50,000, making the vote $50,000. He assured the House that no portion of the money would be used in purchasing the rolling stock of the Drummond County Railway.

It will be in the recollection of members of the Senate, who were present at the time, that I asked that question particularly, whether it was intended to buy that old rolling stock, and the hon. leader of the House at that time, Sir Oliver Mowat, declared it was not the intention and also quoted from the speech made by the Minister of Railways, in conformation of his statement. Then Sir Oliver Mowat proceeds as follows:—

Representing this government here I endorse that statement. I should like to say further, though it is only repeating in substance what I said a few days ago, with regard to the $157,500 asked for the rental of the two pieces of road belonging respectively to the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Drummond County Railway Company, that this amount is only wanted for a tentative purpose, to ascertain by experiment the effect of nine months operating the road as part of the Intercolonial Railway, and with a view to be in a situation to consider more satisfactorily a permanent connection with Montreal by some other means, whether those spoken of heretofore or some other.

Now I hold, and I think I am right in drawing the deductions from that statement and similar statements which can be found on four other pages of this debate, that the intention as declared by the Minister of Railways, and confirmed by the minister who led this House, the then Minister of Justice, that the government asked for that amount of money for the purpose of enabling them to test the earning capacity of that portion of the road which they were about acquiring; and to ascertain, in addition to that, the expense which would be incurred in running this western section of what was to be, when acquired, the Intercolonial Railway. He uses that expression over and over again, that it was a tentative operation adopted for the purpose, the Senate having rejected the bargain, of ascertaining whether they would be justified in carrying out the policy which the government had laid before Parliament, or, as Sir Oliver Mowat says, adopting "some other means." How did they come to the conclusion that it is impossible to state what they have earned on that section of the road? The Secretary of State says he was informed by Mr. Pottinger and Mr. Schreiber that it was impossible to do it. If it is impossible for them to do it, those gentlemen have probably, under instructions, deliberately kept the books so that it cannot be done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Shame!

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I say railway men, who have been working railways for years and years, assert that such a statement can be made, and that the books should be kept, and no doubt are kept, in such a way as to judge how much freight has been delivered over the Drummond County section of the Intercolonial Railway at Montreal, and the number of tickets sold to the passengers, even those that come from the west, that have passed over it. I do not say that much of this freight, neither do I say that many passengers would not have gone over the road, but they could have gone on the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway, and taken the Intercolonial at Lévis, opposite Quebec, for the maritime provinces. I do not wish to say anything that might be considered harsh, but I say it is a fraud, if that is not too hard a word, upon the community to say to the people of this country, when they are asked to add to its present indebtedness the sum of about $7,000,000 for all time to come, that they cannot tell us what the earnings of this line have been while they have had the road in their possession. If the government are desirous of having this bill become law, and confirmed by the solemn vote of both branches of Parliament, and believe it is in the interests of the country, they should be prepared to give all the information that can possibly be obtained, even if it takes two months of their employees time to prepare it. That is the view I hold of it, and think it is the opinion that is held by the people of this country. We are incurring, if we put this bill on the statute-books, an additional indebtedness of about $7,000,000, and we are asked to do it without the information which the leader of the government in this House and the head of the department, at the time they were entering into the arrangement, said was only tentative or with a view of ascertaining whether, after a year's experience in running the road, they would be justified in asking Parliament again to confirm the two arrangements they had made, or obtain an entrance into Montreal by some other means. I repeat the language used by Sir Oliver Mowat. I have no desire, speaking personally, and I my quite sure no member of the Senate has any desire, to throw any stumbling block in the way of doing that which they believe to be in the interests of the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman says hear, hear, ironically, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, ironically.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I can tell the hon. gentleman that the member who is speaking and the gentlemen who surround him are just as patriotic and as desirous of enhancing the interests of the country as the hon. gentleman is himself, and much more so. I am speaking from a thorough and full conviction of what I believe to be right, and just so long as the government refuse legitimate information which both Houses of Parliament are entitled to, they must take the responsibility if they do not accomplish what they desire.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is extremely unfair in misleading the House, as he has been doing during the last half hour. The government have withheld no information that it was possible to lay before Parliament. The hon. gentleman has asked for the particular amount to be credited to the extension of the road to Montreal. His motion was sent to the department, and I gave the hon. gentleman the answer made by the officers in charge. What the Parliament and the people of Canada want to know, is what are the advantages to the Intercolonial Railway of the extension to Montreal. Does any business flow over the extension to Montreal? We did not buy it for the local traffic between Ste. Rosalie and Bonaventure station, we bought it because it was going to give the Intercolonial Railway access to a city of 250,000, the principal market of Canada. We know that all railways seek important centres of traffic. The traffic of this country centres in the city of Montreal. It is the outlet of the canal system—the point where the Canadian Pacific Railway, which traverses the continent, has its headquarters. The Grand Trunk Railway Company also have their headquarters in Montreal. What this House and the country ought to know is what has been the effect of bringing the Intercolonial Railway into the city of Montreal. When this House is informed that the advantage has been upwards of three or four hundred thousand dollars a year to the Intercolonial Railway over all charges, they should be satisfied. A statement was asked for, of the comparative returns from July to March, or as far as it can be brought down this year, as between the years ending March, 1899, and March, 1898. That statement was laid on the table and showed that while in the former year there was a loss of some $35,000, that loss had been converted into a gain of some sixty odd thousand dollars last year. The gain by the extension to Montreal, after charging up all the interest against it, was a profit of $65,000, a profit larger than the profits of the Intercolonial Railway since the opening of the road in 1878. Is not that a pertinent fact? Are we to be told that the evidence of that, which was laid on the table of this chamber a fortnight ago, is not satisfactory —that the government are withholding information? The government are giving all the information they can, but the hon. gentleman asked for it in such a shape that it is impossible to give it, and if we did give it in that shape it would be minimizing the whole position. We have not assumed that there was any traffic in the country between Ste. Rosalie and Chaudière Junction. That was not the object of extending the Intercolonial Railway. The object was to get into a city of 250,000 people, where the traffic of the whole of Canada is centred, and the figures justify the statement I have made. Since yesterday I sent over, and went over myself to the department, to know whether they could give me the returns for April, May or June. The officials said they were making them up for April and May, and the effect is to show that the increase is enormous. The advantage is on the whole line extending to Montreal, not the portion that can be credited to the line between Ste. Rosalie and Chaudière Junction. That is not an important factor, otherwise than as allowing the Intercolonial Railway to get to Montreal. If the hon. gentleman will take the information in the only shape in which it can be given, and will refer to the tables I laid before the House in answer to an address, he will see that the result is shown as I have stated—that instead of there being a loss, as in the former year, there is a gain of some sixty thousand odd dollars—a gain larger than the aggregate gains since it was opened. I have answered a statement which was most misleading and most unfair. I am surprised the hon. gentleman would put his case as he did, reflecting on the officers of the department. I am quite sure Mr. Pottinger and Mr. Schreiber have no interest in keeping back information. I went out of the way in order to get all the information possible. I not only sent over my secretary, but went over myself and saw Mr. Pottinger and told him I wanted all the information that could be produced, and, so far as we have got the information, it points to the results I have indicated. Hon. gentlemen smile at that. I have just sent for the blue book and I can show what the profits have been over losses, and hon. gentlemen will see that I am borne out there in the statements I have made, that the extension to Montreal has already shown the important results stated. That is what this House has to guide it, and what the House will be governed by, I have no doubt. The House, I presume, desires to see if the Intercolonial Railway can be made, not perhaps a paying concern, but a concern that will pay its way. The expenses of the Intercolonial Railway, over and above its gains, have been, in the last fourteen years, about $15,000,000, between capital account and losses in operating it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That has nothing to do with the question we are discussing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If we can relieve the road from that terrible incubus, I think we will have accomplished something we deserve credit for, and when the hon. gentleman comes to look into the figures, he will not be disposed to minimize it. He has adopted a carping principle, and says, "Tell us what is exactly due to the earnings of the Drummond County Railway." As a railway, it is very little; as a channel to get to Montreal, it is a great deal. There is just the difference. The hon. gentleman will see that he is not putting the case fairly. He is not often so disingenuous. If he would only recognize that the object of getting the Drummond County Railway was not the Drummond County Railway per se, but to get into Montreal, and that by it we have got into Montreal in the cheapest and most advantageous way for the Intercolonial Railway and the country——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman understand the literal meaning of the word "disingenuous?" If he does, I repudiate it, as applied to me, in the strongest way possible. If there is any member of this House who indulges in discussion of that kind, it is the hon. Secretary of State. It was an exceedingly disingenuous manner in which he referred to my remarks about what could be done by the officers of the department. I never made a reflection on the officers of the department. I did not even insinuate anything of the kind. I said they could procure the information if they were instructed to do it. If the government instructed these gentlemen to do it, they could prepare it and lay it on the table. That is what I said. I did not cast any reflection on either Mr. Pottinger or Mr Schreiber, and it was exceedingly, doubly, superlatively disingenuous for the hon. gentleman to use that expression.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I can assure the hon. gentleman the information came directly from Mr. Schreiber.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the explanation given by my hon. friend is very unsatisfactory, that it is impossible for the Department of Railways to give this information for which we have been inquiring.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am guided by the practical officers. That is exactly what they told me.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—With regard to that, the return does not say in itself that is the verdict of the officers. The answer is this: An account of the working expenses of the Drummond County Railway cannot be prepared, as the accounts of the opening of the railway are kept as a whole.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Who signs that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Mr. Schreiber.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then I am right.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. leader of the opposition has quoted a very different opinion given by Mr. Schreiber before the Committee on the Drummond County Railway. Mr. Schreiber there submitted a statement for the month of March, 1898, that $44,716.04, was the actual earnings of the Montreal extension including the Drummond Railway part of it and the Grand Trund part of it. He is asked:

