CHAPTER VI.

Her husband! The mere sound of the word sent her thoughts into a different current.

These kindly feelings, these hopes for the future, had not passed away when Madge awoke in the morning.

"Oh, I follow you!" he said, "it isn't time for me to speak just yet, while you are dealing in generalities."

"I have no doubt that I have been very foolish in allowing my fears to get the better of me, and in refusing to go and act in London."

Madge knew, moreover, that at such an hour she should be able to walk through the streets without undergoing the severe scrutiny which was usually bestowed upon her.

fields being the only human creatures within view.
Eleven o'clock rang out from the cathedral as she arrived within sight of her destination;

"Oh, you do, do you?" said the Major slowly, giving his legs one vicious switch; "don't let's have any mistake about it this time; let me understand you quite clearly."

"I do!" she cried, exasperated at the mocking tone in which he spoke; "I do, and I tell you so plainly. Do you think I have been blinded by this pretext for an instant?"

"Suppose it were!" she echoed; "well then, I tell you plainly, I would not marry you for the sake of your money."

"I will tell you, Philip; but before I tell you let me say one word about myself and about myself."