Q. That is the statement you produced?—A. Yes.
Q. You have not got the working expenses?—A. No, I have not.
Q. How do you apportion the amount of the Drummond County Railway through rates?—A. That is determined on a mileage basis, I think.

There seemed to be no trouble about it. This was for the month of March, 1898. It was only a statement of the earnings. It did not include the expenses, but if hon. gentlemen will look at this very contract itself they will find that the traffic charges, &c., shall every month be interchanged between the company and the government, so that there is a monthly statement of all the charges and expenses incident to running the road as between the Grand Trunk and the Intercolonial Railway to be made up every month and interchanged between the different parties, that is so far as the working expenses are concerned, while as to earnings, there was no difficulty, in 1898, for Mr. Schreiber to go before the committee and give on oath a statement of the exact earnings of the Montreal extension for the month of March. I am reading from page 137 of the Drummond Railway report dated 13th May, 1898, and this had reference to the earnings for the month of March. A few days later a question arose as to whether these earnings had been swollen by charges for carrying material for the Drummond County construction going on at that time, and Mr. Pottinger was telegraphed to and his answer was that no freight on material for Drummond County Railway work entered into the returns. The same day he sent a further telegram—it does not give the telegram that called this forth, but the answer will show the nature of the telegram sent:

Information respecting April traffic over Montreal extension cannot be given until the 2nd or 3rd of June after the April accounts have been made up.

This indicates beyond a doubt that when the April accounts were made up it would be then possible to submit a statement for the April working of the road. Now, as far as Mr. Pottinger and Mr. Schreiber are concerned, here are their opinions when they were before that committee and under oath. Mr. Schreiber was under oath and Mr. Pottinger gave his answers, which were read as evidence before that committee. I am astonished that my hon. friend the Secretary of State would make such an unqualified statement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have simply given the statement of the officers of the department. I know nothing personally about it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Against that I have submitted Mr. Schreiber's evidence before the committee. Mr. Schreiber, in submitting this statement, I have no doubt, did just what his minister told him to do. The minister instructed him to give such and such an answer, and the answer was forthcoming; at all events, it looks very much like that when we have Mr. Schreiber's sworn statement before the Drummond County Committee, which tells altogether a different story, confirmed by Mr. Pottinger's telegram, in which he says that the traffic accounts for the month of April would not be made up, until the 2nd or 3rd of June. As against the opinion of my hon. friend, given so emphatically, that it is absolutely impossible to furnish such information as this with regard to the Drummond County Railway, let me point out to my hon. friend and to this House some evidence given by Mr. Wainwright before the same committee. The first I am going to refer to will be found on page 62 of the report of the evidence of that committee. Information was being elicited with regard to the contracts between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway with regard to 38 miles of a railway between Hamilton and Toronto, which was in a similar position to the Montreal extension as between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway. Questions were raised with regard to that lease and the nature of it. After these had been gone through pretty extensively, Mr. Powell asked Mr. Wainwright this question:

Could you give us the proportion of business, so far as the use of that 38 miles of track is concerned?

"I could get it for you" said Mr. Wainwright. Here is 38 miles of railway, run under a lease between the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway, between Hamilton and Toronto, and there was no hesitation on the part of Mr. Wainright to say that he could get, for the information of that committee, the proportion of the business done by the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway over that 38 miles of road.

Hon. Mr SCOTT—That is on a fixed sum. The Canadian Pacific Railway paid $1,000 a mile.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—They did not care what rent they paid, but they wanted to know the proportion of business they did in order to arrive at a fair conclusion as to whether the amount paid for that 38 miles was proportionate to the amount proposed to be paid to the Grand Trunk Railway for this line between St. Lambert and Ste. Rosalie, and the answer was "I could get it for you." I now turn to page 58, and I find Mr. Wainwright was giving evidence with regard to the proportion of business which had been done by the Grand Trunk Railway and Intercolonial Railway lines from Lévis or Chaudière into Montreal before this lease went into operation, and Mr. Powell asked him "Can you conveniently give us the amount of through traffic passenger and freight as relates to the Grand Trunk Railway and Intercolonial?" He answered "Yes, we can give that." Then he is asked "It would not involve much work, would it?" And he answers "Yes, there would be a good deal of clerical work about it." We admit there might be some clerical work about it, but seeing the supreme importance of this information, there should not be a moment's hesitation on the part of the government and the Intercolonial Railway, even if there would be a great deal of clerical work about it, to give it, especially in view of the solemn promises of the Minister of Justice at the time that the vote for $157,000 was sought for, and which was brought down in the Supply Bill after the Senate had rejected the contract, when we were assured that that was only asked for for a tentative purpose, in order to make an experiment of the working of that particular road.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend now turns round and says "we cannot give you that information." As against that statement we have the sworn statement of Mr. Schreiber and the telegrams of Mr. Pot-tinger, and the testimony of Mr. Wainwright on oath with regard to other similar lines, that it was quite easy to get the information, involving, in one case, some clerical work. My hon. friend turns round and says the Intercolonial Railway is showing a more favourable balance than ever before. He draws a long bow upon that, because he says the balance has been greater this year than in all previous years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I have the authority for it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We have the returns supplied up to ten months, but I notice that it is claimed that for that period of ten months there will be a balance of $62,500 in favour of the road. We will have to wait for the complete returns to find whether everything is included, whether the rents paid are included or not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So I am advised.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We want to see whether the statement is a full one or not. However that may be, I take it that it would be the most surprising and inexplicable thing that could occur, that in this year the Intercolonial Railway would not furnish a better record than in previous years. What do we find that the Canadian Pacific Railway is doing? I have not the earnings before me, but I think they have gone up millions above former years. The Grand Trunk Railway, which has been fighting under great difficulties in the past, shows an increased earning of ten per cent during the last year. If the Intercolonial Railway were to do the same as that, we would have a very much larger balance in its favour than $62,000 for the ten months, and I believe it is doing that. From the extraordinary development on the Island of Cape Breton, the roads there are better employed than they were before, and it is but reasonable to assume that the Intercolonial Railway has caught the impetus from the improvement in business all over the country, which has enhanced the earnings of every other railway in Canada. And now my hon. friend comes down and points to some increase on the Intercolonial Railway, and asks this House to credit that to the Drummond County extension. If my hon. friend were to bring down a correct statement as to how the Montreal extension has turned out, as between earnings and expenses upon it, charging the road with all the rents which they are paying and everything else, I am satisfied, on account of the extreme reluctance to give this information to the House, if for no other reason, that it would show that instead of being benefited by this extension, the earnings have been decreased in consequence of it. We say it is perfectly easy to get this information. Mr. Wainwright swore that it was easy to get the information with regard to other partnerships or leasings. Mr. Pottinger actually shows it was possible to get it for the next month, but we would have to wait till the accounts were made up, four or five weeks after the close of the month. All this evidence goes to show that it is possible to get it and the fact that my hon. friend refuses it——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend's declaration that he cannot furnish it to the House, as he said, is the best possible evidence that this Montreal extension is being run at a loss, and, as was demonstrated beyond a doubt, in another place, every dollar of new business that was got on this new road by reason of the Drummond County extension has cost the government $1.30 to get it. It is quite possible that, notwithstanding a somewhat unfavourable showing with regard to the Montreal extension, that gentlemen in this House might see their way clear to give their support to the contract, considering that very material improvements have been made in it since it was before this House on a former occasion, and I think, therefore, it is a great pity that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House should present such difficulties in the way of a fair consideration of the bill by withholding this information. I must warn them that I think they will find it utterly impossible to convince this House or the country that they cannot supply the information if they desire it. We all have an idea of how railways keep their accounts and leasings, and all that kind of things, and the matter of ascertaining the exact proportion of business done and money earned is reduced to a perfect science among railroad officials. We all know that is the case, and this is no exception. The information can be got and the hon. Secretary of State should certainly see that the information is obtained, and he may perhaps find that, notwithstanding it may not have such a good appearance as he thinks it has, that it would not make such a bad impression on hon. gentlemen as he thinks.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—The claim made by the hon. Secretary of State that the $62,500 of a balance in favour of the Intercolonial Railway this year results from the acquisition by the government of the Drummond County Railway, I cannot agree to. On the contrary, I believe that the acquisition of the Drummond County Railway has been a loss to the Intercolonial Railway for the past year. In addition to what the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island has said on the matter, showing the prosperity of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway, and the Intercolonial Railway, I wish to say to the House that at the eastern extremity of the Intercolonial Railway is the Island of Newfoundland, with a population of 200,000 people. The completion of the Newfoundland Railway with the steamship "Bruce" connecting it with the Intercolonial Railway at North Sydney gives a large amount of traffic to the Intercolonial Railway. Communication has been going on now for the last year and a half between Newfoundland and North Sydney, and twice a week for the whole of that time, winter and summer, a large steamer is running between Newfoundland and North Sydney, Cape Breton, giving to the Intercolonial Railway an enormous amount of passenger traffic and freight, the largest portion of which is from Montreal.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—All this freight and passenger traffic is a profit to the Intercolonial Railway and the Intercolonial Railway is entitled to the credit of that without crediting one single dollar of it to the Drummond County Railway. The Newfoundland Railway gives that traffic, and the Intercolonial Railway would have that traffic if the Drummond County Railway never existed, and I believe the $62,500 profit in favour of the Intercolonial Railway for the last year can be attributed altogether to the immense amount of traffic from Newfoundland. Hon. gentlemen can imagine the amount passenger and freight traffic a population of 200,000 gives to the Intercolonial Railway for 800 miles from North Sydney to Montreal.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU—Have we not had that traffic every year?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—No. The steamer "Bruce" only commenced to run in the fall of 1897, so that the immense amount of traffic that that gives to the Intercolonial Railway, in my opinion, accounts for the large balance in favour of that road for the past year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I was somewhat surprised, after the very irascible speech made by my hon. friend who leads the opposition, that he should have complained of the use of the word "disingenuous" by the hon. Secretary of State. My hon. friend had spoken about the government as having committed a fraud, and made fraudulent statements, and I thought that those words were pretty harsh expressions, scarcely warranted by the law and usage of Parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They were not disingenuous.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I admit that. But my hon. friend had put himself out of court and was not in a position to complain of the word "disingenuous" on account of the very harsh expression he had used himself. Then the hon. gentleman said in a somewhat forcible tone, that he was just as honest and the hon. gentlemen sitting around him were just as patriotic as the government. I am not going to dispute that statement, but when the hon. gentleman charged the government with fraud, he did not give himself a high certificate of character when he said he was just as good as we were, because, according to his own statement, neither of us was very good, and neither of us was fit to represent the people of this country in Parliament. It is a mistake to undertake to anticipate the discussion that may take place on the Drummond County Railway Bill, and the arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway with reference to traffic over their section of line. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson), who spoke on this question, I think was undertaking to find some excuse why he should oppose these two measures, just as they had been opposed before; because, first, he was saying that what the Deputy Minister of Railways said was an impossibility, and then he made the introduction of that impossibility a condition of his support. The hon. gentleman characterized the entrance into Montreal as an incubus—the Montreal section was an incubus on the Intercolonial Railway. If the hon. gentleman thinks it is an incubus, then it is a measure that the hon. gentleman ought not to countenance and support. Let me say that I cannot very well understand on what commercial theory the hon. member can arrive at that conclusion, when Montreal is undoubtedly the commercial metropolis of the Dominion of Canada. How access to that distributing centre can be an incubus to the Intercolonial Railway, the hon. gentleman may be able to satisfy himself upon, but it would be impossible for any hon. gentleman to convince the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What I said was that if the earnings and expenses of the Montreal extension were brought down and showed a deficit of $100,000 or something of the kind, then the road must be regarded as an incubus. I think that was my statement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, my hon. friend spoke of the acquisition of this connection, by which access was to be gained to the metropolis of Canada, as an incubus.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes; if the return would show it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He went further than that, and he showed none of the advantages promised by the government had arisen from this connection, and that while the Canadian Pacific Railway had prospered to the extent of millions, and the Grand Trunk had made progress, the Intercolonial showed scarcely any improvement at all. That was the hon. gentleman's contention, and he showed Mr. Schreiber, in preparing a report which has been laid upon the table of the House, made a dishonest report.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He did not say anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—An unworthy report.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He said it was inspired by the Minister of Railways and was an inaccurate report and untrue statement, and although signed by the Deputy Minister of Railways, had contained a falsehood on its face. It said that it was impossible to give information which the hon. gentleman says it is possible to give, and that it can be given without any trouble. Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that it is not a matter of any consequence what the local traffic on that Drummond County section, or on the section between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, may be, in the settlement of this question. It may be a question of more or less; but it is not a question of yes or no. Let me suppose that you have no local traffic over that road, but that it gave you connection with the west and a large amount of through traffic which, otherwise, you would not get at all, is it not a matter of consequence to obtain that, even although you had no local traffic along the line? The information which the hon. gentleman asks for can be made up, no doubt. It can be shown that from this station and that, between one extremity of the acquired line and the other, a certain amount of traffic has to come, and whether you show that that traffic is much or little, does not affect the real question. The point that you cannot show, by any statistics which you may produce, is the amount of traffic you secure by this connection, which you would not have secured if the terminus had remained at Quebec. And, therefore, it is absurd to say that you can produce evidence here which will be sufficient to show conclusively what additional business the railway has done which it would not have done if this line had not been constructed. You cannot show that at all; but you can show whether the freight on the road has increased. You can show what amount of freight is obtained at the city of Montreal for through traffic, and you can show the number of passengers that pass from Montreal over the line. If that road had not been built a few might have taken the Intercolonial Railway at Quebec, but it is not likely the majority would have done so. The result is that if you look at the general improvement of the receipts of the road you have the best possible evidence you can have of the improved condition arising from this connection with the commercial metropolis of the country. One hon. gentleman has referred to the traffic from Newfoundland. Connection has been established with Newfoundland by the present government.

There is no doubt about that. The government is an enterprising government, and seeks to improve the condition of commerce of the country in every way that suggests itself, and that is one. And the hon. gentleman knows that you have, and are likely to find in the near future, a large amount of trade with that province which we did not possess before. But whether we would have that traffic, if people had not the chance of connection with the city of Montreal, whether the people might not take some other route than the Intercolonial Railway, I think may be fairly open to consideration.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where would they go?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no trouble at all. They could go to Portland or to Boston and they could come from there to Montreal. Some of them do that as it is, and the number who do so would have been very much larger if you had not had a continuous line of railway to the city of Montreal. I do not think it is necessary to enter into a discussion of this subject at the present time. I say the test of advantage from this connection is the improvement of freight and passenger traffic of the railway, and it is upon that rather than upon any local traffic that may be done along the line of road that the wisdom of the course taken by the government in entering into these contracts is to be justified. I am anxious that the hon. gentlemen opposite should have every means of information that it is in the power of the government to give them, but the hon. gentlemen know right well that you cannot take out a section of road fifty or one hundred miles in length and ask for a return of the earnings of that section without a great deal of trouble, and in many cases it would be impossible to give a full and accurate estimate. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. I ask him how does he know whether any one of those passengers who take the railway at Montreal and who seek to go to, say, St. John would have taken the Intercolonial Railway at all if the road had remained with its western terminus at Lévis?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON — Why would they not?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because they could have taken some other road. They would have taken the Canadian Pacific Railway. They would have no difficulty doing that. They may even do that now if they choose, but the fact remains that a certain number have gone to Montreal by the Intercolonial Railway, and what they would have done if that connecting link had not been acquired it is impossible for any one to say.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to remind my hon. friend of the fact that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) called the attention of the hon. minister to the 20th paragraph of the agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway, in which arrangements are made to keep an exact account of the mileage traffic.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We can discuss that at the proper time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is quite correct. I merely wish to add: I am not aware that in my remarks, animated though they may have been, that I discussed the traffic of the road, or the propriety of bringing it into Montreal at all. My whole argument, and all my quotations were to show that the information which I asked for, could be given. My hon. friend, who tried to draw a herring across the trail, began to discuss the policy of extending the road to Montreal. I did not argue that question at all. I am prepared to do that at the proper time. My whole argument was to show that, by the promises of the government, the statements before the committee and the statements of Mr. Pottinger and Mr. Schreiber, this information could be given, and that we wanted it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In the same way, my reference to an incubus referred to this information. I said if this information could be brought down it would show that the extension was an incubus.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Hon. gentlemen ——

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is nothing before the House and I raise the question of order.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I merely want to ask a question.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman cannot address the House unless there is something before it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I beg to move that the House adjourn.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The hon. gentleman from Cape Breton made a statement with reference to the traffic from Cape Breton on the Intercolonial Railway through the establishment of that line with Newfoundland. The hon. minister takes credit for his government for having developed this traffic. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton what the Federal Government has to do with it; do they supply a subsidy or anything of the kind?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I am not aware that the government has given any subsidy at all to this line running to Cape Breton.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I will explain how it is; they did not interfere with that National Policy.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It is owing to the completion of the Newfoundland Railway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A subsidy has been granted to a steamer running between Cape Breton or Halifax or some place in the maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—That is a different thing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That was granted fifteen or twenty years ago by the government of the late Mr. Mackenzie, and was continued by the government that succeeded him. The idea of the present government claiming credit for that is worse than absurd.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I hope the hon. gentleman will understand before the Drummond County Bill is discussed that we should have that information.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has already spoken on the motion for adjournment. He cannot speak on that motion now.

The motion to adjourn was withdrawn.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed, in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (2) "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 205.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I hope this clause will pass as it stands. I had a great deal to do with the introduction into this country of the distribution of works of art. In the mother country it is carried on largely for the benefit of artists. In other works, an exhibition is held of the works of the artists themselves and does good. In this country it does very little good, or any good that it may do is overshadowed by the fact that it is used as a cover for lotteries. I took occasion, as president of the Art Association of Montreal, recently to call attention to the subject and the following resolution was passed by the Art Association of Montreal:

Whereas, chapter 36 of 46 Victoria, Canada, as presently incorporated in the Revised Statutes of Canada, chap. 160, sec. 8 and sec. 205 of the Criminal Code (55 and 56 Victoria) was enacted for the purpose of permitting the introduction into Canada of Art Unions, in character similar to those at that time in operation in Great Britain, and was so enacted with a view of encouraging art and the development of painting, and had, therefore, at the time of its enactment the full approval of the Art Association of Montreal.

And whereas, the law presently existing has been used as a cover for carrying on lotteries having for object financial gain and the acquisition of money solely by the means of the selling and drawing of tickets and other modes of chance.

And whereas, such lotteries carried on by incorporated companies in the city of Montreal are in no way an advantage but rather a detriment to the cause of art and painting.

Resolved, that this association would approve of such a change in the law as it now stands as will render it impossible that such lotteries and gambling by way of tickets and other modes of chance can be carried on under the cloak and cover of companies or businesses established for the promotion and encouragement of art by means of the distribution by lot amongst the members or ticket holders, of drawings, paintings or other works of art produced by the labours of the members or published by or under the protection of any incorporated society.

The Ontario Society of Artists at Toronto wrote as follows to the Art Association of Montreal:—

TORONTO, 12th April, 1899.

ROBERT LINDSAY, Esq.,
Secretary Art Association of Montreal.

DEAR SIR,—I am requested to send you the following resolution passed at our last monthly meeting.

That the Ontario Society of Artists, learning with pleasure the action of the Art Association desire to approve and express their sympathy with their effort to regulate or abolish the Art Unions at present in operation in Canada, and their readiness to co-operate with them in this desirable effort.

I am, sir,
Yours truly,

(Sgd.) ROBT. F. GAGEN.
Sec. Ontario Society of Artists.

Now, I have no hesitation in saying that, under cover of this art union principle, there are lotteries carried on which are doing a great deal of harm, and I trust that the clauses of this bill which cover this principle shall be carried in their entirety.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do you think this clause will cover it?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I think so.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 208.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I might say the practice has grown up in some places of sending all the poor people of the country, who are unable to support themselves, to the jail, and I have inserted this provision to put an end to that practice. The vagrants provisions of our law grew up after the American civil war when a large number of tramps came into the country, and it was desirable to mitigate as far as possible that nuisance, but it was never intended that the inhabitants of the country should make use of it for the purpose of putting every poor and infirm person unable to support himself into jail. I have had brought under my notice one county, in the jail of which, during the past winter, between fifty and sixty poor people were kept, and beds were put up in every part of the prison for the purpose of furnishing accommodation to those who were in danger of perishing. Those people, so far as we know, except the fact that they were poor, had committed no offence against the law. I spoke to the inspector of prisons of Ontario in regard to the matter before I prepared this clause. I think this would to some extent put an end to that evil, for I do regard it as an evil. He called my attention to a case in which a party, who was in good circumstances at one time, but had transferred his property to his son and left himself destitute, was turned out of doors, and being unsupported by his own children was obliged to take refuge in the jail in order to live through the winter. I do not think that it is a desirable condition of things; at all events, this is a step in the direction of putting an end to that, and requiring each county to take some measure for the purpose of taking care of its poor. If they are not residents of the county, if they are ordinary vagrants, the law does not touch them. But it does disqualify them from picking up those who have lived for years in the county and putting them in jail in order to get rid of the expense of making humane provision for their wants.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We all know the law has been fearfully abused, but there is this difficulty. Take a city or county where they have no poor-house, and no place to send these people, and the very case to which the hon. gentleman refers, where the son is brutal enough—I think that is not too strong a word—to turn his parent out on the street, and there is no place to put him—what is the corporation to do under those circumstances? The only place they have to send him is the jail. There are plenty of counties in Ontario, and plenty of cities and towns in Ontario where they have no poor-house.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They must make provision.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But what are they to do in the meantime?

I think the clause is in the right direction, but when we come to reduce it to practice. Here is a case to which the hon. member calls the attention of the committee. He says a father had deeded his property to his son; that son was inhuman enough to turn him out and would not support him. There is no place to send him, and the hon. gentleman says the corporation must find a place.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is my answer, and they might a good deal better rent a building.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing they will not do that. If this would have the tendency of compelling them to do it, I think it would be beneficial.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think that is the effect it will have.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is three years not too long? Would two years not be enough?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no objection to inserting two years instead of three years.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the bill, and asked leave to sit again.

The Senate adjourned.

CANADA PERMANENT AND WESTERN CANADA INCORPORATION BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (75) "An Act to incorporate the Canada Permanent and Western Canada Mortgage Corporation," with several amendments. He said:—I may explain that these amendments are all applicable to just one clause in the bill, clause 6, where it provides that the company may invest in certain securities and in mortgages upon freehold and leasehold real estate or other immovables, and the committee add "fully paid up." The next amendment is that they may invest in the stock of any chartered bank or incorporated company incorporated in Canada, or in any province forming part of Canada, and the committee add at the end of the clause "provided the loan upon the security or the interest in the debentures, bonds or stock of the company shall not exceed one-fifth of the paid up capital of any such corporation or one-fifth of the paid up stock of the company." The company may take personal security as collateral to any advance made, or contracted to be made, by or for any debt due to the company. I may say that these amendments in the sixth clause were simply made in order to bring the bill into conformity with the Loan Companies Bill which has been before the House for the last day or two, and follow out exactly the lines of the Loan Companies Bill. I, therefore, move concurrence in the amendments.

The motion was agreed.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I should like to say to the House that this bill will have now to go back to the Commons, and it is, therefore, of considerable moment that it should be passed as soon as possible, as there are a great many arrangements depending upon its passage, and there is only, as I said before, this one amendment, which, as I explained, was made to conform with the Loan Companies Act. Then there is clause 23, with regard to foreign investments, and the company desire that the bill should not be read a third time until those clauses in the Loan Companies Act relating to the same subject are passed by this House. Therefore, I would ask the indulgence of the House to be permitted to hold the bill and move the third reading before the end of to-day's sitting, if those clauses are passed to-day, in order to allow the bill to go to the House of Commons to-night, and, I might also state, that my hon. friend from Rideau, who is opposed to the whole principle of the bill, desires to make some objections, and, perhaps, he would be pleased to do so when the third reading is moved.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I intend to move an amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I might just say that the opportunity will arise when the third reading is moved. I hope to proceed immediately with the Loan Companies Bill, and as soon as the clauses are adopted, I can see no good reason why the hon. gentleman should not be allowed to move the third reading of the bill to-day, if he so desires.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—How does that affect the amendment I propose?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Inasmuch as the hon. gentleman in charge of the bill is asking the indulgence of the House to be allowed to read it the third time to-day, he has to obtain the unanimous consent to suspend the rules in order to move the third reading, and he will not object to allowing the hon. member from Rideau (Mr. Clemow) to move the amendment without notice.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I want to strike out several clauses

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (69) "An Act to incorporate the Niagara, St. Catherines and Toronto Railway Company."—(Mr. McMillan.)

THE EXPORT OF SAW LOGS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Justice to a statement which I see in the newspapers, that the Attorney General of Ontario has granted his fiat permitting United States lumbermen, who own limits in that province, to test the right of the local government to compel the manufacture in Canada of saw logs cut upon land which they have leased. Hon. gentlemen may know that the Ontario Government, in leasing limits, have made it a condition that the logs must be manufactured in this country. United States lumbermen who are interested in the matter, have employed Chris. Robinson, Q.C., to test in the courts, the right of the Ontario Government to impose such a restriction. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the Dominion Government is to be made a party to that suit, it being a question affecting the constitution of the country, or whether they intend to be represented in the case in any way. The Dominion Department of Justice, I presume, has come to the conclusion that the province of Ontario has the right to impose such a condition, otherwise they would have disallowed the Act which was passed by the Ontario legislature, confirming such regulation. This being a constitutional question, I felt interested to know whether the Dominion Government is to be a party to the suit.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Of course I know nothing more about the matter than the hon. gentleman himself does, from what appears in the newspapers. The matter is one entirely within the purview of the local government. Whether it is intra vires or ultra vires, I have not considered the question. It is a matter under the jurisdiction of Ontario. They have their own law officers. They have not had any communication with us, and I see no reason for interfering. If they are ultra vires in their action, of course we could not much help them. If they are ultra vires, I suppose they will employ eminent counsel who will be able to maintain that position, but I have not considered the subject as it is outside of our jurisdiction.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It being a constitutional question and an interference with what might be considered the rights of the Dominion on a question of trade and commerce, induced me to ask the question. From the position taken by my hon. friend, I take it the government are quite willing to let the Ontario Government and the United States lumbermen fight it out, and then they will act in accordance with the decision of the courts.

THE USURY BILL.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to direct attention to a paragraph which appeared in this morning's Citizen and which, to say the least of it, has a tendency to create a very grave misapprehension on the public mind in regard to the attitude of the Banking Committee, of which I am a member, with regard to usury. I shall read the paragraph as it appears :

THE BILL THROWN OUT.

SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND COMMERCE WOULD NOT DISCUSS THE USURY BILL.

The bill to prevent usury was thrown out by the Senate Committee on Commerce yesterday. A number of compromises were suggested, but merely resulted in a deadlock. A vote was taken on the question: "Shall we proceed?" resulting in 6 for going on and 8 against.

Now, the paragraph to which I take exception, and which conveys to the public the idea that the members of the Banking and Commerce Committee regard usury, with all its heinousness as carried out in Canada to-day, as a legitimate business, is as follows :—

It is felt that usury is a legitimate business; that it is entered into by certain parties, who make a specialty of money-lending, because the banks are unwilling to accept stated risks; and that, so long as the rates of interest are not excessive, it should be permitted. Only when the interest becomes excessive should it be stopped.

I maintain that that is an entirely misleading paragraph. The attitude of the committee, in which my fellow members will bear me out, is this, that they have the strongest possible sympathy with the spirit of that bill, but the matter is such an intricate and involved one that they felt, in order to meet those enormities which occur in commercial communities, it would be necessary to have more time at the disposal of the promoter to frame his bill if possible to meet as many of these objectionable things as possible. I think the representatives of the press should be more careful in giving the findings of the committee of the Senate to the public. The whole tendency and trend of that paragraph is to create an impression directly at variance with the finding of the committee.

THE DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to the present position of the Dominion Elections Act, with a view to learn from him whether it is the intention of the government to propose an amendment or consolidation of that Act during the present session of Parliament. My immediate reason for calling my hon. friend's attention to the subject at this moment is this: As he will very well remember, a great deal of difficulty was experienced last year in fitting the Dominion Franchise Act, as far as it related to the province of Prince Edward Island, into the Dominion Elections Act. In the province of Prince Edward Island, as my hon. friend will well remember, there were no voters' lists, and open voting prevailed. In consequence of that, the adoption of the Dominion Franchise Act of 1898, and the adoption with it of the provincial laws, opened the door for a great many serious difficulties. We experienced that when we were dealing with the question, and on looking over the matter very carefully since, I find that some points which require attention escaped observation at the time. One of those points, not by any means the most important one, still one which calls for examination is this: it was pointed out here that section 43 of the Dominion Elections Act would raise a difficulty in Prince Edward Island, because every voter offering to enter a polling booth must have his name on the list. My hon. friend went on and moved that section 43 should not be made to apply to Prince Edward Island. That amendment, although all right as far as the question of voters' lists is concerned, makes the whole section not to apply to Prince Edward Island, and the consequence is that, technically, not one voter in Prince Edward Island has the right to enter a polling booth at all, because it happens that it is in connection with that section that the right of access is given to the voter to the polling booth. Of course it might be possible for the voters of the province to find their way into the polling booths even though the law does not provide a way for them to enter. Although that is an objection, it is not so serious as others. My hon. friend will remember that a system of marking objected ballots is provided for, and provision made for the deputy returning officers, at the close of the polls, to proceed to count the ballots, and it is provided that they shall reject any ballots that have any marks upon them excepting the initials, or the marks required to be put on under the section referring to the case of undecided appeals under the Dominion Franchise Act, which has been repealed; but under that section, I think it would probably be held that all those votes so objected to could be rejected by the deputy returning officer at the close of the poll, on the ground that they contained a mark not admitted under the Dominion Elections Act. Now that is a serious question, because, my hon. friend will see, if the law is allowed to stand unamended, and a large number of votes should be marked that way, the deputy returning officer might be obliged by the law to reject every vote so marked. All those votes might be thrown out and a most serious difficulty would, in consequence, be encountered. In fitting the Dominion Franchise Act into our Provincial Elections Act there is another difficulty. It is very hard to say whether the County Court judge is given the full power we thought he had. We thought he had power as a County Court judge, when he sat at a recount, to adjudicate upon those objected votes. That is very doubtful. On inquiry I find that it is doubtful whether full power is given in section 64, which says he shall verify or correct the ballot paper account and statement of the number of votes given for each candidate. But we go further and find that under the Dominion Elections Act the County Court judge has not the power to summon or examine witnesses, and of course that is a most vital objection, because he could not possibly at the recount enter into an investigation of the merits of the votes objected at the polls unless he had power to call witnesses before him and examine them. I am told there are difficulties elsewhere in the Act with regard to the application of the franchise law. We know at this moment the Dominion Elections Act is in a very bad shape. It has been amended again and again, and the nature of those amendments has been such that the Act has been turned inside out, and the attempt last year to follow the Franchise Acts of the provinces led to so many changes that the Act and its amendments stand in great need of consolidation. Whether the government are prepared at this late period of the session to go on with a measure of consolidation or not is a matter for them to consider, and I wish to call attention to what I have pointed out as very strong reasons why there should be an amendment, not to the Franchise Act, but to the Dominion Elections Act, so as to overcome the difficulties I have referred to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I shall give consideration to the statements which the hon. gentleman has made, and see what may be done a little later.

NISBET ACADEMY OF PRINCE ALBERT BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. POWER, in the absence of Mr. Lougheed, rose to move the third reading of Bill (10) "An Act respecting the Nisbet Academy of Prince Albert.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose hon. gentlemen have considered the bill. It is a matter dealing with education, over which we have given jurisdiction to the government of the North-west Territories. I have not had an opportunity of looking at the bill, but of course, as we have given the North-west Territories jurisdiction over this matter, we do not want to interfere with it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is a private college.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If it is a private college we might have the power to legislate, but it might more properly be incorporated by the authority which has jurisdiction over education.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The object of the bill is to authorize the Presbyterian Synod of the church in Canada to wind up the corporation, and we have jurisdiction over the Presbyterian Synod, which was incorporated by the Dominion Parliament, and I presume upon that ground we have the right to deal with this matter.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Perhaps it is because it refers to the Nisbet Academy that the hon. gentleman thinks it is called after me, and that I had something to do with it, but it is not so. It was handed to me, and it was afterwards transferred to the Hon. Mr. Lougheed. I do not know anything about it all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why not let it stand till Monday and have the deputy minister look into it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move that the order of the day be discharged and placed on the orders for Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

LOAN COMPANIES BILL.

IN THE COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (P) "An Act respecting Loan Companies."

On clause 29.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The clause suggested to me in place of this one reads as follows:—

The company may have agencies in any places in Great Britain or elsewhere for the registration and transfer of debentures or other stock, and for the transaction of any other business of the company.

That is very much wider than the clause in the bill, The limitations in reference to calling meetings for the purpose disappears, and I suppose we could trust the company to do that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You give the company power to establish agencies in England or elsewhere without any restrictions?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it is a good provision.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move that this clause be substituted in place of clause 29.

The motion was agreed to, and the substituted clause was adopted.

On the last clause.

41. The Companies Act, chapter 119 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, is hereby repealed so far as regards the formation or incorporation hereafter of any loan company or the amalgamation of any two or more loan companies by virtue of any of the provisions thereof; but every such company incorporated or formed by virtue of the said Act shall so remain and no provision of the said Act shall, as touching any such company, be in any wise affected by this Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certain parties who have, under chapter 119, the power of being amalgamated, with powers that this Act does not confer, have asked that they should have the power of amalgamation, but without abandoning any of the franchises which they now have, and so they propose that the word "confirmation or" should be struck out at the beginning of the third line of this clause and the word "or" at the end of that line, then the whole of the 4th and 5th lines to the words "thereof." I have considered this matter along with the officers of the Finance Department, and they think that it is better that the clause should be carried as it is. If they want to amalgamate with larger powers than this bill confers, then they would require to come to Parliament for amalgamation. I think this is not an unreasonable proposition; at all events, that is as far as I think we ought to go at the present time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only difficulty there would be in case any two companies should desire to unite, and they have powers other than those which are conferred upon them by this bill. They would have to ask for legislation, and that opens the door for continued legislation, which we are trying to avoid by the passage of a general consolidation Act. I can readily understand the position of the minister.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a choice of evils.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is to give up the powers which they have and become amalgamated, or remaining as they are. If it is thought, by those who have not only taken an interest in but studied this question, that the powers which have been given to these companies and which the amalgamation under this law would deprive them of, should be taken from them, then of course the clause should stand. I am rather inclined to take the other view. Still, if the object is to make them as uniform as possible, perhaps it is better to allow the clause to stand as it is.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the view that is taken. I have no very strong view on the subject. On consideration, I think it on the whole, it is desirable to secure uniformity as far as possible. If we once succeeded in obtaining it, then changes made hereafter must be for the general advantage of all companies alike. This bill goes to the House of Commons, and if there is any very strong feeling in that direction, of course they will amend it and it will be a short undertaking to reconsider it here, I move therefore that clause 41 be adopted as it stands.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE, from the committee, reported the bill, with amendments, which were concurred in.

CANADA PERMANENT AND WESTERN CANADA MORTGAGE CORPORATION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I presume I may now move the third reading of Bill (75) "An Act to incorporate the Canada Permanent and Western Canada Mortgage Corporation."

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved, in amendment:

That the said bill, as amended, be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, with instructions to strike out the 25th, 26th, 27th and 28th clauses of the said bill.

He said:—I stated before my objections to amalgamating these companies in the manner proposed by this bill. I do not see why, in view of the bill we have just passed, this legislation is necessary at all. They can take advantage of the bill we have just passed as well as they could by having special legislation. A good deal of discussion occurred to-day in the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and some information was obtained respecting the operations of these companies, but the committee had not the opportunity of examining the various accounts and statements of the companies interested in the amalgamation, in order to show where the deficiencies occurred, as I suppose they have occurred with respect to some companies interested in this matter.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—No.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have no doubt the originators and the gentlemen now applying for the Act of incorporation, are perfectly competent to carry out the provisions of this bill. They have the means and ability to do it, and therefore I do not intend to throw any discredit on their ability to carry out the intention of this bill. What I do object to is the principle advocated in this measure, that they can amalgamate these different companies with a huge capital without imparting the necessary information in order to allow the members of the House and the committee to ascertain whether it is necessary and whether it is in the interest of the country or not. Year after year applications have been made for the incorporation of companies. I strongly opposed them, because I think it is not a true principle to allow the incorporation of these companies unless the necessities of the country require it, but I was met with this argument, if people are inclined to invest their money in these companies and thereby reduce the rate of interest, we should not object. We find from what has taken place during the last fourteen or fifteen years that that has not been realized. They now come to us and say, "It is true that we obtained this power in the past, but we found that it has not been profitable, and therefore we require a change and want to amalgamate these concerns in order to reduce expense, and in that way enable the company to modify the rate of interest charged to people requiring money." I do not believe in that principle at all. If the original principle advocated was in the direction of incorporating this company with a view to obtaining money at a cheaper rate, certainly the provisions of the Act will not carry that principle out, because if a company with $7,000,000 of capital cannot pay a reasonable dividend, I do not see how we can expect a company with $20,000,000 will be enabled to accomplish this. We heard to-day that these companies had a capital of $14,000,000, one-half of which has not been paid up. If they required more capital, why did they not call upon the original stockholders to make up the unpaid principal for the purpose of carrying on their business operations? It appears to me that they found it was impossible to pay a dividend on $7,000,000, and instead of increasing their capital, they say now "If you allow us to amalgamate we will save sufficient in the expenses of the company to carry on a profitable business on $20,000,000 stock. The only plea of justification is that there is going to be a decrease in carrying on the business operations. I cannot understand that this can be accomplished to any appreciable extent. I object to these large trusts in Canada. In the United States they are doing everything by trusts, and the effect will be, in place of decreasing the value of the articles, that it will increase them. We know that by experience, We know that the oil trust and the steel trust have resulted in that way. Oil is higher to-day than before the amalgamation. It is a mammoth monopoly of the worst kind. I do not say that this amalgamation will lead to a monopoly, but it looks very much like it. If you pass this measure you will have other companies coming and asking for similar concessions. The next thing will be that the two great railway corporatious, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, will amalgamate. It has been the fear of the country that they might do so, and if they do amalgamate they will increase the cost of freight and traffic, increase the passenger rates to such a degree that it will be a burden on the people. I object to this amalgamation on principle, and because I think it will be injurious to the best interests of the country. I am now justifying the course I have taken in the past. I know the stockholders, bondholders and debenture holders can take care of themselves, but it is the duty of Parliament to see that the interests of the people who cannot protect themselves are looked after. The government may say they have no right to interfere, but I think they ought to intervene to prevent any tendency they have to injure the people. We have already sufficient companies to carry on the business without this amalgamation. Taking the view as a commercial man, I think business can be conducted far more satisfactorily to the country at large without this huge monopoly. They will force people to agree to any terms they may decide to impose. I had hoped that we would have had an opportunity of going into the details of these transactions, so that we could judge from actual knowledge whether this amalgamation was desirable. I do not know what their object is in asking for this legislation. The only plea they put forward is that there would be a reduction in the expenses, which would make up for the deficiencies in the past. However, we have not had an opportunity of going into it. We are simply asked, on the bald application of these gentlemen, to allow them to combine. If we grant their request we have no control over them, and perhaps in the future they may come back and ask us to reduce their capital, and in that way it would probably entail a heavy loss on the stockholders of the company. I suppose the motives of the company are proper, but they consult their own interests and the interests of the bondholders and debenture holders, and I do not think they have taken into consideration the interests of the country generally. I wish to test the feeling of the House, so that we can ascertain in the future whether my fears will be realized. I hope that they will not be. I have very grave doubts on the matter, and I think it right that I should express them in this chamber. I desire to know whether the bill, which has just been passed, would not give these people all the power necessary to carry out the provision contained in this Act. Before granting this bill to any parties, it would have to come under the supervision of the Governor in Council and Finance Minister by the terms of the general measure, and then they would examine into the details and say whether it was in the interest of the country, and if it were not they could refuse it. I know perfectly well that there is a feeling generally expressed that these gentlemen know what they are doing. I do not dispute that at all, and I think they are perfectly honest, but they have only one object in view, and that is to serve themselves and to get out of a bad bargain.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I would like to ascertain whether the bondholders, or debenture holders, were represented before the committee, or whether any statement was made that they would acquiesce in this legislation.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The bondholders were all consulted in the matter, and this draft was submitted to them when the bill was presented to the House. They were the ones that were considered most.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—We had no evidence of that before us.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It was stated by the gentleman who was representing those interested in the bill that this scheme had been submitted to the bondholders in England and was thoroughly approved of by them. I have only to mention the names of the deputation which went there—Mr. George Gooderham, Mr. Herbert Mason of the Canadian Permanent and Walter Lee of the Western Canadian, and these gentlemen were all connected with the Loan Company. Mr. Blackstock is their lawyer. The whole matter was thoroughly considered, with the greatest possible care, before this bill was reported. The draft was submitted to them. I desire to correct one statement which was made; I should be very sorry if this House should for a moment believe that any of these companies mentioned in the bill was not thoroughly sound and solvent, and came to the House to ask for powers, because they were in trouble. There was nothing of the kind. Every one of these companies desiring to federate was was perfectly solvent and sound.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That may be or may not be.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I do not think the comparison the hon. gentleman made between these companies and the trusts and monopolies is applicable to this bill in the least degree. I also call the attention of the House to the fact that this amalgamation cannot be carried into effect until all the shareholders in the different companies have met and agreed to carry out this bill. So that every interest is thoroughly guarded in that way. I may say that the object of this amalgamation is not only by the reduction in the expenses of carrying on the business and to make it possible to loan money on better terms to those who wish to borrow, but it is desired in every way to strengthen our credit in Scotland and England, and unquestionably it would have that effect. We all know that some little time ago there was considerable shock caused by the failure of one of the Ontario loan companies, and if a company of this kind had been in existence, with the powers which this bill proposes to give them, they might have taken over the liabilities of that company and prevented its debentures remaining unpaid, and though it might be necessary to liquidate these assets, still it would have saved all the scandal and discredit which occurred to Canadian investment. I cannot see in what way this bill can be considered otherwise than in the interests of either investors and borrowers in the country. On the contrary, I think it is calculated to be of very great advantage to both.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to speak on a question of order. The hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Allan) moved the third reading, under a suspension of the rule, and I rise to make a suggestion that an entry should be made in the minutes that before this third reading takes place, rules 70 and 71 were suspended by unanimous consent. That was the understanding, and it will be better to have it appear in the minutes.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I am fully in accord with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Rideau Division. It is very well known that combines of all kinds are against the interests of the country, and against the general interests of trade, and this is a combine of moneyed interests. We believe competition is the life of trade, and this is a bill to do away with competition in lending out money. I think that giving certain people the power of uniting their funds together, to the amount of $20,000,000 is putting a vast power into the hands of a few people. And after a few years they can increase that. It is an immense power to give any company, the control of $20,000,000. We know what good they might do with it, but we know also that they may do harm. I think it is a vicious principle to give power to a number of people to combine in this way and buy up smaller institutions of a similar nature, which are likely to keep down the prices of the commodity in which they are trading. We know that if there is only one institution which has the control of the money market, it has the power in its own hands to charge what it pleases. If there are a number of institutions competing for the lending of money, there is competition, the rate of interest is more likely to be brought to a proper level than when it is in the hands of one large institution such as the one to be created by the bill before us. Some allusion has been made to dividends. Is it at all likely that it is going to be any benefit to the poor people who want money that these people should get all the lending into their own hands, and that they should be enabled to pay larger dividends? That is certainly the object in combining, that they should be able to divide larger profits among themselves, and these profits are to be made out of the power to hire out money. I am opposed to the principle of the bill, not only to the clauses which the hon. gentleman from Rideau attacks, but the whole principle of the bill, because it is giving too much power to one company.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not see the force of the objection made by the hon. members who are opposing this bill. This is just one of the kind of combines that cannot work against the public interest. No matter what rate this company undertakes to fix as the value of money, it cannot put up the price beyond that which other companies
